1) Early Greek· God of herds, guardian of paths or trails, and of guides to travellers; swift messenger of the gods, inventor of the lyre and shepherd's pipe. Later, a conductor of the dead to the underworld, he carries a caduceus or ancient herald's wand, and is pictured in the cults wearing winged sandals, and occasionally wings on his cap; patron of heralds, of traders, of orators, of market places, and of thieves, a god of healing and a 'quieter of pestilence'. Finally, with the attainment of the assumption by Greeks of the unity of nature, Hermes, as with Pindar*, changes to a divinity of righteousness and truth; and fades into the jurisdiction and power of a greater cosmic deity.

2) In Egypt Hermes and Hermanubis. In Egypt the power of the Greek god is more apparent than real. To the Greek mind in Egypt, the Egyptian god Hermanubis (a name compounded of Horus* and Anubis, two Egyptian gods), a messenger of the gods guiding the dead before Osiris*, suggested an identification with their Hermes, Psychopompos, in a similar role. Out of this identification of function a type arose which represented Hermanubis as a Greek god, crowned with a modius, and carrying a caduceus and palm branch, etc. But this Hermanubis fails to gain the worship of Anubis who was worshiped with Isis and Osiris at Rome

Hermes was also identified with other Egyptian gods, the chief, perhaps, being Thoth*, the god of learning. (See below, 3). Due no doubt to this linkage the name Hermes became attached to special writings of a magical character which developed in the Roman period. Hermes was linked also with local Egyptian gods, and connected with various animals, plants, sun, moon, etc., probably because of the tie with the powerful Egyptian gods Anubis and Thoth. See Egypt, religions of.

3) In Egypt: In the Roman imperial period, Hermes appears as a god of revelation for man's regeneration; worshiped at Hermopolis; father of Thoth, Egyptian god of wisdom; revealer of divine wisdom by which man may become a new man, a son of God. See Mercury.

These and other doctrines are derived from one Hermes, a descendant of the god Hermes and are found in Hermes Trismegistus, a philosophical and religious literature of the third or early fourth centuries A D., which embodied a conglomerate of ideas of various religious philosophies of the age, mostly Greek in origin, and strongly Platonic, with a dash of loyalty to the religion of ancient Egypt which was in a state of decay. The point of view is pro-Egyptian. The doctrines show little resemblance to Christianity.   F.L.P.

hermit: (Gr., eremos desert) Used in a general sense, as synonymous with anchorite*, to describe a solitary without official order or rule, devoting himself to God's service. In its technical usage the term denotes membership in a regulated eremitical association. Anchorites and hermits, who gave to Christian monasticism* its early character, did not cease to function upon the introduction of the cenobitic* forms.   R.C.P.

Hermits of St. Augustine: See Augustinians.

Hernnhut: See Zinzendorf; Moravian Church.

hero worship: Reverence or devotion offered to men who have become divine or semi-divine because of their qualities, rank or the services rendered to their peoples. Culture heroes who taught men agriculture, building, weaving, healing or other arts of civilized living are revered in almost every land. Some heroes were founders of states or religions or families. The first ancestor of a clan and the prophet of a successful gospel very frequently reached divine status. The ancestors of the ruling dynasty in China shared honors with Heaven. Many of the popular gods were men appointed after death to divine office in their districts. In Egypt dead kings were worshiped because of their royal rank. The emperor of Japan receives devotion as the lineal descendent of the Sun Goddess. The epic heroes of northern Europe, Greece, and India are revered because of personal achievements as mighty warriors, men of wisdom, great saints or ascetics. Some of India's heroes are worshiped as incarnations of the high god. The warrior dead of Japan are enshrined with divine honors. In ancient Greece the cult of heroes had a prominent place. The heroes were expected, in return for sacrifices, to give guidance, healing, fertility and help in war. See ancestor worship; emperor worship.
          A.E.H.

Herodotus: See philosophy of history.

Herrites: See Mennonites.

Herrmann, Wilhelm Johann Georg: (1846-1922) As professor at the University of Marburg, he emphasized a close affiliation between ethics and religion. He was the first theologian to openly ally himself with A. Ritschl*. He regarded the introduction of metaphysics into theology and vital religion as detrimental. He was suspicious of the encroachment of philosophy and of the influence of mysticism upon vital religion and theology. For him ethico-religious experience was the basis of religion. He introduced the distinction between faith-ground and faith-content, and tried to base the theology of faith upon the inner life of Jesus. He considered the moral principle as altogether the product of ethical personality. To attain an ethical personality was to get away from one's self and work for the well-being of man in general. He sought to give content to the formal, empty categorical imperative of Kant. Religion had for him its own distinctive way of arriving at its assurance of God and of framing a comprehensive view of the world.

Die Religion im Verhältnis zum Welterkennen und zur Sittlichkeit (Halle, 1879) ; Der Begriff der Offenbarung (Freiburg, 1887) ; Die Gewissheit des Glaubens und die Freiheit der Theologie (2 ed., Freiburg, 1889) ; Ethik (Tubingen und Leipzig, 1901, 2 ed., Tubingen und Leipzig, 1909) ; The Communion of the Christian with God (London, 1895) ; Faith and Morals (1904) ; Die Wirklichkeit Gottes (Tubingen, 1914) ; Systematic Theology (London, 1927) ; E. Troeltsch, Gesammelte Schriften, vol. II (Tubingen, 1913) ; W. Schultz, Das Grundgefüge der Herrmanschen Theologie, ihre Entwicklung und ihre geschichtliche Wurzeln (Berlin, 1926) ; M. Redeker, Wilhelm Herrmann im Kampf gegen die positivistische Lebensanschauung (Gotha, 1928).   H.H.

Hestia: (Gr., Hestia, hearth) Sister of Zeus*, virgin goddess of the hearth, both of the home and of the city. With libations to her, sacrifices began and ended. Each colony took sacred fire from the city's hearth to its new home. Cf. Vesta of the Romans.
          E.M.N.

heterodoxy: (Gr., heteros, other; doxa, opinion) Contrary to or differing from a standard (Bible, creed, or conciliar decree) acknowledged as orthodox*; usually denotes a departure not serious enough to be punished as heresy*.   F.G.E.

heteronomy: (Gr., heteros, other, and nomos, law) Law imposed by another. Used by Kant* in his ethics to mean any principle determining moral action which does not arise from the rational will of the agent. Thus, conduct is heteronomous when it arises from emotion, desire, pleasure, affection, or the will of another. See autonomy.   E.S.B.

Hewett Lectureship, The: Established in 1923 by Waterman T. Hewett with a capital sum of $10,000 and given at the Union Theological Seminary, New York, the Episcopal Theological School, Cambridge, Mass., and the Andover-Newton Theological School, Newton Center, Mass. The lectures are given annually, biennially or triennially on the subjects dealing with "the truths of Christianity as shown in revelation, reason and in history", on the value and authority of Scriptures, on the church and missions, or on fresh discoveries in archaeology relating to "Christian truths." Lecturers: Canon B. H. Streeter, A. D. Lindsay, C. H. Dodd and Richard Kroner.

(Data furnished by the Office of the Registrar, Union Theological Seminary.)   V.F.

Hexapla: See Origen; polyglot Bibles; versions of the Bible, ancient.

Hexateuch: Literally, "six books" The term employed by biblical scholars to designate the first six books of the Bible. It contrasts with the term, "Pentateuch,"* "five books." This latter term reflects the popular belief, based upon the biblical record itself, that the first five books of the Bible, Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers and Deuteronomy, were all written by Moses,* under divine inspiration, constitute therefore a distinct literary unit, and possess a unique authority as the divinely revealed law of God. This belief, that these so-called "five books of Moses" or "Torah,"* to use the traditional Hebrew term, are the record of God's law, revealed to Israel, give to these five books an additional unity, that of content.

Already in the seventeenth century, however, scholars began to perceive serious internal contradictions and duplications within the Pentateuch, in both its narrative and legal sections. Steadily the conclusion became firmly established that the Pentateuch could not possibly be the writing of one man or of one single age, but was a composite literary work, the product of numerous writers and of a long period of time, worked together, more or less skillfully, into a seeming literary unit by various editors or redactors. Beginning in the second quarter of the nineteenth century, and with the task still far from completed, biblical scholars have painstakingly unravelled the various strands of narrative and legislation and determined with relative accuracy the broad content and approximate date of each literary strand or "document," as generally called.

They distinguish in the main four major documents, the Jahwist Code (J*), coming from the Southern Kingdom and dated to 900-500 B.C., the Elohist Code (E*), composed in the Northern Kingdom at about 850-700 B.C., the Deuteronomic Code (D*), 621-350 B.C., and the Priestly Code (P*), 450-250 B.C. None of these major documents is itself a literary unit. On the one hand, they have incorporated into themselves a number of smaller codes, such as the Kenite Code (K) in J, the Book of the Covenant (C) in E, and the Holiness Code (H) in P; and, on the other hand, they consist themselves of various internal strands. Actually, therefore, each of these four major documents represents a school of theological thought and literary composition extending over several centuries.

Very quickly after this scientific analytic process began, it became apparent that at least three of these four major documents, viz. J, D and P, and perhaps E also, continued into the sixth book of the Bible, the Book of Joshua,* and that therefore, not the first five, but the first six books of the Bible constituted the true, literary unit, as it was fashioned by its successive editors. It is this literary unit, viz., the Pentateuch plus Joshua, which the term, "Hexateuch," describes. In these six books there is a definite unity of thought as well as of composition, for together they record the traditional history of the birth of the Israelite people, its migration to and settlement in Egypt, its deliverance from Egyptian bondage through divine aid and in accordance with divine promise, its journey through the desert under divine guidance, and its final settlement in Palestine. Without the record of the fulfillment of God's promise in the Book of Joshua, the history would be incomplete.

Obviously the Hexateuch was the original literary unit. Probably not until some time in the fourth century B.C. was the Book of Joshua separated from the first five books and relegated to a subordinate position. This was done largely because of theological and ritualistic considerations, primarily to emphasize the significance of the Torah, the divinely revealed law, in the life, belief and practice of the Jewish people. The Pentateuch is therefore actually a later and historically less real literary unit than the Hexateuch.

J. E .Carpenter and G. Harford, The Composition of the Hexateuch (London, 1902) ; J. A. Bewer, The Literature of the Old Testament (1933) ; R. H. Pfeiffer, Introduction to the Old Testament (1941).

J.M.

Hicksites: See Society of Friends; anti-missionary movement in the U. S.

hierarchy: (Gr., hieros, sacred; archein, to rule) Divine government, or usually holy orders. The function of representing God to man and man to God within any social group requires some recognized order. The simplest form of this, the religious function of the pater familias, was in ethnic religions copied in the state, but a priesthood* separate from government became necessary to maintain and guard developing bodies of knowledge about theology and cultus and to insure training for right performances of function. The organization of different cults and the interrelationship of them in polytheism (e.g., Amon in Egypt and Assur in Assyria) and political alliances of countries with hereditary priesthoods (e.g., in Israel, Syria, and Egypt) brought about increased gradations of function. Succession within a hierarchy may be by inheritance (e.g., the Aaronic priesthood in Israel, and the Aztecan kings), by caste (e g., the Brahmims), or by consecration and ordination (e.g., the rabbinate in post-Exilic Judaism, and the Christian ministry. The word hierarchy first appears with the Pseudo-Dionisius who compares the nine orders of angelic beings with three groups of three each of Christian people, of whom two were laity and one that of the three holy orders of bishop, priest and deacon. See clergy.   T.J.B.

hieroglyphic writing: System of writing used by the ancient Egyptians, mainly ideographic, which later gave way to the Hieratic and to the Demotic systems. Deciphered by Champollion in 1822 with the help of the trilingual inscription of the Rosetta Stone.   S.L.T.

Hieronymites: A name best known in connection with a monastic* order which in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries possessed some of the most famous monasteries · in Spain (e.g., the Escurial). Though marked by great austerity, and given largely to study and the active ministry, they gained great influence at court.   G.R.C.

high altar: The principal altar in a church as distinguished from the lesser or side altars.

P.V.N.

high church: A term applied under Queen Anne to strong supporters of the Church of England in politics, later to Anglicans who held a high view of the church and its sacraments. See Anglo-Catholics.

E.R.H.

high mass: See mass

high place: (Semitic places of worship) "High place" is the translation of the Hebrew word bamah which signifies both "elevation" and "sanctuary," in accordance with the Semitic* and particularly Canaanitic* custom of establishing sanctuaries at high points. The connection of divinity with mountains is found in all parts of the Near East, especially in Syria and Asia Minor. Not all bamot, however, were on hills, e.g. that of Gezar. They were sometimes in valleys, open-air shrines marked by mazzebot (stone pillars) and asherah (sacred wooden post), lavers, images of the gods and other cultic objects. In such cases the word bamah seems to refer to the elevated structure of the shrine itself, and this may well be the original meaning of the word.

These bamot were not exclusively Canaanitic. YHWH, God of Israel, also had His legitimate bamot. The corrupt influences of foreign idolatry, however, rendered the continued existence of bamot in Israel and Judea a distinct danger to the holiness of YHWH and to national survival, and the prophets denounced them in the strongest terms. Several attempts were made, as a result, by Judean kings to root out the bamot, the most famous under Josiah (2 Ki 22 3, 2 Chron. 34.3).

H.K.-L.F.

high-priest: The highest ecclesiastical official in the Jewish priestly organization in biblical literature. Biblical tradition represented him as being a descendant of Aaron; this is, however historically untrue. Actually all passages in the Bible which refer to the high-priest date from the last quarter of the fifth century B.C. or even later. The office itself was instituted only in 411 B.C. The high-priest was the chief ecclesiastical ministrant in the Temple at Jerusalem at the most important religious festivals and functions in the Jewish calendar, and especially in the momentous ceremonies of the annual Day of Atonement. He likewise presided over the Sanhedrin. The office came to an end with the destruction of the Temple by the Romans in 70 A.D. See priesthood, Hebraic and Jewish; Urim and Thummim.

J.M.

higher criticism: See Biblical criticism.

Hilary of Poitiers, St.: (ca. 300-367) Bishop of Poitiers ca. 350 A.D. A protagonist of orthodoxy against Arianism.* Exiled by Constantine to the East, where he attempted to bring about a reconciliation between semi-Arians* and Catholics. Restored to his See in 364.

S.M.G.

Hildebrand: See Gregory VII., St. Pope.

Hillel: Hillel I, also known as Hillel the Elder (Ha-Zaken), was the most prominent Jewish teacher of the first century (30 B.C.E.-10 C.E.), the founder of an influential school which bears his name (Beth Hillel*), and the ancestor of the patriarchs, the leaders of Palestinian Jewry during the first four centuries of the common era. A Babylonian by birth and, according to tradition, of Davidic stock, Hillel migrated (in early manhood) to Palestine to sit at the feet of the great masters of Biblical interpretation and exposition, Shemaiah and Abtalion Despite great poverty and hardship (cf. Yoma 35b), Hillel pursued his studies with rare diligence and zeal, and rapidly became one of the keenest masters of the Bible. Such was his fame that when the Bene Bathyra, the heads of the college, resigned, Hillel was appointed to succeed them and became the recognized authority among the scholars of the Law.* Later generations are indebted to him for the formulation of seven rules for the systematic exposition of the Bible. These rules became basic for later Rabbinic* reasoning.

Hillel is revered not only for his profound scholarship but also for his inspiring saintliness. Humbleness and love for his fellowmen are the keystones of his character. All the legends which later generations wove about him as well as the sayings ascribed to him reveal these two characteristic traits. Perhaps the best appreciation of his character can be gained from the story of the heathen who came to Hillel and asked for a very concise statement of the essence of Judaism. Hillel replied, "What is hateful to thee, do not unto thy fellowman, this is the whole Law, the rest is mere commentary." (Shab. 31a).

E.B.-L.F.

Hillel Foundation, the: See student religious organizations.

hillul hashem: See kiddush hashem.

Hinayana: See Buddhist Terminology.

Hincmar of Rheims: (c. 806-882) Archbishop of Rheims, personal councilor to the West-Frankish kings, annalist, most powerful Gallican ecclesiastic of his time. His high conception of his office as Metropolitan led to an inevitable and losing struggle with Pope Nicholas I* which brought into prominence for the first time the Pseudo-Isidorian decretals.*

F.W.N.

HINDU TERMINOLOGY: See abhiseka, Aditi, Adityas, advaita, Agni, ahimsa, Ajivikas, Akbar, Aranyakas, Arya Samaj, Assam, Asura, Asvins, Atharva Veda, atman, avatar.

Bhagavad Gita, bhakti-marga, Brahma, Brahma Samaj, Brahman, Brahmanas, Brahmanaspati (Brihaspati), Brahmanism—see Hinduism.

Charvakas.

Dasyus (Dasus), Deva, dharma, dhyana, Dravidians, Dyaus.

Gandharvas, Ganesha, gayatri, Gosala, Granth, guna, guru.

Hinduism, Hiranyagarbha.

India, religions of; Indra, Ishvara.

Jagganath, Jainism, jnana-marga.

356

Kali, kalpa, karma-marga, Keshub Chunder Sen, Krishna, kshatriya.

Lakshmi, linga, Lingayats, Lokayata.

Mahabharata, Mahadeva, Mahavira, mahatma, mantras, manu, Maruts, maya, Meru, Mohenjo-daro, moksha, mukti.

Nanak, Narayana.

om

Parjanya, Parvati, Pitris, Prajapati, prakriti, prapatti-marga, pretas, prithivi, puja, Puranas, purohita, purusha, Pusan (Pushan).

rakshas, Ram Mohan Roy, Rama, Ramakrishna, Ramananda, Ramanuja, Ramayana, Rig Veda, rishi, rita, Rudra.

sacred thread, sadhana, Saivism, (Shivism, Shivaism), sakti, see shakti, samadhi, Sama-Veda, Samhita, samsara, Sankhya, Sankhya-Yoga, sannyasi, sati, see suttee, Sarasvati, Savitri, shakti, (Shaktism, Saktism), Shankara, Shiva (Civa), shraddha, Sikh, smriti, Soma, Sraddhas, see Shraddhas, sruti, see shruti, sudra, Surya, sutras, suttee, swastika.

Tantras, tapas, Temples, Indian, Thags, Trimurti.

Uma, Upanishads, Ushas.

Vac, Vaicesika, Vaiseshika, see Hinduism, Vaisnavism, see Vishnuism, vaisyas, Varuna, Vasudeva, Vayu (Vata), Vedanta, Vedas, Vedic religion, see Hinduism; Vishnu, Vishnuism, Vivekananda.

Yajur-Veda, Yama, yantras, Yima, Yoga Philosophy, see Yoga, Hinduism; Yoga, yogi.

Hindu triad: See s. v. Vishnu.

Hinduism: A broad term used by modern historians of religion to designate the traditional religion of India, past and present. Its various stages of development historically are as follows: 1) Vedic Hinduism, 2) Brahmanic Hinduism; 3) Philosophic Hinduism, 4) Devotional or Sectarian Hinduism, and 5) Reformed Hinduism, to which might also be added Heretical Hinduism to include the Buddhist and Jain movements which arose in the 6th century B C.

I. Vedic Hinduism. Before the Aryan invasion of India there was, of course, a native religion which may be characterized as Dravidian* or pre-Aryan Hinduism, a great deal of which survives in the popular Hinduism of the present time. That there was a flourishing and highly developed cult in the Indus valley as long ago as 3,000 B.C. is now well established by archeological discoveries of the past two decades. That some of the major conceptions and practices, and probably also, divine figures of post-Vedic Hinduism were known in that remote period is also fairly clear. (See Mohenjo-daro).

Whatever the original native religion, it was pretty well displaced for a number of centuries by the vigorous Aryan invaders who came into India at some unknown period, probably going back of 1,500 B.C. (See Aryans.) The Vedic religion was a relatively optimistic, life-loving, on the whole this- worldly faith, though not without a conception of the afterlife. The prayers and hymns found in the Vedas, which are the source books of that period of Hinduism, reflect the wants and needs of the people as being an abundant food supply in the form of cattle and dairy products mainly, large families, success in war (they were still an invasion force) and length of life. The gods were on the whole nature forces such as Varuna, sky, Indra, storm, fertility, war, Agni, fire, Soma, the intoxicant which was a constant element in sacrifice and the elixir of immortality. Then there was also wind, Vayu, Ushas, dawn, and many others. Of sun gods there were many. The cult was originally a family affair, becoming increasingly complex with an elaborate priesthood, an involved ritual, and a numerous collection of hymns, prayers, and incantations embodying the essential desires and needs of the people The four Veda and the Atharva-veda, are the literature of the period and have come to be regarded as the basic scriptures of all Hinduism

II. Brahmanic Hinduism is that transitional stage of Hinduism represented in the literature known as the Brahmanas and represents the decadence of ancient Vedic Hinduism into an infinitely tiresome and costly ceremonialism which by its over-emphasis on the magic power of the cult reduced the very gods to the position of relative impotence in that the power of the spell or charm came to exceed that of the gods themselves, and so led to their ultimate discrediting. During this period there began to emerge the ideas of Karma and transmigration which were to become the most characteristic features of later Hinduism. Also there is the beginning of some philosophic speculation as to man's origin and destiny. Caste became a fixed institution during this period and was to be henceforth the framework of Indian society.

III. At a period not far from that in which Greece began to speculate about the nature of the world and man, men began in India likewise to reflect concerning the origins of man and his world, the nature of the reality behind the universe and how man might attain to salvation. The record of this reflection is preserved in the Upanishads,* the great basic philosophical texts of Hinduism from which all subsequent Indian philosophical speculation takes its start. By this time the idea of Karma, the law of the dead, or the law of sowing and reaping, and the idea of reincarnation, a series of lives in which each successive life is determined by the Karma of previous existences, were well established and the deep desire of man had become that of escape from the round of rebirth. As to the nature of reality, philosophical Hinduism, arrived at the idea of Brahman, the neuter world soul, a monistic world view, or, according to many authorities, a pantheistic conclusion, and salvation came to be thought of as possible, not through the practise of sacrifice, however expensive and complicated, but by the way of knowledge. The nature of the knowledge required was conceived of differently by later schools of interpretation, whether that of knowledge of the identity of the self with the self of the universe, or the knowledge of the total unreality of all existence including that of man himself and the universe, that is, that all is illusion; or whether as in one school, the knowledge of the eternal separateness of spirit and matter. But all held that it was knowledge alone that could avail for escape or moksha.* The method of attaining knowledge varies likewise, but the general method of Yoga* that is a process of highly disciplined meditation under physical conditions the most favorable possible, was the almost universal method. Vedic Hinduism disappeared, likewise Brahmanic, but Philosophic Hinduism interpreted variously by different philosophical schools such as that of Shankara and Ramanuja, continues still and has cast somewhat of a philosophical film even over some of the cruder forms of sectarian Hinduism. Perhaps the best known modern school is the Vedanta*.

IV. As a natural reaction on the one hand to the decadence of Bhramanic Hinduism and the highly speculative and somewhat intangible thought of Philosophical Hinduism which served mainly the intelligentsia of India, there arose two highly divergent tendencies. One took the form of atheism, at least so far as any dependence on the aid of the gods was concerned. Out of this general tendency came, in the 6th century B.C., Buddhism* and Jainism.* Both came to be regarded as distinct religions and will be so discussed in this volume. Some authorities still treat them merely as heretical sects of Hinduism.

V. There is evidence that as the ancient Vedic deities declined in power two great personal deities began to emerge. One of these, Vishnu, was a minor Sun deity in the Vedas. Gradually he became almost a monotheistic figure to whom the devotion of great bodies of Indians was attracted.
Here was a great personal, powerful deity in whom one could trust, who was not limited as were the Vedic deities by the power and magic of ceremony, nor so vague and impersonal as the philosopher's deity, Brahman. When, possibly due to the influence of philosophic Hinduism, he became assimilated to the impersonal Brahman, there arose the belief that Vishnu had manifested himself in concrete form through a series of incarnations, ten in number traditionally, which reached their climax in Rama and Krishna.*
These deities with their consorts are the major objects of worship of the Vishnu sects of Hinduism and are widely spread throughout India.
Here the way of salvation is not through sacrifice nor through knowledge, but through loving faith, and devotion to the great god or his incarnation, in other words salvation by faith (bhakti).*
There had now come to be also an elaborate system of hells and heavens into and out of which the soul might be born in its endless cycle of births. To the philosopher this salvation seemed inadequate, one from which the soul must again come to rebirth until through knowledge it achieved complete emancipation. To the humble devotee (bhakta), however, it seemed enough that through the gracious help of Krishna or Rama he should attain to eternal communion with god.

Shiva, the other great personal deity which emerged was probably only the resurgence of a great deity who had been eclipsed by the coming of the Aryans. To be sure, he is linked with Rudra of Vedic times and bears somewhat the destructive character of that god of storm but the main lineaments of Shiva are probably drawn from the pre-Aryan faith. Certainly there are numerous traces of the Linga which is the phallic symbol of Shiva in the ancient ruins of the buried cities of the Indus. Shiva and his consorts who are numerous and of varied character are widely worshipped, he being represented usually as the generative force of the universe, symbolized either by the bull, Nanda, or by the Linga. Kali* is perhaps the most widely worshipped of his consorts. Here likewise salvation is largely of a devotional type rather than that of knowledge or through the performance of ceremonials or au-sterities. There are many sub-sects both of Vish-nuism and of Shivism. The literature of these sects is the Puranas. The Bhagavad-Gita is the great devotional classic of Krishna worship but has a universal quality about it which makes it usable among the people of many sects.

VI. Reform Movements in Hinduism. The great Aryan invasion produced Vedic Hinduism;
The Moslem invasion about 1,000 A.D. brought Hinduism and Islam into intimate contact; the resulting syncretism produced a movement at the end of the 15th century known as the Sikh movement. It was founded by Nanak* at about the time of the European Reformation. From Islam it took three things, its monotheism, somewhat modified to be sure in the course of time, second, its nonidolatrous worship, and third, its militance. It early became a theocracy and controlled Northwest India. It is largely limited to that area still.
Its sacred book is the Granth.* It is regarded now as a separate religion by many historians.

The invasion of the west beginning in the 16th century brought Christianity and Western culture into contact with Indian culture. This resulted eventually in a number of reform movements such as the Brahma-Samaj* founded in 1828, the Arya-Samaj* founded in 1875, the Rama-Krishna movement, Servants of India, etc. All of these borrowed heavily from Christianity but retained significant features of Hinduism and are active forces in India today.

Is there anything common to Hinduism as thus far described? Not much, yet some things. For instance, the respect for the Vedas is almost universal though repudiated in some modern movements; the principle of Karma and reincarnation runs through all save Vedic Hinduism; the principle of caste is the social framework through which most of them operate and for which most of them find religious authority; a strange mystic strain pervades most of Hinduism and a respect for the sanyasi* or holy man is almost universal.
The principle of non-injury of Ahimsa, while not universal is widely held though with varying degrees of strictness. It may be that Professor Das was right when he characterized Hinduism as only an anthropological process. It is broad; it is tolerant, it has an absorbtive quality which enables it to assimilate almost anything with which it comes in contact. When it was officially asked for census purposes, "What constitutes a Hindu?", the only answer that one writer could find as satisfactory was this, "Any one who says he is a Hindu, is one." See cycles of time; sacred literatures, salvation; transmigration.

Vedic Hinduism
H. D. Griswold, The Religion of the Rig-Veda (1923); Maurice Bloomfield, The Religion of the Rig-Veda (1908).
Philosophic Hinduism
Robert E. Hume, The Thirteen Principal Upanishads (1931); S Das Gupta, History of Indian Philosophy, 3 Vols. (Cambridge, 1922, 1932 and 1941), S. Radhakrishnan, Indian Philosophy, 2 Vols (London, 1923, 27).
Modern Hinduism
J N Farquhar, Modern Religious Movements in India (1918); H. D. Griswold, Insights into Modern Hinduism (1934); S. Radhakrishnan, The Hindu View of Life (London, 1927).
General
S. Das Gupta, Hindu Mysticism (1927); J. B. Pratt, India and Its Faiths (1915); Nichol Mc-Nicol, Living Religions of India (London, 1935); M. Monier-Williams, Brahmanism and Hinduism (London, 1887); Mrs. Sinclair Stevenson, Rites of the Twice-born (1920).   C.S.B.

Hippolytus: (ca. 160-235) A learned Roman Christian, who wrote many important works. From 217-235 he headed a local schism but was nevertheless canonized after martyrdom.   B.S.E.

Hiranyagarbha: (Lit. Golden Germ) The cosmic intelligence or soul, "related to the universe in the same way as the individual soul is related to its body." (S. Radhakrishnan, Indian Philosophy, I, 1923) In Rig Veda X, 121 it is said, "In the beginning arose Hiranyagarbha, the earth's begetter, who created heaven." However, in Svetāsvatara Upanishad the golden germ is said to have been created by Rudra.   C.S.B.

historical criticism: See Biblical criticism; exegesis.

historical materialism: See Marx, Karl.

history, philosophy of: See philosophy of history.

History of Susannah: See Susannah, History of.

Hittites: Name of an ancient people living in Asia Minor, mentioned in the OT. Some of their archives were discovered on thousands of clay tablets at Boghar-Keui, Turkey, in 1906-1910.
See A. Goetze, Hethiter, Churriter und Assyrer (1936), "The Present State of Anatolian and Hittite Studies," in The Haverford Symposium on Archeology and the Bible (1938), ed. by E. Grant, pp. 136-157; G. Furlani, La Religione degli Hittiti (1936); Saggi sulla civilta degli Hittiti (1939).   S.L.T.

Hobbes, Thomas: (1588-1679) A mechanistic materialist who defended the cynical view that the whole of human life is "one continuous exercise in self-love." Ascribing the origin of religion to the primeval fear of the unknown, he, like Epicur and Lucretius, derived religion from terror and superstition. His uncommon hatred of theology is connected with the ecclesiastical pretensions of the papacy. Blindness and thoughtlessness of faith have been in no system so expressly stated. He distinguished the essential and the non-essential elements of religion, and explained away obvious contradictions between Scripture and faith. Religion is not philosophy, but law. It demands not discussion, but obedience. The state decides all religious questions. By removing immortality to the general resurrection at the Last Day, he, like Milton and Priestley, combined materialism with faith. Hobbes is proof of the fact that materialism and atheism are not identical, even if related conceptions. He was a devoted partisan of the Episcopal High Church. A great deal of unnecessary effort has been spent on his theology. He seemed to conceive of God as a part of the universe—controlling, universally spread, uniform, and by its motion determining mechanically the motion of the whole. Cf Erastianism.
F Brandt, Thomas Hobbes' Mechanical Conception of Nature (London, 1928); George E. G. Catlin, Thomas Hobbes as Philosopher, Publicist, and Man of Letters (Oxford, 1922); J. Laird, Hobbes (London, 1934); Z. Lubienski, Die Grundlagen des ethisch-politischen Systems von Hobbes (Munich, 1932); L. Strauss, The Political Philosophy of Hobbes (Oxford, 1936).   H.H.

hobgoblin: (hob, elf or fairy*; goblin, an ugly sprite* having malicious or mischievous intentions) A bogy; a fancied object of fear.   F.L.P.

hocket: (Fr. hocquet; Lat. hoquetus) Literally meaning hiccough, the proper Latin term is truncatio. A medieval device in which rests were frequently interspersed between notes of the melody, causing a chopping up of words and syllables without regard for meaning. Also a sudden cessation of one singer, whose expected note is sung by another voice. As an ornament to church music this technique was heartily disliked by such ecclesiastics as Pope John XXII.   E.H.B.

Hodge, Charles: (1797-1878) Eminent American theologian, the chief figure in the group of theologians known as the Princeton School, and best known by his three volume Systematic Theology (1872-73). From 1822 to 1878, with the exception of three years' special study in Germany, Dr. Hodge was a professor in Princeton Theological Seminary. In 1825 he founded The Biblical Repertory, a theological journal subsequently called The Princeton Review which, under his editorship, became the most influential American religious journal of the nineteenth century. Besides his Systematic Theology and innumerable articles in The Princeton Review, Hodge's principal works are: Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans (1835); Constitutional History of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America (1839-40); Commentary on the Epistle to the Ephesians (1856); Discussions in Church Polity (1878). Charles Hodge has been the most internationally known and influential Calvinist theologian in the United States since the days of Jonathan Edwards.   J.A.M.

Höffding, Harald: (1843-1931) Danish philosopher and professor in Copenhagen. His early thought was influenced by Kierkegaard.* He was anti-metaphysical and tended toward positivism,* but with a deep concern for ethical and religious values. He finds the essence of religion in the axiom of the "conservation of value"* but denies immortality. His view of God is impersonal

His chief works are. Etik (1887, not tr) , History of Modern Philosophy (1895, Eng , 1900) , Problems of Philosophy (1902, Eng , 1905) ; and Philosophy of Religion (1901, Eng , 1906).

See J de la Harpe, La religion comme conservation de la valeur dans ses rapports avec philosophie generale de Harald Höffding (1920).   J.E N.

Hofmann, Johann Chr. von: (1810-1877) Protestant theologian and church leader. Born in Nuremberg, Germany, he became in 1838 privatdozent in Erlangen, in 1842 professor, Rostock, and from 1845-1877 at Erlangen, principal representative of Lutheran biblicism as opposed to the confessionalism of Stahl and Hengstenberg.* Deeply influenced by the historians Raumer and Ranke he interpreted Biblical religion as divine history (Heilsgeschichte*), the main characteristic of which is the correlation between prophecy and fulfilment Unlike the older school he taught to find prophecy primarily in historical events, and only secondarily in the interpretative words of the prophets. Thus the unity of the Bible rests upon its historical substance rather than upon the inspiration of its writers. Every stage of Biblical history points beyond itself to the subsequent stage of the purpose of God and ultimately to its fulfilment in Jesus Christ's first and second coming.

Hofmann was equally remarkable as exegete and as theological thinker In his systematic presentation of the Christian truth he started from the experience of regeneration. But whereas Schleiermacher,* by whose theological approach he was influenced, interpreted experience subjectively, i.e. as having the evidence of its truth in itself, Hofmann interpreted it historically, i.e. as deriving its certitude from its historical causes, namely the history of the Church and the history of the Old and New Covenants. Head of the Erlangen School.* See neo-Lutheranism.
Principal works·

Weissagung und Erfüllung (1841-1844) ; Der Schriftbeweis (1852-1856, 2nd ed. 1857-1860) ; Die Heilige Schrift zusammenhängend untersucht (1862-1877, incomplete)

After his death his disciple Volk published· Die Biblische Geschichte des Neuen Testamentes (1883) ; Biblische Theologie des Neuen Testamentes (1886) ; Biographies· R Wapler, Das Leben J. Chr. K. von Hofmanns (1914) ; see also article "Hofmann" by A. Hauck in Herzog's Realenzyklop. 3rd. ed., vol. VIII, pp 234-241. On his theology see: Joh. Hausleiten, Grundlinien der Theologie von Hofmanns in seiner eigenen Darstellung (1910).
O.A.P.

Hofmann, Melchior: (c. 1498-c. 1544) Anabaptist*, was an indefatigable lay preacher in many centres of northern Europe. Though at first on friendly terms with Luther, his leanings to Anabaptism caused a breach between them. He also differed from Luther on sacramental doctrine. His anabaptist tendencies led to his expulsion from one city after another.   G.R.C.

Holbach, Paul Henri Dietrich, Baron d': (1723-1789) He developed in his System of Nature a systematic materialistic metaphysics according to which the universe is neither governed by God nor chance, but by immutable and necessary laws. He combatted the idea of God in every possible form, even pursuing deistic and pantheistic ideas of deity, which made him violent enemies even among freethinkers. Contending that cunning priests are the real makers of God, he held religion to be the chief source of all human corruption.

M. P Cushing, Baron d'Holbach; a study of eighteenth century radicalism in France (1914) , F. A Lange, History of Materialism (1925) ; G. V Plekhanov, Essays in the history of materialism (London, 1934) , W. H Wickwar, Baron d'Holbach, a prelude to the French revolution (London, 1935) .   H.H.

holiness: See sanctity.

holiness: A term of universal use and importance in religion. It has a variety of meanings but everywhere refers to an essential feature of the divine and distinguishes the sacred from the profane. Its main primitive denotation was an extraordinary and inscrutable power connected with certain objects, beings, events or actions by virtue of which they were set apart from common contact and use, invested with tabus, treated with special precaution and reserved for religious regard and use At this level its meaning is quasi-material, non-ethical, super-natural power of great value and great danger for men.

In the course of moral and religious development, traceable eminently in the Bible, the term has gradually acquired another principal and more familiar meaning, namely, ethical purity and moral perfection of character. It has never become an exclusively ethical term, however, but remains an essentially religious word denoting that perfect and loving righteousness which characterizes God's nature and power. Such holiness is His crowning attribute. In so far as the term is applicable to men it refers to that moral likeness to God which is the fruit of His grace bringing them into perfect moral sonship and obedience to Him.   R.W.F.

Holiness Church: A "second blessing" holiness sect organized by three Methodist preachers in California in 1896. It professes to adhere strictly to the standards and practices of early Methodism. It stresses sanctification, the second advent, and divine healing, and opposes tobacco, lodges and jewelry. Ministers are unsalaried and for the most part support themselves by working at other tasks. There are 15 churches having 400 members. See holiness churches; pentecostal churches. E.T.C.

holiness churches: A group of perfectionist* sects* which stress Christian perfection, perfect love, or holiness as a "second blessing" or work of grace instantaneously accomplished subsequent to justification. The group has a left-wing or extreme branch consisting of sects which insist on various charismata or spiritual gifts, usually the gift of speaking in unknown tongues,* as the sign and seal of holiness. These are customarily known as Pentecostal churches.

Although perfectionism has been present in the Church for many centuries, the modern holiness movement in the United States may be said to stem directly from John Wesley* and early Methodism.* Wesley taught Christian perfection, though with some reservations and inconsistencies, and emotional excesses resembling the typical charismata featured some of his meetings. Early American Methodism was known for its teaching of holiness and its first general conference stated one of its objects to be "to spread scriptural holiness over these lands " In the background of all this, of course, was the previous pietism* and the general perfectionist theology.

Most of the holiness groups in the United States have the Methodist background, many represent direct offshoots of the Methodist body and some definitely lay claim to Wesleyan traditions. The lessening of the emphasis upon holiness as Methodism increased in size, wealth, social prestige, and administrative machinery created a dissatisfaction which gave rise to the National Holiness Movement soon after the War Between the States, beginning with meetings of small holiness groups within the Methodist and other denominations, and the promoting larger holiness conventions and camp meetings in various parts of the country, this movement eventually resulted in the creation of several independent holiness denominations.

There have been various splits and unions within the general group, and certain bodies which originally stressed "second blessing" holiness have laid less stress on the doctrine as they increased in size and influence. Indeed, the whole modern history of the movement tends to show that holiness as a vital element decreases as the group grows in numbers and wealth and the need for an elaborate administrative organization appears. Most of the sects which sloughed off from the main Methodist bodies not only adopted holiness but also eliminated the episcopacy and other administrative offices.

Making allowances for this constantly shifting emphasis upon the doctrines of holiness and the fact that very many small sects are actually holiness in character even though they do not clearly state the tenet in their creeds, and excluding the extreme Pentecostal sects,* it may be said that the leading holiness groups in the United States at the present time are as follows

Group	Churches	Members
Christian and Missionary Alliance*	444	32,000
Church of God (Anderson, Indiana)*	1032	57,000
Church of the Nazarene*	2197	136,000
Apostolic Christian Church*	57	5,800
Apostolic Christian Church (Nazarean)*	31	1,600
Apostolic Faith Mission*	17	2,300
Christian Congregation*	1	57
Church of Daniel's Band*	5	120
Church of God (Apostolic)*	13	300
Church of God as Organized by Christ*	13	360
Hepzibah Faith Missionary Association*	20	700
Metropolitan Church Association*	14	1,000
Missionary Church Association*	47	3,600
Missionary Bands of the World*	6	200
Pillar of Fire*	46	4,000
Holiness Church*	15	400
Wesleyan Methodist Connection	565	22,000
Primitive Methodist* Church in the U.S.A.	91	12,000
Congregational Methodist Church	121	8,000
Free Methodist Church	1,084	37,000
New Congregational Methodist Church	25	1,500
Holiness Methodist Church	3	200
Reformed Methodist Church	9	300
Apostolic Methodist Church	2	30
Reformed New Congregational Methodist Church	8	300
Christian Nation Church*	5	100
Church of the Full Gospel, Inc.*	4	300
Kodesh Church of Immanuel*	9	560

E. T. Clark, The Small Sects in America (1937), Chapman, A History of the Church of the Nazarene; Flew, The Idea of Perfection; Lee, The Historical Background of Early Methodist Enthusiasm; McDaniel, Origin and Early History of the Congregational Methodist Church; Nagler, Pietism and Methodism; Pardington, Twenty-five Wonderful Years; Warfield, Studies in Perfectionism, 2 vols ; White, Looking Back from Beulah; Yahn, History of the Churches of God in North America.   E.T.C.

Holiness Code: Name of a section of the book of Leviticus* (xvii-xxvi, perhaps also Ex xxxi, 13-14a; Lev. xi, 43-45, Num. xv, 37-41) made of a collection of laws called P 1 or H, inspired by the school of Ezekiel, and warning against moral transgressions, ritual corruptions and pagan influences. Was later incorporated in the Priestly Code.* See R. Pfeiffer, Introduction to the Old Testament (1941), pp. 239-250. See Hexateuch.   S.L.T.

holiness, Divine: See s. v. wrath of God.

Holiness Methodist Church: See holiness churches.

Holl, Karl: (1866-1926) German Protestant theologian. He was born in Tubingen, Würtemberg. From 1901-1906 he was professor of Church history in Tubingen and from 1906-1926 (together with Harnack) professor of Church History in Berlin.

His principal fields of research were the Ancient Church and the Reformation period His publication of Epiphanius* (2 vols. 1915, 1922) in the Berlin edition of the Greek Fathers is a model of accuracy and learning. His interpretation of Luther—an attempt to understand the reformer out of the inner logic of his theology and experience—made a deep impression upon Continental Protestantism and helped to usher in the Luther Renaissance. Holl was the teacher of a considerable number of New Testament and Church History students. See neo-Lutheranism. Principal works:

Die Sacra Parallela des Johannes Damascenus (1897) ; Enthusiasmus und Bussgewalt beim griechischen Mönchtum (1898) , Gesammelte Aufsätze, 3 vols. (1922-1928 Volume I, dealing with Luther).

O.A.P.

Holman Lectureship: In connection with the endowment effort of 1865 for the Gettysburg Lutheran Seminary, the Rev. Samuel A. Holman, then a young pastor in Altoona, Pa., gave $2,000, the annual income from which was used to secure a lecture each year on one of the 21 doctrinal articles of the Augsburg Confession. Beginning with Dr. J. A. Brown on Article I in 1866, there has been a continuous succession of these annual lectures by prominent professors and pastors. They have led to a more thorough study and exposition of the mother symbol of Protestantism and were no small factor in the doctrinal development of the General Synod of the Lutheran Church in America. All were printed in the Evangelical Review and the Lutheran Quarterly. The first series of 21 lectures were published in 1888. The names of the annual lecturers down to the present appear in A. R. Wentz, History of the Gettysburg Seminary (1926), pp. 298-299. (Data from the office of the President of the Gettysburg Lutheran Theological Seminary.)

V.F.

holocaust: Completely burnt offering*. LXX's* rendering of Hebrew olah literally "that which is brought up" to the Deity. A synonym is kalil, signifying complete burning, not only of the holy inwards and fat, but of the carcass as well. The olah was the atonement sacrifice par excellence; other expiatory* sacrifices* atoned for particular transgressions. At first both a private as well as a public offering, it later became, in the form of the daily "tamid," the great national sacrifice of all Israel, prototype of the daily Jewish prayer services of today.

H.K.-L.F.

Hölscher, Gustav: (1877-) He has been teaching at the universities of Halle, Giessen, Marburg and Bonn. Now is at the University of Heidelberg. As an individualist, influenced by the psychologist W. Wundt,* he dared to initiate independent beginnings in the field of the study of the OT.
Der Sadduzaeismus (Leipzig, 1906) ; Die Propheten (Leipzig, 1914) ; Hesekiel. Der Dichter und das Buch (Giessen, 1924) ; Das Buch Hiob (Tübingen, 1937) ; Die Hohenpriesterliste bei Josephus und die evangelische Chronologie (Heidelberg, 1940).

H.H.

Holtzmann, Heinrich: (1832-1910) He was professor in Heidelberg and Strasburg. In spite of his critical scientific attitude, he won considerable influence. By his comprehensive works he became more just to the NT writings than was the construction of F. C. Baur.* See Lives of Jesus.
Die synoptischen Evangelien (Tubingen u Leipzig, 1863) ; Lehrbuch der historisch-kritischen Einleitung in das Neue Testament (Freiburg, 1885) ; Lehrbuch der neutestamentlichen Theologie. 2 vols. (Tübingen, 1896).

H.H.

Holy Alliance, The: Was organized after the Congress of Vienna (1815) by Alexander I of Russia together with Francis I of Austria and Frederick William III of Prussia. Its purpose was to base the relations between their States on the religion of Christianity whose precepts were to have a direct bearing on the councils of Princes. The rulers were pledged to mutual assistance, their relation to their subjects was to be that of fathers to families, their subjects were to consider themselves as members of one and the same Christian nation. Other powers which avowed these principles were asked to join. Most of the European sovereigns did so, notable exceptions being Great Britain, the Pope, and the Sultan. The Holy Alliance with its vague paternalistic idealism has often mistakenly been identified with the Quadruple Alliance. Too, it has had a bad reputation as suppressor of liberty, as in the crushing of the Hungarian Revolution (1849). But to the 19th Century Tsars it continued to express their mystic faith in the potency of rule by divine right for effecting the highest ends; thus it is said to have inspired Nicholas II to take measures resulting in the first international peace conference at The Hague, 1899.
Cambridge Modern History, Vol. X, ch. I. ᵹ·o

holy days, Jewish: See Jewish religious festivals; Sabbath.

holy days and festivals, Christian: See church year, church year cycle; feasts and fasts of the Roman Catholic Church; festivals and holy days, Christian, Sabbath, Christian.

holy family: The family of Joseph, Mary and Jesus. Often the title of paintings. In Roman Catholic circles regarded as a model for Christian households and an object of veneration.

S.M.G.

Holy Grail, the: A medieval legend* of pagan and of Christian apocryphal origins, it varied widely in the telling. (On the word "Grail" see Joseph of Arimathea . . ., edited by W. W. Skeat, London, 1871, pp. xxxvi-xlii.) In the main there are two kinds of legends. One has interest centered on the Grail as such and is associated with the Cup of the Eucharist, Joseph of Arimathea, etc. The other is concerned with the quest, the most celebrated searchers being Perceval (Parzifal) and Galahad, knights of Arthur's Round Table. The great stories on the quest theme were written within the last quarter of the 12th and the middle of the 13th centuries, the most notable being Chrétien de Troyes' Perceval le Gallois or Le Conte del Graal, and Wolfram von Eschenbach's Parsifal. Perceval, who was to have been the next Lord of the Grail, had been shown the Grail, but he failed to ask about its significance, and therefore it was lost to him. In Wolfram this failure is attributed to ignorance (like that of Oedipus), and his lordship of the Grail is rewon by becoming wise. Wolfram's treatment is a moving one and deeply spiritual.
Sir Thomas Malory, Morte d'Arthur (Fifteenth Century), Books XIII-XVII contain the most popular tradition of the quest. (Many editions.) R. Jaffray, King Arthur and the Holy Grail (1928).

Q.B.

Holy of Holies: (Kodesh Ha Kodashim) The most sacred chamber of the Tabernacle and then Temple, where the high priest performed the Day of Atonement* ritual. The Ark* of a Covenant was kept there. The exact measurements of the Holy of Holies in the Temple of Solomon are described in I Kings vi. 				B.Z.B.

holy orders: See apostolic succession; bishop, canon law; cardinal; clergy; deacon; deaconess; orders; ordination; pope; priest; sacraments; vicar.

holy place: A site held sacred because of its religious associations. The principal holy place in Judaism is the site on which formerly was the Temple* in Jerusalem, with the portion of wall which still survives and which is known as the "wailing wall". It is a popular place for Jewish pilgrims who wail there for the tragedies of the Jewish dispersion. See blood. 		B.Z.B.

Holy Rollers: See pentecostal sects.

Holy Roman empire, the: This institution roots in the Christianization of the Roman Empire, when (at least by 395 A.D.) to be Christian was to be Roman, and vice versa. Throughout the 4th to the 8th centuries a cleavage between East and West took place, brought about by growth of imperial autocracy (cf. Diocletian, Constantine, Constantinople), barbarian invasions, conversion of the barbarian nations to Catholic Christianity, and the power of the Roman Church (which increased in the West, decreased in the East). What came to be thought of as the Holy Roman empire was distinctly a Western phenomenon it was (theoretically) co-extensive with the Latin Church, its rulers were of "barbarian" stock. Its appelation of "Roman" was intended to be more than nominal; for the barbarian peoples had long admired the Roman Empire, they desired to be its heirs and to preserve its institutions, in consequence of which it is not surprising that the emperors of the H. R. empire considered themselves in line of succession to the Roman emperors.

In the first phase of its history the empire takes the part of protector and extender of the Latin Church. It began with the conversion of the Franks (496) and their conquests. In the 8th century the Saracen and Lombard perils drew the papacy into closer association with the Krankish State, an important result being the creation of the title of ruler by divine right. (Cf. Charles Martel, Pepin the Short, Donation of Pepin, St. Boniface.) In 800 A.D. Charlemagne was crowned Emperor by Leo III, with which act the formal history of the Empire may be said to have begun.

Its second phase is characterized by the breakup of the Frankish State and the shift of the Empire to Germany (Henry the Fowler, 918-936, Otto I, 936-973), the imperial concern about church reform (Henry II, 1002-24, Henry III, 1039-56), and the struggle of emperors and popes for supremacy (Henry IV, 1056-1106, Frederick Barbarossa, 1152-89, Frederick II, 1212-50; cf. also Gregory VII, Alexander III, Innocent III, Gregory IX; Dictatus Papae, Concordat of Worms). In this struggle the popes generally prevailed, while the Empire declined. Important factors were German ducal competition for the crown, want of a single imperial capitol, the impossible ideal of including Italy in the Empire, the ambition of some emperors to establish a national church, and the extraordinary prestige of the papacy (cf. translatio imperii, Doctrine of the Two Swords). Meanwhile, in this period the empire claimed supremacy over Germany, and, in varying degrees, over Hungary, Poland, Denmark, France, Scandinavia, Spain, England, Ireland, Italy (save Venice), Cyprus, Armenia. The revived study of Roman law dates from this period (University of Bologna). The third phase may be dated from the Interregnum (1254-1273) to the fall of the empire in 1806. It had now become more or less exclusively a German state, and eighteen of its twenty-seven emperors were Hapsburgs. While its medieval glory was passing the imperial ideal had memorable champions (cf. Dante's De Monarchia, William Ockham, Marsilius of Padua). Charles V, 1519-56, united the imperial crown with that of a national state (Spain), which led to protracted wars, particularly with France. Throughout the 16th century Reformation the empire defended Catholic orthodoxy as the religion of all Europe, its principle being challenged by the Protestant cuius regio, huius religio. A serious blow was dealt the Empire in the Peace of Westphalia*, 1648, which was drafted by nation states only. In 1806 Napoleon brought about the Emperor's abdication, maintaining that the Empire had by "translation" gone to him as the Charlemagne of the West. See Ghibelline and Guelf.

J. Bryce, The Holy Roman Empire (1909 ed.); Cambridge Medieval History; Cambridge Modern History; C. H. McIlwain, The Growth of Political Thought in the West, from the Greeks to the End of the Middle Ages (London, 1932); C. C. Eckhardt, The Papacy in World Affairs (1937).
				Q.B.

holy see: See see; pope.

holy sepulchre: The body of Jesus, after his death on Calvary, was conveyed to a rock-hewn tomb, evidently very close at hand, which was offered by Joseph of Arimathea. Christian tradition or conjecture has identified this tomb with a cave now enclosed by the church of the Holy Sepulchre, but the true position of Calvary, and therefore of the adjoining tomb, has not yet been ascertained. 				E.F.S.

Holy Spirit: The roots of this conception are to be found in primitive religion. (Cf. Spenta Mainyu.) It was observed that men at times become different from themselves, for instance in madness or high enthusiasm, and this was explained by the presence in the world of a mysterious power, which may chance to enter the man and make him its instrument. In the O.T. this power is called the ruah or breath, and to it are attributed the strength of Samson, the genius of Bezaleel, the insanity of Saul. In a later age it was peculiarly associated with the frenzy in which a prophet uttered divine oracles, and from the physical state of the prophet it was transferred to his exalted mood, and hence to all divine impulse and knowledge and action An age was anticipated when God would "pour out his Spirit on all flesh" (Joel, 2 28) and not merely on his chosen prophets. It was believed in the early church that this promised age had now opened, and the strange phenomena on the day of Pentecost were supposed to mark the coming of the Spirit. In the Synoptic teaching of Jesus himself the conception of the Spirit has little or no place. Perhaps the only reference which can be deemed authentic is that which deals with blasphemy against the holy Spirit, and Jesus here is only meeting the charge of his enemies who said that he was possessed of an evil spirit. It was the departure of Jesus which brought the idea of the Spirit to the fore-front. He had himself ascended, but for the brief interval that would elapse before his return he had sent the Spirit to take his place. At first it was regarded simply as a miracle-working power, and this is the conception which dominates the book of Acts. Paul invested it with a new significance He thought of it not as coming at rare intervals in sudden gusts but as the abiding principle of the Christian life. He connected it with moral and not merely with abnormal activities, and made love the chief manifestation of the Spirit. With Paul it became in a full sense the alter ego of Christ, so that he can say (2 Cor. 3.17) "the Lord is the Spirit". This idea is further developed in the Fourth Gospel, although the work of the Spirit is there confined almost exclusively to revelation. In the N.T. there is no direct suggestion of a doctrine of the Trinity. The Spirit is conceived as an impersonal power by which God effects His will through Christ. At the same time Paul invariably thinks of God and Christ and the Spirit together, most notably in the Benedictions; and to this extent the later doctrine, which grew up in the course of the second century, had its origin in the N.T. See conviction of sin; grace, procession of the Holy Spirit, regeneration; sanctification, seven gifts of the Holy Spirit; Trinity.

    E F. Scott, The Spirit in the New Testament (1927), H. J. Holtzmann, New Testament Theologie (1897; 1911); H. Weinel, New Ttestament Theologie (1911).   E.F.S.

Holy Synod: In Russia the institution of the Holy Governing Synod was created by Tsar Peter the Great in 1721, as a substitute for the patriarchate*. It became one of the departments of the centralized government through which the Tsar could exercise his control over the church in matters not affecting the Orthodox faith. Its members were appointed by the Tsar, and took the same oath as the Senators. In his "Spiritual Rules," Peter prescribed in detail the duties of the members of the Holy Synod and the entire hierarchy. It was presided over by a layman, the ober-procurator, who represented the Tsar, and was responsible to him. In course of time, he became the most powerful figure, for the ecclesiastical policy was largely determined by him. It was through the instrumentality of the Holy Synod that the State exercised control over the church, and made it subservient to its political aims. For that reason, when after the downfall of tsarism in the Spring of 1917, the provisional government called a Church Council for the reorganization of the ecclesiastical structure, this body abolished the Holy Governing Synod, and restored the patriarchate. Nevertheless, the patriarch was not granted autocratic powers in the administration of the church, but shared this function with the Holy Synod and the Supreme Ecclesiastical Council. The membership of the former consisted of twelve bishops, and its functions had to do mostly with matters of the inner life of the church—doctrine, liturgy, religious education, discipline, and missionary and publication work. The Supreme Ecclesiastical Council was of mixed membership—hierarchical, priestly, and lay. Its duties were of economic and financial nature.

A similar organization obtains in other Orthodox national or autocephalous churches thus, for instance, the Ecumenical Patriarchate (of Constantinople) was organized on this basis in accordance with the Constitution of 1862. The patriarchal administration of spiritual matters was shared with the Holy Synod, composed of twelve metropolitans, alone, the patriarch could not take any decision apart from this organ of supreme administration, and himself was subject to it. Accordingly, properly speaking, it was the Holy Synod which was made the governing body rather than the patriarch. The National Mixed Council, composed of four clerics and eight laymen, was charged with the administration of schools, hospitals, and other benevolent institutions, as well as the finances of the church and other secular business.

The organization of the administration of other Orthodox communions, such as the churches of Roumania, Yugoslavia, Bulgaria, and others, follows essentially the same principle, and need not therefore be described in detail. See Eastern Orthodox Churches.

    Matthew Spinka, The Church and the Russian Revolution (1927); Paul Milinkov, Outlines of Russian Culture, ed. by Michael-Karpovich (1942), I.   M.S.

Holy Thursday: Common name for Maundy Thursday*, but in older English usage (so in Book of Common Prayer since 1662) Ascension Day.   E.R.H.

holy water: Ordinary water* which has been sanctified by the blessing of the Church. Salt is added to ordinary water to signify that this water is now preserved from corruption. It is used extensively in ceremonies of blessing.   W.H.

Holy Week: The week before Easter, beginning with Palm Sunday. Observed with traditional ceremonies in Catholic churches, and including especially Maundy Thursday (when the institution of the Lord's Supper is commemorated), Good Friday (when the Passion and Death of Christ are remembered), and Holy Saturday (when baptisms traditionally take place). See church year cycle.

W.N.P.

home missions: The work of the church devoted to minority and immigrant peoples within the home land. Ministry to the under-privileged in cities and rural districts, including every form of Christian and humanitarian service the church is able to offer. The purpose is identical with but in geographical contrast to foreign missions. Cf. city missions, inner mission.

P.E J.

homiletics: That branch of theology which deals with the art and science of preaching*. The word itself is a transliteration of a Greek word meaning "to be in company with." Its secondary meaning was "easy and companionable conversation." The early conversations of Christian teachers with Christian groups about the Old and New Testaments thus came to be called, from a related Greek word, "homiletics", probably in 3rd Century Alexandria. The art of public speech had been highly cultivated within Greece and Rome and the Christian preacher inherited the tradition. Some training in the art of preaching has, therefore, always distinguished theological education, though the prominence given it has naturally varied with the importance attached to the sermon itself.

Homiletics so defined has created a vast literature on the preparation and delivery of sermons, to which English speaking non-liturgical Protestantism, with its emphasis upon preaching, has made distinguished contributions. Particularized homiletic instruction, with professional instructors, is more stressed in Scotch and American theological post-graduate schools than in the English Univerities. A representative course in homiletics would include instruction in the principles of effective public address, the examination of standard sermon types, some history of preaching and studies of representative preachers, training in voice and gesture, the proper development of texts and topics, "practice preaching", followed by criticism and such marginal procedure as the instructor considers helpful, since the field is both spacious and elastic. The larger theological schools have often more than one specialist in homiletics in their faculties. See rhetorici.

Charles R. Brown, The Art of Preaching (1922); Raymond Calkins, The Eloquence of Christian Experience (1927).

G.G.A.

homiliarium: Any medieval book of homilies, or sermons, compiled either for the benefit of parish preachers and congregations or for reading in the choir offices of the clergy.

E.C.K.

homily: (fr. Gr. homilia, converse, discourse; fr. homilos, crowd, assembly) A term in use from the early Christian Church to designate an informal discourse on some doctrinal subject, scriptural passage, Christian virtue or vice, or ecclesiastical observance. Contrasted with the sermon* which developed as a more formal type of preaching*. Homilies written by celebrated preachers came to be widely used by the clergy of the medieval Church for reading to their local congregations. In the Church of England, the Book of Homilies, constituting such a collection of discourses, was royally authorized (First Book publ. in 1547, Second Book in 1563) and appointed to be read in the churches for the purposes of offsetting false doctrine and moving the people to the true worship and service of God.

E.T.R.

homoios: A Greek word meaning "like", or "similar." It was the watchword of the group among the fourth-century Semi-Arians* who opposed the use of the Nicene formula, *homoousios, to descr.be the relation of Father and Son. They objected that *oussa is an unscriptural term and affirmed that the Son is "like" the Father, without specifying their actual metaphysical relationship.

F.G.E.

homoi ousios: A Greek term meaning "of like (or "similar") essence (or "substance") " It was the watchword of the mediating party in the Arian* controversy to express the relation of the Son to the Father of like, but not of the same, essence. Opposed to *homo oussos, the orthodox formula.

F.G.E.

homo ousios: A Greek word meaning "consubstantial," "of the same essence," or "substance." It represents the formula championed by Athanasius* (293-373) and adopted by the Nicene Council (325) to express the relation of the Father and the Son. They are in substance one, numerically identical, indivisible, in contrast to the Arian* view which subordinated the Son to the Father. See an-omoians, creeds of Christendom.

F.G.E.

honesty: A general term for a virtue stressed in all ethics. It denotes the disposition and practice of fair, truthful and straight-forward dealing with others and with oneself. It signifies, in particular, special regard for the rights and property of others, respect for the principles of conduct of others, fidelity in keeping one's agreements, and freedom from all fraud and imposture.

R.W.F.

honor: The term may refer to 1) the high regard and esteem paid to a person of worth, achievement or position; 2) the symbols of distinction (e.g., titles) granted as a mark of such esteem, and 3) the inner consciousness of worth and delicate sense of rights and obligations felt by such a person. The last is the ethical use of the term and it is usually associated with the "code of honor" binding upon a member of the aristocracy or of a special group with peculiar duties and privileges In Christian ethics the honor of a Christian emanates from God, the final moral Judge who is "the reader of all hearts."

R.W.F.

hope: The attitude of looking forward to a future good or to the fulfilment of a cherished desire. Pagan thought stressed its illusory character. It is the dominant note of the Bible, however, and one of St. Paul's triumvirate of graces (I Cor. 13:13) which became the three theological virtues of Christian ethics. In Christianity it is an expectation of spiritual blessings based upon faith in the love of God as revealed in Christ. As a Christian grace it begets a joyous temper, patience and perseverance amid trials, and a confident, optimistic outlook upon life and the future.

R W.F.

Hooker, Richard: (1554?-1600) English theologian, author of the treatise Of the Laws of Ecclesiastical Polity (1594-97). A man of wide learning and a master of English prose, Hooker formulated the classic defence of the Church of England as a via media between the extremes of Rome and Geneva. In an age of petty controversy, his work is remarkable for its philosophic breadth and tolerant spirit.

L.W.C.

Hopedale (Mass.) community: See communistic settlements, secular.

Hopkins, Samuel: (1721-1803) American theologian, pupil and follower of Jonathan Edwards*, whose teachings he expounded in a complete System of Doctrines (1793). Most characteristic teaching· definition of true holiness as "disinterested benevolence*." Self-love was to Hopkins the root of all sin, and no man was saved unless so completely devoid of self-love that he would be willing, if necessary, to be "damned for the glory of God." Inquiry into the Nature of True Holiness (1773). See Hopkinsianism; New England theology.

W.M.H.

Hopkinsianism: A name given to the systematic formulation of Jonathan Edwards* theology by Samuel Hopkins*. The creed of Andover Seminary, designed to guard it against Unitarian heresy, was very largely a Hopkinsian creed, though containing some concessions to Old Calvinism*. Cf. Calvinism, consistent; means.

W.M.H.

horae: See hours.

hormic psychology: See psychology, schools of.

Hormisdas, Pope: (514-523) Of a wealthy family in Latium, he had been married, and his son was a later pope (Silverius, 536-7). He was a deacon under Pope Symmachus (498-514) whom he succeeded. As pope he first healed the schism of Laurentius (anti-pope). Till 519 he was mostly occupied with the schism begun by patriarch Acacius* of Constantinople; out of the negotiations came the Formula Hormisdae (frequently cited at the Vatican Council). At his direction Dionysius Exiguus brought out a translation of the canons of the Greek Church. The pope also issued a new edition of the Gelasian Canon. See also henoticon; Justinian.

Catholic Encyclopedia, "Hormisdas." C. Mirbt, Quellen z. Gesch. d. Papsttums u. d. Röm. Katholizismus (Tübingen, 1934), O. 89.

Q.B.

horns: Horns are primarily a symbol of power. The bull with its ferocious strength furnished the symbol. As sign of their power, many deities of the Middle East wore horns. For the same reason, horns decorate the head dress of kings, priests, and warriors. The bull was also associated with the divine powers of fertility. As a result, horns symbolized prosperity and plenty. The primary meaning is illustrated in the use of horns for the protection of houses, persons and graves. The secondary meaning appears in the cornucopia. The blowing of a horn was effective against demons, sickness and other evils.

A.E.H.

horoscope: (Gr. hora, time; skopos, observer) Observation of the sky or planets at a certain moment, especially at a person's birth; a scheme showing an aspect of the heavens at a particular moment; from an aspect of the heavens at the moment of a person's birth, the astrologer professes to forecast the events of a person's life; an example of such as aspect is the use of a sign of the zodiac which rises above the horizon at the moment of an individual's birth; the zodiac is a schematic arrangement of the circuit of the heavens into twelve segments, each segment with its sign or star-pattern. Interpretations of the aspect presented follow the customary and fixed rules established by the pseudoscience of astrology.

F.L.P.

Horus: (Egyptian) In the Early Kingdom, sky or sun god of the rulers of lower Egypt, or delta region, the falcon god; later, in the myth of Osiris*, Horus is the son who overthrows Set*, the brother of Osiris. See Egypt, religions of.

F.L.P.

hosanna: (Gr. form of Heb. hosha'-na, O Save) A liturgical cry of entreaty (cf. Psalm 118 25) used in Mark 11 9, 10 and parallel passages apparently as an ejaculation of praise, a meaning acquired through association with other praise cries.

R.B.Y.S.

Hosea: A combination of two originally separate collections, the Parables of Hosea (chs. 1-3) and the Prophecies of Hosea (chs. 4-14). The book contains about fifteen prophetic poems delivered by Hosea, a farmer, on marketing trips to nearby cities Jezreel and Samaria. His oracles are dated 743-735 B.C., reflecting steps in national disintegration. With the prosperity of 750 B.C. (see Amos) giving way to civil war and Assyria organizing westward campaigns, Hosea tried to save his nation. Primarily a political prophet, he worked for national unity, opposed foreign alliances, and demanded just public administration. He reaffirmed the religious contributions of Amos, advancing beyond the justice idea to conceiving Yahweh as a god of longsuffering love. He saved Israelite religion from absorption into Baalism* with its sexual worship. His call was intimately connected with his marriage. Domestic tragedy caused by his wife's subsequent unfaithfulness gave him insight into the feelings of Yahweh toward the faithless nation. Last prophet of north Israel, Hosea was noted for popularizing the parable, using figures of speech, and coming closer than other O.T. writers to Jesus' conception of God.

See J. M P. Smith and W A Irwin, The Prophets and their Times (1941), pp. 69-84; E. Hamilton, The Prophets of Israel (1936), pp. 76-85.

R E.W.

Hoshana Rabba: (Heb. "save, we beseech Thee") Name of the 7th day of Tabernacles, derived from the chant of Psalm 118.25 during the procession around the altar on each day of the feast, with citrons, palm branches, myrtles and willow branches (Lev. 23: 40-41, 2 Macc. 10 7, cf. John 12 13). The last day, which was marked by seven circuits, acquired the name "Great Hosanna". It formed the climax of the water drawing festivities preceding the beginning of the winter or rainy season. Part of its ceremonies consisted in beating small bunches of willow sprigs on the ground at the side of the altar. Hence the day was also known as "the day of beating the willow" (or "palm tufts"). The Cabbalists (see Kabbalah) invested it with mystic significance as the time when God's decrees regarding each person, sealed on the Day of Atonement*, take effect. See Tabernacles or Feast of Booths.

S.S.C.

Hosius: Bishop of Cordova in Spain ca. 295 and a champion of orthodoxy against Arianism* in the early 4th century. An adviser to the emperor Constantine when dealing with the Donatists*. Presided at the Council of Nicaea. A friend of Athanasius. In 351, under pressure, he signed an Arian declaration. See Elvira, Synod of; Sylvester I.

S.M G.

hospice (5th cent. and St. Bernard) Building set aside for use of travellers, the sick and unfortunate. Developed from hospitality early practised by monastics of the East and carried on in West by Benedictine and Columban (Celtic) monks. Hospice of the Great St. Bernard, founded by Bernard of Menthon in eleventh century is famous for rescues made in Alpine passes.

K.H.C.

hospitality: See charity and almsgiving.

hospitallers: Used in a general sense to designate those whose religious vocation involved the care, in hospitals, of the aged, the homeless, orphans, and the sick. Among those dedicated to such service were numerous orders and congregations, some of them for women. In the crusading* period, hospitalizing services came to be closely associated with the functions of such military orders as the Templars, Teutonic Knights, and the Knights Hospitallers of St. John. In this connection see Military Religious Orders. See Anthony, St., Bethlehemites; charity and almsgiving (Christian); Knights Templar.

R.C.P.

hospitals: See charity and almsgiving (Christian).

host: (Lat., hostia, victim) The unleavened eucharistic bread used in the Western Church, which is held to become by consecration the body of Christ offered in the sacrifice of the Mass*. See corporal, elevation of the host, monstrance, pyx.

P.V.N.

Hotman, Francois: (1524-1590) Best known Huguenot* writer on constitutional theory. He attacked papal pretensions, and urged a formal declaration of independence from Rome by France. His large tract, entitled Franco-Gallia (1573) was called out by the Massacre of St. Bartholomew*. His argument for the view that the French king was elective and his power limited by the States General depended upon the principle of medieval constitutionalism, that political institutions derive their right from immemorial practices inherent in the community itself.

J W Allen, A History of Political Thought in the Sixteenth Century (London, 1928), E Armstrong, "The Political Theory of the Huguenots" English Historical Review, vol IV (London, 1889); E. Barker, "A Huguenot Theory of Politics," Church, State and Study (London, 1930).

H.H.

hours: (horae. The canonical hours) The system of prayer at stated times during the day and night, arising in part out of the primitive vigil (Vespers, Matins, Lauds), partly out of times of private devotion (Terce, Sext, None—the Little Hours), and in part out of monastic life (Prime, Compline). These eight hours together constitute the Divine Office*, canonically binding upon all clergy and Religious in the Roman Communion (with slight exceptions). The core of the Office is the Psalter. See Breviary; Psalmody.

P.V.N.

House of God, the Holy Church of the Living God, The Pillar and Ground of the Truth, House of Prayer for all People: A Negro religious sect founded by R. A. R. Johnson in Washington, D. C., in 1913. It is based on twenty-four principles which Bishop Johnson claims were revealed to him by God. These principles contain the ordinary theology of the fundamentalist type. Women are recognized as evangelists and foot washing is practiced. Headquarters are at Beaufort, South Carolina. There are four churches and 200 members.

E.T.C.

House of the Lord: A religious sect founded by W. H. Johnson in Detroit, Michigan, in 1925. It now has four churches and 300 members. Its members are not allowed to engage in any occupation involving tobacco, whiskey, nor may they be "bell hops", play cards, go pleasure riding ,or attend motion picture or other theaters, ball games, dances or horse races. Modest apparel is insisted upon. Christian perfection is taught in the literal sense and the baptism of the Holy Spirit accompanied by speaking in unknown tongues is sought. However, no person can be sanctified if he owns property of any kind. There is opposition to taking oaths, joining secret fraternities, and carrying life insurance. See pentecostal sects.

E.T.C.

House of Prayer: A Negro pentecostal sect founded by one "Bishop Grace," who is regarded as a sort of messiah by his followers. Among its practices are divine healing, speaking in unknown tongues, trances, and other extreme emotional excesses. See pentecostal sects.   E.T.C.

Houtin, Albert: (1867-1926) Participant in the Catholic Modernist* movement, later (after leaving the priesthood) its most complete historian. Histoire du modernisme catholique, (1912), Autobiography, Mon expérience (1926).
                                                        W.M.H.

Howison, George Holmes: (1834-1916) Born in Montgomery Co., Maryland, the son of parents who freed their slaves and removed to Marietta, Ohio, George Howison graduated from Marietta College in 1852, and from Lane Theological Seminary in 1855. After teaching school in Salem, Mass. and elsewhere he became instructor in mathematics in Washington University, St. Louis, where he joined the Kant club studying Hegel and Kant. Removing to Boston he lectured in the Harvard Divinity School, the Concord School of Philosophy and was professor of the Philosophy of science and logic in the Massachusetts Institute of Technology (1871-79). In 1883 he was lecturer on philosophy in Michigan University and was called in 1884 to the chair of philosophy (afterward the Mills Chair) in the University of California. Here he became "one of the most successful and inspiring teachers of philosophy that America has produced." (Cambridge History of American Literature.)

Author A Treatise on Analytic Geometry (1869), Limits of Evolution and Other Essays in Philosophy (1901, 2nd ed., 1905); The Conception of God (joint author, 1907), also reviews and addresses.

Howison's philosophy, which he termed Personal Idealism, is an original, theistic Personalism*, defining God as Perfect Person, Final Cause, and Center of the Republic of persons and emphasizing "the freedom and dignity of the soul."

J. W. Buckham and G M Stratton, George Holmes Howison, Philosopher and Teacher (containing a biographical sketch, The Limits of Evolution and other principal writings) (1933); "The Personal Idealism of George Holmes Howison" by C. M. Bakewell, Philosophical Review, Vol XLIX, Nov, 1940; "The Contribution of Professor Howison to Christian Thought" by J W. Buckham, The Harvard Theological Review, Vol. IX, July, 1916
                                                        J.W.B.

Hoyt Memorial Foundation, The: A fund established in 1925, in honor of Dr. Arthur S. Hoyt, for thirty years professor of homiletics at Auburn Seminary (Auburn, N. Y.), by the alumni of the Seminary. The income from this fund, now amounting to $10,000. is to provide for ministers-in-residence, missionary and other speakers during the seminary year.

(Data furnished by W. S. Davison, Executive Director of Auburn Theological Seminary.)   V.F.

Hsüan-tsang: See Buddhist Terminology.

Hübmaier, Balthasar: (1480-1528) Scholarly leader of the German Anabaptists*. Having been professor in the University of Ingolstadt and influential preacher in Waldshut, under the influence of the Swiss reformers he broke off with Rome. In 1525 he became an Anabaptist and fled to Zurich. There, with Zwingli's* connivance, he was imprisoned and tortured. Going to Moravia, he was arrested two years later, taken to Vienna, and burned at the stake Singularly free from mystical elements, Hubmaier was a cogent interpreter of Scripture. His death was due directly to his refusal to recant the view that the Eucharist and adult baptism are the only two sacraments.   T.A.K.

Hügel, Baron Friedrich, von: (1852-1925) A Roman Catholic interpreter of religion whose writings and personal influence, especially in England where he resided during his adult life, were greater outside his own communion than within it His Mystical Element of Religion (2 volumes, 1908, 2nd edition, 1923) is one of the greatest studies of the phenomena of mystical religion of all times. The emphasis upon the transcendent reality of God increases steadily in the books that follow Eternal Life (1912), Essays and Addresses in the Philosophy of Religion (1st Series 1921, 2nd Series 1926), Selected Letters (1927); and The Reality of God (1931). M. Nédoncelle, Baron Friedrich von Hügel.
                                                        D.V.S.

Hugo (or Hugh) of St. Victor: (1096-1141) Writer of the first dogmatics in the occident, he was neither a narrow-minded traditionalist nor an enemy of reason. A pious Augustinian Platonist, he described the various states leading up to the perfect contemplation of God. His thought moved in a world of allegory. See Mystics of Saint Victor, sacraments.

J. Kilgenstein, Die Gotteslehre des Hugo v. St Viktor (Wurzburg, 1898); K. Th A Liebner, Hugo v St. Viktor (Leipzig, 1832); H. Ostler, Die Psychologie des Hugo v. St. Viktor (Munster, 1906)
                                                        H.H.

Huguenots: It was in France between 1562 and 1598, a period of not fewer than eight civil wars, that the most significant chapter in political philosophy was written. The centralized system of French monarchy had proved to be subject to abuses so serious that they threatened to cost the crown the support of the higher middle classes upon which its power really depended. The theories opposing royal absolutism were first developed by Huguenot writers. They stood for decentralization and local autonomy. They were driven to oppose the king and to advocate deposition because of the persecution of their religion, and because of a fundamental conviction of the undesirability of the monarchial form of government. Cf. Camisards. See wars of religion.

J. W. Allen, A History of Political Thought in the Sixteenth Century (London, 1928); E Armstrong, The French Wars of Religion. 2 ed. (Oxford, 1904); J. N. Figgis, Studies of Political Thought from Gerson to Grotius (Cambridge, 1923), 2 ed.   H.H.

Huitzilopochtli: (Aztec) God of war, to whom was offered sacrifices of human hearts taken from living bodies while placed on the sacrificial stone, god of the Eastern Paradise to which realm of delight fallen warriors were taken, a god sacramentally represented by a body of grain and bread and eaten, principal sanctuary was on top of the great pyramid in old Mexico City.

F.L.P.

human sacrifice: The ceremonial killing of a human being. The practice was worldwide among all peoples who had risen above the level of savagery. In most cases the victim was sacrificed for the welfare of the whole community but sometimes only individuals benefited. The rite was used for many purposes—to save crops from drought or too much rain, to stop epidemics, to secure victory, to get favorable winds, to heal the sick, as a firstfruits* offering, to provide a scapegoat*, to send a messenger to the gods or the dead, to guarantee a safe passage over water, to make foundations firm, to appease divine anger, to commune with a god by eating his human embodiment, to furnish servants and companions for the dead, to remove barrenness, to win great wealth. The mellowing of human manners led to the substitution of animals for human victims, redemption of the first born, and the use of effigies as companions of the dead.

A.E.H.

humanism, classical: See Renaissance.

Humanism, the New: As used by Irving Babbitt, Paul Elmer More, and their followers, the term signifies a philosophic point of view stressing the human elements of experience in contradistinction to the animal. Assuming a dualism of man and nature, the New Humanists assert that the essential quality of human experience is ethical, that man's will is free, and that the ultimate freedom is to be found in "liberation from outer constraints and subjection to inner law." Although inclining to the Hellenic doctrine of reason rather than to distinctively Christian standards, some members of the school have attempted a synthesis with revealed religion.
See the symposium edited by Norman Foerster, Humanism and America (1930).

L.W.C.

humanism, religious: Although humanists have appeared in many periods of the world's history, by religious humanism is generally meant a relatively recent movement, born doubtless of the modern scientific age, which has discarded all dependence upon anything outside of man himself for the attainment of the good life. Man is "on his own" in the universe which is essentially indifferent to him. Whatever satisfaction he is to enjoy he must achieve by his ability to control the physical world about him or through his manipulation of social forces which can thus be made to serve him. He is entirely this-worldly in his outlook. Science is the key to his hope of a better world. John H. Dietrich, a Unitarian minister, is frequently called the "father" of religious humanism, and most of the leaders of the movement have been furnished by the Unitarian* church. Indeed the humanist churches constitute for the most part the left wing of Unitarianism. The most representative statement of their position was the so-called Humanist Manifesto issued in May, 1933, which declares in part —

"Humanism asserts that the nature of the universe depicted by modern science makes unacceptable any supernatural or cosmic guarantees of human values . . . Religion must formulate its hopes and plans in the light of the scientific spirit and method.

"Religion consists of those actions, purposes and experiences which are humanly significant. Nothing human is alien to the religious. It includes labor, art, science, philosophy, friendship, recreation—all that is in its degree expressive of satisfying human living. The distinction between the sacred and the secular can no longer be maintained.

"The goal of humanism is a free and universal society in which people voluntarily and intelligently cooperate for the common good. Humanists demand a shared life in a shared world."

While religious humanism is generally nontheistic, there are many who call themselves theistic humanists or Christian humanists. They are at one with the more radical wing in their insistence upon human values and their denial of the complete impotence of man to work out his own salvation. Man cannot, they hold, achieve salvation without most vigorous self-effort, but he is not left wholly alone, for God works with him. Furthermore their outlook is not wholly this-worldly although they do not stress the future life. That, they are content to trust to a good and wise God. See Comte, A.; Foster, G. B.; positivism.
Representative writings of religious humanism include: Curtis Reese, Humanist Religion (1931); A. E. Haydon, The Quest of the Ages (1929); Charles F. Potter, Humanism—A New Religion (1930), R. W. Sellars, Religion Coming of Age (1928); J C F. Auer, Humanism States its Case (1933). The Movement publishes a monthly magazine The Humanist.

C.S.B.

humanitarianism: A term used technically to describe philanthropy as it broke away from the aegis of Christianity in the 17th and 18th centuries. Sometimes employed by liberals in contempt to indicate the attempt of the newly rich mercantilist class to salve their consciences by private doles. Sociologically, it can be viewed as private efforts in the commercial and urban community of the post-Reformation period to exercise the deeply imbedded pattern of mutual aid in a society in which the customary forms of mutual aid were either frustrated by the complexity of the problems of poverty or exploited.
Thorstein Veblen, The Theory of the Leisure Class (1879); Stuart A. Queen, Social Work in the Light of History (1922).

F.J.B.

Hume, David: (1711-76) Scottish philosopher, probably greatest modern sceptic. Following the Occasionalists, Locke, Berkeley, and ancient sceptics*, Hume dissolves experience into a shower of "impressions," fading off into mere "ideas", and without any unity or coherence except a mysterious "custom" or "association of ideas." Causation is regularity in the flow of impressions, which by habit we expect to continue. Knowing no objective principle of causation, we cannot infer a divine mind as cause of the world-order. Matter and mind alike fail to explain orderliness, since the impressions by which we know them are essentially separate, and how the mind controls even its own ideas, if it really does so, is a mystery. Hume's critique of theology depends also upon his assumption that though causality is inexplicable, it yet has absolute sway, forbidding all freedom of open alternatives. Hence a world-orderer, if there be such, must be responsible for all details of events—thus the problem of evil* appears insoluble. In the Dialogues, Cleanthes rejects, as "really atheistic", the purely absolute, timeless character imputed to God by "all the orthodox divines almost". Theism means that man is not wholly dissimilar to the supreme cause, and there can be no analogy between the human mind and a sheer absolute (see also Gerson, Levi ben). But no definite alternative is suggested, other than a crudely finite deity. (See finite God.)

Hume's fine treatment of ethics rests upon the idea of sympathetic or disinterested approval and disapproval. His view of religion stands or falls largely with the atomistic concept of experience, the assumption of determinism*, and the apparent assumption that there can be no higher synthesis of absolute and relative in the idea of God (see Perfect). Whitehead* and others have recently challenged all three assumptions. Kant's* famous answer to Hume effects some reform of the first. See cause.

D. Hume, A Treatise of Human Nature (1739-40); Enquiry Concerning the Human Understanding (1748); Enquiry Concerning Morals (1751); Natural History of Religion (1757); Dialogues Concerning Natural Religion (1779). Also N. K. Smith, The Philosophy of David Hume (1941).   C.H.

humeral veil: (Lat. humerus, the shoulder) A cloth vestment about 2½' x 8' worn on the shoulders of the subdeacon in solemn Masses to hold the paten, from the Offertory to the Pater Noster, in imitation of the Levites of the O.T. It is also worn by the priest while giving benediction with the Most Blessed Sacrament and when carrying the same Holy Sacrament in procession. Lambing, Sacramentals, 291.   B.S.

Humiliati: (It. The Humble Ones) A twelfth-century association of lay-penitents combining the prosecution of gospel ideals with the avowed application of Christian principles to economic practices. Although living in normal, family relationships, they frequently gathered in common assembly for mutual edification, social and spiritual. Denied, by the papacy, the full exercise of their renunciatory dedication, they led a checkered career of heresy and orthodox monastic* vocations.   R.C.P.

humiliation of Christ: A Lutheran and Reformed doctrine, based on Philippians 2:5-9, denoting the limitations and sufferings submitted to by Christ in consequence of his humanity,—the supernatural conception, birth, circumcision, education, earthly life, passion, death, and burial, contrasted with his exaltation,—resurrection, ascension, and seat at the right hand of God. See kenosis.   F.G.E.

humility: In general usage an attitude of modest self-estimate characterized by a lowly and unpretending view of oneself, an absence of pride in one's achievements, and freedom from arrogance, presumption and conceit. It is stressed in Christianity as the initial grace of the Christian life. It indicates a sense of creatureliness, weakness and unworthiness before God, the Perfect Spirit, and so calls for constant dependence on His grace while it refers all personal gifts and virtues to Him as their true and only source.   R.W.F.

Huntingdon's, Countess of, Connexion: A group of Calvinistic Methodists*, so called after Selina, Countess of Huntingdon (1707-1791), who had appointed Whitefield* and other Calvinistic Methodists as her chaplains, built chapels and a seminary, and supported and ruled the group until her death. In 1779 she was forced to separate from the Church of England and enroll as a dissenter*.   A.K.R.

Hunzinger, August Wilhelm: (1871-1920) He taught in Leipzig and Erlangen. Then he was chief pastor in Hamburg. He was a leader in the effort to come to an understanding between conservative and critical theology.

Lutherstudien (Leipzig, 1906); Der Glaube und das religionsgeschichtliche Christentum der Gegenwart (Leipzig, 1907); Zur apologetischen Aufgabe der evangelischen Kirche in der Gegenwart (Leipzig, 1907); Probleme und Aufgaben der gegenwärtigen systematischen Theologie (Leipzig, 1909); Theologie und Kirche (Leipzig, 1912); Das Wunder (Leipzig, 1912); Hauptfragen der Lebensgestaltung (Leipzig, 1916); Das Christentum im Weltanschauungskampf der Gegenwart (3 ed., Leipzig, 1919).   H.H.

huppah: Hebrew term for bridal chamber (Ps. 19.6; Joel 2:16). Originally the chamber in which the bride received the groom for the consummation of their marriage, it has come to be a portable canopy, consisting of a square covering of silk, satin or other cloth, stretched across four poles, which are either fixed in the ground or held by attendants, under which the wedding ceremony is solemnized according to traditional Jewish practice. (Cf. Isa. 4:5).   S.S.C.

Hus, John: (1369-1415) The leader of the Czech Reform. Studied at the University of Prague, where he became acquainted with the philosophical writings of John Wyclif*. Later he studied his theological works, and gradually became the leader of the Czech Reform movement, since he was the preacher at Bethlehem Chapel, its chief center. He was a moderate and always critical Wyclifite, never sharing some of the most important tenets of Wyclif. He became involved in a conflict with Archbishop Zbynek over the papal schism, he adhering to Pope Alexander V, while Zbynek at first held to Pope Gregory. Later, he lost the support of King Václav by disregarding the latter's prohibition of opposition to the sale of indulgences. In order to save Prague from an interdict, he left the city, and later voluntarily came to the Council of Constance*. But despite the imperial safe conduct, he was imprisoned and accused of the Wycliffite heresy. Although the great majority of the charges against him were false, he was adjudged guilty of them. He was burned at the stake on July 6, 1415. See Hussitism; Moravian Church.

Matthew Spinka, John Hus and the Czech Reform (1941); Count Lutzow, Master John Hus (London, 1900). M.S.

Husserl, Edmund: (1859-1938) Professor of philosophy at Göttingen and Freiburg. Founder of phenomenology*. In his Philosophie der Arithmetik (1891) he tried to base arithmetic on psychology. Later, in his influential Logische Untersuchungen (1900-01) he contended powerfully against all psychologisms. In this and his Ideen, etc. (1913) he attempts to establish a science of pure experience, based on intuition of essences, which shall refute naturalism by "bracketing" the factual and shall also overcome formalism and rationalism by showing that truth is based on ideal yet concrete Wesenheiten. See psychology, schools of.

Other Works· Formale und Transcendentale Logik (Jahrbuch für Philosophie etc 1929); Nachwort zu meinen Ideen (ibid., 1930); Méditations cartésiennes (1931). J.S.B.

Hussitism: The Czech Church Reform movement deriving from John Hus*. There were three main parties in Bohemia claiming spiritual descent from Hus. the most radical were the Taborites*, who went far beyond the teachings of Hus and regarded the Scriptures as their sole rule of faith and practice. Their armies, under John Zizka, proved at first victorious against all opposing forces, domestic and foreign, but were ultimately defeated, at the battle of Lipany (1435), by the combined forces of the Calixtines* and the Czech Catholics. The second group comprised the moderates, called the Calixtines or Utraquists, who by the Compacts* of Prague (1431), granted by the Council of Basel* were allowed certain reforms (especially the communion under both kinds) and were recognized as within the Roman Catholic Church. They perpetuated their separate organization until after the Battle of White Mountain (1620) when their privileges were abrogated along with those of all other Protestants. In a less direct way, the Unity of Brethren may also be included, although the spiritual father of this movement was Peter of Chelcice and the organizer was Brother Gregory.

Count Lützow, The Hussite Wars (London, 1909); J. Th. Müller, Geschichte der böhmischen Brüder, 2 vols. (Herrnhut, 1922-31). M.S.

Huterite (Bruederhof) communities: See communistic settlements, religious; Mennonites.

Huxley, Thomas Henry: (1825-1895) English biologist. Apart from his strictly technical studies, Huxley influenced 19th century thought by his brilliant exposition and defence of Darwinism. Evidence as to Man's Place in Nature (1863), Lay Sermons, Addresses and Reviews (1870), Science and Morals (1886), and Evolution and Ethics (1893) are representative titles. To describe his own theological position he coined the term agnosticism*. See evolution. L.W.C.

Hyacinthe, Fr.: See Loyson.

hybris: (Gr. hybris) Insolence or overweening pride, which brings down retribution (némesis) from the gods through blind infatuation (átē), which causes a man to commit some rash act leading to ruin. E.M.N.

Hyde, William Dewitt: (1858-1917) Graduated Harvard, 1879, Andover, 1882.

President and professor of Mental and Moral Philosophy, Bowdoin College, 1885-1917. President Hyde was a penetrative and persuasive teacher and writer on ethics and religion and was notably influential in these fields in the educational world.

Author: Practical Ethics (1892); Practical Idealism (1897), Sin and its Forgiveness (1909); From Epicurus to Christ (1904), republished as The Five Great Philosophies of Life (1911). J.W.B.

Hyde Lectureship on Foreign Missions, The: Established in 1867 by Henry Hazen Hyde of Boston at Andover Newton Theological School, Newton Centre, Mass. The capital sum is $10,000. Given at irregular intervals the lectures serve to bring to the seminary courses "on Christianity and its World Mission." Among those serving have been John R. Mott; James L. Barton, Albert W. Palmer; and John A. Mackay.

(Data from the office of the President of the Theological School.) V.F.

Hyksos: An invading body of mixed peoples entering Egypt from Syria in the eighteenth century, B.C.; were expelled from the delta about 1580 B.C. by Ahmose I, founder of the Eighteenth Dynasty. F.L.P.

hylomorphism: See Aristotle; ontology.

hylozoism (Gr. hulé, wood or matter, and zoé, life) The theory that matter has an inner life of its own ("all things are full of gods," Thales). This view was accepted naively by the Milesians. There are traces of it in the Stoics*. It was later developed by the French materialists of the eighteenth century, who believed that nature could be explained on a completely mechanical basis. Whether as an immanent naturalistic teleology or as a mechanistic theory, it is of theological importance because it tends to make the hypothesis of God unnecessary, in spite of the Stoic identification of matter or the World Soul with God. J.E.N.

hymnals: See hymns.

hymnology: A hymn is a song of praise or prayer to God. Enjoined by the apostles, hymn singing became popular among early Christians. Though largely restricted to the clergy after 600, it led to the creation of vast treasures of hymnody both in the Greek and Latin churches. The Reformers reopened the floodgates of congregational song. Inspired by Luther, Germany achieved leadership in the composition of hymns and melodies. Wherever Calvinistic influence extended (as in England, Scotland, New England), rhymed versions of the psalms were sung in place of hymns. Ken and Watts (around 1700) and Charles Wesley were the first in the long line of great hymnists in English speaking coun-.ies. But every Christian age and country has contributed to the imposing total of half a million hymns.

Article in Schaff-Herzog, Encyclopedia of Religious Knowledge Vol V. (1909) ; J. Julian, Dictionary of Hymnology (1882. New ed 1907) , Louis Benson, The Hymnody of the Christian Church (1927).

E.C.K.

hymns: (Gr. humnos; Lat., hymnus) Following the Last Supper* of Jesus, having sung praises to God (humnesantes) they went out to the Mount of Olives. (Mark 14 26.) From this occasion, which marks the origin of so many Christian traditions, to the present day, the hymn has been an exceedingly important vehicle for the expression and spread of Christian doctrine and devotion. The use of songs of praise is found in early pagan rites as well as in the psalmody of the early Hebrew synagogue. This practice was transferred quite naturally into the early Christian churches. Antiphonal psalmody was employed from the beginning in the Eastern Church.

The magnificent Latin hymnody was begun in the Western church in the period of St. Ambrose* who used the Syrian antiphonal hymn to combat the Arian heresy, much as it was used earlier in the East to combat gnosticism. Ambrosian hymns were the first true Western Christian poetry. They employed plainsong* melodies, but since the poetry was metrical, the music also became metrical without effort. The free rhythmed Gregorian chant* and the metrical hymn developed simultaneously.

A Spanish magistrate, Aurelius Prudentius Clemens, (348-413), wrote many Christian poems which were soon set to music. St. Benedict* about 530 provided in his monastic order that a hymn should be sung for each Office. The hymns of Venantius Fortunatus (530-609), bishop of Poitiers, mark the beginning of the medieval way of thought. They are rich in romantic symbolism, many written in honor of the Cross.

Used as part of the liturgy* there were communion hymns, processional hymns, and sequences. An Irishman, Sechnall, wrote a communion hymn as early as 690. A Carolingian poet, Theowulf, about 821 created a Palm Sunday processional hymn. The great hymn, Pange lingua gloriosa, of Fortunatus was also used for this purpose. In the 11th century the traditional sequence to the Alleluia* was replaced by the well-known Veni sancte Spiritus, sometimes attributed to Robert the Pious, king of France, who died in 1031. This was extended and developed into the Golden Sequence possibly done by Pope Innocent III but more likely by Stephen Langton, archbishop of Canterbury, 1207-1228. Out of the Easter sequence, Victimae paschali, by Wigo of Burgundy, died 1050, grew the medieval miracle and morality plays* and thence the modern drama. Musically there was derived from it the great Lutheran chorale*, Christ lag in Todesbanden, employed by Bach in a cantata of the same name. The greatest composer of sequences was conceded to be Adam, canon of St Victor in Paris. Two other 13th century sequences have become great hymns. the Dies irae and the Stabat mater.

The essence of the hymn is its direct appeal to the spirit of the people The declining use of Latin from the 14th century on led to a growing unfamiliarity with the meanings of hymns and to their decreasing usefulness. There was no decline in the production of hymns but a decided lack of quality aggravated by attempts to put the good medieval hymns into classical Latin, which only destroyed their original value. In 1629 Urban VIII had the Jesuits "correct" the hymns. These mutilations were retained as late as the Breviary of 1911.

Hymns in the vernacular appeared long before the reformation. Carols brought into sacred usage from folksong the refreshing dance rhythms which were no longer associated with pagan rites or immorality. Many carols were a mixture of Latin with the vernacular, such as In dulci jubilo, Puer nobis, and O filii et filiae. The tender spirit St. Francis in the 13th century, which brought a personal Christianity back to the people, gave rise to spontaneous religious song throughout Europe. From the Laudi spirituals in Italy came the hymns Alta Trinita beata and Divinum mysterium; from the Spanish Cantus mariales came Tantum ergo, used in a magnificent motet by Vittoria, among the French Noels was Picardy; of the Piae Cantiones of Germany was Es ist ein' Ros entsprungen, set later by Praetorius, from the Bohemian Separatist group came the tune Ravenshaw.

The reformation added new impetus to vernacular hymnody. Luther* wrote, "It is my intention to make German Psalms for the people, spiritual songs whereby the word of God may be kept alive in them by singing." Luther himself, recognizing the value of congregational singing, wrote many chorales such as Ein' feste Burg, Aus tiefer Noth schrei ich zu dir, Vater unser, and Vom Himmel hoch. Heinrich Isaak adapted a popular folk tune to O Welt, ich muss dich lassen. The pietist* movement in the 18th century brought forth many more great chorales. The emphasis of Spener and Francke upon emotional religion and individualism created an atmosphere in which great hymns arose. Paul Gerhardt, composer of the Passion Chorale, is second in importance in German hymnody only to Luther. Zinzendorf*, leader of a separatist movement, brought the German chorale to America where it was established in the Moravian* settlements in Pennsylvania and North Carolina. The loftiest result of pietism in music was the great opus of Johann Sebastian Bach (1685-1750) who made the chorale the center of his art Not only did he write many original chorales but he used them in his passions, oratorios, cantatas, motets, and chorale-preludes for organ.

The Huguenot movement was not popular in the French court. Clément Marot, who translated many Psalms into French, was forced to flee his position at the gay court of Francis I. At Geneva he met a follower of Calvin, Theodore Beza*, who completed the versification of the French Psalter. This was set to music by Louis Bourgeois, giving birth to Old Hundredth, St. Michael, and Toulon. Calvinism, however, imposed a serious restriction upon the growth of hymnody. The texts had to be drawn from the Bible

In 1539 Miles Coverdale published an English translation of 36 German chorales in an unpopular hymnal, Goostly Psalmes and Spirituialle Songs. The early Anglican church prescribed the Calvinist ban upon non-Biblical texts. Thomas Sternhold made a poor English translation of 37 Psalms which pleased Edward VI. The strict rule regarding texts was relaxed under Elizabeth in 1559. The Whole Booke of Psalmes of 1562 was made up largely of the translations of Sternhold and Hopkins. In 1623 George Wither published Hymns and Songs of the Church. This included three tunes of Orlando Gibbons and was characterized by many good tunes but poor poetry.

The publication of new hymnals has increased in quantity from the 17th century to this. In 1701 Henry Playford published The Divine Companion which included hymns of Jeremiah Clark, called the first modern hymn-writer, George Herbert, Richard Crashaw, and William Croft, who contributed St. Anne and Hanover. This also included some translations of Breviary hymns. In 1708 the Lyra Davidica included translations from both Latin and German. The music was freer in style than the old Psalm tunes, illustrated by Jesus Christ is Risen Today.

The non-conformists contributed heavily to the great English production of hymns. They were much freer with subject matter than their predecessors. Isaac Watts (1674-1748) wrote over 400 hymns still sung, among them When I Survey the Wondrous Cross and O God, Our Help in Ages Past.

At Charles Town, S. C. in 1737 John Wesley* published A Collection of Psalms and Hymns, the first true Anglican hymnal, containing 70 tunes. This was proscribed by the church because it contained non-Biblical texts. After his return to England, Wesley wrote more hymns. At first closely associated with Moravian ideas, he later grew away from them because of their emphasis upon intimate personal emotions and the physical sufferings of Christ. This Moravian tendency in his brother prevented John from using some of Charles' most sentimental hymns. By his spiritual reserve John safeguarded the Wesleyan hymn from sentimental decay.

The melancholy poet, William Cowper (1731-1800), befriended a converted slaveship captain, John Newton, who was a clergyman at Olney. They published the famous Olney Hymns of excellent quality in 1779. As late as 1819 Thomas Cotterill, a vicar of Sheffield, was sued for introducing into his parish an unauthorized hymnal printed by his Moravian friend, James Montgomery, one of the best of the English hymn-poets.

Reginald Heber,* vicar of Hodnet, was exemplary of the new 19th century spirit of romanticism. Familiar with the Olney hymns, he produced many himself, making a collection which included works of most of his prominent predecessors both in English and in translations of Latin, German, and French sources. He was one of the first to unify his service by correlating hymns, scripture and sermon topically. His work, Hymns written and adapted to the Weekly Church Service of the Year, was published in 1827, (the year following his death in Calcutta where he spent the last three years of his life as bishop.)

The 19th century has seen several important movements in hymnology the revival of the Latin hymn and the German chorale in translations, of the neglected carol, and of Gregorian chant. An English priest, John Mason Neale (1818-1866) made a great contribution to hymnology by his edition with Thomas Helmore of The Hymnal Noted in 1852 and 1854. This contained 105 Greek and Latin hymns translated and set to the original plainsong.

Many American and British denominations now have excellent recent hymnals

W Douglas, Church Music in History and Practice (1937) ; J. Julian, Dictionary of Hymnology (1915) ; G. Grove, Dictionary of Music and Musicians (1935), Article on Hymns, Hymns Ancient and Modern, Historical Edition (1909).   E.H.B.

hymns, Hebrew and Jewish: The Psalms and other sacred songs of the Bible form the hymnal treasury of the Synagogue as well as the models for reconstructed liturgy, following the destruction of the Temple in 70 C.E. The post-Talmudic poems go under the name of piyyut (Gr. poiesis, poetry). The first of these creations were anonymous. From the 7th century come the distinguished names of Jose ben Jose, Yannai, and Eleazar Kalir. The devotional piyyut of Saadia Gaon (d. 942) and of the Spanish-Arabic school of the 10th-12th centuries, reaching its height in the works of Solomon ibn Gabirol, Moses and Abraham ibn Ezra, and Jehudah Halevi, is the lineal descendant of the Psalms. The didactic piyyut of Yannai and of Kalir and his followers of the Romano-German rites, like Meshulam ben Kalonymus, Kalonymus ben Jehudah, Gershom ben Jehudah, Shimeon ben Isaac, Joseph Tub Elem, etc., consists largely of versified Rabbinic homilies and even of laws and customs pertaining to various occasions of the year and events in the religious life.

Though produced by some of the foremost men of the Synagogue, the piyyut made its way into the liturgy under great protest, because 1) of its seeming disturbance of the religious spirit and unity of the established service, and 2) of its obscurities of style and cryptic language. Reform Judaism has objected to the piyyutim on theological grounds as well, and has retained only some of the more inspirational ones both in the original and in translations.

Reform Judaism introduced hymns in modern languages into the liturgy. The first collection of such hymns was issued by Israel Jacobson in 1810 (Cassel). The Hamburg Hymnal of 1845 enjoyed considerable popularity in Germany and affected the Jewish hymnals which appeared in the U. S. Of these the best known are Isaac S. Moses's Sabbath School Hymnal 14th ed. (1920), A. Z. Idelsohn's Jewish Song Book 2nd ed. (1929), and the Union Hymnal, published by the Central Conference of Amer. Rabbis, 3rd ed. (1932).

The fullest index of the sacred song of the Synagogue is I. Davidson's Thesaurus of Mediaeval Hebrew Poetry, 4 vols. (1924-33) (about 35,000 entries, many of them secular). A. Z. Idelsohn's Thesaurus of Hebrew Oriental Melodies, 10 vols. (1914-33), presents several thousand texts (generally first stanzas) and music of hymns and prayers sung in the synagogues and Jewish homes throughout the world.   s.s.c.

hyperdulia: See dulia; latria; mariolatry.

hyperousios: See ousia.

hypnosis: See abnormal psychology; psychotherapy; suggestion.

hypocrisy: The act of simulating qualities of personality, moral character, religious convictions or other beliefs which are not actually present in the person or persons assuming that false appearance. While the term hypocrisy is applied in common usage to deliberate dissimulation or intentional insincerity, it may not properly be limited to conscious deception alone. The term may also have consistent, even if unwelcome, reference to man's unconscious distortion of the professed ideal, the unrecognized discrepancies or inconsistencies prevailing between that which man avows in theory and the quality of personality which man demonstrates in practice.   h.w.j.

hypostasis: A Greek word of varying meaning: literally, "a support," used in early Christological discussions, first as a synonym for ousia, "substance," or "essence," latterly as a term for the divine substance in its personal modes. Thus, the members of the Trinity came to be called hypostases, eternal distinctions within the divine unity. See Cappadocians, the Three.   f.g.e.

hypostatical unity: A term employed to denote the union of divine and human natures in the one person (hypostasis) of Christ. It represents a formula worked out by the Council of Chalcedon (451) to reconcile the felt demand for unity in Christ's personality and also its humanity. It affirms that the human and divine natures, though distinct, are united inseparably in Christ. See Christology. Cf. hypostatical unity in impanation*.   f.g.e.

hypothesis: Science has projected hypothesis into the spot-light of modern thought, but in fact the thought process, at any level, has employed it even long before its identification and recognition as hypothesis. The reason is that thinking itself is an abstractive process whose initial possibility necessitates assumption or hypothesis. Much the same as man's seeing instrument, the eye, sees other objects rather than itself and therefore man naturally slips into unconsciousness of his seeing organ, so in a sense hypothesis implements the origin and beginning of thoughts' processes in which thought tends to move on and likewise to become unconscious of the instrument of its initiation.

In more scientific terms, hypothesis may be said to stand as the initiator of a thought form destined, if it persists, to move on to the stage of theory and finally to that of fact.   p.r.h.

hysteria: A functional disorder of unstable and neurotic persons that is usually classified under the psychoneuroses and held to be psychogenic in origin. Among its many symptoms are excessive impressionability, liability to emotional episodes, marked sensory, motor and psychic disturbances, and the unconscious simulation of all sorts of diseases. Among its principal causes are overstrain, emotional shock, faulty synthesis of personality and buried complexes. For two important theories about it consult the writings of P. Janet and S. Freud*.   r.w.f.

I

I Am: A religious movement founded by Guy M. Ballard and his wife as a result of certain revelations received from the Ascended Master St. Germain in 1930 at Mt. Shasta in northern California, and subsequently. It attracted a large following during the late 1930's when it held great series of meetings in the larger cities of the United States. The founder died in 1939. Mrs. Ballard and son Donald were later indicted for using the mails to defraud, and an adverse judgment was rendered by the courts. No statistics as to the number of followers are available. Headquarters of the movement are in Los Angeles, California and Mrs. Ballard continues as its head.

The teaching of the movement may be stated briefly as follows.

The Mighty I am Presence, or God is the source of all life and power. There are certain Ascended Masters through whom knowledge of the I am is communicated. Jesus was one; St. Germain is the one through whom the revelation came to Ballard. Until his death he continued to receive communications from St. Germain which were published in The Voice of the I Am. Others bear names familiar to occultists. The Ballards styled themselves the accredited messengers. The power of the I Am Presence is always available, but can not be made effective until it is called for by humanity. This is accomplished through a decree. The decrees which, directed to the Ascended Masters release the forces necessary to produce the desired results, take the place of prayer in the I Am groups. Mass decree is the technique employed in group meetings. The entire congregation repeats the decrees, in unison, not in a voice of supplication but demand. These are furnished in the official book of decrees, which express the desire of the group. A great deal of use is made of light and color in the cult.

The teachings of I Am are clearly taken from various sources, particularly theosophy and its beliefs in Mahatmas.

The chief textbooks of the movement are Unveiled Mysteries and The Magic Presence (1935) by the founder, under the pen name, Godfre Ray King, The I AM Discourses by St. Germain and the I Am Adorations and Affirmations by Chanera, all published by the St. Germain Press, Chicago.

C.S.B.

Ibas: (d. 457) Succeeded Rabbulas as Bishop of Edessa* in 435, later charged with Nestorian heresy because of his interest in and translation (into Syriac, the language of the Persian Church) of certain writings of Theodore of Mopsuestia*, deposed by the Council of Ephesus in 449, reinstated by the Council of Chalcedon in 451. His famous letter to the Persian bishop, Maris, was condemned (one of "The Three Chapters"*) by Justinian and by the Fifth Ecumenical Council (553). See Syrian churches.

E.T.R.

Iblis or Eblis: (Arabic Iblis from Greek diabolos, devil) The prince of fallen angels, who was turned into a devil for refusing to worship Adam at God's command. The Moslem equivalent for Satan*.

P.E.J.

Ibn-Gabriol, Soloman Ben Judah: (1021-1058) Jewish Spanish poet and philosopher, also known as Avicebron. Author of Fons Vitae (in Hebrew, Mekor Chaim), a philosophical discourse which helped revive the Neo-Platonic tradition in Christian Europe. Fons Vitae did not reveal the author's religion and he was long mistaken for a Christian scholastic. Gabriol's liturgical poems became the model for many Spanish Hebrew poets. His Keter Malkut, (Royal Crown), a philosophical ethical hymn reiterating the ideas expressed in Fons Vitae, was included in the synagogue ritual. Also written up under Avicebron; Gabirol.

B.Z.B

Icarian settlements: See communistic settlements, secular.

I Ching: See Chinese Terminology.

icon: (From the Greek eikon, an "image" or "representation") It is used, especially in the eastern orthodox churches, of a painting, bas-relief, or mosaic of Christ, the Virgin Mary, or a saint. These images are venerated by the faithful. After a vigorous controversy over their use during the eighth and ninth centuries, their use was finally made legitimate, but the Nestorian* church opposes their use. See images.

C.T.C.

iconoclastic controversy: See images.

iconography: (Gr. eikon, a likeness, image, portrait) As an ecclesiastical term it refers to images, mosaics and paintings used as church decoration.   F.T.P.

iconodulism: See images.

Id: See psychology, schools of.

ideal: (Lat. idealis, fr Gr. idea) 1) A norm or standard of perfection (such as a Platonic Idea, a moral law, a principle of aesthetics, or the idea of God), a conception of what ought to be. An ideal as such is contrasted with a value. An ideal is not a value unless it is realized in actual experience Hence the expression "objectivity of values" should be supplanted by "objectivity of ideals." 2) A plan of action, "a chosen end . . . for which other ends are sacrificed. 3) In Kant, "the Ideal of Pure Reason" is the idea of something absolutely necessary, determined throughout by mere idea, an inclusive concept (Inbegriff) of the whole of reality, not to be hypostatized as existing (see CPR, B, 594, 434-435, 602, 607, 610). 4) As an adjective: pertaining to ideas in any sense (Platonic or mental), often used in contrast to real. See value.   E.S.B.

idealism, epistemological: Contrasted with epistemological realism and epistemological dualism. In general, the theory that the structure of knowledge is such that only consciousness or something inseparably related to consciousness is knowable. It assumes various forms. 1) Subjective idealism The theory that only the ideas of a particular finite knower can be known by him, equivalent to solipsism*. Also, the theory that all knowable objects belong to one universal subject (Fichte). 2) Transcendental idealism: The Kantian theory that all knowledge refers to phenomena organized by the categories. 3) Absolutistic idealism: That type of epistemological monism for which ultimately all objects are identical with idea, and the ideal of knowledge is one all-inclusive system of ideas. 4) Platonic idealism: In so far as the Platonic Forms or Ideas are objects accessible only to thought and not to sense, Platonism* is a form of epistemological idealism, but because the Forms or Ideas are independent of the knowing mind, Platonism is also called realism. See epistemology.
    W. H. Sheldon, Strife of Systems and Productive Duality (1918).   E.S.B.

idealism, metaphysical: (Gr. idea, form or archetype) Any metaphysical system which holds that ideals belong to the objective structure of the universe and that mind (or something like mind) is the source and type of all real being. Antonyms. materialism, naturalism, realism.
    Note· These historical antonyms are now being used in senses less antithetical to idealism than formerly. Dialectical materialism, for example, and Dewey's naturalism have much in common with Hegelianism*. The naturalism* of J. B. Pratt is personalism* of a kind, while that of H. N. Wieman is theistic (if impersonal). Vergilius Ferm has recently come out in defense of an "idealistic naturalism." (See bibliography: article: naturalism and theology. Also see "Varieties of Naturalism", Vergilius Ferm, First Adventures in Philosophy (1936), pp. 210 ff and passim.) Much realism is akin to idealism at many points (cf. S. Alexander, R. W. Sellars, W. P. Montague). See B. Bosanquet, The Meeting of Extremes in Contemporary Philosophy (1921).

Historically there are four main types of idealism 1) The Platonic Plato is often called a realist on the ground that his Ideas are independent of mind, whether human or divine, but because he combines objectivity of ideal values with a personal theism, he is the great founder of idealism (perhaps anticipated by Anaxagoras). 2) The Berkeleian. Berkeley taught that all reality is of the nature of consciousness, consisting of ideas (passive and inert) and spirit (active). The esse of nature is not material, but perceptual; it consists only of ideas which the Divine Spirit gives to human spirits. 3) The Hegelian. The coherence of one absolute system, an individual whole, is the ground and explanation of everything. The Idee, as Hegel calls it, is an Absolute Spirit. 4) The Lotzean. For Lotze, selfhood or personality is the ultimate metaphysical fact. Everything that is is either a self or some aspect, process, part, or relation of a self or selves.— These four types (except perhaps Platonism) are also found in Indian, and to some extent in Chinese, thought.

The Platonic type may be called axiological; the Berkeleian, mentalistic or subjective, the Hegelian, organic, absolute, or objective, and the Lotzean, personalistic. These four types are not sharply distinguished from each other, and the chief systems of idealism combine traits from all four. Idealists like Bradley emphasize the Hegelian at the expense of the other three types, so, to some extent, do Bosanquet, Creighton, Barrett, and Robinson. In J. S. Bixler, the Platonic is dominant, although·place is found for the others. All four types are merged and unified in the thought of idealists like W. R. Sorley, A. S. Pringle-Pattison, B. P. Bowne, J. Royce, M. W. Calkins, H. Munsterberg, W. E. Hocking, and J. S. Moore.
    See Platonism, Hegelianism, Personalism, Berkeley, Lotze. See also ontology.
    J. Royce, The Spirit of Modern Philosophy (1892) ; R. F. A. Hoernlé, Idealism as a Philosophy (1927) ; E S. Brightman, A Philosophy of Ideals (1928) ; W E. Hocking, Types of Philosophy (1929) ; A. C. Ewing, Idealism: A Critical Survey (1934) ; B Blanshard, The Nature of Thought (1939).   E.S.B.

idealism, practical: Devotion to ideals*, especially to social ideals. Independent of epistemological and metaphysical idealism, although most metaphysical idealists are also practical idealists (e.g., Plato and Hegel).   E.S.B.

idealism, subjective: See Berkeley, George, epistemology; idealism, epistemological.

Idealistic School, Buddhist: See Buddhist Terminology.

idolatry: The worship of a physical object, usually an artifact, as god. It may refer to the worship of alien divinities, or to the adoration of what is seen and tangible as opposed to the invisible spiritual being, or to the excessive veneration of any human creation instead of the one true creator god. See sin.　　　　　　　　　　R.W.F

idols and images: An idol is a representation of a deity in symbolic or human form, adored or worshiped as a tangible manifestation of the divine presence. Idols are images* but many images are not worshiped Some are amulets effective through their own inherent qualities. others are fetishes made effective by an indwelling spirit. Pictured or sculptured images of saints, of events in the history of a religion, or in the life of the founder appearing in religious structures often serve the purposes of instruction or inspiration, they may or may not be worshiped. Images, but not idols, are such forms as the models of servants and companions buried with the dead in Egypt, China and Japan, or the portrait statue of the dead man indwelt by his *Ka in the Egyptian tomb. Images of ancestors may be revered, or used as fetishes, or if the ancestors have attained divinity, worshiped as idols. On the border line between image and idol are the statues of the Jain Masters and of Confucius who were revered as great teachers rather than as gods

Idols and images in human form are a late product of culture. The nature deities of early religions were tangible and visible realities and needed no symbolic representation. A material form was required to localize the presence of an invisible spirit. When the gods became spirits* their presence was associated first with tangible symbols—sun, moon, a lightning-shattered oak, a pillar of wood or stone, a phallus, a cairn, a mirror, a bird or an animal. The symbol usually had some relation to the activity or character of the god. Art worked first at the perfecting of the symbols and then turned to the representation of the gods in human form, retaining their symbols as attributes. Sometimes a ceremony was necessary to make the image come alive with the indwelling presence of the god. The effort to portray the powers of the various deities produced some fantastic idols in Hinduism and Buddhism.

The religions of Babylonia and Egypt* treated the idols as real embodiments of the gods. Hinduism and Buddhism made large use of idols as aids to popular devotion although the intellectuals knew that no image, not even a mental image, could represent the divine reality. The religion of Israel* used images for many centuries until the struggle with neighboring cults led to a fanatical official rejection of them. Christianity created countless images but officially condemns idolatry. Since the destruction of the idols of Mecca by Mohammed*, Islam* has forbidden their use. Zoroastrianism* never represented deity in human form. See charms and amulets; fetishism.　　A.E.H.

Igigi: (Babylonian) Term for the gods of heaven, collectively; gods embodied in those stars which are above the horizon at any one time; gods embodied in stars that dip below the horizon are in the underworld and known collectively as Anunnaki　　　　　　　　　　　　　F.L.P.

Ignatius of Antioch: Traditional third bishop of Syrian Antioch (Eusebius, H. E. iii, 36, 2), believed to have been martyred at Rome during the reign of Trajan. During his trip from Antioch to Rome he wrote seven letters now included among the Apostolic Fathers, viz., Ephesians, Magnesians, Trallians, Romans, Philadelphians, Smyrneans, and to Polycarp. In all of them two notes are dominant. 1. respect for the authority of the bishops of the several congregations, 2. a protest and warning against Docetism*, which denied reality to the sufferings of Jesus The letter to the Romans is a passionate plea to the local Christians not to prevent (through mistaken kindness) his long anticipated martyrdom in the arena. In all of the letters the Christians addressed are urged to encourage Antioch to rally after her great loss. Two other versions—usually styled the "long recension" and the "Syriac abridgement"—are extant, but have little claim to originality. The authenticity of the traditional seven, although widely accepted, is not entirely free from difficulties. If genuine, the letters are important evidence as to the early rise of what may be called the "monarchical episcopate", and to the caution and restraint showed by Rome in the matter of martyring Christians. See clergy. The most convenient edition of the letters is K. Lake's The Apostolic Fathers, Vol. I (Loeb Classical Library, 1913).　　　M.S.E.

ignorance: Partial or complete lack of knowledge. In law ignorance of the law does not, in general, excuse from responsibility for the consequences of one's acts. In ethics Socrates* held that virtue is knowledge and vice ignorance. This doctrine omits the role of will and habit in conduct. In matters moral and religious ignorance may be involuntary and unavoidable, or voluntary and removable. The former is called invincible ignorance and excuses from culpability in the Roman Catholic Church. The latter is called vincible ignorance and is sin.　　　R.W.F.

ignorance, divine: See omniscience.

Ihmels, Ludwig Heinrich: (1858-1933) He was Lutheran professor of theology in Erlangen and Leipzig, and bishop of Saxony. Faith was for him not based upon dogma, but upon the revelation of God which consists in acts. Hence the certainty of the Christian is certainty of faith. Although he veered toward bible theology and Ritschlianism*, he nevertheless assigned to dogma and creed normative significance for theology.

Die Selbstständigkeit der Dogmatik gegenüber der Religionsphilosophie (Leipzig, 1900); Die christliche Wahrheitsgewissheit, ihr letzter Grund und ihre Entstehung (Leipzig, 1901); Die Bedeutung des Autoritätsglaubens (Leipzig, 1902); Theonomie und Autonomie im Lichte der christlichen Ethik (Leipzig, 1903); Centralfragen der Dogmatik in der Gegenwart (Leipzig, 1911); Das Christentum Luthers in seiner Eigenart (Leipzig, 1917).　　　H.H.

I H S: There are the first three letters of the Greek word Iesous, when it is spelled in capital letters. Since H was later mistaken for a capital h, it was given the erroneous interpretation Jesus Hominum Salvator, "Jesus, the Savior of Men." In fact, it is simply an abbreviation of the name Jesus which served as a symbol for him. See fish as symbol, symbolism. Cf. labarum.   c.t.c.

ijma: (Arabic ijma, agreement) Agreement among the learned of Islam is the principle whereby religious beliefs become articles of faith. The plural ijmaa means the collective body of these decisions, making up the orthodox tradition. "My people shall never be unanimous in error", said Mohammed.   p.e.j.

Ikhnaton: (Egyptian) King of Egypt, Amenhotep IV (c. 1375-1358 B C.) who established the worship of Aton, the visible sun disc, as the religion of Egypt, displacing Amon, god of Thebes; took the name Ikhnaton ('spirit of Aton'); built temples, composed hymns, and established ceremonies for Aton, soon after his death Amon* worship was restored and the work of the reformer was destroyed.   f.l.p.

illegitimacy: The act of giving birth to a child out of wedlock. Ordinarily the child conceived out of wedlock is the consequence of illicit sexual relations although in some cultures, sexual intercourse is looked upon as a normal part of courtship and conception is regarded as a guarantee of the potential fertility of the marriage*. Under these circumstances, the marriage is consummated and the position of the child is no different from those born in wedlock. More commonly, however, both the illegitimate child and its mother lose caste. In general within recent occidental culture the humanitarian movement has tended to mitigate the severity of treatment accorded both the illegitimate child and its mother as symbolized in the substitution of the terms, "illegitimate child" for bastard, "born out of wedlock" for illegitimacy, and "unmarried mother" for the illegitimate mother. Nevertheless in the United States it is a widespread practice for pregnant unmarried women to leave their local communities to give birth to their children in the privacy of a strange locale or in institutions which specialize in providing care for such persons. Not infrequently the child is then placed for adoption and reared by foster parents. Some states require that the father if known support his illegitimate child but he is not compelled to give it his name. The rural mores often sanction the compulsion of marriage between the two persons and these have become known colloquially as "shot-gun" marriages.

Kingsley Davis, "Illegitimacy and the Social Structure," American Journal of Sociology, vol. XLV (September, 1939), pp. 215-233; Percy G. Kammerer, The Unmarried Mother (1918); Ernest R. Mowrer, Disorganization: Personal and Social (1942); Ruth Reed, The Illegitimate Family in New York City (1934).   e.r.m.

Illuminati: A name applied to groups claiming to have special enlightenment, religious or intellectual. There are traces of Illuminati in Spain in the sixteenth century, and Ignatius Loyola was warned against association with them. There were groups in France that used the title, though often wholly distinct from one another. In Germany in the late eighteenth century, a society, half religious, half political, spread widely, but collapsed under persecution.   g.r.c.

illusion: A sense perception which does not give the true character of the object or action perceived. Whether due to mistaken judgment about sense data or to erroneous perception is debatable. It is to be distinguished from hallucination in which the external sense stimulus is lacking. There are normal illusions of ordinary perception and pathological illusions that characterize insanity. Religious ascetics and mystics by virtue of their temperament or longing are believed to be easily subject to illusions. The term is sometimes applied to that non-literal ingredient of religious belief which consists of symbolical construction or imaginative interpretation placed upon a core of real fact or valid insights in order to communicate, vivify and drive home the essential truth of the belief.   r.w.f.

image of God: According to Genesis 1.26. Adam was created "in the image of God." The reference here is evidently to spiritual resemblance alone, the gift of self-conscious reason, a faint adumbration of the supreme reason of God. This image does not belong only to man in his state of primeval innocence but is transmitted to Adam's descendants (ibid. 5.13). Whoever destroys a man does violence to God's image (ibid. 9.6).

Critical view The term "image of God" calls up the highly controversial question of whether the Hebrews at any time worshiped an actual image of YHWH. Many scholars have held that the golden calf of Aaron and those set up by Jeroboam, as well as the idol of Micah, Gideon's "ephod", etc., are all evidence of iconic worship of YHWH. But all this rejects the unanimous testimony of Israelite tradition. The written sources, plus the completely negative results of excavation indicate that the Mosaic religion was from the beginning aniconic and that material representations were foreign to its spirit from the beginning.   l.f.—h.k.

images: The controversy which broke out in the Byzantine Empire* over the worship of images (or icons) is known as the Iconoclastic Controversy. It began in 725 with the prohibition of image worship by Emperor Leo III. The church both East and West opposed the edict, Pope Gregory II denouncing iconoclasm as a heresy (727); Patriarch Germanus of Constantinople was deprived of his see. The most important of the Eastern iconodules (image worshipers) was St. John of Damascus* who denied the Emperor's right to legislate in dogmatic matters. The struggle continued during the reign of Emp. Constantine V (741-775), but during the regency of Irene terminated with the victory for image worshipers. At the Seventh Ecumenical Council (787) it was decreed that images should be venerated but not adored.

But the struggle broke out anew in the reign of Emperor Leo V (813-20), who made the supreme effort to impose iconoclasm upon the church. The chief defender of iconodulism was Theodore of Studion* . However, this attempt failed again, this time in the regency of Theodora. She convoked a Council in 843 which restored the worship of images. Since that time it became the chief feature of the Orthodox type of piety. The event is celebrated to this day in The Festival of Orthodoxy. Cf. Caroline Books; icon, relic.

E. J. Martin, A History of the Iconoclastic Controversy (London, n d) ; A. A. Vasiliev, History of the Byzantine Empire, 2 vols. (1928).   M.S.

images and idols: See idols and images.

imam or imaum: (Arabic imam, leader; from amma, to go before or precede) The officiating priest of a Moslem mosque. Also a title given to various Moslem leaders, such as the Caliph*, chiefs, the founders of the four orthodox sects, or a leading author on any subject. See Mohammedanism.   P.E.J.

imitation in religion: (Lat. imitatio) The repetition of a behavior pattern observed in another person, or persons, in whom one is interested. Such interested perception tends automatically to issue in similar action unless inhibited by conflicting habit or critical judgment. Imitation is particularly characteristic of childhood, although not restricted to it. Together with suggestibility, it is the conservative or traditionalizing factor in community life. The individual tends, consciously or unconsciously, to copy the accepted behavior modes of his society and, in so doing, to acquire the associated attitudes and feelings. Learning by imitation is an important factor in character building and is an essential preliminary to the development of moral insight. In general, moral qualities and religious attitudes are most deeply rooted in persons in whom imitation of such qualities and attitudes began in early childhood.   E.T.R.

Imitation of Christ: This is a classic of Christian devotional literature which has appeared in more than a thousand editions, has been translated into every common language, and apart from the Bible is the most widely read Christian book. The book is rich in counsel on the path of growth in the spiritual life*. It is unflinching in its insistence that The Royal Road of the Holy Cross can only be taken by those who are prepared to suffer with Christ, and that nothing short of the inevitable tribulation which a break with the lusts of this world will bring can serve to "scour off the rust of my defects." Although Thomas a Kempis (1380-1471) of Windesheim in Holland issued the book under his name in 1441, its authorship has long been in dispute. Albert Hyma (Christian Renaissance, 1925) maintains that a Kempis only assembled and worked over the writings of early members of the Brethren of the Common Life* such as Ketel, Zerbolt and Florentius Radwyn. Joseph Malaise (The Following of Christ, 1937) on the basis of the famous Lubeck mss., discovered in 1921, has presented the most convincing case for the Imitation being taken principally from the Spiritual Diary of Gerard Groote, the founder of the Brethren of the Common Life of which Thomas a Kempis was a member. See Groote.   D.V.S.

immaculate conception: (Lat. immaculata, unspotted, sinless, and conceptio, conception) The doctrine that by Christ's merits and in view of the fact that she was to be his mother, the Blessed Virgin Mary* was from the moment of her conception in St. Anne's womb kept free from original sin. See Confessions, Formal of the Christian Church, Sixtus IV, Pope, Peter Aureoli; Pius IX.   L.R.W.

immanence: (Lat. in manere, dwell in) In general philosophical usage the word refers to a) an activity when it produces its effect from within the patient, or b) an entity when its being within something else contributes to the existence of that thing. Immanence may be complete or partial, but the concept represents a protest against ultimate dualism or pluralism, and transitive causality.

In theology the term refers either to complete or to partial identification of God* with the world. The absolute immanence of God in the universe means pantheism*. The absolute independence of God from the world once created means deism*. The theistic tradition, mediating for metaphysical and moral reasons, posits a God immanent in the world but not exhausted in it (transcendent).

The manner of immanence has reflected both metaphysical differences and changes in scientific conceptions, ranging from resemblance, participation, and persuasion (Plato), to emanation, creation, degradation, evolution, organicity, and emergence. Some recent trends emphasize the importance of the world to God's development. See theism; transcendence. Cf. Fiske, John.

"Immanence" by A. C. McGiffert in J. Hastings, Enc. of Rel. and Ethics.   P.A.B.

immediacy: (Lat. in medius, middle) Psychological and Epistemological.

Psychological immediacy is the condition in which the object of awareness is directly present to the mind. It contrasts with the reflective interpretation of the object, or knowledge-about.

Epistemological immediacy characterizes knowledge about reality (or the nature of the psychological object) gained without mediation, either as self-evident, or without resort to inference and interpretation.

An epistemological dualist, as opposed to the monist, holds that the psychological immediacy of the object does not involve epistemological immediacy, whether natural or mystical experience be in question. For example, God, or his agency, may be psychologically immediate without necessarily justifying the claim of the mystic that knowledge of God is epistemologically immediate. See datum, epistemology.

F. R. Tennant, Philosophical Theology, 2 vols. (1928, 1930) ; J. M. Moore, Theories of Religious Experience (1938).   P.A.B.

immersion: Baptism* by complete submersion in water, as distinguished from affusion* (or aspersion) and infusion, the mode practised in the early church and certain modern religious bodies as the Eastern Orthodox, the Baptists, the Disciples of Christ, and numerous sects. See trine immersion.   W.M.B.

immortality, arguments for and against: As the term is employed in this article, immortality means the everlasting duration of the individual human personality. This definition admits a number of conceptions of personality, but is intended to imply some self-recognized continuity of purpose and memory from the present life into the future. See immortality, kinds of.

A. Some Popular but Uncritical Arguments.

1. Consensus gentium. The argument that immortality must be true because belief in it has always been universal among normal human beings is refuted by two considerations a) that the belief has not been held by all normal men (unless an ad hoc definition of "normal" be adopted); and b) that even if belief had been so nearly universal until now as is claimed, that would not prove the belief true. The belief in an earth-centered physical universe would have been better supported by this argument in, let us say, the year 1000, than is belief in immortality now. But the geocentric theory was, nevertheless, false.

2. Origins of belief. It is often pointed out that in the individual child belief in a future life originates in teaching or "conditioning" by the home or church, both of which have often been subject to error. Similarly, it is said that primitive men first came to believe in the soul's survival of death by observing the apparent independence of the body shown by the soul in dreams. Now, it is argued, we have disclosed the real causes of the doctrine, in the individual and the race. Other evidences are in truth only rationalizations of a prior faith. Since the causes themselves are not adequate ground for the doctrine, it is therefore bared as a primitive and childish superstition. To such argument it may be replied that the doctrines of survival held by savages and children are as radically unlike the beliefs held by intelligent and mature men as astrology is unlike the astronomy which evolved from it, and equally irrelevant to the truth of the more mature views. Moreover, many a true conclusion has been drawn from false premises, as every logician knows.

3. Traditional associations of belief. Much contemporary doubt of immortality is affected by immoral and irrational ideas long associated with it, such as the notions of literal golden pavements in Heaven, and of infant damnation. Such associations have, obviously, no bearing on the truth of doctrines not including nor implying them.

4. Effect of desire on belief. Many persons who believe in immortality find their faith pleasant and comforting. It is therefore concluded by some uncritical minds that all so-called arguments for immortality must actually be instances of mere wishful thinking. But probably most men who expect to receive salary checks near the first of next month have good reasons for their expectation and the fact that they enjoy the prospect is quite irrelevant to the question of truth. Whether the reasons for belief in immortality are also good reasons must be determined by examining them, not by observing the emotions which accompany belief.

5. Supposed selfishness of belief. Some objectors think that belief in endless life is selfish. Probably some such belief is accompanied by selfish purposes. But surely belief in the immortality of others is not selfish. Moreover, it is hard to see why faith in a life after death is more selfish than belief in life after tonight's sleep. Whether either belief is selfish or not depends on the kind of life one purposes to live, not on its length.

6. Difficulties of describing a future life. More serious is the objection that no believer can accurately describe the life to come so that it can be presented in vivid detail to the imagination. Despite the sublime allegories of Bunyan, Dante, and the Apocalypse, the contention is doubtless true. Yet there are many of our present experiences which are fundamentally spiritual, as pure mathematics, prayer, moral aspiration, and the love of a kindred spirit. None of these can be presented to the sensory imagination, but all are real and rich in meaning. All may be conceived as continuing after death if consciousness persists. As for the means of communication beyond the grave, we cannot now predict them. But neither could a pre-existing human mind have predicted our present bodies nor their physical environment.

B. The Platonic Arguments. Famous in the history of theology but unimportant for present evaluation of the doctrine of immortality are the following arguments of Plato*:

1. When one kind of being generates its opposite, the former will in turn be generated by the latter. Therefore, as day generates night and night day, so life generates death but death will likewise generate life. Plato's principle is based on a few selected instances and does not hold true universally. E.g., fire "generates" cold ashes, but cold ashes do not generate fire.

2. The soul is by definition the life principle. A dead soul would, accordingly, be a contradiction in terms, like a cold fire. This is true. No such thing as a dead soul can exist. But it is not logically impossible that a soul may cease to be anything at all, or may become some being other than soul.

3. Since the soul knows the eternal Ideas, it shares their eternity to the extent of being everlasting in time, though not, like them, timeless. If one does not accept Plato's doctrine of Ideas, he will not be convinced, and even if he does believe in the eternal Ideas, he may insist that a mere knowing of them no more implies a sharing in their immortality than does the participation in them exemplified in a destructible tree or stone.

4. The soul is simple and therefore not subject to dissolution. But it is questionable in exactly what sense the soul is simple. Moreover, some simple elements, such as sensations, do cease to be.

5. The soul is a self-mover. Since it provides its own motion and its motion is its very life and being, it will never die. But the most hardy exponent of free will today would scarcely go so far as to assert that the human soul has never received any impulsion from any other source whatsoever. If any impulsion has been received it may be that without the continuance, at intervals, of such impulsions, the soul will run down like an unwound clock. Moreover, this argument implies infinite pre-existence with all its difficulties. (See pre-existence.)

6. There is evidence in our present life that the human soul did not begin in time, but has always been in existence. If the soul did not begin it probably will not end. But the evidence for pre-existence is not convincing and there are serious objections. (See pre-existence.) However, when the critics argue further, that if the soul has begun in time it will also end they seem to be on uncertain ground. The series of positive integers has a beginning but no end. We have no way of knowing that every temporal series with a beginning has also an end.

C. Main Arguments Against Immortality.

1. Lack of sensory evidence. The souls of the dead are neither observed to depart from the bodies nor discovered by the senses to be in existence afterward. Since in a scientific age evidence of the senses must be demanded in support of every hypothesis, the lack of such evidence is, in many minds, a fatal blow to the doctrine of immortality. To this positivistic argument, two replies may conceivably be made. Both, in fact, have been set forth. First, it is insisted that the senses do bear witness to immortality as a fact. Orthodox Christians believe that Jesus was observed by the senses of the disciples, to be alive and active after his death. Even if this testimony were accepted by doubters, they might ask whether the survival of death by one professedly superhuman soul proved the immortality of other, merely human souls. But most doubters would question the historical evidence. The believer's reply to both questions would usually take the form of an appeal to the authority of revelation. Whether such an appeal is valid is a problem to be examined later. But it is not an appeal to sensory evidence such as the positivist demands. Many persons would answer the positivist by adducing the evidence from psychic research*. But this evidence could at best prove only the survival of death, not an everlasting survival. Actually, while some well-attested psychic phenomena do give some evidence of ways of knowing unacceptable to traditional modern psychology, there seems to be little reason for supposing that these ways must involve the agency of departed human spirits. The second reply to the positivist is that many hypotheses not subject to sensory evidence are nevertheless well supported. Especially is this true of the present existence of human consciousness. If there were no evidence of any kind, it is admitted, belief would be indefensible, but the evidence need not be of a sensory character.

2. The psychophysiological objection. The most important evidence against immortality is the intimate relation between body and mind, which makes it difficult to believe that consciousness can endure after the death of the body. The conclusiveness of this argument depends on the belief that consciousness is a mere function of the brain, dependent upon the brain not only for its present mode of being and of communication with other minds, but also for its very existence. For this doctrine evidence is lacking. Many beings which, while in relation with others, are profoundly affected by them, are nevertheless capable of existing without them. Thus, a child's whole mind may be so completely controlled by a moving picture he is seeing that one might expect his consciousness to cease when the picture is at an end. But instead it is simply shifted to a new set of relations. If materialism is true, of course immortality is impossible. But so also is present consciousness and the meaningful quest of truth. If idealism is true, then the body itself is a system of experiences of minds and one might then reasonably expect it to be replaced at death, by other experiences. The true interpretation of the relation of body and mind cannot be established by scientific observation but is dependent upon one's whole world view.

D. Main Arguments For Immortality.

1. Arguments from intuition and revelation. Intuitions differ. Some persons profess to know intuitively that immortality is true, others with equal immediacy that it is false. Any adequate criteria for judging such intuitions would seem to depend upon further judgment as to the relation between various kinds of character and the fundamental meaning of the world. If one accepts theism then he may reasonably give considerable weight to the reported spiritual insights of saintly and intelligent men whom he has reason to think fitting vehicles of divine revelation. Without belief in God, such evidence will have little importance.

2. Pragmatic and moral arguments. It is often argued that the effects of faith in the future life are so salutary as to afford good evidence of the truth of this belief. To be sure, some effects have been bad, such as the cruelties of the Inquisition, the self-torture of Mohammedan fakirs, and such other-worldly preoccupation as to encourage toleration of human misery and injustice here. But these effects do not result from the more intelligent and ethical views. The latter views do, on the other hand, support such courage, hope, and comfort in peril and sorrow, and give such a sense of permanence and dignity to intellectual, aesthetic, educational, religious, and moral achievement as to be of incalculable pragmatic worth. But how do we know that a belief which is so deeply and widely useful is also true. There seems to be ground for such faith only if truth about reality is inherently harmonious with our own highest aspirations, as it is if theism is true. Kant's moral argument for immortality as an ethical postulate depends on a similar belief in the relevance of duty to truth.

3. Rationality of the universe. All the achievements of modern science are founded on belief in the fundamental rationality of the world. Give up this postulate and all our vast system of inferences from present data to future and distant events falls like a house of cards. But if immortality is not true, then we are confronted with a strange irrationality. After an age-long evolution of ever more complex beings, there has been produced at last a creature whose worth is beyond question because he experiences his own worth and evaluates all things by ideals which enable him to unlock the secrets of nature itself. He cannot always live here. (See immortality, kinds of, Social Influence.) If this life is all there is for him then all of this long evolutionary process will finally come to naught, just when victory—the creation of something of value in and to itself—has been achieved. Is this what one would expect of a world so thoroughly rational as the world of modern thought and scientific achievement? It must be noted that this argument depends upon the conviction that the world is not only rational in its mechanical constancy but also in its fidelity to purpose. Many philosophers have believed that the mechanical constancy affirmed by scientific faith could not be explained without belief also in a fundamental purposive rationality, such as theism asserts. But again we find that without appeal to a theistic world-view, the evidence for immortality would be unconvincing. On the other hand, if theism is accepted, then not only this and some other evidences already cited give valid support to the doctrine of immortality, but there are also certain additional arguments which may now be briefly presented.

4. The Goodness of God.

a. If God is good, then He wills to conserve value, since even a minimum definition of goodness would imply at least that much. But if man is doomed to annihilation, then all the value achieved by men of all the ages will one day cease to be. If a good God would permit that it would be only because He was powerless to prevent it. The power He has displayed in the creation of man and the world would seem clearly adequate to prevent such a final catastrophe.

b. If this life is all, then many lives will end in peculiarly unjust conditions. The problem of injustice in the distribution of pains and pleasures in this life is, at best, a difficult one for the theist. But without the belief in immortality it will be completely insoluble. (For further discussion of the problem of just compensation for sin and virtue, see: rewards and punishments.)

c. Some persons enter upon this life with great promise of fine achievement. But environmental obstacles, disease, and accident seem, with terrible consistency to obstruct every aspiration, until death intervenes. Will a good God let such careers stop there? Or will He provide new media of work and growth?

d. The holiest of saints, the most learned of scientists, and the most gifted of artists are most keenly aware of the distance their finest efforts fall short of the goals set in their hearts. If theism is true, God has given to man an infinite task. If for this infinite task He has given only a finite time, then just when His most faithful children are seeking in deepest humility to obey His divine commission He sweeps them away into utter annihilation. To call such a being good would be a contradiction of terms.

Seldom has theism been held by enlightened thinkers without an accompanying belief in immortality. The above considerations indicate the reason. The two doctrines are so inextricably bound together by logical implication that either one without the other is precarious and incomplete. See annihilationism, immortality, conditional, immortality, kinds of, Ingersoll lectures, pre-existence, resurrection; rewards and punishments, soul, time, transmigration.

See W. F. Barrett, Psychical Research (1912); H. Bergson, Matter and Memory (1911); J. S. Bixler, Immortality and the Present Mood (1931); E. S Brightman, Immortality in Post-Kantian Idealism (1925); J. W. Dunne, The New Immortality (1939); V. Ferm, First Chapters in Religious Philosophy (1937), G. Galloway, The Idea of Immortality (1919), H. Hoffding, Philosophy of Religion (1906); W James, Human Immortality (1897); R. Jones, Spirit in Man (1941), C Lamont, The Illusion of Immortality (1935), W P. Montague, The Chances of Surviving Death (1934); J. Royce, The Conception of Immortality (1900); R. A. Tsanoff, The Problem of Immortality (1924).   L.H.DE W immortality, conditional: Everlasting personal existence, conceived as a spiritual achievement or privilege of some human selves, rather than an inherent property or divinely given right of all.

The chief arguments urged in favor of this view are as follows· 1) Many passages of the Bible support it, e.g., Prov. 12 28, Matt. 10·28; John 3 16, 11·26, Rom. 2.7; I Tim. 6·16; I John 2 17. 2) Some of the Church Fathers stated the conditional view. Especially important are passages from Justin Martyr (Trypho, 4-6), Theophilus of Antioch (Ad Autolycum, ii, 37), Irenaeus (Adversus Haereses, 34), and Arnobius (Disputationes Adversus Gentes, ii, 14, 16, 62, etc.). 3) The annihilation of the wicked would be more in accord with the divine mercy and goodness than the everlasting punishment affirmed by traditional doctrines of Christianity and many other religions. 4) The most convincing philosophical arguments for immortality presuppose the intrinsic value of the human soul. There is, accordingly, little or no evidence for belief in the immortality of those souls which are not valuable to themselves nor to others. 5) Conditionalism would affirm a principle of the survival of the fittest in the spiritual realm coherent with the well-known biological law. 6) Immortality implies the soul's independence of the body. But souls which predominantly sensuous living has made dependent on the body would lack the moral autonomy and other resources of spiritual life to maintain any meaningful existence apart from the body.

The opponents of conditionalism reply. 1) The biblical passages cited by conditionalists depend, for such interpretation, on the understanding of such words as "death" to mean annihilation, and of "life" to mean continued existence. Actually, these words are often used figuratively to connote, respectively, spiritual disaster and blessedness. 2) Of the Church Fathers cited, only one, Arnobius, is clearly and consistently a conditionalist, while many patristic passages, even from the writings of men claimed as supporters of conditionalism, clearly affirm the everlasting punishment of the wicked. 3) To the other four arguments of the conditionalists, conservative opponents reply that justice requires eternal punishment, that the body is to be resurrected, and that it is not for men to deny the plain teachings of almost innumerable passages of scripture affirming everlasting punishment. To the third argument, many liberal opponents of conditionalism, on the other hand, reply that, while the doctrine of inescapable and everlasting punishment of the wicked is immoral, conditionalism is not the only, nor the best, alternative view. 4) Every human soul is intrinsically valuable. There may be disagreement concerning the question whether every biologically living human body, like that of the "zero" idiot, possesses a soul. But it is insisted that every self-conscious being capable of making choices affirms, by every act of will, even in murder or suicide, that there are ideals which to that soul are of intrinsic value. 5) Arguments from analogy are precarious, and there is no empirical ground for supposing the principle of survival of the fittest, which is true of biological species, to be true also of spiritual individuals. 6) Even the most sensuous soul has some ideal aspirations, or is capable of developing them under conditions more favorable than those which have degraded many lives from very infancy in our evil earthly society. A good God can be trusted to provide further opportunities for spiritual development, even of such degraded persons. 7) Furthermore, the belief in conditional immortality would set an infinite gulf between persons differing little in worth or spiritual attainment. For presumably some would be found barely worthy of immortality, others barely deficient. Between these classes would be a minute difference in merit. Yet their destinies would be separated by the infinity which divides a finite time from eternity. Such a disparity between difference in merit and difference in treatment would be grossly unjust.

The earliest recorded conditional view of a philosopher was that of Chrysippus, the Stoic (282-209 B.C.) Later Stoics were divided on the question. The Christian apologist, Arnobius (284-305), has been mentioned. His defense of the doctrine had little influence and conditionalism nearly disappeared from the literature of the Christian world for twelve centuries. It was re-vived by Fausto Sozzini (1539-1604), and vigorously defended by Hobbes (1588-1679), Locke (1632-1704), and Rousseau (1712-1778). The earliest systematic argument for conditionalism as a Christian doctrine was presented by H. Dodwell in 1706. The idea was revived in the nineteenth century by Richard Whately and Edward White, and then defended with especial thoroughness by E. Petavel. Since Petavel the belief in conditional immortality has been upheld by many thinkers, including, among its most recent defenders, J. Y. Simpson, W. E. Hocking, and E. S. Brightman. See immortality, arguments for and against; immortality, kinds of; pre-existence, rewards and punishments, soul.

See E. S. Brightman, A Philosophy of Religion (1940); W E. Hocking, Thoughts on Death and Life (1937); J. H. Leckie, The World to Come and Final Destiny (1918); E. Petavel, The Struggle for Eternal Life (1875); S. D. F Salmond, Christian Doctrine of Immortality (1897); J. Y. Simpson, Man and the Attainment of Immortality (1922).

　　　　　　　　　　　　　　　　　　　　　L H.De W.

immortality, kinds of: A. Substitute Conceptions. Many persons who do not believe that the human personality or soul can survive death do, nevertheless, assert that they believe in immortality. The doctrines which they affirm and call by that name are of several kinds.

1. Social influence. The observation that an individual may influence others, and they yet others, does give to present choices an importance transcending the single life span. Ostwald, who says he "can think of no grander perspective of immortality than this," yet admits that the influence a man leaves behind loses "individuality and the possibility of being distinguished," and also points out that a universal catastrophe may finally extinguish the human race. Indeed, most astronomers would say that it is altogether irrational to expect an endless continuance of life on this planet. The relentless process of the fixation of our indispensable oxygen supply in solid forms goes on unceasingly and will eventually doom the race even if the earth escapes such spectacular catastrophes as are observed frequently to occur in other parts of the universe. If there is no other life than this earthly career, then even social influence is destined to end at last.

2. Biological continuity. The same objections apply equally against giving the name of immortality to the obvious biological continuity of the individual with his offspring.

3. Eternity of truth and value. J. S. Bixler says, "Perhaps immortality should stand not for an unending existence but for the realization in mortal life of that by which mortality is transcended. In the place of endless quantity we may have to put belief in a quality which temporal limits cannot confine." But it is not clear how anything more valuable than the abstract possibility of a quality can fail to be confined by the temporal limits of the beings in which it inheres.

4. Impersonal monism. Aristotle* affirmed the immortality of man's active intellect, by which he meant the system of intellectual ideals and implications which man shares with God. But however important to ethics and logic is the idea of some such objective and absolute system, it is only by a strained figure of speech that its enduring truth can be called human immortality. No more should one confuse immortality with the continuance of the cosmic, purposeless Will, in the philosophy of Schopenhauer*, nor, on the other hand, with the absorption of the worker in his work. The latter is urged by Kirsopp Lake as the true immortality, and he insists concerning his own work, that after the annihilation of his individuality at death, "it will still be mine." What could be the meaning of "mine" when there is no "I" is a mystery. Obviously we are dealing here with rhetoric, not precise theology nor philosophy.

B. Conceptions of Personal Immortality.

1. Physical or quasi-physical survival. The Christian doctrine of the resurrection of the dead has never implied that the living body itself constituted the continuing individual. Rather, belief in the resurrection of the body has presupposed the immortality of the soul. Some other religions, however, have affirmed the continued existence of a soul which was itself a shadowy thing, like the body in form, but highly attenuated. (See resurrection.) But it may be safely assumed that those who hold such beliefs mean, however vaguely, to assert also the continuance of some awareness of personal identity.

2. Transmigration. One of the most widely held beliefs concerning immortality is the doctrine that at death the soul passes to another body, human or animal, the kind of body usually being thought dependent on the quality of the life just lived. While this ancient view still prevails in the Orient, it is generally regarded in the Occident as a fanciful superstition. Since its acceptance would imply that many or all persons now living had lived in other forms before this life, it is subject to the same objections as the belief in pre-existence*.

3. Spiritual monism. Another ancient view is the belief in the merging of the human soul into the life of an all-embracing Divine Spirit. This view is familiar to the philosophers of India. Probably the return of the individual soul to Brahmā was at first not meant to imply a complete loss of individuality. But there are many passages in the Upanishads and Vedanta which do seem to assert that individuality, even now, is an illusion (māyā), and this view is dominant in Hindu thought, despite the arguments of opposing thinkers known in India as dualists. According to the prevailing monism, the real essence of the individual soul is Atman, and Atman is universal, being identical with Brahmā, the infinite, all-embracing absolute. Therefore, when the soul successfully concludes its pilgrimage and all māyā ceases, the individual, as such, is lost in the inconceivable vastness of Brahmā. The thought of Plotinus* is similar. The human soul, now enslaved by its preoccupation with evil matter, may free itself by asceticism and reverent contemplation of pure Intelligence. Even in this life the soul may experience an ecstatic union with the divine One, but permanent union awaits the discarding of the flesh in death. Both the rational demand for unity of conception and the mystical passion for drawing ever nearer to God have tended to develop such monistic conceptions. The former seems predominant in the thought of John Scotus Eriugena, Hegel, and Royce, and the latter in the teachings of Eckhart, St. Theresa, and Jacob Boehme. The idea of reabsorption in God appears occasionally in modern Christian hymnology, as in the lines by George Matheson, "I give Thee back the life I owe, That in Thine ocean-depths its flow May richer, fuller be." Though in this particular instance the known beliefs of the poet support a monistic interpretation, the use of such expressions by theists often leaves doubt as to the precise meaning. The ethical influence of a spiritual monism will depend mainly upon the answer to the question whether the union with God will everlastingly affirm the value of all that is best in this life or whether it will forever negate it, so that our present highest good will have become evil, or at least of no account. Indian monists have often tended toward the latter, life-denying alternative, Christian mystics have differed, but in the last three centuries have usually been life-affirming, as are most of the occidental monistic philosophers.

4. Survival of a substrate soul. Many persons, untrained in philosophy or theology, think of immortality as indefinite survival of a soul, conceived as an unknown, immaterial being, subject neither to external nor introspective observation, which somehow has or produces the sensations and other elements of consciousness. It is as Locke's tabula rasa were to be, at death, divested of all which experience has written upon it and were to enter a new realm of experience where new content may be acquired. It is not strange that the idea of such a soul being immortal fails to arouse much interest. With no linkages of memory, purpose, nor even learned skills, there would seem little reason for identifying the future life of such an unknown thing with the present self. It is true that Roman Catholic theologians, and some Protestant theologians, believe in a substrate soul, as the subject or agent from which consciousness proceeds. But they believe also that consciousness, with meaningful memories and sense of identity, will continue to accompany this substrate in the life to come.

5. Immortality of the individual personal consciousness. In all of the conceptions of personal immortality, it seems to be tacitly assumed that after death I shall know that I am, in some form, living on. But what can be meant by calling the knower of that fact "I," if there is no consciousness of identity with my present self? And why should the "I" then observed to be still living be considered the same as the "I" now speculating about the future, unless there is continuity of memory and purpose to link that being with the present? Every argument for immortality which seems to have much weight is an argument for the continuance of that personal career of purpose begun, but unfinished, here below. The teachings of the N.T. seem clearly to affirm such personal continuity, and so do nearly all Christian theologians, whether believing also in an underlying soul substance or not. Belief in the continuity of personal consciousness here and beyond the grave is also maintained by the Mohammedans, most modern Jews, the "dualistic" school of modern Hinduism, the personalistic philosophers, and many others. See immortality, arguments for and against, immortality, conditional, pre-existence, resurrection; rewards and punishments, soul, transmigration.

See J. Baillie, And the Life Everlasting (1933); the Bhagavad-Gita; J. G. Frazer, The Belief in Immortality and the Worship of the Dead (1922), K. Lake, Immortality and the Modern Mind (1922), W. Ostwald, Individuality and Immortality (1906); G A. Reisner, Egyptian Conceptions of Immortality (1912); J. Royce, The Conception of Immortality (1900); and Vivekananda, Jnana-Yoga (1933).

L.H DE W.

immortals, Taoist: See Chinese Terminology.

immunity: (Lat. immunitas, fr. immunis, free from a public obligation) Freedom from some burden or requirement.   More specifically, a privileged exemption of a person or class from legal obligations or penalties to which others are subject. In most societies having clearly defined classes of religious leaders, such leaders enjoy immunities of various kinds. Among such privileges now extended to Christian clergymen and similar officials of all faiths, in America, are exemption from compulsory military service, from jury duty, and from payment of federal income tax on living quarters provided by the church or other religious organization served. The churches, also, are generally granted certain immunities, the chief being freedom from taxation of property used for services of worship. Such privileges vary greatly in different countries, and even among the states of the United States.

In general, immunities of religious bodies and their officers have been gradually reduced from feudal times to the present. The various remaining exemptions are criticized as undemocratic class privileges, as indirect but real means of supporting churches by public taxation in violation of liberal principles, as weakening the influence of the privileged clergymen with citizens not so privileged, and as degrading the ministry itself by encouraging those who engage in it to think of their office as a means of escape from responsibility rather than a call to heavier responsibility. On the other hand, immunities granted to the churches are defended on the ground that churches are rendering important public services, valuable to all but supported by all too few. Some legal privileges of clergymen are based on the claim of incompatibility between their religious offices and the services from which they are exempted, as military and jury services. Special tax exemptions are defended on the ground that clergymen are public servants whose income is at best disproportionately small when compared with the income of other men of comparable ability and education.   See benefit of clergy.

See N F. Brand, The Pastor's Legal Adviser (1942)

L.H.DE W.

imp: (Mid. Eng. impa, shoot, graft, scion) Little devil. A petty or inferior evil spirit, child of the devil is an imp of Satan.   F.L.P.

impanation: In the theology of the Eucharist*, the theory that asserts the perdurance under the sacramental species of the substance of the Body and Blood of Christ together with the substance of bread and wine, in a form of substantial, or hypostatic, union. By its emphasis on this latter point it differs from consubstantiation*, which asserts the simple coexistence of the two substances. The theory is first mentioned, and refuted as heretical, by Guitmond d'Aversa (d. ca. 1095), it was apparently held by certain unknown followers of Berengarius of Tours* (d. 1086). Some have maintained that Luther's doctrine on the Real Presence* was impanationist, more probably he held a form of consubstantiation, in dependence on Wyclif* and certain nominalist theories (Smalkald Articles, III, art. 6). But the theory of impanation was apparently held by certain Lutherans, whom Melanchthon* refuted. Cf. Lutheran Doctrine of the Lord's Supper.   J.C.M impediments, marital: See marital impediments.

implicit faith: In traditional Catholic theology, the term is employed to describe a faith which can exist in any man who assents to the two fundamental beliefs that a) God exists, and b) that he will reward those who seek to know him   Such implicit faith, acted upon, is sufficient to place its holder in the way of salvation, since it contains by implication the full Christian faith, although it cannot guarantee salvation. Cf. explicit faith.

W.N.P.

imprimatur: (Lat. it may be published) A bishop's approbation for a Catholic to publish certain types of books, esp. those in theology and philosophy. The words Nihil obstat are also used and mean that there is no reason why the book should not be published.   See censorship of books.   L.R.W.

imputation: The doctrine that the guilt* of Adam's sin is attributed or transmitted to posterity, also the parallel doctrine that Christ's righteousness is laid to the account of Christian believers.

The Apostle Paul had taught that by Adam sin entered the world and death by sin, and so death passed to all men (Rom. 5 12). But through the free gift of God the righteousness of Christ also was transmitted to all men unto justification (Rom. 5:18). The doctrine remained somewhat vague and incidental, however, until lifted by Augustine* to the central position in a theological system. Undergirded by a Platonic realism, he made Adam the representative of the race and his transgression the generic sin of humanity. Hence, in Adam all sinned in a metaphysical rather than a metaphorical sense.   His guilt is transferred to all men, formally, while materially his posterity received from him a corrupted nature (original sin). Calvin, while acknowledging the transference of guilt, stressed the material side— the punishment received through the corrupted nature,—sometimes called mediate imputation, as against the direct or immediate attribution of guilt for Adam's transgression. Protestantism emphasized the notion also that God imputes to the believer the merits of Christ, which makes it possible for Him to justify the believer. See justification, original sin.   F.G.E.

inability, natural: The doctrine that, as a consequence of the Fall, man lacks the capacity to do the will of God. It was enunciated by Augustine* and defended by the Old School Calvinism*.   F.G.E.

Inari: (Lit. probably from ine, "rice plant," and naru, "to grow," i e., "growing rice") The name applied to a pantheon of food and fertility deities consisting of nine main personages, worshiped at the so-called Inari shrines of Japanese Shinto.
D.C.H.

incantation: The practice, common among primitive peoples, of using verbal phrases or formulae in magical rites for coercing supernatural powers to act, bewitching persons, exorcising demons or curing disease. As a part of the ritual of magic the formulae are spoken, sung or chanted.
R.W F.

incarnations: Incarnation is the assumption by a deity temporarily or for a life span of a human or animal body. Rulers, saviors and religious leaders in many cultures received authority for office through direct contact with the gods. The relationship took many forms—inspiration, appearance of the god in a vision, lineal descent from the deity, possession by the Holy Spirit, endowment with divine illumination or incarnation. The "royal glory" of the Persian kings, the "divine light" of the Moslem Shi'ite Imams crowned these men with divine authority: the Imam of the Assassins, the Old Man of the Mountain, was revered as a divine incarnation. The Pharaohs of Egypt were divine because the sun god, Rē, took the form of the ruling monarch to impregnate the queen. Temporary incarnations of the gods were numerous in Greek religion. Zeus, Apollo and Poseidon appeared most frequently, and rarely for moral reasons. They came to punish insolence, to get revenge or to give divine parentage to heroes. The many amours of Zeus, in which he took animal or human form, were a scandal to the later intellectuals. These myths were made in the effort to unite the Aryan sky god, Zeus, with the many pre-Aryan fertility goddesses, the Earth Mothers.

The beneficent Vishnu is the hero of most of the incarnation stories in Hinduism. Episodes which originally belonged to other gods are now credited to him. He is incarnated whenever there is desperate need, when the world is sinking into decay, when iniquity flourishes and duty is neglected. At such times he comes to restore the teaching and to save. He has been incarnated as fish, tortoise, boar, man-lion, dwarf, Rāma with the axe, Rāma, Krishna, Buddha and in the decline of the present age will appear as Kalki. Many great saints in modern times have been honored as incarnations of him. In the beginning, Buddhism taught a way of salvation that asked no help from the gods but later developed the idea of the bodhisattva (see Buddhist terminology), a human being who had acquired supernatural power, wisdom and goodness in his climb toward buddhahood. These divine beings were incarnated in innumerable forms to help and save mankind. Whenever the truth is obscured, the law neglected and the world in distress one of these celestial bodhisattvas comes to the earth, as Gautama* did, to lead men to salvation. The future Buddha, Maitreya (see Buddhist terminology), is now waiting in the Tusita heaven for his hour of incarnation to strike. In Tibet, the Dalai Lāma and the Tashi Lāma are incarnations of the bodhisattva Avalokiteśvara and the buddha Amitābha respectively.

Early in the second century, the Christian savior was recognised as a god. Since Christianity was committed to monotheism he was asserted to be an incarnation of the divine essence.

Theories of divine incarnation arise for various reasons—to give great men status, to give god-value to a savior, to reconcile religions of separate origins or to bring divine help close to mankind in human form.   A.E.H.

incense, significance of: A sacramental used in religious services; it is the granulated resin of certain tropical and eastern trees. It is burned in a covered vessel, the censer*, and used at Solemn Masses, benediction, vespers, funerals, and other services. In the blessing of the paschal candle five grains of incense represent the five wounds* of Our Risen Lord. The aromatic fragrance of burning incense signifies virtue; zeal is symbolized by the burning. The rising smoke is significant of prayer ascending to heaven.

Cf. The Catholic Encyclopedia, vol viii, p. 716; The New Catholic Dictionary, p. 475.   S.C.

incubi and succubi: Incubi, male demons* who copulated with women, and Succubi, female demons who had sexual intercourse with men, produced devil children according to mediaeval lore. Demon copulation was accomplished by three methods: 1) by a corpse activated by a demon, 2) by means of stolen semen, and 3) by diabolic illusion.

See Demoniality, or, Incubi and Succubi, (17th Century), Sinistrari, translated by the Rev. M. Summers (London, 1927).   D.F.E.—J.T.M.

indefectibility: The quality of being exempt from liability to failure, decay, or imperfection. In theology it is used to describe the divine holiness, the divine grace, the Son, the heavenly state, and (in Roman Catholic literature) the Church.   F.G.E.

independency: (Cong polity) Originated by Robert Browne*. Browne taught that a church should consist of a company of true believers united by a public covenant with eachother and with God. Ecclesiastical authority consists only in Christ's supremacy over such local churches, their members interpreting the teachings of the Bible under the guidance of the Holy Spirit. Each church should choose its own officers, each member having equal rights with all the others. All churches are bound together only by the principle of mutual fellowship and cooperation. See Congregationalism, Separatists, Protestant.
W. Walker, A History of the Congregational Churches in the U. S. (1894); G. G. Atkins and F L Fagley, History of American Congregationalism (1942), Shaff-Herzog, Encyclopedia of Religious Knowledge (1908-1912) v. 2.   F.T.P.

Independent Baptist Church of America: A group of 8 Scandinavian Baptist churches, holding the common Baptist doctrines, but stressing "the laying on of hands," pacifism, and the second coming of Christ. They have about 130 members.   E.T.C.

Independent Puritans: See Puritanism.

indeterminism: See cause:

Index: See censorship of books.

India, missions to: Christianity came early to India. Tradition has it that the Apostle Thomas was the first to carry the gospel thither, but that cannot be proven. It is certain, however, that by the middle of the fourth century there was a Christian community in Malabar. They have been called Syrian Christians and are still there. The Nestorian* Christians seem quite certainly to have worked in India. John of Monte Corvino, pioneer Catholic missioner to China, spent some thirteen months in India on his way to China in 1292-93 and reported baptizing over a hundred Indians into the Christian faith.
The Portuguese explorer Vasco da Gama rounded the Cape of, Good Hope in 1498 and reached India. In 1500 a group of Portuguese monks were sent out for missionary service and soon had planted the Church in India. As early as 1543 Goa had been made a bishopric and by 1557 had been raised to an archbishopric. The great missionary Francis Xavier* was in India in 1542 for a time before continuing on to Japan. There were said to be as many as three hundred thousand Roman Catholic Christians as early as 1557. Today they number well over 3 million.
Protestant missions were carried on first by chaplains of the East Indian Trading Company but these were very few. The Danish government sent out two German missionaries in 1705, Bartholomew Ziegenbalg*, and Henry Pluetschau and later C. F. Schwartz, (1750). Pioneer British missionaries sent out by the churches were Wm. Carey*, Baptist, who did an enormous amount of translating the Bible into the native languages; and Alexander Duff, of the Established Church of Scotland who shaped the entire educational system of India.

American Protestant missions entered India in 1813, and have been very successful. Over half the entire Protestant Christian community is related to missions of American origin.
The entire Christian community of India numbers over 6,000,000, of which probably ninety per cent have come from the depressed classes. All types of missionary work are carried on, including educational, medical, industrial, as well as evangelistic.
In recent years with the rise of a capable and well trained leadership, the Indian churches are becoming more and more self-directing and self-propagating. There is a strong tendency toward union among the various denominational national groups, notably in South India and a somewhat less advanced movement represented in the United Church of North India. There is a National Christian Council which does much to promote a sense of solidarity among all Indian Christians and to coordinate their efforts to extend Christianity throughout the whole of India.
The Statistical Survey of the World Mission (International Missionary Council, N. Y. 1938) reveals a total of 1,042,416 communicants and 1,363,886 baptized non-communicants or a total of 2,406,302 baptized Protestant Christians, with an additional 260,697 persons under Christian instruction in India, (not including Burma). The national staff includes 2,440 ordained ministers, 9,854 unordained men and 5,129 women, a total of 17,323 native Indians engaged in Christian work. The foreign missionary staff numbered 5,112, of which 1,268 were ordained men, 372 not ordained men, 1,232 wives and 2,191 unmarried women and widows.
Protestant educational work is carried on in 13,274 elementary schools with 609,821 pupils; 302 high and middle schools with 67,229 students, and 158 special schools with 5,469 students. The national teaching staff is comprised of 21,996 men and 7,459 women. Their medical work is done in 283 hospitals with 18,283 beds and 525 dispensaries.
The Roman Catholic church at the same time reported 3,334,938 Catholics and 107,473 catechumens, 1,113 foreign priests, 2,583 native, 282 foreign brothers, 328 native; 1,842 foreign sisters, 5,762 native, 5,134 catechists and 9,365 other teachers. They report a total 328,624 students in 4,911 elementary schools; 116,854 in 782 secondary schools, and 2,623 in 46 seminaries. They have 43 hospitals and 264 dispensaries.
According to the Indian Census the reported Christian population, Protestant and Catholic in India in 1901 was 2,923,240; in 1911, 3,876,203; in 1921, 4,754,064 and in 1931, 6,297,000. The percentage of the total populations for the four decades was .99; 1.24, 1.51, and 1.79.
Julius Richter, A History of Missions in India (1908); Interpretative Statistical Survey of the World Mission of the Christian Church. Edited by Joseph E. Parker, International Missionary Council (1938).
C.S.B.

India, religions of: India has been a prolific mother of religions and at the same time hospitable to religions which have come to her from outside her own borders. Hinduism* is of course the majority religion, but Hinduism is a broad term and gathers within its ample folds types of religious faith and practise which differ almost as day and night. The greater sects are Vishnuism (Vaisnavism*) and Shivism (Saivism*), but there are many others of greater or lesser importance, all recognized as phases of Hinduism. Three faiths which began as reform movements within Hinduism have come to be considered world religions, although only one of these has extended itself beyond the confines of Mother India. These are

    1. Jainism* whose traditional founder was Mahavira* in the sixth century B.C.

    2. Buddhism*, founded by Gautama, the Buddha*, also in the 6th century B.C. Buddhism had almost disappeared from India by the year 1000 A.D. and is today found in considerable numbers only in the border states in the high Himalayas and in Burma which is hardly India proper.

    3. Sikhism*, founded by Nanak* in the latter part of the 15th century A.D. largely as a result of Moslem influence on India.

Two other reform movements which arose in the 19th century, largely as a result of Christian influence, are enumerated as separate from Hinduism in the Indian census. They are·

    1 The Arya Samaj*, founded by Dyananda Sarasvati in 1875.

    2. The Brahma Samaj*, founded by Ram Mohan Roy* in 1828.

Numerous other movements have arisen in the modern period which reflect in varying degree the impact of foreign cultures, especially Christianity, upon India. They are, however, not usually distinguished as other than modern forms of Hinduism.

In addition to all these the Indian census takes account of certain pocketed groups of aborigines which have not yet been assimilated to Hinduism. They figure in the census as tribal religions or "animists", though the term is but very loosely used.

Religions not native to India but at present found there in considerable strength are:

    1. Islam, (see Mohammedanism) which came into India about 1000 A D. and today claims approximately one-fifth of the total population. It has in the past played, and still plays, a highly significant role in the political life of India.

    2. Christianity which came to India very early—tradition says it was first brought by St Thomas one of the original twelve disciples of Jesus. Certainly the Syrian Christians of India have been there since the early Christian centuries. The earliest certain date is 343 A.D. The age of conquest and discovery in the 15th and 16th centuries brought Catholic Christianity to India in some strength, though the Catholic, John of Monte Corvino, had spent a year in India in the 13th century. Portuguese Catholics had made Goa a bishopric as early as 1543 and an archbishopric by 1557. The great Francis Xavier* visited the missions in India on his way to the farther East Protestant missions began in the 17th century and from near the end of the 18th century increased rapidly. See India, missions to.

    3. Zoroastrianism*—better known in India as the Parsi religion and its adherents as Parsis*. These followers of Zoroaster came to India in the 8th century A.D. seeking asylum from the invading Moslems. They constitute a small, closely-knit, self-contained community, concentrated chiefly in Western India, in and near Bombay.

Finally, there has been from very ancient times a small number of Jews in India, found mainly in the great cities.

The latest census of India gives the following enumeration of the adherents of each of the faiths mentioned.

Religion	Number, 1931	% of Pop.	Number, 1921	% of Pop.
Hindus	239,195,140	68 24	216,260,620	68 41
Moslems	77,677,545	22 16	68,735,233	21 74
Buddhists	12,786,806	3 6	11,571,268	36.6
(12,348,037 in Burma)
Jains	1,252,105	.36	1,178,596	.37
Sikhs	4,355,771	1.24	3,238,803	1 02
Zoroastrians (Parsis)	109,752	.03	101,778	.03
Christians	6,296,763	1.79	4,754,064	1.51
Jews	24,141	.01	21,778	.007
Tribal	8,280,347	2 36	9,774,611	3 09
Arya-Samaj	468,000	.15	467,578	.15
Brahma-Samaj	5,378		6,388	.002

    See Aryan religion, sacred literatures, temples, Indian

    J. B Pratt, India and Its Faiths (1915), N MacNicol, Living Religions of India (London, 1934). See also bibliographies under different religions.   c.s.b.

Indian temples: See temples, Indian.

indifferentism: 1) A doctrine of Stoic* origin that certain things such as health, wealth, beauty, good birth and their opposites are beyond our power and neither help nor hinder moral conduct. Hence they are things indifferent 2) In the medieval conflict between Realism and Nominalism the mediating doctrine of Adelard of Bath* (12th century) to the effect that whether individuals remain individuals or become for us the species depends on whether we attend to their differences or non-differences (indifferentia). Thus everything depends on the point of view. 3) In the philosophy of right confessional indifferentism is the view that the religious opinions of a citizen fall outside the jurisdiction of the state, his rights being independent of his adherence to this or that confession. 4) In theology the doctrine that some differences of religious belief are not significant.   r w.f.

indigitamenta: (Lat. indigitamenta, from indigito, to call upon or invoke a deity) In Roman religion, priestly books, dating from very early times or modelled after those of early times, which recorded the names of the manifold numina of everyday life, along with set forms of prayer for their worship, prayers which lost their efficacy if altered in any way.   r.m.n.

individual psychology: See psychology, schools of.

individualism: A movement of thought or that social policy which makes the desires, rights, initiative and well-being of individuals primary in religious, political, economic and social life. It holds that the measure of all institutions and social organization is their effects upon the interests, welfare and destiny of individuals. As a modern development it had its beginnings in the Renaissance and Reformation. It became a prominent, widespread attitude with appropriate doctrines in the 18th and 19th centuries. It owes much to the Christian teaching of the supreme worth of the individual and to the Reformation doctrine of the priesthood of all believers. As a political philosophy it holds that the state exists for the individual, should trust individual initiative as the mainspring of conduct and should interfere as little as possible with its exercise. In political economy it stresses free enterprise, individual initiative, the laissez faire system of competition and is opposed to socialism. In ethics it is the doctrine that all values, rights and duties originate in individuals, that the interests of the individual should determine the supreme rule of conduct, and that the good of the community consists of the sum of the goods of the individuals who compose it.   R.W.F.

individuation: A term indicating the philosophical problem about the grounds of numerical plurality within a class. The principle of individuation according to Saint Thomas Aquinas* (1225-6-1274) is matter, invested ("signata") with a certain extended quantity. For John Duns Scotus* (1270-1308) this principle, ultimately, is the individual substance itself. For Francis Suarez* (1548-1617) finiteness is the source of all multiplicity and individuality.   S.C.T.

Indra: The Vedic god of war, of storm and fertility. Over 250 or about one-fourth of the hymns of the Rig-Veda are addressed to him. He represented only the more benevolent aspects of the storm, the destructive aspects being referred to Rudra*, possibly in part the precursor of the great Shiva* of later Hinduism. See virgin birth.   C.S.B.

indulgence: The extra-sacramental remission by the Church of the temporal punishment due for sins whose guilt and eternal punishment have already been pardoned. According to Roman Catholic teaching sin involves guilt before God, eternal punishment at His hands, as well as temporal punishment (either on earth or in purgatory). The sacrament of Penance* removes the first two; the third can be commuted by indulgences. A full remission is called plenary and can be granted by the Pope alone. Partial remission—for a given period of time,—may be granted by a bishop or one authorized by him. The condition of their granting is contrition* and usually the performance of optional works of merit,—prayers, almsdeeds, visits to a church, etc.

It was the abuse of indulgences in the late medieval period which called forth Luther's* protest and inaugurated the Protestant Reformation*. While, strictly speaking, indulgences apply only to temporal punishment for sin, there was a widespread belief among common people unaware of the finer theological distinctions that indulgences removed guilt as well as punishment. Further, this remission could be obtained at that time for the payment of money, which, as Luther said, put a grievous instrument in the hand of avarice. In his famous Theses Luther contended, among other things, that the Church can only remit the ecclesiastical penalties it has imposed, it can remit neither guilt nor divine punishment, which are in the hands of God alone. See pardon, Theses, Ninety-Five, of Luther.

See the articles on "Indulgences" in The Catholic Encyclopedia, The Encyclopedia Britannica, Hastings' Encyclopedia of Religion and Ethics, and T M. Lindsay, A History of the Reformation (reprint, 1922), I, 213 ff.   F.G E.

indult: A faculty or favor which the legislator benevolently grants for a time, either outside the law or contrary to it. It differs from a privilege in that it is not necessarily perpetual. See Catholic Societies.   J.C.M.

infallibility: Broadly, exemption from error; the doctrine that an individual, institution, system of doctrine, or body of literature is inerrant.

Infallibility at the present time is most commonly associated with the claims of the Roman Catholic Church, and more especially the Pope* as its head, to be immune from error through divine assistance when enunciating a decision on questions of faith and morals. The Roman doctrine rests on a three-fold base· 1) God cannot err, any decree or utterance of His must be infallible, 2) God entrusted the keeping and teaching of his infallible truth to the Church (cf. Mt. 28.18-20, 16 18, Jn. 14, 15, 16, I Tim. 3:14-15, Acts 15 28 ff.); 3) since, however, such a prerogative left indiscriminately with the Church as a whole can have little practical benefit when decisions affecting the purity of the faith are to be made, a supreme and infallible authority must be exercised. This authority was lodged unequivocally with the Pope by the decree of the Vatican Council*, July 18, 1870. It affirmed, that when the Bishop of Rome, touching questions of faith or morals, speaks ex cathedra—in his office as spiritual head of the universal Church with the intent to define a doctrine and bind all Christians —his decrees are divinely guaranteed against error and final. See Pius IX.

The Protestant Reformers held to the infallibility of the divine Word (1 above), but denied it had been entrusted to the Church (2). They contended that it is contained, or is present, in the Scripture and is to be apprehended by the faith of the believer. In time this doctrine was extended to mean that every letter of the Biblical text is inerrant. Thus, an infallible Book replaced an infallible Church. In recent Protestantism the idea of an infallible authority has tended to disappear. See Confessions, Formal of the Christian Church; Döllinger.

See the articles on "Infallibility" in The Catholic Encyclopedia, The Encyclopedia Britannica, and Hastings' Encyclopedia of Religion and Ethics.   F.G.E.

infamy: Public disgrace or loss of good name because of notorious moral delinquency or conviction for certain crimes. May disqualify one for certain legal functions or social positions.

R.W.F.

infant salvation: The doctrine that infants will be saved in the life to come, whether baptized or not. This view arose in Protestantism in reaction to the Augustinian view that unbaptized infants cannot be saved, though their place of abode—the limbus infantum—was not usually conceived as one of torture. Zwingli first denied the necessity of baptism for salvation. Calvin held to the salvation of elect infants. But the Arminians and most modern evangelicals include all infants among the elect.   F.G.E. infanticide: The practice of putting new-born infants to death or allowing them to die. The practice was usually conditioned by superstition.

R.W.F.

infidelity: Unfaithfulness to the marriage* vows. With but few exceptions, sexual intercourse with another person other than the marriage partner is looked upon with condemnation in occidental countries at the present time. Thus all European countries and every state in the United States recognize infidelity as a cause for divorce* except South Carolina where divorce cannot be obtained except by legislative action. The terms, adultery and infidelity, are often used interchangeably and have the same meaning with reference to the marriage relationship.

Historical, primitive, and Oriental peoples, however, have not always regarded infidelity with the same distaste as that generally found in Euro-American cultures, particularly as regards the infidelity of the husband. In the Greek states adultery upon the part of the husband was not sufficient cause for divorce. The same was true among the Hebrews and still prevails today in some of the Latin-American countries. In fact until very recent times, sexual intercourse outside marriage upon the part of the husband was fairly generally condoned throughout occidental civilization.

While in most occidental cultures at the present time, infidelity upon the part of either party is recognized as a cause for divorce there still survives much of the old differential attitudes which characterized the past. Thus in contemporary United States, infidelity of the wife is generally regarded as more serious than that of the husband. This differential in attitudes is part of the double standard of morals which has long prevailed, although there are indications of its decline of recent years. Nevertheless, in divorce actions, where the wife has been found guilty of infidelity, her loss of status is greater than that which her husband would experience were he adjudged guilty of the same offense. The consequence is that infidelity or adultery has never been a particularly popular charge in divorce suits in those states in which other grounds are available.

Arthur W. Calhoun, A Social History of the American Family, (Cleveland, 1917-19); Willystine Goodsell, A History of the Family as a Social and Educational Institution (1927), Ernest R. Mowrer, Family Disorganization (rev ed., 1939).   E.R.M.

infinite: (Lat. infinitus, not bounded) In mathematics, a multitude so far as capable of one-to-one-correspondence ("equality") with some of its parts. An infinite number is not a member of the series, 1, 2, 3, etc., but is at least equal to the entire series itself. It may be greater, according to most mathematicians, who accept the theory of a hierarchy of infinites. However, it has been contended (by Felix Kaufmann) that the "higher infinites" are not legitimate conceptions; and "finitist" philosophers of mathematics maintain that mathematics has no need of infinity except in the sense of an unlimited possibility of addition. Thus infinity would not be a number, but merely the law that any number can be exceeded by other numbers.

It has been contended by many (e.g., Renouvier*, Parker) that an actually infinite plurality is impossible, that the concept is contradictory. It must be a whole some of whose parts are equal to it, although to be a part is by definition to be less than the whole. Again, the infinite must be an endless or never-completed series which nonetheless is complete. However, it can be argued that the contradictions are only apparent. The part is "equal" to the whole only in a technical sense, "one-to-one-correspondence", and the definition of part need not deny equality in this sense. The whole must by definition be the part and something else besides; this is true even of infinite wholes. The-odd-numbers-and-the-even-numbers are capable of one to one correspondence with the odd numbers alone; but they are nonetheless the odd numbers and other things besides. Again, one need not and mathematicians do not define an infinite series as one which cannot be completed, if by that is meant one whose members are not all there, or not all actual.

There is, however, at least one application of the idea of an actual infinite which leads to contradictions, the famous contradictions embodied in Zeno's paradoxes. It cannot be that a finite stretch of time contains an infinity of actual parts. If the parts have no temporal or spatial length, their sum can have none; if they have length, their sum will have infinite not finite length. Besides, it would be impossible to reach one part from another. A series which has not been entered and which cannot be begun, since it has no first member, cannot be entered and hence cannot be completed. Now the series: one minute past five, preceded by $\frac{1}{2}$ minute past five, preceded by $\frac{1}{4}$ minute past five, and so on, is a series which, at five o'clock, has not been entered, has no first member with which to begin, and which hence cannot be begun, and a fortiori cannot be completed. The solution of this difficulty is given by the "epochal theory of time" (Whitehead*), according to which the "and so on" above is subject to a limit beyond which time is not actually divided into real units or events. One may mathematically conceive divisions of time beyond the limit, but they represent only things which might happen, not things which in a given case do happen. In other words there is a least portion of time in which, after a given moment, anything actually happens. This is a generalization of the "specious present" of human consciousness described by James*. It implies that after five o'clock there is a first real division of time, 1/nth minute past five, with which one may begin in passing from five to a minute past five. Spatial subdivision is treated in the same way. The theory rests upon the recognition that potentiality is a real mode of being (see Time), that to be infinitely divisible is not the same as to be infinitely divided, and yet is something quite real.

The most plausible application of the idea of an actuality numerically infinite is that to the series of all past events. Here there is no problem of entering or beginning the series; for at no time was anyone or anything outside "all events" waiting to get into it. Kant's* attempt to prove a contradiction here presupposed that infinite must be defined as endless, a supposition which is mathematically untrue. The most one can say is that it is difficult to see how the idea of the infinite past can have any basis in direct experience or intuition. We cannot distinctly intuit or imagine each member of an infinite series. But perhaps we can indistinctly intuit the infinity of the past, for when we attempt to conceive the past as finite we seem to collide with the intuitive content of the idea of time, suggesting that we may not be utterly without the intuition of infinity. After all, very little of our awareness is wholly distinct.

In philosophy and theology, the term is often used in a non-quantitative sense, meaning absence of limitations or deficiencies, in some given, or in all, respects. Total absence of limitations, infinity in all respects, is a common conception or pseudo-conception of God. Its meaningfulness or consistency is doubtful. Its object must be that which lacks no positive being or value that could be present anywhere. But the question is whether what "lacks nothing in particular" could possess anything in particular. "Determination is negation", but indetermination is also negation, so how can a purely positive being be other than nonsense? To be this is not to be that, possibilities are often incompatible. From the realm of pure potentiality no one thing is missing more than another, because everything determinate and actual is missing, and what is there is precisely the impartially deficient mode of existence, potentiality. The doctrine that the deficiency can be, and in God is, impartially and exhaustively remedied has never been shown consistent with what we know of the meaning of potential and actual. Besides, there is the dilemma: either the finite, including man, makes no difference to the infinite being, and man's efforts are worthless, or the finite, in making differences to the infinite, somehow limits it (although perhaps not in all respects or aspects—see Transcendence). In other terms, if the impartial deficiency of pure potentiality is impartially and exhaustively overcome in God it is inconceivable why there should also be the partial and non-exhaustive realization of potencies in the creation. The wholly unlimited-and-the-limited cannot be more than the wholly unlimited by itself, or in any intelligible way distinguished from it. Nor is the problem solved by saying that the true infinite is what is limited only by itself. For it is by the creatures that God must in some fashion be limited, and in any case self-limitation is still in some sense limitation   The conclusion seems to be that the denial of limits requires itself to be limited, if it is to be consistent. See omnipotence, perfect; transcendence. D. H. Parker, Experience and Substance (1941).   C.H.

infralapsarianism: (infra, after, lapsus, fall) The doctrine which holds that God's decrees of reprobation and election came after the Fall of man, and were in order to redeem the purpose of creation. Held by Arminius and the more humanistic of the Dutch Calvinists. Defeated at the Synod of Dort*. Cf. supralapsarianism. E.P.B.

infusio gratiae: See infusion of grace.

infusion of grace: The Roman Catholic Church teaches that when grace, which is understood to be a divine habitus (a supernatural essence) is administered through the sacrament, it is "infused" in the human heart, thus restoring the gift of grace which God in creation had superadded to human nature but which through Adam's fall has been lost to all mankind. The Scriptural authority for this teaching is Rom. 5:5.   W.P.

Ingersoll Lectureship: A lectureship at Harvard University established by the will of Miss Caroline Haskell Ingersoll in honor of her father, George Goldthwait Ingersoll providing for the annual delivery of a lecture at Harvard on "the Immortality of Man." The choice of the lecturer "is not to be limited to any one religious denomination, nor to any one profession, but may be that of either clergyman or layman." The first lecture was delivered in 1896 by George A. Gordon. Other distinguished lecturers on the foundation have included Wm. James, Josiah Royce, G. Lowes Dickinson, George H. Palmer, George Foot Moore, Kirsopp Lake, E. S. Brightman, Harry Emerson Fosdick. Until 1934 the lectures were printed separately in book form. Since then they have for the most part been published in the Harvard Divinity School Bulletin. A thorough analysis and criticism of the lectures up to 1935 is offered in "Premises of the Arguments Concerning Immortality in Thirty Ingersoll Lectures", an unpublished dissertation by L. Harold De Wolf, now in the Boston University Library. The Ingersoll Lecturer for 1941 was Alfred North Whitehead.   J.S.B.

inheritance, social, group: See culture.

inhibition: 1) In psychology the checking or blocking of one neural or psychical process by another, usually explained as due to the conflict of competing or incompatible impulses, desires, habits or interests. It is a fundamental conception in psychology and a factor of great importance in the formation of habits and the integration of personality 2) In ecclesiastical law it is a censure in the form of an official command to a clergyman or priest not to perform the functions of his office. R.W.F.

initiation rites: In early and simple cultures initiation is a maturity rite, introducing adolescent youth to adult responsibilities and privileges. Where the religious group does not include the whole society it is a ceremony admitting young people and adults to the benefits of religion, and by extension, the qualifying of selected persons for the official duties of the cult.

In its universal early use the rite marked the transition from childhood to maturity. When the infant was born, a public ritual of baptism* and naming recognised him as a member of the group with the right to enfoldment in tribal care. Initiation lifted him from this irresponsible status as a child and made him a fully qualified adult with social responsibilities as a brearer of the tribal heritage, a sharer in the duties of food-getting, family life, perpetuation of the ceremonies, maintaining of group loyalties and mores, and defense of his people in war. It was a second birth into a larger life.

The ceremonies of simple cultures usually emphasize the break with the past, test the physical and moral qualities of the initiate and, by emotional experiences, bind him in loyalty to the social structure of the tribe, its sacred traditions and its secret lore. Various means are used to mark the separation from the old way of life—relaxation of behavior restrictions, change of clothing, cutting the hair, a last meal on the mother's lap, bathing, baptism, sprinkling with water or some other fluid with cleansing power, separation from the women, a period of seclusion, the giving of a new name Girls usually enter adult status by marriage marked by tatooing, or a new kind of dress or a new mode of wearing the hair. The testing of youth is often severe. It is intended to demonstrate courage in frightening situations and ability to endure pain without flinching. It serves also to impress upon the young people the superior status and authority of the older men. Scars and mutilations became signs of the initiated. The most important part of the ceremony is the instruction. In the early world the transmission from generation to generation of the law, the ceremonial techniques, the sacred literature and theology could only be done orally. In initiation the new generation viewed for the first time the sacred cult objects, received basic teaching in tribal wisdom, acquired a sense of unity with the ancestral past and was pledged to loyal support of the existing order. The total effect of the rite was to weld a chain of cultural continuity through the centuries.

In Hinduism* initiation was early associated with the beginning of education in the religious heritage. The rite removed the child from the śudra class with no Aryan privileges, gave him his second birth by investment with the sacred thread and handed him over to a teacher for twelve years of study in one of the sacred books. In the modern age of printed books the educational stress has fallen away and the ceremony becomes again simply a recognition of twice-born status. In Buddhism*, initiation is in two stages, the introduction of the novice to preliminary training, and the more elaborate ceremony of admission to the order of monks. The first initiation in Zoroastrianism* is a continuation of the ancient Aryan* rite. The child is bathed, puts on the sacred shirt and the sacred girdle, recites scripture texts and a summary confession of faith. The rite marks the beginning of education. The later priestly initiation is restricted to the families of priests and requires prolonged preparation and training. Initiation into the mystery religions of the old Mediterranean world involved a baptism for purification or forgiveness of sins and a viewing of the sacred symbols of the divine mythology. The intitiates were then eligible for participation in the communion meal which gave assurance of immortality. The bar-mitzvah* in Judaism and confirmation* or adult baptism in Christianity admitting to membership in the church retain some of the qualities of the early rites of initiation. See sacred literatures. A.E.H.

inner light: See Society of Friends.

inner mission: (German, Innere Mission) A movement in the evangelical church of Germany organized at the beginning of the 19th century to serve the neglected and unfortunate members of society. Deaconess* work, Sunday Schools, prison reform, orphanages, came from this movement. A large number of lay men and women as well as ministers have taken part in this work, aiding discharged prisoners and prostitutes, giving aid and protection to working girls, relieving the hardships of sailors, and caring for any in need. See Löhe, W. P.E.J.

innocence: The quality of stainless purity or freedom from sin, guilt or taint of evil, a condition which belonged to man before the fall according to Christian theology. It may refer to that childlikeness of spirit which Jesus required of members of His Kingdom and which Tertullian claimed was the characteristic grace of Christians, a childlikeness marked by the guilelessness, simplicity, gentleness, and humility begotten of confirmed, single-minded devotion to God. The term is also applied to children before the age of moral accountability. R.W.F.

Innocent III: Lotharing Conti was born in 1160. His family on both sides were of the high Roman nobility. After finishing his early studies in Rome, he went to the University of Paris for his philosophy and theology, then to Bologna to study canon law. On completing his studies he returned to Rome and fulfilled several administrative positions at the papal court. He was made a cardinal deacon in 1190, and was elected Pope January 8, 1198,—the very day that his predecessor Celestine III died. Lothario took the name of Innocent on his elevation.

During his reign (Jan. 1198-July 1216) the papal theocracy reached its greatest development thanks to his great diplomatic skill and statesmanship. Basing his policy on canon law, the acts of his predecessors, and the ideas of his time, Innocent carried it to its logical conclusion. As vicar of Jesus Christ on earth he claimed and exercised an absolute and universal authority over the Church. Most political acts being moral acts, Innocent III, as guardian of the moral law, claimed and exercised the right to intervene in the most important political issues of his time. Thus he became political master of Italy, helped depose kings in Germany and England, and received as papal fiefs the kingdom of England, Portugal, Denmark, Aragon, etc. His policy was leading to a union of all the European states in one Christian commonwealth under papal leadership. The rise of nationalism was the principal reason for its failure to materialize. See Langton, Stephen.

J. Clayton, Innocent III (1941)   J.A.C.

Innocent X, Pope: (1644-55) Giambattista Pamfili was born at Rome, May 6, 1574 and rose rapidly in Vatican diplomatic circles. In 1601 he became Consistorial Adviser; in 1604, Auditor of the Rota; in 1621 Nuncio (cf. "Papal Legates") to Naples, and later, Assistant to Cardinal Francesco Barberini, the Elder, in the papal legation to France and Spain. Appointed Titular Patriarch of Antioch, he was named Papal Nuncio to Madrid, 1621 and created Cardinal in petto (i.e., not published) Aug. 30, 1629. He took part in the deliberations of the Council of Trent*. Elected Pope on Sept. 15, 1644 as a compromise candidate of the French and Spanish factions, he favored rather the latter in their respective controversies. As pope, he assisted Venice in her struggles against the Turks. In his famous Bull, Zelo domus Dei, of Nov. 26, 1648 he approved of his Legate's, Fabio Chigi (later Pope Alexander VII rejection of those articles of the Westphalian Treaty (1648)* which involved the justification of usurpation and retention of usurped Catholic Church properties. On May 31, 1653 he condemned five propositions taken from the "Augustinus" of Jansenius, thus precipitating the later long-drawn out Jansenistic* controversies in France and Belgium. Like Pope Urban VIII, he declined to recognize King John IV Braganza of Portugal, when the latter country, following the insurrection of 1640, seceded from Spain. Accordingly, the pope contested John's usurped right of nominating bishops in the kingdom. It thus happened that towards the end of Innocent's pontificate there was only one legitimate bishop in all Portugal.

Cf. L. Pastor, History of the Popes, Vol. XXX (1940) where all the important sources will be found quoted; Ciampi, Innocenzo X Pamfili e la sua corte (Imola, 1878); Palatius, Gesta Pontif. Roman. IV (Venice, 1688), 571-94   R M H.

Innocents Day: A feast celebrated in honor of the male children slaughtered by order of Herod, who wished to kill the new-born Christ. These children died instead of Christ and are considered the first martyrs of the Church. In the Latin church the feast is kept on December 28. In the Greek church on December 29. It dates back to the fifth century.   C.R.

Inquisition, The: The Inquisition, as a medieval ecclesiastical tribunal for the preservation of the Faith, and as distinct from similar imperial or royal decrees and courts to combat heresy, was instituted by Gregory IX (1227-41). It had essentially a three-fold purpose· 1) to inquire (inquirere. hence, Inquisition) into the spread of doctrines opposed to the Faith (heresies), 2) to call before its tribunals all Catholics suspected of heresy, and 3) to punish their infidelity, to convince them of error and to exhort them to repentance. To the medieval Christian the preservation of orthodoxy was self-evident and paramount. As conceived by the popes, the Inquisition was not an institution to force upon Jews, Saracens (Mohammedans) or Non-Catholics in general the tenets of Catholic doctrine. It was intended solely for the salvation, coercion and punishment of her own children. The use of torture, while rather abhorrent to present-day mentality, was used only once on any given accused, furthermore, it was not distinctive of the Inquisition, but common to Roman and to all imperial or royal medieval tribunals of justice. In fact, religious intolerance, based albeit on sincere and deep-rooted convictions, was practiced also by certain XVI century Protestant reformers (cf. articles on Calvin, Servetus, Bullinger, Penal Laws) and by the American colonists. Instituted in the beginning to counteract the heresies of the Albigensians, the Waldensians and the Cathari, the Inquisition was revived in the XVI century to safe-guard the faith of Catholics, especially in Italy, Spain and her dependencies. Sixtus IV objected to the harshness of the Spanish State Inquisition and Clement VIII published rules for humane treatment in all ecclesiastical tribunals. The Catholic Church refuses to be held responsible for excesses of the "secular arm". The Inquisitors—Local and General—were usually, although not exclusively, selected from among the members of the Franciscan and Dominican Orders, preferably the latter. Cf. Office, Sacred Congregation of the Holy.

Literature: An impartial complete history of the Inquisition still remains to be written. The standard English work on the I. by H. C. Lea, A History of the Inquisition in the Middle Ages (1887) 3 vols. is anti-Catholic. (cf Cath. Encyc. VIII 38); a Catholic work is by J. Guiraud, L'Inquisition Médiévale (Paris, 3d, 1928). Other studies· Langlois, L'Inquisition d'après les travaux récents (Paris, 1902); Vacandard, L'Inquisition. Etude historique et critique sur le pouvoir coercitif de l'Eglise (Paris, 1907); Douais, L'Inquisition. Ses origines. Sa procédure insanity: A broad term for mental disorder which unfits one to live a normal life. Strictly speaking it is a social and legal term for mental disease which disqualifies one for legal responsibility and civil duties and which requires institutional supervision for the patient. In general it means any form of dementia, i.e., deterioration or derangement of normal mental processes, and is distinguished from amentia, i.e., idiocy, imbecility, and feeblemindedness, which is due to inherent brain deficiency. Insanity may be organic (physiological) or functional (psychogenic) in origin. With the notable increase of insanity under our complex civilization the environmental social situation is more and more recognized as a contributory factor. Formerly insanity was regarded as due to demonic possession or a criminal nature and treated accordingly. Today it is recognized as mental disease and its scientific study and treatment is a social obligation assumed by the state. R.W.F.

(Paris, 1906) ; William T. Walsh, Characters of the Inquisition (1941). R.M.H.

inspiration: In religion as in art it is very generally believed that human actions of extraordinary insight, worth or power are due to inspiration, that is, to inflow of psychic force comparable to life-giving breath. The religious idea of inspiration is inseparably connected with the thought of personal divine power and of human dependence upon it. An antonym of inspiration is the term "religious genius" which represents the idea that extraordinary work is the product of the extraordinary man, acting more or less independently of God. The idea of inspiration in Christian theology may be traced, apart from its connection with such manifestations as those indicated in Acts 2 and in later church history, to Hebrew prophecy and to Greek philosophy. Plato's (e.g., in Phaedrus and Timaeus) and Philo's remarks on divination* have been used especially in the development of the more extreme theories of inspiration.

The most important theological problems of inspiration concern the subjects, the sources, the means and the criteria of true inspiration as distinguished from false, rather than the actuality of inspiration itself. The question of the proper subject of inspiration—whether a person, a community or a book may properly be said to be inspired—has been greatly confused in history by being involved in the problem of church authority. Thus the doctrine of the inspiration of Scriptures was largely developed to secure the church against the inroads of sectarianism with the latter's claims to the inspiration of special leaders or of individual members (e g., Montanism, Anabaptism, the Society of Friends). The doctrine that ecumenical councils or popes are inspired when speaking on matters of faith and morals has been developed partly in conflict with sectarianism, partly in opposition to the rigid, Scriptural "constitutionalism" of Protestantism. This confusion between the ideas of inspiration and of authority has led to the strange result that the great churches tend to regard Scriptures or these and the official pronouncements of the church as alone inspired while the more objective theology in these churches tends to agree that only a person or a community of persons may properly be said to be the subject of inspiration.

The problem of the source of inspiration was raised in Hebrew thought by the appearance of false prophecy, and by the consequent question for monotheism in what sense such inspiration came from God. In Christian theology the questions were to what extent the inspiring principle in the Godhead was distinct from the creating and redeeming principle, in what sense it proceeded from one or both of these.

The question about the means of inspiration has been dealt with indirectly and in confusion with the question of subject and criteria. The orthodox Protestant and Catholic churches have emphasized the importance of Scriptures, of church discipline and instruction as the ordinary means through which inspiration comes. Mystic and sectarian groups have shown a larger interest in other means—asceticism, the practice of silence, etc. In the Protestant doctrine of the "testimony of the Holy Spirit*'" which must accompany the reading of the word if there is to be true inspiration and in Roman as well as Eastern Catholic acceptance of monasticism* the great churches have made some approach to the interests of the sects and mysticism*.

Among the criteria employed by religious thought to distinguish true from false inspiration the most important are: 1) the consistency of the product of inspiration not only in itself but also and primarily with accepted norms, i e., with the moral laws, the "spirit of Jesus Christ," the Scriptures, the common understanding of the community (cf. I Cor. 12-14); 2) the truth of prediction (Dt. 18·22); this test, which has an analogy in modern science, has been used apologetically rather than critically, to validate the inspiration of Scriptures, as in the argument from prophecy*; 3) disinterestedness, that is the extent to which personal interests and opinions are absent or negated in the "inspired" utterance; in the extreme form, as represented by Philo, the idea is that the self retires wholly under true inspiration (On Special Laws, par. 65), but in Biblical thought the test was used less psychologically, more ethically (cf. Jer. 23, Ezekiel 13). 4) Intelligibility might be added as a fourth criterion of the validity of inspiration though not a test of its truth, since the unintelligible cannot be said to be true or false. See Bible; sacred literatures.

B. H. Streeter, ed., The Spirit (London, 1919); F. W. Camfield, Revelation and the Holy Spirit (London, 1933); W. Sanday, Inspiration (London, 1901); G. Hoelscher, Die Profeten (Leipzig, 1940); A. Guillaume, Prophecy and Divination (London, 1938). H.R.N.

installation: a) The ceremony by which a Canon* is invested with his office as one of the governing clergy of a Cathedral or Collegiate Church (R.C. or Anglican) by being formally put in possession of his official seat, or stall.

E.R.H.

b) The ceremony of induction in non-episcopal churches of a minister into his new pastorate.

V.F.

instinct: An inborn tendency or drive to act in a more or less definite way in response to special situations for the fulfilment of the vital needs of the organism. It usually has emotional concomitants, is more complex and less stereotyped than a reflex and while analogous to a habit it is not dependent upon previous learning or experience. Clear-cut cases are found among the insects. The question of the classification and even the existence of human instincts is in dispute. That there are important hereditary factors in human behavior is not doubted but that man has any such innate equipment of instinct-patterns as the lower animals possess is seriously questioned. The tendency among psychologists and especially sociologists is to be severely critical of the doctrine of human instincts. On the whole it has proved more enlightening to explain the complex behavior patterns of man in terms of an acquired organization of impulses which is the product of custom, habit and intelligence rather than in terms of congenital instincts. There is general agreement, however, that man has no specific moral or religious instincts. See psychology of religion, for list of instincts. R.W.F.

Institute for Religious Studies, The: The Institute for Religious Studies was established at the Jewish Theological Seminary of America to enable graduate ministers of various denominations to study the relationship between different faiths and the common religious background of the democratic tradition.

The Institute was established in 1939 by a grant from the Lucius N. Littauer Foundation. In 1942, the scope of the Institute was expanded to include study of the problems of religion and the world order, and group relations and group antagonisms. In 1943, the Board of Regents in the State of New York authorized the Seminary to confer upon graduates of the Institute the degrees of Master and Doctor of Comparative Religion, and Master and Doctor of Theology.

Among those who conducted courses at the Institute for Religious Studies during the academic year 1942-43 are. Professor F. Ernest Johnson, Professor Robert M. MacIver, Professor Hunter Guthrie, S. J., Professor William F. Albright, Professor George F. Thomas, and Doctor Ben Zion Bokser. L.F.

institutional church, the: An institutional church, at the time the name became current, was a church which had added to its traditional services of worship and pastoral oversight, a program of social activities carried on through the week. The name took its place in church literature with the organization of 'The Open and Institutional Church League", in 1894, an association of independent churches the manifesto of which announced their purpose to abolish "so far as possible distinctions between the religious and secular," and emphasized their lack of credal tests.

The League had but a short life and by no means included all institutional churches. Churches of practically all the greater denominations became "institutional" in equipment and practice, some such as the Wesleyan Missions in English cities developing social and cultural activities, without taking the name. The most notable of these was the West End Mission, London.

The institutional church's program for the most part was the result of shifts in population by which it found itself surrounded by transient, underprivileged and foreign born groups, where had been its stable and well-to-do constituency. The program sought to provide a social and cultural life for such underprivileged groups, for young people at work in the city and away from their own homes, for those whom the necessities of a livelihood prevented from attending the established schools, and for foreign born and others desiring adult education, particularly in language and domestic science. Included in the customary activities of the institutional church were kindergartens, clubs for young men and women, study classes, manual training for boys and girls, athletics, supervised games, nurseries, etc.

The name has now fallen into disuse, for which perhaps several causes can be assigned: The social program of the public schools, the Y.M.C.A. and the Y.W.C.A.  and the multiplication of social settlements, and the fact that many if not most Protestant churches maintain to some extent similar social and cultural activities. The most noted Institutional Church at the beginning of the century was St. George's, New York City, under the leadership of the Reverend Dr. William R. Rainsford. Others were the Ruggles Street Baptist Church, Boston, the Baptist Temple, Philadelphia, during the pastorate of Russell H. Conwell, the Plymouth Congregational Church, Indianapolis. Perhaps the best known today is the Morgan Memorial, Boston, from which developed, under the leadership of the Reverend Dr. E. E. Helms, the Goodwill Industries of America. See social work of the churches.

G. Hodges and J. Reichert, The Administration of an Institutional Church (1906); H. P. Douglass, Protestant Cooperation in American Cities, pub. by the Institute of Social and Religious Research (1930); H. P. Douglass and E. de S. Brunner, The Protestant Church as a Social Institution (1935); Leiffer, City and Church in Transition (1938).

J.M.M.G.

institutions: See culture.

intelligence tests: See clinical psychology.

intemperance: Immoderate indulgence of any appetite; in the United States it refers particularly to the excessive use of intoxicants. See temperance movements. R.W.F.

intention, sacramental: In Roman Catholic sacramental doctrine, 1) the positive will, required in an adult, to receive a sacrament, and 2) the positive will of the minister in performing the visible rite "at least to do what the Church does" (Council of Trent, sess. 7, can. 11). The necessity of this latter intention for the validity of a sacrament is implicit in the doctrine that the sacraments were instituted by Christ as practical signs, whose sanctifying effect derives under given conditions from the position of the rite itself in the objective sacramental significance imparted to it by Christ (see opus operatum). In its sheerly material entity as a complex of words and actions the visible rite might signify a number of things, the minister, therefore, must determine it to its objective sacramental significance by willing to perform it formally as the rite which Christ instituted. To this end the minimum required is that he will to do what the Church does—the formula classic since William of Auxerre* (d. 1231)—or what the Gospel of Christ enjoins, what true Christians intend, or equivalent formulas. Given this sacramental intention, and the correct performance of the rite prescribed, the validity of the sacrament is not affected by the minister's own faith or probity, or lack of them; for, since only God through Christ sanctifies, the human agent of the sacraments acts in an essentially vicarious capacity (different from that of the minister of the word), and his instrumental alliance with the uniquely sanctifying power of Christ is accomplished by his intention, not by his faith or probity. This principle, implicit in the traditional practice of the Church (see Stephen I, Cyprian), was clarified notably by Augustine against the Donatists. The necessity of this sacramental intention (not controverted in the early disputes on rebaptism) was denied by the Reformers (Calvin, Acta syn. trid. cum antid., Corpus Reform., XXXV, 946 ff.), in the inner logic of their system it was not necessary, since the visible rite itself, even though performed in jest by the minister, could still arouse the faith of the recipient, from which alone its efficacy derived. The question of the sacramental intention is important in connection with Anglican orders.   J.C.M.

intercession: Theologically, a form of the prayer of petition: entreaty made to God for others. Examples are recorded in the O.T. (Ex. 32 11 ff.); the N.T. frequently records the intercessory prayer of Christ (Matt. 19.13; John 17.9-26; Luke 22:31, etc.), who enjoined it (Matt. 5 44; 6:7-13). The practice was familiar in the early Church (Acts 12·5), and is prominent in St. Paul (Rom. 15.30, I Tim. 2 1-2; etc.), who bases it on the doctrine of the Body of Christ. Its object is represented as the grace of salvation, together with favors of the temporal order inasmuch as they are related to it. In the second century the intercession of the martyrs*, while still living (through the libellum pacis) and after death, was acknowledged (cf. H. Delehaye, Sanctus, 1927). Thereafter all the Fathers attest the place in the Christian life of prayer held by belief in the intercession of the angels and saints in heaven. Vigilantius attacked the belief (or perhaps only its practical exaggerations), and was vehemently refuted by Jerome*. Simpler folk of unenlightened piety have, in fact, not always observed the proper bounds. But the belief itself has always supported an essential part of the popular and liturgical piety of the Roman Catholic Church, it is related to faith in the Communion of Saints*, the real solidarity and active, unbroken fellowship, through a share in the one Spirit of Christ, of the members of the Church in her different states, militant, suffering, and triumphant. The "Great Intercession" is a distinctive feature of all Oriental liturgies. The Protestant tradition admits in theory the intercession of Christians on earth for one another, but rejects all intercessory prayer in heaven, and correspondingly all invocation of the saints. Calvin was particularly emphatic on the point. The rejection is logically consistent with the Protestant concept of Christian unity. In the Communion Service of the first Book of Common Prayer (1549) the "Intercession" was retained, following the corresponding parts of the Roman canon (Te igitur, Memento, Communicantes), but all reference to the merits and intercessions of the saints was omitted. The revision of 1552 more radically omitted even the commemoration of the saints, and the prayer for the dead*; and it explicitly restricted the "Prayer for the Church" to the Church "militant here on earth" (words omitted in the American revision of 1928). In 1661 a short mention of the "departed" was added, in the form of a simple commemoration, which involves no idea of intercession, either for them or by them. Similarly, the collects never appeal to the intercession of the saints.

       J.C.M.

Interchurch World Movement of North America: An interdenominational organization formed at the close of World War I, and comprising 59 societies representing the home and foreign missionary interests of the leading denominations, especially those active in the "Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America."* Its purpose was to perpetuate in the promotion of religious projects the increased interest in social and international problems and in interdenominational cooperation which the churches had experienced during the war. The first meeting was called by the Southern Presbyterian Church in New York, and formal organization was effected on December 17, 1918, under the chairmanship of John R. Mott, whose slogan, "the evangelization of the world in this generation," had captured the imagination of religious leaders a decade earlier. At a conference at Cleveland on April 30, 1919, the preliminary stages of organization were completed, and a program of action finally launched which included 1) a general survey of foreign and domestic missionary needs, 2) the formulation of a world-wide program adequate to meet the needs disclosed by the survey, covering the fields of evangelism and educational, social service, medical, industrial, and agricultural missions, 3) a unified budget estimating the cost of the program, 4) a plan of interdenominational comity assigning to each society its responsibility in the common effort, and 5) a united educational and financial drive to acquaint the home churches with the findings of the survey and to raise the funds required to execute its recommendations. The next year was devoted to carrying out the first four parts of the program. The educational and financial drive was begun in March, 1920. By July, 1920, the failure of the movement was conceded by its sponsors, the employed staff was dismissed, and the liquidation of the organization was begun. This was completed in 1922. Its research was continued on a small scale by the Institute of Social and Religious Research.

The most important permanent contribution of the Movement was its Report on the Steel Strike of 1919. This study exercised significant influence in arousing the public opinion which at last brought to an end the twelve hour day in the steel industry. The failure of the movement has often been attributed to the antagonism of powerful financial and industrial interests to the Report. This, however, was a minor factor. More important were the general social and political reaction at the close of the war, the worsening economic outlook, the lack of preparation of public opinion among the churches for the degree of cooperative action required by the movement, and the fear on the part of many denominational agencies that it would absorb or dominate their own work.

J. H. Oldham, "The Interchurch World Movements· Its Possibilities and Problems", International Review of Missions, vol 9 (April, 1920), pp 182-199, "Interchurch· World Movement Number", Missionary Review of the World, Vol 43 (March, 1920), pp 161-238; "Embarrassment of the Interchurch Movement," Literary Digest, Vol 65, (June 12, 1920), pp 42-43· "Cooperation's Greatest Failure," Literary Digest, Vol 80 (January 12, 1924) p 33

H.E.J.

interdenominational cooperation: See Federal Council of The Churches of Christ in America; Interchurch World Movement of North America; Sunday School movement in the United States.

Interdenominational Council of Religious Education: See Sunday School movement in the United States.

interdict: In canon law (Codex Iuris Canonici,* 2268-77), an ecclesiastical punishment whereby the subjects of the Church, while remaining within her communion, are barred from certain sacred rites or functions—Mass, the sacraments, divine services. It may be either personal or local, general or particular. See ban. J.C.M.

interest: In psychology the attitude of the mind (and self) toward any object, activity or end of action which excites feeling, arouses concern, attracts and absorbs attention, and in general evokes spontaneous "whole-hearted" response. It is a mind-set characterized by a readiness to respond to, a propensity to attend to, and an inner urge to engage in further pursuit of such an object, activity or end of action. The term is also applied to the object of such an attitude or mind-set. The roots of interest were formerly said to be the instincts. This explanation has proved to be too narrow and inaccurate. The desires, needs, habits and purposes of the self, all of which are socially conditioned and in large part socially defined, and all of which are too complex to be explained in terms of innate factors alone, are now held to be the main sources of interest.

R.W.F.

interim: A temporary agreement in religious matters between Catholics and Lutherans, made at the Diet of Augsburg, 1548, after Charles V* had crushed the Schmalcald League*. Though it compromised Reformation doctrines, it was to be binding on Lutherans until the next general council. Accepted by a few Lutheran princes, it was rejected by John of Saxony and most of the Lutheran cities, especially by Magdeburg. It was terminated in the Treaty of Passau, 1552, which followed Maurice of Saxony's victory over the emperor. E.C.K.

intermediate state: The state of the soul between death and final judgment. Zoroastrianism, late Hebrew religion, Stoicism, Christianity, and Mohammedanism all have such a belief, as against Eastern religions generally. Frequently the belief is but slightly formulated even when, as in Mohammedanism, the doctrines of judgment, hell, and heaven are clear.

Contrary to Hellenistic views which developed the beliefs of the early Greeks into an intellectual immortality, Pharisee and apocalyptic* thought in Judaism expanded the prophetic this-worldliness with beliefs, usually pictorially described, that centre on the survival of the moral and religious elements of the whole personality These included particular and general judgment, hell and heaven and an intermediate state and prayers for the dead.

In Christianity these beliefs were retained generally except by some medieval heretical sects and received fullest explication in medieval times as the doctrine of Purgatory*. The Reformers' protest against this is the basis for a general Protestant denial, until recently, of any intermediate state. T J.B.

International Bible Students' Association: See Russell, Charles Taze, Russelism; Millenial Dawn, J. F. Rutherford.

International Church of the Foursquare Gospel: A religious sect of the fundamentalist type organized and controlled by Mrs. Aimee Semple McPherson (died, 1944). Its central church is the Angelus Temple at Los Angeles. From this center the movement has spread into about twenty states and to some Latin American countries, and it claims a total of 205 churches and 16,000 members.

The sect revolves about the personality of Aimee Semple McPherson. Born in Canada, first married to a travelling Baptist evangelist, she came to Los Angeles in 1918, "by divine call", where she founded the Echo Park Evangelistic Association and built Angelus Temple to large proportions. She was pastor of the Temple and president for life of the Foursquare sect, with power to appoint her successor, to name all trustees and directors and to hold veto power over their actions.

The Foursquare theology is thoroughly fundamentalist. The sect is adventist, charismatic, premillennarian, and pentecostal. Among the doctrines stressed in the declaration of faith (written by Mrs. McPherson) are verbal inspiration, literalism, spirit baptism and guidance, speaking in unknown tongues and interpreting the same, divine healing and miracles, the imminent second coming and millennial reign of Christ, and a literal heaven and hell. See pentecostal sects.

E.T.C.

International Graded Sunday School Lesson: See Sunday School movement in the United States.

international law: See law.

International New Thought Alliance: See New Thought movement.

International Pentecostal Assemblies: See pentecostal sects.

International Sunday School Association: See Sunday School movement in the United States.

International Sunday School Convention: See Sunday School movement in the United States.

International Sunday School Council of Religious Education: See Sunday School movement in the United States.

International Uniform Sunday School Lesson: See Sunday School movement in the United States.

internuncio: (Lat. inter, between; nuntius, messenger) A papal diplomat having charge of the legation in a foreign country of secondary importance. He is either a titular archbishop or a domestic prelate, and has the same powers and privileges of a nuncio but without the latter's dignity. See legates and nuncios, papal.

J.F.T.

interpolation: A word, phrase, sentence, or passage of greater length inserted by a copyist or editor of a writing, either unintentionally through a scribal error or intentionally to change or modify the meaning. The identification of these interpolations in the Bible and in other sources is a necessary part of critical study. Familiar examples: the addition to the Ten Commandments in the Samaritan Pentateuch*; the apocalypse in Isa. 24-27; the doxology to the Lord's Prayer (Matt. 6:13); the resurrection narrative in Mark 16:9-20; the Pericope Adulterae (Jn. 7:53-8:11); "He descended into Hell" in the Apostles' Creed; and the "filioque" clause in the Latin text of the Nicene Creed.

M.R.

interpretation: See allegorical interpretation; anagogical interpretation; exegesis; literal interpretation; senses of Scripture; types.

interstice: (Lat. interstitium, an interval) The interval of time required by canon law* between the receptions of the various ranks of orders* in the Roman Catholic Church, e.g., between acolyte* (minor order) and subdiaconate (major order), one year; between subdiaconate and diaconate, and diaconate and priesthood, three months.

J.F.T.

intichiuma: (Australian) A rite of natives of central Australia, ceremonies for the maintenance of the annual supply of food and drink, such as rain-making ceremonies and those in which the flesh of the kangaroo is ceremonially eaten.

F.L.P.

introit: (Lat. introitus, entrance) The name in the Roman rite for the anthem sung as the priest approaches the altar at the beginning of Mass*. See plainsong, psalmody.

E.R.H.

introspection: (Lat. introspicere, to look into) The observation of the presentations and processes of one's own consciousness; as such, the chief method, historically, of all philosophical analysis of mind and of spiritual autobiography; developed as a carefully controlled method by Titchener and his Structuralist* (existentialist) School, completely rejected by Watson and his behaviorist school, but now generally recognized as supplemental to behavioristic, psychoanalytic and other psychological methods.

E.T.R.

intrusion: Thrusting a person into an ecclesiastical office illegally. The "non-intrusion controversy" which issued in the disruption of the Church of Scotland* in 1843 arose because ministers presented by patrons were thrust into parish churches by civil authority over the objection of congregations, in disregard of an act of the General Assembly.

R.H.N.

intuitionism: See empirical theology, epistemology; immediacy; mysticism; religious datum; truth.

intuitionism, ethical: An intuition is a proposition that is self evident to an intelligent mind. While all ethical systems have some use of intuitions, the designation Intuitionism is commonly restricted to those relying almost wholly on intuitions, making little use of abstract reasoning and empirical observations. The Scottish Intuitionists (Thomas Reid, Dugald Stewart, Thomas Brown, et al.,) in opposition to their contemporary rivals, mostly Utilitarians* and Kantians, believed that a man's conscience, properly educated, enables him to know without much reflection what he ought to do. The term is now sometimes applied to Sir W. David Ross and others who affirm that "right" and "good", known intuitively, sometimes call for contrary actions between which choice has to be made.

W.K.W.

investiture conflict: (1059-1122) Investiture was originally the bestowal of an ecclesiastical office by investing the recipient with the symbols (ring, staff, keys) of his authority. In this conflict the popes disputed the claim of the lay rulers to confer bishoprics, abbacies, and other ecclesiastical offices. Sovereigns had in early medieval times arrogated this right to themselves. Simony, an incontinent clergy, and the subordination of the spiritual to the temporal power resulted. From the reign of Nicholas II (1059-1061), the popes endeavored, for the sake of reform, to free the Church from this scourge and particularly from the tutelage of the Holy Roman Empire in Italy and in Germany. The struggle reached an acute stage in 1075 when St. Gregory VII* (Hildebrand) delivered an ultimatum to the emperor Henry IV. The latter resisted and was excommunicated. There followed the celebrated scene between the pope and the emperor at Canossa. Many have seen in it the humiliation of the civil power by the ambitious Church. Some are inclined to interpret it as a political triumph for Henry. The conflict continued under the successors of the pope and of the emperor and was settled by a compromise, the Concordat of Worms (1122)*, between Henry V and Callistus II. The civil authority was deprived of its unlimited power over the appointment of bishops, while the Church had to be satisfied with something less than the full exclusion of alien influence from canonical elections. In England Henry I had renounced investiture in 1107. In France a reform had been effected by 1080. Further action concerning lesser ecclesiastical offices was taken at the Lateran Council of 1179. See Lateran Councils.

E.A.R.

Invitatory: Psalm 95, "O come, let us sing unto the Lord", sung at the beginning of Matins* as a call to worship is the invitatory Psalm, the invitatories are phrases attached to it (Roman rite and newer Anglican Prayer Books) relating to the day or season being observed.   E.R.H.

invocation: A term to describe the words employed to ask for the special presence of God at the opening of a religious service, or for some special purpose. Traditionally used, also, to describe the invocatory formula, "In the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost", with which sermons, acts of devotion, etc., are often begun in Catholic communions. In the Anglican liturgies, the word is used also to describe the "epiclesis"*, by which the Holy Spirit is "invoked" upon the elements of bread and wine. Cf. intercession.   W.N.P.

Ionic style: See temples, Greek and Roman.

Ireland, Church of: That part of Irish Christianity which accepted the Reformation as introduced from England, and since 1560 has disputed with Roman Catholics the claim to continuity with the ancient and mediaeval Irish Church. Probably at all times about 10% of the population, it was at first largely Calvinist (see Irish Articles), and since 1800 has been the most strongly Evangelical Church of the Anglican Communion. After disestablishment in 1869 it revised its Prayer Book and Canons in an Evangelical and anti-ritualist direction, though reaffirming its claim to be the "Catholic and Apostolic Church of Ireland."

W. A. Phillips, ed., History of the Church of Ireland, 3 vols (1933), J. T. Ball, The Reformed Church of Ireland (1886).   E.R.H.

Irenæus: A second-century bishop of Lyons in Gaul and heresiologist*. He was born in Asia Minor (ca. 130 A.D.). Of his youth little is known save his own statement that he had as a boy seen and heard Polycarp. His mature life was spent in Gaul, first as a presbyter, then, following the death of Pothinus, as bishop of Lyons. His principle writing, Against the Heresies, (ca. 180 A.D.), was intended as an exposure and refutation of Gnosticism*. It was written in Greek, fragments of which are extant in the writings of Hippolytus, Eusebius, and Epiphanius; the whole being available in an early Latin translation. The writing was widely used in the early church and is still the fullest account of the Gnostic vagaries. Irenæus is properly regarded one of the most influential figures of the ante-Nicene church   The last three books of his Against the Heresies may be called the first systematic exposition of Christian belief. The date of his death is unknown. Mention of his martyrdom under Septimus Severus does not apparently antedate the fifth century. See clergy; recapitulation.

The standard edition of Irenæus is H. W. Harvey, Sancti Irenaei episcopi Lugdunensis Libros quinque Adversus haereses, 2 vols. (1857).   M.S E.

irenics: Irenical theology is the study of Christian doctrines with a view to conciliating differences which arise in religion and the church from one-sided theories. Its purpose is to promote the peace and harmony of the Christian Church.   A.K R.

Irish Articles: Adopted by the Convocation of the Church of Ireland* in 1615, revised the Thirty-Nine Articles* in a strongly Calvinist direction. Though disused in Ireland after the adoption of the Thirty-Nine Articles in 1634, they were used in part as a basis for the Westminster Confession*.   E.R.H.

irregularity: In Roman Catholic and Anglican usage, the performance of a sacred act (e.g., the bestowal of Holy Orders*) with the essentials of validity but in violation of the rules involved; irregular orders cannot be repeated, but confer no right to exercise official functions in the Church unless the irregularity is rectified.   E.R.H.

irresistible grace: See grace.

Irving, Edward: (1792-1834) Minister of the established Church of Scotland, known for his apocalyptic sermons and theology, which were instrumental in founding the Catholic Apostolic Church in London in 1832. A child prodigy, he entered the Church after graduation from the Uni. of Edinburgh and became an assistant to Thomas Chalmers. Removing to London his fiery sermons on prophecy and the millenial hope attracted great crowds. In 1830 he was excommunicated by the Presbyterian Synod of London for preaching the humanity of Jesus, and not long after going into forced retirement, died. His followers left the Church to form a new sect, which now has approximately 50,000 members in England and America. See Catholic Apostolic Church

Mrs M. Oliphant (Wilson), Life of Edward Irving (London, 1862) ; W. Wilks, Edward Irving (London, 1854) ; Samuel Taylor Coleridge, Notes on English Divines (London, 1853) ; Edward Miller, History and Doctrine of Irvingism (2 vols, London, 1878) ; Thomas Carlyle, Miscellanies, "Essay on Death of Irving," ed. Froude (1881).   M.G.R.—W.W.S.

Irvingites: See Irving, Edward; Catholic Apostolic Church.

isagogics: That part of theology directly preliminary to actual exegesis*, and concerned with the literary history of the Bible More generally known as Biblical Introduction* it deals with such subjects as authorship, date and place of writing, contents, style and peculiar difficulties of the different writings of Scripture.   A.K.R.

Isaiah: The Book of Isaiah is composed of two halves that have been artificially combined a book purporting to contain prophecies of Isaiah, an 8th century prophet (chs. 1-39), and a book of prophecies of a much later time (chs. 40-66).

1. Isaiah 1-39 may be divided into four main sections: 1-12, 13-27, 28-35, 36-39. The most valuable section is 1-12, it represents a combination of a number of separate collections—a) 1.1-31 belong to the closing days of Isaiah's career and look back on the war of 701 B.C. (Sennacherib) b) 2.1-4 6—early invective and predictions with some non-authentic hopeful additions 2.2-4 (Micah 4 1-4) and 4 2-6. c) 5 1-30 —early invective. d) 6 1-9 6—sometimes called the "Isaiah Memoir," containing sections of first person narrative. e) 9.7-11 9—really the continuation of item c), with an appendix 11·10-12:5. The second main section, 13-27 is composed of a group of "burdens," 13-23 (i.e., oracles against particular nations of which few, if any, can be considered "authentic"), and of the "Isaiah-apocalypse," 24-27, a production of the late Persian or early Greek era. In 28-35 there are three groups of material. 28-32 we again have chiefly genuine utterances of Isaiah, belonging to his later days, with two appendices,—a "prophetic liturgy" (ch. 33) and a prophecy imitative of Deutero-Isaiah (34-35), both of much later vintage. Chapters 36-39, finally, are taken over from II Kings*. Isaiah is the most "classic" of the prophets in thought and diction.

2. "Deutero-Isaiah" is often used to describe Isaiah 40-66, but more particularly 40-55 (in which case 56-66 are called "Trito-Isaiah"). Chapters 40-55 are a collection of poems in a new rhapsodic style from the period of the exile. Modern "form-criticism"* provides an essential tool for the separation of the individual entities.

The allusions to Cyrus as a rising figure and the imminent fall of Chaldaean Babylon suggest a date of 550-538 B.C. Torrey's attempt to preserve the unity of 40-66 by eliminating the Cyrus-Babylon passages and dating the whole work much later has not met with much favor. Of particular importance are the Servant songs, 42· 1-4, 49 1-6, 50 4-9, 52 13-53-12. The problem of their authorship (composed by Deuter-Isaiah or by a follower?), and interpretation (the Servant a "collective" figure—the ideal Israel—or an individual—past (e.g., Jeremiah), present (the prophet himself), or future ("Messiah")—will probably never be solved. Entirely apart from any Messianic "predictions" contained in it, the book is full of profound insights and an important preparation for Christianity. "Trito-Isaiah" is the usual designation for 55-66. Some hold that they are the work of a single author. The most favored view today, however, is that 56-66 contain a number of poems of diverse origin. Of the units contained in it, chapters 60-62, 57 14-19, 66.6-16 seem to be by one hand—that of a pupil or imitator of Deutero-Isaiah, presumably writing about the time of Haggai and Zechariah.

R. H. Pfeiffer, Introduction to the Old Testament (1941) ; J. A. Bewer; Literature of the Old Testament (rev. ed., 1933).   E.G.K.

Isaiah, Ascension of: A 3-4 cent. A.D. compilation of several older works—a Jewish "Martyrdom of Isaiah" (1 cent. B.C.), interpolated with a fragment of a christian "Vision of Isaiah" 3·13-4.18 (100 A.D.) and augmented with a visionary ascension of Isaiah, 6-11 (2 cent. A.D.)   E.G.K.

Ishtar: See Mesopotamian religion. Cf. Ashtoreth.

Ishvara: The personalized form of God as contrasted with the impersonal Brahman in Hinduism. Used chiefly by the theistic Hindu sects as the name of their Supreme God.   C.S.B.

Isidore Mercator: See False Decretals.

Isidore of Seville: (c. 570-636) Succeeded his brother as Bishop of Seville 608, an extensive writer, his Etymologies and other text-books preserved learning, while his practical works are notable for sense if not for originality.   E.R.H.

Isis: See Osiris, mother-goddesses; mystery religions.

Isis-Osiris: See mystery religions.

Islam: (Arabic, meaning submission to, or having peace with God) The religion of which Mohammed* was the prophet. As Mohammed preached submission to God he called his religion Islam. An adherent of Islam is called a Moslem* (Arabic, one who submits). See Mohammedanism.   P.E.J.

Ismailis: A branch of the Shiite* sect in Islam, established by Adallah ibn Maymum in the 9th century. Members were initiated to its secret organization to prepare for the revelation of a concealed leader (*imam) of the house of Ali.

Groups are still found in Arabia, Egypt and India.
See taqiyya.   P.E J.

Israel, religion and theology: Judaism regards all of its adherents as members of a religious order, a "kingdom of priests"; and it imposes on them a religious discipline, both moral and ceremonial, such as is prescribed in other religions, generally, only for members of special orders.
This religious discipline is considered a means of communion with God. Thus the study of the Scriptures and their commentaries, and the observance of the Law*, are as much a part of Jewish worship as the recital of prayers or attendance at synagogue. Hence it comes about that much of the Jewish religion has to be practiced outside of the synagogue*. Judaism affects conduct not only in the religious school, but also in the marketplace, and above all in the home. This religious system, aside from its intrinsic appeal to the Jew who follows it, has an interest for the Christian and Mohammedan world, because of their close association with it in their origins, and its long history offers an excellent opportunity for the study of the development of religious thought generally.

The term "religion and theology of Israel" as used in this article, therefore covers the religion and theology which, inculcated in the Hebrew Scriptures, has survived in the form of Rabbinic Judaism* until our day. The whole constitutes a dynamic system, the origins of which we can trace back to Moses*, and the growth of which we can follow over the whole period of more than three thousand years from his time. The view, commonly held among some Bible critics a generation ago, that Moses himself was a mythical character, and that even if he existed, he was a "henotheist"* is today vanishing. An increasingly strong body of opinion even among higher critics holds that Moses was a monotheist.

The most obvious elements in the development of prophetic religion after Moses were its continuous battles against idolatry, and its increasing recognition of the importance and moral responsibility of the individual personality. With these there came a deepening of the understanding of life's moral issues, such as a recognition of the meaning of universal peace, and its indispensability to civilization.

The most impressive figure in the struggle against idol-worship was that of Elijah*, whose dramatic manner of winning the people of Israel away from the worship of the Phoenician Baal* to the worship of God, remained one of the most cherished memories of the Jewish tradition. The emphasis on the moral responsibility of the individual attained its highest expression in the teachings of the prophet, Ezekiel*, in the sixth century B C.

The accentuation of the moral responsibility of the individual tended to raise the question of reward and punishment of individual persons, and with that of the problem of evil in the world.
The problem is first suggested in the Pentateuch* itself (Genesis*, chap. 18), but is expressed with increasing clarity by Jeremiah* (seventh cent.

B C.) and by Habakkuk* (possibly a contemporary). The discussion reaches new levels in the portrayal of Israel as the "suffering servant of God" by the Second Isaiah* (in the sixth century B C.), and in the argument about the theodicy* which constitutes the Book of Job* (probably composed in the fourth century B C).

The discussion entered a new phase with the emergence of the doctrine of the resurrection*, which appears in Israel clearly for the first time in Isaiah, 26.19, a section of the Book of Isaiah frequently assigned to the fourth or third centuries B.C.

The question of the belief in the resurrection, and its accompanying doctrine of personal immortality*, thus introduced, assumed continually greater importance in the Jewish consciousness.
The Sadducean* sect, which denied the resurrection, came to be regarded as heretical by the Pharisees*, who ultimately constituted the majority of the Jews.

Together with the rise of the doctrine of the resurrection, there grew up a belief that the study of the Law and its elaboration led to personal salvation*. This doctrine, held in the first instance probably by the Hasideans* of the fourth and third centuries, and the Scribes* who led them, ultimately was accepted as basic by the Pharisaic sect. According to this doctrine, especial merit attached to the lay students who devoted themselves to the study of the Law, and to memorizing and transmitting the comments made upon it by their teachers. The whole body of traditions which grew up among these scribes became known as the "Oral Law" because it was handed down orally from master to pupil. The Pharisees accepted the authority of this Law, and the Sadducees, who also held that the Scriptures were of binding authority, did not admit that these oral traditions had any validity

While the Pharisees insisted that personal salvation could be obtained by members of the Jewish faith only by the study and observance of the Law, in all its aspects, ceremonial as well as civil, they taught that all men could obtain salvation by the observance of seven basic moral principles These were called the "Noachic Laws", because, according to Pharisaic doctrine, they applied to all the descendants of Noah, and according to one version were revealed to him.
These laws are those forbidding idol-worship, blasphemy, murder, sexual irregularity, theft, and cruelty to animals, and establishing civil righteousness.

The Talmudic* writings are the products of the Pharisaic tradition; we have no ancient works stemming from the Sadducean tradition. Hence, Judaism as it has survived in the world is essentially ancient Pharisaism.

In the course of centuries, the Pharisaic Judaism has further been stimulated by its reaction to Greek philosophy (as in Philo* Judeus, Alexandria, first century of the Christian era), and also, in a less definite form, among the Rabbinical scholars of Palestine. In later times, scholars like Rab Saadia Gaon (882-942), Judah Ha-Levi (1085-1140), Ibn Gabirol (ca. 1021-ca. 1058), and Moses ben Maimon (1135-1204) made efforts to interpret the traditional faith in terms of the later philosophical development, particularly as it became extant among the Arabs from the eighth to the twelfth centuries. The work of these philosophers, and some of their less well-known successors, like Hasdai Crescas (1340-1410), was of great significance not only for Judaism, but also for Christianity, which utilized their works for the clarification of its own philosophy.

The essential elements in the Jewish faith as it has emerged out of these developments are its insistence on the unity, the incorporeality, the timelessness and the immanence of God, on the authority of the Law, as interpreted in the Talmud writings, and later Rabbinic works; as well as the belief in the dignity and immortality of the individual human personality; and the belief in the ultimate redemption of mankind in the Messianic Age.

In the course of the 19th century, there developed first in Germany, and then also in the United States, a "Reform" movement in Judaism, the purpose of which is a re-statement of Judaism on the basis of modified system of observances. (See Judaism, Reform.) Among some extremist teachers, Reform Judaism tends to take the form almost of anti-nomianism*, while among more moderate teachers, it constitutes simply an effort to adjust Jewish traditional ceremonial discipline to the problems of a standardized, industrial age. To meet the challenge of Reform Judaism, there developed both in Germany and in America, a movement called "Conservative Judaism", which seeks to maintain the historic continuity of the Jewish tradition, and claims that all the social and theological problems of the modern day can be solved within the framework of that tradition, and the elasticity it allows to its interpreters. On the other hand, a third group, known as "Orthodox Jews" deny that the traditional customs are in need of either adjustment or re-interpretation.

During the last decade of the 19th century, the traditional belief of Judaism that ultimately the center of its spiritual life would be restored to Palestine, as the Holy Land, led to the rise of the Zionist* movement which seeks to effect the re-establishment of Palestine as a homeland of the Jewish people. The rise of this movement led to the issuance of the Balfour Declaration by Great Britain in 1917, enunciating the promise that His Majesty's Government would favor the establishment of such a homeland for the Jews. The problems associated with this declaration, and its implementation, have been many and complicated; and they are still unsolved. The Zionist movement, while drawing numbers of adherents from Orthodox, Conservative, and Reform groups, also includes many who are not all affiliated with any of these groups.

There is no central Jewish body capable of giving final, authoritative interpretation to Judaism. Each learned teacher or rabbi* may turn to the Talmud and its related writings for his guidance. As a matter of practice, and by informal concensus, the leading teachers of each generation come to be recognized as such, but their authority extends only to those individuals and groups who consider them acceptable interpreters of the Law. See Jewish; Judaism, Semites, religion of. Also see cosmogonies.

W. F. Albright, From the Stone Age to Christianity (1940) ; idem, Archaeology and the Religion of Israel (1942) ; Salo W. Baron, A Social and Religious History of the Jews (1937) ; Elbogen, Die Religionsanschauungen der Pharisaeer mit besonderer Beruecksichtigung der Begriffe Gott und Mensch (Berlin, 1904) ; Louis Finkelstein, The Pharisees, The Sociological Background of their Faith (2nd ed., 1939) ; idem, Beliefs and Practices of Judaism (1941) , Israel Friedlaender, Past and Present, A Collection of Jewish Essays (1919) ; Morris Joseph, Judaism as Creed and Life, (5th ed., London, 1925) ; Kaufmann Kohler, Jewish Theology (1918) ; G. F. Moore, Judaism in the First Centuries of the Christian Era (Cambridge, 1927) ; W. O. E. Oesterley and G. H Box, The Religion and Worship of the Synagogue (London, 1907) ; W. O. E Oesterley and T H Robinson, Hebrew Religion (1930) ; W. O. E. Oesterley, Judaism and Christianity (1937) ; Solomon Schechter, Some Aspects of Rabbinic Theology (1909) ; idem, Studies in Judaism, 3 vols. (1896-1924) ; J. Wellhausen, Israelitische und juedische Geschichte (8th ed., Berlin-Leipzig, 1921).   L.F.

Israel: See Judaism (Introductory).

Israel ben Eliezer: See Chasidism.

Israfil or Israfel: The angel of music in Mohammedan mythology who is expected to sound the trumpet at the resurrection.   P.E.J.

Itala: See versions of the Bible, ancient.

Italian pentecostal sects: There are two pentecostal sects among Italians in the United States, both growing out of a movement in Chicago about 1904. The Unorganized Italian Christian Churches of North America has 104 congregations and 9,500 members. Its headquarters are in Chicago. The Italian Pentecostal Assemblies of God, with headquarters in Newark, N. J., has 16 churches and 1,500 members. Both groups hold to the fundamentalist theology and stress the pentecostal gift of speaking in unknown tongues. See pentecostal sects.   E.T.C.

itinerarium: A form of prayer used by monks and clerics before setting out on a journey, and is usually printed at the end of the Breviary. The use of such forms is probably to be traced to monastic observances. Among the Fathers of the Desert there were prescriptions on the conduct of monks before setting out on a journey. The rule of St. Benedict* gives two forms, one for those going on a short journey, and a second and more solemn form to be used by those about to go on a long journey. The Itinerarium of the present day is probably derived from the more solemn form used in medieval times. The usual form of the Itinerarium consists of the canticle "Benedictus," with an antiphon, certain versicles, and several collects.   T.T.M.

ius divinum (lex divina; lex aeterna) In Scholastic, especially Thomist theory the immutable order of both nature and human society that derives immediately from God, as opposed to man-made, changeable lex humana. Within the comprehensive category of ius divinum, ius naturale constitutes that part that is known to man through reason, while ius divinum positivium would be unknown but for supernatural revelation.

See Canon Law; ius naturale; law.   M Rh.

ius naturale: See natural law; natural rights; ius divinum.

iustitia naturalis: (natural righteousness or perfection) By himself man was able to do good before he fell by reason of his natural righteousness or perfection by which the sensual was subject to his free will. See perfection, perfectionism.   H.H.

iustitia originalis: (original or primitive righteousness or perfection) This is the righteousness or perfection given man at his creation. It is not a part of nature. It was given man before the Fall. The state of original righteousness is in Catholic thought a special supernatural gift, a donum supernaturale, which was added to the pura naturalia, that is the essential humanity which Adam had as man before he fell. The idea testifies to the fact that human sin cannot destroy the essential character of man to such a degree that it would cease being implied in, and furnishing a contrast to, what he has become. Catholic thought makes a complete distinction between natural law and original righteousness or perfection. See perfection, perfectionism.   H.H.

Izanagi: Origin of word unknown. The name applied to the ancient Japanese sky father.
                                                                    D.C.H.

Izanami: Origin of word unknown. The name applied to the ancient Japanese earth mother.
                                                                    D.C.H.

J

J: Symbol used for one of the component narratives of certain O.T. books, derived from the initial letter of the divine name Jahveh (Jehovah*, Yahweh), which it employs before the time of Moses. It is found in Genesis-Judges, and possibly also in I, II Samuel*. J was written in Judah, probably in the tenth or ninth century B.C. While it has been subdivided by some scholars more minutely (J1, J2, L, S, etc.), it is possible to do justice to the facts by considering the J writer as both compiler and creative author. See Hexateuch.

See E. S. Brightman, The Sources of the Hexateuch (1918); O. Eissfeldt, Hexateuch-Synopse (1922).

J.P.H.

Jacobi, Friedrich Heinrich: (1743-1819) German philosopher of intuition. Himself a realist and an empiricist, Jacobi opposed Kant's* philosophy charging that it leads to solipsism*. Our consciousness of freedom, moreover, refutes the absolute determinism of Spinoza's* philosophy. The existence of God cannot be proven by some demonstrative or mediate method of rationalism or discovered outside of man in nature where mechanical causation is the rule. Our apprehension of God can come only through immediate perception, that is, through faith. In such an act of direct knowledge or intuition, the existence of God is revealed within us with the certainty of feeling. The understanding however must not attempt the impossible task of defining God's nature and attributes, which are beyond the grasp of human understanding.

Main works. Ueber die Lehre des Spinoza (1785); David Hume über den Glauben (1787); Sendschreiben an Fichte (1799).

H.W.J.

Jacobites: As the members of the Syrian National Church are generally known, represent the monophysite* members of the ancient patriarchate of Antioch who refused to accept the decisions of the Council of Chalcedon* of 451. The nickname is derived from Jacob Baradaeus (490-577), who organized their scattered forces during the reign of Justinian and Theodora. The latter was herself a Monophysite, and protected Jacob from the persecuting measures declared against her coreligionists by her husband, the Orthodox Justinian. When the Mohammedan Arabs conquered Syria, the Monophysite Jacobites were free to develop their own organization relatively unimpeded. At present they number about 200,000 members, ruled by the Patriarch of Antioch, whose seat is at Mardin in Iraq. See Antiochene (Syrian Rite), Syrian Churches.

J. B Kidd, The Churches of Eastern Christendom (London, n d.), Harry C. J. Luke, Prophets, Priests and Patriarchs (London, 1927).

M.S.

Jacopo da Voragine (or Varagine): (c. 1230-c. 1298) Popular preacher, Dominican, later Archbishop of Genoa. His Legendae Sanctorum, commonly called Legenda Aurea, a collection of legends* of the saints arranged according to their days in the calendar of the church, became one of the most popular books of the Middle Ages. After circulating in many manuscript copies for a century and a half, it was printed not only in the original Latin but in translations into five other languages within the first half century of printing. Caxton published it in 1483 as "The Golden Legend." The statement, by Sixtus of Siena, that Jacopo translated the whole Bible into Italian is generally disputed, but is defended by Richardson.

Potthast, Bibliotheca hist. med. aev. (Berlin, 1896); E C Richardson, Materials for a Life of Jacopo da Varagine (1935), G. Ryan and H. Ripperger, The Golden Legend of Jacopo da Voragine, Translated and Adapted. 2 vols. (1941).

W.E.G.

Jagganath, Juggernaut: A variant name of Vishnu* the Preserver under which he is worshipped at Puri. The most notable feature of his worship is the car festival in which the great images of Jagganath, "Lord of the World" and his brother and sister, Balaram and Subadhra are hauled by thousands of pious worshipers from the temple a distance some four miles to the Garden House. The great car is 45 feet in height, 35 feet square and runs on 16 wheels seven feet in diameter.

C.S.B.

Jainism: One of the native religions of India. The 6th century saw two major reform movements in Hinduism*, both of which eventually came to be regarded as separate religions. These were Jainism and Buddhism*. Both were a reaction against current conceptions of divinity in the direction of non-theism; both were attempts to win salvation or moksha without resorting to the help of gods, which, specifically denied by neither, were held to be unable to do anything for man. Jainism is slightly older than Buddhism, indeed, its beginnings may lie much farther back than the 6th century. Buddha in his quest for salvation began by the way of asceticism which was central among the Jains. Traditionally however, it is considered that Vardhaman or Mahavira*, "Great Hero" as he is better known, was the founder of the organized movement historically known as Jainism. Born 599 B.C. and dying 527 B.C. he was thus an older contemporary of Gautama. According to the Jain scriptures he was the last of the twenty-four Tirthankaras, or Ford Finders, who had through asceticism attained release, and served to encourage man in his hard search for moksha.

Theoretically in Jainism, salvation is to be won through rigid self-effort, mainly through the observation of ascetic practise, though the Three Jewels, knowledge, faith and right conduct, are stressed as the way to final liberation. Jainism accepted with some modification the Hindu law of Karma and transmigration. More than any other Hindu group they emphasize ahimsha* or non-injury. The temples are among the most striking and ornate of the numerous temples of India. The present Jain population of India according to the 1931 census was 1,252,105. This represents a slight increase over the 1921 census which revealed a Jain population of 1,178,596, but was nearly 200,000 less than the number in the census of 1891. See cycles of time; sacred literatures.

S. Stevenson, The Heart of Jainism (Oxford, 1915); J. B. Pratt, India and Its Faiths (1915); Nicol McNicol, Living Religions of India (London, 1934).

C.S.B.

James: (Gr. Jacobus) 1. Son of Zebedee, brother of John, and one of the twelve disciples; executed by Herod Agrippa 1 ca. 44 A.D. 2. The son of Alphaeus, also one of the twelve; possibly identical with James the son of Mary (Mark 16.1, etc.). In Mark 15:40 called "James the Younger." 3. The brother of the Lord and head of the early Christian community in Jerusalem, stoned to death in 62 A.D. 4. Father of a disciple of Jesus whom Luke (6:16) calls Judas.   S.M.G.

James, Letter of: James is an ancient sermon, dwelling upon the practical aspects of the Christian life, which it sets forth with great pungency and variety. The opposition it sets up between faith and works undoubtedly reflects acquaintance with Paul's collected letters, but is aimed not at Paul's doctrine of faith but at a current misconception of it. It is impossible to trace a course of thought through the little tract; it is less a chain of thought than a string of pearls. The ancient preacher seems to aim at having something for everybody in his audience, and so deals with every sort of human weakness. Illustrations, rhetorical questions, scorn and humor all play their vivid parts, recalling the diatribes of the Stoic street preachers, and the discourses of Epictetus. The writer was acquainted not only with the collected Pauline letters, but with Hebrews, I Peter, and probably Matthew and Luke. The sermon was probably written early in the second century, and afterward published, addressed to Christians everywhere. The name James may have been suggested by the apparent opposition to Paul in 2·14-26, along with Paul's mention of James in Gal. 2 12 as the leader of the opposition in Jerusalem, in that case James the Lord's brother is meant.

J. H. Ropes, The Epistle of St. James (1916).

E J.G.

James, William: (1842-1910) Psychologist, philosopher, expounder of religious theory, teacher at Harvard 1873-1907, one of the most original and influential figures in the American world of letters, son of Henry James the Swedenborgian theologian and brother of Henry James the novelist. James came to philosophy without B.A., M A., or Ph D. but as a man of the world who had read and travelled widely, and as an M D. trained in the biological sciences. The results showed in the original and colorful qualities of his pragmatism and his radical empiricism. As a pragmatist he shifted attention from knower and known to organism and environment, interpreting knowledge as part of the larger practical situation where life adjusts itself to its world. Truth became thus not an antecedent reality, but what may or may not happen to ideas according as they work out satisfactorily. Logic became an instrument forged by life for the accomplishment of its demands. All intellectual operations derived their importance from their success in carrying out practical purposes.

Pragmatism* thus became a method for testing ideas. Radical empiricism began as a psychological theory and ended as an incomplete metaphysics which James left uncompleted at his death. As psychology it was the discovery of relations in transitive states of consciousness and therefore in the stream of experience itself, not supplied by an outside factor such as mind. As metaphysics it was an attempt to interpret reality as experience of the "strung-along variety", i.e., as having pluralistic and external relations and as being "what it is experienced as." Both pragmatism and radical empiricism had important results for religious theory. Pragmatism was, if anything, more successful as an interpretation of religious belief than of truth, since there is an obvious sense in which beliefs must be practical and must "outstrip the evidence" whereas the definition of truth in terms of results is open to question. The essays in The Will to Believe explain the part played by inner or emotional evidence and justify the appeal to purpose and will as an unavoidable element in determining one's worldview. The Varieties of Religious Experience describes the more passive, receptive attitude, where man is saved by a power outside himself, but the attempt to invoke radical empiricism to explain the nature of religious experience was somewhat obscured by its association with the "subconscious" and the phenomena of psychical research and hypnotism. (See subliminal self.) On the whole, James's greatest contribution to religion seems to rest on a) his pragmatic defence of emotional evidence, b) his pluralistic insistence that even for religion "all is not well' and God is limited, c) his empiricistic eagerness to take experience as it comes and in doing so to look for light in unexpected places. He bequeathed less a convincing definition of truth than a sense of the need of being ever on the alert for new truth; he will be remembered not for a stereotyped set of phrases but for his large-hearted generous attitude and for his remarkable ability to make the printed page reflect the color of living experience. In psychology, philosophy, and religion he did not so much offer a definition as determine a direction. His influence has grown since his death. See psychology, schools of.

Works: The Principles of Psychology (1890) 2 vols.; The Will to Believe, etc (1897); Human Immortality (1898); Talks on Psychology (1899); The Varieties of Religious Experience (1902); Pragmatism (1907); A Pluralistic Universe (1909); The Meaning of Truth (1909); Some Problems of Philosophy (1911); The Letters of William James (1920) Cf. R B. Perry: The Thought and Character of William James (1935), which contains not only an exhaustive analysis but many hitherto unpublished letters.   J.S.B.

Jane Frances de Chantal (Jeanne Francoise Fremyot de Chantal), Saint: (1572-1641) A woman of rare spiritual qualities who as a widow, after raising her family, founded with the aid of her spiritual director, St. Francis de Sales*, the Congregation of the Visitation. See Visitation, Order of the.   D.V.S.

Jansenism: A movement in the Roman Catholic Church named after Cornelius Jansen (Bishop of Ypres, 1636-8) whose posthumous Augustinus (1640) revived extreme Augustinian positions on predestination and grace. Jansenism was associated with rigorist ethics, especially in France, where Pascal's Lettres provinciales (1656-7) attacked the lax casuistry of some Jesuit* writers. In 1653 five Jansenist propositions were condemned by Pope Innocent X, but this merely provoked a controversy as to whether the propositions really appeared in the Augustinus, and whether the Pope's authority extended to matters of fact as well as of faith. A devotional work, the Reflexions morales of Quesnel*, became a means of Jansenist propaganda, in 1713 Clement XI condemned it in the bull Unigenitus, against which 20 French Bishops appealed to a General Council. But Jansenism had lost much of its religious force; on one side it fused with political Gallicanism*, on the other degenerated into the antics of the Convulsionnaires. In theology Jansenism merely led the Roman Catholic Church to reaffirm the Tridentine position on grace and free will; but its rigorism, though rejected as such, influenced the general development of moral theology.

A. Gazier,Histoire générale du mouvement janseniste (1922); L. von Pastor, History of the Popes (1938-1941) vols. 28-34.   E.R.H.

Janson, Eric: See communistic settlements, religious, Bishop Hill colony.

Janus: (Lat. Ianus, from ianua, doorway) God of the doorway, a purely Roman divinity deriving from the ancient animism. Two-faced, he became the god of beginnings; hence January. His famous little bronze temple in the Roman Forum faced both east and west, it was open in time of war, closed in time of peace. In myth, he settled on the hill across the Tiber called from his name the Janiculum.   E.M N.

Japan, Christianity in: The story of Christianity in Japan is divided into two main periods: that of the Roman Catholic missions of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries and that of the modern era which began with the arrival of the first Protestant missionaries in 1859. The former opened with the landing of Francis Xavier at Kagoshima on August 15, 1549, and in spite of temporary repressive measures under Toyotomi Hideyoshi in 1597, continued with a brilliant record until the second decade of the seventeenth century. Pagés, one of the modern Roman Catholic historians, estimates the number of Christian followers in 1605 at 750,000. This is probably an exaggeration. Bishop Cerqueira (1552-1614), who was in charge of the Jesuit mission to Japan at the time, states that the number of Christians under pastoral care in 1603 was 200,000. Many feudal lords and members of the nobility became followers of Christ. Nationalistic fears eventually led to violent anti-Christian reaction and persecution. By 1638 Christianity was supposedly completely blotted out. Actually it survived as a secret faith in various local areas until the change of governmental policy at the opening of the modern period made public profession of belief once more possible. The legal interdiction of Christianity was not removed until 1872.

The modern period has been characterized by exceeding diversity in propaganda agencies. Roman Catholic, Greek Orthodox, and a large representation of the Protestant denominations of Europe and America have sought to extend their communions to Japan. The first Protestant church was organized in Yokohama on March 10, 1872. In spite of the negative influence of anti-foreign reaction at the close of the nineteenth century and the disturbing effects of the "New Japanism" that developed with ever-rising tempo throughout the decade beginning with the opening of the Manchurian Affair in September, 1931, the general impact of the Christian movement on Japan, while not spectacular, has nevertheless had sufficient penetration to influence constructively many areas of the national life. Most of the movements for social melioration in modern Japan were cradled in the Christian church. On the other hand the rising national sentiment of the 1931-1941 period found an outlet in the Christian churches that widened constantly as the crisis of the Pacific war drew nearer.

Insofar as Protestant bodies are concerned, earlier diversity has been partially counterbalanced by a considerable degree of unification in general policies. This has been especially true since the formation of the National Christian Council of Japan in 1922. The trend towards standardization was still further augmented by the adoption in the spring of 1940 of the Religious Organizations Law which placed all agencies of religious propaganda and education under a unified official control, and, in the summer of 1941, by the co-operation of forty denominations in the formation of a single Protestant Church ("The Church of Christ in Japan"—Nippon Kirisuto Kyodan). In this latter reorganization powerful totalitarian pressure from the state operated to accelerate pre-existing tendencies toward closer coordination within the various churches themselves. Statistics covering the status of Protestant denominations at the close of 1940 showed 233,000 members of churches, 1,931 organized churches, and 951 self-supporting churches. For the same period the Roman Catholic Church reported 119,000 adherents, and the Greek Orthodox Church an additional 41,000. See Japanese religions; Shinto religion and theology.

Otis Cary, A History of Christianity in Japan (1909) 2 vols ; Hans Haas, Geschichte des Christenthums in Japan (1902-4) 2 Vols , Tokyo; The Japan Christian Year Book (Formerly The Christian Movement in Its Relation to the New Life in Japan; The Christian Movement in Japan, Korea and Formosa; The Japan Mission Year Book, Yokohama and Tokyo (1901—). D.C.H.

Japanese religions: The major religious movements of Japan are Shinto, Buddhism, Confucianism and Christianity.

Shinto, or the Way of the Gods, has had an institutional existence of approximately two thousand years. Even prior to the introduction of Buddhism into Japan in the middle of the sixth century A.D., Shinto had incorporated elements of diverse origin. At an early period a primitive animism was apparently amalgamated with Mongolian Shamanism and an ancient cosmogony that shows affinities with the mythology of southeastern Asia and Indonesia. The early rituals (norito) reveal a complicated pantheon of nature deities worshiped as the protectors of family, clan and dynastic interests. Political centralization was eventually attained under the aegis of the sun goddess, Amaterasu-Omikami. This is the central element of the Japanese state religion today. The existing god-world is a composite of nature deities, interpreted as ancestors, and the spirits of rulers and heroes. As a state religion contemporary Shinto is primarily a cultus for unifying and deepening national sentiment. It is also institutionalized in the form of numerous popular sects that must be distinguished from the state system. (See article: "Shinto Religion and Theology.")

The traditional date of the introduction of Buddhism into Japan is 552 A.D. The Mahayana school has always had practically exclusive control. In spite of early opposition from Shinto, state protection soon favored Buddhism and, supported by the imperial prince, Shotoku Taishi (572-622 A.D.), it quickly attained the position of the most powerful religious and cultural influence in the land. The Nara Era (710-784 A.D.) showed rapid growth, with six sects coming into existence. Three of these, Hosso (635 A.D.), Kegon (739 A.D.), and Ritsu (754 A.D.), have survived to the present. The greatest of the modern sects are of later date. The important foundings are: Tendai (806 A.D.), Shingon (806 A.D.), Yuzu Nembutsu (1123 A.D.), Jodo (1174 A.D.), Zen (1191 A D.), Shin (1224 A.D.), and Nichiren (1253 A.D.). The latest available statistics of Japanese Buddhism (1940) report: 42,250,000 adherents, 71,300 temples, 7,700 churches, 56,000 temple heads and 178,000 other priests. The figures cover the thirteen main sects and some fifty sub-sects. (See Buddhist Terminology.)

On the side of doctrine and ceremony Japanese Buddhism is almost infinitely complicated. At the one extreme, it is criticized by Japanese authorities for having retarded cultural progress by alliance with primitive Asiatic superstition and folkways, and by fostering pessimism and withdrawal from the world, at the opposite pole, Buddhist scholars pride themselves on the harmony of their doctrine with the most recent scientific thought, and their contribution to sound private and national morality. In the course of Japanese history Buddhist pantheism, ritual, ethics and architecture have profoundly influenced Shinto. This was especially true during the long period of the amalgamation of the two faiths between the ninth and the middle of the nineteenth centuries of the western era.

Confucianism found its way into Japan prior to the arrival of Buddhism, although the exact time of the introduction is unknown. The date of 405 A.D. is probable for the first importation of the Analects. Confucian influence reached its height in the Tokugawa Era (1603-1868 A.D.) and various schools flourished. The most important of these are the Shushi school which emphasized the ethics of a static social gradation as the manifestation of the immutable will of Heaven, and the Oyomei school which fostered tendencies towards a teaching and practice of human equality. The former has been by far the more potent in its effect on Japanese life. United with Zen Buddhism, the Shushi philosophy furnished the foundations of Bushido or the Way of the Warrior. Japanese national education and the ethics of the family system, as well as her political institutions, are even today built largely upon the teachings of Confucius. The Imperial Rescript on Education issued in 1890, a document which Japanese patriots exalt as the proclamation and inspiration of an independent nationalism over against the dangerous encroachments of Westernism, stands on an ethical foundation of almost pure Confucianism. See sacred literatures, temples, Far Eastern.

(For Christianity in Japan see article: "Japan, Christianity in.")

Masaharu Anesaki, History of Japanese Religion with Special Reference to the Social and Moral Life of the Nation (London, 1930) ; Masaharu Anesaki, The Religious Life of the Japanese People: Its Present Status and Historical Background (Tokyo, 1938); T. T. Brumbaugh, Religious Values in Japanese Culture (Tokyo, 1934) ; Wilhelm Gundert, Japanische Religionsgeschichte; die Religionen der Japaner und Koreaner in geschichtlichem Abriss dargestellt (Tokyo, 1935) ; Sir Charles Eliot, Japanese Buddhism (London, 1935); August Karl Reischauer, Studies in Japanese Buddhism (1925); Otto Rosenberg, Introduction to the Study of Buddhism (Tokyo, 1916). Otto Rosenberg, Die Probleme des Buddhismus, Philosophie, Materialen zur Kunde (Heidelberg, 1924); Arthur Lloyd, The Creed of Half Japan, (London, 1912); J. B. Pratt, The Pilgrimage of Buddhism and a Buddhist Pilgrim (1917). Robert Cornell Armstrong, Light from the East. Studies in Japanese Confucianism (Toronto, 1914); Inazo Nitobe, Bushido, the Soul of Japan (1905); Kaiten Nukariya, The Religion of the Samurai (London, 1913).

D.C.H.

JAPANESE TERMINOLOGY:

daibutsu: (Jap.) A large image of the Buddha, such as those found in Nara and Kamakura.

Dengyo Daishi: (Saicho, 767-822) Founder of the Tendai School in Japan. As a great scholar, he was sent by Imperial order to study Buddhism in China. After a sojourn of one year, he returned to spread the Tendai doctrine, Shingon mysticism, the Zen doctrine of meditation, and Vinaya practices.

Dogen: (1200-1253) Founder of the Soto Shu of Buddhism in Japan.

Eisai: (1141-1215) Founder of the Rinzai Shu of Buddhism in Japan.

Eison: (1201-1290) Founder of the New Disciplinary School of Buddhism in Japan.

Ekwan (Jap.), Hui-kuan (Chin.): A Korean priest, pupil of Chi-tsang, who introduced both the Satyasiddhi system and the Middle Doctrine of Buddhism into Japan in 625.

Honen: (1133-1212) Founder of the Jodo School of Buddhism in Japan.

Ingen: (1592-1673) Founder of the Obaku Shu of Buddhism in Japan.

Ippen: (1239-1289) Founder of the Ji Shu of Buddhism in Japan.

Koyasan: (Jap.) The Koya Mountain, center of the Shingon School in Japan.

nembutsu: (Jap.) "Thinking of Buddha", the name of the process of repeating Buddha's name and meditating on him.

Ryonin: (1071-1132) Founder of the Yuzunembutsu Sect of Buddhism in Japan.

Shinran: (1173-1262) Called Shonin or Saint. Disciple of Honen and founder of the Shin (Shu) of the Pure Land School in Japan; posthumous name, Kenshin Daishi, or "Seeing-truth Great-Master."

W.T.C.

The following terms are the Japanese equivalents for terms appearing under Buddhist Terminology: Amida: (Jap.) idem: Amita; bosatsu: (Jap.) idem: bodhisattva; Dai-nichi-nyorai: (Jap.) idem: Mahavairocana; Eno: (Jap.) idem: Hui-neng, see Meditation School; Hosso School: (Jap. Dharma Nature School) see Idealistic School, Buddhist; Jinshu: (Jap.) idem: Shen-hsiu see Meditation School, Jodo School: (Jap.) The Pure Land School founded by Honen; Jojitsu School: (Jap.) "Completion-of-Truth" School idem: Satyasiddhi School. Kegon School: (Jap. "Wreath" School) idem: Hua-yen School; koan. (Jap. public problem) see Meditation School; Kukai: (Jap.) name of Kobo Daishi; Kusha School: (Jap.) idem: Kosa School; Kwannon: (Jap.) idem: Avalokitesvara; Miroku: (Jap.) idem: Maitreya; Mondo: (Jap. question and answer) see Meditation School; Monju: (Jap.) idem: Manjusri; Ritsu School: (Jap.) idem: Disciplinary School; Sanron School: (Jap.) see Middle Doctrine School; satori: (Jap. enlightenment) see Meditation School; Shingon School. (Jap.) see Mystical School, Buddhist; Tomitsu: (Jap. Eastern Mystics) see Taimitsu and Mystical School, Buddhist.

The following Japanese terms will be found under Buddhist Terminology: Ji (Shu); Kobo Daishi, Nichiren; Obaku Shu; Rinzai Shu; Taimitsu; Tendai School; Yuzunembutsu Shu; Zen. Shu-shi· see Chinese Terminology.   w.t.c.

See under separate headings: Amaterasu-Omikami; Engi Shiki, gohei; Hachiman; harakiri; Inari, Izanagi, Izanami; jingu, jinja, kami; Kogoshui; Kojiki, Nihongi; norito; oharai; oho-harahi; Oyomei; samurai; seppuku; Shin Ritsu; Susano-o (no-Mikoto); Yamato-Damashii. Also see Buddhism; Japanese religions; Shinto religion and theology; temples, Far Eastern.

Jarrell Lectureship, The A. J.: Established by Charles C. Jarrell in 1916 at Emory University, Emory University, Georgia. The capital sum amounts now to about $5,000. It provides that "the lectures should be given by an outstanding or distinguished man or woman and should be in the field of practical Christianity or missionary theory and practice, or in the doctrines of the Holy Spirit, or in the field of higher ranges of Christian experience." A few outstanding lecturers and subjects are· Bishop Warren A. Candler, The Christ and the Creed; Halford E. Luccock, Christianity and the Individual in a World of Enemies; Henry Sloane Coffin, Religion Yesterday and Today; Bishop Paul B. Kern, Methodism has a Message; Bishop Arthur J. Moore, Central Certainties, and Bishop W. T. Watkins.

(Data from the office of the Dean of Candler School of Theology.)   v.f.

Jashar, Book of: See forgeries.

Jaspers, Karl: (1883-) Taught philosophy at Heidelberg 1916-38. Although he came to philosophy as a scientist and fresh from the study of psychopathology, Jaspers's main interest has been to work out the distinctive function of the one who philosophizes. His own philosophy is that of a subjective, introspective thinker who draws ideas out of his own intuitive insight and subjects them again and again to rigorous analysis and criticism. In his passion for sincerity he makes much of the limitations on all human thought and its necessary skepticism. Philosophy must pass first through Welt-orientierung or scientific discovery, then Existenz-erhellung, personal illumination or discovery of individual freedom in time, and finally Metaphysik or awareness of dependence on transcendental being. In its "existential" and personal character Jaspers's thought has resemblances to that of Heidegger,* but where Heidegger is a realist influenced by scholasticism Jaspers tends toward idealism and shows the influence of Protestantism and Kant. See Spranger, Eduard.

Chief works: Psychologie der Weltanschauungen (1919) ; Die geistige Situation der Zeit (1931), Eng. tr. Man in the Modern Age (1933) ; Philosophie, 3 vols. (1932) ; Vernunft und Existenz (1935) ; Nietzsche (1936) ; Existenzphilosophie (1938).

J.S.B.

jealousy: A resentful emotion arising from suspicion of the faithfulness of husband, wife or friend, or from apprehension that a rival is supplanting one in some cherished relationship. It may engender emulation or malevolence, more often the latter.   R.W.F.

Jehovah (Yahweh, Jahve): Jehovah was the personal name of the god of Israel, originally pronounced Yahweh (Jahve), (as is shown by Gr. transcriptions). When for the first time the vowels were inserted in the Heb. Bible in the 7th Cent. A.D., the vowels of the word "aDoNaY," "Lord," were written with the consonants YHWH to indicate that, for reasons of reverence, this word was to be substituted in reading aloud. The form "Jehovah" is a transliteration of the resulting hybrid, and first came into use in the 14th Cent. A.D. through the failure of Christian scholars to recognize the origin and purpose of the vocalization; it has now acquired by usage independent standing in Eng.

The name is found also in the shorter forms Yah (Exodus 15:2, etc.) and Yahu or Yeho (as element in names, and in Assyrian inscriptions and Aramaic papyri); an original Yaw has been conjectured, and tentatively identified among the divine names of the Ras Shamra* documents from Northern Phoenicia (15th Cent. B.C.). That the name was pre-Mosaic is implied by its revelation as new to Moses (Exodus 3:13-15; 6 4), that it was originally non-Israelite is stated in Gen. 4·26, cf. Josh. 24.14. It is held by some that Moses learned to worship Yahweh through his marriage to the daughter of a Kenite priest in Midian (Exodus 3.1 ff., 18:8-12,24) (Kenite Theory). The longer form YHWH is attested externally as early as the 9th Cent. B.C. on the Moabite Stone.* Its etymology from the root "to be" proposed by the writer of Exod. 3:14 is a rough approximation, since the roots are not identical; but it is significant as giving to this Israelite form of the name a distinctive meaning consonant with prophetic teaching "He (who) is what he will (choose to) be," or—"He (who) causes to be what exists (or, what happens)." See cosmogonies; high place; tetragrammaton.   R.B.Y.S.

Jehovah's Witnesses: See Russell, Charles Taze; Russelism; Millenial Dawn; Rutherford, J. F.

Jên: See Confucianism

Jeremiah: The Book of Jeremiah, a prophet who lived in the days of the decline and fall of the Kingdom of Judah, may be divided roughly into three parts· 1-25—prophecies primarily against Judah, 26-45—chiefly narratives about Jeremiah, 46-51—prophecies against foreign nations. Chapter 52 is a historical appendix taken from II Kings 24 18f. The section 46-51 is of minor interest and only a nucleus can be by Jeremiah, though he did regard himself as "prophet to the nations" (1 5). The authentic oracles of Jeremiah which were contained in Baruch's original scroll (referred to in 36 32) are doubtless among the materials of 1—25. There was another source, however, which reported the speeches of Jeremiah in a free, prosaic form. The passages preserved from this source—7:1f., 11 1f.; 18:1f.; 21.1f., 25 1f., 32 1f., 34 1f., 35.1f., 44 1f.—all have the same superscription. A third group of materials—19 1f. and the bulk of 26-44 deals only briefly, but likewise in prose, with what Jeremiah said, for the interest is focussed on the external happenings. Chapters 30-31 form a special collection of sayings the Jeremianic origin of which is debatable. The genuine (poetic) oracles of the prophet contain a great deal of invective. Unique are the so-called confessions of Jeremiah (11 18-23, 12 1-6, 15 10-21, 17:12-18, 18 18-23, 20 7-18) in which the personal relation existing between a prophet and his God receives unusual light. See Lachish Ostraca; Lamentations.

J. Skinner, Prophecy and Religion; Studies in the Life of Jeremiah (Cambridge, 1922), R H Pfeiffer, Introduction to the Old Testament (1941).

E.G.K.

Jeremiah II, the Patriarch: (1536-1595) Was one of the great personalities of the Greek Orthodox Church in the 16th century He is the author of the answers to the Augsburg Confession, which are the fundamental teachings of the Greek Church today. In reality he was a humanist, classical scholar and friend of the Lutheran Church. He was also the organizer of the Russian Church, spending more than five years in Russia. See Confessions, Formal of the Christian Church, Eastern Orthodox Churches.   G.E.Z.

Jericho: Also called City of Palms, fortified city of the lower Jordan valley, Palestine, captured and destroyed by the Israelites (Jos. vi) Rebuilt by Hiel of Bethel (I Kgs xvi, 34) and enlarged by Herod the Great. Scene of several Gospel pericopes (Lke x, 30, Mk. x, 46, Lke xix, 1 ff.). See F. M. Abel, Géographie de la Palestine, vol. ii (1938), pp. 357-360; J. Garstang, The Story of Jericho (1940).   S.L.T.

Jerome (ca. 347-420) Born at Stridon in Dalmatia. A visionary experience at Antioch in 374 determined him to devote himself to Biblical studies. He lived for a period in a monastic community in the Desert of Chalcis and then at Antioch and Constantinople. In 382 he went to Rome, but opposition to his monastic doctrines forced him to leave in 385. The following year he founded an establishment for monks and nuns at Bethlehem, where he spent the rest of his life. While at Rome, at the request of Pope Damasus, he revised the Latin NT by the use of Greek mss. This together with a new translation of the OT into Latin from the Hebrew, made at Bethlehem, became the official text of the Bible in the Western Church (the Vulgate*). Also the author of numerous Biblical commentaries and controversial works. See canon, Old and New Testament, intercession; versions of the Bible, ancient.   S.M.G.

Jerome of Prague: A Czech Wyclifite. Studied at Prague with Hus then in 1398 went to Oxford, became acquainted with Wyclif's* writings. In 1407 returned to Prague as an outspoken Wyclifite. Travelled all over Europe. Came to the Council of Constance* to assist Hus, but was imprisoned. At first recanting, later he manfully repudiated his weakness. Was burned at the stake on May 30, 1416.

Count Lutzow, Master John Hus (n.d.), 321 ff.   M.S.

Jerusalem: The chief city of Palestine and for the greater portion of the last three thousand years the capital or seat of administration of the country. Jerusalem is first mentioned, under the name Ursalimmu, in the Amarna letters of the fourteenth century B.C. It was then an important city-state in southern Palestine. But it must have been founded at a much earlier date, although there is no justification whatever for the popular tradition that Jerusalem is the oldest city in the world. In the earliest historic times it was the home-city of the Jebusites, a subdivision of the pre-Israelite inhabitants of Palestine. Despite its reputed impregnability, it was captured by David at about 1000 B.C. He renamed it "City of David" and made it the capital of his kingdom. Some forty years later Solomon* erected the Temple there. After the division of the Kingdom Jerusalem, under its old name, continued as the capital of the Southern Kingdom. It was captured by the Babylonians in 586 B.C., by the Romans in 70 A.D. and by the Moslems in 636 A.D. Because of its persisting religious associations Jerusalem is regarded by both Jews and Christians as their holiest city, while the Moslems esteem it as second only to Mecca and Medina in sanctity. See Judas Maccabeus.   J.M.

Jerusalem, Patriarchate of: The "mother of all churches," since here the earliest Christian communities were gathered. But despite its undoubted apostolic foundation, it was not granted the patriarchal rank until by the Council of Chalcedon* in 451, when Juvenal, by going over to the winning side, secured it, although even then it was the fifth in order. But upon his return, Patriarch Juvenal was repudiated by his people, and gained entry into the city only with the aid of the imperial army. The majority of the Christians of the newly created Patriarchate adopted Monophysitism,* and the Arab conquest of Palestine made the schism with the Chalcedonian church of the Empire permanent. At present, the Patri-archate is governed by a Greek hierarchy chosen exclusively from the Confraternity of the Holy Sepulchre. The native Christians resent this dominance by a handful of Greek monks, and it is likely that soon the control will pass to the natives.

Sir Anton Bertram and Harry C. J. Luke, Report of the Commission appointed by the Government of Palestine to Inquire into the Affairs of the Orthodox Patriarchate of Jerusalem (London, 1921).   M.S.

Jerusalem, Synod of: Held in 1672, was summoned by Patriarch Dositheus (1669-1707), and its chief act was the declaration of the Orthodox faith in which the assertion that Cyril Lucaris, patriarch of Constantinople (d. 1638) had been the author of the Calvinistic "Confession" is derived. Furthermore, had he written it, it would still not be the Confession of the Orthodox Church, but merely his own personal view. The decrees of this synod are given in the form of a "Confession of Dositheus" in which the Calvinistic views of the "Confession" ascribed to Cyril are refuted.

Philip Schaff, The Creeds of Christendom (3 vols., New York, 1919), II, 401 ff.   M.S.

Jesuits: (Society of Jesus) A Roman Catholic religious order, founded by St. Ignatius Loyola* and approved by Paul III in the bull Regimini militantis ecclesiae of September 27, 1540. When Loyola died in 1556 the order possessed one hundred and one houses and about a thousand members. It had spread to many parts of Europe, and foreign missions had been begun in the Portuguese Indian Empire and Japan under St. Francis Xavier,* and in South America and Africa. By 1550 Loyola had composed the Constitutions of the order, which aim at the advancement of the greater glory of God by the sanctification of the members and by work for the salvation of souls. Ad majorem Dei Gloriam (To the greater glory of God) is the motto of the order. The legislative power resides in the General Congregation, which usually meets only when a new General is to be chosen. The General has accordingly ordinary executive and judicial power and his tenure is for life. The members comprise priests, scholastics (candidates for the priesthood), and brothers. The Jesuits have no female branch and do not affiliate lay people. The spirit of the Society is that of the founder's Spiritual Exercises.

After 1556 the order increased rapidly in numbers and influence. In 1616 there were 13,112 members; in 1710, 19,978 and in 1749, 22,589. The order played an important rôle in the revival of Catholicism in Southern Europe in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. Leadership in the efforts made to bring the Protestants back to Rome was also partially in its hands. Many Jesuits were confessors to Catholic royalty. The Jesuit school of theology grew in influence with Vasquez,* Valencia, Lessius, Busenbaum and Suarez.* In philosophy the Jesuit school advanced a Christian Aristotelianism. Its dogmatic theology was tributary to fourteenth and fifteenth century Scholasticism and to the positive gains of the Renaissance as well as to Thomism. In moral theology the school was characterized by a moderate optimism in regard to man's moral capabilities. Jesuit foreign missions flourished especially in the Far East and in South America (Reductions*). In more than six hundred colleges the Society taught during the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries an élite of the Catholic youth of Europe. Sodalities* of the Blessed Virgin Mary were also sources of influence.

During the seventeenth century the opposition to the Society, which had never been wanting, grew in many places. In Europe the Jansenists* aimed at the destruction of the influence of Jesuit moralists in the Church. In the foreign missions the rise of Dutch and English sea power put an end to expansion, the fierce Japanese persecution all but wiped out one of the most promising missions, and controversies on missionary methods with other Catholic missionaries persisted. During the eighteenth century the Society was one of the leading defenders of Christian truth against the doctrines of the Enlightenment. In the second half of the century it fell a victim to the "enlightened" ministers of the Bourbon courts. Disbanded succesively in Portugal, France and Spain, the Society was suppressed throughout the world by a brief which had been extorted by the Bourbon courts from Clement XIV.* Catherine the Great of Russia refused to allow the brief to be published in her Polish dominions, and the Society survived there until its restoration. This survival was sanctioned by Pius VI as early as 1783.

Restored by Pius VII* in 1814, the Jesuit order again spread throughout the world despite continued attacks by various European governments. The Dutchman, John Philip Roothaan*, third General of the restored Society, was largely responsible for this rapid expansion. The revived Society has been distinguished by its work in education, spiritual retreats, and foreign missions. In 1939 it numbered 25,954 members in fifty provinces, of which seven were in the United States, seven vice-provinces, and forty-six missions throughout the world. See Ratio Studiorum; Chinese religions.

M. P. Harney, The Jesuits in History (1941); T. J. Campbell, The Jesuits (1921); J. Brucker, La Compagnie de Jésus (1919).   E.A.R.

Jesus: See Christ.

Jesus, Lives of: See Lives of Jesus.

Jesus, our knowledge of: Our knowledge of Jesus is largely dependent upon the Gospels,* particularly the Synoptics;* but these, unfortunately, are hagiography* rather than biography. Moreover, they are scarcely by eye-witnesses, but instead are the deposit of anonymous units of gospel tradition, mostly oral, that originated and had their growth during the first generation of Christians. Overlaid as it is with accretions of Christology,* Mariology, miracles, etiological explanations of the Christian cultus, martyrology, anti-Semitism, accommodations to OT prophecies, conformations to OT proto-types, apocalyptic* expectations, and Hellenistic intrusions, the authentic tradition about Jesus is uncovered with the greatest of difficulty. To add to the difficulties, our sources of information are at times in irreconcilable conflict (cf. the resurrection* narratives), or frequently narrow down to a single, uncorroborated line of evidence (e.g., Mark,* a major source of the other Gospels, is for the most part unsupported by parallel independent evidence). However, through the rigorous application of historical methodology to the sources (as has been done by scholars like Guignebert, Case, Dibelius, and Riddle) the following summary is presented without further explanation and with a fair degree of assurance.

Jesus was born in Galilee, possibly in Nazareth, the son of a certain Joseph, a Jewish artisan, and his wife Mary. In addition there were several other sons and daughters. There is no indication that the life of this Jewish family differed materially from that of other Galilean families similarly situated. Jesus probably worked at his father's trade until that fateful day when he heard John the Baptist* proclaim his stirring message of repentance and the imminence of the Kingdom of God.* Along with many others he accepted John's baptism as a sign of repentance and probably became one of his followers. When John was imprisoned by Herod Antipas, probably because this puppet ruler feared his growing popularity, as Josephus* suggests, Jesus began his independent mission (lasting less than a year) which was largely if not entirely confined to the lost sheep of the house of Israel. Adopting the message of John as his own, he went throughout Galilee proclaiming the gospel of repentance, religious and ethical righteousness, and the immediate advent of the Kingdom. The Gospels represent Jesus as the Messiah,* but there is reason to believe that he thought of himself as a prophet, like the Baptizer, heralding the approach of the Kingdom and preparing people for its arrival. Christian tradition also depicts Jesus as consciously founding the Christian church, but more probably he had no thought of any break with Judaism.* Likewise, he is credited with the institution of the sacrament of the Eucharist, but the accounts of the last supper* may well be etiological in character. Further, the Gospels represent him as both an exorcist driving out demons* from the sick and as a worker of miracles, but there is no compelling reason to believe that he was either; moreover similar exorcisms* and miracles* were credited to many persons of antiquity.

In his teachings, in which he used methods and forms not unlike those of his Jewish contemporaries, Jesus was in substantial agreement with the Pharisees* on such basic subjects as: God; Satan; angels and demons; inspiration of the written Torah* (Scripture); the nature of the Kingdom of God; sin, repentance; forgiveness; resurrection of the dead; rewards and punishments; and ethical conduct. Moreover, he was loyal to the chief institutions of Judaism such as the temple, the synagogue, the Passover, and even the Sabbath. There is no evidence that he abrogated the law of circumcision,* and little, save for a dubious passage, that he did away with the dietary laws—at least Paul* shows no knowledge of any cancellation of these laws by Jesus. Unlike the Pharisees, Jesus may have combined the apocalyptic hope with the Kingdom of God, but again the apocalypticism in the Gospels may be a later accretion. On the other hand, his laxity in certain observances; his neglect of regulations in the oral Torah (e.g., those specifying the precise manner in which the Sabbath should be observed); his association with sinners, the "lost," and the ritually unclean, and his urgent proclamation of the immediacy of the Kingdom may have brought him into conflict with some of the Pharisees.

Apparently Jesus, like John the Baptist, aroused the suspicions of Herod Antipas and left Galilee to escape John's fate. At length, accompanied by a group of loyal disciples, he went to Jerusalem, not to die but to proclaim the gospel of the Kingdom to the throng of worshipers there to celebrate the Passover. Although his entry into the city was probably unnoticed he soon attracted attention by his dramatic purging of the temple. This act, together with his teaching in the temple area, quite likely added to his popularity with the masses, but no doubt incurred the enmity of the Sadducean temple clique. Finally, Pontius Pilate, the Roman military governor, possibly fearing that this popular religious leader with his teaching about some kingdom other than Caesar's might become the center of a popular disturbance or revolt against Rome, arrested Jesus. Following a summary hearing, he was condemned and crucified as a criminal. With this tragic conclusion to his high hopes the story of Jesus ends. That which follows, including the resurrection appearances, the ascension, the belief of his followers that he would soon return as an apocalyptic Messiah, and the concept that he was Savior* and Lord, belongs to the realm of Christology. Admittedly this outline is both sketchy and unsatisfactory, but in the light of our present knowledge it must suffice.

A. Schweitzer, The Quest of the Historical Jesus (tr. from the German, 1911); C. C. McCown, The Search for the Real Jesus (1940); D. W. Riddle, "Jesus in Modern Research," Journal of Religion XVII (1937), pp. 170-183; S. J. Case, The Historicity of Jesus (1912); M. Dibelius, From Tradition to Gospel (tr. from the German, 1935); D. W. Riddle, The Gospels: Their Origin and Growth (1939); H. B. Branscomb, The Gospel of Mark (The Moffatt N. T. Commentary, n. d.); C. G. Montefiore, The Synoptic Gospels, 2 vols. (2d ed., 1927); B. T. D. Smith, The Parables of the Synoptic Gospels (1937); R. Bultmann, Jesus and the Word (tr. from the German, 1934); S. J. Case, Jesus: A New Biography (1927), M. Goguel, The Life of Jesus (tr. from the French, 1933); C. Guignebert, Jesus (tr. from the French, 1935). M.R.

Jesus Christ: The name Jesus (Yeshua, prb. an abbreviation of Yehoshua; same as Joshua) is the Greek equivalent of a common Jewish name in the first century; Christ is from the title Christos, meaning Anointed (the Greek translation of Aram. Meshicha—Heb. Mashiakh), which early became—even as early as the lifetime of St. Paul —more of a proper noun than a title.

Jesus Christ is the personal name of the Founder of the Christian religion. Several different approaches to his life and teaching are possible. A purely theological approach would begin with the idea of the Incarnation, according to which God, or rather the Son of God,* became incarnate, that is, took our flesh upon him and became man in Jesus of Nazareth. His life, therefore, was a succession of divine manifestations and his teaching had the oracular quality of the final proclamation of eternal truth. His purpose in coming into the world was to save the world from its sin and from death, the consequence of sin, in order fully to achieve this end, he founded the church to be the channel of divine grace and the repository and guardian of divine truth. This magnificent idea, which is the heart of the Catholic conception of Christianity, does not depend upon history or historical records for its support; it views the historical data mainly as confirming the appropriateness or congruity of the theological idea.

At the opposite extreme is the purely historical view, according to which Jesus was either a prophet or a chasid (i.e. a saint or holy man, who was also a healer and teacher) in Galilee early in the first century. He gathered about him a group of disciples, and the burden of his message was the coming Kingdom of God. He was put to death at Jerusalem by the Romans in the year 29 or 30. Convinced soon after his death that he had risen again from the dead as Messiah, his disciples began a movement within Judaism which resulted in the development of the Christian church. The records of Jesus' life are only the traditions preserved by his followers during this crucial period of strain and antagonism, resulting in the final expulsion of the Christians from the synagogues and the formation of the church as an independent religious organization. Meanwhile, Christianity had long-since crossed the borders of Judaism and was spreading in the Gentile world. Hence the traditions of the life and teaching of Jesus were influenced, in the second place, by conceptions and expectations inspired upon the Gentile mission field.

It is very important to grasp the full bearing of these divergent interpretations, and to understand the presuppositions from which they set out. Otherwise, modern NT research in this field may impress the reader as only a bewildering chaos of conflicting interpretations.

The sources for the life of Jesus are almost exclusively limited to the four gospels. Ancient Jewish and pagan authors alike disregarded it. The reference in Tacitus is undoubtedly authentic but tells us little. (On the gospels see art. "Gospel," also "Synoptic Gospels," and "Form Criticism"). The Fourth Gospel goes far towards justifying the theological view described above; although it contains an indubitable substratum of historical reminiscence, this has been largely overlaid by later theological interpretation and mystical exposition. The author aims to set forth the meaning Christ has come to have for him and the contemporary church, stating it in the dramatic form of a gospel. By contrast the synoptic gospels represent the tradition at a much earlier stage of development, but this does not mean that they contain no interpretation or exposition. Quite the contrary: interpretation was involved from the very beginning. Even in Mark, the earliest gospel, there is a theological element, reflecting, to some extent, the Pauline theology. The specific theories of the Gospel of Mark (such as the divine judgment upon the Jewish people which prevented them from recognizing and accepting Jesus as Christ, the similar blindness of the disciples, the parables as meant to conceal the truth from those outside, Jesus' secret Messiahship, his repeated announcement to his disciples that he was going to Jerusalem in order to die and rise again) have been followed by the later evangelists, though not without modification. It will not do simply to take Mark, the earliest gospel, and follow it uncritically. Every item in the evangelic tradition has to be examined and accepted or rejected upon its own merits.

The chronology of the life of Jesus is a very difficult subject, especially in view of the fact that neither Mark nor the oral tradition before him had any interest in chronology. The probability is that Jesus was born sometime before the death of Herod, that is, before 4 B.C., and that he died in the year 29 or 30. His ministry was probably longer than a year, though we can hardly insist that it must have been four years in length. It is not certain that the Gospel of John presupposes a four-year or even a three-year ministry, furthermore, it may be that certain chapters in the Gospel of John are out of proper order and need to be rearranged. The oldest formulated tradition in the gospels is undoubtedly the Passion Narrative, and this narrative presupposes that Jesus was put to death just before the Feast of Passover. The oldest tradition represents Jesus as a native of Nazareth. The later legend of his birth in Bethlehem was doubtless inspired by the dogmatic interpretation of the Old Testament. As Son of David and Messiah, he must have been born in Bethlehem, but the older tradition (Mark 6 1) represents Nazareth as his patris—birth place and home town.

As a Galilean, Jesus grew up in a district somewhat remote from the religious capital of Judaism, with its temple services, priestly hierarchy, Sanhedrin, and scribal schools. Galilee at the opening years of the first century was far less influenced by scribism than it was, say in the middle of the second century, after the two destructions of Jerusalem and the establishment of the rabbinic schools in Tiberias, Sapphoris, and elsewhere. This does not mean that Galilee was totally uninfluenced by the scribal or Pharisaic type of Judaism, but only that it was still 'Galilee of the Gentiles.' Here Jews were brought into closer contact with Gentiles and the rigorous exclusiveness and separatism taught by the scribes were less practicable.

Jesus grew up among the poor. He was himself a 'carpenter,' i.e. he practiced the craft of the peasant builder, joiner, or carpenter, making wooden doors, plows, window frames, etc. No doubt it was his experience as a youth growing up among the people, the 'Am ha-Aretz' who could not devote all their time to observance of the law and who lived in a certain amount of unavoidable contact with Gentiles—this experience, coupled with a profound understanding of the religious message of the OT, the Bible of his people, helps to explain the form taken by his own teaching later on.

The sudden appearance of a prophet, John the son of Zacharias, was like a trumpet call to his generation. Among the many who responded to John's preaching was Jesus of Nazareth. He must indeed have been baptized (or baptized himself, as the custom was) at the bidding of John, for the Christian tradition would never have manufactured this incident. The story of his temptation which follows is replete with apocalyptic imagery and may be chiefly symbolical. It is the story of the ordeal of the Messiah, how, that is, Jesus must have faced the problems of his ministry. The presupposition of the story is Jesus' consciousness of his own Messiahship. This presupposition, natural enough in the early church, is widely questioned today. Undoubtedly Jesus was conscious of a divine call, at least as strong and clear as that of any of the OT prophets. Moreover, the characters portrayed in this role (the Messiah enduring his temptations and triumphing over the tempter) is the character of Jesus Christ as known and adored by his followers he refuses to resort to miracle, sign, or prodigy, even for his own self-protection or for the advancement of his cause.

Although it is possible to combine the Fourth Gospel with the other three, by assuming a Judean ministry preceding the ministry in Galilee, the data are not specific enough to warrant such a combination. It is not at all improbable that Jesus' ministry included Judea as well as Galilee, but this must remain a probability rather than a certainty. As we see him pictured in the synoptic gospels, he is surrounded by great crowds of people who come to him for healing and in order to hear his Gospel of the Kingdom. As represented in Mark, an initial period of success is followed by one of failure and eventually Jesus leaves Galilee and moves to Jerusalem to die. But the tradition itself seems to protest against this Marcan "pragmatism" Jesus is still accompanied by loyal and enthusiastic supporters as he journeys southward and as he enters the city at the Triumphal Entry. The probability is that after a long-continued ministry among the people, running into many months, possibly extending over some years—at least two—Jesus was seized by the authorities when he went to Jerusalem for a Passover observance and was handed over to the Romans to be put to death as a dangerous agitator and insurrectionist (Luke 23.2, 5). The journeys of Jesus can no longer be traced on a map, but there is no doubt that there were many more such journeys than the old-fashioned maps ever depicted. He was a man of the people, at home among them, and he knew how to appeal to their better nature (Mark 3 31-35). It was among the poor that he expected to see the beginnings of the realized Kingdom of God (Luke 6.20-26). Although he did not begin by attacking the law or it, interpretation by the scribes, he was fully aware of the inadequacy of the law, especially as expounded by the scribes and practiced by the Pharisees. His criticism, therefore, went farther than mere criticism of scribal interpretation. The law itself was subject to limitations and imperfections, from his point of view.

In view of the hopeless political outlook for Judaism, Jesus' teachings regarding non-resistance had an added urgency. It was the best common sense in the world for the Jews to renounce political ambition and especially their old apocalyptic dream of world domination. If only they had followed this counsel, their history might have been far different, from that day to this! But Jesus' teaching regarding non-resistance to evil (or rather of non-resentment and of cooperation with persecutors, in spite of their mistreatment) has a deeper religious basis than political common sense; for Jesus taught that God is the Father of all men and that they are brothers in the one great human family. Passages in the gospels which seem to point in the opposite direction are probably assignable, upon other grounds, to a strain of tradition affected by ultra-Judaistic groups in Jerusalem in the 40s and 50s. In the Kingdom of God, the character of those who are its members must correspond to the character of the King, that is, God (Matt. 5 43-48). Admission to the Kingdom is restricted to the humble, penitent, and child-like in heart. The proud, the violent, the self-assertive, and the self-righteous have no place in it. This was the gospel Jesus preached to the common people of Galilee, who heard him gladly.

He did not proclaim himself as Messiah nor did he undertake to gather a group of followers whom he could lead in a revolt against the Roman authority. It is clear from the tradition of the question about the tribute money (Mark 12.13-17), whatever its full meaning, that Jesus did not teach or encourage active resistance against the Romans.

As his influence grew and spread farther among the people, the authorities, both ecclesiastical and political, became suspicious, and when he went to Jerusalem for the Passover, he was seized, taken before the high priests for a secret examination, and in the morning was denounced before Pilate as a dangerous agitator and insurrectionist. The story of the last days of Jesus is of course told from the Christian point of view and was never looked upon as a documentary account of the proceedings. It is a question whether or not any of the disciples or other early Christians had personal recollection of what transpired in the high priests' court. What we are told in the Marcan Passion Narrative is probably either hearsay or inference. Hence, it is difficult to maintain the traditional view that Jesus claimed, in the presence of the high priest and his satellites, to be either the Messiah or the Son of Man* who was expected to come upon the clouds of heaven (Mark 14·61-62). At any rate, this was not the charge against him before Pilate. Before Pilate he was represented as claiming to be "King of the Jews," a title commonly assumed by revolutionists of that time, as we learn from Josephus.

Thus, in spite of his gospel of non-resistance, and the gentle manner of his dealing with others, Jesus was put to death upon a trumped-up charge. The only possible justification for the charge against him was the so-called cleansing of the temple, following the Triumphal Entry into Jerusalem, (Mark 11:1-19) But this was the act of a religious reformer and could only be represented as a threat of revolution by completely misinterpreting the incident.

According to the gospels, the life of Jesus did not come to an end with his crucifixion; the climax of the life of Christ was his triumph over death in his resurrection* and exaltation as heavenly Messiah. This conviction characterizes all later Christianity. The life of Jesus was no tragedy, and that character reflected in his teaching and in his personal life, which Christians recognize as the supreme revelation of God, is, we are convinced, destined to go on, "conquering and to conquer." It will, in fact, be the final test by which all mankind shall be judged (Matt. 25 31-46). This quality of life, this spirit, this mind, which is seen in Christ Jesus our Lord (Phil. 2 5), is the unique and distinctive thing about him and is the point at which a modern Christology must begin. For the primitive church it was not the historical Jesus but the spiritual Christ, the Lord of his community, the church, which was all important. This view pervades the whole NT, and is found even in the historical books. See Christology; Saviour.

See M Goguel, The Life of Jesus, E. tr. (1933); S. J. Case, Jesus, A New Biography (1927); O. Holtzmann, The Life of Jesus, E. tr. (1904); J. Klausner, Jesus of Nazareth (1925); B H. Branscomb, Jesus and the Law of Moses (1930); The Teachings of Jesus (1931); E. F Scott, The Ethical Teaching of Jesus (1924); H. N. Wilder, Eschatology and Ethics in the Teaching of Jesus (1939); J. Knox, The Man Christ Jesus (1941); R. Bultmann, Jesus and the Word, E. tr. (1935), B. S. Easton, What Jesus Taught (1938); F. C. Grant, The Gospel of the Kingdom (1940).   F.C.G.

Jesus, Society of: See Jesuits.

Jesus, the son of Sirach: Name of the author of a well known and oft cited Jewish aprocryphal work, commonly known as Ecclesiasticus, but not infrequently cited by the name of its author. It is similar in content and spirit to the biblical books, Proverbs and Ecclesiastes, and like them belongs to the so-called Jewish Wisdom Literature.* The book was written originally in Hebrew about 180 B.C., and was translated into Greek by the grandson of the author. The entire work is preserved only in this Greek translation, but near the beginning of the present century quite extensive portions of the original Hebrew were discovered in the storechamber of an ancient synagogue in Egypt. See apocrypha, Old Testament.   J.M.

Jewish: See Judaism.

Jewish Christianity: The original members of the church were Jews, and observed the Law in addition to faith in Christ. Paul, to whom faith alone was sufficient, found himself in opposition to this Jewish Christianity. In Palestine the Law was never abandoned, and there were many Jews of the Dispersion who continued to hold to it, and who occasionally made converts among the Gentiles.* No sharp line, however, can be drawn between Jewish and Gentile Christianity, except in the one matter of observance of the Law. See Ebionism; Judaizers, Nazarenes.   E.F.S.

Jewish New Year: See New Year, Jewish.

Jewish philanthropy: See social work of the churches.

Jewish religious festivals: Because of Israel's long history and the successive stages of cultures through which it passed one expects a great deal of syncretism in observance. The Sabbath and New Moon are very ancient holydays and the former always occupied first place in the calendar. The Pilgrim festivals of Passover,* Weeks, and Tabernacles,* combine nature, historical, moral and religious features. The first will serve as illustration. In it are united the shepherd festival of sacrifice of part of the flock, the paschal lamb (in very ancient days we learn of a sheep-shearing celebration), the eating of the unleavened cakes in commemoration perhaps of the grain (barley) harvest and the redemption from Egypt and the moral lessons of the Providence of God in history and the great boon of freedom. Exodus 23 and Levit. 23 give a list of some of the feasts. Weeks commemorates the wheat harvest and the giving of the decalogue and Booths, the ingathering (Ex. 23 16; 34·22) at the end of the year of the produce and the fact that Israel once dwelt in tents. Out of the transitional period between the end of the old and the beginning of the new, emerged the actual New Year's* Day and the later very solemn day of Atonement.* This whole period is called the penitential season. The Feast of Dedication celebrates the Maccabean victory and the re-institution of the cult in and the cleansing of the Temple that the Syrians had defiled. The feast of Lots and the Fast of Esther which precedes it mark the deliverance from extermination of the Jews of Persia. The ninth day of Ab* recalled with mourning laments the destruction of the two great sanctuaries at Jerusalem.

List of Festivals

Sabbath—Seventh Day Sundown to sundown.

Passover (Pesach)—Nisan 15-22. Four middle days semi-festive. Reform Jews observe first and seventh.

Weeks (Shabuot)—Swan 6-7. Reform Jews observe first day only.

Ninth of Ab (Tishab' Ab)—Ab 9. Not observed by Reform Jews.

New Year (Rosh ha-Shana)—Tishri 1-2. First day only by Reform Jews.

Atonement (Yom ha Kippurim)—Tishri 10.

Tabernacles (Sukkot)—Tishri 15-20. Middle days—semi-festive, first day and eighth day observed by Reform Jews instead of first and second and eighth and ninth. See following.

(Hoshana Rabbo)—Tishri 21. Great Hosanna—not observed by Reform Jews.

(Sh'mini Azeret)—Tishri 22. Solemn Assembly—Combined with next by Reform Jews.

(Simchat Torah)—Tishri 23. Rejoicing of Law—not observed by Reform Jews.

For Eight Days—Kislev 25. Dedication (semi-holyday).

(Ta'anit Esther, Purim)—Adar 14, 15. Fast of Esther (not observed by Reform Jews) and Feast of Lots (semi-holyday).

Minor Festivals· New Moon, Minor Day of Atonement (fast day before each new moon), Lag-Bo-omer, 15th day of Shebat and 15th day of Ab (Midwinter and Midsummer Days, the latter an Arbor Day) and others, including some celebrations purely local. None kept by Reform Jews.

Hayyim Schauss, The Jewish Festivals (1938).   F.A L.

Jewish socialism: Among those who eminently contributed to the success of the modern Socialist movement, the Jews rank high. The perennial prophetic and rabbinic traditions of social justice, coupled with the various social disabilities they experienced, prompted many of them to join radical equalitarian movements They supplied leaders to the socialist parties greatly beyond their numerical proportion. Overeager to accomplish the reign of justice, zealous in devotion to learning, extreme in logical clarity, possessing remarkable oratorical and dialectical aptitudes, organizing ability, compelling power of persuasion, delighting in sacrifice for realization of great ideas, love for the poor and weak, all these qualities combined tended to make the Jews understand the power of their ethnic tradition, and enabled them to become leaders of the unconscious strivings and aimless rebellion of the masses. Attachment to religion, family, and property tends to make the Jew conservative, but the prophets and Jesus are examples that stamp them as hereditary revolutionaries. The strong communal responsibility, permeating the ghetto, also stimulated opposition to anarchical liberalism.

During the last century there has been no social movement of any importance in which the Jews failed to play a not insignificant part, whether these movements were radical and antistate, or conservative, pro-government and nationalistic. Classic examples of the former were Marx and Lasalle; of the latter, Disraeli and F. J. Stahl, the latter being the greatest theorist of German Junkerdom. To what political party the Jew belongs depends largely on local situations of the different countries. Jews are absent from the ranks of the British communist and independent labor parties. A few joined the moderate wings of the Labor party. Due to their class position, they either belong to the Conservatives or Liberals. One may find them at the head of movements which marshal against one another the nationalities animated by a reciprocal hate. Daniel Main, Gambetta, E. Simson, Bamberger and Lasker are typical. They often constitute the advance guard of almost all of the strongly nationalist parties (German Bohemians, Italian irridentists, Polish and Hungarian nationalists).

Jewish leadership has assumed conspicuous importance in the labor movements of Germany, Austria, and Russia. In Germany Karl Marx* and Ferdinand Lasalle were foremost; in Austria Victor Adler, Max Adler, Adolf Braun, etc.; in Russia Leon Martov, Rosa Luxemburg, and Leon Trotzky. Marx, the founder of "scientific socialism," was mentally, no less than biologically, a true descendent of a long line of rabbis.

In all western countries, the Jewish socialist leaders were the spokesmen of the general, not the Jewish, proletariat. At times they merely rationalized the grievances of the persecuted, ethnic minority, into the protest of all oppressed classes. There was practically until the 1890's no Jewish working class west of Poland. In Russia the growing Jewish proletarian masses, suffering both as working men and as Jews, were even more inclined to join radical movements than their fellow-workers among the Christians. Their Jewish consciousness usually led them to organize separate Jewish socialist parties, which, in time, assumed a definitely nationalistic tinge.

Major contributions of the Jews to western socialism were the work of individuals rather than of the masses. Socialism did not become a major force in the Jewish world until the last half century. The constructive theoretical and practical contributions made by the Jews to European socialism enhanced its prestige. The myth that the Russian communist revolution is a Jewish attempt at world domination overlooks the numerous Jewish opponents of Bolshevism. The German and Rusisan socialists maintained a consistent attitude of combating anti-Semitism, which often raised its head in their own midst. The German Socialist Democratic party repeatedly condemned as reactionary all anti-Semitic tendencies. A similar stand was taken by the Russian communists. The Soviet government alone succeeded in suppressing all anti-Semitic outbreaks.

Lenin as far back as 1903-05 waged war against the major Jewish and non-Jewish socialist organizations. Even in 1917 the majority of Russian Jewish socialists were gathered under the flag of the Bund, the Poale Zion, Socialist Zionists, etc. All these organizations were soon outlawed as counter-revolutionary. Jewish radical communists were the chief opponents of nationalistic Zionism, denouncing the Palestine ideal as reactionary and bourgeois. Even before World War I socialist ideologies permeated the entire Zionist movement. In the special Zionist labor parties, the socialist idea, in combination with Zionism, achieved its greatest fruition. The Poale Zion took shape in 1900-05, made its greatest strides in the period of the 1905-06 Russian Revolution, when it encountered opposition by the newly organized Zionist socialist (SS) party, which had a pronounced territorial program. After World War I the Poale Zion hopelessly split into a multitude of intramural divisions. Notwithstanding the many warring camps the labor elements became decisive in the reconstruction of Palestine under the Mandate. See dialectic, socialism.

Main references. R Michels, Political Parties (1915); A. Tartakower, A History of the Jewish Labor Movement (Yiddish) (Warsaw, 1929-31); H Burgin, The History of the Jewish Labor Movement in America, Russia and England (Yiddish) (1915); W Preuss, Die jüdische Arbeiterbewegung in Palästina, 2 vols (Berlin, 1932-33); A. Yarmolonsky, Jews and Other Minor Nationalities under the Soviets (1928).   H.H.

Jewish theology and religion: See Israel, religion and theology; Judaism.

Jewish theological schools: See theological schools, Jewish.

jihad or jehad: (Arabic jihad, struggle, contest) A religious war of Moslems against unbelievers, taught as a duty in the Koran* and traditions. Also a war or crusade for or against some doctrine or principle.   P.E.J.

jingu: (Lit. "God Palace.") A Shinto shrine of special dignity.   D C.H.

jinja: (Lit. "God House.") A Shinto shrine.
                                                                        D.C.H.

jinn: (Arabic collective plural for demons, spirits, angels. Singular jinni, or in English genie) In Mohammedan demonology, an order of spirits lower than the angels with power to appear in human or animal forms, and to exercise supernatural influence.   P.E.J.

jnana marga: The way of knowledge. One of the three major ways of attaining salvation in Hinduism. The kind of knowledge required for salvation differs in various branches of Hinduism. See salvation, Hindu.   C.S.B.

Joachim of Fiore: (c. 1145-1202) Born at Celico (Calabria), brought up at court of Duke Roger of Apulia. On a pilgrimage to the Holy Land the death by plague of companions led to adopting the ascetic life as a Cistercian. Later he founded an abbey under still stricter rules (approved by Innocent III, 1204).

A commentator of Scripture and theologian of note, he is famous for Concordia novi et veteris Testamenti, Expositio in Apocalypsin Psalterium decem chordarum, Concordia Evangeliorum contra Judaeos, De Articulis fidei, Confessio fidei, De Unitate Trinitatis. Numerous spurious works have been attributed to him, owing to his extraordinary influence.

His major theme was that which came to be called "The Eternal Gospel". He dividad all history into three parts: 1) The Age of the Father (Law); 2) The Age of the Son (Gospel) which includes the history of the hierarchical church; and 3) The Age of the Holy Ghost in which monasticism will be universal, whose character will be contemplative, and in which there will be no need of the discipline of the church. This third age was popularly called The Eternal Gospel.

The Joachimites, his spiritual heirs, were particularly numerous among the Spiritual Franciscans* who held that the new age had begun with St. Francis. Among critics of Joachim's writings was Thomas Aquinas. In 1260 a Council at Arles condemned his writings. He is described as one of the blessed in Dante's Paradise, as "endowed with prophetic spirit" (Paradiso XII 140 f.).

H. C. Lea, History of the Inquisition of the Middle Ages (1888), vol. III, Ch. I.; Catholic Encyclopedia, "Joachim of Fiore."   Q.B.

Joachimites: See Joachim of Fiore.

Joan of Arc: (1412-1431) Born in Domrémy, of farmer stock (her father was a leading man in the village), she grew up in a desperate time for France in its war with England whose ally was Burgundy. Apparently a normal, though grave, child, at thirteen she received voices and visions (St. Michael, St. Catherine, and St. Margaret) which by 1428 commanded her to deliver her country. Assuming male attire, she by persistence overcame the reluctance of army leaders and courtiers, and after being examined by theologians was commissioned by the king. Between April and July of 1429 she routed the English from Orléans, captured Troyes, and saw Charles VII crowned at Rheims (July 17). Her fortunes began to wane with her failure to relieve Paris, the continuous opposition at court, and finally with her capture (at Compiègne) by a Burgundian who sold her to the English. Pierre Cauchon, bishop of Beauvais (pro-Burgundian who had been expelled from captured Beauvais) instituted proceedings for heresy against her at Rouen; which was a subtler and for a time more effective way of discrediting Charles than killing Joan outright. The trial is infamous for treachery, bigotry, and cruelty, in which the University of Paris played a regrettable part. Joan's good sense and candor (on all but the visions) in her responses have added to her fame. The 70 propositions, condensed to 12, included condemnation of her male attire, of her voices and visions as "false and diabolical", and particularly her alleged responsibility to God alone and not the church. After a momentary and perhaps confused retraction Joan was tricked into relapsing into "heresy". She was burned at the stake May 30, 1431. In 1450 began attempts at réhabilitation which ended in 1456 in a complete reversal of the judgment of 1431. She was beatified in 1909 and canonized in 1920.

Jules Quicherat, Procès de Condamnation et de réhabilitation de Jeanne d'Arc (5 vols., Soc. de l'histoire de France, 1849); A. France, Vie de Jeanne d'Arc (1907); A. Lang, The Maid of France (1908); A. B. Paine, Joan of Arc (1927); G. B. Shaw, St. Joan (1924), a vital drama, with an understanding Preface.   Q.B.

Job: Formerly considered a very ancient book because of its patriarchal background, it is now regarded as among the younger elements of the O.T. (probably fourth century B.C.). It belongs to the "wisdom literature"* but not as typically as Proverbs*. Edomite* or Arabian origin has been urged, but without sufficient reason. It reflects the crisis into which religiously oriented Hebrew wise men were thrown when their optimistic philosophy, which operated with a belief in the doctrine of divine retribution, was upset by the spectacle of undeserved suffering. The book develops this situation in such a way that the legendary hero, who is made to typify an afflicted wise man, maintains his belief in his righteousness and in his vindication by God, through chapter 19. The original intent of the climactic 19:25-27 is the hope of a vindication before death. At this point all viewpoints are exhausted and the rehabilitation of Job is really in order. A considerable literary problem is created by the third cycle of speeches which is not only incomplete but confused. Rearrangements are often attempted but are futile. Chapter 21, unlike chapters 3-19, portrays a sceptical Job who is made to reverse himself and praise the divine wisdom in chapter 28 and then, after a swan song and oath of clearance (30-31) basically parallel to the Job speeches of 3-19 in spirit, is unnecessarily reproved by a fresh contender Elihu (32-37), and finally by God Himself (38-39), who makes Job recant. There is thus a sharp cleavage between the earlier (3-19) and the succeeding portions of the book. Materials of a different provenance have apparently been joined to an "original" dialogue and then disrupted and repeatedly counteracted. Chapters 28, 32-37, 38-39 thus represent accretions (though many scholars who "restore" the third cycle of speeches attempt to hold chapter 38 f.). The prologue and epilogue are also composite. In 1-2.10 we have the torso of an older (8th century?) narrative about Job. In 2 11-13, abridged at the beginning, and 42 79, we have the real "framework narrative" of the original dialogue. Chapter 42:10-17 contains supplementary material partly redactional, partly independent tradition. In effect, the book overcomes the doctrine of retribution from which many of the Psalmists also suffer. Esthetically "Job" is the supreme production of Hebrew literary genius. Cf. Davidson, A. B.

Cf. E. G. Kraeling, The Book of the Ways of God (1939) for full bibliography; R. H. Pfeiffer, Introduction to the Old Testament (1941).   E.G.K.

Jodl, Friedrich: (1848-1914) Was professor at the German university in Prague, Bohemia, then at the University of Vienna. Following the positivists Stuart Mill, Feuerbach and Comte, he projected a new religion of national culture. He upheld the humanistic formula· the idea in us and faith in the realization of the same by us.

Volkswirtschaftslehre und Ethik (Berlin, 1886); Religion, Moral und Schule (Berlin, 1892); Wesen und Ziele der ethischen Bewegung in Deutschland. 3 ed. (Frankfort a. M., 1909), Geschichte der Ethik. 3 rev. ed. (Stuttgart, 1920); Wissenschaft und Religion (Wien, 1909), Der Monismus und die Kulturprobleme (Leipzig, 1911).   H.H.

Joel: A master poem, written in the third or fourth centuries B.C., telling of a devastating locust plague which had wasted Palestine. From 2·28 (3:1 in Hebrew) to the end are a series of appended supplements by other writers, mostly militant nationalists and eschatologists*. Interpolations by the Day of Yahweh* Editor within chs. 1-2 try to convert the plague description into a prophecy of God's judgment day. Joel simply recounted, with brilliant poetic imagery, the descent of the plague, ensuing devastation of fields, orchards, and vineyards, summoning of everyone to day of fasting and prayer, final departure of locusts, restored fertility, and then the great thanksgiving for deliverance. See The Prophets and their Times by J. M. P. Smith and W. A. Irwin (1941), pp. 280-85.   R.E.W.

Jogues, St. Isaac: (1607-1646) French Jesuit, heroic missionary to the Hurons and Iroquois. Martyred by the latter at Auriesville, N. Y., on October 18, 1646.   E.A.R.

Johanan ben Zakkai: Leading Tana*, or teacher, at the time of the destruction of the Temple* (70 C.E.). He was the youngest pupil of Hillel* and was characterized by the latter as the "father of wisdom" Johanan, sensing that Jerusalem would be destroyed, obtained permission from Vespasian to open an academy at Jabneh where he gathered most of the scholars of his day. In this manner he saved Judaism from disintegration. All the prominent teachers of the next generation were his pupils.
          E.B.—L.F.

Johannine problem: Primarily, the problem of identifying the author of the Fourth Gospel; in a larger sense it is the question whether or not a single author produced the Fourth Gospel, the three Johannine Epistles, and the Apocalypse of John; also whether or not this author can be identified with John the son of Zebedee. The general consensus of Protestant scholarship today is that the author of the Fourth Gospel can hardly be the son of Zebedee, although the tradition underlying the Gospel may in some way be connected with that apostle; the first epistle is probably by the author of the Gospel; Epistles II and III are probably by the 'Elder' John; the Apocalypse is an entirely different type of work by some early Christian apocalyptist who used some older Jewish and Christian material but can scarcely have been one of the apostles. Style, thought, diction, and theology of these various books provide the basis upon which the modern view of diverse authorship is supported. See John, Gospel of.
          W. F. Howard, The Fourth Gospel in Recent Criticism and Interpretation (1931), supplemented by J. H. Scammon; "Studies in the Fourth Gospel, 1930-1941", in Anglican Theological Review 23.2 (April, 1941).
          F.C.G.

John: This was a common Jewish name, and was borne by three or perhaps four men who appear in the N. T.: 1) a kinsman of the high-priest, mentioned incidentally in Ac. 4:6; 2) John, surnamed Mark, the nephew (or cousin) of Barnabas, and author, in whole or in part, of the Gospel of Mark; 3) John the son of Zebedee, one of the four original disciples, later one of the three "pillars" of the church at Jerusalem, and the reputed author of the Fourth Gospel; 4) the seer of Revelation, who was possibly John the elder, a leader of the Asian church in the closing years of the first century.   E.F.S.

John the Baptist: The Gospels all begin with an account of the ministry of John, and the circumstances of his birth are recounted by Luke in a long chapter, based, most probably, on documents preserved among John's followers. The N.T. record is supplemented by Josephus* (Ant. xxii), who is highly appreciative of John, although of Jesus he says nothing. John was the son of a priest, Zacharias, and was born, according to Lk., some months before Jesus. In his early manhood he retired into the wilderness beyond Jordan, where he lived a solitary, ascetic life. In the year 28 A.D. he came forward as a prophet, announcing the approach of the Kingdom of God, and calling on the people to repent. It is evident, from the fragments of his teaching preserved to us, that by repentance he meant little more than practical amendment, as contrasted with mere legal piety. To those who thus repented he offered his rite of baptism, which carried with it divine forgiveness, and ensured entrance into the Kingdom. From his practice of this rite he was known as the Baptiser,—a name by which he is designated by Josephus, as well as in the N.T. The whole nation acclaimed him as a new Prophet, and multitudes thronged to him in the wilderness to receive his baptism. Among them was Jesus. The arrest of John took place in the interval between the baptism of Jesus and the opening of his ministry. According to the Gospels John had excited the anger of Herod Antipas by denouncing his incestuous marriage. This may have been a contributory motive, but Josephus is no doubt right in his statement that Herod arrested him "lest his influence with the people might lead to a revolt". Josephus may also be trusted when he proceeds to tell that John was secretly put to death, by order of the king, in the fortress of Machaerus. The account of his murder at the royal banquet appears to be one of the popular legends which grew up around the Herodian family. John is represented in the Gospels as the conscious forerunner of Jesus, but it may be gathered, from notices in the Gospels themselves, that his interest in Jesus was only awakened when he heard during his imprisonment of the activities of the new Prophet. In so far as he foretold the Messiah it was only incidentally, when he described the Kingdom, in apocalyptic* fashion, as ushered in by a terrible Judge who would destroy the wicked. He prepared the way for Jesus by creating a religious revival which made the people responsive to Jesus' message. He also vitalised the apocalyptic hopes to which Jesus appealed, and connected them with ethical demands. Otherwise his work was of a different order from that of Jesus, and was by no means merged in it. During Jesus' ministry the disciples of John continued to be a distinct body, and gave rise to a sect which maintained itself alongside of the Christian church.

We hear of it in the second century as one of the recognized Jewish sects, and there is reason to believe that a controversy with it underlies the Fourth Gospel. It has been suggested that the Mandaean Community, which still survives, had its origin in the sect of John, but this is more than doubtful.

Foakes Jackson & Lake, Beginnings of Christianity (1920) Vol. I; D. Buzy, Jean Baptiste (1922).

E.F.S.

John Baptist de La Salle: See La Salle, St. John Baptist de.

John, Epistles of: The second and third of these Epistles are short personal notes, the first is of some length and of the highest religious value. They are all written in the style of the Fourth Gospel, and occasionally repeat its phrases and ideas. This similarity has sometimes been set down to imitation on the part of a later writer, but the 1st Epistle is so excellent and so original that this is hardly possible. It was occasioned by the secession from the church of some of its members who held views of a Docetic nature. They prided themselves on superior piety and intelligence, and those who remained had become doubtful of their own more conservative beliefs. John offers them three tests by which they may know whether the true Christian life is in them,—the tests of doctrine, of conduct and of love. In his application of these tests, and particularly of the last one, John penetrates more deeply perhaps than any other writer, into the inner meaning of the Christian religion. The 2nd and 3rd Epistles are concerned almost wholly with the question of visiting missionaries. They illustrate the transition from an itinerant to a local ministry, and for this reason have a great historical interest. On the date and authorship of the Epistles of John, see John, Gospel of.

A. E. Brooks, The Epistles of John (ICC, 1912); C. R. Dodd, The Epistles of John (In preparation).

E.F.S.

John, Gospel of: Since the latter part of the second century, and perhaps earlier, this Gospel has been one of the canonical four, although it is obviously different in character from the others. It aims not merely at recounting the history of Jesus but at disclosing its deeper significance, with the aid of conceptions derived, in large measure, from Alexandrian philosophy. These are briefly set forth in the Prologue (1:1-18); then follows the Gospel proper (1:19-20.31). The closing chapter (21) is of the nature of an appendix, and is the work of editors, who take care to distinguish themselves from the author. The Gospel appears to fall into three parts, in accordance with the idea that Christ drew to himself out of the world those whom God had chosen. (cf. 1:10, 11; 3 19-21; 11:52). In the first part (chs. 1-6) Jesus offers himself to men, and they waver in their judgment, in the second (7-12) his friends and his enemies draw gradually apart; in the third (13-20) he is fully accepted by "his own", and is crucified by the unbelieving world. Throughout the Gospel the history moves on two planes, the record of the earthly life suggesting what Jesus would be forever in the experience of his people. This double interest accounts for the apparent mingling of historical fact with free invention. John is by no means indifferent to facts. At some points, and most notably in his story of the Passion, he is more accurate than the Synoptists, and perhaps had before him a brief early document of great value. But he seeks to weave into the facts of history those spiritual facts which to his mind were equally real. Critical questions of great difficulty are involved in the study of this Gospel. The date of the Gospel of John and of the Epistles of John I, II, III is about 100 A.D.,— possibly several years earlier. The Gospel and the Epistles are almost certainly by the same author. Few scholars would now accept the traditional view that he was the Apostle John, and attempts have been made to identify him with one eminent teacher or another. He lived, however, in a period of which we have practically no record, and his name will probably never be recovered. See gospel and the gospels, Johannine problem; logos.

A. Loisy, Le Quatrième Evangile (1921); G. H. C. MacGregor, The Gospel of John (1929); H. L. Jackson, The Problem of the Fourth Gospel (1918); E. F. Scott, The Purpose and Theology of the Fourth Gospel (1906).

E.F.S.

John XXII: (Pope, 1316-1334) Aggressive Pontiff of the Avignon period best known for his long struggle with the Emperor Louis the Bavarian and his attack on the Franciscan* interpretation of poverty. He crushed the Spirituals and won the Order as a whole from the Minister General, Michael of Cesena*, who, with William of Ockham*, had supported Louis. Administratively, John remodeled the curia and greatly extended the financial exactions of the papacy. See Sabbatine privilege.

R.C.P.

John, sect of: See John the Baptist.

John of Antioch: See Chrysostom.

John of the Cross, Saint: (1542-91) Spanish Carmelite* mystic of the counter-reformation period and perhaps the greatest writer on mystical theology which the Roman Catholic Church has ever produced. He shared with Saint Teresa* of Avila the founding of the Discalced Carmelites and suffered even more than she in the persecution which that reform aroused. His Dark Night of the Soul and Ascent of Mount Carmel are among the great mystical treatises of all time.

New Edition of the Works of St. John of the Cross (London, 1934-5), edited by Allison Peers; Bede Frost, St. John of the Cross (1937).

D.V.S.

John of Damascus: Born of Arab stock about 700 A.D.; a strong defender of image* worship, which he held to be the logical expression of dogma; chiefly famous as the author of a large work entitled The Fountain of Knowledge, which is a systematisation of the whole doctrine of the Greek Fathers and the church councils up to his time. See perichoresis.

W. Smith, A Dictionary of Christian Biography (1877-87). E.F.S.

John Pupper of Goch: (c. 1410-1475) Superior of the Thabor Convent at Malines, adherent of the Brethren of the Common Life*, radical pre-reformer. Q.B.

John of Jandum: (c. 1300-1328) Early a teacher of arts at Paris, author of De Laudibus Parisius, and collaborator with Marsilius of Padua* on Defensor Pacis for which both were condemned in 1327. His commentaries on Aristotle are strongly flavored with Averroism* and present a radical interpretation of the twofold-truth theory*.

C W. Previté-Orton, The Defensor Pacis (Cambridge, 1928), xii f; P. Feret, La faculté de théologie de Paris, III (1896). Q.B.

John (Quidort) of Paris: (d. 1306) Dominican teacher, author of De potestate regia et papali (1302) and of De modo existendi corporis Christi in sacramento altaris (1304). The former treatise advocates conciliar government; the latter was out of accord with orthodox medieval views of the Eucharist.

J. T. McNeill, "The Emergence of Conciliarism" in J. L. Cate, Medieval and Historiographical Essays in Honor of J. W. Thompson (1938). J.T.M.

John of Salisbury: (d. 1180) Bishop of Chartres. Friend and associate of Thomas a Becket. Chiefly remembered for his Policraticus (text edited by C. C. J. Webb, 1909). See two swords, the doctrine of. W.S.H.

Johnson, Gisle: (1822-1894) A Norwegian theologian who exercised wide influence through theological and church publications and through the establishment of the Inner Mission in Norway. Cf. neo-Lutheranism. C.J.B.

Jonah: Latest prophetic book of the O.T., written in the third century by an anonymous author, using a historical setting five hundred years earlier. It is religious fiction, with the key happenings historically impossible. In contrast with Jonah's anti-foreignness, the author pictures the supposed heathen as repentant and eager to embrace new religious conceptions. Contrasting with Jonah's God of the Hebrew people, the book shows a universal deity from whom Jonah could not escape by leaving Palestine. Jonah's vengeful deity, who destroys all non-Jews, is replaced by a God gracious, merciful, slow to anger, etc. This book is an allegory of the prophet nation which should have shared her religion with the world. In pre-exilic days she fled from duty and met apparent death in the storm of exile. The three days symbolize the three exiles. Then came the return and the renewed commission, but bigotry and legalism caused her last state to be worse than her first. This satire on prevalent beliefs is one of the greatest, yet one of the most misunderstood books in the Bible.

See J. M. P. Smith and W. A. Irwin, The Prophets and Their Times (1941), pp. 271-79. R.E.W.

Jones Lectureship, The Sam P.: Established in 1920 at Emory University, Georgia by the family of the Rev. Sam P. Jones with a capital sum of almost $3,000 these lectures (given from time to time) are designated to deal with the cause of evangelism. Drs. George R. Stuart, L. H. Hough, A. E. Day have appeared on this foundation.

(Data from the office of the Dean of Candler School of Theology.) V.F.

Joseph, Sisters of Saint: See Sisters of St. Joseph's Society for Foreign Missions.

Josephus, Flavius: Jewish historian and writer (37/38 to about 110) of priestly origin, well educated in Jewish lore and the Greek disciplines. During his youth he lived for three years as a rigid ascetic, later joining the Pharisees*. In 64 he went on a mission to Rome. At the outbreak of the war with Rome, he was assigned to unruly Galilee. He organized the province and raised an army. After some initial successes, he was defeated and escaped, later surrendered to the Romans under Vespasian. He is suspected of treachery.

According to his own account he predicted that the Roman general would be emperor and thus deeply impressed his captor. After Josephus' return from a campaign with Titus, against the Jews, wherein Josephus essayed the dual role of being loyal to his Roman masters and kind to his people, and with some success, he returned to Rome, where he was granted citizenship and a pension. He henceforth devoted himself to literature, writing perhaps in his native Aramaic dialect and with probably expert help to translate it into Greek. He produced the Wars of the Jews, Antiquities of the Jews and Autobiography not always reliable, and an apologetic work, the first of its kind, Against Apion in which he ably defended Jew and Judaism. He is often our sole source for a period or an event, hence, his importance. He tries to present himself and his conduct in the best possible light and attempts to show the world the greatness of the Jewish people and the exalted ethics of their religion. It was the Christian church that preserved his works because of an interpolated passage about Jesus found in them. (Antiq. XVIII, 3, 3).

F. Foakes Jackson, Josephus and The Jews (1930); Works of H. St. J Thackery, Josephus in Loeb Classical Library (1926 ff.). F.A.L.

Joshua: A historical book of the O.T., included among the "Former Prophets"* in the Hebrew canon. It contains accounts of the invasion and conquest of Canaan by the Israelites (chapters 1-12), the allotment of territory to the various tribes (chapters 13-21), and the final acts and speeches of Joshua (chapters 22-24). The book derives its name from Moses' successor, Joshua, who is considered by Jewish tradition as the author (Baba Bathra 14b). This view cannot be correct, for the book has many marks of later date. In its present form it is in large part a product of the Deuteronomic school of historians (see D), who composed or re-wrote the history of the period on the basis of earlier traditional material. This material is usually assigned by critical scholars to J and E, but this is not certain. In any case there is very little material which resembles J (mostly in chapters 15-17) and if E was used, it has been largely re-written. Most of the chapters dealing with the allotment of territory are usually attributed to P*, but they likewise may be Deuteronomic. The standard tradition of the conquest of Palestine is that it was made by a unified nation under Joshua's leadership, and was immediately and completely successful. There are traces, particularly in Joshua 15-17 and Judges* 1-2, of an earlier tradition which represented the conquest as having been made by tribes, as only partially successful, and as spread over a long period of time. This tradition is doubtless more authentic, and is supported by archaeological evidence. See Hexateuch.

M. Noth, Das Buch Josua (Handbuch zum Alten Testament I, 7) (1938); J Garstang, The Foundations of Bible History: Joshua, Judges (1931).

                                       J.P.H.

Jotunn: (Norse-Icelandic) Giant, earth monster, frost giant, cliff giant. Jotunheim, the home or world of the giants (Jotnar), is held to lie to the east of Norway, the giant is powerful, huge, and fairly intelligent, an earth god. Some giants had human and others non-human characteristics, known to marry gods (of the sky and air). There were giantesses, some of whom were held to be beautiful, but generally speaking, giants of either sex were not regarded as handsome. Many had personal names. Whether, as claimed by some scholars, the giants originated from the realm of the dead, it seems improbable that it is true for most of them.   F.L.P.

Journalism, Catholic: See Catholic Journalism.

journalism, religious, in the U. S.: See religious journalism in the U. S.

Journals (General) of religion and theology:
Biblical Archaeologist, published quarterly by American Schools of Oriental Research to provide non-technical account of archaeological discoveries as they are related to the Bible. Editor, G. Ernest Wright; New Haven, 1938.

Bulletin of the American Schools of Oriental Research, published quarterly by the American Schools of Oriental Research. Editor, W. F. Albright; New Haven, 1919.

Chrsstendom, published quarterly by the American Section of the World Conference on Faith and Order and the Universal Christian Council for Life and Work, an ecumenical review. Editor, Harlan Paul Douglas, New York City, 1935.

Christian Century, an undenominational weekly. Editor, Charles Clayton Morrison; 1902.

Christianity and Crisis, published bi-weekly, a journal of Christian opinion. Chairman of Editorial Board, Reinhold Niebuhr; New York City, 1941.

Christianity and Society, a quarterly devoted to Church History, published quarterly by the American Society of Church History. Managing Editor, Matthew Spinka, Chicago, Illinois, 1932.

Church Management, published monthly. Editor, William H. Leach, Cleveland, Ohio, 1924.

The Crozer Quarterly, published by the Faculty of Crozer Theological Seminary. M. S. Enslin, Editor, 1923.

The Expositor and Homiletical Review, a Christianity and Social Reconstruction, published by the Fellowship of Socialist Christians. Editor, Reinhold Niebuhr, New York City, 1934.

monthly journal of practical church methods, published by the F. M. Barton, Co., Cleveland, 1897.

Federal Council Bulletin, issued monthly by the Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America, a journal of inter-church cooperation. Editor, Roswell P. Barnes, New York City, 1918.

Harvard Theological Review, issued quarterly by the Faculty of Divinity in Harvard University. Embraces theology, ethics, history, and philosophy of religion and cognate subjects. Aims to enlarge knowledge and advance thought. 1908.

Information Service, published weekly by the Department of Research and Education of the Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America, New York, 1921.

International Journal of Religious Education, published monthly by the International Council of Religious Education. Editor, P. R. Hayward, Chicago, 1924.

Jewish Quarterly Review, published quarterly by the Dropsie College for Hebrew and Cognate Learning. Editors, Abraham A. Neuman and Solomon Zeitlin; Philadelphia, 1910. This supersedes The Jewish Quarterly Review, published in London, 1889-1908.

Journal of Bible and Religion, published quarterly by the National Association of Biblical Instructors to foster religion in education. Editor, Carl Everett Pennington, Somerville, New Jersey, 1933.

Journal of Biblical Literature, published quarterly by the Society of Biblical Literature and Exegesis. Editor, Robert N. Pfeiffer; Philadelphia, 1881.

The Journal of Liberal Religion, a quarterly published by the Unitarian Ministerial Association, The Universalist Ministerial Associaton, and The Meadville Theological School. Editor, James Luther Adams, Chicago, 1939.

Journal of Near Eastern Studies, a quarterly continuing the American Journal of Semitic Languages and Literatures. Editor, George A. Cameron, the journal of the Department of Oriental Languages and Literatures of the University of Chicago, 1942.

Journal of Religion, continuing the Biblical World and the American Journal of Theology (1897 to 1920), a quarterly issued by the Divinity Faculty and Conference of the University of Chicago, 1921.

The Moslem World, a quarterly review of current literature and thought among Mohammedans, published by the Hartford Seminary Foundation. Editors, Samuel M. Zwemer and Edwin E. Cal-verley; Hartford, Connecticut, 1893.

The Personalist, a quarterly journal of philosophy, religion and literature published by the School of Philosophy of the University of So. California. Editor, Ralph Tyler Flewelling, 1920.

The Protestant, (originally entitled The Protestant Digest) a bi-monthly journal of affirmation published by the Protestant Digest. Editor, Kenneth Leslie, New York, 1938.

Religion in Life, a Christian quarterly, published by the Abingdon-Cokesbury Press; Editor-in-chief, Nolan B. Harmon; New York, 1932.

Religion in the Making, published four times a year by the Florida School of Religion. Editor, Shirley Jackson Case; 1940.

Religious Education, a bi-monthly which seeks to present on an adequate, scientific plane those factors which make for improvement in religious and moral education; published by the Religious Education Association. Editor, Laird T. Hites; Chicago, 1907.

Review of Religion, published bi-monthly by the Columbia University Press. Editor, Horace L. Friess, New York City, 1936.

Social Action, a monthly magazine of fact, published by the Council for Social Action of the Congregational Christian Churches. Editor, Elizabeth G. Whiting; New York City, 1935.

A.C.M.

Jovinian: (ca. 390) A pre-Augustinian monk who conceived the communication of the spirit as an experience tied to the ecclesiastical acts of baptism and repentance. Not inferring the consequence of asceticism from pneumatism, he maintained the equal meritoriousness of the marital and celibate states and the moral equality of fasting and eating.

W. Haller, Jovinianus (Leipzig, 1897).   H.H.

Jowett, Benjamin: (1817-1893) Distinguished English clergyman and educator, and Master of Balliol College in Oxford for many years, during most of which he was also regius professor of Greek. His translation of the Dialogues of Plato is the standard English text of the Platonic corpus. Jowett's influence as Master of Balliol was very wide, and gave rise to scores of characteristic legends and stories. Religiously, he was a broad churchman, whose essay on the Bible in Essays and Reviews caused much controversial discussion.   W.N.P.

Jubilee, Year of: Following the analogy of the weekly seventh day of repose for man, the seventh year was to be a period of rest for the land. (Ex. 23:10, 11). A Sabbath of Sabbaths (49) of years was to precede the jubilee. During this fiftieth (in actual practice the preceding) year, 1) the land was to lie fallow; 2) it was to revert to original ownership; 3) Hebrew slaves were manumitted. Many students think that the jubilee legislation (Lev. 25:10 ff) is an ideal construction rather than provision for an actual situation. Later Jewish law adopted, developed and even rescinded some of the features of the Biblical legislation.   F.A.L.

Jubilees, Book of: Apocalyptic book found in the O.T. pseudepigrapha*, known also under the Greek and Hebrew title of "The Little Genesis" as well as the Apocalypse of Moses. Was originally written in Hebrew and translated successively into Greek, Ethiopic, Latin and Syriac. It purports to be a revelation to Moses on Mt. Sinai by the Angel of the Presence of the history and religious laws and practices covered by the Bible, from Genesis I to Exodus XII, and emanated from an unknown sect at end of 3rd century. The whole is fitted into a chronology reckoned according to the years of the jubilee. The book is a highly interesting religious document with many mystic features, e.g., the pre-existence of the Torah* upon "heavenly tablets" before creation, the celebration in heaven of Pentecost, the date of the revelation of the Torah at Creation.

F.A.L.

Jud, Leo: See catechism; catechumenate.

Judah, the Patriarch, Rabbi: See mishnah.

Judaism: See Israel, religion and theology; Jewish.

Judaism: See Zionism.

Judaism: (Introductory) The term Judaism (Gr., Ioudaismos) was coined by Greek speaking Jews to designate their religious way of life in contrast with that of their neighbors, known as Hellenism. (2 Macc. 2.21; 8.1; 14.38; 4 Macc. 4.26) N.T. Greek uses the term in the sense of the Jewish religion (Gal. 1.13-14). Its Hebrew equivalent Yahadut dates from the Middle Ages (Rashi to Yebamot 23b, Esther Rabba 7 uses Yehudut).

While the term is late, the phenomenon to which it refers goes back to the beginnings of Jewish spiritual life. The distinction, which is commonly made, between the religion of Israel and Judaism, limiting the first to pre-exilic and the other to post-exilic developments, is purely artificial. They describe successive stages of the same religious process. The basic features of post-exilic* Judaism began long before the Exile. The worship of Yahweh* as Israel's covenant God and Savior, the revelation of His will to the prophets and its embodiment in the various codes that comprise the Torah*, and His demand of moral conduct from His worshipers are permanent elements of Judaism, which run unbroken from the days of Sinai to the present.

Judaism represents the religious experience of the Jewish people, that is their consciousness of the sacred as embodied in the Torah both Written and Oral, or Scripture and Tradition. The stages of its growth correspond to the stages of Jewish political, cultural and social evolution. Branching out of Semitic paganism (see Semites, religion of), the religion of the early tribes of Israel was shaped by Moses* at Sinai and Kadesh into the exclusive worship of Yahweh with a corresponding body of ritual and social legislation to meet the needs of the desert surroundings. In the agricultural economy of Canaan the nomadic religion acquired an elaborate sacrificial cult, festivals, sanctuaries, an organized priesthood, codes of law, etc. It was greatly enriched by the institution of kingship and by the unique body of prophets*, who advanced the monolatrous idea of Yahweh to the pure conception of ethical monotheism. The prophetic criticism of the cult and the subordination of ritual to righteousness affected priestly practice and resulted in the Deuteronomic Reformation, which centralized religious worship in Jerusalem and in the Zadokite* priesthood.

The Babylonian Exile marked the break up of the geographic unity of the Jews and the beginning of an ever widening diaspora. (See Babylonian Captivity.) The Davidic dynasty disappeared only to grow into an object of Messianic* hope. What was left of political independence took the form of a theocracy, headed by a high priest of the line of Zadok. The actual sovereignty passed into the hands of the Persians, Greeks and Romans. The spiritual life centered in the Second Temple and, to a lesser degree, in the new institution of the Synagogue. It was deepened and enriched by the Reformation of Ezra and Nehemiah and by the adoption of the Torah as the supreme source of authority of the Jewish people. This highly creative period was further distinguished by the virtual completion of the three-fold canon of Scripture, by the growth of the Apocrypha, and the beginnings of the Oral Law. It called forth the Samaritan secession, the heroic resistance on the part of the Jewish pietists of the tidal wave of Hellenism, and the rise of the Pharisees*, who challenged the Zadokite priesthood—who formed the nucleus of the politico-religious party of Sadducees*—by insisting that all Jews must constitute a kingdom of priests and a holy nation, and that the Torah is the common heritage of the entire congregation of Jacob. The messianic yearnings and eschatological hopes of the politically crushed people merged with the mystery cults of the neighboring peoples, and, centering in the person of Jesus, formed the world religion of Christianity.

The fall of the Jewish state and the destruction of the Second Temple* in 70 C.E. represents the great divide of Judaism as well as of Jewish history. Palestine was now completely in foreign hands, and the Jew was driven into Galut, exile, as a homeless wanderer among the nations. Out of the conflagration which destroyed his home and sanctuary the Jew carried away the Torah, which served him henceforth as the indestructible spiritual fatherland. Round it he built fences to safeguard it from hostile attacks. The synagogue* now rose in place of the Temple as the center of Jewish life. In it the ancient sacrificial worship was replaced by the service of prayer, study of Torah and charity. The leadership of the priests gave way to that of the rabbis*, whose main function consisted in interpreting the Torah and in applying it to everchanging conditions. In the schools and academies of Palestine and Babylonia they concentrated on the word of Scripture and developed the Haggadah (religious lore) and Halacha (law) which endowed Judaism with new power. The rich products of their labors are embodied in the Mishnah* and in the Palestinian and Babylonian Gemaras* (See Talmud) and in the Midrashim.

About the time of the rise of Mohammedanism* —a religion derived in great part from Judaism— there began an intense activity on the part of the heads of the Babylonian academies, the Geonim, to make the newly completed Talmud the possession of all Jewry. Their zeal evoked the opposition of the Karaites* to the authority of both the Talmud and the Rabbis. Their call, "Back to Scripture" created a serious split in Judaism. Their challenge awakened the leaders of Rabbinic Judaism to the study of the text of the Bible, of Hebrew grammar and philology as well as to the systematic study of the Halacha, etc. The contact with Arabic culture stimulated further Jewish creativity in biblical exegesis, history, poetry, theology, philosophy and science.

Following the death of Maimonides* (1204), the codification of the Halacha, which reached its climax in his Mishne Torah, continued in Jacob b Asher's Tur (14th cent.) and in Joseph Karo's Shulhan Aruch (16th cent.). However the dominant force of the period was the *Cabbala. Developing in Talmudic and Geonic times, it made its appearance in the cryptic Sefer Yezira and reached its height in the Zohar (14th cent.). Its mysticism sought to offset the rationalism of the previous period and to correct the overemphasis on Talmudic legalism. The speculative Cabbala of Spanish Jewry was supplemented by the Practical Cabbala of Isaac Luria (16th cent.). Gathering up the occult sciences of angelology, demonology, astrology, etc., and combining them with neo-Platonic conceptions, particularly with the doctrine of metempsychosis*, it created a strangely fantastic world, in which asceticism crushed the joy of living. The messianism of the Cabbala, which sought to offer anodyne to suffering Jewry, degenerated into vulgar imposture in the movements of Sabbatai Zevi and Jacob Frank. Its tragic aberrations were relieved by the deeply spiritual popular movement of Hasidism* (18th cent.).

The modern era began with the Enlightenment* in Germany under the leadership of Moses Mendelssohn*. This movement spread to Eastern Europe and renovated the cultural life of the Jewish people. The liberalism of the period expressed itself in the Emancipation of Western Jewry, in reaction to which Antisemitism* rose to ever greater power. It is the period of Jewish assimilation, on the one hand, and of secular nationalism and of Zionism*, on the other. It witnessed the renascence of Hebrew as a spoken language and the birth of modern Hebrew and Yiddish* literatures. Its outstanding spiritual expressions are the Science of Judaism (created by Krochmal, Rapoport, and Zunz) and of the Reform, Conservative and Neo-Orthodox movements.

L. Baeck, The Essence of Judaism (Engl. tr., 1936); H. Cohen, Die Religion der Vernunft (1919); S. S. Cohon, What We Jews Believe (1931); M. Friedländer, The Jewish Religion (1891); M. Joseph, Judaism as Creed and Life (4th ed, 1920) ; K. Kohler, Jewish Theology (1918) ; G F. Moore, Judaism, 3 vols. (1927-30) ; C. G. Montefiore, Outlines of Liberal Judaism (1912) ; S. S. Schechter, Some Aspects of Rabbinic Theology (1909).

s s c.

Judaism, conservative: A designation of a school of thought or a cultural and religious trend within Judaism, rather than a party or sect. It had its modern origins in Germany in the middle of the nineteenth century. Its early exponents were Isaac Bernays (1792-1849), Zachariah Frankel (1801-1875), and the faculty and graduates of the Breslau Seminary founded in 1854. In the United States its leadership is centered around the Jewish Theological Seminary of America, founded in 1885, reorganized in 1902.

No lay or Rabbinical conference of conservatively minded Jews ever adopted a platform of principles or dogmas. There was, and is, however, a general agreement on objectives to be sought.

Conservative Judaism recognizes the authority of Jewish religious and ritual Law as it developed from the Bible through the Talmudic and later Rabbinic periods to modern times. That Law of necessity is subject to the universal principle of change and development. But the changes must accord with the inner logic and essential character of the Law. Opinions regarding that "inner logic and essential character" differ. But despite the differences, the conservative congregation will be readily recognized by its definite inclination to preserve the religious forms and traditions which give to Judaism its peculiar and distinctive manifestations.

The Hebrew language occupies a place of paramount importance in the outlook of conservative Judaism. Though prayers in the vernacular may be recited, Hebrew dominates the Synagogue service as well as the school curriculum. Moreover, its use as a vehicle for every form of modern literary expression is encouraged.

The hope for the restoration of a Jewish Commonwealth in Palestine, always an integral part of traditional Judaism, is cherished. That hope in no way conflicts with the legitimate demands of patriotic allegiance to democratically organized societies, and its realization is indispensable to a full and rich development of the Hebrew heritage in the modern world.

Emphasis upon a thorough and complete knowledge of the whole of the Jewish past, knowledge, based upon modern scientific methods of research and of study is another of the marked characteristics of Conservative Judaism. From its ranks, therefore, came many of the scholars, who during the past hundred years have recovered the history of the Jewish people and much of their vast literary and cultural achievement, out of the forgotten and dust-laden manuscripts of the libraries and private collections throughout the world.

Conservative Judaism neither eschews modern thought, nor accepts it as the final authority on matters of faith and tradition. It studies modern thought and accepts and incorporates it into the framework of Judaism when its truth has been proved beyond any reasonable doubt, and when its teachings and implications do not run counter to the ethical doctrines of Judaism, or to the laws of its being, as they have developed during forty centuries of varied experiences.

Solomon Schechter, Seminary Address and Other Papers (1915) ; Cyrus Adler, Lectures, Selected Papers, Addresses (1933), pp. 240-264; H. Graetz, History of the Jews, Jewish Pub. Society, Vol. V., Ch. XV, XVI, XVIII; Louis Finkelstein, "The Things That Unite Us", Proceedings of Rabbinical Assembly of America (1927).

s.G.

Judaism in China: See Chinese religions.

Judaism, Hellenistic: Hellenism, from hellenizein, used properly of a non-Greek speaking or imitating Greek, a term applied, especially since J. G. Droysen (1836), to the Grecizing influence of the Greek penetration of the Eastern Mediterranean, especially after the conquests of Alexander the Great. The process was carried on chiefly by the establishment of Greek cities, which then served as centers for the propagation of Greek culture. In Palestine traces of the new ideas have been discerned in some of the Wisdom books of the O.T. (e.g., Ecclesiastes); the Apocrypha naturally shows less doubtful influence (e g., Wisdom of Solomon) and the Books of the Maccabees* constitute the locus classicus for the struggle between traditionalists and innovators, religious as well as political. The struggle is taken cognizance of in rabbinic literature of all periods, and though this literature shows the influence of Greek language and ideas, the importations from the west cannot be said to have substantially affected the main stream of Jewish tradition. But in Alexandria, the focus of Hellenistic Judaism, the Greek current was so dominant as eventually to engulf the failing Jewish stream entirely. The tendency is apparent in Philo*, the great philosopher of Hellenistic Judaism, who, when Greek and Jewish ideas diverge, is apt by forced interpretation to assimilate the Jewish to the Greek. It is more apparent in the fact that Greek is the sole language of a considerable body of literature, produced to acquaint Jews themselves as well as the outer world with Jewish ideas and traditions. The chief monument is the Greek version of the Hebrew Bible known as the Septuagint*, a fanciful account of whose genesis is given in the Letter of Aristeas. Fragments of Jewish histories by Demetrius, Eupolemus, Artapanus, and others are preserved in Eusebius and Clement of Alexandria. Philosophy is represented by Aristobulus as well as Philo, poetry by Ezekielos' drama on the exodus and by insertions in Phocylides and the Sybilline Oracles. Josephus'* work, though somewhat later and directed to a Roman audience, belongs to the same category. See Hellenism.

The standard work is still Emil Schürer, Geschichte des jüdischen Volkes im Zeitalter Jesu Christi; the English translation (1891) is of the first edition; subsequent German editions are superior. The literature is dealt with in Vol. III of Schürer, and perhaps more conveniently in Christ-Schmid-Stählin, Geschichte der griechischen Litteratur (1920), II 1⁶. The texts are given in W. N. Stearns, Fragments from Graeco-Jewish Writers (1908) See also the relevant chapters and bibliographies in the Cambridge Ancient History (1928 and 1930), VII and VIII.

M.H.

Judaism, Lectureship on: Established and under written since 1936 by Jewish friends of Elyria, Ohio, this lectureship is given at the Graduate School of Theology, Oberlin, Ohio. It is concerned with Talmudic and post-Talmudic law, literature, philosophy and religion. The following have served as lecturers: Rabbi B. R. Brickner, Dr. Louis Finkelstein, Dr. Solomon Goldman, Rabbi S. B. Freehoff, Rabbi A. H. Silver and Prof. S. S. Cohon.

(Data from the office of the Dean of the Graduate School of Theology.)   v.F.

Judaism, orthodox: The total Jewish tradition of living as determined by the basic Pentateuchal code of Moses*, amplified by three thousand years of Jewish life in Biblical and post-Biblical ages. The expansion of the written Mosaic law remained a living oral tradition until its primary codification in the Mishnah towards the end of the second century of the Christian era. This was later expanded in the Talmud, and in the Middle Ages classified in such orderly and authoritative codes as the Yad Ha-hazakah of Maimonides and the Shulhan Aruch of Joseph Caro*. Exigencies of life and the uprooting and dispersal of the Jews from Palestine necessarily brought into desuetude some elements of this system. But orthodox Judaism regarding the Mosaic code as divine revelation, gives theoretic allegiance even to those parts of it which can no longer be practically observed.

The necessity, and the acceptance of the principle of the constant interpretation of this law by qualified rabbis in every generation has kept orthodox Judaism fluid, and saved it from much of that rigidity which marked such an outgrowth as the unbending scripturalism of the Karaites*. The interpretation usually tends to alleviate the succinct Biblical law, which starkly applied might have been unbearably rigorous. Thus the numerous laws of the Sabbath, cardinal in orthodox Jewish life, make the traditional Jewish Sabbath a day of complete relaxation and refreshment of body, mind and spirit.

Because orthodox Judaism is based on authoritative written codes it has an essential unity all over the world. But local religious customs, many of which over the centuries have acquired the authority of law, give it considerable outward diversity.

The strength of orthodox Judaism lies in its intense and unbroken traditionalism. Clinging to Hebrew as a sacred tongue, the Hebrew Bible as its ultimate authority, the law of Moses, the admonitions of the prophets and the outpourings of the Psalmist for much of its liturgy, the religious obligation of constant study of the Biblical and rabbinic law by both old and young for its intellectual foundation, and the return to Palestine as integral in its Messianic hope, it has held unwaveringly to its course in the line marked out by Moses, the prophets and the rabbis. This, however, also constitutes a source of weakness because of the difficulty of maintaining an ancient Hebraic tradition outside of Palestine and outside of an essentially Jewish environment. In the Ghetto intensive Jewish living was comparatively easy. Outside the Ghetto, orthodoxy rapidly weakened under modern Western secularist influences, and sometimes through a reform movement seeking to adapt it to the standards of the environment.

The cardinal elements of orthodox Jewish faith are an uncompromising belief in the unity of God and an acceptance of His law as revealed to Moses. But the term orthodox, first used in the time of Napoleon, is a misnomer, because the main emphasis of traditional Judaism is not on creed but on the practise of the ceremonial, social, and ethical teachings of that law.

Orthodox Judaism has no world organization. It has local organizations such as the Union of Orthodox Jewish Congregations of America in the U. S It has no authoritative ecclesiastical organization, since every duly ordained rabbi is theoretically of equal authority Of world Jewry estimated at 15,700,000 souls, the great majority, outside of Soviet Russia, would be classified as affiliated with orthodox Judaism. See parochial schools.

Michael Friedlander, The Jewish Religion (1891); Isidore Epstein, Judaism of Tradition (1931); The Jewish Library, 4 series (1928, 1930, 1934), edited by Leo Jung.   D.S.P.

Judaism, rabbinic: See Akiba; Hillel; Midrash; Mishnah; rabbinism, Talmud.

Judaism, reform: Reform Judaism stems from the endeavor on the part of Jews in Western Europe to adjust themselves spiritually to the changed order introduced by the Enlightenment*, on the one hand, and by the political and social upheaval at the turn of the 18th century, on the other. The doctrine of the rights of man (see natural rights), culminating in the French Revolution, broke down the barriers wherewith both Church and State kept the Jews apart from their neighbors. In 1791 the National Assembly enfranchised all the Jews of France. Four years earlier the U.S.A. adopted its Constitution based on the principles of equality and of liberty of conscience. For the first time since their dispersion the Jews found themselves the equals of their fellowmen. The newly acquired status of the Jews in the U S.A. and in France became the goal of their brethren in Germany and in other lands.

Political equality confronted the Jews with grave problems of adjustment. Some ultra-Orthodox Jews feared that under emancipation Jews might not remain loyal to rabbinical* law* and abandon the hope of deliverance and restoration in the Holy Land under the Messiah*. Extremists at the other end considered Judaism incompatible with the new freedom, and sought their salvation in total assimilation within Christian society. The leaders of Reform endeavored to avoid both extremes. Following the teaching of Moses Mendelssohn*, they resolved to enter the new European order as a religious people, i.e., to identify themselves with their neighbors in political, industrial, economic and cultural life, and to retain their separateness only in religion and in those social and cultural elements which pertain to religion.

This political and social change went hand in hand with the altered religious outlook under the influence of Deism, Kantian moralism and Hegelian rationalism. The ferment of new ideas weakened the whole structure of Jewish belief and practice. To win back for Judaism those whose religious ardor had cooled became the primary object of Reform. At the first Reform Temple, built by Israel Jacobsohn at Seesen in 1810, and particularly at the Hamburg Temple (1818), which served as model for Reform synagogues in Germany and in other countries, stress was laid on the modernization of the service by revising the liturgy, introducing the vernacular in worship, instrumental music, family pews, confirmation of girls as well as of boys, etc. The external reforms were followed by the reinterpretation of the theological foundations of Judaism in the light of current philosophies and the historical sciences by Leopold Zunz (1794-1886), Samuel Holdheim (1806-1860), and Abraham Geiger (1810-1874). Through their disciples the movement spread to other lands and found a specially congenial home in democratic America, where, under the leadership of Isaac M. Wise (1819-1900), David Einhorn (1809-1879), Kaufmann Kohler (1843-1926), etc., Reform congregations were established in almost all cities of the land.

The Union of American Hebrew Congregations (org. 1873) numbers (1943) 308 congregations, consisting of 62,209 families. More than 450 rabbis belong to the Central Conference of American Rabbis (org. 1889). The movement is ministered to by the Hebrew Union College (org. by Isaac M. Wise, 1875) and by the Jewish Institute of Religion (org. by Stephen S. Wise, 1922).

As the product of the Enlightenment, Reform identified itself with the rational tradition in Judaism, and built its theology upon reason and upon the scientific interpretation of Scripture and the Oral Law. The dominant notes in its teaching have been the universal and the ethical without ignoring the particularistic and the ceremonial. In view of changing conditions in Jewish life today, the main task of Reform is no longer mere adjustment to the modern temper but rather the self-reaffirmation of Judaism as a religion in a world predominantly secularistic and nationalistic. Though absorbed in the struggle against the deadly forces of Anti-semitism* and in problems of relief and of aiding Palestinian fellow Jews to establish for themselves a secure home, Reform Judaism adheres to the wider view of its prophetic heritage and conceives its Messianic task to be "to co-operate with all men in the establishment of the kingdom of God*, of universal brotherhood, justice, truth and peace on earth".

Guiding Principles of Reform Judaism, Yearbook of Central Conference of American Rabbis (1937), Vol. 47, 94-114; Union Prayerbook (1940), Vol. 1, (1922), Vol. II; Rabbi's Manual (1928); Samuel S. Cohon (and Rall), Christianity and Judaism Compare Notes (1927); S. S. Cohon, What We Jews Believe (1931); K. Kohler, Jewish Theology (1918); C. G. Montefiore, Outlines of Liberal Judaism (1912); D Philipson, The Reform Movement in Judaism (1931).

s.s.c.

Judaism, Talmudic: See Talmud.

Judaizers: Those who inculcate Jewish doctrines and observances. Particularly is it applied to those Jewish Christians* who insisted that Gentiles* must observe their national rites, including circumcision*. The word is really derived from Paul's use of a verb, "to Judaize" (Gal. 2.14). The term appears again in the letters of Ignatius* (Mag. 8.1, Phil. 5) where the Bishop of Antioch opposes those who insist upon circumcision, sabbath observance, and the keeping of the Law.

c.t.c.

Judas: (Iscariot) One of the inner circle of Jesus' followers, and His betrayer. According to John 12 6, also treasurer of the group Iscariot probably means "man of Kerioth."

s m.g.

Judas Maccabeus: (the "hammerer") Third son of Mattathias the Hasmonean* priest of Modin, and his successor as leader in the holy war against Antiochus Epiphanes's* forceful hellenization of Judea. With his small and poorly equipped guerilla bands of patriots, this resourceful warrior overcame the well armed and disciplined hosts of Syria, and defeated Lysias the governor of Syria himself and Bacchides. After three years of struggle, Judas retook Jerusalem*, except the Citadel, cleansed the Temple* of heathen altars, and reconsecrated it to the God of Israel (25th of Kislev, 165 or 164), an event celebrated by the annual eight day celebration of Hanukkah (Dedication).

After two years of comparative quiet, Judas was forced to undertake campaigns against hostile neighbors in Transjordania and in Galilee. Taking advantage of the death of the king, he laid siege to the Citadel. Counterattacked by Lysias who had assumed the regency of Syria, Judas lifted the siege and met his opponent in battle. At Beth-Zacharias Judas was defeated (162 B.C.). He retreated to the Temple Mount, but could not hold out because of an acute food shortage. For political reasons Lysias dealt leniently with the Jews. He demolished the Temple fortification, but granted the Jews complete religious freedom, which was the goal of their fighting.

Following the murder of Lysias and his royal ward, the new king Demetrius I sent Bacchides back to Judea to remove Judas and to install Alcimus in the High Priesthood. The Hasidim* accepted Bacchides's promise to respect their religious freedom and withdrew from further fighting. The treacherous execution of sixty of their number confirmed Judas in his resolve to fight on until complete political as well as religious freedom would be secured. This time Nicanor was dispatched with a strong force to Judea (161 B.C.). At Capharsalama he suffered a crushing defeat, and in the next battle at Adasa he was slain. The day of Judas's greatest victory (13th of Adar) was observed as an annual festival.

Threatened by the continuous menace of Syria, Judas sent an embassy to Rome to secure its friendship. Before help could come from that quarter, Bacchides returned to Judea to avenge the defeat of Nicanor. He encamped at Berea. This time the courage of the Jewish soldiers sank. They turned and fled, leaving only eight hundred men with Judas. The lion hearted warrior battled desperately and performed wonders, but was overwhelmed and slain. (Nisan, 160 B.C.) Though defeated, his cause triumphed. His brothers Jonathan (161-142) and Simon (142-135) won through concessions from the rival claimants of the Syrian throne the independence for which Judas fought and died. See Maccabees; Maccabees, Books of, Jewish religious festivals.

1 and 2 Maccabees; Josephus, Antiquities, XII, 6-11; Art. in Jewish Encyclopedia (1903); Histories of the Jewish People.   s.s.c.

Jude, Letter of: Written about A.D. 125, Jude is an encyclical to Christians everywhere, warning them against the groups of people of low morals and high pretensions that were infecting the churches. He probably has the Docetists* in mind. Nothing is known of the author, the only Jude, brother of James, in the N.T. was also the brother of Jesus, and would have been designated "the Lord's brother." If he is meant, the letter is pseudonymous, since the situation it reflects is later than the first century. It stands in two of our three earliest N.T. lists, Tertullian and the Muratorian.

J. B. Mayor, The Epistle of St. Jude and the Second Epistle of St. Peter (1907).   e.j.g.

judge, ecclesiastical: (Lat. judex ecclesiasticus) A dignitary of the Roman Catholic Church with power to sit in judgment and pronounce sentence. His jurisdiction is either a) ordinary—that which is attached by law to an ecclesiastical office, or b) delegated—that which is committed to a cleric by competent ecclesiastical authority. The pope's jurisdiction is universal while that of each bishop is confined to his own diocese. In practice, the Sacred Roman Rota is the papal court of the first instance, appeal, or final appeal, except in those cases reserved by law to the pope himself. A diocesan judge, called the official, usually acts for the bishop. In some cases a collegiate tribunal of three or five judges is required. The judge alone exercises judicial power in all cases, whether civil or criminal, there being no jury system in church courts.   j.f.t.

Judges: A historical book of the O.T., included among the "Former Prophets"* in the Hebrew canon. It contains three well-defined divisions: a brief survey of the occupation of Canaan by the Israelites (1:1-2:5), the history of the judges (2 6-16 31); and an appendix, comprising accounts of the Danite migration and of the war against Benjamin (chapters 17-21). The central and main portion of the book (2.6-16 31) is a product of the Deuteronomic school of historians (See D) who have used older material, possibly from J and E narratives, and provided for the various judges a stereotyped framework of religious introductions and conclusions. They viewed the history of this period as a regular succession of cycles of apostasy by Israel, oppression by an enemy, outcry to Yahweh, and deliverance by a judge. To this Deuteronomic book were later added the introduction, 1 1-2 5, from old material which is paralleled in fragments of Joshua* (especially chapters 15-17) and the appendix, which contains old material with annotations. The story of Abimelech in chapter 9 and of the minor judges in 10 1-5, 12.8-15, which do not have Deuteronomic coloring, are probably also later additions The Deuteronomic conception of the history of this period is artificial, but the book contains much valuable material. Of greatest importance is the Song of Deborah, chapter 5, a masterpiece of early Hebrew poetry which is nearly contemporaneous with the events it describes. The judges were military leaders and administrative chieftains who were probably local heroes of one of more tribes rather than rulers of the whole nation. Cf. Samson.

See G. F Moore, Judges (International Critical Commentary, 1895); C. F. Burney, The Book of Judges (2nd ed., 1920).   j.p.r.

judgment, final (or last): See final judgment.

Judith: Apocryphal book named after its heroine. Like Daniel and Esther it celebrates the deliverance of the Jews from persecution and aims to endow them with courage. It is variously dated from Maccabean* times to the age of Hadrian. Composed in Hebrew, it has been preserved in Greek, Syriac and Latin versions.   s.s.c.

Judson, Adoniram: (1788-1850) Pioneer foreign Baptist missionary. On way to Burma as appointee of American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions turned Baptist being immersed September 6, 1812. Translator of Bible into Burmese and author of Burmese dictionary (1849). Body buried at sea.   c.h.m.

Julian the Apostate: (331-363) Successor to Constantius as Roman emperor, reigning from 361-363. Dismissed Christians from all official posts and enacted such repressive measure as forbidding them to teach the classics. He sought to reform paganism and to reestablish it in the Empire, but without results that survived his death.   s.m.g.

Julian Calendar: See Gregorian Calendar.

Julian of Eclanum: Bishop of Eclanum in Apulia ca. 417, but exiled from Italy in 421. A Pelagian* who attacked Augustine and his teachings. particularly that of original sin*.   s.m.g.

Jumpers, the: A derisive epithet applied to eighteenth century Welsh Calvinistic Methodists, whose worship was accompanied by ecstatic convulsions.   F.G.E.

Jung, Carl G.: (1875-) Like Adler*, he is a distinguished pupil of Freud*, who founded his own "school" of psychoanalysis. A man of profound intellectual gifts and a comprehensive grasp of culture, his contribution of the famous introvert-extravert dichotomy of personalities is one of the earliest and undoubtedly the most influential from the point of view of the research on personality. He holds that the most basic distinction in personalities is that of orientation toward objective reality and toward subjective determinants. He also developed the discrete association test, an approach to the study of personality from the introspective side, by the verbal responses of the individual. He regards Freud's psychoanalytic method as the therapy of choice for many psycho-neuroses except in elderly people. In developing his own method of psychological healing, he insists in paying more attention to the primitive background of man's mind. For him the unconscious is essentially collective, racial, and perhaps universal. Unmasking, in particular, the different denizens in the unfamiliar realm of the unconscious, exploring the creative forces of the unconscious, he stresses that its unveiling should not be taken seriously until the second half of life. His psychoanalytic studies of mythology and religion are of great value. In most essentials his therapeutic principles and method of psychological healing are very different from Freud's. He interests himself, in particular, in the determination of the patient's personality type and in guiding him in his development of avocations. Special interest is shown in the more symbolic elements of the individual's phantasy life, and studying their similarities with those found in art, various religions, and mythologies. Much of his procedure appears to Freudians more as a stimulating academic tutorship than as an etiological therapy, providing the individual with a new philosophy with which to cloak his suffering rather than effecting a dynamic personality change for more mature development. Jung is by far the most sensitive of the founders of the psychoanalytic movement, to every echo in the secret recesses of the mind. Truly catholic in outlook and constructive in ideals, the truths of religion are as necessary as those of material science. Castigated as being a philosopher but no psychologist by the rival camps, he is unafraid to speak of the soul and the spiritual. He has been especially the source of inspiration for the English guild of pastoral psychologists, which is chiefly interested in promoting an understanding of psychotherapy among ministers of religion. See psychology, schools of.

His chief works are: Dementia praecox (1914); Psychology of the Unconscious (1916); Studies in Word Association (1918); Psychological Types (1923); Modern Man in Search of a Soul (1933); Psychology of Religion (1938); The Integration of the Personality (1939).   H.H.

Jupiter: (Lat. Iovis—dies, day, pater, father) In Roman religion, originally the sky-spirit; then lord of heaven and earth. The thunder-bolt is his weapon. He became the people's protector in time of war; the god of justice and of oaths in time of peace. As Jupiter Optimus Maximus, he was later identified with the Greek Zeus*. His tree is the oak; his bird the eagle.   E.M.N

jurisprudence: The term covers two essentially different types of science of law. As understood by lawyers, the science of law, on the European continent called "dogmatic jurisprudence", is the science of the rules of law. As a taxonomic science it sees its primary task in the clear formulation and the orderly arrangement of the rules of law, as they are found in statutes and judicial pronouncements. As a "Geisteswissenschaft"* it explores the meaning of these rules in order to develop for new and unforeseen situations such solutions as will be in accordance with the societal value judgments of which the existing rules of law are expressive.

In a different sense the word jurisprudence signifies a "Wirklichkeitswissenschaft", whose subject-matter is constituted by law as a real social phenomenon and which inquires into the role played by this phenomenon in social life. While the jurisprudence of the lawyers is concerned with one particular legal system, e.g., American law or French law, and with the present day, jurisprudence in the latter sense is concerned with the law of all times and climes. In England and the United States the term jurisprudence is often reserved to this latter science. Its various "schools" do not represent mutually exclusive philosophical systems but different branches of, or approaches to, the common subject-matter. Historical jurisprudence as History of Law is concerned with the development in time of the law of a country (e.g., W. S. Holdsworth's History of English Law, 1903-38) or system (e.g., the Common Law, the Civil Law or Mohammedan Law) or of a particular legal institution (e.g., contract, mortgage, divorce, etc.), or of law in the general course of human history. Sociology of law (N. S. Timasheff, Max Weber, A. Gurvitch, E. Ehrlich) is interested in determining law's role in human society, in finding correlations between law and other phenomena of social life and of nature (e.g., political power, forms of production, climate, race) and in discovering such statistical regularities ("social laws") as may exist in such correlations. Comparative law is sociology of law when directed toward the investigation of the social causes and effects of detailed legal institutions with special emphasis upon the differences existing between contemporary laws of different countries. Ethnological jurisprudence collects and interprets the pre-legal and legal institutions of primitive or backward peoples. Contemporary American realism (Llewellyn, U. Moore, J. Frank, Thurman Arnold) constitutes sociology of law carried on by a group of men trained in law rather than sociology, inspired by liberal political ideals, but inclined to underestimate the psychological reality of "rules" of law. So-called sociological jurisprudence, on the other hand (O. W. Holmes, B. Cardozo, R.

Pound) is not sociology of law at all but that method of lawyers' practical jurisprudence that emphasizes the necessity for courts and lawyers to familiarize themselves with the facts of modern social, especially economic life, in order to arrive at adequate decisions. Analytical jurisprudence
(J. Austin, Kocourek, H. Kelser) is interested in clarifying the conceptual framework of a particular legal system or of legal thought in general.
Philosophy of law finally seeks to comprehend the "essence" of law, to determine its metaphysical ends and to establish, by developing the notion of justice, the standards for the ethical evaluation of positive law. See law; natural rights.
R. Pound, "Jurisprudence", Vol. 8, *Enc. of Soc.
Sci.*, p 477 (with extensive bibliography) ; J Hall, Readings in Jurisprudence (1938) ; W. Seagle, The Quest for Law (1941) ; H. Cairns, Theory of Legal Science (1941) ; R. Pound, Contemporary Juristic Theory (1940) ; H. E. Yntema, "Jurisprudence on Parade" (1941), Vol. 39, Michigan Law Rev., p.
1154.
                                                              M Rh.

justice: 1) The standard of rights and duties applicable to all; 2) the cardinal virtue of those who conform to the standard. Conceptions of both standard and virtue vary as societies are low or high in culture, aristocratic or democratic. Justice is always a principle of "perfect obligation" with definite and universal connotation within a given society (e.g , with us, all must carry out contracts, pay taxes, refrain from crime) in contrast with benevolence or love, which is of "imperfect obligation" and ' individual conscience (e.g., whether and how much to contribute to a charity). With social progress, functions previously within the domain of imperfect obligation and individual conscience often become matters of prescribed justice: (e.g., compulsory contributions through taxes to the support of free elementary schools replace voluntary subscriptions, while the attendance of children becomes required and no longer is left to the option of parents).
In Plato's* Republic, justice is the inclusive virtue of the ideal state, in which all citizens are temperate and obedient, the military class in addition courageous, and the rulers wise. Every person performs the tasks for which he is best fitted. Justice for the individual means that his appetites are controlled by temperance, his emotions by courage, and his decisions by wisdom.
Aristotle*, in the Nicomachean Ethics, after observing that Justice had sometimes (as with Plato) been a designation for the whole of virtue, decides to limit his own discussion to the narrower and more specific definition of what is fair. He also distinguishes between Distributive Justice—the fair distribution of honors, wealth, and other goods in accordance with a rational principle—and Corrective Justice—the correction of violations of such just distribution (e.g., crimes, torts, breaches of contracts). Aristotle's usage has generally been preferred to Plato's.
In modern times, a typical individualistic definition of Justice is that of Herbert Spencer*:
"every man is free to do that which he wills, provided he infringes not the equal freedom of any other man". This implies that the activities of government should be restricted to a minimum, and individuals allowed to benefit and suffer from the consequences of their own actions. Collectivists wish the state to promote the general good more actively, and to bring all persons upon an approximately equalitarian level, at least in the economic field. A mediating position proposes as its canon· "a just distribution of economic and other goods will render to the members of each class of society the facilities and rewards requisite to enable and to induce them to render the services which society has a right to expect of them".

Capitalistic, communistic, and co-operative programs should be evaluated by this canon Conflicting interpretations of Corrective Justice were advanced during the last century, but the following points are now usually accepted.
Although the essential motive leading to the apprehension and conviction of criminals is undoubtedly public moral indignation, yet no offender should be punished merely as an expression of retribution Four other considerations should be taken into account moral education of the public to the wrongfulness of the crime; deterrence of would be offenders by fear of like punishment; prevention (by execution, imprisonment, surveillance) of future misconduct by the criminal himself, if possible, reformation or rehabilitation of the criminal's character. Many believe that improved social conditions will prove in the long run more effective in diminishing crime than the efforts of Corrective Justice. See lex talionis; natural rights.
S. E. Mezes, Ethics (1901), Chap. on Justice; T.
N. Carver, Essays in Social Justice (1915) ; J. H.
Ryan, Distributive Justice (rev. ed., 1942).
                                                              w.r.w.

justice, Divine: See sin; theodicy; wrath of God.

justice, Old Testament conception of: See righteousness, Old Testament conception of.

justification: By the teaching of the apostle Paul* the doctrine of justification has become central in all Christian thinking. When Paul speaks of 'justification by faith' he gives expression to the conviction that man cannot become acceptable in God's sight by fulfilling the law (of Moses), but that he can be saved only by trusting (believing) in the grace* of God revealed in Jesus Christ. To be "justified by God" means to be "righteous before God" (Rom. 2·13) and to be "regarded as righteous" by him (Rom. 9:19).
But this acknowledgment of being righteous in the presence of God is due not to the fulfillment of religious and moral commandments (for such an accomplishment is impossible for man) but to the grace of God alone, who through Christ accepts even a sinner by forgiving him, thus making him his own. By faith man knows that he is God's.
Ancient Catholicism adhered to this Pauline teaching, but modified it by narrowing it down.
It identified grace primarily with baptismal grace.

By reference to it, it declared the Christian to be free from obedience to the works of the law; but in anticipation of the divine judgment at the end of time, it expected him to do good works by which he could prove and maintain the salvation by grace. It introduced the teaching and practice whereby the Christian was to earn "merits" and "satisfactions"*. Thus Christianity was understood as a religion of grace as well as of good works. Absolute dependence upon God was combined with an insistence upon the moral freedom of man.

Only Augustine* returned to the original Pauline teaching on justification, but not without developing it further. Nor was his teaching such that thereby the established doctrines and practices were superseded. He started from the principle that the will is totally enslaved to sin and therefore incapable of accomplishing anything good. All salvation (attainment of goodness) is due to grace. As "prevenient grace" it creates a new heart in man by being infused in him as "charity" or "spirit". As "cooperating grace" it is present in all "works" of man, thus making it possible for him to become acceptable in God's sight. All this is understood as justification which is identical with the inspiration of the Holy Spirit (or of love) into the sinful heart of man. In full consistency with this view he advanced his doctrine of predestination.

Had Augustinianism been adopted without qualifications, the Roman Catholic Church would have been compelled radically to change its institutional practices. As a matter of fact, Augustine's predestinarianism* was not adopted in the interest of preserving room within the Christian life for free will and good works.

On this basis the medieval scholastics developed their doctrine of justification. They too endeavored to be loyal to the Pauline teaching that man lives by grace alone. But they made possible the practice of good works as an expression of man's moral will by strictly distinguishing the realm of grace from that of free will. With the help of Aristotelian philosophy they developed the theory of the "information" of the human soul with the "habitus" of divine grace: In order that God may dwell in man, the metaphysical center of the soul must be purified by an infusion of the supernatural "habitus" of grace (or love); thus man is rendered capable of performing good works and of earning merits. By this theory, which was classically developed by Thomas Aquinas, the freedom of the will could be acknowledged within the limits of the religion of grace.

Luther*, trained in Nominalism which had criticized the Thomistic doctrine to such an extent that it practically affirmed Pelagianism, overthrew the entire Roman Catholic tradition by a fresh interpretation of the Pauline doctrine of justification. He ceased to understand grace as an impersonal supernatural substance, bound to the sacraments, but interpreted it to mean God's personal relationship of mercy toward the sinner, assured to man in the Word. Confronted by the fatherly mercy of God revealed in Christ, man can do no other than in repentance to acknowledge his utter unworthiness and in faith to receive the assurance of the divine forgiveness. Thus he is justified and reborn. In the presence of God always a sinner, he lives by grace alone, so that he is forced to see himself as sinner and saint at the same time (simul peccator ac iustus).

Luther coupled this thinking, which represents the essential message of the Reformation*, with the doctrine of the "imputation" of the righteousness of Christ upon the undeserving sinner. By virtue of the forensic "imputation"* of the righteousness of Christ upon him, the sinner is "reputed" as righteous. Such became the teaching of Protestant Orthodoxy. It tended to regard justification as an extra-human event—in full contrast to Luther's original message according to which all human experience of God in Christ was viewed as a process of justification.

In the history of Protestantism, the doctrine of justification was developed either on the basis of the "Orthodox" teaching of the divine justifying decree (forensic justification) or as a reaction against it. In liberal Protestantism it lost all significance, partly in connection with the dissolution of the traditional Christology* and partly under the influence of the evolutionary interpretation of religious experience. However, under the impact of the recent revival of the Reformation faith, primarily in Lutheran circles, Luther's original teaching on justification is brought to the fore. See atonement in Christianity; common grace, regeneration; sanctification.

w.p.

Justin Martyr: (2nd cent.) Born ca. 100 A.D. of pagan parents at the Samaritan city of Flavia Neapolis (the ancient Shechem) and well educated in Greek philosophy. On his conversion to Christianity he travelled from place to place, like other professional philosophers, lecturing on the truth of Christian beliefs. Suffered a martyr's death in Rome sometime during the years 163-167. His "Apology," written at Rome ca. 150, is the earliest formal defense of Christianity that has survived. Justin refutes criminal charges brought against Christians, describes Christian worship, and develops a philosophy of the Christian religion. Also the author of a defense of Christianity against Judaism entitled "Dialogue with Trypho." See Apologists.

s.m.g.

Justinian I: (483-565) Emperor at Constantinople, 527-565; reign was epoch in history of Byzantine* empire and Eastern Church. Brought temporary revival of area and prestige of old Roman empire. Instituted legal reforms and codified Roman law. Assumed control over the church and tried unsuccessfully to reconcile orthodox and Monophysite* views. See Constantinople, Councils of.

k.h.c.

juvenile delinquency: A broad term that relates to the criminal or other anti-social acts of children which are sufficiently serious in their consequences for the community, or for the children themselves, as to bring them to the attention of the juvenile court. It should be noted that such a definition stops short of including acts of harmless mischief. Indeed, delinquency need not imply specific acts, such as are involved in the concept of adult crime, but is broad enough in its significance to include mere association with immoral or vicious persons; or, as one statute has it, the situation of a child who is "growing up in idleness and crime." In other words, such a conception takes cognizance of immoral or dangerous tendencies on the part of children and their need for protection from the same.

Furthermore, the legal conception of delinquency has reference to the age limit up to which the juvenile court has jurisdiction. According to state juvenile court laws this varies from 16 to 21 years, the prevailing age limit being 17 years. Above this limit, wherever it is placed, the definitely criminal acts of young persons make them liable to prosecution in the criminal courts. In them the procedure is vastly different from that of the juvenile courts. The former are concerned with specific illegal acts performed, and the identification of accused persons with them; the latter consider evidence relating to the character of children concerning whom a petition of delinquency has been filed, and to the reasons for their behavior. Delinquency involves, therefore, not only a different legal process, but also a fundamentally different type of inquiry, directed not toward conviction, but toward an understanding of the maladjustment of children. The explanation of their difficulties may involve constitutional defects, but perhaps to a larger degree unfavorable environmental influences in family or community life, or both types of circumstance may be present in a complex pattern of interaction.

From all this it appears that the term delinquency has a definitely sociological content, involving under the juvenile court a socialized procedure, looking toward a reorientation of badly adjusted children, and utilizing the facilities of medicine, psychiatry, social case work, or other techniques as may seem promising for the end in view. Finally, it may be observed that this concept of juvenile delinquency, and the institution of the juvenile court, have important implications for the socialization of our methods in dealing with adult crime. See juvenile protection; penology.

L. J. Carr, Delinquency Control (1941); W. Healy, New Light on Delinquency and its Treatment (1936); C. R. Shaw, The Natural History of a Delinquent Career (1931); S. and E. T. Glueck, One Thousand Juvenile Delinquents (1934).   A.E.W.

juvenile protection: Pertaining to activities and agencies for the moral and physical protection of children. The greater complexity of our urban environment, the increasing moral hazards of childhood, and the lessening degree of family control have given rise to the necessity of extra-familial organization for the safeguarding of children from unwholesome influences, whether in the family or in the community at large. Agencies for this purpose were established in many states before 1900, and at present there are possibly over three-hundred such privately supported organizations in the United States, some of them being state-wide in their function. The earliest types were termed Societies for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, but many of them now carry on under the name of Humane Societies which broadened their activities to care for children as well as animals. It is pertinent to observe that the latter had first place in public concern.

Some of these organizations play an important role in the prosecution under the statutes of cases of cruelty and neglect where children are involved. But besides these situations which relate to improper family care the agencies for juvenile protection are concerned with conditions in the community that are moral hazards for children. Such are to be found in dance halls, pool rooms, movies, night-clubs, and other places of recreation; and they are often associated with the unsavory environment of children in the street trades or other places of work. It is natural that these situations are found to be highly related to juvenile delinquency. Some of the organizations that we are discussing specialize in the protection of young girls in urban areas. Others work with unmarried mothers.

Meanwhile, the establishment of juvenile courts, policewomen's bureaus, boys' divisions of police departments, and the activities of the Federal Children's Bureau indicate an increasing concern of publically constituted agencies for problems in this field. Moreover, the movement for juvenile protection has inspired new laws for the control and abatement of unwholesome conditions affecting children; and an increasing emphasis is being placed on preventive work. As yet the movement has only slightly affected conditions in the rural areas where there is undoubtedly much need. As for our cities the problems in this field would seem to indicate that child welfare has been an afterthought in our urban civilization. See juvenile delinquency.

S. and E. T. Glueck, Preventing Crime (1936); G. Abbott, The Child and the State (1938), 2 vols.; H. Folks, The Care of Destitute, Neglected and Delinquent Children (1902).   A.E.W

K

ka: In early Egypt, the spirit guardian and companion which attends the human soul both while the soul is in the living flesh, and also in the after-life. See idols and images.   F.L.P.

kaaba or caaba: (Arabic kabah, a square building from kab, cube) The small, nearly cubical stone building in the court of the Great Mosque at Mecca*, which contains the sacred black rock, thought by Moslems* to have been given by Gabriel to Abraham. It is the object of annual pilgrimage, and worship center to which Moslems turn in daily prayers.   P.E.J.

Kabbalah: (Heb. Kabel—to receive, hence tradition) The esoteric mystic lore of Judaism based upon an occult interpretation of the Bible and handed down as secret doctrine to the initiated. The origin is obscure Evidences of Kabbalistic themes both as speculative theosophy and practical thaumaturgy are found in Apocryphal and Apocalyptic literature and abundantly in Talmudic and Midrashic literature. In the course of its long development, many streams from alien sources flowed into it—Gnosticism, Neo-Platonism, Neo-Pythagoreanism, possibly also Zoroastrianism and Suffism. Its birthplace was Palestine, but it was in Babylonia, during the Geonic period (550-1000 A.D.) that it experienced its first substantial systematic development. At least two important Kabbalistic works were composed or edited here, the "Sefer Yetzirah" (The Book of Formation), on the creative powers of letters and numbers, a most widely studied and commented work, and the "Shiur Komah" (The Measure of the Height) an anthropomorphic work on the dimensions of the Deity.

From Babylonia the center of Kabbalah moved, in the ninth and tenth centuries, to Italy, Spain, the Provence and Germany. Among the forerunners of Kabbalah in Europe were Aaron ben Samuel, who brought it from Babylonia to Italy, Isaac the Blind and Azriel in the Provence, the Kalonymus family, who transplanted it from Italy to Germany, Judah the Pious and Eleazar of Worms, and, in Spain, Moses ben Nachman*. To this period belong the Kabbalistic classics "Masechet Atzilut" (A Treatise on Emanation) by Jacob Nazir (12 c); the "Sefer Ha-Bahir", (The Luminous Book—13 c); and the "Sefer Ha-Temunah", (The Book of the Image—13 c).

The most significant book of this period, however, and the one which came to be regarded as the holiest of all Kabbalistic writings, and the very epitome of Jewish mysticism, was the Zohar*, made known to the public by Moses de Leon in 1300.

The next great period of Kabbalah was in the 16th century. Its principal center was in Palestine, more especially in the city of Safed. Next in importance was the center in Poland. The foremost Kabbalists of this period were Moses Cordovero (1522-1570), Isaac Luria (1533-1572), the father of modern "practical" Kabbalah, and his disciple, Chayim Vital (1543-1620) who committed the teachings of Luria to writing. Luria was the founder of a school of Kabbalistic speculation in which redemption and messianism figured prominently which greatly influenced the subsequent development of Kabbalah. The Lurianic Kabbalah was one of the spiritual sources of the popular mystic movement of Eastern Europe in the 18th and 19th centuries known as Chasidism*.

With the advent of the Zohar, the study of Kabbalah spread among the masses of the people. It ceased to be the secret doctrine of the few. Everybody studied it, even the young. Especially was this true of the Jews in Poland. Frequently leading Rabbinic authorities inveighed against this popular absorption in Kabbalistic studies which fed many superstitions and aberrations.

Kabbalism attracted the interest of Christian scholars in the Middle Ages. Prominent among them were Raymond Lully, Pico della Mirandola and John Reuchlin—first as a reaction to medieval scholastic theology and then in the hope of finding substantiation for Christian doctrine, in the mystic writings of the Jews.

The central themes of Kabbalah are the nature of the Deity—the "En Sof"—(The Limitless One) and the ways by which He has made Himself manifest—the "Ten Sefirot" (Emanations), the four Universes of Atzilah (Emanation), Beriah (Creation), Yetzirah (Formation), and Asia (Action), the Soul of man, its nature and consummation, the mysteries of the Divine Name, good and evil, man's place in the universe, heaven and hell, the order of the angels and demons, Israel, the Exile, redemption and the Messiah.

Kabbalah employed a characteristic exegetical technique which gave it great freedom and scope. It regarded not only every word of the Bible—written in Hebrew, the very language of God—but every letter, every vowel and all their possible permutations and combinations as holding profound mysteries. Thus the Bible was interpreted not only literally, allegorically, homiletically and anagogically, but also through the devices of Gematria (the interpretation of a word according to the numerical value of its letters), Notarikon (taking each letter of a word as the initial of some other word), Temurah (substituting one letter for another) and Tziruf or Chiluf (transposing the letters—anagram). Thus Kabbalah never felt the constraint of the "letter which killeth" and never came into conflict with the written Scriptures as Christian mystics frequently did. See Judaism (Introductory).
Adolf Franck, The Kabbalah (1926), Christian Ginsburg, The Kabbalah (1920) ; A. E Waite, The Holy Kabbalah (1929) ; Jew. Encycl. (1901-05) s v "Cabala".   A.H.S.

kaddish: (Aramaic, holy) An ancient Jewish prayer for the hallowing of God's name and coming of His Kingdom. Its opening words parallel the first three phrases of the Lord's Prayer, pointing to a traditional prayer form from which both stem. This Aramaic doxology, originally closing a sermon, in the synagogue liturgy closes a section of the service. Since medieval times it has become the mourner's declaration of faith.
                                             D.S.P.

Kaehler, Martin: Protestant theologian. Born 1835, Neuhausen, East Prussia, 1860 privatdozent in Halle, 1864 professor of Systematic Theology in Bonn, 1865-1912 in Halle. Under the early influences of R. Rothe, J. T. Beck and neo-Lutheran pietism Kaehler developed a type of theology of great originality and depth. His aim was the combination of the cognitive and the experiential aspects of Biblical Christianity. His central idea was the indissoluble unity of the historical and the suprahistorical in the Biblical events. He did much to explode the "historical Jesus" of Protestant liberalism. According to Kaehler theology is primarily soteriology. His theological method is characterized by the triangular nature of its authorities: Bible, Church and personal experience in mutual interrelation. His theology is the mature re-integration of the theological developments of the nineteenth century, interpreted by a man of great intellectual force and spiritual warmth. The clumsiness and occasional obscurity of his literary style prevented his theology from becoming as popular as it deserved. He had no direct follower. But with ingenious certitude and vision he pointed to the problems which the theology of the twentieth century had to face. The theological development of Germany for the last thirty years reveals everywhere its indebtedness to Kaehler.
Principal works:
Die Wissenschaft von der christlichen Lehre (1883, 3rd ed. 1905) ; Der sog. historische Jesus und der geschichtliche biblische Christus (1892, 2nd ed. 1896) ;

Dogmatische Zeitfragen, 3 vols. (1898-1913) ; Das Kreuz Grund und Mass für die Christologie (1911). For a list of his remarkable articles in Herzog's Realencyclopädie, 3rd ed. see vol. 22, p. xix. On Kaehler see. Ch. Boegner, D. Martin Kaehler (1912) , O Zanker, Grundlinien der Theologie Martin Kaehlers (1914) ; F Kattenbusch, Die deutsche Theologie seit Schleiermacher, (2nd ed. 1934), p. 65ff.   O.A.P.

kafir or kaffir: (Arabic kafir, infidel, from kafara, to be skeptical) An epithet applied to all unbelievers by the Moslems A non-Mohammedan or infidel. *Gabar or Gheber, (Persian non-believer), is thought to be derived from kafir.
                                             P.E.J.

Kaftan, Julius Wilhelm: (1848-1926) Professor of theology in universities in Germany, Kaftan's career like that of most of his theologian colleagues, was a song of ascent, going from strength to strength until arriving at Zion (Berlin University) in 1883 Kaftan was a leading member of the Religio-historical school.
Author. The Essence (Wesen) of the Christian Religion (1881) ; The Truth (Wahrheit) of the Christian Religion (1898) , Dogmatics (1897) ; The Philosophy of Protestantism (1917) , also volumes and addresses on Kant and his relation to Protestant theology.
Cf. Die Religionswissenschaft in Selbstdarstellung, edited by D. E Stange (Leipzig, 1928) .   J.W.B.

Kaftan, Theodor: (1847-1932) He was general church superintendent for Schleswig. As a Lutheran, he developed the modern theology of the old faith, a mild form of didactic method that placed the metaphysical back of the living faith, and sharply stressed the opposition to Troeltsch*.
Moderne Theologie des alten Glaubens (Schleswig, 1905) ; Zur Verständigung über moderne Theologie des alten Glaubens (Schleswig, 1909) ; Ernst Troeltsch (Schleswig. 1912) .   H.H.

Kahnis, Karl Friedrich August: (1814-1888) He was professor in Breslau and Leipzig. He sought to surmount the opposition between the N.T. and the dogma of the Trinity by regarding the Son and the Spirit subordinistically as God in the word's second and third sense. He took a mediating rôle towards all dogmatic questions.
Lutherische Dogmatik, 3 vols. (Leipzig, 1861-68) , Der innere Gang des deutschen Protestantismus (Leipzig, 1854) ; Zeugnis von den Grundwahrheiten des Protestantismus gegen Hengstenberg (Leipzig, 1862) .
                                             H.H.

kalam: (Arabic, meaning conversation) The fundamentals of religion as defended in public controversy within Islam and with members of other religious communities. Scholastic Moslem* theology.   P.E.J.

Kalevala: (Finn) National epic of Finland, a poem of fifty runes or divisions, each averaging nearly 500 lines, compiled from popular songs, by a Finnish patriot, and rated by some scholars as one of the few greatest epics of the world. Parts of the epic were composed by different unknown composers at different periods; along with the epic are lyric and folk poems. Songs of heroes reach back into pre-Christian Finland. some legendary poems are stories about Christ.

The epic was compiled by Elias Lonnrot, a Finn who visited districts of his land and brought the songs together. It was first published in 1835 and contained about 12,000 lines; a later edition, issued in 1849, is the epic as it stands today, and contains 22,793 lines.

The name, Kalevala, is derived from an ancestor of heroes, Kaleva, not mentioned in the epic. It means 'the land of the heroes', i.e., Finland.   F.L.P.

Kali: Hindu goddess, the wife or Shakti of Shiva*. Represented as terrible in form, with a necklace of human heads, a girdle of several human arms, holding a bloody dripping sword in one of her many hands and sometimes standing with one foot on the prostrate body of her husband Shiva, she is nevertheless, known to many and lovingly worshiped as "the mother". She is one of the few Indian deities to whom animal sacrifice is still offered. To the more philosophical Hindus she is the personification of cosmic force which is by them thought to be feminine. She is said to be the creator of all things, even the gods, including Shiva himself. See Thags.
                                                        C.S.B.

kalpa: A world period in Hinduism, the time between the creation of the world and its destruction. Some Indian schools of thought believe in an eternal succession of kalpas, e.g., Bhagavad-Gita IX, 7, VIII, 17-19, Svetāsvatara Up. III, 2, etc.   C.S.B.

kami: (Japanese word translated variously by "deity," "deities," "god," 'goddess," etc.) In origin kami has a significance similar to that of *mana or "occult power."   D.C.H.

Kant, Immanuel: (1724-1804) Kant dealt with all branches of philosophy and some of science, but his chief aim was to harmonize cognitive and ethical interests. He said he had been forced to limit knowledge to make room for faith. But the faith was also limited, a "religion within the bounds of mere reason" (the title of one of his books). God was posited as cosmic judge and policeman to secure the happiness of the virtuous, immortality was an inconceivable timeless essence of the soul (as noumenon or thing in itself); freedom was not choice of open alternatives within time, but an unthinkable ability of the timeless self to have chosen an alternative temporal world. Yet faith, though beginning where knowledge ended, was neither irrational nor based upon mere intuition. It was based upon ethics, and Kant's ethics was the most rationalistic possible; for its principle was, act from precepts capable of rational generalization, valid, like truths of pure reason, for all thinking beings. Even the motive of ethical action is "respect" for rationality of will, not desire for happiness, whether our own or others'. A frequent misunderstanding takes this to mean we are to ignore probable consequences of our acts for human welfare. Kant says rather: man, by instinct, or without ethics, makes happiness a goal, and this goal can be rationalized or ethicized only by generalizing it to include the happiness of all. As ethical, we want to be rational in all things, therefore also in happiness-seeking. The whole of practical hedonism is included in Kant's system, save that certain methods of promoting the general happiness are vetoed as incapable of rationalization, even though their goal be rational. Thus if all men accepted the principle of lying in the general interest, this would destroy mutual trust, and the lies, not being believed, would serve no interest whatever. Yet, since life is based on probability, the chance that a man might be saying truth would perhaps give his words significance, even in the case supposed.

Kant's famous theory of knowledge is as follows. Experience, therefore positive knowledge, is temporal through and through. This temporal character supports a priori knowledge: the unity of time grounds causal connectedness; space, inseparable from time, grounds geometry; while we know a priori what time is, since it is the inherent pattern of our own intuitive perceptions, our innate way of seeing all things. Time and space must be viewed as dimensions, not of things, but only of our experience of things. For: if time and space were real apart from us, we could not know a priori, as, with respect to geometry, arithmetic, and such principles of science as causality, we must and do know it; further, time and space are self-contradictory ideas (involve antinomies*) when construed as real totalities; again, if the temporal side of things is real then the soul is not free, since time is causal through and through; finally, if time and space are ultimately real, then God, the ultimate being, must be temporal and spatial—for Kant, as for nearly all his predecessors, an absurdity. Upon these four arguments the system largely rests. Recent thought tends to undermine all of them. Many philosophers now hold that time* and space can be conceived as attributes of a real totality; that time is not causal in a strict or deterministic sense; and that God and the soul are in process (or process is in them)—see eternal, eternity. A priori knowledge might still, in Kantian fashion, be viewed as involving innate forms of possible experience given to us by intuition, but such forms, e.g., space (not, however, as Euclidian) and time, may be applicable to all things because they are dimensions not simply of human but even of divine experience (with which we are in intuitive contact), and because things as objects of divine experience and things as real are identical. (See omniscience). Post-Kantian Idealism (from Fichte to Royce or Bradley) reconstructs Kant in some such way, but confusedly or without freeing itself from unreconstructed (and inconsistent) elements. See autonomy; epistemology; heteronomy; infinite.

Immanuel Kant: Critique of Pure Reason (1781); Fundamental Principles of the Metaphysic of Morality (1785); Critique of Practical Reason (1788); Critique of Judgment (1790), Kant's views on aesthetics and teleology; Religion Within the Bounds of Mere Reason (1793-4).   C.H.

Kaplan, Mordecai M.: (1881-) The leading mind among the exponents of modernistic Judaism, representing the crystallization of religio-culturism, known as Reconstructionism. The central threads of the texture of his thought are. Religion is the consciousness of group values. Universalistic aspirations of Judaism, Christianity and Islam are illusory. The vitalization of Jewish religion demands the intensification of Jewish national consciousness. Judaism is a civilization, not merely a religion. Religion is a healthy reaction to life. The residual element of belief which religion insists upon is that the universe is so constructed as to make sure that the ideals of humanity will ultimately be realized. Kaplan limits God to the actually observed striving of men. He believes the traditional principles of Judaism must be consciously reinterpreted, calling for a shift of the center of gravity from religion to nationalism.

Judaism as a Civilization (1934) ; The Meaning of God in Modern Jewish Religion (1937). H.H.

Karaites: A Jewish sect flourishing in the Near East, principally in Babylonia, from the 9th to the 12th centuries. The name Karaites means literally the "Readers of Scriptures", and they were so called because of their exclusive adherence to the Bible (O.T.) as a source of religious authority in Judaism, and the repudiation of the Talmud as a spurious invention of the rabbis. The movement was initiated by Anan ben David who had been shelved from succession to the political leadership of the Babylonian Jewish community. The inevitable necessity of implementing the Bible (O.T.) with details of procedure forced the Karaites, on the one hand, to permit the individual conscience freely to interpret the Bible (O.T.), with a resultant anarchy of religious observance; some of the Karaite communities even dividing on the fixation of the religious calendar. On the other hand, the repudiation of Talmudic developments of Biblical law forced the Karaites into a very severe religious discipline. Applying the Biblical enactments literally, they, for example forbade the use of fire on the Sabbath. Some 12,000 Karaites are still supposed to exist, most of them in Russian Crimea. Karaism was important in Judaism for stimulating among Jews a new emphasis upon the study of the Bible (O.T.) and a vigorous polemic in defense of the Talmud tradition. The best known representative of this anti-Karaite reaction is Saadi ben Joseph* (882-942), the brilliant Egyptian Jewish scholar and philosopher who subsequently became the head of the Rabbinic Academy in Sura, Babylonia.

B.Z.B.

karma: See Buddhist Terminology.

karma-marga: Term descriptive of "salvation by works" in Hinduism, i.e., salvation by what one does, not knowledge, or faith. The kind of "works" varies widely in different phases of Hinduism. In Vedic times it meant sacrifice, in Jainism it meant asceticism, at other times moral effort. C.S.B.

kathenotheism: A term invented by Max Müller* which literally denotes one-at-a-time theism.

It symbolizes the Vedic monotheistic practice according to which the position of the gods is so arranged that each god is supreme in turn. H.H.

Kattenbusch, Ferdinand: (1851-1936) German Protestant theologian. He was born at Kettwig (Ruhr), in 1876 he became privatdozent at Goettingen. He was a disciple of Albrecht Ritschl*. From 1878-1904 he was professor of Church History in Giessen and from 1904-1923 at Halle. His main interest was in the history of Christian doctrine and "Konfessionskunde*". Editor of Theologische Studien und Kritiken 1910-1934.

Principal works: Luthers Lehre vom unfreien Willen und von der Praedestination (1875, 2nd ed. 1905), Lehrbuch der vergleichenden Konfessionskunde, vol. 1 (1892) ; Die deutsche evangelische Theologie seit Schleiermacher (1892, 6th ed 1934), Das Apostolische Symbol, 2 vols. (1894-1900) ; Deus absconditus bei Luther (1920), Der Quellort der Kirchenidee (1921) ; Die Doppelschichtigkeit in Luthers Kirchenbegriff (1928). O.A.P.

Keble, John: (1792-1866) English clergyman, scholar, and poet. A leader in the Oxford Movement*, translator of Irenaeus and editor of Hooker, he became best known for his devotional verse, especially The Christian Year (1827), which attained great popularity. See Anglo-Catholics. L.W.C.

Keil, Wilhelm: Founder of communities at Bethel, Mo., and Aurora, Ore. See communistic settlements, religious.

Kelpius, Johann: See communistic settlements, religious.

Kempis, Thomas à: See Imitation of Christ; Groote.

kenosis: (From the Greek word kenosis, meaning "emptying") It is applied to the action of Christ on becoming man in Philippians 2.7, where the verb is used. The heavenly Christ gave up what he possessed in contrast to grasping for something further as the first Adam had done (See also II Cor. 8.9). From this biblical use, the term came to be applied to the self-limitation of the divine attributes by the Son of God in the Incarnation*. The idea was given prominence by such nineteenth century theologians as Thomasius, Gess, and Frank as they faced the problem of harmonizing the Christological statements of the orthodox creeds with the portrait of Jesus offered by the critical, historical study of the gospels. See humiliation of Christ. C.T.C.

Kepler, Johann: (1571-1630) He is the founder of exact modern science. His Neo-Pythagoreanism and Neo-Platonism enabled him to discover an illuminating proof of his Christian theology, clothed in animistic and allegorico-naturalistic statements. He conceived of God as the creator of the world in accordance with the Pythagorean principle of perfect numbers. The real world is the mathematical harmonies discoverable in phenomena. The mathematical harmonies in the mind of God are the genuine causes of things. Both speculatively and mathematically, Kepler thought the Copernican world scheme justified in the progressive achievements of mathematics and astronomy.

E. A. Burtt, The Metaphysical Foundations of Modern Science (1925).   H.H.

Keshub Chunder Sen: (1838-1884) A distinguished leader of the Brahma-Samaj*. Disagreement with Devendra Nath Tagore led in 1866 to a division of the society into the Adi Brahma Samaj or Original Brahma Samaj which followed Tagore, and the Bharatvarshiya Brahma Samaj or the Brahma Samaj of India, the larger section, of which Keshub Chunder Sen was the leader. It was much more largely influenced by Christianity than the other which reacted in the direction of Hinduism. Sen attained enormous popularity and was heard by multitudes wherever he went. His movement was deeply affected when he permitted his thirteen year old daughter to marry the Hindu Raja of Cooch Behar. Having fought long against child marriage and the idolatrous Hindu rites, many even of his staunchest admirers were unable to accept his acquiesence in this marriage. A split took place in the Samaj and the Sadharan (inclusive) Brahma Samaj was formed. In 1880 Keshub founded the Navha Vidhan or Church of the New Dispensation in which he continued his ministry until his death in 1884. One Indian writer has said of him: "Keshub's chief service not only to Hinduism but to the world lies in the fact that he in his life and experience affiliated the mystic consciousness of the Hindu race to the Christ ideal".

M. C. Parekh, Rajarshi Keshub Chunder Sen (Rajkot, Kathiawad, India, 1926).   C.S.B.

Kessler Lecture Foundation: A lectureship at Hamma Divinity School of Wittenberg College, Springfield, Ohio, established in 1921 by Mrs. Emma B. Kessler of Louisville, Ky., and providing an endowment of $10,000, the interest of which is to be used periodically for "a series of lectures dealing with subjects related to the practical work of the ministry". At first these lectures were held annually, but in recent years biennially. Among the lecturers have been: Dr. E. P. Pfatteicher, "Christian Social Science"; President F. H. Knubel, "The Ministry and the Church"; Prof. Otto Piper, "The Use of History and Doctrine in Preaching"; Dr. W. S. Sadler, "Pastoral Psychiatry"; Dr. Conrad Bergendoff, "The Divine Impulse in Preaching"; Dr. Bernhard M. Christensen, "The Impact of Preaching". Most of these lectures have been published.

                                                          T.A.K.

Keswick Conference: An annual gathering of Evangelicals in the Church of England, held at Keswick in the Lake District during the summer. The conferences have been deeply influential in promoting the spiritual life of "low churchmen" in England, like Northfield meetings in America.

                                                          W.N.P.

ketubah: (Heb., writ) Marriage contract, instituted by Simeon ben Shatah (1st cent., B.C.E.) for the protection of the wife in case of divorce or widowhood. Earlier references to deeds of marriage appear in the Assuan Papyri (5th cent.), and in Tobit 7 14 (also in the Code of Hammurabi). Serving as a mere memorandum of obligations assumed by the husband, without power of validating marriage, it is retained in Orthodox Jewish practice on traditional grounds.   s.s.c.

keys,. power of the: This refers to supremacy of jurisdiction in the Catholic Church as vested in the Holy Father. In conferring this power, Christ used the analogy of keys. Just as the one who possesses the keys of a house possesses complete authority over the house and its tenants, so also the Supreme Pontiff*, head of the house of God in this world, has the power or the keys or supreme dominion over the Church and its members. See Peter, St., First Bishop of Rome.   w.h.

Keyserling, Hermann: (1880-) A free-lance writer on religious and philosophical topics who has had a considerable following in Germany. His Schule der Weisheit with semi-annual sessions at Darmstadt has attracted able lecturers. Keyserling teaches an intuitive approach to problems of truth and value with emphasis on the uniqueness of the individual and the need of differentiating between one's own abilities and those of other men. "He who always does what is in accord with his deepest nature necessarily does right." Keyserling has shown unusual ability to grasp the special features of a culture or a period and to describe them vividly.

Chief works in English: Travel Diary of a Philosopher (1925); Book of Marriage (1926); Europe (1928); Creative Understanding (1929), Immortality (1938).   J.S.B.

khalif: See caliph.

Kharijites: (Arabic, khawagri, come-outers) An early Moslem* sect of Arabia. They were radical reformers who sought to establish a theocracy, urging that a faithful man of whatever tribe or nation might be called to the caliphate. They opposed the *Shi ites, and eventually broke up into minor sects.   P.E.J.

Khlysty: See Russian sectarianism.

Khnum: The ram god of Elephantine, Egypt. In early Egypt, the ram, along with other animals, rated as an actual god; each such animal god was associated with an Egyptian city.   F.L.P.

kibla or kiblah: The direction of the Kaaba in Mecca, toward which Moslems face when in prayer. In a mosque it is indicated by a niche in the wall called the mihrab. Mohammed is supposed to have started the custom by turning toward the sacred rock (Kaaba) to pray.   P.E.J.

Kidd, Benjamin: (1858-1916) He maintained that just as in animal evolution every step costs an enormous price in the extermination of a great many lives, so any progress within mankind itself costs a great price. In order that a few individuals or groups could progress, a great many other individuals or groups have had to sacrifice themselves. Religion has also been a factor responsible for social progress. Human social evolution has not been due so much to egotistical reason as to ultra-rational faith. Religion is responsible for all the altruistic actions of men. The stronger religion is the more social the groups and the more chances they have to survive. Religion is responsible for man's non-revolt against progress and for his continuing to pay its terrible price.

B. Kidd, Social Evolution (1894)   H.H.

kiddush: (literally sanctification) Prayer of the Sabbath* and festivals to usher in and sanctify the sacred day. According to the Talmud* (Berakot 33a) the ceremony of kiddush was instituted by the men of the Great Synagogue*. That it was firmly established during the first century of the Christian era, is evident from the various rules on the ceremony emanating from the schools of Hillel and Shammai.

Cf. L. N. Dembitz in Jewish Encyclopedia, Vol. VII, pp. 483-484.   B.C.

kiddush hashem and hillul hashem: The sanctification and desecration of God's name. Two terms denoting the positive and negative aspects of a concept which has always been an extremely important criterion of ethical behavior in Judaism.

The former refers to any act which reflects glory upon the name of God and finds its highest expression in martyrdom in the cause of religion. On the other hand, any act which discredits the name of God is hillul hashem and is to be avoided at all costs.   E.B.—L.F.

Kierkegaard, Soeren: (1813-1855) Outstanding religious thinker and writer. Almost his whole life was spent in Copenhagen. Notwithstanding the remarkable literary qualities of his writings and the originality and freshness of his thought K. was hardly known outside Denmark during his lifetime and not taken seriously by his compatriots. His name became gradually familiar to theologians in the last third of the past century. But not until Karl Barth* had re-interpreted him in his Epistle to the Romans was his momentous significance fully realized.

In his nature a deep-seated melancholy—an heritage from his father—was coupled with an amazing gift of incisive analytical thinking and a very fertile imagination. Under the influence of melancholy scruples he broke his engagement with Christine Olsen in 1840, and this event, interpreted by K. both as necessity and as guilt, left its traces upon most of his writings. A polemic with a Copenhagen literary magazine, that had ridiculed him, as well as protracted literary attacks on what he thought was a godless church made his last years a period of great unhappiness to him.

Kierkegaard wanted to be an orthodox Lutheran Christian. Over against Hegel, Kierkegaard developed early the idea of existentiality (adopted recently by modern Existenz philosophy), meaning thereby an attitude towards life, in which a person commits himself totally to the claims of the Absolute without regard for the cost involved. This attitude is opposed to the 'spectator attitude' of science and speculative philosophy. With great emphasis K. pointed out that the hardships of such existential life were made tolerable only through the certainty of divine grace and forgiveness of sins. Next to St. Augustine and Pascal it is to his relentless selfscrutiny that we owe the most important contributions to the psychology of faith and Christian anthropology. Except for a number of "Devotional Discourses" Kierkegaard published his works pseudonymously or called himself merely the editor, thereby indicating that he had not succeeded himself in attaining to the ideal of true Christianity as portrayed in his books. While his thoughts do not lend themselves to systematization they begin to operate as a wholesome corrective both upon Protestant and Roman Catholic theology. See reason in religion. Cf. Unamuno, M.

Works. The Oxford University Press London, the Augsburg Publishing House, Minneapolis Minn., and the Princeton University Press, Princeton, N. J. share in the merits of having provided English translations of all of K.'s works. Among the translators Walter Lowrie excels in his literary qualities and his indefatigable zeal to introduce K. to the Anglo-Saxon world.

Philosophical Fragments (1936) ; Purify Your Hearts (London, 1937) ; another translation. Purity of Heart Is To Will One Thing (1938) , The Present Age (London, 1940) , The Journals of S Kierkegaard. A selection (London, 1938) , Christian Discourses and The Lilies of the Field And the Birds In the Air, and three discourses at the communion on Fridays (London, 1939) ; The Point of View (London, 1939) ; Fear and Trembling (London, 1939) ; Stages on Life's Way (1940) ; Consider the Lilies (London, 1940) , For Selfexamination (1940, London, 1941) , Repetition (1941) . The Sickness Unto Death (1941) ; Training in Christianity (London, 1941) ; Concluding Unscientific Postscript (1941) , Thoughts on Crucial Situations in Human Life (1941) ; On Kierkegaard: E. Geismar, Soeren Kierkegaard, 6 v. Danish and German (Goettingen, 1926-29) ; W. Lowrie, Kierkegaard (London, 1938) ; E. L. Allen, Kierkegaard, his life and thought (London, 1935) ; John A. Bain, Kierkegaard, his life and religious teaching (London, 1935) ; Eduard Geismar, Lectures on the religious thought of Kierkegaard (1937) ; D F Swenson, Something about Kierkegaard (1941) ; G. Hofding, Soeren Kierkegaard als Philosoph (Stuttgart, 1902) ; M. Channing-Pearce, The Terrible Crystal. Studies in Kierkegaard and Modern Christianity (London, 1940) .   O.A.P.

Kilwardby, Robert: (unknown—1279) English Dominican of Augustinian tendencies, later Archbishop of Canterbury and Cardinal. Author of many Commentaries to the Aristotelian text and of a ranking treatise On the Origin and Division of Philosophy. His anti-Thomistic attitude led him to the condemnation of some of the doctrines of Saint Thomas Aquinas* in March 18, 1277. S.C.T.

kindness: That mode of affection and benevolence which is expressed in considerate, friendly, gracious and magnanimous behavior toward others. It is opposed to the spirit of callousness, harshness and ill-will. It seems to have its basis in the tender, social impulses of man and to be a natural expression of affection in the family and kinship group. With the growth of civilization it has come, by a process of ethical extension, to be regarded as a universal requirement in the treatment of all persons. The higher religions stress it as essential to the moral life. In Christianity it is held to be an expression of the loving character of God and a primary virtue for all men of good will.   R.W.F.

King, Henry Churchill: (1858-1934) Graduated Oberlin College, 1879, Seminary, 1882; studied at Harvard and Berlin Universities. Professor of Philosophy, Oberlin College 1891-1897, Theology, Oberlin Seminary 1897-1925; President, Oberlin College, 1902-1927. His teaching and writing, based upon the philosophy of Lotze,* have done much to further Christian philosophy and theology and to promote "reverence for personality".

Author: Reconstruction of Theology (1901); Theology and the Social Consciousness (1902); The Seeming Unreality of the Spiritual Life (1908), The Ethics of Jesus (1910), and many other volumes.   J.W.B.

King James version: See Bible, English.

kingdom of God: (same as kingdom of heaven*) The term used in the NT, chiefly in the Synoptic Gospels, for the final realization and fulfillment of God's reign over the world. In its origin the term reflects the theocratic idea, deeply embedded in ancient Hebrew religious thought. "The Kingdom is the Lord's," and the earthly king is only the representative or 'Son' of God. Thus the ancient Hebrews shared the old Oriental idea of kingship, along with the neighboring peoples of the Near East. A more vigorous advocacy of the theocratic idea ("God alone is king") by the prophetic party resulted in conflict with the popular idea of the earthly king as head of the nation.

In the end the purely theocratic idea triumphed, with the result that Jewish apocalyptic conceived of the Kingdom as belonging to the Lord, without any independent Jewish king at the head of the nation. That is, world-sovereignty now belongs to God alone and he puts down and sets up earthly powers, even world empires, as he chooses (Daniel 7, esp. verse 27). Although in much of the literature of post-exilic Judaism the theocratic idea included a hierarchical organization, with a high priest at the head of the nation, the general tendency was to view all earthly figures as incidental or non-essential. That this idea was widely held is clear from the repeated protests of the Jews, chiefly of the Pharisees, against "the kingly and other forms of government," as we are told by Josephus.

Although in many of the apocalypses and also in the Old Testament itself an ideal figure is pictured as coming to hold the Last Judgment* or to destroy Israel's enemies, and to reign forever—or for a long time—over the restored nation, it is nevertheless true that there are prophetic and apocalyptic books which take no account of this ideal figure, the Anointed of the Lord, the Messiah.*

The profound religious significance of the whole idea of God's universal reign is clear from the prophets and from the Psalms (esp. Ps. 145). When God takes his great power and reigns over his world, then Israel will be exalted, sickness, suffering, and death will be done away, wars will be no more, peace and plenty will prevail, and "the earth will be full of the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea" (Isaiah 11:9).

According to the Synoptic Gospels (Mark 1.15) Jesus began his ministry in Galilee by announcing that 'the Kingdom of God is at hand.' His ethics was ethics of the Kingdom, unfolding the kind of character God requires in those who belonged to his Kingdom (the Beatitudes, for example), his parables set forth various aspects of the coming of the Kingdom and of men's preparation for it by repentance and obedience to the will of God. Some scholars hold that Jesus believed the Kingdom had already begun ('Realized Eschatology'), others that it was still in the future, though not remote.

It was also clear that the Synoptic Gospels assume, following Mark, that Jesus was Messiah even during his earthly life, and did not have to wait for the resurrection to set him forth in his true nature—though only a few of his followers knew the secret. Perhaps the primitive idea was that he "became" Messiah at the resurrection; if so, that idea has been revised in the earliest gospel.

In the apostolic church, the Kingdom of God still means the future consummation of the divine reign; at the same time the church, the new community of the elect, the New or True Israel, shares in the good things of the age to come; its powers are already manifest in the mighty works not only of Jesus but of his disciples and of the Messianic community which represents the beginning of the New Age. It was an easy step from this view to the conception of the Kingdom as the empirical church, and we find late passages in the New Testament which reflect this high ecclesiastical view (e.g. Matt. 13:41). At the same time the ethical emphasis is made clear, especially by Paul (e.g. Rom. 14:17). It is clear that the New Testament conception, including the one set forth in Jesus' own teaching, transcends the limitations of nationality (e.g. Matt. 8:11), and also, at least in Paul, it transcends any possible realization in this world (I Cor. 15:50).

Thus the data are at hand within the NT itself for the later dogmatic and philosophical interpretations of the phrase. In general these have been as follows: 1) Retaining the purely eschatological* conception found in the Jewish apocalypses, and relying largely upon the supposed implications of the synonymous expression, Kingdom of Heaven, it has been maintained that the term means simply and exclusively the consummation, "when God shall be all in all," reigning triumphantly with his saints in Heaven; after this world has passed away. 2) An alternative view identifies the Kingdom of God with the divine or supernatural aspect of the existing church; that is, the Kingdom of God is really the Kingdom of Grace, engaged in constant warfare with the Kingdom of sin, Satan, and death, destined ultimately to be victorious and permanent

(this is more or less the basic idea of St. Augustine's City of God). 3) Still another idea identifies the Kingdom of God completely with the empirical church, though for theology of this type the 'empirical' church is more than just the sum total of Christian communities in the world: it is the Una Sancta and is the organ and instrument of divine revelation and grace in this present world, eventually it is to take the place of this present world when the Church Militant will be merged with the Church Triumphant (this is more or less the idea underlying the theology of the Council of Trent*). 4) Still another interpretation is the one set forth by Albrecht Ritschl,* according to which the Kingdom of God represents the consummation of human history, an idea characteristic of 19th-century science and philosophy: it is "the one far-off divine event toward which the whole creation moves." At the same time there are expressions in the NT which seem to justify such a view (e.g. Col. 1:9-20).

5) Still another view popular in modern times interprets the Kingdom of God as a sublime social hope. It is the ancient Hebrew, Jewish, and early Christian way of setting forth the ideal of a world at peace and blessed with plenty. So far as the social hope remains religious, there are certainly elements in it which correspond to the primitive idea of the Kingdom of God—not only as reflected in the OT and in the Jewish apocalyptic literature, but also in the NT. For example, the reign of the saints upon earth (in Revelation 20:1-6) is a transitional period between this world and the next, and yet the reign takes place upon this present earth (see also Luke 22.28-30). However, nowhere in the NT or in biblical literature generally is the Kingdom of God viewed as a humanly-achieved new order of society. The roots of the conception are Semitic, not Greek; religious, not humanitarian or secular. From first to last the biblical idea emphasizes the fact that it is God's reign. The emphasis is upon the character of the King, not upon the extent or nature or even duration of the realm he controls, though these are assumed to be final and absolute.

Thus the doctrine of the Kingdom of God is one of fundamental, regulative importance for the NT and the early church. If we can trace the stages through which the idea passed in its biblical development, this is not to ignore but really to emphasize its far-reaching significance for Hebrew, Jewish, and (especially) for early Christian religious thought. See social gospel.

See J. Weiss, Predigt Jesu vom Reiche Gottes, 2nd ed. (1900); E. F. Scott, The Kingdom of God in the New Testament (1931); M. Goguel, The Life of Jesus (1933), E. tr.;R. Otto, The Kingdom of God and the Son of Man (1938), E tr; T W. Manson, The Teaching of Jesus (1931); E. W. K. Mould, The World-View of Jesus (1941); C. H. Dodd, The Parables of the Kingdom (1935); F. C. Grant, The Gospel of the Kingdom (1940).   F.C.G.

kingdom of heaven: Same as kingdom of God*; 'Heaven' was used by ancient Jews as a circumlocution for the divine name.   F.C.G.

Kingo, Thomas Hansen: (1634-1703) Danish bishop, author of the official Danish Church Hymnal of 1699. A representative of orthodoxy of the baroque period, his best hymns treated of the themes of Lent and Easter.   C.J.B.

kings, divine right of: Theory that kings have absolute authority because they hold their position directly from God and not from consent of their people. It owes something to ancient ideas of sacredness of monarchy and special honours given to emperor. In medieval period became associated with theories of imperial party in struggle against papal supremacy. With rise of nationalism and Protestantism there was exaltation of civil ruler in some quarters. In 17th century the theory centered in claims of Stuart kings in England. In recent centuries it has been expressed in extreme form in certain European autocratic monarchies. See emperor worship; divine right.   K.H.C.

Kings, I and II: Historical books of the O.T., included among the "Former Prophets"* in the Hebrew canon, where they form a single volume. They recount the history of the Hebrew nation from the closing days of David* and accession of Solomon* (ca. 970 B.C.) to the release of King Jehoiachin from a Babylonian prison by Amel-Marduk (561 B.C.). The first edition of this work was written by a Deuteronomic historian ca. 600 B.C. (see D), and a later edition, with supplementary matter especially of North Israelite origin, was issued half a century later. References are made throughout the work to several sources employed in the writing: The Book of the Acts of Solomon (I 11 41), The Book of the Chronicles of the Kings of Israel (I 14.19), and a similar work on Judaean kings (I 14.29). These were probably biographies and histories based in part upon official annals. In addition, the editors apparently used temple chronicles and popular narratives concerning prophets, especially Elijah* and Elisha. While the Books of Kings are frequently our only or principal sources of information for long periods of Hebrew history, and while their information is largely authentic, they should not be considered as wholly objective history, either in intention or accomplishment. Being of Deuteronomic origin, they are largely commentary on and illustration in history of the great Deuteronomic doctrines of centralization of all sacrificial worship in the Jerusalem temple, and of divine retribution for human deeds.

See W. E. Barnes, The First and Second Books of the Kings, 2 vols (The Cambridge Bible for Schools and Colleges), (2nd ed., 1928, 1932).   J.P.H.

kismet: (Arabic, meaning fate*) A common ejaculation among Moslems, expressing their belief in a fate that rules the affairs of men. Not only a man's fortunes, but his deeds with their future consequences are pre-ordained and inevitable.   P.E.J.

kiss of charity: A salutation as a token of Christian Brotherhood named from I Pet. 5·14 and otherwise known as the holy kiss (Rom. 16.16; I Cor. 16·20, I Th. 5:26) and later, among patristic writers, as the kiss of peace. A rite practiced widely and likely promiscuously among early Christians, but now limited to the same sex and found only among certain religious groups like the Dunkers* and others.   W.M.B.

Kittel, Rudolf: (1853-1929) Professor at various German universities, concluding his work at Leipzig; as translator and editor, he provided (in three editions) the critical edition of Biblia Hebraica used by practically all modern scholars; perhaps greatest authority on the history and religion of Israel.   R.E.W.

Kleutgen, Joseph: (1811-1883) German Jesuit, philosopher and theologian. He was influential at the Vatican Council, and the revival of Scholastic philosophy in Roman Catholic schools was in part his work.   E.A.R.

Kliefoth, Theodor: (1816-1895) He was pastor in Ludwigslust and held various executive and administrative church positions in the Mecklenburg Landeskirche. As a leading confessional Lutheran theologian he was interested more in the propagation of the old Protestant theology than in that of Luther's writings. He rejected Luther's subjectivistic extravaganzes. In his ecclesiology he accepted Catholic and Anglican elements and stressed eschatological implications. He also sought a new relation of faith towards history.
Einleitung in die Dogmengeschichte (Henstorff, 1839); Acht Bücher von der Kirche (Schwerin u Rostock, 1854); Christliche Eschatologie (Leipzig, 1886).   B.H.

kneeling at communion: The medieval practice of kneeling to receive the sacrament was retained in the English Reformation but opposed by Knox, Hooper, and other Puritans. A declaration (later called the "Black Rubric") was inserted in the communion office in the second Prayer Book (1552) against any implication of transubstantiation* in the act of kneeling. See genuflexion.
M. M. Knappen, Tudor Puritanism (1939).
                                                   J.T.M.

Knights of Columbus, the: The name of a fraternal and beneficent society of Catholic laymen, founded at New Haven, Connecticut, in 1882. The original group consisted of two priests, Rev. M. J. McGinney and Rev. P. P. Lawlor; and eight laymen, James T. Mullen, Cornelius T. Driscoll, Dr. M. C. O'Connor, Daniel Colwell, William M. Geary, John T. Kerrigan, Bartholomew Healey, and Michael Curran. The purpose of the society, as originally founded, was to develop amongst its members a practical Catholicity which would manifest itself by aiding the cause of Catholic education and furthering Catholic charity, and at the same time, to serve as a means of aiding the families of its members through a system of insurance which would be held by each member; consequently, as originally founded the Knights of Columbus was an insurance organization with the added function of promoting the Catholic cause in every way possible. After the founding, subordinate councils spread rapidly throughout Connecticut, but it was not until 1885 that one was founded outside that state, when a council was set up in Westerley, R. I. The growth of the society was constant, and with the growth certain changes occurred. In 1893 it became apparent that the cause of the Knights would be greatly aided by accepting members who did not wish to share in the insurance privileges; as a result there have been two types of members since that time, the insurance and the associate. The legislating part of the governing body has gone through a number of evolutionary stages until today it consists of a National Council composed of the State Deputy and last Past State Deputy of each State Council, and one delegate from every thousand members of the insurance class. The membership, which is spread through every state of the Union, Canada, Newfoundland, the Philippines, Mexico, Cuba, Panama, etc., was greatest in the years just preceding World War I, reaching at that time about 1,000,000; but in the years following the War it declined. The work of the Knights has been of the most varied sort, but principally it has been centered in charity and education. The society has granted endowments to Catholic universities, and fostered sports and social enterprises besides.

M. F. Egan and J. B. Kennedy, The Knights of Columbus in Peace and War (1920), 2 vols.
                                                   T.T.M.

Knights Templar: The first and most notable of the military religious orders* of the Middle Ages. At the time of the Crusades* the spirit of the age gave rise to two types of religious orders, one was the order of ransom, the other was the military order to which the Templars belonged. The Templars were founded in 1118 by Hugue de Payens and Godeffroi de St. Omer under Baldwin II. The name of this congregation was derived from the fact that their first house was a part of Baldwin's palace lying next to the former mosque of al-Akra, the so-called "Temple of Solomon." The order adopted the rule of St. Benedict as reformed by the Cistercians, and both the order and its adaptation of the rule were discussed and sanctioned by the Council of Troyes (1128). One of the most ardent supporters of this new group in that Council was St. Bernard of Clairvaux.* The members, who were admited either for life or for a term of years, were divided into knights or heavy cavalry, sergeants or light cavalry, farmers, who administered the temporals, and chaplains, who alone had sacerdotal power. Because they were subject only to their own Grand Master and to the pope, they soon gained the cordial dislike of the bishops and lesser clergy. But despite this fact the order grew rapidly since, besides the high favor it gained from the princes and popes, it united the two great tendencies of the Middle Ages: religious fervor and military prowess. The power of the Templars grew swiftly, not so much because of their large land holdings as because they became notable as international bankers, and their Temple at Paris became the center of the world's money market. The role of international financiers fell quite naturally to them since the Templars' strongholds were scattered throughout both the East and the West, and made exchange with the East a possibility, their military power and discipline ensured safe transmission of the treasures entrusted to them, and their reputation as monks guaranteed their integrity in handling the funds. Their reputation, rich in heroic legend, as brave and dauntless soldiers of the Cross was bought at the expense of tremendous losses of men in many and ruthless engagements with the enemies in the East Because of their great wealth they attracted the attention of Philip the Fair of France who was hard pressed for funds, and wished to have this wealth at his disposal. By a charge of heresy and other insinuations, Philip was able eventually to bring the vacillating and weak Clement V to suppress the order by a decree of March 22, 1312, on the absurd grounds that blasphemy and desecration of holy things were prerequisites for entrance into the order. Upon the suppression of the order most of the Templars entered the ranks of their former rivals, the Hospitallers,* which order also took over most of the former wealth of the defunct Templars. The guilt or innocence of the Templars is still debated, but modern investigation points more and more to the fact that they were the victims of the rapacious Philip the Fair. See Vienne, Council of.　　T.T.M.

knots, religious use of: The significance attached to knots in religion is that of binding and holding or impeding and restricting. It may symbolize the binding character of marriage, the knots used by a Brahman in tying on his sacred girdle signify fidelity, finality. The phylacteries* of the Jews were bound on forehead and wrist as symbolic of binding character of the law. On the other hand, in India, Saxony and Lapland all knots in the house were untied at childbirth, lest anything impede the birth of the child. Ascetics in India and Syria avoid knots while on a pilgrimage. Primitive peoples cut or untie knots for release from illness, or a witch's spell, an oath or some taboo. See Frazer, Golden Bough (1911), Vol. 3, Tabu, pp. 293-313.　　M.L.C.

Knox, John: (1505? or 1513 or 1515-1572) The leading churchman in, though not the originator of, the Reformation in Scotland. He was born at Haddington, in East Lothian, and studied in the grammar school there before being admitted to the University of Glasgow. For some obscure reason, he seems to have left the latter institution without taking a degree. He probably became a priest about 1530, but little is known of this period of his life. He was associated with the Reformer, Wishart, and seems to have been influenced by the latter's martyrdom to take his place openly with the Protestant side. As a result, he found it wise to seek refuge in the castle at St. Andrews. When the French fleet seized the castle the next year, 1547, to avenge the death of Cardinal Beaton, Knox was taken prisoner to France, and there condemned to the galley slavery which kept him chained until early in 1549. He preached in England, until the death of Edward VI, where the Established Church, though episcopally governed, was strongly under Calvinistic influence. With the accession of Mary Tudor, he fled to the continent. Then began a period of wandering which included a brief visit to Geneva in 1555, and a short stay in Scotland late in 1555 and early in 1556. From the latter year until early in 1559, he was pastor of the English congregation in Geneva—a period when the fierce opposition to John Calvin had been overthrown, and the city had become very nearly a model of the Reformed ideal. Knox returned to Scotland in 1559, and when, the following year, the Scottish parliament adopted the Reformation, Knox was on hand to guide it and the newly organized Church, and to defend it against the destructive policies of Queen Mary. See Scotland, Church of, Scots Confession.

Works of John Knox, edited by D. Laing (Edinburgh, 1846-1864). 6 vols ; P H. Brown, John Knox, a Biography (London, 1895), 2 vols.　　A.K.R.

kobold: (Ger.) Brownie, familiar spirit. underground spirit, as in mines, caverns, a figure in German mythology.　　F.L.P.

Kodesh Church Immanuel: A colored religious sect organized by Frank R. Killingsworth in Florida in 1929. The group claims to follow the Arminian theology and the Methodist ecclesiastical pattern. It believes in entire sanctification as a "second blessing," the second coming of Christ, and divine healing. It opposes the use of tobacco, extravagant dress, membership in lodges, indulgence in what it regards as worldly amusements. There are nine churches and 560 members. See holiness churches.　　E.T.C.

Kogoshui: "Gleanings from Ancient Stories." An account of early Japanese mythology and religion published probably in 806 A.D.　　D.C.H.

Koheleth: Meaning. the master of a school. Hebrew name for Ecclesiastes.*　　V.F.

koiné: (Gr. Koiné, common) A common Greek speech, gradually developing and replacing local dialects throughout the eastern Mediterranean from the time of Alexander. The Koiné is found in literary works (usually Atticizing) of the period, the Septuagint and NT writings, papyri,* inscriptions, and ostraca. It is simpler and less subtle than Attic, making rapid progress toward a purely analytic form of language. The period is roughly from 330 B.C. to 330 A.D.　　E.M.N.

Kojiki: "The Chronicle of Ancient Events." The oldest extant Japanese historical document compiled in 712 A.D. Begins with the myths of creation and ends with 628 A.D. Invaluable for the study of primitive Shinto.　　D.C.H.

kol nidre: (Lit. all vows) Prayer recited in the synagogue at the commencement of the evening service of the Day of Atonement.* The prayer was devised to ease the feelings of the devout who were conscience stricken on that solemn day at the very thought of the failure to fulfill all their religious vows.

Cf. Max Schlessinger, Jewish Encyclopedia, Vol VII. pp. 539-542; I. Davidson, in American Jewish Year Book (1923), Vol. 25, pp. 180-194.　　B.C.

konfessionskunde: (Comparative Symbolics) The comparative treatment of the nature and peculiarities of the various Christian denominations. In the 16th and 17th centuries this study was largely identical with polemics* (M. Chemnitz,* Hospinianus, Bossuet*). Originally devoted merely to the study of the confessional standards of the churches and sects the field was extended by Marheinecke* (1810) to all the characteristic manifestations of the respective denominations, such as worship, constitution, geographical extension, statistics. The abundance of material available for such studies explains the paucity of works, in which Marheinecke's program is fully carried out. Only E. F. Karl Muller, Mulert and Neve offer a satisfactory comprehensive treatment of all denominations. In the majority of books the study is limited to one country (Brown, Carrol, Clark) or to one denomination (Kattenbusch, Loofs, Heiler).

The older type, that confines itself to the study of the doctrinal standards is represented by Oehler, Moehler, Schneckenburger, Winer (whose tabulation of doctrines was adopted by Grant, Rohnert, Guenther and Mouson), Chr. H. Schmidt, Schaff, Briggs, W. Walther. See Confessions, formal; symbolics.

Martin Chemnitius Examen Concilii Tridentini (1565-1573), new ed. by Preuss (1861), reprint, 1915 (Lutheran view); Rudolf Hospinianus, Concordia Discors (1607) (the Lutheran Concord from the Reformed viewpoint); J. B. Bossuet, Exposition de la doctrine de l'église catholique sur les matières de controverse (1671); P. K. Marheinecke, Christliche Konfessionskunde (1810-1813); Herm. Mulert, Konfessionskunde (Giessen, 1927), J. L. Neve, Churches and Sects of Christendom (1940); W. A. Brown, The Church in America (a study of the present condition and the future prospects of American Protestantism, 1922); W. A. Brown, The Church, Catholic and Protestant (a study of differences that matter, 1935); H. K. Carroll, The Religious Forces in the United States (1893-1912); E. T. Clark, The Small Sects in America (1937); Ferdinand Kattenbusch, Lehrbuch der vergleichenden konfessionskunde, vol. I (Orthodox Eastern Church) (1892); Friedrich Loofs, Symbolik oder christliche Konfessionskunde, Vol I (Oriental and Roman Catholic Churches) (1902); E. F. Karl Muller, Symbolik (1896); Friedrich Heiler, Der Katholizismus. Seine Idee und seine Verwirklichung (1923); Joh. Adam Mohler, Symbolik oder Darstellung der dogmatischen Gegensätze der Katholiken und Protestanten nach ihren öffentlichen Bekenntnisschriften (1832, 10th ed. 1921) (Roman Catholic). Engl. tr.; M. Schneckenburger, Vergleichende Darstellung des lutherischen und reformierten Lehrbegriffes, 2 vols. (1855); E. Sell, Katholizismus und Protestantismus in Religion, Geschichte und Literatur (1908); C. A. Briggs, Theological Symbolics (1914); Philip Schaff, The Creeds of Christendom (with a history and critical notes) 3 vols. (1877); Corpus Confessionum. Die Bekenntnisse der Christenheit, hersg. von Cajus Fabricius (1928), (projected as a comprehensive collection of all the characteristic manifestations of the churches united in the Faith and Order Movement); U. S. Bureau of Census: Religious Bodies (1936), 3 vols. (1941).

O.A.P.

Koran or Quran: (From the Arabic, karaa, to read; signifies, the reading) The sacred book of Islam, believed to be the eternal word of God, delivered by the angel Gabriel to the prophet Mohammed.* The term was at first applied to each revelation announced by the prophet, and eventually to the entire book of revelations, compiled after his death by his secretary Zaid Ibn Thabit at the direction of the Caliph Abu Bekr. The 114 suras (chapters), containing 77,639 words, are mechanically arranged by length, rather than logically or chronologically. The style is metrical, its strong cadences and cumulative repetitions are read aloud eloquently with great appeal to Moslem hearers. The content is unified; evidently the fervent expression of the mind of the prophet. It urges submission to the one God Allah, and the true faith, shows the way of salvation through the prophets from Moses and Christ to the final prophet Mohammed. The day of judgment, rewards and punishments, laws, admonitions and warnings are illustrated by Arabian, Jewish and Christian stories though somewhat distorted by distance from those sources. The aim of the Koran is "guidance for the pious who believe in the mysteries of the faith, perform their prayers, give alms," and is accepted by them with profound reverence as above criticism. The Koran is in classical Arabic, and becomes the standard for literature, science, philosophy, morals as well as religion. Its influence on the history of the Moslem world can scarcely be exaggerated. See Mohammedanism; Ramadan. English translations by G. Sale (1734) and J. M. Rodwell (1861) are classic and available in later editions.

P.E.J.

kosher: This word, properly pronounced kasher, means "fit." In modern Hebrew and Yiddish, following the usage of Mishnaic Hebrew of the second century, it signifies primarily "fit to be eaten according to Jewish ritual." Jewish law prohibits the use of certain animals for food,* that those animals which may be eaten be slaughtered in accordance with a set ritual (intended to mitigate the animal's suffering); it also requires that meat and milk foods be separated, and that all meat be freed of its surface blood before being eaten. Food prepared in accordance with the prescribed rules, as set forth in the Talmud* and later works, is described as kosher.

L.F.-H.K.

Köstlin, Julius: See neo-Lutheranism.

Krause, Karl Christian Friedrich: (1781-1832) He taught at the Universities of Jena, Dresden, Berlin and Gottingen. Most of his works have been published posthumously. The influence of his ideas was greatest in Spain and South America. He attempted to change the pantheism of identity into a panentheism.* He tried to reconcile the idea of God as known by faith and inner conscience with the idea of the world as known through the senses. He argued that God is not a personality, but an infinite, an all inclusive essence embracing the universe within itself. The divine is a divine organism. The process of development is through the formation of ever higher unities until the ultimate stage is reached in the identification of the world in God.

Die absolute Religionsphilosophie im Verhältnis zum gefühlsgläubigen Theismus und nach ihrer Vermittlung des Supernaturalismus und Rationalismus (Göttingen, 1834-1843), 2 vols. ed. by H. K. v.

Leonhardi; Der im Lichte der Gotteserkenntnis als des höchsten Wissenschaftsprinzipes ableitende Teil der Philosophie (Leipzig, 1889), ed by P. Hohlfeld und A. Wünsche, Anschauungen und Entwürfe zur Höherbildung des Menschenlebens, 3 vols (Leipzig, 1890-1892), 4th vol (Leipzig, 1902) ; Zur Religionsphilosophie und spekulativen Theologie (Leipzig, 1893) ; Das Urbild der Menschheit (Leipzig, 1903), 3 rev ed by P Hohlfeld und A. Wünsche ; A Cless, Das Ideal der Menschheit nach Krauses Urbild der Menschheit (Stuttgart, 1881) ; B. Martin, K. C. F. Krauses Leben, Lehre und Bedeutung (Leipzig, 1885).

H.H.

Krauth, Charles Porterfield: (1823-1883) Lutheran theologian, educator, champion of conservative Lutheranism in America. A leading figure in the revolt from a liberal type of Lutheranism (represented by his old teacher, S. S. Schmucker*), Krauth took an unequivocal stand in behalf of the old Lutheran symbols as normative for true Lutheranism. First professor of systematic divinity in the Lutheran Seminary at Mt. Airy, Philadelphia (established in opposition to that of Gettysburg) he set the stamp of his own theology upon a whole generation of Lutheran ministers. Many of his papers were collected in a magnum opus entitled The Conservative Reformation and its Theology (1871), a standard book of reference for a large section of the church. The General Council (org. 1867 in opposition to the more liberal General Synod) was a child after his own heart. He served the University of Pennsylvania as trustee, professor and vice-provost. As editor of conservative Lutheran journals he wielded tremendous influence. On matters of polity and liturgical practice as well as theology he was regarded as master. He took an active part on the American Revision Committee of the OT.

Adolph Spaeth, Charles Porterfield Krauth (2 vols. 1898-1909) contains a comprehensive bibliography; S. E. Ochsenford, Documentary History of the General Council of the Ev. Lutheran Church in N. America (1912). For the immediate background of the Krauthian development of American Lutheran theology, see Vergilius Ferm, The Crisis in Am. Luth. Theology (1927). V.F.

Krishna: One of the most widely worshiped deities of Hinduism, the greatest of the incarnations of Vishnu.* Represented variously in legend as warrior hero, cowherd, youthful prankster, lover par excellence, slayer of dragons, he becomes, in the Bhagavad Gita, very God, even Brahman. Here, as the supreme object of bhakti,* it is through love, devotion and service to him that salvation is possible for all men regardless of caste. C.S.B.

kshatriya: The warrior, ruler class in ancient Indo-Aryan society. The name of the second of the three traditional, twice-born castes of India, Brahman, Kshatriya and Vaisya. C.S.B.

Kuan Ti, Kuan Kung: See Chinese Terminology.

Kübel, Robert Benjamin: (1838-1894) He was professor in Tübingen. Through him the Swabian realistic biblicism of Beck* was upheld with many moderations and in sharp antagonism against the other theological tendencies.

Christliches Lehrsystem (Stuttgart, 1873) ; Über den Unterschied der positiven und liberalen Richtung in der neueren Theologie (Nordlingen, (1881). H.H.

Kuei, Kwei: See Chinese Terminology.

Kuenen, Abraham: (1838-1891) Dutch Christian OT scholar. Professor in the theological faculty of the University of Leyden.

Kuenen was one of the leaders of the modern school of OT critics. His chief work, a critical attempt to interpret the history of Hebrew religion from the premises of the new critical school, was his Godsdienst van Israel (1869-70, English translation The Religion of Israel Till the Fall of the Jewish State). In this work he elaborated on Graf's theory of the late origin of the priestly legislation of the OT. H.K.-L.F.

Ku-Klux Klan: The name of a secret organization made up of Southern whites, which arose during the years 1866-1867, to combat negro and carpet-bag rule in the ex-Confederate states. In 1871 Congress passed the Ku-Klux Act empowering the President to use Federal troops to suppress the organization, though without great success. With the restoration of white rule in the South the organization gradually disappeared. The memory of the Klan lived on in the South and its work was more or less idealized. In 1915 a new organization taking the name Ku-Klux Klan appeared in Georgia organized by Col. William J. Simmons. It amounted to little until the nineteen twenties when a nation-wide campaign for members under the direction of two professional publicity agents soon raised the membership to several millions. Its slogan was native, white, Protestant supremacy, and it denounced Aliens, Negroes and Catholics with equal vehemence. The symbol of the order was the Fiery Cross; the members wore hooded white robes and there was much marching, especially at night and fiery crosses were erected. It soon became a political power of temporary importance in Maine, Texas, Oklahoma, Louisiana and Indiana. As was inevitable the organization got into the hands of corrupt leaders, while its intolerance and terroristic methods aroused the disgust of the average citizen. By 1928 its influence had largely disappeared and many who had belonged returned, at least, to temporary sanity.

For the original Ku-Klux Klan· Lester and Wilson, Ku-Klux Klan; Its Origin, Growth and Disbandment (1905) ; The New Klan· J. M. Mecklin, The Ku Klux Klan: a Study of the American Mind (1924). W.W.S.

Külpe, Oswald: (1865-1915) He first was Wundt's* assistant at the psychological institute in Leipzig. He next taught in succession in Würzburg, Bonn and München. As the founder of the Wurzburg school of experimental psychology, he initiated the experimental investigation of thought processes. He also continued Fechner's experimental study of aesthetics. He was a representative of a new critical and rational realism which aimed to conquer the neo-Kantian* anti-realistic tendencies. His polemics were never personal, but always matter of fact. He was opposed to contemporary naturalism. In opposition to Kant he regarded metaphysics as possible. Voluntarism and intellectualism he felt were inadequate. He regarded atheism theoretically irrefutable. He held a supplementation of our world view necessary from the religious and ethical standpoint. Theism, be held, the most suitable for our practical interests. Outlines of Psychology (London, 1895), Introduction to Philosophy (London, 1897); Philosophy of the Present in Germany (London, 1913), Einleitung in die Philosophie, 9 ed. by A. Messer (Leipzig, 1919); Die Philosophie der Gegenwart (7 ed, Leipzig, 1920); Die Realisierung, vol I (Leipzig, 1912), vols. II and III ed. by A. Messer (Leipzig, 1920).

H.H.

Kulturkampf: (Ger. struggle for civilization) A term applied in the 1870's by the anti-Catholics in Germany to the struggle between the new Empire and Rome, incited by fears of increased Catholic power in Prussia (especially Jesuit) and directly occasioned by the violent liberal reaction to the decree of papal infallibility* of the Vatican Council* (1870). The State entered the conflict by expelling the Jesuits* from Germany and enacting the May Laws (1873-1875), designed to destroy Catholic political power within the country. The struggle was bitter and widespread and finally resolved only after the death of Pius IX (1878), when Bismarck turned to a program of conciliation with Rome, leading to the rescinding of the May Laws in 1886.   E T R.

Kumarajiva: See Buddhist Terminology.

Kurtz, Benjamin: (1795-1865) Early associate and life-long friend of S. S. Schmucker* in establishing the Theological Seminary at Gettysburg and in the formative period of the General Synod of the Lutheran Church, editor of the Lutheran Observer from 1833 to 1861, vigorous spokesman for a liberal type of Lutheranism, defender and expositor of "American Lutheranism"* as well as the earlier movement known as "New Measures."*   v.f.

Kuyper, Abraham: (1837-1920) Dutch Reformed theologian and statesman. He was born at Maasshuis, Holland. Originally under Scholten's liberal influence, he became converted to strict Calvinism. From 1863 he was pastor, and from 1880 professor of Systematic Theology at the Free University in Amsterdam where he died.

At about 1870 Kuyper became the leader of the orthodox Calvinists in Holland. He fought against liberalism in theology, church practice and politics and for the political and social ideals of Calvinism. He advocated the rights of church schools (partial success in 1889, full success in 1920) and the return of the established (Hervormd) Church to the status of the Snyod of Dort* (1619). When these attempts proved to be abortive he finally formed with his followers the Christian Reformed Church (Gereformeerd Kerk) in 1889. As a preparatory step the Free University in Amsterdam had been founded in 1880. Kuyper was not only a powerful preacher and writer and keen theologian, but also a great politician. He became the leader of the Christian Historical Party, that represented a conservative policy with a strongly social tendency. From 1902-1905 Kuyper was Dutch Prime Minister.

His theological method combines a highly developed intellectualism on a confessional and Biblical basis with an interest in the practical applicability of the Christian truth. His influence as a theologian extended far beyond Holland to the Reformed groups in Germany and U. S. A. See common grace.

Het werk van den Heiligen Geest (1888-1889) 3 vols. (Engl. tr. in 1 vol , 1900), Encyclopaedie der heilige Godgeleerdheid (1894), 3 vols , 2nd ed (1908-1909), Eng. tr. (1898); De engelen Gods (1902); De gemeene Gratie (1902-1905), 3 vols ; Dictaten Dogmatiek (1910), 5 vols, 2nd ed. 6 vol. n d), Calvinism (Stone Lectures) (1898); Pro rege, or Het koningschap van Christus (1911-1912), 3 vols., His Decease, meditations on the passion and death of our Lord (1928), Asleep in Jesus (1929); In the shadow of death (1929); The Revelation of John (1935). Biographies by: de Savornin Lohman (1889 and 1897); W F A Winkel (1919) and J C. Bullmann (1928) (all in Dutch); Wilh. Kolfhaus (1925) 2nd ed. (German). On his theology see: B. O. Eerdmans, De theologie vom Dr. A. Kuyper (1909); Kuyperbibliografie, 2 vols., by J. C. Bullmann (1923-29).

O.A.P.

Kwan-yin: See Buddhist Terminology.

kyrie eleison: (Gr. Lord, have mercy) The most common response to the petitions in the Greek and Syrian litanies.* It was taken over untranslated into the Latin rites, with the variant, Christe eleison, and is so used nine-fold in the Roman Mass* after the Introit*, probably the slight remnant of a vanished litany.   p.v.n.

L

L: This stands for Lay Source, a supposed documentary strand of the O.T. running parallel to J, E, and P from Creation to the death of David; proposed by Eissfeldt in 1922 but approved by few scholars, usually considered part of J. See J. Cf. Synoptic Gospels.   R.E.W.

Labadists: A pietistic sect of the 17th and 18th centuries, founded by Jean de Labadie (1610-1674), a French ex-Jesuit. De Labadie left the Society of Jesus in 1639 and joined the Reformed Church at Montauban in 1650; subsequently he rejected the authority of his adopted church and founded a separate sect in Middleburg, Holland. Expelled from this city, he and his fifty-five followers migrated to Hereford, in Westphalia, 1670; again banished, the congregation settled at Altona where its founder died within two years. The peregrinations of the Labadists continued, including an attempted colonization of a New Bohemia on the Hudson River in the State of New York, but like the rest of their ventures it ended in failure. The high tide of their prosperity was reached in Wiewert, West Friesland, with about four hundred members, but this community, too, dispersed in 1732. Their doctrinal teaching stressed the importance of interior illumination by the Holy Spirit in understanding the Bible; only those reborn from sin are entitled to the sacraments, and hence they frowned on infant baptism, seldom celebrated the Lord's Supper, and declared marriage with an unregenerated person to be not binding. They held property in common in emulation of the primitive Church, supported themselves by manual labor, and held very lax views regarding the observance of the Sabbath. See communistic settlements, religious.   J.F.T.

labarum: The standard of the Roman emperor Constantine*. Designed to commemorate the vision, supposed to have been seen by him before the Battle of the Mulvian Bridge, in which a Cross appeared to the emperor with the words "In hoc signo vinces." The labarum was a lance with a cross-bar, with crown and gems at the point, the letters IHS* (Greek letters beginning the name of Jesus), and a purple banner depending from the cross-beam.   W.N.P.

Laberthonnière, Lucien: (1860-19?) French Catholic philosopher. In his Essais de philosophie religieuse (1903) and Le Réalisme chrétien et l'Idéalisme grec (1904) he opposed the scholastic conception of God as actus purus, and developed a doctrine of the "vital immanence" of God in the heart and conscience of mankind. This "immanentism" was condemned by Pius X* in the Encyclical Pascendi against modernism* (1907).
W.M.H.

labor movements: Labor movements include all those efforts which the workers themselves, in their organized capacity, have made and are making to improve their conditions: unionism, labor politics, workers' education, and, in some measure, co-operation and socialism*. Under democratic institutions, such as have developed in Great Britain and the United States and to some extent elsewhere during the past century, labor has been able to exert pressure or leverage in at least three different ways: through its control of labor power and skill, through the direction of its purchasing power as a consumer, and through the ballot; and all of these have been used in differing degrees and combinations. As the most necessitous group, working people have always been most hospitable to new doctrines and plans for social reform, Christianity not excepted. But organized protest against unemployment, long hours, low wages, conditions dangerous to health and safety, inequality of wealth and opportunity, and class differences generally, has, for the most part, had to wait upon higher levels of intelligence and education, in America upon the partial assimilation of the immigrants, the rise of abler leadership, and a clearer recognition of the limitations of laissez faire individualism. So long as there remained a large geographic or economic frontier and a chance for the energetic individual or potential leader to allay his discontent by getting possession of land or entering business and himself becoming an employer, the labor movement languished and was at best sporadic in its manifestations.

Unionism, as the more moderate expression of labor unrest, had its beginnings in England far back in the early stages of modern capitalism*. Its ancestry is to be found in the organization of journeymen under the guild system when they found the masters too highhanded and too much inclined to disregard the customary rules of the trade. Until a recent period it has been chiefly confined to the relatively skilled crafts where there is some basis for cohesiveness and bargaining power in a common technique. The building trades (carpenters, bricklayers and masons, plumbers), the metal trades (blacksmiths, molders, machinists), the printers and allied trades, and the railroad engineers, firemen, and trainmen, have been typical of this somewhat aristocratic group. Most of them in the United States have been affiliated since 1886 with the American Federation of Labor, although the railway brotherhoods have eschewed even such entangling alliances. Effective organization among the semi-skilled and unskilled workers in the heavy and highly mechanized industries has been slower and more difficult. The Knights of Labor was able to sweep some of these into its heterogeneous ranks during the 1880's, and through able leadership and perhaps because of the physical stamina required in such occupations the coal miners in both Great Britain and the United States have been a power to reckon with for more than fifty years. But most of the inclusive unions now affiliated with the Congress for Industrial Organizations are products of the past decade. Structural differences between the two great federations are, to be sure, not absolute or clear-cut; but the unions which separated from the A. F. of L. after 1935 to form the C. I. O. were mainly industrial and set that pattern for later affiliates. The real business of unionism is done chiefly within each trade or industrial union and these federations (city, state, and federal) which attract so much attention in the press are useful mainly for propaganda, political activity, and the settlement of jurisdictional squabbles. This they could undoubtedly accomplish more effectively if the national bodies could sink personal animosities and combine under a single banner. Parallel with the trend toward federation and, more recently, toward industrial organization, has been a joining up of locals into nationals and even some intimations of international co-operation.

Like most other things, unionism has tended to thrive during periods of prosperity and high prices when it was easy to keep up dues and when employers were willing to make concessions. It has usually lost ground rather grievously during periods of depression. The decade since 1933, when the aggregate membership of all unions in the United States has reached the record figure of over 10,000,000, has been an exception chiefly because of the favorable attitude of the New Deal administration and the great progress in organizing mass-production industries.

Collective bargaining or the right to have a voice in the determination of wages, hours and other working conditions is the goal of the business type of labor union; and other tactics or methods, such as restrictions upon membership, opposition to technological changes, strikes and boycotts, and benefit features, are to be regarded as merely auxiliary. The most hopeful development of the past twenty years has been the rise of union-management co-operation, first in some railway shops and in some branches of the clothing industry, more recently in the hosiery, steel, electrical supply, and other industries. This promises to bring about a better understanding of the mutuality of interest between employers and employees and to dispel most of those unlovely characteristics and methods that were the result of suspicion and conflict.

The political activities of labor in both Great Britain and America have been directed primarily at facilitating unionism and collective bargaining: the removal of legal obstacles to organization and the safeguarding of unions and union leaders against the blacklist, "yellow-dog" contracts, labor spies, injunctions, and other disruptive tactics of employers. Only secondarily has the political weapon been used for supplementary purposes such as restriction of immigration, regulation of the hours of women and children and of other dependent or less well-organized groups, protecting wage-claims, etc. Minimum-wage legislation, at least in its earlier stages, and the whole program of security or social insurance legislation, including workmen's compensation for accidents, were evidently not originated by labor itself although it has given them its support. These were more largely of humanitarian origin and inspiration. In America labor's political influence has been mainly exerted through the nonpartisan methods of lobbying and the questioning of candidates for office put up by the old parties, whereas in Great Britain since about 1900 a separate labor party has evolved and has twice had control of the government. This difference has been partly due to the stronger hold which collectivist or socialist ideas and leadership have had in the British labor movement.

Both the co-operative movement and socialism or communism have appealed for support to wage-earning groups and, particularly during periods of depression and discontent, have found here a congenial soil. The Rochdale pioneers who set the pattern for consumers' co-operation* were a group of weavers who realized the advantages of small economies in buying, and the movement in Great Britain has always had its greatest strength in the large industrial centers like Manchester, Leeds, and Glasgow. In the United States co-operation has been more backward, partly because the chain stores forestalled it and partly because of the mobility and heterogeneity of our population. But it has had some success under the leadership of immigrant groups who have known its benefits abroad, and among the farmers. The Marxian* doctrines of exploitation, increasing misery, and the class struggle were certainly keyed to reach the proletariat*; but these are believed to have even less vogue than formerly in the English-speaking world. Socialistic sentiment in these countries is of the Fabian rather than the revolutionary type; and any progress which socialism is making as a possible solution for human ills is more largely from the viewpoint of the consumer than from that of the wage-earner.

J. R. Commons and Associates, History of Labor in the United States (vol. i-ii, 1918; vol. iii by D. D. Lescohier and Elizabeth Brandeis, 1935; vol.

iv by S. Perlman and P. Taft, 1935), 4 vols.; S. H. Slichter, Union Policies and Industrial Management (1941); Twentieth Century Fund, How Collective Bargaining Works (1942).   w.b.c.

labyrinth: (Gr. laburinthos, a maze) A complicated building with winding passages. Many medieval churches had inlaid labyrinths in their pavements supposed to typify the difficulties of the Christian way through life; or, to have had some mystical meaning now lost.   f.t.p.

Lachelier, Jules: (1834-1918) He made his influence orally felt by his teaching at the Ecole Normale Superieure. He was a leading pioneer of the spiritual metaphysical position in France. He called his philosophy spiritual realism. It is the true philosophy of nature. The world of free creative spontaneity of the spirit is not regarded as merely the complement of, or the reflex from, the world of mechanism and determinism. The new spiritualism of which Lachelier is one of the profoundest speculative minds, is not only acquainted with the place and results of the sciences, so unlike in this regard to the old spiritualism, but it also felt itself equal to a criticism of them. The sciences themselves are constructions of the synthetic creative activity of the human spirit. The real a priori lies in the absolute spontaneity of the spirit. Lachelier's spiritualism is independent of any religion. Duty is the fulfillment of our destiny, the suppression of all sensuous illusions, the realization that God in man is real and immortal. The religious life is the highest intellectual life.
Du fondement de l'induction (Paris, 1924); Psychologie et de métaphysique (Paris, 1924); G. Seailles, La philosophie de Jules Lachelier (Paris, 1920).   h.h.

Lachish Ostraca: Discovered in Tell-el-Duweir (site of ancient Lachish, Palestine), from 1935 to 1938. About twenty letters written in the Old Hebrew Alphabet; several of them date from 589 B.C. and give valuable information upon the time of Jeremiah. See H. Torczyner, The Lachish Letters (1938).   s.l.t.

Lacordaire, Jean-Baptiste Henri Dominique: (1802-1861) Renowned French pulpit orator. During his school-days he lost his faith, but in 1824 he was converted and abandoned his promising legal career to study for the priesthood. With Lamennais* he founded the political journal L'Avenir. In 1839 he entered the Dominican Order*, which he re-established in France, in 1843. With intervals in Rome, he occupied the pulpit of Notre Dame in Paris from 1835-1851.
                                    c.v.

Lactantius: (died ca. 330) Probably an Italian by birth, but educated as a rhetorician under Arnobius in North Africa. Appointed teacher of Latin eloquence by Diocletian in Nicomedia, where he was converted about 301 A.D. Became a leading adviser of Constantine*, who made him tutor of his son, Crispus. He was known as the Christian Cicero for his elegant style, in prose and poetry. His Institutiones divinae (seven books) was an exposition and defence of the Christian faith. He was a fanatical Chiliast*, and showed some Manichaean* tendencies of thought.   a.k.r.

Lady-Chapel: A chapel dedicated in honor of the Virgin Mary. Usually but by no means invariably situated at the extreme eastern end of the church.   b.s.e.

Lady-Day: March 25, on which, according to Church tradition, the Angel Gabriel appeared to St. Mary and announced to her that she was to be the Mother of God Incarnate. Also known as the Feast of the Annunciation*. The Biblical story is found in Luke 1 26-38.   w.n.p.

Laestadians: A sectarian development within the Lutheran church in northern Sweden, Norway and Finland. Probably an outgrowth of the Herrnhuter (Moravian-Zinzendorfian) movement. As early as 1734 the Herrnhuters sent missionaries to these bleak and forsaken regions. In 1825 a Lutheran pastor, Lars Levi Laestadius (1800-1861) of the State Church of Sweden, became pastor of the Karesuando parish and later moved to Pajala (1858). A few years after his arrival he had a thoroughgoing conversion experience, precipitated by a chance conversation with a humble shoemaker. Loathing his former life, he began preaching with holy zeal against the gross sins of his parishioners. His radical approach seemed to sow seeds for new and strange doctrines:
a. There is no direct approach to God. God must be approached through the congregation of Christians, or preferably through the medium of a single Christian layman. Sins must be confessed in painful detail to this layman, who in turn gives absolution.
b. The date of conversion, as well as the name of the spiritual "midwife" (lay confessor) must be known.
c. The "embrace" was a sign of fellowship and always followed the giving of absolution.
d. The devil entered heaven through the "door of baptism"; hence their opposition to baptism, especially that of infants.
e. Lay preachers were preferred to those of the established church, although the Sect retained membership in the established church.
f. Emphasis on "we" rather than "I".
g. Distinctive garb in terms of ascetic austerity. There are traces of the movement in mid-western United States. The founder, the Rev. Lars Levi Laestadius, was a natural scientist of high standing, and had his studies published by the Swedish Academy of Science. Besides these scientific writings, he published theological treatises and a volume of sermons. The latter are being read at the services and prayer meetings held by his followers.
Nordisk Familjebok, vol. IX, p. 506.   o.a.w.

Laetare Sunday: The name applied to the Fourth Sunday of Lent*, from the opening word

"Laetare" (Latin, rejoice) of the Introit of the Mass, to express the Church's joy over the coming baptism of candidates, which formerly took place on Easter Eve. When the old baptismal procedures passed into desuetude, new reasons for rejoicing were excogitated, such as the fact that Lent is then half over. Cf. golden rose.   c.v.

Lagarde, Paul Anton de: (1827-1891) His original name was Bötticher. He taught at the University of Göttingen. He was an enthusiastic philologist and a foundation-laying Orientalist. His brilliant linguistic ability sharpened the weapons and the methodical conscience of historical theology. Although he exercised a most severe critique of contemporary culture, church and theology, he yet remained an enthusiastic theologian. Critical of the entire historically developed Christianity, he regarded Protestantism as a surpassed phenomenon. He almost hated Luther and St. Paul. Only a humble return to the Gospel, he thought, enabled him to establish a doctrine of faith. It was his belief that the state has to assist in bringing about the new national church for which his patriotic soul yearned.
Mittheilungen, von Paul Anton de Lagarde, 4 vols. (Göttingen, 1884-91); Deutsche Schriften. Gesammtausgabe letzter Hand (Göttingen, 1892); W Hartmann, Paul de Lagarde (Halle, 1933); L. Schmid, Paul de Lagardes Kritik an Kirchen, Theologie und Christentum (Stuttgart, 1935); A. Rahlfs, Lagardes wissenschaftliche Lebenswerk (Berlin, 1928).   H.H.

Lagneau, Jules: (1851-1894) He taught philosophy at the Lycee Michelet. His thought was not only an important continuation of Kantianism in the domain of moral philosophy, but also of a moral rationalism. Man comes into direct contact with God in the moral act. God is the common principle of the speculative and practical order, of knowledge and action. To believe in God is to act morally.
Ecrits de Jules Lagneau (Paris, 1924), L'existence de Dieu (Paris, 1925).   H.H.

Lainez, James: (1512-1565) Spanish theologian, influential at the Council of Trent* and the Colloquium of Poissy. Successor to St. Ignatius Loyola* as General of the Jesuits.   E.A.R.

laity: (Ultimately from the Greek laos, people) Members of the Christian church who are not clergy. As the term, properly speaking, is not applied to unbaptized persons it denotes privilege as well as the absence of higher privilege.   B.S.E.

Lakshmi: Wife of the Hindu god Vishnu*, goddess of good fortune and prosperity. When Krishna appeared as incarnation of Vishnu, Lakshmi appeared as his favorite wife. When Rama became Vishnu's avatar, Lakshmi took the form of Sita.   C.S.B.

Lāmaism: See Buddhist Terminology.

Lambeth Articles: Adopted Nov. 20, 1595, these articles state in nine points the predestinarian system then predominant in the Church of England*. They never had the force of law (P. Schaff, Creeds of Christendom, I, 658-662).   W.W.R.

Lambeth Conferences: Meetings of the Anglican episcopate held about every 10 years since 1867 (most recently in 1930) at the call of the Archbishop of Canterbury, and named from their usual place of meeting, the Archbishop's Palace at Lambeth; of importance as reflecting the mind of the Anglican Communion on theology and problems of the day.
W. R. Curtis, The Lambeth Conferences (1942).   E.R.H.

Lambeth Quadrilateral: Bases for reunion proposed by the Lambeth Conference* in 1888—the Bible, the Apostles' and Nicene Creeds, the two major Sacraments, and the Historic Episcopate.   E.R.H.

Lamennais, Hugues Félicité Robert de: (1782-1854) Catholic apologist, later a rebel against the church. His Essai sur l'indifférence en matière de religion (1817) denounced the principle of private judgment as the source of the excesses of the French Revolution, and prescribed ecclesiastical authority and tradition as the cure of Europe's woes. By 1830, he was endeavoring to reconcile Catholicism with democracy, taking "God and Liberty" as the motto of his periodical, L'Avenir. The condemnation of L'Avenir by Gregory XVI drove Lamennais into open revolt and radical socialism. The Paroles d'un croyant (1834) which he issued in defiance of the church, are full of prophetic fire and literary power. Cf. Döllinger; Lacordaire. See traditionalism.   W.M.H.

Lamentabili, the decree of 1907: See Pius X, Pope, modernism.

Lamentations: A book in the third division of the Hebrew O.T., "the writings", consisting of five poems (corresponding to our chapter divisions) written in the Kina or Lamentation metre, probably dating from the fifth century B.C. and composed for occasions commemorating the fall of Jerusalem. It is not clear whether they were written in Palestine or in Babylonia. The first four are "alphabetic acrostics"—a word beginning with the next letter of the Hebrew alphabet (22 letters) standing at the beginning of each unit of several lines or verses. The fifth poem has twenty-two (!) verses. Poems 1, 2 and 4 are in the vein of lamentations or dirges such as were sung at funerals. Jerusalem is figuratively considered the deceased. Poem 3 is in the style of an individual lamentation, with the unusual feature that a male (not female) figure personifies the people or city. Poem 5 is a collective lamentation. Kinship of diction with Isaiah 40-66 appears in 1 and 3. Ascription of the poems to Jeremiah* by tradition is ancient; II Chronicles 35:25, however, hardly can have this collection in mind. The viewpoints do not coincide with Jeremiah's utterances, and 2:9, 4:17, 5 7 do not fit him.

R H. Pfeiffer, Introduction to the Old Testament (1941) ; J. A. Bewer, Literature of the Old Testament (rev ed , 1933).   E.G.K.

Lanfranc: (d. 1089) Rising to prominence as a Pavian jurist, he achieved greater fame as prior and renovator of the monastery of Bec*. Here he emerged as a peerless teacher, and as the triumphant opponent of Berengar of Tours*. Subsequently abbot of St. Stephen in Caen, he was elected in 1070 to the archbishopric of Canterbury through which office he effected a disciplinary reorganization of ecclesiastical life in England. See William of Malmesbury.   R C.P.

Lang, Heinrich: (1826-1876) A radical reformed theologian who was pastor at Wartau, St. Gallen, Switzerland. He brought the ecclesiastical function more strongly to the fore than the historical function.
Versuch einer christlichen Dogmatik allen Christen dargeboten (Berlin, 1851) , Ein Gang durch die christliche Welt (Berlin, 1859) , Martin Luther (Berlin, 1870).   H.H.

Lange, Frederick Albert: (1828-1875) As one of the most attractive of nineteenth century German thinkers, he denied the pretensions of a materialistic metaphysics on the ground that like metaphysics, it illegitimately extends the categories beyond experience, and on the ground that it must necessarily fail in its attempt to reduce mind to physical terms. Metaphysical and religious speculations have no theoretical but practical value in life. Materialism is only justified as a method and not as a world view. Ideals are the legitimate expressions of the moral, aesthetic and religious nature of man. Although errors arise when ideals are taken for actualities, they are to be judged only by their own standards.
History of Materialism (1925) ; J. M. Bosch, Friedrich Albert Lange und sein "Standpunkt des Ideals." (Frauenfeld, Switzerland, 1890) ; W. Genz, Der Agnostizismus Herbert Spencers mit Rücksicht auf August Comte und Friedrich Albert Lange (Greifswald, 1902) ; P. Grebe, Die Arbeiterfrage bei Lange, Ketteler, Jörg, Schäffle. Aufgezeigt an ihrer Auseinandersetzung mit Lasalle (Berlin, 1935).   H.H.

Lange, Johann Peter: (1802-1884) He taught at the universities of Zürich and Bonn. He enriched biblicism through speculation, however, without the necessary discipline of thought.
Das Leben Jesu nach den Evangelien, 5 vols. (Heidelberg, 1844-47) ; Christliche Dogmatik, 3 vols. (Heidelberg, 1849-52, 2 ed., Heidelberg, 1870).   H H.

Langton, Stephen: Cardinal and Archbishop of Canterbury, 1207-1228, died in the latter year. He was a friend of Innocent III*, an influential statesman, and co-author of the Magna Charta*. He is responsible for the division of the Bible into chapters. (See chapters and verses) In 1222 he held a Provincial Synod at Osney, which was of enormous importance for the future of the Church in England.   C.V.

Laodicea, Synod of: A local church council, held about A D. 364, to deal mainly with questions of church organization. It fixed a Canon of Scripture which omitted the Book of Revelation*, tried to regulate the practice of penance*, and, probably with the practice of certain Gnostic sects in mind, it forbade the worship of angels* and the use of unauthorized hymns.   A.K.R.

Lao-tse: See Chinese Terminology.

Lao Tzū: See Chinese Terminology.

lapidaries: Books describing the supernatural properties of jewels. Epiphanius* of Cyprus (d. 403) and Marbod of Rennes (d. 1123) are prominent authors of lapidaries.
J Evans, Magical Jewels of the Middle Ages and the Renaissance, (1922) ; L Thorndike, History of Magic and Experimental Science (1923-41), 6 vols   J.T.M.

lapsed: A term applied in the early Church to Christians who because of persecution fell away from Christian faith and practice. The numerous classes which have been distinguished among the lapsed may be principally grouped as follows: the sacrificati, who had sacrificed to the pagan gods, the thurificati, who had burned incense to the gods, the libellatici, who had won immunity by presenting papers secured by bribery or through other means containing the false or true declaration that they had performed the one or the other of the preceding idolatious acts as required; the traditores, who under the persecution of Diocletian* gave up the sacred books or vessels of the Church. The question as to the leniency or severity to be shown to the lapsed who desired readmission to the Church led to bitter controversy and schisms, with the policy of readmission under a system of public confession and penance finally prevailing. Cf. Novatian.   H.W.J.

lares: See Roman religions.

LaSalle, St. John Baptist de: (1651-1719) French Roman Catholic priest, who founded at Rheims in 1684 the Institute of the Brothers of the Christian Schools. He has been called the Pestalozzi of France because of his educational reforms. See Christian Brothers.   E A.R.

last judgment: See final judgment.

Lateran Councils: There were five Ecumenical Councils* held at the Lateran Palace of the popes in Rome, so called because in ancient times the Laterani Family occupied the present site. The first of these General Councils was celebrated in 1123, under Callixtus II (1119-24) confirming the Treaty of Worms with King Henry V of Germany and putting an end to the Investiture* Controversies; the second, in 1139, under Innocent II (1130-43) excommunicating Roger of Sicily and the bishops appointed by the Anti-Pope*, Anaclete II; stabilizing the "privilegium canonis" in defense of clerics and re-approving the decree of Nicholas II regarding the election of popes, the third, in 1179 under Alexander

III* (1159-81) settling the controversies with Emperor Frederick I (Barbarossa) of Germany, and confirming the Peace of Venice; the fourth, in 1215, the most important of all five, under Innocent III* (1198-1216), stabilizing the use of the term "transubstantiation"* regarding the Eucharist* and enjoining under pain of excommunication the reception of Holy Communion at Easter time, and finally, the fifth, in 1512-17, under Julius II (1503-13) convoked to re-establish peace among the Christian princes, to promote the war against the Turks and to reform the Church "in its head and members".

The Acts of the various Councils were published by such well-known compilers as Mansi in his Concilsorum nova et amplissima collectio (Paris. 1901-24), and by Hefele, Conciliengeschichte (Freiburg in Br., 1886), (French transl. by Leclerq). Besides the Ecumenical Councils there were also many other councils celebrated at the Lateran but they were of local nature and are usually referred to as Synods.

Litt G. D. Mansi, Conciliorum Nova et Amplissima Collectio (Venice, 1776) XXI, 278-304 (I), ib. 1776, XXI, 523-546 (II), ib. 1778, XXII, 203-468 (III), ib. 1778, XXII, 953-1086 (iv); Paris, 1902, XXXII, 649-1002 (V). C J. von Hefele, Conciliengeschichte (Freib in Br., 1855-90), French tr. by H. Leclercq, Histoire des Concils (Paris, 1907-18). P. Deslandres, Les grands concils de Lateran (Paris, 1913); L. Pastor, History of the Popes (London and St Louis· Herder), Vol. VIII, (1923) IX; Dict. de la Théol. Cath. VIII. 2628-86, Cath. Encyc. IX, 16-19.
R.M.H.

Latimer, Hugh: (c. 1490-1547) English reformer. His preaching, clearly implying Reformed doctrines, early made him a center of debate in Cambridge and London. Though he rose to be bishop of Worcester, his greatness lay in his power as a preacher. His sermons established Reformation principles in the hearts and minds of the people, and gave the movement its distinctive complexion. Martyred under Mary.
G.R.C.

Latin America, religion in: The Roman Catholic faith was introduced into Latin America at the time of the Spanish Conquest, which, in a sense, was a religious crusade. This was in the early part of the 16th century. Culturally and religiously, Latin America owes a debt to Spain and Portugal. The most notable work was the pioneer missionary activity of the religious orders. On the Spanish settlements the encomienda system had as its principal object the conversion of the Indians to the Catholic faith. Although masses of these were, baptized they remained thoroughly pagan and even today their fundamental beliefs and practices are still pagan.

From the time of the Conquest and settlement of the New World the question of state and church relationship was of paramount importance and it continues to play an important part in the life of the Latin American republics. Ecclesiastical patronage was granted to the monarchs of Spain and Portugal. By this means and through the Inquisition* the mother countries sought to achieve political unity and a rigid control of cultural expression in colonial times.

Following political independence at the beginning of the 19th century the conflict between Church and State continued in all countries, over the questions of control of personnel, church property and education. Religious freedom became a prominent issue. Peru was the last country to give religious freedom (1915). During the last century party-politics had their basis largely in the religious questions and continue to do so today. The liberals, under different names, are generally anti-clerical though nominally Roman Catholics as individuals, while the conservatives stand for the prerogatives and power of the Church and are often drawn from the landowning aristocracy.

Today many of the educated classes, students, professionals and the like, are estranged from the Church. Formerly, some of them embraced agnosticism or atheism, but in recent years a deep spiritual unrest and a search for reality have been discernible. At the same time positivism*, spiritualism as well as oriental cults and philosophies have gained a considerable number of adherents, especially in Brazil and Chile.

The most significant religious movement of modern times is that of Protestantism, which, except for sporadic attempts in earlier centuries, was introduced effectively during the second half of the 19th century. This movement has emphasized the evangelical note and the ethical content of personal religion. British and North American missionary societies have made an outstanding contribution through their educational, medical and social institutions. In some cases these were begun at the invitation of liberal Latin American presidents. The American Bible Society and the British and Foreign Bible Society have distributed the Scriptures in all countries. (See Bible Societies). In recent years the Protestant Church has grown rapidly. From 1925 to 1938 the number of members trebled. The strongest churches are to be found in Brazil, Mexico and Argentina. In the last twenty years there has been a notable development in national leadership and indigenous churches.

A series of international conferences of Protestant forces have been held, beginning at Panama in 1916. At this conference the Committee on Cooperation in Latin America was created by representatives of the mission boards of most of the major Protestant denominations. This Committee, with headquarters at 156 Fifth Avenue, New York, seeks to coordinate the efforts of the different bodies, publishes the influential Spanish magazine La Nueva Democracia, promotes a literacy campaign throughout Latin America, using the Laubach method, and has a comprehensive program of Christian literature. Some of the larger mission boards working in Latin America include: The Board of Foreign Missions of the Presbyterian Church in the U. S. A., The Board of National Missions of the Presbyterian Church in the U. S. A., The Board of Missions and Church Extension of the Methodist Church; The American Baptist Home Mission Society; The National Council of the Protestant Episcopal Church; The United Christian Missionary Society, (Indianapolis, Indiana).

At the present time the Roman Catholic Church is seeking to regain an ecclesiastical monopoly in Latin America through the exclusion of Protestant missionaries. Liberal groups in the Peruvian Congress and elsewhere have recently been vocal on this issue. The fear of communism and social upheaval has tended to strengthen the alliance between the conservative reactionary groups and the Roman Catholic hierarchy in many parts of Latin America.

Books on Religion in Latin America·
J A Mackay, The Other Spanish Christ (1933) ; J L Mecham, The Church and State in Latin America (1934) ; W S Rycroft, On This Foundation, The Evangelical Witness in Latin America (1942)

W.S.R.

Latin Christianity: Historical form of Christian beliefs and practices developed in the church of the Latin countries of Europe and overseas and other churches under pope at Rome.   K.H.C.

Latin, ecclesiastical: See ecclesiastical Latin.

Latitudinarians: A body of Anglicans, sprung from the Low Church* party, who looked to Comprehension rather than toleration as the ideal for the Church of England*. Their aim was greater Latitude, alike from the narrowness of rigid Calvinism and rigid Catholicism of the Laudian* variety. The name was first attached to the Anglicans who conformed to the Cromwellian Church settlement, but the great age of Latitudinarians was from 1688, under the leadership of Archbishop Tillotson (1630-1694) under the influence of the writings of Chillingworth (1602-44) and the Platonism of Whichcote (d. 1683). Antagonism came not only from the Anglican side, Baxter referred to them as the "Cambridge Arminians."   F.W.B.

latria: (Gr. the status of a servant) A term used, technically, to designate that supreme adoration rendered to Divinity, exclusively, as Sovereign Creator, sustainer, and last end of the creature. It is thus distinguished from dulia, which is the veneration due saints and angels, and hyperdulia, which is the special honor due Mary*. See Mariolatry.   R.C.P.

Latter Day Saints: (general article on) A group of six religious sects, otherwise known as Mormons, first founded by Joseph Smith at Fayette, N. Y., in 1830. Smith claimed to have received a series of divine revelations instructing him about the second coming of Christ, the organization of a new church, and the whereabouts of certain golden plates bearing the message of a new dispensation. When he was twenty-one years old he secured these plates from which he and others translated the book of Mormon*, accepted by the believers as a divinely inspired revelation. According to this book America was settled by an ancient people dispersed from the east when human tongues were confused at the Tower of Babel and by Israelites who emigrated from Jerusalem six hundred years before Christ .

Smith and his friends gained some converts and established colonies in Ohio, Illinois, and Missouri, following a policy of segregating the converts from the "gentiles." They encountered opposition everywhere because of the extravagant claims of revelations from Christ, John the Baptist, and various apostles, and because of their advocacy of polygamy. In 1844 Smith was killed in a riot at Carthage, Ill. The remarkable Mormon leader, Brigham Young, led the main body to Utah in 1848, where they founded Salt Lake City and secured possession of large areas of territory. Young published his doctrine of "celestial marriage" (for eternity as well as time) and polygamy in 1852, and he and the Mormon leaders generally practiced plural marriage. This brought them into conflict with the laws of the United States and led practically to war between the Mormons and the authorities Polygamy was publicly disavowed in 1890.

Mormon doctrine includes belief in the Bible and the main tenets of the Christian religion but it adds original elements of its own. Chief among these is the inspiration of the Book of Mormon, special divine revelations of various kinds, two orders of priesthood, the Aaronic and the Melchizedek, and the activities of various angels, especially the guiding spirit of the Mormons, Moroni. Its officers, headed by an all powerful president and two other "high priests," are apostles, patriarchs, seventies, elders, and bishops. Visions, prophecy, the gift of tongues, divine healing, and various other gifts are believed in. The second coming of Christ is imminent and he will set up his city of Zion in the United States, while the "ten tribes" will be restored and the Jews will return to Palestine.

The Mormons were reputed to have amassed vast wealth in Utah Their noted temple (from which "gentiles" and lukewarm Mormons are excluded) and tabernacle at Salt Lake City are well known. They oppose the use of liquor, tobacco, tea, and coffee. They are energetic in proselyting and have sent missionaries into all parts of the world, many young Mormons serve a missionary apprenticeship before taking their places in the business world.

The total group of Mormons number about 775,000, mainly in Utah (340,000) and Idaho (100,000) and the western states. There are over 2,000 local churches They are divided into six different denominations.

1. The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints is the main, or Salt Lake City, group which has more than half the churches and 85% of the members.

2. The Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints (567 churches and 94,000 members) claims to be the true Mormon Church founded by Joseph Smith*. It denied the claims of Brigham Young* and opposed polygamy. It was originally constituted by the few churches which survived after the main body went to Utah. The son of the original Joseph Smith was its head for many years, and a grandson is president at the present time. Headquarters are at Independence, Mo.

3. Church of Christ (Temple Lot) is a group of 16 churches and 700 members which originally moved from Illinois, where they remained when the main body went to Missouri, to Independence, Mo., in response to an alleged divine revelation in 1864. There they purchased the "temple lot," 2¾ acres of land said to have been selected in 1831 as the site of the temple in the "land of Zion." This lot has great significance in their eyes, since the temple which is to stand on it will be the center of the new world order to be ushered in when the New Jerusalem is built and Christ returns. In 1891 the Reorganized Church began legal proceeding to secure the lot and in 1895 the decision was rendered in its favor.

4. Church of Jesus Christ (Bickertonites) This group has 31 churches and 1600 members. It was founded by William Bickerton at Greenock, Pa., in 1862. This man claimed divine inspirations of various kinds and he gathered a group of believers who remained in the east after the departure of the main body, and who opposed Brigham Young, polygamy, baptism for the dead, and other Mormon ideas.

5. Church of Jesus Christ (Cutlerites). This little group of 30 Mormons has a church at Independence, Mo., and another at Cliterall, Minn. They claim to be the true church founded by Joseph Smith, all others having apostatised. The sect was founded by Alphens Cutler, one of Smith's elders, when he saw in the sky the sign of "two half-moons with their backs together." Cutler's successor tried to establish community of goods, and the principle that ownership should vest only in the church still prevails.

6. Church of Jesus Christ (Strangites). This sect of 4 churches and 120 members claims to be the original and only Mormon body. Its prophet and founder was James J. Strang who is said to have been designated by Joseph Smith as his successor. After the murder of Smith, Strang was "ordained by the hands of angels" and tried to assume leadership and started to build a "stake in Zion" at Voree, near Burlington, Wis. But he was rejected by the main body who "voted they wanted no more prophets of God to lead them." Strang continued his prophetic work, however, translated "by Urim and Thummim," from certain "plates of Laban" missed by Smith, a book called "Book of Law of the Lord," and was finally crowned king in 1850. He was assassinated in 1856.   E.T.C.

Latter Day Saints: Or more correctly The Church of Jesus Christ (of Latter Day Saints was added for legal reasons), organized 6 April 1830 by Joseph Smith, Jr* in Sebeca County, New York; later moved to Kirtland, Ohio, where temple was built, Independence, Missouri; Caldwell County, Missouri, Nauvoo, Illinois. After death of Joseph Smith Jr. by mob, 27 June 1844, most of the over 200,000 members were scattered. Some 20,000 followed Brigham Young to Utah; some others formed smaller groups and in 1852 reorganized, awaiting the coming of Joseph Smith III in 1860, together with the mother, brother, sisters and all descendants of Joseph Smith Jr. This group had headquarters at Plano, Illinois, then Lamoni, Iowa, and, since 1907, Independence, Missouri.

In doctrine, liberal with no set creed, but accepts principles of Apostles Creed, trinitarian; accepts the Bible as the fundamental work of Christianity, the Book of Mormon, as a record of the early inhabitants of America, present revelation, issued as Doctrine and Covenants; ordained priesthood with gradations of First Presidency; Apostles (12), Seventy (7 quorums), high priests, including High Council evangelists, bishops; also elders, priests, teachers and deacons; believes every one has right of approach to God, with spiritual gifts through confirmation, baptism by immersion, healing (James 5 15).

Also Christian economic order of Enoch to care for poor through donation of surplus with every man his home and stewardship.

Believe in endowment of the Spirit (Lk. 24:49, Acts 2 1-21), and that God is unchangeable.

Herman C. Smith, History of the Church (1896, 1897, 1900, 1903), Vols. 1-4; Times and Seasons, 1839-1846, Nauvoo; Elbert A. Smith, Angel Message tracts; Elbert A. Smith, Faith of Our Fathers (1940); Elbert A. Smith, What Latter Day Saints Believe about God (1937); Elbert A. Smith, What Latter Day Saints Believe about Immortality (1937).

S.A.B.

Latter Day Saints—Reorganized: Has been held a continuation of the Original Latter Day Saints, alike in doctrine and practice. (Federal Reporter, 60-937, Court of Common Pleas, Lake County, Ohio, 1880, in re Kirtland Temple.) Headquarters—Independence, Missouri. President—Frederick M. Smith, grandson of Joseph Smith, Jr.   S.A.B.

Latter Day Saints—Utah: Sometimes called Mormons, started with those who followed Brigham Young to Utah, there rebaptized and reconfirmed. On 29 August 1852 first published celestial marriage, popularly called polygamy, a practice previously started by Young and associate leaders and continued until Manifesto of 1890 and later proclamations of Presidency officially repudiated practice, but held as celestial marriage for life to come; ideal of God as once a man with celestial wives; Adam as God was once, taught by Young and others now rejected as only their personal, not official, teaching. To the three books named under Latter Day Saints, they add the Book of Abraham, in The Pearl of Great Price (1851). Build temples for ritual use with grips and pass words, baptism for dead ancestors. Headquarters—Salt Lake City. Heber J. Grant, President.

John A. Widstoe, Rational Theology, pp. 23, 24, 63, 148, Jas E. Talmage, The Articles of Faith, pp. 435, 440, 457; B. H. Roberts, Defense of the Faith and the Saints (1907), p. 18 ff.   S.A.B.

Latter, the, Prophets: See canon, Old and New Testament.

Laud, William: (1573-1645) Archbishop of Canterbury during the troubled days of the Stuart monarchy. Successively Bishop of London and Archbishop of Canterbury, Laud became first minister of the crown, standing with Charles I and Strafford against Puritanism and the commonwealth. He was a vigorous churchman, loyal to Catholic standards which he sought to impose by force. This caused disaster both in England and in Scotland, where his policy gave rise to the "Covenant." He was impeached, tried for treason, and executed by the Long Parliament, in 1640-44. His chief place in religious history is as a defender of the catholicity of the Church of England, and his apologia for that Church is his most important published work.   W.N.P.

lauds: (Lt. laudes) The drawn service in the system of Hours*, usually, when sung in choir, following immediately upon Matins*. So called from the use of the laudate psalms (Ps. 148-50). See divine office.   P.V.N.

Lavabo: (Lat. I will wash) The first word of verses 6-12 of Psalm XXV in the Vulgate, beginning, "Lavabo inter innocentes manus meas," said by the celebrant while washing and drying his fingers after the offertory of the Mass*; used as a name for the ceremony. The Lavabo originated in the practical necessity of cleansing the fingers after handling offerings of bread, fruit, etc., donated by the faithful. It now symbolizes that purity with which the sacred mysteries should be approached.   J.F.T.

Lavater, Johann Caspar: (1741-1801) Protestant thinker. Born Zurich, Switzerland. Extensive journeys through Germany brought him into contact with most of the leading contemporaries. He became in 1769 pastor in Zurich where he died. The first Protestant theologian to conceive of the ministry primarily as cure of souls. Counselled many thousands in interviews and through an extensive correspondence. Christianity to him consisted mainly in personal relationships, "Virtuose der Freundschaft". His religion was open to philosophical arguments, but remained, nevertheless both Biblical and emotional. It contributed much to the defeat of the older type of rationalism and paved the way toward German idealism. The meticulous self-scrutiny of his Secret Diary inaugurated in Germany and Britain the fashion of writing "moral diaries".

Like Hamann* Lavater interpreted nature as the direct manifestation of the Divine Spirit. His works on physiognomics were an expression of this view. They were as successful as his religious writings.

Principal works· Aussichten in die Ewigkeit (1769-1773); Physiognomische Fragmente (1775-1778, Engl. tr. by H. Hunter, 1810 and Thos. Holcroft, 1808, illustrated by Wm. Blake and others); Geheimes Tagebuch von einem Beobachter seiner selbst (1772-1773, Engl. tr. 1795); Jesus Messias, or the Evangelists and Acts of the Apostles, 4 vol Gesammelte Werke (1841-1844); Biographies by P. J. Heisch, 1842 (Eng); Fr. Munker, 1883, A. Vömel, 1927, and Chr. Janentzky, 1928 (all three in German); Ol. Guinandeau, 1924 (French).   O.A.P.

law: In the juridical sense, the aggregate of those rules of conduct which the governing power of a community recognizes as those which it will enforce or sanction, and according to which it will regulate, limit, or protect the acts of its members. Theories as to the nature and origin of law vary with the different schools of jurisprudence. 1) To the natural law school, which grew out of the Stoic philosophy and Roman jurisprudence, law is the expression of right reason inhering in the nature of man and society which is ethically binding as a rule of civil conduct, and which it is the duty of society as politically organized to recognize and enforce, 2) to the analytical school, which was first definitely formulated by Thomas Hobbes* in his Leviathan (1651) but which became dominant among English-speaking peoples through the writings of John Austin (1790-1859), law is the command of the sovereign to his subjects to perform or abstain from performing definite acts, to the breach of which a definite penalty is attached, while 3) to the historical and comparative schools, originating with the historical and social sciences in the nineteenth century and popularized by the writings of Henry Sumner Maine (1822-88), law is a social product consisting of certain authoritative regulations of social relations which were slowly differentiated and developed out of the matrix of custom and distinguished from it by a) the nature of the authority or sanctions involved, (b) the procedure or mode of regulation, and (c) their social function or scope.

Many primitive peoples have not yet evolved law as distinct from custom in any meaningful sense of the term. Yet such societies are not on that account characterized by anarchy and ungoverned violence. On the contrary, in primitive society custom conditions, permeates, and controls every phase of man's social and personal behavior from birth to death. Agreement as to what is required and what is prohibited is so universal and conformity is so general that control is for the most part exercised by consensus rather than by constraint. Most of the violations which occur are dealt with by such informal and general or diffuse sanctions as disapprobation and ridicule. Some violations, however, involve religious sanctions, and are conceived of as producing in the offender a state of ceremonial uncleanness or pollution which endangers both himself and those in contact with him, and which can be removed only by the performance of prescribed religious rites.

Law, however, has developed out of certain customary methods of redress of public and private wrongs. Among most, if not quite all, peoples there exist powerful sanctions which are obviously communal in character. They are often visited upon the offender by means which express the moral indignation of the group in a manner quite similar to modern lynch law. They are especially concerned with maintaining certain customs which are felt as especially sacred and whose violation is therefore looked upon as a form of sacrilege which endangers the life of the group by rendering it ritualistically unclean and exposing it to the wrath of the gods. The offender is therefore stoned, burned, sacrificed to the gods, or outlawed from the group. Because uncleanness is looked upon as a form of physical pollution which can be communicated by contact, the entire family or blood group of the offender together with his property, is sometimes included in the penalty, as in the case of the punishment of Achan's theft (Joshua, ch. 7). Among the actions most commonly treated in this manner are witchcraft*, incest, and breaches of marriage customs, although any act may be included which is thought of as a serious violation of sacred prohibitions. Such sanctions provide the starting point for the evolution of primitive law.

Acts of private vengeance visited by the injured upon the guilty for violations of custom which are not felt to endanger the community as a whole constitute a second source of law. For private vengeance is casual and arbitrary at best, and the principle of solidarity and collective responsibility of the kindred which makes the blood* feud as interminable conflict between the families of the aggrieved and the aggressor, constitutes a perpetuate threat to social harmony. Hence custom, which at first sanctioned only the right of private vengeance, ultimately prescribes both its extent and duration. Thus arises the lex talionis* which demands that there shall be an equivalence between the injury and the penalty, and that, when vengeance has once been exacted, further retaliation shall cease. But an offender may suffer in property as well as in person, and a further mitigation of the blood feud is the composition for offenses, or money payment in lieu of physical injury.

These methods for the redress of public and private wrongs are applicable only when rights are clear and violations apparent. They provide no means of settling controversies as to the existence of an injury and the actuality of alleged guilt. But every group has leaders whose authority is based on age, strength, courage, skill, intelligence, personality, or other valued qualities. These elders, headmen, or chiefs provide impartial arbiters to hear complaints and hand down decisions as to the character of the reparation due. But they did not dare to execute their own sentences for fear of involving themselves in the blood feud. Nor did they presume to determine cases in the light of their human wisdom alone. Hence they employed oaths* and ordeals by which the gods were called upon to render their judgments as to guilt or innocence.

Law, in the full juridical sense of the term, can hardly be said to exist until there emerges a central executive authority sufficiently powerful to enforce its decision without fear of blood vengeance. But even at this stage the administration of justice by a central power does not involve the right to make new laws by legislation and judicial action. Even at a relatively advanced stage of cultural development, kings who are justly described as autocrats are as much bound by custom as are their subjects. As an illuminating statement in King Alfred's Law expresses it, "I durst not set down much of my own."

Although true legislation, the power of creating new regulations by acts of political authority, which has become the chief source of law in modern complex societies, was attained by many advanced political societies of the Ancient World, not until the eighteenth century did the full potentialities of this power begin to be employed. Yet even today custom continues to be an important, though diminishing, source of law.

Law in modern society therefore has three sources. Legislative enactments constitute the lex scripta, or statutory law. Long prevailing customs, sanctioned by the consent of those who use them and recognized by the final courts of appeal, as reasonable, consistent, and established, constitute the lex non-scripta, or common law. The law established by judicial decision in adapting either statutory or common law to particular cases constitutes case law. If in the process of interpretation an absolutely new rule is added to the law, it is properly referred to as judicial legislation.

The scope of law has evolved pari pasu with its sanctions and procedures. Primitive society is marked by a strong predominance of the criminal over the civil law. This was due, as Maine has shown, not to the greater turbulence of primitive peoples, but to the fact that absence of contract, the regulation of personal relations by the status of individuals, the administration and inheritance of property according to custom, and the relative isolation and ethnocentrism of kinship and territorial groups, left little occasion for the development of other legal functions. But the evolution of social organization created new problems in social control and enlarged the scope of the law. The increasing interdependence of sovereign states has led to the compilation of international law. It consists of the system of rules which regulate the intercourse of states and determine their reciprocal rights and obligations. It is still almost wholly customary in character. It consists of acts and forbearances of states with respect to each other, and has no other sanctions than "a decent respect to the opinions of mankind." International courts and tribunals, like those of primitive society, must depend upon the willingness of the disputants to accept their decisions, and when this fails, the resort is to that modern form of organized vengeance and blood feud known as war. The body of law in force within the political jurisdiction of a state is called, not very appropriately, municipal law. Substantive law defines or creates the rights which the courts are called upon to administer in contradistinction to adjective law, which defines or creates the means and procedures of enforcing them. Public law consists of the legalization to which governmental power has become subjected in the process of its development. It includes 1) constitutional law, which defines the form of government and the relations of the different branches of government to each other, 2) administrative law, which prescribes the manner in which the powers of government shall be exercised within the constitution, and defines the rights and duties of governmental officials and the relations between government and private persons, and 3) criminal law, which deals with injuries to the government or to the public at large resulting from violations of law and prescribes penalties for the same. Private, or civil law defines the rights and privileges of persons, both natural and juridical, and deals with things as property or objects of private right. The term political law is used by some writers to refer to that part of jurisprudence* which relates to the organization and policy of states and their relations to each other and to their citizens and subjects. It includes international, constitutional, and administrative law, as here defined. -See culture, primitive religion.

N. S. Timasheff, An Introduction to the Sociology of Law (1939), P. Vinogradoff, Outlines of Historical Jurisprudence (London, 1920-22); L. T. Hobhouse, Morals in Evolution (London, 1906) law: In its most general sense, especially as it was used by the Hebrews and in Greek philosophy, the word law signifies every observed regularity of nature as well as of human conduct, such regularity being thought of as taking place in obedience to divine command. Not until the eighteenth century is the meaning of law as an objectively observed regularity, i.e., a "law of nature" (see natural law) clearly and consistently distinguished from law as the idea of a norm or a system of norms of human conduct to which human beings owe obedience, but which a man is free to disobey provided he is willing to suffer the penalty. In the terminology prevailing among present-day lawyers the term law is confined to those rules of human conduct which are manipulated and enforced by the state or, at least to such bodies of norms as are applied and interpreted in the same method in which state enforced rules of human conduct are handled. If taken in this latter sense the term law is broad enough to cover the phenomena of International Law and Ecclesiastical Law which are not covered by the narrower meaning. The lawyer's definition emphasizes that feature which distinguishes "law" from such other bodies of norms of human conduct as those of social etiquette, religion and ethics. While the sanction of law is the infliction upon the violator of some detriment by a special functionary of politically organized society, the sanction of etiquette consists in ridicule, boycott or some other form of unfavorable reaction of society as an unorganized or, at least not politically organized, group. The sanction of the religious rule of conduct consists in the believer's notions of incurring the wrath of the deity in this or another world, and the ethical rule of conduct finds its sanction in the feeling of uneasiness, remorse or despondency which attends or follows upon the violation of the ethical imperative in the mind of the person endowed with ethical sensibility. While these various types of rules of human conduct are distinguished from each other in mature analysis, in so-called primitive law they form an indistinguished complex.
H.E.J.

The ancient comprehensive meaning of the term law is also reflected in the terminology of Thomist philosophy, where eternal law, signifying "the plan of the Divine Wisdom as directing all actions and movements" is divided into the two categories of the physical law and the moral law. The former is obeyed perfectly and uniformly, the latter, however, but partially and imperfectly. Of the moral law, the following subdivisions are distinguished Natural Law constitutes "the participation of the eternal law in the rational creature," it is universal, perpetual, immutable, and easily known to any being endowed with reason. Divine Law, on the other hand, is inaccessible to human reason and has therefore been supernaturally revealed to man by God in his infinite goodness and mercy. Finally, human positive law is a rule of conduct, "mandatory in form and freely established and promulgated by human superiors for the common good." It is this latter category alone to which present-day lawyers apply the term law.

One of the outstanding characteristics of modern society is the monopolization of violence by the state. Self-help, feud and spontaneous violence are "out-lawed", except in the relations of states among each other where the outlawry of war has so far remained a pious wish. The application of violence as against individuals is not permitted to private persons but only to certain functionaries of politically organized society who, in contemporary America, are known under such names as sheriff, United States marshall, prison-warden, public executioner, policeman or constable. As a rule these "violence-officers" are not permitted to go into action except upon the express order of a member of another set of societal functionaries, the "determination officers," who are commonly known as courts or judges. These latter officers, in turn, are not allowed to order action against an individual by a violence officer unless they have found that such individual has behaved himself in a certain "illegal" way. If D does not pay the money he owes C, the latter is not allowed to resort to self-help but has to sue D before a court. If the latter after proper investigation finds that C's claim against D is justified under the law, it orders the sheriff to levy execution upon so much of D's assets as may be necessary to pay C's claim. The judgment of the court empowers the sheriff or his deputy to break all resistance D may offer, if necessary, by armed force. With all its might the state ranges itself behind its citizen whom it prevents from "taking the law into his own hands." Looked upon in such an analysis the law appears as that body of rules which tell the determination officers of the state under what circumstances they have to order the violence officers to apply violence against an individual.

The opinion held by contemporary American "realists" that law is not a body of rules but simply the sum total of the activities of the courts and other law people ("Law is nothing but what the judges do") overlooks the basic social need for certainty and predictability of official action. The Leviathan State would be unbearable if its functionaries were not bound to the observance of definite rules, which, of course, have no reality other than that of other contents of the human mind, but whose motivating force can hardly be denied by psychologists. The supreme functionaries of society cannot be curbed by "legal" sanctions in the narrow sense of the word. The guarantee that the judges of a supreme court or a chief executive will apply the law lies in the wisdom of political organization, for instance, the technique of separation of powers, in the restraining force of political prudence and public opinion, and ultimately in the motivating power of such bodies of meaning as ideas of morality and religion.

The content of the rules of law which, through the foreseen sanction of politically organized violence, are of motivating force to the individual members of society, are determined by numerous factors, which can be subsumed under the categories of 1) the ethical convictions and habits of the "elite", i.e., that group or those groups whose convictions, habits and tastes set the pattern for the society in question; 2) the traditions and techniques of the "law specialists", i.e., the judges and attorneys or, in certain countries, administrative officials of various kinds.

The effectiveness of the rules of law of a given society depends not only upon the efficiency of the enforcement machinery but upon the degree of correspondence of the rules of law with the religious beliefs, the ethical convictions and the traditions and habits of those to whom they are addressed. The strongest guarantee of the law consists, however, in the religious or ethical conviction, that law observance as such is pleasing to the Deity or constitutes an ethical imperative (Socrates!). Finally, law cannot dispense with the emotional appeal of myths, symbols and ceremonies. Definitions of law which exclude from this euphonious label politically enforced rules of human conduct which are not backed by the "ethical conviction of the people" or whose contents do not correspond to the ideals of the author of the definition may be means of propaganda against tyranny but are of little use in social science.

The systems of positive law being presently in force in the various countries of the earth are usually distinguished as belonging to either the group of the Common Law or to that of the Civil Law. The Common Law countries are those whose laws continue in an unbroken tradition those rules, techniques and legal usages which have been developed since the 11th century in the Royal courts of England. These countries are England itself, Ireland, the greater part of the British Dominions and colonies and the United States. The Civil Law grew up in the countries of continental Europe upon the basis of innumerable locally and socially different customs. Toward the second half of the Middle Ages the revived law of Imperial Rome exercised a powerful unifying and systematizing influence. Since the beginning of the 19th century the unifying trend has been counteracted by the growth of nationalism which resulted in the enactment of great national codifications. The codes of France and Germany became models for other countries so that the great family of so-called Romance laws (France, Belgium, Netherlands, Italy, Spain, Latin-American, and several Balkan countries) can now be distinguished from the German family of codes (Germany, territories formerly belonging to Austria-Hungary, Switzerland, Japan, China, etc.). French law has also been the model for the laws of the Canadian Province of Quebec and for the Civil Code of the State of Louisiana. Uncodified versions of Civil Law are in force in Scotland, in the Union of South Africa and certain smaller parts of the British Commonwealth of Nations. The Scandinavian countries, which were less affected by Roman law, have developed autonomous legal systems of their own, which have been considerably influenced, however, by the legal science of neighboring Germany. See jurisprudence; canon law; natural rights.

The literature on law is legion. William Seagle's The Quest for Law (1941) may serve as the best introduction and the most extensive collection of bibliographical data. Max Radin's The Law and Mr. Smith (1938) is another fine explanation for the uninitiated. See, also, the articles and bibliographies on Law in the Encyclopedia of the Social Sciences, especially those by A. B. Radcliffe-Brown (Primitive); L. Wenger(General View of Ancient); E. Seidl (Egyptian); P. Koschaker (Cuneiform); A. Gulak (Jewish), B Weiss (Greek), A. A. Schiller (Hellenistic), E. von Kuenssberg (Germanic); S. Kutrzeba (Slavic); E. MacNeill (Celtic); J. Escarra (Chinese), M. Takikawa (Japanese), and S. Vesey-Fitzgerald (Hindu) in 9:202 et sq ; Schiller (Roman Law) 13:419; H. Hazeltine (Canon Law) 3:179; J. Declareuil (Civil Law) 3-502; R. Pound (Common Law) 4:50, and J. Schacht, (Islamic Law) 8:349; further articles on legal topics are indexed in vol. 15 at p. 553   M.Rh.

law, canon: See canon law.

law, Hebrew: System of ritual practices and observances, and jurisprudence, believed by the Hebrews to have been divinely revealed to Moses on Sinai and incorporated in the Pentateuch*. As among all peoples of antiquity, ritual and law proper, i.e., jurisprudence were undifferentiated, and were regarded as having a common origin. In the course of time, Hebrew law underwent a long process of development. This is especially perceptible in the law of the Tannaitic period (the first two centuries of the Christian era) where we meet with many significant variations from and developments of Biblical Law. The main factors in the development of the Law were Interpretation, Enactment and Custom. When the Mishnah* was compiled by Rabbi Judah the Patriarch, it became the authentic guide to Jewish practice with regard to every matter affecting religion and law. The main task of the later scholars known as Amoraim* (who flourished between 200-500 of the Christian era) was to interpret the Mishnah and adjust it to contemporary living. In view of the fact that economic, social and political conditions of Palestine diverged in many respects from that of Babylonia, considerable differences in law and interpretation are to be found in the Palestinian and Babylonian Talmuds. During the Gaonic period (700-1040) it was the Babylonian Talmud which became the recognized authority for Jewish religious life and when the Palestinian Talmud presented a different interpretation, it was generally disregarded. With the dispersion of the Jews in North Africa and Europe, schools for the study of Jewish Law were founded in the new settlements. New living conditions precipitated new problems for the learned in the law, local variations in customs were inevitable in the course of time. From the eleventh century on we witness the growth of the Spanish, Franco-German, Italian, and later the Turkish schools of law differing in many important details with regard to liturgy, ritual and jurisprudence. However, throughout the Middle Ages and down to modern times, it is the Bible and the Talmud* which constitute the two main sources of Hebrew Law. See Hillel; Old Testament, tables of the law. Cf. Israel.

Cf. Louis Ginzberg, Jewish Encyclopedia, Vol. VII. pp. 635-647; A Gulak, Encyclopedia of Religion and Sciences, Vol V, pp 219-224; S. R. Driver, Hastings Dictionary of the Bible, Vol III, pp. 64-73; F Perles, Encyclopedia of Religion and Ethics, Vol. VII, pp. 855-858.   B.C.

Law, William: (1686-1761) English divine, moralist, and mystic. Born at King's Cliffe, Northhamptonshire, the son of a shopkeeper of good family, Law entered Emmanuel College, Cambridge, in 1705. In 1711 he was elected fellow of his college and ordained. Refusing in 1714 the double oath of allegiance to George I and abjuration of the Stuart Pretender, he lost his fellowship and every chance of preferment within the Church. Henceforth he supported himself as he could through tutoring and private chaplaincies and devoted himself in the utmost simplicity to the life of prayer, study, writing, and good works. His most influential works, A Treatise of Christian Perfection (1726) and A Serious Call to a Devout and Holy Life (1728), express the view of Christianity already put into practice by Law. Their influence on John Wesley* was marked and permanent, bearing fruit in his mature doctrine of Christian perfection. The Case of Reason (1732) was the first answer to Tindal's Christianity as Old as Creation—the foremost Deist* writing. About 1733 Law became acquainted with the writings of Jacob Boehme*. His writings after 1737 are mystical in the normative sense of the word and have earned him the title of "The English Mystic". See evangelicalism and evangelical revival; non-jurors.

Works (1892), 9 vols.; J. H. Overton, William Law, Non-Juror and Mystic (1881).   C.W.L.

Laws of Manu: See manu; Vedas.

laws, natural: See law, natural law. Cf. American theology, early.

lay, layman: Strictly employed, these terms are to be understood through their opposition to the term clericus, and its derivatives, in such Churches as believe the clergy to be possessed of an indelible character, imparted through ordination. A layman is one who is not a cleric. However the terms are used more loosely to signify the non-ministerial status in Churches of any kind; and indeed they are often used to indicate simply the non-professional.   A.K.R

lay abbot: 1) A monastic abbot not in orders—possible even today in Eastern Church 2) commendatory—ecclesiastic or layman to whom Pope or King "commended" monastic endowments, custom widespread c. 1400-1800.   E.R.H.

lay baptism: According to the Roman Catholic Church any lay person may validly baptize, and in case of emergency (i.e., when an unbaptized person is near death and no cleric can be obtained), is bound to do so. Anybody, whether man, woman, child, Catholic, Protestant or Jew, may baptize provided there is the intention to do what the Church intends when baptizing Water is poured on the head of the subject while repeating the Scriptural formula, "I baptize thee in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost." Though the sacrament may be validly administered by any layman, it is gravely illicit except in cases of emergency.   J.F.T.

lay brother, lay sister: (Gr. laikos, laos, people) A member of a religious order who is neither in holy orders nor bound by the recitation of the Office in choir (cf. choir monk, nun), but whose occupation is concerned solely with the secular affairs of a monastery or convent. Such lay religious are clerics in the extended sense of the term and enjoy clerical immunities. The institution was unknown prior to the 10th century, when the ordination of monks was gaining ground and manual labor losing it.   J.F.T.

lay clerk: A (strictly) self-contradictory term for a functionary connected with the choral part of the service in an English cathedral. The term "clerk" preserves the historical fact that the function used to be performed by an ordained official; the term "lay" indicates that it is now discharged by a lay person.   A.K.R.

lay confession: Confession to a layman in the absence of a priest was common in the Middle Ages, either by extension of the practice of resorting to a monk for counsel (East) or by analogy with emergency baptism (West).   E.R.H.

lay reader: Among Anglicans since Elizabethan times a layman authorized by the bishop to read services in church, especially when clergy are not available. Derived from neither but somewhat replacing both, the duties of the office are similar to those of readers in the ancient church, who however were in minor orders, and parish clerks, who however were usually paid parish assistants, sometimes sextons*.   T.J.B.

lay religious teaching: See Sunday School movement in the United States.

lay tithes: 1) secular tithes paid to a secular landlord; 2) ecclesiastical tithes which, in the course of time, have, for one reason or another, been alienated from the Church to a lay proprietor.

A.K.R.

laying on of hands: A method used by a qualified person to transmit blessing*, authority or grace to another. The hands were usually laid on the head. In the Christian church the rite has been used for exorcism* before baptism, to impart the Holy Spirit to the newly baptised, to transmit a special grace at ordination. In a less formal way it was used for healing, absolution and benediction. The Prince of the Sanhedrin* or other members conferred authority upon a new member in this way. In Egypt and Babylonia the king and priests received authority for their offices by contact with the hands of the images of the gods. A variant appears in the ancient Hebrew ceremony in which the priest annually transferred the sins of the people to the scapegoat*. Underlying all such rites is the primitive idea of a mysterious potency which may be communicated by contagion. See confirmation.

A.E.H.

Le Bon, Gustave: (1841-1931) He held that tenacious efficiency of beliefs is proof that man is not a logical creature. Man is likely to believe the most illogical and unreasonable things if these satisfy his emotions and feelings. Thus beliefs, not reason and logic, have been the real factors in life and history. Change in the beliefs of a people is followed by a great change in their whole social life.

G. Le Bon, Psychology of Socialism (1889).

H.H.

League, German Catholic: Founded 1609 in Munich against the Protestant Union of 1608. By 1619 it included most of the Catholic estates of the empire under the leadership of Bavaria. It played an important part in the years preceding and immediately following the beginning of the Thirty Years' War*. It came to an end in the Peace of Prague, 1635.

E.C.K.

League and Covenant, the Solemn: A covenant, based on the Scottish National Covenant of 1638, adopted by the English Parliament in 1644, to be imposed on all Englishmen over eighteen years of age. This amounted to an effort to make the Established Church in England* Presbyterian* in return for Scottish help in the struggle with Charles I. Cf. Covenanters.

See H. Gee and W. J. Hardy, Documents Illustrative of English Church History (1914), pp. 569-574.

A.K.R.

leaven: Symbolic of unseen influences for good or evil—the first (from the parable, Matthew 13.33) is common in literature, the second suggests an association of purity in faith and morals with the unleavened bread* of the Passover* (I Cor. 5:8) and unleavened altar-bread*

E.R.H.

lectern: (From Lat., legere, to read) A reading desk of wood or metal, frequently employing the eagle symbol, upon which is placed the Bible read in public worship.

P.V.N.

lection: A passage from Scripture, the writings of the Fathers, or the lives of the saints, read in the services of the Church, particularly in the Eucharist (Epistle, Gospel) and in Matins*.

P.V.N.

lectionary: 1) A book containing the lections* read in the Eucharist (liturgical Epistles and Gospels) or in Matins. 2) A table of lessons appointed to be thus used. See pericope.

P.V.N.

lector: Perhaps originally a charismatic* order allowed to read and expound the Scriptures—since the third century a minor order; in Anglican use (16th century and modern) a layman licensed to read part of the service.

E.R.H.

Lectureships, Foundations and Institutes: See under separate headings: Adams; Alden-Tuthill; Avera; Ayer, Barrows; Beecher; Bohlen; Bross; Carew; Chancellor; Christian Biography, Clark; Cole; Colver; Crozer; Dudleian; Earl; Ely; Flowers; Fondren; Goldberg; Green; Haddon-Colt; Hale; Haskell (Oberlin); Haskell (U. of Chicago); Hazen; Hewitt, Holman; Hoyt; Hyde, Ingersoll, Institute for Religious Studies, Jarrell; Jones, Judaism, Lectureship on, Kessler; Lowell; McCauley, McNair, Mendenhall, Merrick, Moore; Morse, Noble, Paddock, Pollok, Porter; Quillian; Rauschenbusch, Richard, Robertson, Rockwell, Science, Philosophy and Religion, Conference on; Russell, Shaffer (Northwestern), Shaffer (Yale); Southworth; Sprunt; Stone, Students' Lectureship on Missions (Princeton), Swander, Taylor; Terry, Theology Lectures, the (U. of Va.); Thomas; West, Zimmerman.

Lee, Mother Ann: See communistic settlements, religious, Shaker communities.

legalism in religion and morality: The view that religion or morality consists in strict obedience to a prescribed code of laws. Often the term is used derogatively to signify a conformity which has missed the inner spirit or purpose of the laws and degenerated into a barren observance of externalities. Legalism stands opposed both to utilitarianism and to salvation by grace; it requires obedience to law without regard to consequences and rests the claim to redemption on good works. The scribes* of ancient Judaism and the Puritans* of the modern era are familiar examples. Both construed the Scriptures as a legal code.

F.G.E.

legates and nuncios, papal: Both, Papal Legates and Papal Nuncios, are representatives of the Pope*. They differ in the degree of authority vested in them and according to the countries to which they are sent. A Legate, e.g., may be sent to another ruler or country merely in an honorary capacity, as e.g., to represent His Holiness at a King's Coronation or to preside in his name over a Eucharistic Congress. A Legatus a Latere is always a cardinal, he is sent by the Pope as another ego and enjoys as much power as is committed to him by the Pontiff, plenipotentiary (in a given case) or restricted, e.g., in signing contracts, concordats*, etc. (Canon 266 of the Code of Canon Law.) If the Legate represents not only the person of the Pope but also the Holy See which has diplomatic relations with that country, he is called a Nuncio. His position corresponds to that of an Ambassador, hence the terms Nunciature and Embassy are correlative. If the Legate represents diplomatically the Holy See in a country of second rank, so classified either by reason of its population or Catholic proportion, he is called an *Internuncio. His rank would thus correspond to that of a Minister, diplomatically speaking. The principal ordinary duties of a Nuncio or Internuncio (besides extraordinary faculties) are to foster, according to stabilized norms, good relations between the Holy See and the government to which he is sent; to watch diligently over the status of the Church in that country and to report on the same to the Holy See. An Apostolic Delegate (Dex Legatus) represents the Holy See only in the last named sense and enjoys no diplomatic character, i.e., does not represent the Holy See with the government of the country to which he is sent. Hence despite the presence of an Apostolic Delegate, the Pope may discuss matters of mutual interest in any given country through another as his personal representative (e.g., Mr. Myron Taylor as personal envoy of President Roosevelt and any given Bishop or Archbishop as personal envoy of the Pope). An Apostolic Delegate, of course, may enjoy many delegated powers not ordinarily connected with his role or office, especially when relations with Rome become difficult as e.g., during a war. Unless otherwise specifically stated his duties do not expire with the death of the Pope; they do cease however, if the Legate or Delegate (Envoy) is sent only for a specific purpose that has been accomplished, or by recall from his mission, or by resignation, if accepted by the Pontiff. Legates may not interfere with the ordinary jurisdiction of bishops in their respective dioceses, they do however, enjoy precedence over all other prelates, even though they themselves be not consecrated bishops or (as is usual) archbishops, (excepting over cardinals). If the Legate be a consecrated bishop or archbishop he may, even without the permission of the Ordinary (excepting in the Cathedral) bless the faithful publicly, e.g., during processions, and perform all such pontifical functions (cf. Pontificals, Pontificalia) even with throne and canopy. If a bishop or archbishop enjoys the title of an Apostolic Legate by virtue of his see, he does not thereby obtain any special jurisdiction (Canons 1 c. No. 265-270). Such Legates, e.g., the Archbishops of Cologne, Rheims, Canterbury, etc., are known as Legati Nati (born Legates) in Canon Law*. All Legates, like Ambassadors, enjoy personal immunity.   R.M.H.

legend: (Lat. legere, to read) A term denoting a popularly accepted narrative, or collection of narratives, of widely varying authenticity such as were current in the Middle Ages. Specifically, a medieval legend might concern itself with an edifying story of a saint's life, a collection of stories or readings in the saints, for instance, the famous Golden Legend of Jacobus de Voragine; a service book of readings or lessons combining excerpts from Scripture and saints' lore, or a bold traditional fabrication of religious data in response to popular needs. The uses of the legend in sermon, liturgy, religious drama, and private devotion were legion. See culture, folk lore; Holy Grail, Jacopo da Voragine.   R.C.P.

Leibniz, Gottfried Wilhelm: (1646-1716) Mathematician, erudite man of affairs, and rationalistic philosopher. He believed that reality, in which "causae efficientes pendent a finalibus," is a system of self-contained, unique centers of appetition and perception (monads). The quality of monads extends continuously from the obscure perception of the simple monad to the clearer perception of necessary truths envisioned by rational spirits. Each monad "mirrors" the universe from its viewpoint not because of mutual interaction, but because it was selected for its part by an omniscient, omnipotent, and provident God whose "fulgurations" brought into being this best world among possibilities. A finite world and moral freedom necessitate evil.

God, the source of the possible and the actual (compossible) world must exist, for nothing can contravene his possibility, while he alone could be the sufficient cause of the contingent world. In knowing God, faith and reason harmonize. See Enlightenment, the; monadism; panpsychism.
La Monadologie (1714); Théodicée (1710); Principes de la Nature et Grace (1714).   P.A.B.

Leipzig, Interim of: A modification of the 26 articles of the Augsburg Interim* by Melanchthon* and his colleagues. Declared the law of the land at Leipzig in December, 1548, by Maurice of Saxony, it aroused intense opposition among strict Lutherans and led to the adiaphoristic controversy*. Cf. Majoristic controversy.   E.C.K.

Lemme, Ludwig: (1847-1927) He was professor in Breslau, Bonn and Heidelberg. The impetus and clarity of theological group differences disappeared in his works.
Christliche Ethik (Gross-Lichterfelde-Berlin, 1905); Theologische Enzyklopädie (Berlin, 1909); Christliche Glaubenslehre (Berlin-Lichterfelde, 1918); Christliche Apologetik (Berlin, 1922).   H.H.

Lempp, Otto: (1885-1914) Killed in World War I, he taught at the University of Kiel. With H. Suskind*, his fellow-Swabian, he was most strongly influenced by Troeltsch*.
Das Problem der Theodizee in der Philosophie und Literatur des 18 Jahrhunderts (Leipzig, 1910); Tolstoi (Tubingen, 1912); Schiller (Gottingen, 1915).   H.H.

Lent: (Old Eng., lencten, spring) The penitential season of forty days from Ash Wednesday* to the eve of Easter*. In the official terminology of the Roman Catholic Church, *Quadragesima, whence Fr. carême, etc., Ger., Fastenzeit. The pre-paschal fast was at first quite short, but was gradually extended backward to include Holy Week*, then a 'tithe' of the year, finally the period of forty days (Sundays of course excluded). The fast is otherwise reckoned in the Eastern Church. Anciently the Lenten season was a period of preparation for baptism at Easter, and of public penance* for those under discipline. The imposition of ashes is a survival of the later practice. See church year; church year cycle; Laetere Sunday; Shrovetide.   P.V.N.

Leo the Great—Pope: (440-461) Leo I First Bishop of Rome to achieve general recognition of their claim to supremacy as successors of Peter. The Barbarian invasions contributed. Valentinian III, eastern Emperor, for political purposes, proclaimed his authority in the West.

Leo's definition of the person of Christ was adopted by the Council of Chalcedon (451)* and remains orthodox.   R.E.E.H.

Leo IX: (Pope, 1049-1054) This reforming pope ascended the papal throne from the bishopric of Toul, from which he had been called by his cousin, the Emperor Henry III. Leo immediately embarked upon a program of reform which issued in a reorganized cardinalate, far-reaching appointments of such men as Hildebrand*, and a series of acts calculated to raise ecclesiastical morale and papal authority. See Cerularius, M; schism.   R.C.P.

Leo X: (Pope, 1513-1521) Giovanni de 'Medici came to the papal throne with all the Renaissance* predilections of his famous family. His reign was marked, especially, by his struggle to advance the political fortunes of the papacy and those of his relatives with it, his Concordat* of 1516 with Francis I of France, and the beginning of the Protestant Revolt in Germany. With the challenge presented by this last, he was conspicuously unable to cope. See s.v. Defender of the Faith.   R.C.P.

Leo XIII: (Pope 1878-1903) Vincenzo Gioacchino Pecci, b. March 2, 1810 at Carpineto, educated by the Jesuits* in Viterbo, at the Roman College and in the Academy for Nobles in Rome, was ordained priest and made a Domestic Prelate in 1831; Apostolic Delegate (cf. papal nuncio) to Benevento, where he combatted brigandry, in 1838; Apostolic Legate to Spoleto and Perugia in 1843 and Nuncio to Belgium in 1843 whence, for having sided with the bishops against the State in the question of Christian education, despite royal favor, he was recalled, 1846. It was here, as also as a result of his extensive travels to Cologne, Paris and London that he obtained that world-wide cultural and social viewpoint (Weltanschauung) that was later to characterize him as pope. Appointed by Gregory XVI Bishop of Perugia and created cardinal in petto (not published) he was unalterably opposed (since 1860) to the anti-clerical laws of the Italian government. Promulgated as cardinal by Pius IX* in 1853, he was called in 1877, after Antonelli's death, to act as Camerlengo of the Roman Curia. Elected pope in 1878 he sought incessantly to show through his many encyclicals* the perfect harmony of Christian principles with any justifiable form of government that stood for personal liberty; the justifiability of privately owned property and the rights of the working classes consistent with their natural and Christian dignity. (Immortale Dei, Nov. 1, 1885; Libertas, praestantissimum, June 29, 1888; Graves de Communi, Jan. 18, 1901 (Christian Democracy); Rerum Novarum May 15, 1891 (against Socialism and Liberalism), etc. His relations with the countries of Europe, excepting Italy ("non expedit") were, despite his "captivity" in the Vatican, friendly and appreciated. As a missionary pope he did much to advance the cause of faith and religion in the Americas, China, Japan and Africa. He erected 48 missionary vicariates and 248 dioceses throughout the world. Personally highly educated, he took a great interest in the revival of Thomistic Scholasticism (see Neo-Scholasticism), Biblical Studies and higher education in general. He founded the Catholic Universities at Washington, D. C., at Fribourg in Switzerland and at Louvain, Belgium. His most ardent desire was to see the separated Slavic nations return to the fold of Rome. He fostered Catholic devotions. Although always physically weak, he was an intellectual giant in philosophical and theological knowledge; a classical Latinist and poet; a pioneer and leader in Christian politico-social sciences and an arbiter in national disputes that won for him and the papacy the admiration of the whole world. He died in 1903 and was laid to rest at St. John Lateran opposite the tomb of that other international pope of the Middle Ages, Innocent III*. See Americanism; Commission, the Biblical.

Litt. Acta Leonis XIII (Rome, 1881-1903), 22 vols. plus Index; Acta Sanctae Sedis (Rome, 1878 ff), Vol. XI, ff, Allocutiones, Epistolae et Constitutiones—Leonis XIII (Brugge, 1878-1900), 7 vols., Carmina, Inscriptiones, Numismata Leonis XIII, publ. by J. Bach (1903), Engl. tr. by Henry (no date), The Great Encyclicals of Leo XIII, edit. by Father Wynn, S.J.; individual encyclicals translated into Engl. publ. by the Paulist Press, New York and by the NCWC of Washington, D. C. Biographies by B. O'Reilly (Paris, 1887); German tr. by V. Weinaud (1892); E. Keller (1882); J. McCarthy (London, 1896); Furey (1903); J. J. McGovern (1903).   R.M.H.

LeRoy, Edouard: (1870-) French philosopher, Catholic modernist and follower of Bergson, first attained celebrity by his Dogme et critique (1906) which gave a pragmatic interpretation of Catholic dogmas. While this and his subsequent book, Le Problème de Dieu (1929), have been put on the Index*, M. LeRoy has remained a loyal Catholic layman, whose constant endeavor has been to reconcile Catholic faith with modern science by means of Bergsonian philosophy. Cf. his book on Bergson, Une philosophie nouvelle (1912).   W.M.H.

Lessing, Gotthold Ephraim: (1729-1781) German dramatist, critic, librarian of the Wolfenbuttel* Library. The latter part of his life was devoted to freeing and broadening the conception of religion and defending the application of criticism to Christianity. In this cause he published Zur Geschichte und Litteratur (1774-1778) containing extracts from H. S. Reimarus'* caustic criticism of miracles. In the well-known drama Nathan der Weise (1779) Lessing pointed out the unity of aim in Mohammedanism, Judaism and Christianity, and in his great work Die Erziehung des Menschengeschechts (1780) (The Education of the Human Race) he portrayed life as the education of man through successive Divine revelations. These works have had a marked influence in promoting religious breadth and tolerance. See Lives of Jesus; Mendelssohn, Moses.   J.W.B.

Lessius, Leonard: (1554-1623) Flemish Jesuit and theologian who played an important part in the disputes on grace in the Catholic Church at the beginning of the seventeenth century. Cf Molinism.   E.A R.

Lesson Helps in Sunday School: See Sunday School movement in the United States.

Levellers, the: They formed the most important movement of popular political thought and of democratic radicalism during the 17th century English civil wars. In religion they favored religious toleration and were opposed to the establishment of either an episcopal or a presbyterian form of government. Though not of a very definite composition, the group formed for a brief time something like a political party, having a definite idea of the political aims of the English revolution, and a plan for re-settling the constitution on liberal lines. It failed in all of its purposes, but it represented with remarkable distinctness the modes of thought and argument which characterized revolutionary liberalism in the 18th and early 19th centuries. It drew the lines rather definitely between the liberalism of the less privileged economic classes and of the well-to-do. The name Leveller was meant to imply that the party sought to destroy differences in social position, of political rank, and even of property. The equality sought was equality before the law and equality of political rights for the small property owners. The Levellers were individualist rather than socialist in their radical democratic liberalism, and political rather than economic in their aims. See Diggers, the.

C. H. Firth, ed., The Clarke Papers (Camden, Eng., 1891-1901), 4 vols.; G. P. Gooch, Political Thought in England from Bacon to Halifax (London, 1914); Th. Pease, The Leveller Movement (Washington, 1916); G. P. Gooch, English Democratic Ideas in the Seventeenth Century (Cambridge, 1927); W. Haller, ed, Tracts on Liberty in the Puritan Revolution, 1638-1647 (1934), 3 vols.   H.H.

levirate marriage: (Lat., levir, husband's brother) Deuteronomy 25.5-10 legislates that when a man dies without a male descendant, the widow* must not marry a stranger, but the surviv-ing brother of the deceased must take her to wife; and the first son born of them succeeds to the name (and the property) of the deceased. This form of marriage, widely practiced among various nations, was connected in ancient Israel with the agrarian law which sought to preserve the integrity of the estate within each clan and family. (Cf. Num. 27 7-11) Taking over the land of the deceased, the brother inherits also the widow. The law also protected the childless widow by retaining her as part of her husband's family (Ruth 1.11; 3. 1ff.). The spiritual motive behind the law was to avert the extinction of the name of the deceased and possibly also to secure for him a son to perform the proper ancestral rites. Pre-Deuteronomic custom did not restrict the performance of this duty to the husband's brother, but permitted the nearest kinsman to discharge it (Gen. 38; Ruth 3-4). Both Tamar and Ruth* consider it to be their supreme obligation to supply their dead husbands with male progeny.

An aversion to the levirate marriage seems to have been attached throughout its history among the Jewish people. The Deuteronomic law (vss. 7-9) provides a substitute for it in the form of Halizah ("loosing the shoe") or release of the widow by the brother-in-law to marry whomever she pleases. The Code of Holiness* ignores both the levirate marriage and the Halizah, prohibiting, without exception, the marriage of a man and his brother's wife as incestuous (Lev. 18.16; 20.21). The Samaritans reconciled the discrepancy between the two codes by limiting the levirate marriage to instances where the woman was only betrothed but not yet married to the deceased brother. The Sadducees* appear to have shared this view. (Cf. Mat. 22.24ff.; Mk 12.18 ff., Lk. 20.27ff) This, too, was the position of the Pharisaic school of Shammai and subsequently of some Karaites. The school of Hillel held that the law in the Holiness Code is suspended in the case of a childless widow. However, if the deceased left a child either male or female, the levirate law does not apply. According to Mt. 4.4 and Mk. 6.18 this was also the view of John the Baptist. The Rabbis in the Talmud and Codes differ as to whether levirate marriage or Halizah is preferable. Rabbi Gershom b. Jehudah of Mayence (c. 1000), by his interdict against polygamy, rendered levirate marriage impracticable. In consequence levirate marriage was completely replaced by Halizah in Ashkenazi Jewry. Inasmuch as the release becomes an empty ceremony where the levirate marriage is prohibited, Reform Judaism dropped the Halizah as requirement for childless widows for remarriage. See marriage; patriarchal system; widows, treatment of.

M. Burroughs, "Levirate Marriage in Israel," Jour. Bibl. Liter. (1940), 23-33; S. S. Cohon, "Marrying a Deceased Brother's Wife," Yearbook Central Confer. Amer. Rabbis (1925), 364-371; S. R. Driver, Deuteronomy, 280-285; M. Mielziner, Jewish Law of Marriage and Divorce (1884), 54-58; Strack-Billerbeck, Kommentar zum n. Test. to Matthew 22.24; J. Pederson, Israel (1926), 77-81.   S.S.C.

Leviticus: The third book of the Pentateuch*, which contains priestly legislation on the following subjects· sacrifices (1:1-6.7), priesthood (6 8-10 20; 21-22), purifications (11-15), sacred seasons (16, 23), meat-eating (17), marriage and chastity (18), sabbatical year and year of jubilee (25), vows and tithes (27), and various other matters. The book is wholly a product of the late priestly writer(s) designated by the symbol P*, incorporating an earlier work of the sixth century B.C., the Holiness Code* (most of chapters 17-26). In its present form Leviticus dates from cir. 500 B.C., and contains most of the P legislation as distinguished from P narrative. Except for orthodox Judaism*, the book as a whole has little more than antiquarian value today, but it does contain some high religious and ethical principles, especially in chapter 19. See A. Bertholet, Leviticus (Kurzer Hand-Commentar zum A.T, 1901). See Sifra.   J.P.H.

Levy-Bruhl, Lucien: (1857-1939) Professor of sociology at the Sorbonne in Paris. As the most remarkable continuator of Comtian positivism*, minus its dogmatic religious and prophetic attitude, the main subject of his investigations dealt with the nature of primitive mentality of non-literate peoples. He showed by a commendable array of facts that the law of participation is the basic law of mystic mentality. He interpreted primitive mentality as pre-logical or mystical, not as anti-logical. He showed that the collective representations of primitive mentality are as a rule incomprehensible to civilized people. This is due to a greater socialization of primitive mentality.
Ethics and moral science (London, 1905); Primitive mentality (London, 1923); How natives think (1926); Soul of the primitive (1928), Primitives and the supernatural (1935).   H.H.

lex divina; lex aeterna: See ius divinum.

lex evangelica: (evangelical law) It is the completion of the law of nature.   H.H.

lex humana: See ius divinum.

lex naturalis: (natural law) Also called the ius naturale or the ius divinum. It designates the native direction towards the good in human reason, and embraces the immutable principles of reason for justice. It is the basis and norm for all positive law. It implies the universal ethical norms.   H.H.

lex scripta: See law.

lex talionis: The law of retaliation or principle of equivalence which provided that the punishment should be the same in kind as the offense, "life for life, eye for eye, tooth for tooth," etc. (Exodus 21.23 ff.) Popularly conceived of as a primitive form of justice, it nevertheless marked an advance to a higher moral system, in which purely individual hostile acts of revenge against the transgressor were replaced by acts of socio-ethical retribution performed either by representatives of the group or by the offended individual himself under group sanctions, and in which the principle of proportion or adequacy was always the basis of retaliation. See blood revenge; law.

Rudolf Hirzel, "Die Talion," in Philologus, Supplementband XI (1907-1910), pp. 407-482; Ray Madding McConnell, Criminal Responsibility and Social Constraint (1912), pp 22-59; Prosanto Kumar Sen, From Punishment to Prevention (London, 1932), pp. 15-20.   H.E.J.

lexicography: The making of dictionaries especially of foreign languages, notably for the interpretation of the Hebrew O.T. and the Greek N T. See exegesis.   E.J.G.

Liber Pontificalis: (Book of the Popes) The work of a number of writers. Contains biographies of Popes* from Peter down to Stephen V (885-891). It was first given out by an unknown writer of the sixth century. Afterwards various writers added to it. Louis Duchesne's edition brings the lives up to 1431. Cf. the Prologomena of his work for details.   C.R.

Liberal Catholic Church: A sect which has combined the esoteric ideas of theosophy* with Catholic sacramentarian notions into a ritual and created a creed of liberal thought. It claims to be a "Catholic Church" with valid orders in apostolic succession derived from the Old Catholic see of Utrecht. (See Old Catholics.) One of the bishops created by the Jansenist church in Holland, James Ingall Wedgebody, was converted to or greatly influenced by the English theosophist, Charles W. Leadbeater, and consecrated Leadbeater as bishop of Australia. In 1917 Leadbeater came to America and consecrated Irving Steiger Cooper, who set up the Liberal Catholic Church in Los Angeles and became its bishop.
E. T. Clark, The Small Sects in America (1937); Piggott, The Liberal Catholic Church; Sheehan, Teaching and Work of the Liberal Catholic Church; Leadbeater, The Christian Creed.   E.T.C.

liberal theology: The word "liberal" is defined by the Oxford Dictionary as "originally the distinctive epithet of those 'arts' or 'sciences' that were considered worthy of a free man, opposed to servile or mechanical." The implication is that liberalism is an educational and spiritual achievement and that it carries the dignities and responsibilities as well as the rights of freedom. In theology as in other fields the word is habitually associated with the attitudes that accompany thought and action untrammeled by prejudice or convention. Thus a liberal theologian is suspicious of authority and in revolt against it; he may or may not believe in revelation, but he tends to interpret it as continuous with and as furnishing data for rational and reflective methods of thought. He may accept the supernatural, but here again he tends to minimize its distinction from the content of ordinary experience and to find its difference from the natural in its ideal quality or the characteristics which give it value above what is usual. The liberal theologian is loyal to the religious institution but he tends, also, to consider it worthy of devotion not in itself but in so far as it becomes the bearer and representative of ideal truth. In theology as in politics the liberal is one who is favorably disposed to change, especially that which is in line with individualism and democracy.

Liberal theologians are thus bound by a common method rather than a definable common content. In his Baltimore sermon (1819) W. E. Channing* illustrated this method when he said: "Our leading principle in interpreting Scripture is this—that the Bible is a book written for men, in the language of men, and that its meaning is to be sought in the same manner as that of other books . . . We indeed grant that the use of reason in religion is accompanied with danger. But we ask any honest man to look back on the history of the church, and say, whether the renunciation of it be not still more dangerous." Liberalism became especially prominent in theology in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries as part of the general movement toward freedom of thought so that a list of liberals would include a large proportion of the outstanding theological thinkers of that period. It is a mistake, however, to think of it as limited to any one age. It springs from a way of thinking and feeling which is at least as old as the Greeks and the more humane Hebrew prophets and as new as the more recent developments in democratic theory. At present it is seriously challenged as too exclusively "rationalistic", as "blindly optimistic", and as promoting the attitude of spectator rather than participant. Its ability to meet the challenge would seem to depend upon humanity's confidence in its own capacity to assume the responsibilities of democracy and freedom. See modernist; reason in religion. Cf. fundamentalism.   J.S.B.

libertarianism and necessitarianism: Respectively, belief in free-will, power in men of initial decision, denial of freedom since all action due to antecedent causes.

Science from Newton* on unveiled necessity in nature (mechanistic naturalism), tendency ensued, helped by monistic inclination of thought, to bring ethics and psychology under same rule. 'The necessary character of our volitions fully established' (Haeckel). Resisting psychologists and moralists admitted determinism, but 'it is the self that determines' (self-determination). Present-day science wears another face; with discovery of quanta, 'physics no longer pledged to deterministic law' (Eddington). Libertarianism favored by revolt against the static in being and thought, under evolutionary and instrumentalist concepts.

Yet theoretical argument for necessity seems logically holeproof, can a mental state be other than conditioned? Against this is set 'the immediate affirmation of consciousness in the moment of deliberate action . . . I find it impossible not to think that I can now choose' (Sidgwick). There is wide acceptance of this, or since Kant, of freedom as involved in obligation; with acknowledgment that in anticipating the behavior of others our assumptions are commonly necessitarian.

The parallel issue in theology is the Pelagian-Augustinian, some of whose elements re-appear in modern theology in Calvinism* and its contraries Pelagius endowed man with freedom as alternate choice, Augustine viewed freedom as the establishment of the soul in goodness through indwelling grace*. Strict Calvinists feel that on any theory but theirs, there is a loophole for man becoming his own saviour, but many non-Calvinists (e g., Evangelical Arminians*) would with equal zeal deny Pelagianism. Theology widely today seems moving toward an equilibrium of thought: God's sufficiency man's sole hope. man's answerability to God for his life and deeds. See cause, predestination.

H V. Knox, The Will to be Free· A critique of Deterministic Theory (1928); N Berdyaev, Freedom and the Spirit (1935); J Maritain, Freedom in the Modern World (1936).   J.L.

Libertines: 1) A 16th century pantheistic, antinomian sect in France and the Netherlands. Also known as the Spirituels, they denied the distinction between good and evil. 2) The political-religious party (also known as Perrinists, from their leader, Ami Perrin) which opposed Calvin's rigorous system in Geneva. They were overthrown in 1555 3) According to Acts VI, 9, a group within the Jerusalem synagogue who opposed Stephen They were probably descendants of Jewish freedmen who had been expelled from Rome by Tiberius. 4) In ethics: one who acts according to his lusts or impulses.   E C.K.

Libertines: A mixed group in Geneva which, from patriotic, antinomian, and other motives, resisted the discipline imposed by the Councils under Calvin's influence, also called Perrinists, after Ami Perrin, their leader from 1546. Their power, broken in 1553, was negligible by 1555.   A.K.R.

libertines: A derogatory term in ethics applied to those who act without restraint, giving a free rein to their impulses and appetites. It may refer to irresponsible free-thinkers.   R.W F.

liberty: See religious liberty.

libido: See psychology, schools of.

licensed preacher: See licentiate.   A.K.R.

licentiate: A person who has been authorized by competent authority, especially by a University or a Church court, to discharge the functions of a profession. In the Roman Catholic Church it signifies a friar who is authorized to hear confessions and grant absolution anywhere. In the Presbyterian Church, a licentiate is one whose right to preach has been recognized, but who has not yet been ordained and installed in a regular pastorate.   A.K.R.

lie and lying: A statement made with intent to deceive and for the sake of some advantage to the deceiver. All lies are wrong according to ethical formalism because truth and truth-speaking are directly apprehended, either by intuition or reason, as having an intrinsic moral quality and as therefore unconditionally obligatory upon the moral conscience. Any deviation from the truth is wrong on these grounds. According to teleological ethical theory lies and lying are, as a rule, to be condemned because of their injurious consequences for the deceived and the deceiver. Truth-speaking is essential to human intercourse and social welfare, to personal integrity and trustworthiness. Without it human communication, social cooperation and mutual confidence would be impossible. Its value consists in its power to promote human welfare. On these grounds deception may be morally defensible in those rare cases where truth-speaking would definitely imperil life but where deception, e.g., the withholding of bad news from one critically ill, is judged likely to aid in saving it. See truth.   R.W.F.

Liebner, Carl Theodor Albert: (1806-1871) He at first taught at the universities of Göttingen, Kiel and Leipzig. Then he was chief court chaplain in Dresden. He sought speculatively to attain the heights of a knowledge of God, the soul of which was an ethical mysticism. By the combination of the newer kenotism with the doctrine of the central man Christ, he built the bridge to a christocentric philosophy of history.
Die christliche Dogmatik aus dem christologischen Prinzip dargestellt (Göttingen, 1849).   H.H.

Lieh Tzu: See Chinese Terminology.

Life and Advent Union: See Adventists.

light and darkness in religious symbolism: Light and darkness represent opposing principles of good and evil in religious symbolism*. The majority of religious myths posit darkness in the beginning of things. In advanced religions, light and darkness lose their physical aspects in an ethical and cosmological dualism. In Chinese religion, Yang* stands for heaven, light, truth, knowledge, order; Yin stands for earth, the lower nature, ignorance. Yang is male, Yin the female. They are two aspects of a total reality, but Heaven or Light is the higher or nobler order. Zoroastrianism* made this dualism purely ethical, one in which Light finally triumphed over darkness and evil was banished. In Buddhism*, the Buddha is associated with Light and Nirvana or pure knowledge, ignorance of the Buddha with darkness and the dull round of rebirth. In the N.T., the gospel is pictured as "the light," those without the gospel are in "darkness." A basic dualism is maintained in the conceptions of heaven and hell* in historical Christianity.

In primitive religions, light and darkness remain more as realities than symbols. Primitive peoples fear darkness; they seek to gain security by magical rites; they conceive evil spirits as enjoying darkness, fearing light. Strange phenomena-producing darkness, as an eclipse, are feared. Indeed primitive man was at a serious disadvantage in darkness compared with other animals. Religion sought through rites and mythologies to insure him against these uncertainties. Man's earliest accounts of creation, his explanations for the setting and rising of the sun, his awareness of the sun's rays, continually streaming on the earth, reveals an imagination and esthetic interest also. See article "Light and Darkness," Hastings Encyclopedia of Religion and Ethics, vol. 8 (1915).   M.L.C.

Lightfoot, Joseph Barber: (1828-1889) Anglican theologian. He was born in Liverpool, entered Trinity College, Cambridge in 1847, and a disciple of Westcott. In 1857 he became tutor, 1861 Hulsean professor, Cambridge, and from 1875-1879 Lady Margaret Professor of Divinity, Cambridge. From 1870-1880 he was one of the revisors of the King James' Version. In 1879 he was made bishop of Durham. He died at Bournemouth.

Lightfoot was one of the outstanding N.T. scholars of the 19th century. His commentaries on the Pauline Epistles (Galatians 1865, Philippians 1868, Colossians and Philemon 1875) and his monumental edition of the Apostolic Fathers (5 vols. 1869-1885) are standard works in their field. On the basis of careful and extensive textual and grammatical studies he aimed at interpreting the authors out of the logic of their own thought (historical-grammatical method). He was a successful teacher, and through his numerous disciples influenced the study of exegesis in many theological schools. As minister and bishop he excelled himself no less in the clarity and depth of his sermons than in the active interest he took in church expansion work. Intimate friend of Westcott* (who succeeded him in Durham) and of Hort.

Works, not mentioned above. Sermons (1890-1891); Biblical Essays (1893); Biographies by Hort in Dictionary of National Biography 33 (1893) pp. 232-240, and by H. W. Watkins (1894).
                                                           O.A.P.

Liguori, St. Alphonsus: Italian bishop, born near Naples in 1696. After a short career as a lawyer, he was ordained priest in 1726 and founded in 1732 the Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer (the Redemptorists*). In 1762 he was consecrated bishop of Sant' Agata dei Goti, resigning the see in 1775. The Roman Catholic saint of the century, he lived a life of great mortification, and is known especially for his writings on moral and ascetical theology, in which he gives proof of wise moderation and avoids with equal care rigor and laxity. He died in 1787. See equiprobabilism; probabilism.
                                                           E.A.R.

limbo: (Lat. limbus, border, edge) The abode of those souls excluded from heaven through no fault of their own; so called because of the primitive belief that it was situated near the borders of hell. Roman Catholic theologians distinguish two kinds of limbo: 1) the limbo of the Fathers— a place and state of rest wherein the souls of the just who died before Christ's ascension were detained until he re-opened heaven to them, hitherto closed in consequence of Adam's fall, referred to as "Abraham's bosom" (Luke xvi, 22), "Paradise" (Luke xxiii, 43), and notably in Ephesians iv, 9, and I Peter iii, 18-20; 2) the limbo of children—Catholic faith holds that all children or adults who die without the baptism of water, blood, or desire and therefore in a state of original sin, are excluded from the vision of God in heaven (cf. beatific vision). The great majority of Catholic theologians—St. Augustine being a notable exception—teach that such children and unbaptized adults as are free from grievous actual sin eternally enjoy a state of perfect natural happiness, knowing and loving God by the use of their natural powers. This place and state is what is generally understood by the term limbo.   J.F.T.

limitation: See self-limitation.

Lindberg, Conrad Emil: (1852-1930) Born in Sweden, Lindberg came to America in 1871 and in 1890 became professor of theology at Augustana Theological Seminary. Through four decades his teaching influenced the ministry of the Augustana Synod. His Dogmatics (Eng. tr. 1922) is a clear analysis of conservative Lutheran doctrine.   C.J.B.

Ling Chos: (Tibet—Chos, stories; ling, country) Legends and tales of gods, demons, and giants; parts of an ancient pre-Buddhist religion, carried in the folklore of the peoples of Tibet. It is not entirely clear whether these religious elements derive from Indo-Europeans of Western Tibet, or the Indo-Chinese of Eastern Tibet. This ancient religion appears to have come down to the present day in the form of the Bon Chos. Tibetans call the old pre-Buddhist religion the Bon. (See Buddhist Terminology) In spite of the prevalence of basic Buddhist concepts in Tibet, many of the elements of the old Bon religion have survived within Buddhism*, as in the Ling Chos, particularly in those portions of Tibet not directly dominated by the Grand Lamas.   F.L.P.

linga: The phallic* symbol under which Shiva* is almost universally worshipped in India. It represents fertility and generative power.   C.S.B.

Lingayats: An Indian sub-sect of Shivism numbering about three million. Every member of the community wears a small silver box containing a stone phallic emblem, the symbol of his faith. The sect is chiefly non-Aryan, and in the beginning represented a revolt against the dominance of the Brahmans. Founded in the 12th century the movement was originally opposed to caste and child marriage and permitted the re-marriage of widows.   C.S.B.

Linus: See Peter, St., First Bishop of Rome; Clement, St., Pope.

Lipsius, Richard Adelbert: (1830-1892) Professor of theology, in Kiel and Jena, Germany and in Wien, Austria. Religion was for him the solution of the riddle assigned to us by our empirical nature and our moral destiny. Dogmas of faith are descriptions of objective relations between God, man, and world. Revelation is the self-demonstration of God to man. It realizes itself in the orders of nature, of the moral world and of salvation, which are in the eternal world plan of God. Central to evangelical piety is immediate personal certainty of salvation.

Lehrbuch der evangelisch-protestantischen Dogmatik, 2 3e. (Braunschweig, 1879), Dogmatische Beiträge (Leipzig, 1878); Philosophie und Religion (Leipzig, 1885); E Pfenningsdorf, Vergleichungen der dogmatischen Systeme von R. R. Lipsius und A. Ritschl (Gotha, 1896); K Rule, Erkenntnistheorie von R. A. Lipsius (Gotha, 1894); A Neumann, Grundlagen und Grundzüge der Weltanschauung von R. A. Lipsius (Jena, 1896).   H.H.

liquors, use of: See temperance movement.

litany: (Gr. litai, Lat. deprecatio litania) Solemn intercessory prayers, often penitential, in which fixed responses are made by the people. Known in pagan and mystery religions*, in Christianity they appear in Antioch by the late 4th century and in Rome by the late 5th century. In the East they became and remain important elements of the Eucharist*. In the West they became separate services, used often in processions* as on Apr. 25, the Rogation Days*, and in times of peril. The Litany of the Saints, coming from the 5th century, appears in the Holy Saturday rite in the Roman Mass*. Other popular litanies appeared in medieval times, especially that of Loretto* and of the Holy Name. The Litany of the English Prayer Book is directed for use before the Sunday Eucharist or at other times.   T.J.B.

literal interpretation: In contrast to the mystical, symbolic, typological, or allegorical types of interpretation, the literal interpretation of the Bible is according to the natural or usual construction of a passage, following the plain, ordinary, and apparent sense of the words. Greatly to be preferred to the allegorical* and other fanciful methods of interpretation, it tends to become mechanical unless applied with reference to the historical context. See exegesis.   M.R.

literary criticism: See Biblical criticism.

liturgical churches: See liturgics.

liturgical movement: A revival in the Roman Catholic and Anglican Churches, dating roughly from 1920, and concerned with renewing the emphasis upon the worship of the Church as expressive both of its historic faith and of the implications of Christian "action" in personal and social life The movement was inaugurated in Germany through the efforts of the Benedictine monks of the Abbey or Maria-Laach, under Abbott Ildefons Herwegen; others associated with the movement in Germany included Romano Guardini, whose book The Spirit of the Liturgy (1930—Engl. transl.) is a classic of the movement. The influence of the movement spread quickly to France, Belgium and England, and the Anglican Communion was soon affected, largely through A. G. Hebert's Liturgy and Society (1935). In America, the monks of the Benedictine Order (Roman Catholic), through a periodical "Orate Fratres", have popularized the ideas of the Liturgical Revival, an American Roman classic on the subject is G. Ellard's Christian Life and Worship (1939).

The movement is concerned to stress the centrality of eucharistic worship, as expressing the sacrifice of the whole Church, and through the Church of the whole created order, as being offered to God in union with Christ's self-sacrifice. Through this corporate offering of the Church, expression is also given to the Christian life as one of sacrifice to God; and the purpose of creation, which is to be used by God for his purposes, is declared. By carrying out the implications of this worship, Christian life is to be given significance as the manifesting through "the members of Christ" of the life of the Incarnate God who dwells in his Body the Church to restore man and human society to God and his purposes.   w.n.p.

liturgics: The theological discipline which deals with Christian worship(cultus), the rites and ceremonies of the Church, its devotional and sacramental forms. The materials of liturgical science are 1) liturgical texts and documents, including both the formularies used in the Church's worship and written directions for the due and proper execution of these formularies; 2) liturgical facts—the ceremonies accompanying the formularies of worship and sacraments, the things done as well as the words said. Its method is primarily historical, to discover the origins and trace the development of forms and ceremonies, to formulate the laws underlying their growth, to determine the persons and forces which have moulded this development, and to classify and inter-relate the several rites. On its historical side, liturgics makes use of the principles of historical and literary criticism.

Historical liturgics is of particular importance to those churches which have inherited forms and traditions of worship, those in which the cultus is basically a bequest from the past imposed by authority (the so-called liturgical churches). In the free or non-liturgical churches the historical side is of less moment and attention is directed largely to the practical the construction and criticism of services in terms of reality, devotional value, or psychological effectiveness. Here, liturgics is perhaps less an historical science than an art—the art of worship. See hymns, liturgy, Löhe, W., rubric; worship.

O. Hardman, A History of Christian Worship (London, 1937) ; E. Underhill, Worship (1937).
                                                           p.v.n.

liturgy: In the Septuagint*, leitourgia (public work or duty) is used of the Temple ministry and services. Thence it passed into the N.T. (Lk. 1, 23, etc.) with a somewhat wider connotation. In Christian usage the term liturgy is employed: 1) Strictly, for the Eucharistic* service, the Church's public service par excellence. In the Eastern churches* its use is restricted to this meaning. The Divine Liturgy of the Orthodox is the equivalent of the Latin Mass. 2) More broadly, for any formal and stylized service, a rite. In this sense the term may include the Divine Office (Hours, Breviary), litanies, and the forms used in administration of the sacraments and sacramentals. In this article we confine ourselves to the stricter and more technical meaning of the word (the Eucharist).

The historic liturgies emerge in the fourth and fifth centuries as the result of the crystalization and elaboration, with regional variations, of a primitive fluid rite such as that described by Justin Martyr (Apol. 65, 67, c. 160) and indicated by the anaphora in the Apostolic Tradition of Hippolytus (c. 220). While the structure of the Eucharistic liturgy was evidently determined much earlier, there is no evidence of fixed and binding forms prior to the fourth century, and improvisation continued much longer in the West, particularly in the regions of the Gallican rite*, and ceremonial elaboration by no means ceased with the fixing of the text.

The liturgies of the ancient Church are commonly classified under four basic types or families, two in the East (Greek) and two in the West (Latin).

1) Antiochene or Syrian. The so-called Clementine, in Apost. Const., Bk. VIII, and the Liturgy of St. James (Jerusalem). From this is derived the Byzantine rite*, currently used in the Eastern Orthodox Church (the liturgies of St. Basil and St. John Chrysostom), the Armenian, and the orientalized East Syrian or Nestorian. The Antiochene rite proper is now used normally only by the Syrian Monophysites (Jacobites).

2) Alexandrian or Egyptian. The Liturgy of St. Mark. Surviving today among the Copts and Abyssinians.

3) Gallican, including the Celtic, Mozarabic (Spain) and the Romanized Ambrosian (Milan). The origin of the Gallican rite and its relationship to the Roman is still obscure. In the Carolingian period the Gallican was forced to yield to the Roman Mass, at the same time enriching the latter with colorful additions, but the Mozarabic* continues locally at Toledo.

4) Roman, originally terse and austere, limited to central and southern Italy (the old Roman rite), but from the eighth century enriched by borrowings from the Gallican, which it then supplanted north of the Alps.

These four families may be further reduced to two, since both of the Eastern types have common characteristics and the celebrant's prayers are not influenced by the Christian year (unvarying anaphoras), while both the Latin rites contain elements ("proper" collects and prefaces, etc.), changing from day to day. In the Gallican liturgies this element of seasonal variation was carried to an extreme.

Structurally, the liturgies fall into two parts·
1) The Liturgy of the Catechumens, didactic and exoteric, represents the Church's heritage from Judaism, the Christian appropriation of the synagogue services. It consists of lections* from the Scriptures, instruction, and psalmody*.
2) The Liturgy of the Faithful (offertory, consecration, communion), at which only the baptized were allowed to be present. This is the Eucharist proper, the continuation of Christ's institution at the Last Supper, and probably also the chaburah fellowship of Christ and the Twelve. Opinion is sharply divided as to whether the Last Supper was a Passover meal, with the weight of the evidence against it. On Gentile soil the primitive Jewish-Christian forms of blessing (Didache, 9, 10) gave place to more elaborate consecration prayers (the *anaphoras) of the third and fourth centuries, in which the offering of the eucharistic sacrifice is prominent (notably in the canon of the Roman Mass). But the Eastern rites still preserve the mystical-dramatic representation of Christ's redemptive work.

The ideal of the liturgy is corporate worship, the celebrant, deacon, lectors, cantors, choir, and people, all making their contribution to an artistic whole. Eastern Christendom has never departed from this ideal. In the medieval Western Church, on the other hand, altars and masses were multiplied, and the corporate character of worship was largely lost as the priest with server offered the sacrifice with special intention. Out of this practice (low or private masses) came the construction of Missals*, a type of liturgical book unknown in the early Church. The older Roman books, the Sacramentaries*, contain only the celebrant's part in the Eucharist and other sacraments. Cf. church year; hymns; mass, Roman Catholic; pontifical mass; Sarum Use; vestments.

Y. T. Brilioth, Eucharistic Faith and Practice, Evangelical and Catholic (Eng transl London, 1930); L. Duchesne, Christian Worship: its origin and evolution (5th ed., Eng. transl. London, 1927); A. Fortescue, The Mass: a study of the Roman Liturgy (London, 1914); D. G. Hislop, Our Heritage in Public Worship (1935); A. B Macdonald, Christian Worship in the Primitive Church (Edinburgh, 1934); W. D. Maxwell, An Outline of Christian Worship (Oxford, 1936); J. H. Srawley, The early History of the Liturgy (Cambridge, 1913).

P.V.N.

Lives of Jesus: The gospels* were written as portrayals of the Christian message rather than as biographies of a hero. But when Tatian* (ca. 160) wove them together into his Diatessaron, he probably thought of it as a life of Jesus. Yet orthodox believers in the two natures of the Godman did not feel called upon to produce biographies of Jesus. Ludolf's* Vita Christi (d. 1377) does show, however, an example of the interest of medieval pietism. The Protestant Reformation produced no lives of Jesus.

It remained for rationalism to provide the stimulus. Lessing* published the first effort, a posthumous work by Reimarus*, Concerning the Purpose of Jesus and his Disciples. In contrast to the ruling supernaturalism, the aim was to give a purely rational explanation of the gospel miracles. Typical was that by H. E. Paulus (1828). Taking his clue from the idea of the Hegelian dialectic, David F. Strauss* then sought to interpret the life of Jesus from the standpoint of myth (1835); he thought that this was the synthesis between supernaturalism and rationalism. He did not believe that Jesus himself was a myth (as did later deniers of the historicity of Jesus, such as B. Bauer (1877) and A. Drews (1909), but he held that the gospels contained much mythical material. Yet men like Ewald and Neander continued to defend stoutly the miraculous elements in the gospels.

Though Renan's* life of Jesus (1863) was a great popular success, it had no influence on research. That was dependent on the evaluation of the sources. Strauss and F. C. Baur* (1847) discounted the use of the Fourth Gospel. The demonstration of the priority of Mark by Weisse (1838) and Wilke (1838) made its way slowly at first because of the assumptions of the Tubingen school* that the Judaic Matthew must be the earliest gospel. T. Keim's massive life of Jesus (1867-72) was still written on that assumption. Yet, it really belongs with the liberal lives of Jesus which were developed under the stimulus of the Ritschlian* theology These assumed the two-source hypothesis (that Mark and Q were the basic documents of historical value) a theory which was firmly established by H. J. Holtzmann* (1863). Typical of the liberal lives of Jesus was the one by O Holtzmann (1901). But the difficulties in finding a motivated life of Jesus on the basis of the Markan outline led to the skepticism of Wrede (1901) and the consequent eschatology of Schweitzer* (1901).

The latter position has been undermined by the more recent synoptic* criticism, though the importance of eschatology* for Jesus remains a permanent contribution. Wellhausen* showed that the original tradition consisted of small pericopes (1911). These were classified according to form by Dibelius (1919) and Bultmann (1921) and others. The result is that N.T. scholarship now generally realizes that it is impossible to write a life of Jesus. No chronological framework for it exists, and the individual traditions inevitably bear the mark of the interests of the apostolic church.

Current lives of Jesus may be divided into three groups: (1) the Harmonistic lives, such as The Days of his Flesh by David Smith (1905), (2) Critical lives, such as those by S. J. Case (1927), M. Goguel (1933) and Chas. Guignebert (1935); (3) Studies of his teaching and career, recognizing that a "life" is impossible, such as Wernle (1918) and Dibelius (1939). The most recent survey of the lives of Jesus is that by C. C. McCown, The Search for the Real Jesus (1940). See Edersheim, A.

C.T.C.

Living Christ: See Christ, the Living.

Livingstone, David: (1813-1873) Scottish missionary to Africa, pioneer explorer. He was born near Glasgow, worked in a cotton factory, studied theology and medicine, and sailed for Africa in 1840. There he explored the continent, healed, taught and set an unforgettable example of Christian courage and kindness until his death on his knees among his native friends. His work and writings led to the abolition of slave traffic, and the opening of the continent to the rest of the world. His explorations and scientific observations laid accurate foundations for African geography. P.E.J.

Lobstein, Paul: (1850-1922) An Alsatian theological savant who was professor at the University of Strassburg. Like Bouvier* he formulates extremely just criticisms against the traditional notion of God. He discusses in detail the theses that deny or impair the problem of the omnipotence of God. He dwells in particular upon the views of Wilfred Monod* regarding the impotence of God. He regards as indispensable the problem of divine personality and a revision of it as no less necessary. He thinks the psychological and historical methods as peculiarly applicable to the study of the problem of God. He realizes that the modern idea of personality is foreign to the biblical writings in their descriptions of the true God. Divine personality is a problem of religious knowledge. Lobstein's position here is that of the anthropomorphic symbolism as defined by Auguste Sabatier*. Liberating himself from the sterile intellectualism which weighs heavy upon traditional theology, he rejects the thesis of "the divine-human parallelism" defended by the neo-criticists and by G. Frommel*. Instead he upholds the indispensable union of psychology and history. His psychological analysis of personality remains singularly insufficient. He constantly depends upon the Bible to the exclusion of philosophic speculation. His study of the Christian doctrine of God is one of the most complete of French Protestantism. Etudes sur la doctrine chrétienne de Dieu (Paris and Lausanne, 1907). H.H.

Loci Communes: A Latin title meaning "common topics" given by Melanchthon* to his treatise in dogmatics, the first Protestant work in systematic theology, published in 1521. The first edition adheres to Paul and Luther in presenting sin and grace, but the second edition, 1535, and the third, 1543, are synergistic*, recognizing three concurrent causes in man's conversion: the word of God, the Holy Spirit, and the human will. The title Loci Communes became a popular designation for doctrinal works among both Lutheran and Reformed theologians. T.A.K.

Loci Theologici: (Lat. "theological topics") A title used by early Lutheran dogmaticians for their doctrinal systems. The chief works bearing this title are those of Martin Chemnitz (1591) and Johann Gerhard (1610-1622). See Chemnitz, Gerhard. T.A.K.

Locke, John: (1632-1704) He regarded Christianity as the gospel of love. He would not demand of individuals an acceptance of the incomprehensible dogmas of the Trinity, Atonement and Eternal Punishment. He felt most drawn to those forms of Christianity which are least dogmatic and hierarchical. He laid chief stress upon the ethical side of religion, and demanded as few dogmas and ceremonies as possible. He denied anyone the right to force on others speculative opinions and definite forms of worship. He regarded revelation as an extension of natural religion founded in reason. Reason must control faith in revelation. As a dogmatic supernatural rationalist, he was in his personal life the distillation of the best qualities in Puritanism*. Although, he held, it is as certain that there is a God as it is that there are mathematical axioms, God's real essence is not known. Moreover, as we have no innate idea of God, a knowledge of Him may be attained by the right use of our abilities.

Locke's Essay Concerning Human Understanding (1690) is one of the most remarkable and pregnant works in the history of thought. He proposed a universal history of the mind, conceived on lines similar to Newton's physics, implying the psychological explanation of social processes without reference to the limitations by the evolution of institutions. He meant his attack on innate ideas to be a solvent for all kinds of prejudices in morality, religion and science; but as his greatest weakness as a philosopher was his inability to go back to first principles, he never perceived how far his empiricism, if logically developed, would carry him. After explaining the origin of ideas empirically, he denied the certainty of practically all empirical knowledge. In ethics and in the moral foundations of his political theory he retained the belief that a demonstrative science of morals analogous to geometry could be constructed.

As philosopher of parliamentary government, cautious exponent of a bloodless revolution, he was the most conservative of revolutionists. He championed the claims of Protestant dissent, the right of men of substance to rule, and was anxious to protect the interests of a middle class of traders and landowners against a king. Although he advocated toleration of non-conformists, he was uninterested in the wider issues of social justice. He never spoke for the disinherited. His celebrated theory of the mind as a tabula rasa is useful to one who wishes to insist on the doctrine of political equality, though it is difficult to reconcile with economic inequality. In his social philosophy, Locke was markedly tolerant and critical in defending religion and freedom, and yet was capable of being highly dogmatic in defending the rights of property. He held the view that certain forms of religion and irreligion are harmful to the state. Not sufficiently socialized in religious breadth and sympathy, he regarded Catholics, Jews and atheists as socially dangerous. Of what church a man is a member is no concern of the state. As a force propagating the ideals of liberal but not violent reform, Locke stands unexcelled. See Enlightenment, the.
R. I. Aaron, John Locke (London, 1937); E. Crous, Die religionsphilosophischen Lehren Lockes und ihre Stellung zu dem Deismus seiner Zeit (Halle a. S., 1910); W. Graham, English Political Philosophy from Hobbes to Maine (London, 1899); H. J. Laski, Political Thought in England from Locke to Bentham (London, 1920); H. McLachlan, The Religious Opinions of Milton, Locke and Newton (Manchester, Eng., 1941). H.H.

logia: Literally, announcements, oracles, sayings, —but in a somewhat elastic sense (see below).

Specifically, applied to groups of sayings of Jesus for the most part outside the gospel tradition. Thus the term was applied by Grenfell and Hunt to fragments of a collection of such sayings discovered by them at Oxyrhynchus in Egypt in 1897. It has been more commonly employed to designate a collection of sayings thought by older scholars to have been made by the apostle Matthew. The basis for this view is an enigmatic word of Papias*, preserved by Eusebius (H. E. iii, 39, 16): "Matthew collected the oracles (ta logia) in the Hebrew language, and each interpreted them as he was able."

Analysis of the three Synoptic gospels has convinced all investigators that Matthew and Luke are dependent upon Mark for most (if not all) of their narrative material. In addition to this so-called "triple tradition" Matthew and Luke have much material in common which is not found in Mark. If, as most critics assume, Matthew and Luke were produced independently of one another, the only probable explanation of this common material is a second source, commonly styled Q*, from which both independently drew. Since this "double tradition" is largely in the form of discourse, it has become the habit to refer to it as the "discourse source," and then to find an external guarantee for it in the word of Papias just quoted. Thus popularly the terms "the logia," "the Matthæan logia," "the logia referred to by Papias," or Q have been treated as equivalent titles and entirely unwarranted conclusions have been drawn.

To limit "logia" to a catena of sayings is (while popular) linguistically unwarranted. The Greek word can equally well be used of narrative stories or of a connected account containing both narrative and discourse. Sober exegesis of Papias' word would indicate that he is referring to our gospel of Matthew and not one of its sources; his five-volume work, from which this fragment comes and entitled Exposition of the Lord's Oracles (logion), may without undue violence be assumed to have been essentially a commentary upon our Matthew which Papias apparently prized highly and used as the standard for judging Mark. To continue to use logia as the equivalent of Q is misleading and deplorable.

B. W. Bacon, Studies in Matthew (1930).

M.S.E.

logos: The word logos is as old as the Greek language. It was introduced first by Heraclitus of Ephesus, 5th century B.C. into the circle of philosophic ideas as a principle of cosmic interpretation. Before Heraclitus, the nature of reality was thought to be mathematical (Pythagoras) and consequently static (Eleatics). In Heraclitus' opinion the cosmos was in ceaseless change: "you could never step into the same river twice; for other and yet other waters flow on," (Diels, fr. 41-2). The cosmos is a concourse of becoming, with progressive and regressive sequences simultaneously: "fire lives the death of earth, and air lives the death of fire, (fr. 76). But "changing is rest" (fr. 84), if only stupid minds were able to grasp it. Because "the impression that any naif person gets who plants himself innocently in the flux of things, is that things are off balance," (W. James, A Pluralistic Universe, 88) "the philosopher . . . has to arise out of a sea of change and lay hold of true being" (Plato, Republic, 524 d). Philosophic wisdom, therefore, according to Heraclitus, apprehends that the total process of cosmic becoming is subjected to the regulative control of an agency to which he assigned the term logos. The logos technique accounted for the orderliness of nature. Change, if not chaos, must conform to fixed patterns. Therefore, order, law, measure, predictability, were formulations of cosmic transformations going on according to logos. "The permanence of all is preserved because all things observe their own 'measures.' " (C. Bailey The Greek Atomists and Epicurus, 21) "The fire is kindled in due measures and in due measures extinguished" (fr. 30). At least four fragments of Heraclitus employ logos as a principle of cosmic interpretation· "all things occur according to logos," (fr. 1), [fire] becomes liquid sea, and is measured by the same logos as it was before it became sea" (fr. 31), "logos is common-to-all" (fr. 2), "to the soul belongs the self-multiplying logos" (fr. 115). Finally, Heraclitus conceived of logos as intelligent, eternal and subjecting all change to an orderly law of change.

The term, logos, is found in both Plato and Aristotle, but in both it is vague and undeveloped (S. D. F. Salmond, "Logos", Enc. Brit. (11th ed.) XIV, 803-4) Among Stoic thinkers there was injected into the logos idea theological connotations which it lacked in Heraclitus. The Stoics* were pantheists, identifying nature with God, both of which terms might serve as the context of logos. Philo* of Alexander, under the influence of Plato's demiurge, transformed the Hebrew idea of a creator God into the Platonic conception of an artisan God. Therefore, for Philo, logos is not identical with God, but something distinct and separate from Him, an instrument of creation.

Philo's conception is corrected according to the author of the Fourth Gospel*. Cannon Streeter remarks that in The Fourth Gospel Plato and Isaiah meet. (The Four Gospels, 367) It would be more correct to substitute Heraclitus for Plato. Heraclitus' conception of logos harmonizes with that of The Fourth Gospel. Heraclitus ascribed ultimate reality to logos. John identifies the logos with God. The Fourth Gospel claims that God and logos are two appellations for one, single divine reality and agency.

The presence of the logos idea within Christian thought signifies far more than customarily understood. Its context signals the confrontation of contrasting civilizations. Prior to The Fourth Gospel, the solution seemed to suppose either civilization could endure only by devastating the other. According to the synthesis of The Fourth Gospel, new in the Christian philosophy of history, the truth of both civilizations might endure within a new and higher synthesis wherein abiding values are merged and preserved. See Christology; spermatic word.   P.R.H.

logos Christology: See Christology.

Löhe, Wilhelm: (1808-1872) Lutheran church leader. He was born in Fürth in Frankonia. As a theological student he became identified with the Lutheran revival. He is a representative of Lutheran confessionalism, with special emphasis on the centrality and dignity of the church as a historical body. Severe critic of the established church in Bavaria, he remained to the end in its service. Sacraments, liturgy and ecclesiastical organization no less than purity of doctrine were regarded as essentials of the true church. His constant emphasis on these points enabled Bavarian Lutheranism, and through it the German Lutheranism of the Middle West, to occupy leading positions in the Lutheran Church.

Löhe took a special interest in the religious and ecclesiastical needs of the German Lutheran immigrants, supported them spiritually and financially and organized them in the Missouri* Synod (1847, broke later away from L.), and the Iowa Synod (1854) In his parish Neudettelsau he founded a seminary for these churches and for Lutheran immigrants in Australia (Neudettelsauer Missionsanstalt). His disciples founded later on the Wartburg Seminary in Dubuque, Iowa. Löhe's personal influence survives to the present day in the educational and theological work of Prof. Martin Reu. Löhe's liturgy formed the basis of the 'Common Service of the American Lutheran Church'.

In his homeland Löhe's concept of Christian service, which he regarded as a concomitant of orthodoxy led to the formation of the Society for Inner Mission*, and to the founding of a home for deaconesses* (Diakonissenanstalt) in Neudettelsau (1854), and another home for male social workers in 1865. Grammar and High schools and the seminary together with homes for sick people formed a community of its own, which became a model church, famous for its reforms in architecture and liturgy. He was a strong and original personality. Great was his influence as preacher and in pastoral work. He encouraged private confession. In liturgical studies he was one of the outstanding authorities of all times. The 'Berneuchener Kreis' and the Lutheran liturgical movement are deeply indebted to him. See neo-Lutheranism.

Principal works: Agende für christliche Gemeinden lutherischen Bekenntnisses (1844, 3rd ed. 1884); Drei Bücher von der Kirche (1845, 3rd ed. 1883); Evangelienpostille (1848, 5th ed. 1886); Kirche und Amt (1851); Epistelpostille (1858, 3rd ed. 1897); Biography by Joh. Deinzer, 3 vols. (1873, 3rd ed. 1901).   O.A.P.

Loisy, Alfred, Abbé: (1857-1940) Orientalist and Biblical critic, became the storm center of the Catholic Modernist* controversy after the publication of his The Gospel and the Church (1902), a reply to Harnack's What is Christianity? Thirty-eight of the sixty-five Modernistic propositions condemned in the Decree Lamentabili (1907) were concerned with Loisy's views on Biblical exegesis and Christian origins. Breaking with the Church after his condemnation, he taught many years at the Collège de France (1911-27). In 1917 he published a book (La Religion) in which he interpreted religion in purely sociological and humanistic terms, after the manner of Comte and Durkheim. His Biblical studies run to many volumes, among which may be mentioned his books on the O.T. canon (1890), the N.T. canon (1891), the Synoptic Gospels (1893-94), the Religion of Israel (1901), the Fourth Gospel (1903), the Sermon on the Mount (1903), Mark (1912), Acts (1920), the Apocalypse (1923), and Luke (1924). Autobiography translated under the title, My duel with the Vatican; the autobiography of a Catholic modernist (1924).

An autobiographical essay with bibliography appears in Religion in Transition (London, 1937), edited by Vergilius Ferm, p. 126 ff.   W.M.H.

Lokayatas: A materialistic school of philosophy in India founded by Charvaka. The adherents are known as Lokayatikas, or more frequently still as Charvakas. According to their belief matter is the only reality, mind is a function of the body. There is no soul but only intelligence, therefore with the dissolution of the material body the self returns to nothingness. On the ethical side the Charvakas esteem happiness the chief good, and this is to be found in the prudent enjoyment of sensual pleasures. They repudiate the basic beliefs of Hinduism in gods, Karma, and transmigration since these cannot be proven on the basis of sense-experience, the ultimate basis of all knowledge. Their school is no longer found as such in India today.   C.S.B.

Loki: (Teut.) A Norse god of varying character: sometimes connected with the gods and sometimes with the giants; the name of an outstanding spirit of earth and underworld. In the ancient Scandinavian myth of the fall of the gods, he responded to the threat of a giant and lured Idunn, guardian of the apples of immortality, to a spot where the giant earth demon could seize her. He is represented as cunning, skillful, artistic; graceful and handsome in appearance, but lame, can assume human form. In later times he is centered in a nucleus of mythical ingredients in Christian stories about Satan*.   F.L.P.

Lollards: (Literally: mumblers—of prayers and psalms) Originally applied to a Dutch group which arose at the time of an epidemic in 1350 to care for the sick and bury the dead, the name was transferred to the followers of Wycliffe* in England and Scotland. The Lollard movement was largely the result of the work of the "Poor Preachers," whom Wycliffe sent out among the common people to preach his peculiar doctrines. It grew until in the 1490's the Lollards felt strong enough to petition Parliament to aid in bringing about ecclesiastical reforms. But when Henry IV of Lancaster ascended the throne, they were persecuted and virtually wiped out under the statute de haeretico comburendo of 1401. Lollard sentiment survived in secret, however, and may have facilitated the introduction of the Reformation a century and a half later. See Bible, English.

J. Gairdner, Lollardy and the Reformation in England, 2 vols. (London, 1908).

E.C.X.

Lombard, Peter: See Peter Lombard.

longsuffering: The patient endurance of injuries and especially forebearance and loving toleration of enemies and offenders. The Greek original meant "long-tempered" as opposed to "short-tempered." In the Bible it is slowness to anger, stressed as an attribute of God and a Christian grace, a "fruit of the Spirit" in Gal. 5:22.

R.W.F.

Lord's Day: First used as a term for Sunday in Rev. 1.10 and then in Ignatius* (Mag. 9.1). The celebration by the Christians of the first day in the week is indicated by I Cor. 16.2 and Acts 20.7. The final form of the gospel tradition placed the resurrection of Jesus on the third day (Sunday) rather than "after three days". Though the seven day week corresponds to Jewish practice, they did not name the sabbath* for their God. In Egypt, months and days were named for gods. In Asia Minor, one day a month was consecrated to the emperor and called sebaste. But this was not weekly. Possibly the closest parallel is to be found in the reference by Justin to Saturday as dedicated to kronos in terms of He kronike. See Sabbath, Christian, Sunday.

S. V. McCasland, in J. B. L. 49, p. 65 ff; Paul Cotton, From Sabbath to Sunday (1933).

C.T.C.

Lord's Prayer: The name popularly given to the prayer found in Matt. 6.9-13 and, in a shorter form, in Luke 11 2-4. The doxology, appended to the prayer in liturgical use by Protestants, is missing from Luke entirely and from the earliest Gr. mss. of Matthew, as well as from the Vulgate*. Cf. kaddish.

S.M.G.

Lord's Supper: The central rite of Christian worship, called variously the Eucharist (Greek, Thanksgiving), Holy Communion, Divine Mysteries (Eastern Orthodox), the Mass* (western Catholic usage). This service has developed historically out of the Last Supper of Jesus and his disciples before the Crucifixion, and has traditionally been related to the dominical words, "This is my body", "This is the new covenant in my blood", "Do this in remembrance of me", found in the several gospels and in I Corinthians. Two aspects have regularly been central in the Eucharist, with others finding varying emphasis: sacrifice and presence, as specially important, with memorial, thanksgiving in a restricted sense, Christian fellowship, etc., as secondary. Thanksgiving in the larger sense, however, has been a special characteristic of the rite, as based upon and representing a thanksgiving for "the benefits of Christ," and other "blessings of this life."

Various theories of the sacrifice have been held.

Protestant theologians have tended to minimize this aspect, among Lutherans reaching an almost complete denial of the idea. Others would stress particularly the remembering of what Christ did, and would find a memorial of a past sacrifice on Calvary an important element in the Eucharist*. So with the followers of Zwingli. In the Catholic bodies, including Eastern Orthodox, Roman and Anglican, there has been insistence on a real sacrifice, but no agreement as to its precise nature. Anglican theology has emphasized "the continual remembrance of the sacrifice of the death of Christ", believed to be "represented" in the Eucharist; Roman theologians of recent date (esp. de la Taille, in Mysterium Fidei) (Eng. tr. 1941) have evolved a theory by which the Eucharist is a continual offering of the once-for-all immolation effected on Calvary, both elements of offering and immolation being essential to a true sacrifice. See liturgical movement.

The presence of Christ in the Lord's Supper has been explained by various theories, chief of which are transubstantiation, consubstantiation, virtualism and receptionism. The first is the official Roman Catholic view, shared generally by the Eastern Orthodox (although they prefer such words as "trans-elementation" or "transmutation"), this teaches that the substances (the underlying reality as distinguished from all tangible, visible, sensible signs and appearances) of bread and wine are by consecration changed into the true body and blood of Christ, risen and glorified. The Lutheran notion of consubstantiation varies this view by insisting that to the substances of bread and wine, which remain, there are added the substances of the body and blood of Christ, truly present. (Cf. Lutheran Doctrine of the Lord's Supper). Virtualism, suggested before the Reformation by Berengar of Tours, and evidently the theory of Calvin and some other Reformers, holds that the elements remain unchanged, but through them the spiritual body and blood, and the benefits, of Christ are conveyed. Receptionism, also held by many Protestant theologians, finds a presence of Christ in the recipient, rather than in the elements of the Eucharist themselves. The Anglican Communion has never defined its theory, but in its insistence on "the real presence"* is closer to the Roman and Eastern views than to the others.

All responsible theologians, both Catholic and Protestant, hold to a truly spiritual conception of the Eucharist, as, e.g., in Aquinas's insistence on a presence "of the body of Christ", but not a "bodily presence." It is generally held that a true communion of the Christian with God in Christ is effected by the sacrament, which thereby conveys grace to the believer.

The Lord's Supper is observed with varying kinds of rites, in the Catholic communions with great solemnity and ceremonial enrichment; in the Protestant denominations more simply and, generally, rather less frequently. For further discussion, cf. D. Stone, History of Doctrine of Holy Eucharist (1909), and Ministry and Sacraments (1937) edited by Headlam and Dunkerly, in which all views of various groups are summarized. See agape; remanence; sacraments.

451

W.N.P.

Lord's Supper—early Christian practice and origin:

No fact of the Gospel history is better attested than that Jesus, on the evening of his arrest, held a farewell Supper with his disciples. The incident is narrated in all three Synoptic Gospels, and also in I Cor. 11:23-26, where Paul explicitly says that he had received the account from the church before him. The Fourth Evangelist does not describe the Supper itself, but the central part of his Gospel is occupied with the teaching of Jesus before and after it. Of these various records the most authentic is probably the "short account" in Lk. 22 15-19,—omitting all that follows the word "body". MS evidence proves conclusively that this was how the passage originally ran in Luke, who apparently followed a primitive tradition. According to this narrative Jesus thought of the Supper as anticipating the feast of victory in the Kingdom of God*. He first took the cup, and bade all his disciples drink of it, then he broke a loaf of bread and distributed it, with the words "This is my body". The Synoptists assume that Jesus died on Passover day, and the Supper thus becomes the Passover meal, observed on the eve of the feast. John, however, is almost certainly right in dating the Crucifixion on the day before Passover*, and the Supper was therefore an ordinary meal, to which Jesus gave a sacred significance. Luke appears to suggest (22 15) that he had wished to survive until the Passover meal, but knew himself frustrated, and held this meal as a substitute. The main purpose of the Supper appears to have been to give a solemn pledge to the disciples that they would share in the victory which Jesus would achieve through his death. Much has been made of the particular elements which he took up and distributed, but apparently he made use of them because these ordinary constituents of a simple meal were all that he had before him. Emphasis is laid in all the accounts on the act of distribution, and it is probably here that we must look for the real significance of the Supper. It conveyed a promise in which all were to feel themselves included. The accounts all differ as to the formulae employed by Jesus, and agree only on the words "This is my body." The precise meaning of these words cannot be determined, but it seems best to connect them with the main idea of distribution. Jesus made each one of his disciples a participant in his own act of sacrifice. It is doubtful whether the Supper was meant to be repeated. A farewell, in the nature of things, is made once for all, and the words in which the disciples are bidden to perpetuate the ordinance were possibly added later. We can well understand, however, how the church adopted as a standing institution the act which conveyed a solemn pledge and promise. This was the more natural as it seems to have been Jesus' custom to close the day with a meal in company with his followers. After his death they continued the practice which recalled him to them more vividly than anything else, and now observed it with a special memory of his last Supper. We learn from Ac. 2 42 that the "breaking of bread" was a custom of the church from its earliest days. It was at first connected with the Agapê*, the common meal by which the believers signalized their brotherhood, but this combination of the ordinary meal with the sacred one was discontinued, owing, most likely, to such abuses as Paul condemns in I Cor. 11 20-22. In the time of Paul the Supper was second in importance to Baptism* but was fast acquiring a mystical significance, as is evident from the discussion in I Cor. 10 15-21. The influence of the Pagan cults may have had something to do with the conception of it as a literal communion with Christ. It was Paul himself who made it symbolical of the redemption effected by Christ's death. The earlier church had preserved Jesus' thought more faithfully, and had made it not so much a memorial feast as one of anticipation. Stress is laid in the opening chapters of Acts on the "gladness" which marked the primitive observance. See sacramental meal.

G. H. C. MacGregor, Eucharistic Origins (1929); A. B. Macdonald, Christian Worship in the Primitive Church (1938); W. Heitmüller, Taufe und Abendmahl im Urchristentum (1903; 1911).   E.F.S.

Lord's table:

In I Cor. 10 21 used by metonymy for the Eucharist*; in Eastern Orthodox and Anglican liturgical books "Holy Table" is the official term for the altar (in Latin mensa is the top of the altar); in Protestant usage "Lord's Table" is an alternative term for the Lord's Supper* or the table used for it. See altar.   E.R.H.

Loreto, Holy House of:

(It. Santa Casa) A small building, about thirty-one feet by thirteen feet, enshrined within the basilica at Loreto, near Ancona, Italy. Apart from unverifiable facts, a somewhat uncertain tradition claims the structure to be the house of the Holy Family at Nazareth, which was transported by angels to Illyria in 1291, and thence to Loreto in 1294. Despite the approval of the tradition by many popes and saints and the occurrence of miracles consequent upon devotion at the shrine, its historicity is held in severe doubt as a result of recent Catholic research, and is considered to rest on some unexplained misunderstanding.   J.F.T.

Lost Books of the Bible:

A misnomer given some modern currency mainly through its use as a title for a 1926 reprint of William Hone's Apocryphal New Testament, first published in London in 1820 and actually containing the "Apostolic Fathers", a selection of N.T. apocrypha (Gospel of the Birth of Mary, Protevangelium of James, The Arabic Gospel of the Infancy, part of the Gospel of Thomas, The Epistles of Jesus Christ and Abgar, the spurious Epistle of Paul to the Laodiceans, the alleged correspondence of Paul and Seneca, a chapter of the Acts of Paul), and the Apostles Creed. Later editions added the Gospel of Nicodemus (known also as the Acts of Pilate*). Also often included in this category were the medieval "Letters of Pilate and Herod" and sometimes the fragmentary second-century apocryphon, "Gospel of Peter*." The impropriety of the term is evident from the fact that most of these writings were never in the Bible nor had any serious chance for consideration as canonical. A few (I and II Clement, Letter of Barnabas, Shepherd of Hermas, Acts of Paul) were included in some ancient MSS but eventually rejected. The term is sometimes loosely and even more erroneously used of writings properly designated as spurious works or modern forgeries. See agrapha; apocrypha; canon; forgeries, pseudepigrapha.   A.P.W.

lot: One of a set of objects used to secure a chance or decision in selecting officials designating preferment, dividing goods, etc. Casting a lot drawing an object in a set to determine the share, the fortune, the condition or destiny of a person or thing. See sortes.   F.L.P.

Lots, feast of: See Jewish religious festivals.

lottery: See gambling.

Lotze, Rudolf Hermann: (1817-1881) His creative scholarship in physiology, psychology, logic, and aesthetics form the background for an ethical idealism especially influential among Personalists*. Favoring universal mechanical causation in Nature, Lotze explained it as the "unalterable mode of action" fixed by a personal World-Ground as a prerequisite to human morality. God is the unconditioned transcendent Person, of whom all finite beings are parts without losing being-for-self (panpsychism*), and through whom alone they can enjoy reciprocal action. Mikrokosmos (3 vols., 1856-64, Eng. tr., 1885); Logik (1874, Eng. tr., 1884); Metaphysik (1879, Eng. tr., 1884).   P.A.B.

Lourdes: The name of a town in the department of Hautes Pyrenees in France. It was here between February 11 and July 16, 1858 that Our Lady appeared to a peasant girl, St. Bernadette Soubirous on eighteen different occasions. It is best known in our time as a place of pilgrimage for the sick because of the many proved and apparent miracles of healing. It is primarily, however, a pilgrimage of spiritual significance as is shown by the fact that although there are some 1,000,000 pilgrims visiting there each year, only about 15,000 are afflicted with some bodily ill. The feast of the Apparition of Our Lady at Lourdes is celebrated throughout the Western Church on February 11.   T.T.M.

love: A complex psychical experience of strong attraction to, intense desire for, vivid appreciation of and joyous interest in another person, a group, cause or institution. In general it is characterized by tender affection, sympathetic understanding, admiration and loyalty with reference to its object.

There are many varieties and levels of love. Possessive or acquisitive love seeks the beloved object for the self's sake and may be gross or refined in its expression. Contemplative love admires, adores and enjoys its object as something intrinsically precious and worthy of appreciation for its own sake. Benevolent love seeks the good, increase and joy of its object. Sacrificial love counts nothing too precious, not even life itself, to be given for the sake of its object.

In Christian thought "God is love." An everlasting, all-comprehensive, benevolent and sacrificial love is held to be the very essence of God. This redeeming love was revealed in Christ who summed up the law and the prophets in the twofold commandment of love. He made the love of God the motive of obedience to His will. He made its correlative, love toward men, the basis of Christian ethics. Every commandment divinely intended to govern the relations of men was declared to be fulfilled in the law of love. Such love is set forth as both a gift of God and a task for men. The Kingdom of God* is the fellowship in which this spirit of love, born of God, animates all persons.

In Christianity Eros, the love born of natural desire or the yearnings of the soul, is held to be either transmuted or supplanted by agape*, that self-giving love whose source is God's sacrificial and redemptive love for all men.   R.W.F.

love, Divine and Divine wrath: See wrath of God.

love feast: The agape or fellowship meal in which early Christians joined for brotherly love and commemoration of Christ's parting supper (Acts 2.42, 46; I Cor. 11 17-34, Jude 12). Paul describes such a meal as the special occasion for celebrating the Eucharist* as well (I Cor. 11·17-34). The fellowship meal was gradually separated from the Eucharist and dropped out of religious usage except as it was restored among the Moravian Brethren*, the early Methodists and other Pietistic* sects. It is still practised among the Mennonites and Dunkers who hold a whole evening's ceremony consisting of feet-washing, the fellowship meal, and the Eucharist.
                                                      W.M.B.

lovingkindness, Old Testament conception of: This word is a mistranslation of the Hebrew word hésed (often translated also as "goodness", "kindness", "deal kindly"). The Hebrew term does not refer primarily to the love or the grace of God, but rather to the behavior which a covenant or blood relationship requires. In secular usage it refers to the obligations which community life, or any relationship by covenant, oath, or family tie, made necessary (cf. Gen. 24.49, I Sam. 15 6; 20 8). Since Israel believed itself to be bound in a special covenant relationship with God (see covenant), every member of the community must be loyal to the obligations of that covenant. that is, exercise hésed, and this involves obedience to the divine, ethical commandments which are the laws of the community, having a proper knowledge or fear (reverence) for God, being just, humble, and gracious (e.g., Micah 6:8; Hos. 2 19, 4·1, Prov. 3.3; etc.). On the other hand, God with whom the covenant has been made, will exercise or "show" hésed to His people: that is, will bring help and redemption to them, will be loyal to his promises, will be just, merciful, and righteous (e.g., Jer. 9:24; 16:5; Psa. 63:3, etc.). Thus "lovingkindness" or "kindness" are not proper translations of the Hebrew word. "Loyalty" or "faithfulness" are better terms, provided it is understood that loyalty to community obligations is meant (see further grace).   G.E.W.

low church: The opposite of High Church* in its various senses; for positive associations see Evangelicals and Broad Churchmen.   E.R.H.

low mass: See mass.

Low Sunday: Name for Sunday after Easter in English (the Latin is Dominica in albis, from white robes of neophytes)—origin uncertain, perhaps from clausum paschae.   E.R.H.

Lowell Institute Lectures, The—Religious Series: John Lowell, Jr., a Boston merchant who died in 1836, left half of his estate, amounting to about $250,000, for the establishment of free public lectures in Boston, known as the Lowell Institute. The Institute is administered by a single trustee who has sole responsibility for selecting the lecturers and their subjects. Mr. Lowell directed that "each trustee shall appoint his successor, within a week after his accession to the office, in order that no failure of a regular nomination may take place. In selecting a successor the trustee shall always choose . . . some male descendant of my grandfather, John Lowell, provided there be one who is competent to hold the office of trustee, and of the name of Lowell." The first trustee was John Amory Lowell who developed the Institute most successfully in the more than forty years of his trusteeship. He was succeeded by Augustus Lowell who served until 1900, when A. Lawrence Lowell became trustee. At the death of Dr. Lowell in 1943, the trusteeship passed to Ralph Lowell. The management of the public relations of the Institute, arrangements with lecturers, distribution of tickets, etc., has been in the hands of a curator. The Institute has been fortunate in the character and ability of its curators, Dr. Jeffries Wyman (1839-42), Dr. Benjamin E. Cotting (1842-97), Prof. William Thompson Sedgwick (1897-1921), and Prof. William Henry Lawrence (1921-).

The Institute has offered lectures on a wide variety of topics. It was the express wish of John Lowell, Jr., that a course of lectures be delivered "on the historical and internal evidences in favor of Christianity" and the trustees have provided a course of religious lectures almost every year since 1839 when the public lectures began. The lecturers have represented many points of view and have been given complete freedom in the interpretation of religion.

Some outstanding lectures in the series are: Evidences of Christianity, by Mark Hopkins; The Ascent of Man, by Henry Drummond; The Problem of Christianity, by Josiah Royce; and Religion in the Making, by Alfred North Whitehead.
         J.E.N.

lower criticism: See Biblical criticism.

loyalty: The sentiment and practice of free, devoted allegiance to a person, group, institution or principle. It has been esteemed a cardinal virtue from its earliest tribal form through its articulate institutional embodiment in feudalism to its modern diversified expressions, notably in nationalism. While it involves obligation to what is held to be superior to the individual, as a person, group or principle by which one's conduct should be regulated, it is not mere law-abidingness. For it denotes service with one's entire heart and mind, "the team feeling," and self-identification with a whole. As such it is an important factor in self-realization and personal happiness. Many moral problems grow out of the modern conflict of loyalties. J. Royce* made "loyalty to loyalty" the central principle of his ethics.   R.W.F.

Loyola: Saint Ignatius (Inigo Lopez de Loyola), founder of the Jesuits*, was born in 1491 in the Basque Province of Guipuscoa, Spain. Before his conversion in 1521, he had been a courtier and soldier. By 1523 his celebrated Spiritual Exercises were substantially complete. After studies at the University of Paris (1528-1535), Ignatius settled in Italy and soon became one of the most influential personalities in the Catholic Reformation. He founded the Society of Jesus in 1540, wrote its Constitutions, and governed it till his death at Rome on July 31, 1556.
         E.A.R.

Loyson, Fr. Hyacinthe (Charles): (1827-1912) French preacher, formerly a Carmelite, later reformer on Old Catholic lines (1869-1893); author of sermons and program of Catholic reform.   E.R.H.

Lucian the Martyr (ca. 250-312) A presbyter of the church and head of a theological school at Antioch. Arius* and some of his associates were among his pupils. Revised the Septuagint* on the basis of the Hebrew text and published a recension of the Greek N.T. Suffered a martyr's death. See Antiochian school.   S.M.G.

Lücke, Gottfried Christian Friedrich: (1791-1855) He taught at the universities of Bonn and Göttingen. He supplemented Schleiermacher's* hermeneutics in that he sought to give room to the contents of religious interest in the interpretation of scripture. He also was a pioneer in the awakening of church life.
Grundriss der neutestamentlichen Hermeneutik und ihrer Geschichte, 3 vols. (Göttingen, 1816), Kommentar über die Schriften des Evangelisten Johannes (Bonn, 1820-25, 3 ed., Bonn, 1840-56); Versuch einer vollständigen Einleitung in die Offenbarung Johannis und die gesammte apokalyptische Literatur (Bonn, 1832, 2 ed., Bonn, 1852).   H.H.

Lucretius: (Titus Lucretius Carus) (ca. 99-55 B.C.) A Roman poet, author of De Rerum Natura (tr., W. H. D. Rouse, Loeb), a poetic essay on the atomic theory of Democritus and Epicurus*, written to explain the nature of the physical world so that men should cease to fear death and be free to find pleasure in life. He held that the soul is composed of very fine particles and is therefore mortal. He believed that the gods were eternal, but did not show how they fitted into his atomism.   J.E.N.

Lüdemann, Hermann: (1842-1933) He taught at the University of Bern, Switzerland. He seriously struggled with Kant without being able to overcome his one-sided theory of knowledge. He constructed a world-transfigured metaphysics. He tried to work out the independence of religion in terms of a psychology that reminds us of Schleiermacher*. Christianity was for him the normative religion. In the inclusiveness and power of his thought his dogmatics kept the best idealistic inheritance vital.

Die Anthropologie des Apostels Paulus (Kiel, 1872) ; Das Erkennen und die Werturteile (Leipzig, 1910) ; Christliche Dogmatik (Bern, 1924-26).
     H.H.

Ludolf of Saxony: (d. 1377) A Carthusian* whose Life of Christ had an enormous vogue in the Middle Ages. Neither critical nor original, this work was more than a book of meditations conducing to the greater love of the Christ, human and divine. It stressed, even more, the pertinence and practicality of Christ and the Gospels to the everyday life of average men. In Ludolf's works are to be found both a beautiful, mystic insight and a prophetic challenge to renunciation and ecclesiastical reform. See Lives of Jesus.
S. J. Case, Jesus Through the Centuries (1932).
     R.C.P.

Luke, Gospel of: The first volume of Luke's two-volume work on Christian beginnings, which was written about A.D. 90, probably by Luke, the companion of Paul, in an effort to preserve the story of the rise of Christianity, which was already bidding fair to become a world religion. Luke was a Greek, and his work exhibits some of the Greek literary techniques of his day. he plans his book in two volumes, with a preface, dedication, and account of sources and purpose. He has a historical interest in ages and dates; about all we have on those subjects we owe to him. His fondness for poetry has preserved for us a series of early Christian hymns. He builds largely upon Mark*, but had two other written sources in common with Matthew*, as well as one or two of his own. He declares his purpose to be to verify the various sources known to him and unite them into one connected account. The Good Samaritan, the Prodigal Son, and the Pharisee and the Tax-collector are among the finest things we owe to Luke. The Gospel volume leaves the disciples waiting in Jerusalem for the spirit that is to come upon them precisely the point at which the second volume, the Acts*, takes up the narrative. See gospel and gospels; Synoptic Gospels.
Alfred Plummer, The Gospel according to St. Luke (4th ed., 1901).   E.J.G.

lulab: (literally branch) The branch of the Palm tree used in connection with the ceremony of the Feast of Tabernacles*, ordained in Leviticus 23·40. To the lulab were attached three twigs of myrtle and two willow branches. Together with the etrog or citron, they were waved during the recitation of special passages from the Psalms.
Cf. I. M. Casanowicz, Jewish Encyclopedia, Vol VIII, pp. 205-207.   B.C.

Lullus, Ramon: (c. 1235-1316) A famed missionary leader of the Middle Ages who retired from luxury to a hermit* life in Majorca and, as a preparation for his work in the East, secured instruction in Arabic from a Moorish slave. In 1276 he established a Franciscan* college which, with linguistic studies, looked to service in African and Eastern missions. Soliciting ecclesiastical and political support for his project, East and West, he labored indefatigably as missionary, systematic theologian, and polemicist against the Saracen. He was instrumental in securing chairs of Oriental languages at Paris, Oxford, and Salamanca. Scholar, mystic, and zealous evangel for the faith, he died in 1316 from the effects of stoning by a North African mob. See Kabbalah.
W. T. A. Barber, Raymond Lull (London, 1903).
     R.C.P.

lumen naturæ: See under deism.

Lundensian theology: The name is sometimes applied to a school of theological thinking associated with the theological faculty at the Swedish university of Lund. Anders Nygren* is considered the leader, though his thinking developed under the influence of Einar Billing, Nathan Soderblom, and Gustav Aulen, the latter being at one time a colleague in the department of systematic theology with Nygren. Aulen had already broken with Harnack's* interpretation of Christianity, when Nygren elaborated his thesis in Eros and Agape, (I, 1930; II, 1936). The essential nature of the Christian message is Love as Agape*, distinguished from all human forms of love as Eros. With this conception of divine love as wholly unmotivated by any quality in man, Nygren traced the varying course of Agape in Christian history. There results a new orientation of the relation of Christianity to philosophy and culture. His followers have applied the principle to the fields of eschatology, ethics (where especially the problem of the law is significant), and the history of doctrine. See neo-Lutheranism.   C.J.B.

Lupercalia: (Lat. Lupercālia, from lupus, wolf; arceo, to ward off) An ancient Roman festival in honor of Lupercus (probably Faunus) on February 15, to secure the fertility of the fields, flocks, and people. Two youths ran a purificatory course around the Palatine with strips of goat's hide; these thongs were called februa, means of purification. Hence February, the month of purification.   E.M.N.

Lurianic Kabbalah: See Kabbalah.

lust: (A. S. pleasure, longing; cf. lascivious) In general, any strong desire for anything, as for power, in particular, an inordinate craving for sexual pleasure. Called a capital sin because in desiring the end of lust, a person commits many other sins.   L.R.W.

Lütgert, Wilhelm: (1867-1938) He taught in Greifswald, Halle and Berlin. His theological thought was characterized by a many-sidedness. In the field of systematic theology he fought for a realism of revelation against every spiritualistic idealism and naturalism. He especially aimed at the inclusion of nature into the doctrine of God and favored the restoration of the command of love in ethics.

Reich Gottes und Weltgeschichte (Gutersloh, 1928), Der Erlösungsgedanke in der neueren Theologie (Gutersloh, 1929); Die Religion des deutschen Idealismus und ihr Ende, 3 vols (Gutersloh, 1923 -25), 4th volume (Gutersloh, 1930); A. Schlatter als Theolog innerhalb des Geisteslebens unserer Zeit (Gütersloh, 1932), Schöpfung und Offenbarung (Gütersloh, 1934), Die theologische Krise der Gegenwart und ihr geistesgeschichtlicher Ursprung (Gütersloh, 1936).   H.H.

Luthardt, Christoph Ernst: (1823-1902) He taught in Marburg and Leipzig. He was the most successful Lutheran apologist of the biblical world view against the attacks of modern natural science. See neo-Lutheranism.

Die Lehre vom freien Willen (Leipzig, 1863); Über die Grundwahrheiten des Christentums (Leipzig, 1864); Über die Heilswahrheiten des Christentums (Leipzig, 1867); Über die Moral des Christentums (Leipzig, 1872), Die moderne Weltanschauung (Leipzig, 1880); Geschichte der christlichen Ethik, 2 vols. (Leipzig, 1888); Kompendium der theologischen Ethik (Leipzig, 1896), Kompendium der Dogmatik, rev. ed. by R. Jelke (Leipzig, 1937).   H.H.

Luther, Martin: He was born on November 10, 1483, in Eisleben as the second son of Hans Luther, a miner of peasant stock. He grew up at Mansfeld, where in the course of the years his father, by thrift and hard work, rose to a respected position in the community. After having spent his earliest school years in his home town, Luther was sent to the Latin Schools of Magdeburg (1497) and Eisenach (1498-1501). In April 1501, he matriculated in the University of Erfurt. In 1504, he obtained the B.A. degree and in April 1505 also the M.A. degree. Following the wishes of his father, who desired him to become a lawyer, he continued his studies in the juristic faculty. But on July 17, 1505, he abruptly ended these studies by entering the cloister of the Augustinian Friars of Erfurt. The reasons for this decision are not clear. Luther said later that he had become a monk "in order to get a merciful God," i.e., in order to effect such a relationship with God that he could be assured of God's love for him. He kept this purpose constantly before him, while he conformed conscientiously to the monastic discipline. Ordered to continue his studies in theology, he became a priest (April 4, 1507) and a theological teacher, gradually rising in academic rank. In 1508 he was temporarily transferred to the new University of Wittenberg, where his order had been put in charge of theological education and, in the summer of 1511, after a brief visit to Rome (1510) in connection with monastic affairs, settled there definitely. Having obtained the highest academic rank of the doctorate on October 19, 1512, he assumed the professorship in Biblical theology. He offered exegetical courses on the Psalms (1513-1515), the Epistle to the Romans (1515-1516), the Epistle to the Galatians (1516-1517), the Epistle to the Hebrews (1517-1518), and again on the Psalms (1518-1521).

In the meantime, he had religiously matured. He discovered (most probably in the period between November 1512 and July 1513) in connection with an exegetical pre-occupation with Rom. 1, 17, what he regarded as the true meaning of the Christian gospel, namely the disclosure of God's forgiving love in Christ which must be apprehended in faith and repentance. This new faith permeated his academic lectures. While it caused him to be critical of scholastic theology, it disturbed as yet neither his loyalty to the hierarchical-sacramental Roman Church nor his membership in a monastic order. He was firmly convinced that by preaching and teaching justification* by faith rather than justification by works (i.e., the accomplishment of religious moral perfection by the repentant trust in God's mercy rather than by the moral effort to conform to the divine standard of holiness), he articulated the true faith of the church.

It was this concern which caused him to publish (on October 31, 1517) 95 theses on Indulgences*. The papal practice of selling indulgences appeared to him as religiously harmful, because it tended to destroy the true spirit of repentance. His demand that the theology underlying the practice be clarified received a most unexpected response. "As if the angels were couriers," the theses were spread throughout Germany and hailed as an attack against the Roman Church. Luther suddenly ceased to be an obscure monk and professor and became a public figure. When the ecclesiastical authorities suspected him of heresy and opened a trial against him, he was compelled to defend himself and in doing so he revealed his theological attitudes. Confident that his understanding of the Christian gospel was Biblical, he refused to recant his views unless they were refuted by Biblical arguments. He gained followers among the clergy and the laity and his cause quickly became the focus of the demand for a reformation that had long been latent. Gradually he became conscious of the irreconcilability of his understanding of the gospel and that of the Roman Church. After his appearance before the papal legate Cajetanus in Augsburg (October 12-14, 1518), he appealed to a General Council and after a public debate with Professor Johannes Eck in Leipzig (July 4-14, 1519), he became convinced of the fact that the religious authority of the Papacy blocked the realization of the lordship of Christ in the hearts of Christians. In 1520 he published the pamphlets entitled "Manifesto to the German Nobility on the Improvement of the Christian Estate," "On the Babylonian Captivity of the Church," and "The Freedom of a Christian Man." Suspecting the Papacy of being the Anti-Christ, he attacked the hierarchical organization and the sacramental practice of the Roman Church, demanded a reformation of the church according to the Bible and according to the spirit of personal freedom and responsibility. On December 10, 1520, he dramatically severed himself from obedience to the pope by publicly burning the papal bull that threatened him with excommunication unless he recanted On January 3, 1521, the Curia answered by putting the papal ban upon him, an act which was confirmed by imperial authority at the diet of Worms (May 25, 1521), after Luther, appearing in person before the Emperor Charles V* and the German estates (on April 17 and 18, 1521), had refused to change his mind.

The reformation* was thus outlawed, but due to the political situation of Europe with which the Emperor and the Pope had to preoccupy themselves, it could not be stopped. Luther became its acknowledged leader. By nature conservative and inclined to be wary of an alliance between religion and politics, he assented only slowly to the political organization of the German Evangelicals. Yet only by this means, reformed Christian churches could come into being. But, nevertheless, until the end of his life, it remained Luther's belief "that the word must do it."

Having spent almost a year on the Wartburg, the castle of his protector Frederick the Wise, where he was believed to be safe from persecution, he returned to Wittenberg (March 1522). Having stopped there the outbreaks of an evangelical radicalism initiated by some of his colleagues and fellow monks, he resumed his academic lectures on the Bible. But his main work belonged to the extension and defense of the Reformation. The translation of the Bible, which during his exile on the Wartburg he had begun with a masterful and congenial rendering of the N.T. into German, kept him busy for more than twenty years. The rise of evangelical radicals and sectarians (he called them Schwärmer) compelled him to defend his work by stressing the objective and authoritative nature of the Biblical Word. A concern for the theocentric and Christocentric understanding of the Christian gospel caused him to set himself apart not only from the Humanists (in 1525 he refuted Erasmus* in his most systematic theological book "On the Bondage of the Will"), but also from Zwingli* and the Swiss Reformation (from 1525 till 1529 he was engaged in a literary debate with Zwingli on the meaning of the Lord's Supper). His refusal to sanction in the name of religion the social-economic demands of the disinherited peasants and his encouragement of princely authority to beat down the anarchistic revolution of the peasants (1525) cost him much popularity. (See peasants' war.) Henceforth he looked with suspicion upon the masses ("Master omnes") and reluctantly gave his consent to the formation of territorial state-churches (since 1526). His own chief contributions to their life were the catechisms (1529) in which he summed up his interpretation of the Christian faith in a manner that communicated the spirit of his Christian faith to many future generations. He participated in the making of creeds (Augsburg Confession*, 1530), by which the Lutherans distinguished themselves from Roman Catholics and from fellow-Protestants, but the ban of the Edict of Worms prevented him from sharing directly in the political activities by which, in the thirties and forties, the Reformation was protected and extended.

His last years were darkened by much sickness. However, the heavy burden of work and responsibility which he carried was lightened by the joy of being with his family (on June 13, 1525, he had married the former nun Katherine von Bora).

When on February 18, 1546, he died (in Eisleben, where he was born), he was sure that his work would live on. Two months later, the Lutherans were defeated in battle by Charles V and his Spanish armies, but even this catastrophe could not destroy the achievement of Luther of having won freedom for the Word of God*. See catechism, catechumenate, biblical history, Christian instruction in; festivals and holy days, hymns, justification; Theses, Ninety-five of Luther.

James Mackinnon, Martin Luther and the Reformation, 4 vols. (1925-30), Heinrich Boehmer, Luther in the Light of Recent Research (2nd ed, 1931).

W.P.

Luther League: See Young People's Societies, Christian.

Luther Renaissance: See neo-Lutheranism.

Lutheran Church in America: The Lutheran Church has been a factor in American life since the earliest colonial days. There were Lutherans in Florida in 1565 and on Hudson Bay in 1619. The first Lutheran congregations were organized by the Swedish and Finnish colonists who settled in Delaware in 1638. Their earliest pastors were R. Torkillus and J. Campanius. With the cessation of Swedish immigration, these churches became Anglican, and today such Lutheran landmarks as Gloria Dei Church in Philadelphia and Old Swedes' Church in Wilmington belong to the Episcopalians. In the Dutch colony of New Amsterdam the Lutherans had to struggle under laws permitting only the Reformed Church. Their first pastor, J. E. Gutwasser, was deported in 1659 after two years of secret ministry, and it was not until the English conquest of 1664 that congregational life became definitely established. The first German Lutheran service in America was conducted by a little group of Pietists* in Philadelphia in 1694. A decade later German Lutheran immigration to Pennsylvania began in earnest. Lutheranism was planted in the South with the arrival at Charleston, S. C., of a band of exiles from Salzburg in 1734. The oldest Lutheran congregation still in existence is St. John's in Charleston.

American Lutheranism entered upon an important new phase with the coming in 1742 of Henry Melchior Muhlenberg*, the Patriarch of the Lutheran Church in America, who envisioned a strong organized Church firmly planted in the life of the nation. He organized the scattered German congregations of eastern Pennsylvania into the first Lutheran synod in 1748, known now as the Ministerium of Pennsylvania of the United Lutheran Church. Various other synods were soon formed in the eastern and southern states. Muhlenberg's dream of an integrated evangelizing Church was not realized, however, for the distinguishing trait of American Lutheranism came to be the formation of numerous independent synods. There are still some small completely autonomous Lutheran synods, such as the Lutheran Brethren and the Eielsen Synod among the Norwegians, the Danish Lutheran Church, and three groups of Finnish Lutherans. Lutheran disunity has two main causes: 1) differences in doctrinal emphasis and 2) differences in language and national background. The seed sown by Muhlenberg had indeed come to fruition in 1821 in the Formation of the General Synod, but its leaders, especially the progressive S. S. Schmucker*, were accused of doctrinal laxity and of fraternizing with other denominations. Hence in 1861 the conservative elements withdrew to form the General Council. The southern synods, alienated from the North by the Civil War, formed their own United Synod in 1886. These three groups, however, all heirs of the Muhlenberg tradition, merged in 1918 to become the United Lutheran Church in America*. Decidedly more conservative in its doctrinal position than the old General Synod, this thoroughly Americanized body of 3,606 pastors and 1,714,945 members seeks to unite all Lutherans on the broad principles of the Augsburg Confession*.

Another spirit is represented by the Missouri Synod (see Missouri Lutherans), organized in 1847 by a new patriarch, K. F. W. Walther*, and exceeding even the Lutheran confessions in its meticulous insistence upon doctrinal correctness. To render it immune from surrounding influences the Missouri constitution originally demanded the exclusive use of the German language. Walther did much to restore emphasis upon central Lutheran principles, but his intolerance and penchant for controversy sowed disruption. The clear-cut conservative platform of Missouri, however, won many adherents, and the tremendous wave of nineteenth-century German immigration swelled their ranks. In 1872 the Missourians formed the second of the present general bodies of Lutherans by affiliating with four like-minded synods, the Joint Synod of Wisconsin, the Slovak Synod, the Norwegian Synod, and a Negro Mission, to constitute the Synodical Conference. Of its 4,922 pastors and 1,665,377 members, 4,110 pastors and 1,361,698 members belong to the Missouri Synod. Three independent conservative synods of German background, the Ohio, Iowa, and Buffalo synods, merged in 1930 to form the American Lutheran Church with 1,656 pastors and 571,545 members. This general body seeks to steer a middle course between the United Lutherans and Missouri.

With the opening of the flood-gates of Scandinavian immigration in the nineteenth century, the United States, especially the Middle West, received hundreds of thousands of sturdy pioneers with deeply entrenched and highly developed Lutheran traditions. These people had their own patriarchs organizing them into congregations and synods the Norwegians Eielsen, the Swedes Hasselquist*, the Danes Clausen, the Finns Nikander. The largest of the Scandinavian synods are: the Norwegian Lutheran Church, formed by the merger of three synods in 1917 and having 1,473 pastors and 581,287 members, the Swedish Augustana Synod*, organized in 1860, now having 920 pastors and 356,584 members, the Lutheran Free Church (Norwegian) with 210 pastors and 49,506 members, the United Danish Church with 181 pastors and 35,845 members. These Scandinavian bodies, together with the American Lutheran Church, confederated in 1930 to form the American Lutheran Conference with a total of 4,440 pastors and 1,594,767 members. Both the American Lutheran Conference and the Synodical Conference differ from the United Lutheran Church in being only loose federations of autonomous synods.

In recent years the various Lutheran groups have drawn closer together. An important agency promoting mutual understanding and carrying out common tasks is the National Lutheran Council organized in 1918 for co-operative effort in the emergencies caused by the first World War. Representing all the important Lutheran bodies, with the exception of Missouri, it carries out coordinated projects of world service, social welfare, statistics, and publicity. The second World War, creating new crises in ministering to the armed forces and in maintaining mission fields, has produced new and unparalleled Lutheran co-operation. In 1941 the Lutheran bodies of America had a grand total of 13,565 pastors, 19,033 congregations, and 5,420,115 members, thus being the country's third largest Protestant denomination. See American theology, early, parochial schools.

J. L. Neve and W. D. Allbeck, History of the Lutheran Church in America (3d rev. ed , 1934) ; A. R. Wentz, The Lutheran Church in American History (2nd rev. ed , 1933) ; Vergilius Ferm, The Crisis in American Lutheran Theology (1927) ; Vergilius Ferm, editor, What is Lutheranism? (1930).

T.A.K.

Lutheran confessionalism: See neo-Lutheranism, Confessions, Formal of the Christian Church.

Lutheran doctrine of the Lord's Supper: The Lutherans have stressed the importance of the Lord's Supper* because of its intimate connection with the doctrine of grace*. "The chief things in the Sacrament", declares Luther's Catechism, "are the words 'given and shed for you for the remission of sins' ". The Sacrament*, therefore, is not a sacrifice, either propitiatory or eucharistic. It is not a rite by which we give something to God but a means of grace by which Christ in a peculiar and personal way gives Himself to us. As pledges of the assurance of forgiveness Christ offers His real body and blood, which the believer receives for the strengthening of faith and the unbeliever for condemnation. The emphasis on the real presence* of Christ results from taking the words of the institution in a literal sense. Luther interprets "This is my body" by the simile of the mother who points to a cradle, saying, "This is my child". Christ does not mean to say that the bread is His body any more than the mother implies that the cradle is her child. "In, with, and under" the elements of bread and wine the glorified spiritual body of Christ is present. Since in this glorified state the human nature of Christ has unrestricted use of the properties of the divine nature (communicatio idiomatum*), Christ can be bodily present everywhere (ubiquity*). This doctrine is neither transsubstantiation nor consubstantiation. It lays primary stress neither on the faith nor on the love of the communicants but on the descending and pardoning love of Christ. The Sacrament also serves, however, as a memorial of Christ, a witness of faith, and a bond of Christian fellowship. Fidelity to the original institution led to the restoration of the cup to the laity. The doctrine is stated confessionally in Art. X, XXII, and XXIV of the Augsburg Confession* and its Apology, Luther's Catechisms, Art. VI of Schmalkald Articles, and Ch. VII of the Formula of Concord.   T.A.K.

Lutheran Free Church (Norwegian): See Lutheran Church in America.

Lutheranism in England: See England, Lutheranism in.

Lutheranism, neo: See neo-Lutheranism.

Lüttge, Willy: (1882-1928) He was professor in Berlin and Heidelberg. He concerned himself largely with questions of French Protestantism and its world view.

Die Rechtfertigungslehre Calvins (Berlin, 1909),

Religion und Dogma, ein Jahrhundert innerer Entwicklung im französischen Protestantismus (Tubingen, 1913); Christentum und Buddhismus (Gottingen, 1916), "Der Pessimismus im Christentum" in Festgabe für Julius Kaftan (Tubingen, 1920); Die Dialektik der Gottesidee in der Theologie der Gegenwart (Tubingen, 1925); Zur Krise des Christentums (Gutersloh, 1926), Religion und Kunst (Gutersloh, 1929).   H.H.

LXX: Abbrev. for Septuagint, designation of the O T. in Gr. though properly applicable only to the Gr. Pentateuch. The name may be older than the legendary explanation of it given in the Letter of Aristeas (c. 100 B.C.), viz., that it was translated under extraordinary circumstances by 72 Jewish elders brought from Palestine for the purpose by Ptolemy II Philadelphus (285-246 B.C.). See Alexandrian Library, versions of the Bible, ancient. Cf O T. lit.   R.B.Y.S.

Lyons, Councils of: Besides many provincial and diocesan synods, two general councils were held at Lyons a) First Council of Lyons, the Thirteenth Ecumenical Council* of the Catholic Church (June to December 1245), issued no dogmatic constitutions but deposed Frederick II and voted levies for the relief of the Holy Land and the benefit of the Latin Empire of Constantinople. b) Second Council of Lyons (May to July 1274), the Fourteenth Ecumenical Council of the Catholic Church, had as its principal object the reestablishment of union between the East and the West. An ephemeral union was concluded, the "Filioque"* was solemnly defined, a profession of faith was prescribed for Michael Palaeologus, and among the reform decrees was an important one regulating papal elections.   E.A.R.

Lyra, Nicolaus de: (1270-1340) French exegete, Franciscan, Sorbonne professor. His Biblical commentary, the Postillae, noted for its good presentation of the literal sense, was extensively used in the Middle Ages and by Luther.   E.C.K.

M

ma'arib: (literally, who causes the evening to set) It is the evening prayer, the name being taken from the first benediction. According to a Talmudic* tradition, the Ma'arib prayer was instituted by the Patriarch Jacob. However in Talmudic times the evening prayer was regarded in some circles as optional.

J. D. Eisenstein, Jewish Encyclopedia, Vol. VII, pp 233-234   B.C.

Maat: An ancient Egyptian goddess of justice, whose symbol is the ostrich feather. When the deceased is led before Osiris, king of the dead, and his court, the heart of the deceased is weighed in a balance against an ostrich feather, the symbol of Maat.   F.L.P.

Maccabees: See Hasmoneans.

Maccabees, Books of: Three Jewish, historical or quasi-historical books, included in the Apocrypha of the OT,* and a fourth book, known as IV Maccabees, of philosophic and hortatory character, found in the Jewish pseudepigraphic* writings. Of these four books two, known as I and II Maccabees, deal with the struggle for religious freedom and political independence of the Jewish people, under the leadership of the five Hasmonean* brothers, against the Syrian Empire under Antiochus IV Epiphanes and his successors. III Maccabees, on the other hand, is actually a misnomer, for it deals only very remotely with this Jewish war, has but slight historical background and is in the main a legendary account of a miraculous deliverance of the Jews of Egypt from total destruction by Ptolemy Philopator. I Maccabees deals in objective and reliable historical manner with the military and political events from the accession of Antiochus Epiphanes* in 175 B.C. to the death of Simon the Hasmonean in 135 B.C. It was written in Hebrew about 100 B.C. II Maccabees is actually an epitome of an earlier history of the Maccabean war, covering only the period, 175-161 B.C., written by a Hellenistic Jew, Jason of Cyrene. Jason's history was probably written in the last quarter of the second century B C., and II Maccabees about a half-century later. It was written in Greek. II Maccabees agrees in great measure with I Maccabees, but on the whole is less well organized and has less historical value. III Maccabees was also written in Greek, in Egypt, about 100 B.C. IV Maccabees was likewise written in Greek, for an Alexandrian Jewish audience, probably during the first half of the first century A.D. It makes frequent reference to heroic legends dealing with the Maccabean war; hence its name. See Judas Maccabeus.

R H Charles, The Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha of the Old Testament (Oxford, 1913), I, 59-173; II, 653-685.   J.M.

Macedonianism (Pneumatomachi): Name used after 380 to describe those of the Homoiousians* who regarded the Holy Spirit as a created being, subordinate to the Father and the Son (hence Pneumatomachi). Movement began in Alexandria, though name comes from Macedonius, Bishop of Constantinople, and was commonly applied to the sect after his deposition.   K.H.C.

Machen, J. Gresham: (1881-1937) N.T. scholar, theologian, militant conservative leader. Graduated at Johns Hopkins University, 1901, and at Princeton Theological Seminary, 1905. After graduate study in Germany, he returned to Princeton Seminary in 1906 as Instructor in NT Greek. There he took sides with the group which opposed the policies of President Stevenson, holding, in common with that group, that the differences were basically doctrinal and were an aspect of the Liberal-Fundamentalist controversy which was then convulsing most of American Protestantism. When his group was defeated by the re-organization of Princeton Seminary in 1929, he, with three colleagues, withdrew and took an active part in the founding of Westminster Seminary, Philadelphia. In the controversies which later divided the latter group, leading to the formation of Faith Seminary, he stood for the Westminster Standards as opposed to Pre-millenialism* and Dispensationalism,* and for liberty as opposed to the "separated" life. As a result of his growing dissatisfaction with the policies of the Board of Foreign Missions of his Church (the Presbyterian Church in the U. S. A.), he was active in forming the Independent Board of Presbyterian Foreign Missions of which he became the first President. When ordered by his Church to withdraw from this Board, he refused, and, along with several other ministers, was suspended from its ministry. Accordingly a new Church was formed, in 1936, with Dr. Machen as Moderator of its first General Assembly. The new body first called itself The Presbyterian Church in America, but, when enjoined by the civil courts from the use of that title, it was renamed in 1939 The Orthodox Presbyterian Church. He died at Bismarck, N. D., January 1, 1937, while on a speaking tour in the interests of the new church. Cf. fundamentalism.

The Origin of Paul's Religion (1921), Christianity and Liberalism (1923), The Meaning of Faith (1925); The Virgin Birth of Christ (1930). See his essay in Contemporary American Theology (1932), Vol. I, edited by V. Ferm.   A.K.R.

Machiavelli, Niccolo: (1469-1527) An Italian political philosopher who wished his country to become free, united, and great. He describes quite realistically the methods by which he thought that a prince untroubled by moral scruples might bring this about, using in his best known work, The Prince (c. 1513), Cesare Borgia as a model.
                                                               w.k.w.

Mack, Alexander: (1679-1735) Born at Schriesheim, bred in the Reformed faith, and became a wealthy miller. Became a Separatist and was driven in poverty to Schwarzenau. Here, after serious study of Gottfried Arnold's works and the NT, he was the leading founder in 1708 of the German Baptist Brethren or Dunkers.* He defended their practices in A Plain View of the Rites and Ordinances of the House of God. In 1729 he came with a large body of them to Germantown, Pennsylvania, where he remained their leader until his death.   w.m b.

Macleod, Norman: (1812-1872) A clergyman who remained in the Established Church of Scotland* at the time of the Disruption (1843), through fear of democracy and revolution; but who strove as a preacher, an editor and a presbyter to alleviate the rigidity of his Church in thought and practice.

See D. Macleod, Life of Norman Macleod (1876).
                                                               A.K.R.

Mādhyamaka: See Buddhist Terminology.

Madonna: (Lat. mea domina, my lady) A picture, statue, or other image of the mother of Christ, generally with the Child in her arms. The term is occasionally used in devotions to her.
                                                               J.F.T.

Madsen, Peter: (1840-1911) A Danish theologian. Born at Binding near Holstebro. From 1875-1909 he was professor of Theology in the University of Kopenhagen and from 1909-1911 bishop of Seeland. He was an influential representative of orthodox Lutheranism in Denmark and the Scandinavian countries. Among his disciples is Alf. Theodor Joergensen in Kopenhagen. See neo-Lutheranism.

Principal works.

De Christnes aandelige praestedönne (1879, German tr. 1882); Kenosis Laeren (1898); Ordinationens Betyding indenfor den lutherske Kirke-ofdeling (1904); Efeserbrevet (1911, 2nd ed. 1926); Kolosserbrevet og Brevet til Filemon (1912); Peters förste Brev (1912).   O.A.P.

maftir: The reader of the haftarah in the Synagogue service.   s.h.b.

Magdalen, Orders of St. Mary: Various religious communities of women, dating from the 11th century, dedicated to the reclamation of prostitutes and other unfortunates. At first comprised almost exclusively of penitent women, many communities eventually numbered only those of blameless reputation who tended degenerates, the sick, aged and infirm. Such institutions still exist, e.g., at Lauban, founded 1320, and Studenz. Their rule is generally based on that of St. Augustine or of St. Francis.*   J.F.T.

Magdeburg Centuries: A collective historical work, the conception of which was the intellectual property of Matthias Flacius Illyricus (1520-1575), who was professor in Wittenberg and Jena. In dividing the material of the history of the church according to centuries the Magdeburg historians developed a system of heading in which everything was exactly classified. The work was the cry of a menaced and alarmed church, of protesting Protestantism, stressing the fact that the reformation was in agreement with the original apostolic church.

Ecclesia Historia, integram Ecclesiae Christi ideam . . . secundum singulas centurias perspicuo ordine complectens, 13 vols (Basel, 1559-1574); J. S. Semler, Centuriae Magdeburgenses, 5 vols (Nürnberg, 1757), W. Elert, Morphologie des Luthertums, 2 vols. (München, 1931).   H.H.

magi: (Lat. for the Gr. magoi) In Matt. 2·1, Persian (or Babylonian) priests versed in astrology. In Acts 13 6, 8, the singular describes Bar-Jesus (Elymas) as a "magician" or "quack." See Zoroastrianism.   s.m.g.

magic: Use of materials, rites and spells* believed to be automatically effective for the fulfilment of desires. The techniques fall roughly into three classes—the purely practical, a combination of practical and ceremonial and the purely ceremonial. When desires may be immediately satisfied by practical methods there is no need of ritual.* When there is a practical way but results are postponed or delayed ceremonies furnish psychical assurance of success as in the rites of agriculture, canoe-building, or hunting. When there is no practical method a purely ritual wishfulfilment is attained by such forms as spell or prayer. A large proportion of these ceremonials are magic rites working by mechanical coercion of nature, spirits or gods. Some are persuasive appeals for help from personal divine beings. Both types are socially-approved religious techniques. The long debate among scholars over the relation between magic and religion was a futile discussion of an artificial problem created by arbitrarily defining religion on the pattern of Christianity with its peculiar emphasis on belief and its separation of the secular from the religious. All religions use magic. It played a dominant rôle in the religions of Babylonia, Egypt, Rome, Brahmanical Hinduism, and in the Tantric forms of both Hinduism and Buddhism.

Magic techniques range from such simple forms as the amulet* which automatically benefits its possessor, a wish embodied in emotion-charged words, a fetish working by the power of a captive spirit to such elaborate rites as the great Brahmanical sacrifices of India meticulously integrating spell, gesture and music with the acts of many priests and generating a power able to bind the gods as servants of the will of the sacrificer.

Magic is essentially wish-fulfilment. Desire flows out in word or gesture. The manifold rites take form from chance or mistaken relationships of things, taking a part of a person such as clothing, hair or name to represent him, false analogy, the release of emotion in action or words, the private or priestly control of a mysterious power. Magic used to satisfy private desires at the expense of the community is condemned but its use for such personal ends as protection of property or healing is socially approved. All desires are served by magic. The rites give assurance of success in love, labor or war, protection from dangers, cure of disease, safety from poison or the evil eye, guaranteed virility, fertility, good crops, wealth, happiness and power.

Only by their practical techniques have the peoples made their successful journey down the centuries. Magic has been a drag upon the development and introduction of practical control. On the other hand, in the absence of effective methods, it has provided cathartic, emotional release, a feeling of security and freedom from anxiety by furnishing imaginary cures for imaginary ills. See charms and amulets; exorcism; primitive religion; tabu.   A.E.H.

magic: A practice based on the assumption that certain causes will produce certain effects not admitted by science. Like science, magic is based on logic, but the logic is fallacious. A large class of magical operations, known as "sympathetic" magic, depend upon the belief that certain relations between persons or things continue after the relations have ceased to exist. According to the logic of magic anything closely connected with one's person, such as hair, nails, clothing, or even name, may be used to the injury of the individual involved. Magic intended to produce evil effects is known as "black" magic and is contrasted with the use of the same methods to bring about good, and known as "white magic." Magic is responsible for the popular medical theory that "like cures like" (the bite of a dog can be cured by a hair of the animal that bit you), that warts can be removed by placing blood from the affected part on a piece of potato or bread and burying it or feeding it to a duck, that a person may be injured by melting or mutilating a wax image resembling the person to be affected, and that certain persons possess the power of injuring others by casting on them "the evil eye." Magic also plays a large part in the supposed effectiveness of many formulae, especially those used in divination* and in witchcraft. See witchcraft. Bibliography under folklore.   T.P.C.

magic circle: A circle drawn around a person or object as protection from danger. The circle might be a simple line drawn on the ground, or marked by pebbles, fire, water or thorns. Sometimes a threefold circumambulation* was enough. Men who specialized in calling up spirits* for consultation stood inside a circle for safety. These circles were often made doubly secure by being inscribed with symbolic figures or divine names.   A.E.H.

magister sacri palatii: (Lat. Master of the Sacred Palace) The Master of the Sacred Palace is the Roman Pontiff's personal theologian and canonist. St. Dominic* (1170-1221) was the first, and the office has always been held by a member of the Dominican Order.* The function tended to develop the Palace School*, which became the Roman Univ. in 1513. The holder of the office is a Palatine Prelate, the highest title in the pope's personal suite, though the post is no longer as important as formerly.   J.F.T.

Magna Charta: (The Great Charter—originally so-called because of its length, in contrast with preceding charters.) A set of concessions extracted from King John of England in 1215 by a combination of feudal nobility, churchmen, and townspeople. Of the total of 61 original articles the majority were concerned with strengthening the position of the nobility as against the crown in the feudal system. The first article, however, enunciated the principle that elections of bishops and abbots should be free from royal influence and other articles dealt with the position of lesser figures in the feudal system and with the improvement of government in general. In later years—particularly in the seventeenth century—emphasis on these portions of the charter, fortified by a loose interpretation of the articles originally designed to benefit only the nobility, transformed the Charter into an arsenal of precedents for those working for political liberalism and ultimate democracy in England and the United States. See Langton, Stephen.   M.M.K.

Magna Glossatura: See Peter Lombard.

magnificat: The hymn sung by the Blessed Virgin Mary (Luke 1.46-55), on the occasion of her visit to S. Elizabeth, before the birth of Jesus. The canticle has been incorporated in the Daily Office of the Church, and in Evening Prayer in the Anglican Communion.   W.N.P.

Mahābhārata: The longer of the two great epics of India. It is the longest epic in the world containing 220,000 lines, over seven times the combined length of the Iliad and the Odyssey. It is not all strictly epic, but a combination of genuine epic and didactic material, the latter treating of politics, law, religion and other topics, and forming about three fourths of the whole. It is obviously the work of many hands, even the genuine epic portion. This was probably complete by about the beginning of the Christian era. The entire work as we have it was probably completed before 400 A.D.

The epic story is that of the struggle between the two branches of the house of Bhārata, the Kauravas, sons of the blind Dhrita-rashtra and the Pandavas, sons of his brother Pandu. During the exile of the Pandavas to the forest, friends come to comfort them and tell, among others, three famous stories that are greatly loved by Indians, Savitri and Satyavan, Nala and Damyanti and the story of Rāma* which later became India's other great epic. Probably the most notable part of the didactic epic is the Bhagavad Gītā* which has become India's best loved devotional book.

See E. W. Hopkins, The Great Epic (1902).
The entire epic was translated by Pratap Chundra Roy, 1883-1894 For partial translations see Romesh Dutt, The Ramayana and Mahabharata (London, 1929). Also Sir Edwin Arnold, Indian Idylls (1884). C.S.B.

Mahādeva: (Literally, great god) A variant name of the Hindu god Shiva*. Mahādevi is the wife of Shiva. C.S.B.

mahatma: (Literally, "great soul," maha and atman) A term of high respect as accorded by modern India to Mohandas K. Gandhi.*

In Theosophy* the term signifies a class of great ones, "elder brothers," "masters of wisdom and compassion," who, because of their sympathy for mankind, have renounced the privilege of continuing further in their spiritual evolution in order to help others less advanced than they themselves. They are supposed to be living in India and Tibet where Helen Blavatsky, foundress of Theosophy, had contact with them and received revelations from them. C.S.B.

Mahāvairocana: See Buddhist Terminology.

Mahāvīra: (Literally, great conqueror) It is the title given to Vardhamana generally held to be the founder of the Jain* faith. According to the Jains there have been 24 Jainas or conquerors who have become Tirthankaras or ford finders, of which Mahāvira was the last. They are usually represented by images in Jain temples. They are not deities and can help no one, but having won through to salvation, others find help in their own efforts at salvation in contemplating them. Mahavira was an older contemporary of Gautama, the Buddha.* He placed no dependence for help on anything outside of himself; his movement was theoretically non-theistic. See virgin birth.

Mrs. Sinclair Stevenson, The Heart of Jainism (1915). C.S.B.

Mahāyāna: See Buddhist Terminology.

Mahdi: (Arabic, for the guided one) The future leader of Mohammedans expected to appear as a Messiah* to establish the better age to come. Other leaders (imam) have had their divine appointment in the past and present but the Mahdi will be the final leader, initiating the perfect rule of Allah on earth. The title has been assumed by several leaders of Moslem sects, but not all have accepted such leadership. See Ahmadiya; imam. P.E.J.

Mahzor: (Hebr. cycle) Jewish book of prayers and liturgic poems for the festivals. S.H.B.

Maimonides or Moses Ben Maimon: (1135-1204) Foremost Jewish Talmudist, philosopher and physician of the Middle Ages. Born in Cordova, Spain, he was forced in 1148 to leave his native city as a result of the Almohade invasion. In 1160, after years of wandering, he settled with his family in Fez, Morocco, whence they removed in 1165 to Fostat (Cairo), Egypt. After the death of his brother David, with whom he had participated in the jewelry trade, Moses Maimonides took up the practice of medicine. His fame as a healer caused him to be appointed as physician at the court of Saladin and his recognition as a rabbinical authority to be entrusted with the office of Nagid, i.e. official head of the Egyptian Jewish community. His most important works were the Siraj, a commentary on the Mishnah (1168), his comprehensive code of Jewish law entitled Yad Hahazakah (the Strong Hand) (1180) and his philosophical work "The Guide of the Perplexed," which attempted to harmonize rabbinic Judaism with Aristotelian philosophy (1190). Besides these he also wrote numerous responsa on Jewish legal questions and treatises on logic, astronomy and medicine. For a more complete enumeration of his writings, all of which, except for his code, were composed in Arabic see the Jewish Encyclopedia, Moses Ben Maimon. See Gerson, Levi ben; Israel, religion and theology; Judaism. S.R.

Maistre, Joseph de: (1754-1821) He was a leader of the French Catholic émigrés in their attack upon the philosophy of Voltaire and Rousseau, (Considérations sur la France, 1796). In his book Du Pape (1817) he exalts the papacy as the one absolute principle of social order in the world. In the Soirées de St. Pétersbourg (posthumous) he defends the social utility of war and capital punishment, and the superiority of intuition and tradition over reason. W.M.H.

Maitreya: See Buddhist Terminology.

Major (Mair), John: (1470-1550) A Scottish historian and scholastic theologian. Major taught at Paris, Glasgow and St. Andrews and wrote commentaries on the gospels and on theological and philosophical texts. His valuable History of Greater Britain, of which an English edition with apparatus was published by the Scottish History Society in 1892, exhibits his doctrine of limited monarchy. J.T.M.

Major Prophets: Traditional classification applying to Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel, based wholly on the supposed volume rather than the quality of their work; a grouping less significant since it is recognized there is no unity of authorship in any of these collections, that Ezekiel is low in quality, and that Isaiah is a complex of materials from a number of authors and periods. See Minor Prophets; prophets, prophecy, OT. R.E.W.

Majoristic controversy: A seventeenth century struggle which centered around the attitude of Georg Major (Protestant Reformer). In connection with the Leipsic Interim* (the statement of the Protestant position in the adiaphoristic controversy*), his orthodoxy regarding justification by faith was challenged. He was attacked by Amsdorf, and though at first the controversy was moderate, extreme views were advanced on both sides regarding the relation of good works to salvation.   G.R.C.

majuscules: idem uncials*.

Malachi: An anonymous prophecy, "my messenger" (transliterated malachi) in 3:1 being mistaken as the author. This prophet was active about 460 B.C., in a time of religious slump and political humiliation due to failure of the Zerubbabel and Menahem messianic* movements. The book reflects popular hatred toward Edom, who had helped humiliate Judah. The last three verses are a supplement appended by a later editor to the completed OT. Most priestly of the prophets, the author addressed the whole book to the priests, stressing tithes, offerings, rituals, citing the high traditions of the early levitical priesthood, and upbraiding contemporary priests for their unworthiness. He told of the book of remembrance and the judgment day when God would come to refine and purge his nation. He opposed divorce, stated that other nations were more acceptable to God than Israel, and showed an international breadth of view not found since Amos.* Of post-exilic prophets, he was surpassed only by the author of Jonah.*
See The Prophets and their Times by J. M. P. Smith and W. A. Irwin (1941), pp. 266-70
         R.E.W.

Malebranche, Nicolas: (1638-1715) French metaphysician. See Occasionalism.

Malikites: Followers of Malik ibn Anas (713-795), Arabian jurist, widely revered as an authority on the Koran, and hadith (tradition). His school of orthodox jurisprudence is still influential in Egypt and North Africa.   P.E.J.

malleus maleficarum: Innocent VIII's bull, Summis desiderantes, (1484) gave papal support to the crusade of Henry Kramer and James Sprenger against witchcraft.* Malleus maleficarum (1489) was their treatise describing the manifestations of witchcraft and also prescribing appropriate answers for those who doubted the existence of devils and demons*.
See Malleus Maleficarum, translated with Introduction, by Rev. M. Summers (London, 1928).   D.F.E.-J.T.M.

Mamertine Prison: The medieval name (from the temple of Mars Ultor in the vicinity) of the double-chambered vault generally accepted as identical with "the prison . . . in the middle of the city, overlooking the forum," mentioned by Livy (I, 33). It now lies beneath the church of San Giuseppe dei Falegnami, via di Marforio, Rome.   J.F.T.

Mammon: (Lat. mammona· from Gr. mamonas: from Aramaic mamona, riches) Personified in the NT (Mt. 6.24, and Lk. 16.9-13) the term was taken by mediaeval writers to mean the devil of covetousness. From the 16th century it has been current in English as indicating the evil influence of wealth.   P.E.J.

man: See Adam; anthropology; anthropology, theological, manu. The new man: See regeneration.

mana: (Melanesian) A power or influence that is inherent in, or pertains to, objects or forces in non-human nature, and to the 'dead'; a potency which spirits of nature and ghosts of the 'dead' have and can impart or convey, it may act from spirits through objects and forces. (For somewhat similar concept among Amerinds see orenda, manitou, wakanda.) See primitive religion. Cf. kami.   F.L.P.

manaism: A word of doubtful utility; derived from Melanesian mana* which is not a power of universal character; is incapable of identifying a primitive religion in its wholeness aspect. F.L.P.

Manasseh: King of Judah, reigning 686-641 B.C., most wicked of Hebrew monarchs, martyred the prophets and banished Yahwism, by reintroducing primitive faiths, idolatries, and human sacrifice, he inaugurated a renaissance of paganism in Jerusalem. See Tophet.   R.E.W.

Manasses, Prayer of: A one-chapter book of the Apocrypha, based on the story of the repentance of Manasseh, King of Judah, after his imprisonment by the Assyrians (2 Chron. 33 11-13). In vv. 18, 19, we are told that the text of the original prayer is recorded in the unknown "Acts of the Kings of Israel" and "The History of the Seers."
Our apocryphal version is clearly a Jewish prayer of the devotional "hasid" style found in the later Psalms, though it is not certain that there is a Hebrew original. Jewish traditions do not know this prayer, though they have their own versions. See apocrypha, O.T.   H.K.-L.F.

Mandel, Hermann: (1882-) He taught in Rostock and Kiel. Regarding Christianity as strictly supernatural, he turned his attention for apologetic purposes to the other religions and to natural morality. His theory of reconciliation combines modern historical and traditional traits.
Die Erkenntnis des Übersinnlichen (Leipzig, 1911); System der Ethik als Grundlage der Religion (Leipzig, 1912); Der Wunderglaube (Leipzig, 1913); Christliche Versöhnungslehre (Leipzig, 1916).   H.H.

Manegold of Lautenbach: (d. c. 1103) A German Augustinian monk who, on a contractual basis, supported Pope Gregory VII* in his struggle against the emperor, Henry IV.* He sought to justify the second excommunication of Henry as one who, having already broken his contract with his subjects, was, as a tyrant, subject to papal deposition. Manegold's theory, although obviously employed as a buttress to papal authority, had implicit in it, however, a defense of popular government. In this lies the historical significance of his work.   R.C.P.

manes: In the early Roman republic, departed souls or "dead" which resided in the nether world, they were worshiped with offerings of food and drink at the graves or tombs.   F.L.P.

Mani and Manicheism: During the past fifty years the materials for our knowledge of these great early rivals of Christ and Christianity have been greatly increased both in bulk and in quality. In this half century a large number of fragments of the original writings of Mani and his church have been recovered in at least three Iranian languages, in Uigur-Turkish, in Chinese, and in Coptic. The works of opponents in which Mani and the Manicheans are described and quoted have been enriched by at least one major Syriac source, Theodore bar Konai, and for the works of Augustine, the Acta Archelai, and the polemic of the Neoplatonist Alexander of Lycopolis we have new, more reliable editions. A comprehensive survey of all of the source material, new and old, published before 1918, may be found in Prosper Alfaric, Les écritures manichéennes, Paris, 1918-1919. This is supplemented to 1931 by A. V. W. Jackson in his Researches in Manichaeism (1931). The best comprehensive treatment in English, though naturally somewhat antiquated, is still F. C. Burkitt's Religion of the Manichees (Cambridge, 1925). The best treatment in any language is Hans Jakob Polotsky's article Manichaismus in Pauly-Wissowa's Real-Encyclopädie der classischen Altertumswissenschaft, Supplementband VI (Stuttgart, 1935), Columns 240-271; despite its late date, new publications make even this slightly out of date.

Mani, in the West named Manes or Manichaeus, was born in southern Babylonia in 215-216 A.D. His mother and perhaps his father, Patek, also, were related to the Parthian royal family of the Arsacids. His chief language was Aramaic, he knew enough Persian to compose one of his seven greater books in that language, he was apparently but little acquainted with Parthian. His father was a visionary and a member of an ascetic baptismal sect probably of simple gnostic tendencies. In his tenth year the Parthian royal house was overthrown by the Persian Sasanian dynasty. Whether or not precisely in his twelfth year, certainly at a very precocious age, he received his first revelation. Again we need not accept the second precise twelve of legend to say with fair certainty that he had completed his system, retained with little or no change thereafter, when he was still in his early twenties. In 240 or earlier his first missionary effort led him to northwestern India, perhaps following a Bardesanite trail. Late in 241 he came back to Persia for the coronation of the second Sasanian king of kings, Shapur I, at whose court he had reason to expect a favorable reception. Under Shapur, 241-272, and under his first successor, Hormizd-Ardashir, 272-273, Mani remained safe and in some measure favored by the court in Iran or on campaigns near the king in the Iranian armies' camp. Shapur, by his own inscriptions as published recently in Chicago, was and remained a professed Mazdayasnian or Zoroastrian. He does not appear ever to have become an avowed Manichaean, as two of his brothers seem to have done. But though he fostered and endowed Mazdaism,* for the first time in its history being organized as a state church, as he seems never to have done for Manicheism or any other religion, he in no way hindered, and by letters of recommendation to his subkings and governors even fostered, Manichaean missions. The curious statement about Shapur's collection of foreign literatures into a grand Avesta probably means simply that he took a kindly, paternalistic interest in all sorts of religious practices, beliefs, or missionizing in his empire, by Jews, Christians, Buddhists, Brahmins, as well as Manichaeans, allowing them considerable freedom of speech and movement and giving them police protection at court and throughout his realm. This is one of the elements of greatness in this first Shapur, never before fully recognized by historians under the influence of reports by his enemies, and this attitude was shared by the successor of his own choice, his son Hormizd-Ardashir, who was all too short-lived for the welfare and best interests of young Sasanian Iran. Complete dominance of the new state church and of its real founder and first great and fanatical leader, Kartir, in imperial affairs begins only after Hormizd-Ardashir's early death in 273, under a far less favored, though probably elder son of Shapur I, Bahrām (in the Persian writing of his day, Varahrān) I, 273-276. Under him begins the persecution and the attempt to expel from the empire all foreign "devlish-Ahrimanic" religious belief and practice. This action is led by this same Kartir, as he himself in a series of very extraordinary inscriptions tells us. Here for the first time, as the Arabs long ago correctly told us, the name Zandīks—false, heretical, mystical, allegorical, or typical interpreters of sacred texts, myths, and legends, Persian and others—is used of Mani's followers,—a smearing name, later in Moslem times becoming a name for heretics in general. Here for the first time Mani finds his movements restricted, then stopped by inquisitorial examination led by Kartir, named Kerder in Parthian and Kardel in Coptic Manichaean sources, and presently so roughly handled that he died in prison in 276 A.D. He was not actually crucified, crucifixion being a mere general term for martyrdom in Manichaean diction. Contemporary sources know nothing of his having been flayed either alive or after his death, his skin stuffed with straw and exhibited to the populace, as was his head. All this is perhaps no more than the extreme expression of especially Christian hatred of a dangerous, attractive rival. His own church tells of him attended to the end by faithful women followers and his corpse, after death in prison, buried by his own people.

In the meantime his doctrine and church had prospered and spread westward through Egypt to North Africa, where it presently for a time attracted even so great a Christian theologian as Augustine,* and Rome, eastward (more precisely, northeastward), perhaps favored by one of Shapur's brothers during Mani's lifetime or shortly after, it reached the far-flung frontiers of Shapur's early Iranian empire, that is to say the boundaries of China. Later, like Nestorian* Christianity and Buddhism,* it penetrated deep into Chinese (see Chinese religions) and especially Turkish territory, where it became the official state religion and church of the Uigur Turks, sharing their fates, good and bad, until just about the end of both late in what is called the Middle Ages. What became of Mani's first foundation in India after his departure in 241 is thus far wholly unknown.

The complicated and comprehensive mythologizing worldview which constitutes the essence of the religion devised by Mani, and the ecclesiastical organization and practice that go with it, cannot here be described in detail; reference to Burkitt and especially Polotsky, with occasional additions especially by W. B. Henning and H. H. Schaeder, must suffice for this. Here a few fundamental facts only can and must be mentioned.

Mani and Manicheism is the ultimate and extreme apex reached by antique, dualistic gnosticism. He is, as the Arabs long have told us, the extremist successor more especially to two great gnostic or semignostic predecessors, the Pontian Marcion and the Syrian Bardesanes (Bardaisan), near enough to the latter, so that among other things the great, originally Bardesanite "Hymn of the Soul" and the Acts of Judas Thomas could be taken over with light retouching and small additions into the corpus of Manichaean sacred literature. But he and his followers hold him to be far more than that. His dualism is not merely Persian and an outgrowth of Zoroastrianism.* It outpasses by far any mild, refined, generally recognized form of Zoroastrianism, so that to Arabs and later Zoroastrians, it, and not Zoroastrian Mazdaism, is the real dualistic heresy. Beyond that he considers himself and is considered by his church to be the successor and consummator not only of Zoroaster and Buddha, and whatever great prophets may approach these in stature and significance, but most particularly also as the promised paraclete, who was to complete the work left unfinished by Jesus the Christ—Chrēstos. Mani distinctly prides himself on summing up within himself the essence of all such predecessors. He prides himself particularly on seeing to it in his lifetime that his gospel is preached in all sorts of terms and languages to suit the thought and feeling of all kinds of peoples which it might reach. To Christians he speaks in curiously deflected Christian terminology; to Greeks in mythologizing philosophical concepts, nailing the skins of primeval gigantes to the sky as constellations; to Persians he presents his great world drama in concepts drawn from all-pervading, primitive, and elemental Zervanism* rather than in terms of the new Zoroastrianism just being formulated and reformed by Kartīr in Mani's own day. He invents for the writing of Persian and Parthian in place of clumsy and complicated Pahlavi a new form of purely alphabetic writing, adopting and adapting for this purpose the Syriac-Aramaic alphabet, which with its language was his childhood heritage. For his propaganda fides he further made effective use of poetry and song, of chastely fine calligraphy, illumination, graphic illustration, and in general fine bookmaking. His dramatic conception of the origin of evil in this present world and the process of salvation from it is seductively simple in its fundamental outlines and manifestly most acceptable to many men and women of his day. An aboriginal kingdom of darkness, evil, chaotic disorder, cupidity, and all manner of iniquity in mythologically primeval antiquity made an attack on an equally aboriginal kingdom of light, life, orderly peace and all manner of goodness. The attack succeeded in robbing a fairish portion of light, goodness, and beauty and in a cunning attempt to hold this loot by a self-perpetuating commingling of good and evil. The kingdom of light, incapable of unjust violence, devised a more subtly cunning method of using the ensuing mixed creation or universe for a process of gradual purificatory salvation to end in a complete restoration more stably and securely separating good and evil, light and darkness for all eternity to come. In the human world this process needed gnostic recognition for its furtherance, an elect group seeking perfection in quietistic asceticism, with a lay membership assisting and protecting them in their effort to slow down and bring to a stop the self-perpetuating commingling and to purify and refine out of it in their own persons uncontaminated light and goodness.

The adaptation of this fundamentally simple outline to a wide variety of antique mythological concepts and systems produced a complexity of dramatic action with allegory and actuality inextricably interpenetrating each other, which was clearly impressive to many sincerely searching and not too subtly sophisticated minds.

On the other hand the youthfully elementary and superficial comprehensiveness of Mani's system, ending early in unprogressively sterile fixity and rigidity, proved in the end unacceptable and intolerable to minds trained in methodical Greek and Latin thinking, the Neoplatonist Alexander of Lycopolis, Christian theologians like Augustine, Titus of Bostra, Theodore Bar Konai; to realistically imaginative Persians like the Zoroastrian Kartīr; to subtly earthy Chinese scholars; to scholastically developing Moslems. The faults and defects of Mani's worldview uncovered by such men as these are many; for us they with others are easy to discover. To these errors in large part may be due the widespread and almost universal, hostile opposition with which Manichaeism after a fair start met early, consistently, and continuously. Perhaps what has been said may in large measure account for the almost complete disappearance of the system and its continuity after brief initial success, in contrast with the persistence of systems and groups similar in kind and purpose. The brave sincerity and with it an element of greatness, not to say hugeness, in Mani's attempt to solve the riddle of this world remains as an abiding value in the story of this world of men and what they call thinking. M.SP.

manipule: (Lat., manipulum, handful) A decoration worn on the left arm as part of the eucharistic vestments* in the Western Church. E.R H.

manitu, or manitou: (Algonquin) A force inherent in matter, felt as an expression of spirit; any sort of spirit, found mostly in non-human objects, medicine man or conjurer may have it. See orenda, wakanda. F.L P.

Mañjusri: See Buddhist Terminology.

manners: See culture.

Manning, Henry Edward: (1808-1892) An English churchman who became a Roman Catholic Cardinal. A leader of the early Oxford Movement* in the Church of England, Manning was archdeacon of Chichester; he seceded in 1851 to the Roman Church. After various offices, he became archbishop of Westminster in 1865, and later Cardinal. His works included a treatise on infallibility of the pope, and theological books on the Church. His associations with John Henry Newman* were bitter, during part of his career; and his life, written by Purcell (1896) occasioned acrimonious discussion in England. He was a strong supporter of the rights of labour, and played an important part in strikes in London during his term of office. W.N.P.

Manning, James: (1738-1791) Baptist clergyman and educator. Helped found Rhode Island College (Brown University). 1774, pleaded for civil and religious liberty before Continental Congress. Opposed to war, favored adoption of Constitution. C.H.M.

Mansel, Henry Longueville: (1820-1871) English metaphysician and churchman. Ordained priest, 1845; made Dean of St. Paul's, London, 1868. Influenced by the agnosticism of Sir William Hamilton,* Mansel affirmed the inability of man to know the necessarily-existent Absolute or God by a direct mystical apprehension, or to arrive at the Absolute or Infinite by means of the concepts of the human intellect without becoming involved in contradiction. Neither is finite and fallible man competent to render valid judgment upon the content or moral character of Christian revelation, the truth of which is guaranteed by the external supernatural evidences attending it.
Main works: Prolegomena Logica (1851); The Limits of Religious Thought Examined (Bampton Lectures, 1858); Metaphysics (1860); Philosophy of the Conditioned (1866); Letters, Lectures and Reviews (posthumous, 1873). H.W.J.

mantic: Of divination, in the archaic Greek period; suggests quality or ability of a person who practices seer-craft; of one who is credited with skill, often attributed to possession, in forecasting events by such omens as the actions of birds and animals. F.L.P.

mantra: A term applied in Vedic times to the hymns and prayers to the gods. It came also to mean a spell or charm and so had magical significance. The most popular mantra in Hinduism* is the Gayatri.* Mantras of different kinds are used in Hindu religious rites, varying all the way from those expressing the noblest type of religious aspiration to those of clearly magical character. See Aryan religion. C.S.B.

manu: (Literally, "man") The mythical first man. In this he shares honors with Yama in the Vedas.* In the Brahmanic flood story it is Manu who Noah-like is preserved from the great flood and becomes the father of all post-diluvian humanity. Both Manu and Yama were sons of Vivasvant.
The Laws of Manu is the greatest of ancient Hindu codes, the chief of the Dharmasastras. It is translated in Sacred Books of the East, Vol. 25. See food, sutras. C S.B.

manuscripts of the Bible: MSS of the Bible are variously classified by material used, by script used, by language used, by the makeup of the book, etc., needless to say these classifications overlap. The commonest materials are Papyrus (plural, Papyri), ancient paper; parchment or vellum, animal skins; and modern paper. Our oldest MSS are written on papyrus and come from Egypt. The oldest MSS are written in large, separate letters called uncials* or majuscules, in Greek MSS, from the 9th century on, they are written in a small, more-or-less cursive* script called minuscule. Each language has its own jargon for the varieties of its script. The MSS of the Hebrew OT are usually rolls; those of the NT (and the OT in its versions) are usually leafbooks, "codices." (See codex.)
MSS of the Bible are relatively numerous, giving a larger base for study than is available for any other ancient literature. Moreover, they are closer to their originals in date than is the case in other classics. The widest gap exists between Hebrew MSS and the author's copy, the oldest Hebrew MS of any extent comes from the 9th or 10th century. But MSS of the Greek NT reach as far back as the 2nd century. MSS of versions of the OT are as early as the 2nd century A.D., and those of the versions of the NT are not much later. See under codex.
General: Sir Frederic Kenyon, Our Bible and the Ancient Manuscripts (1940); I. M. Price, The Ancestry of our English Bible: An Account of Manuscripts, Texts, and Versions of the Bible (9th ed., 1934); E. C. Colwell, The Study of the Bible (1941).
Catalogues and Lists: C. D. Ginsburg, Introduction to the Massoretico-Critical Edition of the Hebrew Bible (London, Trinitarian Bible Society, 1897); C. R. Gregory, Textkritik des Neuen Testaments (Leipzig, Hinrich, 1900-1909); Alfred Rahlfs, Verzeichnis der griechischen Handschriften des Alten Testaments (Goettingen, 1914); H. A. A. Kennedy, "Latin Versions, the Old," in Hastings, Dictionary of the Bible (1900); Samuel Berger, Histoire de la Vulgate pendant les premiers siècles du moyen age (Paris, Hachette, 1893); Henri Quentin, Memoire sur l'établissement du texte de la Vulgate (Paris, Gabalda, 1922); H. Hyvernat, "Etude sur les versions coptes de la Bible," Revue Biblique Internationale (1896); F. Macler, Le Texte Arménien de L'Evangile d'apres Matthieu et Marc (Paris, Imprimerie Nationale, 1919); C. R. Gregory, Die Griechische Handschriften des Neuen Testaments (Leipzig: Hinrich, 1908).   E.C.C.

Marburg, Colloquy of: A meeting in 1529 at Marburg of Protestant reformers in the interest of a reconciliation of Lutheran and Zwinglian views, particularly the question of the real presence in the Lord's Supper. The Marburg articles which were framed subsequently showed much agreement. The sacramental views of Luther and Zwingli remained in open disagreement. See Philip of Hesse.   V.F.

Marcellus of Ancyra: (d. c. 374) Defender of the Nicene faith, condemned and deposed by Eastern synods. In West his views came to be regarded as modification of orthodox position and were condemned.   K.H.C.

Marcion, Marcionism: A highly significant second-century reformer, usually (but mistakenly) dismissed as an archheretic. Born in Pontus (ca. 100 A.D.), he went to Rome about the middle of the second century; soon his relations with that church too were strained. The rest of his life (about which little authentic is known, for the stories carried in the Fathers are palpably legendary) was spent in the attempt to purify Christianity from all contact with Judaism. His real cleavage with orthodoxy lay in his denial of unity to the First Principle. There were two gods, a just god depicted in the Jewish Scriptures (the demiurge or creator) and a good God revealed by Christ. The one demanded "an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth," the other "To him that smiteth on the one cheek offer also the other.' The former could say "I create evil" Since a good tree could not bring forth evil fruit, such a God could not himself be good. Hence the true word of Jesus, who came to reveal the good God who had remained undivulged from the beginning of time, was "I am not come to fulfil the law but to destroy it." Jesus, the revealer of the true God, was misunderstood by all and crucified. Only Paul properly understood him. He too fell prey to Jewish machinations. Marcion was then raised up to lift once again the torch of Paul and purge from Christianity all Jewish traces. Thus he rejected in toto the OT, until his time the sole inspired Christian Scripture, and in its place made the nucleus of a truly Christian Scripture the ten letters of Paul which he accepted as genuine. These he purged of the Jewish additions and accretions which had crept in after the apostle's death, and arranged them in the order of their apparent anti-Jewishness. In addition to this apostolicon he accepted the Gospel of Luke (but not Acts) in a probably somewhat altered form. These together with a writing of his own, the Antitheses, (in which he is said to have argued by a series of antithetical passages that not only was the OT contradicted by the Christian Scripture but was in contradiction to itself), thus formed the first "Christian" canon, for until his drastic step the specifically Christian writings, while coming into increasing use and favor, were not considered canonical nor put on an equality with the true Scriptures (the OT). Marcion's iconoclastic step forced the issue. Orthodoxy could not afford to ignore or deny the writings Marcion selected, nor could they appraise them less highly than had the archheretic. Precisely the writings which he had either denied or dismembered must become for an outraged orthodoxy weapons for both defense and offense. A single front was necessary, there had been too much individual action, too many individual opinions in the past. A common foe demanded a common and united answer. The faith once delivered was under attack; all must rally to its defense. Thus Marcion is to be seen as responsible for the emergence not alone of a Christian canon of Scripture but of a united (catholic) church.

The importance of his movement, which outlasted for centuries his death, is seen in the universal and savage attack it incurred. Tertullian of Carthage*, his particular enemy, devoted five flaming books to the refutation of his views, thereby immortalizing the notions he sought to destroy. Marcion and his followers are to be sharply differentiated from the run-of-the-mill second-century Gnostics, none of the mythical speculation, so prominent in the latter, was central in his thinking or in that of his earliest followers. Characterized by an austere, even ascetic, manner of life, as enthusiastic and sincere missionaries they sought to carry on their master's work. Their devotion compares favorably with that of their orthodox contemporaries by whom they were relentlessly, often savagely, opposed and later persecuted without retaliation. Many of them died as martyrs on the same funeral pyres with their orthodox opponents. See baptism for the dead.

The fullest and most adequate treatment of Marcion and his followers is A. Harnack's admirable monograph, Marcion: das Evangelium vom fremden Gott (1924).   M.S.E.

Marcus Aurelius Antoninus: (121-180) Stoic* philosopher and Roman emperor. He was an adopted son of the Emperor Antoninus Pius. He early began the study of philosophy and later endowed chairs for the four schools of philosophy in Athens: the Academy, the Peripatetics, the Stoa, and the Garden. He developed the Stoic principles of the intrinsic value of the good will, independence of externals, conformity with nature as the expression of reason, and co-operation with other human beings. In spite of a fundamentally materialistic metaphysics, his view was essentially that of the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man. Nevertheless Marcus Aurelius lacked appreciation for Christianity and allowed Christians to be persecuted during his reign. Justin Martyr* addressed his First Apology to Antoninus Pius and his adopted sons, Marcus Aurelius and Lucius Commodus, but in vain. The Meditations of Marcus Aurelius are the classic expression of the Stoic philosophy.

See Sedgwick, Marcus Aurelius (1921).   J.E.N.

Marduk: (Semitic) God of Babylon; a local Semitic god which absorbed the powers of Sumerian god of land and air, Enlil, and Ea, god of water and wisdom, to become head god of the Babylon pantheon, god of the Cosmogonic Epic, which gained power over other gods by destroying Tiamat,* and used her body to restrain the waters above and below the earth, determiner of destiny. See Mesopotamian religion.   F.L P.

Margaret of Navarre: (1492-1549) Sister of Francis I of France, was famous for the brilliant circle she gathered around herself. She was one of the leading patronesses in France of men of letters, and her court was the chief refuge of advocates of Reformed doctrines.   G.R.C.

Marheineke, Philipp Konrad: (1780-1846) He taught at Heidelberg and Berlin. A many-sided and creative speculative theologian who was at first active as historian. His system of dogmatics had a profound influence upon his time. It was a popular presentation of ideas that were unusually similar to those of Daub*. He was unable to transcend the limits of speculative theology and to gain a free field for a faith-determined theology. See konfessionskunde.
System der christlichen Dogmatik (Berlin, 1847), ed by St. Matthies u. W. Vatke; Moral (Berlin, 1847), ed by St Matthies u W. Vatke, Christliche Symbolik (Berlin, 1848), ed by St. Matthies u W. Vatke; Dogmengeschichte (Berlin, 1849), ed. by St Matthies u W. Vatke.   H.H.

Marian exiles: During the Marian reaction in England (1553-1558), some eight hundred English Protestants went into exile on the continent. When they returned on the accession of Elizabeth, they brought back the more advanced doctrines of the continental reformers.
See C. H Garrett, The Marian Exiles (1938).   W.S.H.

mariolatry: Idolatrous worship (latria*) of the Virgin Mary*, exceeding that veneration of the highest order (hyper-dulia*) which the Second Council of Nicea (787) following St. John Damascene*, affirms to be rightly hers because of her unique position as Mother of Christ.   T.J.B.

mariology: The doctrines and opinions concerning St. Mary and her relation to the Person and work of Christ. See Virgin Mary.   T.J.B.

marital impediments: Marriage*, according to the canon law*, is a permanent contractual relationship entered into for propagation and the nurture of Christian love and charity. Conditions, legally termed impediments, may preclude the conclusion of a valid contract by entailing absence of requisite physical, mental, moral, or spiritual qualifications. Impediments may be either impedientia or dirimentia. The former prevents marriage from taking place, while the latter operates to nullify a de facto union already concluded.
Some impediments preclude the free, mutual consent which is an indispensable prerequisite for marriage. One or both parties may lack the mental qualifications to conclude a binding contract because of immaturity, insanity, or intoxication. Naturally, no valid marriage can take place with the parties under duress.

A vow of celibacy or ordination to the four highest grades of the priesthood prevents marriage or necessitates separation. Disparity of cult arises if one party is unbaptized or baptized according to ritual not sanctioned by the church. Failure to conform to prescribed usages engenders the impediment of clandestinity. Adultery is an impediment since it violates the basically monogamous character of the marital union. Although impotence is an impediment, sterility cannot be taken as prima facie evidence of its existence.
Blood relationship within the fourth degree (consanguinity), as well as relationship by marriage (affinity) are impediments. Joint participation in the rituals of baptism or confirmation by the parties creates the marital impediment known as spiritual relationship, while marriage to a person who previously was betrothed to a relative may be prohibited by invocation of the impediment of "public honesty."
See consanguinity, marital impediment of.
A Esmein, Le mariage en droit canonique, 2 vols. (Paris, 1891), M Leitner, Lehrbuch des katholischen Eherechts (Paderborn, 1912); C. E Smith, Papal Enforcement of Some Medieval Marriage Laws (1940)   C.E.S.

Mark, Gospel of: The earliest of the written gospels was written in Rome, probably by Mark, in an effort to gather up and preserve those fragments of Peter's preaching which had told of his memories of Jesus That is the tradition Papias* reports and no more probable explanation of its origin has been proposed. It consists principally of a series of incidents in which Jesus appears to do or say some extraordinary thing. There is little extended discourse; Jesus is presented rather as a doer, a man of action. Three times his life is endangered and he retreats before his foes, 3 7, 7 24, 8 27. Then at length he takes the offensive, and sets out for Jerusalem, 10·1 and 32, there to offer his message to the Jewish people gathered at their great feast. The story of their rejection of it and of his fate is a simple yet surpassing piece of heroic tragedy.
Mark was written about A.D. 70, and was soon imitated and expanded by other evangelists. It remained the pattern gospel all through the long gospel making movement, which saw the writing of a score of gospels. But no more dramatic or convincing account has ever been written of the heroic effort of Jesus to set up the Kingdom of God on earth. See Gospel and Gospels; logia; Synoptic Gospels.
B. W Bacon, The Gospel of Mark: its Composition and Date (1925); E. P. Gould, The Gospel according to St. Mark (1913). A. Menzies, The Earliest Gospel (1901); B. H. Streeter, The Four Gospels (1925); C. G Montefiore, The Synoptic Gospels (1927), vol I, 2nd ed.   E.J.G.

Marnix, Philip van: (1538-1598) Count of St. Aldegonde, poet, orator, satirist, and theologian who had studied under Calvin; a soldier and statesman, who was the closest friend and adviser of William the Silent, in the struggle for the independence of the Netherlands.   A.K.R.

Maronites: A Syrian Uniate sect, inhabiting Lebanon for the greatest part, although some live in Palestine, Cyprus, and Egypt. They were organized into a separate community by monk Maro, who died in the fifth century. In 681 they separated themselves from the other Syrian Melchites. In 1182, having come into contact with the Crusaders, they accepted the supremacy of the Roman pope and have been in communion with him ever since.   M S.

Marprelate Tracts: These were bitter, taunting Puritan* polemics, published in 1588 and 1589 under the pseudonym Martin Marprelate. They were repudiated by the party leaders and met with general censure.

See William Pierce, An Historical Introduction to the Marprelate Tracts (1908).   W.S.H.

Marquette, James: (1637-1675) French Jesuit, missionary among the American Indians of the Middle West. He founded an Algonkin mission at Sault Ste Marie, one for the Hurons on Mackinac Island, and one for the Kaskaskia, an Illinois tribe. In 1673 he explored the Mississippi with Jolliet. Two years later he died at Ludington, Michigan.   E.A.R.

Marranos: Were Spanish Jews who adopted Christianity under the stress of expulsions and riots. Jews, coerced by outward pressure to adopt en masse a foreign creed while secretly adhering to Judaism, are found in many historical periods and under various civilizations. They practice even today endogamous tendencies. Both as Jews and as Neo-Christians they held a prominent position in the economic life of the Iberian peninsula. From the beginning they were the victims of avarice and fanaticism. United in ethnic, social and religious bonds, facing constant common dangers, they entered into extensive cooperative relations. Not a few of them became leading anti-Jewish agitators. Syncretistic doctrinal formulations and rites assumed importance among them within two or three generations. They laid stress upon the apocryphal* books. Their influence was felt far beyond the confines of Spain and Portugal. The modern Judaism of America, England, France, Holland and Hamburg, Germany, owes its origin to no small extent to Marrano refugees. A Marrano was one of the main promoters of Columbus' expedition, another was the first Spaniard to tread American soil. These Neo-Christians shared in the upbuilding of modern capitalism; they made a great contribution to the rise of Christian Protestantism, and they played a prominent part in the international relations of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries.

E. N. Adler, Auto da Fé and Jew (London, 1908); C. Roth, A History of Marranos (1932); L. Wolf, The Marranos or Crypto-Jews of Portugal (London, 1926); H. J. Zimmels, Die Marranen in der rabbinischen Literatur (Berlin, 1932).   H.H.

marriage: Marriage is that type of sex relation which is approved as legitimate in a given society. What form of sex relation will obtain the social sanction depends on the ideologies, especially the religio-magical notions, the traditions, the economic and military organization and, possibly on other circumstances, prevailing in the society in question. Regularly no sex relation is granted that social recognition by which it is characterized as marriage unless it is meant to continue beyond sexual satisfaction, to provide the basis for the care of the offspring and to constitute the social-economic unit of a household. While polygymous and polyandrous forms of marriage are frequent among peoples of foreign civilizations, the actual existence of group marriage in the sense of sexual communism is denied by authoritative anthropological opinion. In Western civilization that form of marriage which, not without vicissitudes, has become the only permissible one to the exclusion of all others is the monogamous marriage in the sense of a union between one man and one woman involving a total communion of life between the partners and meant to persist for the entire duration of their joint lives.

Not only the general form of marriage but also its typical incidents are to a large extent socially determined by custom and the social norm systems of religion, ethics, etiquette and law However, the limits within which the partners may work out their own individual patterns have expanded in recent times.

The marriage type sanctioned by the Christian religion is the monogamous marriage in the sense defined above, which early Christianity found firmly established in Hebrew, as well as Hellenistic-Roman tradition. While early Christian and Patristic literature is indicative of an attitude in which celibacy is idealized and to which marriage appears as nothing but the remedium concupiscentiae and the minor evil in comparison with licentiousness, the Church at an early period came to elevate marriage to sublime dignity by endowing that human relation which involves man's most animalic function with the glory and mystery of a divine sacrament. (See sacraments) In this way marriage was not only firmly established as the basis of the family and, thereby, of all social life and organization, but also clearly marked as a spiritual union to be achieved in humble compliance with the moral and religious demands of the divine law. Individual happiness of the partners, although not recognized as the primary aim of marriage, was to be more profoundly achieved through the common strife for the establishment of a truly Christian home and family as part of the Divinely created cosmos. Indissolubility of the religious bond created through the sacrament was implied as self-evident in this Catholic notion of marriage. The fact that practice did not always come up to the standard should not detract from the appreciation of the beauty and life-strengthening force of this ideal. By attacking the sacramental character of marriage, the Reformers laid the foundation to the modern more individual notion of marriage and to a socially ambiguous attitude toward divorce. Both Luther and Calvin admitted divorce, but not so much as a privilege of regaining one's freedom on the marriage-market as in the sense of a punishment for a party guilty of adultery or other grave marital misconduct; and all the Reformers continued to insist on the traditional Christian virtues. In England, where the Reformation started with Henry VIII's desire for a divorce from Catherine of Aragon, divorce was not recognized as a generally available remedy until 1857. Parliamentary divorce remained a rarely obtained privilege of the top-group in the hierarchy of wealth.

Legal regulations of marriage is necessary for those incidents with respect to which society cannot dispense with rules more clearly defined than the more general principles of religion or morality, or where authoritative determination is necessary in the interest of the community. The latter need exists especially with respect to the determination of the beginning and the termination of the marriage relation, whose existence or non-existence is determinative for such numerous and various problems as the existence of inheritance and dower rights, the legitimacy of the offspring, venue of the wife in civil law suits, liabilities of the parties to contract and tort creditors, the wife's domicil and so-called settlement, the children's and, frequently, the wife's nationality, the existence of community property rights, the extent of the parties' liability to income and other taxes, the existence of mutual rights of support, criminal liability for adultery and tort-liability for alienation of affections or criminal conversation (i.e., adultery), etc. Third parties must have a possibility of knowing whether two individuals are or are not married to each other and such possibility cannot be afforded by any type of regulation other than that of the law. Legal regulation is, furthermore, needed today for the enforcement of the social policies according to which certain marital unions are disapproved on ethical or medical grounds or upon grounds of racial policy, it is indispensible for the actualization of the principle which does not allow divorce except upon certain grave and narrowly defined reasons, for the enforcement of the mutual duties of support between husband and wife; and finally for the determination of conflicts about property rights that may arise between the spouses, or between one spouse and the kinship group of the other, or between the married couple and outside creditors. While most, but not all, of the property questions have long been taken care of by temporal authority, the more personal aspects of marriage were left to the jurisdiction of ecclesiastical courts until since the end of the religious wars, the co-existence in one state of several religious denominations, and, consequent thereto, the weakening of the influence of religion upon the masses, necessitated the replacement of ecclesiastical regulation of marriage by temporal legislation and jurisdiction. In the English colonies which were later to become the United States of America, jurisdiction of the ecclesiastical courts* of England was hardly recognized and temporal jurisdiction over marriage became firmly established. In the European continent, with the exception of Czarist Russia and the Balkan countries, marriage was secularized in the century following the French Revolution. In England the ecclesiastical courts were deprived of jurisdiction over matrimonial causes in 1857. In contrast to those numerous continental countries where a civil ceremony was made compulsory for the conclusion of marriage, in the United States and England, marriage before a minister of the Gospel is still optional with the parties. 19 of the United States have even preserved the anachronism of marriage without any initiating ceremony, so-called Common Law marriage.

The most conspicuous trend in the development of marriage in Western civilization is what may be called its individualization. Ever since the period of the Troubadours the ideal of marriage as a union based upon romantic love and entered for the purpose of achieving the parties' individual happiness through the fulfillment of such love has slowly and gradually replaced the older notion of marriage as an arrangement not so much between two individuals as between two families. The most radical actualization of this romantic notion of marriage has taken place in the United States, where the idea that marriage is primarily a means toward the achievement of individual happiness has resulted in the highest divorce rate on earth. Since 1932 about one out of every six marriages has ended in divorce. In 1935 divorce rates per 1000 population were as follows United States, 1.710, Denmark, .809; Germany, .752, Japan .701, France, .501, Sweden, .434; Norway, .313; England, .100, Scotland, .101; Canada, .126.

The Soviet Union which, upon the basis of Marxist theories, started out upon its existence with a similar individualistic notion of marriage, has in recent years veered toward the more rigid conception of marriage constituting a service to the community which, if necessary, may be entitled to ask for the sacrifice of individual happiness to its higher aims.

The individualization of marriage has also found expression in the changed position of the wife. Older social and legal conceptions recognized that the basic social unit is not the individual but the family. In ancient Rome the law of the state in most respects did not deal with individuals at all but with households represented by their heads, the paterfamilias. In a similar way English Common Law only dealt with the husband-father in whose person the wife was regarded as legally merged. Such notions became intolerable with the social emancipation of women in the 19th century. However, instead of constituting the family as a unit with two equal managers the English and American Married Women's Acts brought about a situation in which husband and wife are regarded as almost complete strangers to each other as far as property relations are concerned. Only nine states in the Southwest and Far West, following continental European models, have adopted various systems of community property, under which marriage appears as constituting a sort of co-partnership between two equal partners.

Among some sociologists it has become fashionable to speak of a breakdown of marriage and the family. Undeniably the family has lost numerous of its former functions in consequence of the Industrial Revolution and the urbanization of large masses of the people. However, in spite of modern techniques of birth-control, monogamous marriage continues to constitute the only socially recognized type of sex relation and no other solution has so far been offered for the continuing needs of a companionship lasting from early love through the vicissitudes of life into the days of grey hair, of a relation founded upon absolute stability and mutual reliance, and of a home for parents and offspring that always constitutes a heaven of confidence and refuge in an unstable world. The family is still the basic social unit of consumption, to a large extent the unit of recreation and in important respect, even still a unit of production. In spite of rising divorce rates and falling birth rates, marriage continues for the majority of the people to be a union "in sickness and in health, for better or for worse, until death do us part." See child marriage; consanguinity, divorce, double standard of morals; endogamy, exogamy; family; infidelity; illegitimacy; levirate marriage, marital impediments; matriarchal system; motherhood, ne temere, patriarchal system; polyandry, polygamy; polygany, tempus clausum; woman, religious and ethical status of, widows, treatment of.

Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, Commission on the Church and Social Service, Committee on Marriage and the Home, Ideals of Love and Marriage (1932), Pius XI, Encyclical on Christian Marriage (Casti Connubii), (1931); Bertrand Russell, Marriage and Morals (1929) (a radical attack upon traditional attitudes), Lowie, Art. "Marriage," vol. 10 Enc. Soc. Sci. p. 154 (with extensive bibliography), Library of Congress, Division of Bibliography, Marriage and Divorce. A Selected Bibliography (1940); K. Llewellyn, Behind the Law of Marriage and Divorce, Columbia Law Rev. (1932-33) Vol. 32., p. 1281 and Vol. 35 p. 249.   M.Rh.

Mars: (Lat. Mars, the gleaming one) In the earliest times, an agricultural divinity (whence the month March), developing with the city-state into a god of war. The low land in the bend of the Tiber, where his altar stood, bore his name, the Campus Martius. He was identified with the Greek Ares. Hence the old translation, Mars Hill for Areopagus, in Acts xvii·22.   E.M.N.

Marsh, James (1794-1847) James Marsh was born in Hartford, Vt., graduated from Dartmouth College, studied at Andover Seminary (where he devoted himself especially to the study of Plato, Kant and Coleridge). He was elected President of the University of Vermont in 1826, resigned in 1833 to take the chair of Philosophy in whose occupancy he exerted marked influence.

Marsh introduced the philosophy of Coleridge* in America by the publication of Aids to Reflection, with a Preliminary Essay (1829), a work which had a profound liberalizing and vitalizing effect upon religious thought through Bushnell* and others. He also published a translation of Herder's The Spirit of Hebrew Poetry (1833).

A Memoir of James Marsh by Joseph Torrey (1843, 2nd ed., 1845) contains "Remarks on Psychology," "Discourse on the Nature, Ground and Origin of Sin" and other of Marsh's productions. Cf John Dewey, "James Marsh and American Philosophy," Journal of the History of Ideas, Vol. II, No. 2.   J.W.B.

Marshman, Joshua (1768-1837) For seven years refused membership in Baptist Church because of "head knowledge." Associate of Carey and Ward in the Serampore mission. 1813, drew up first organized plan for establishment of schools in India.   C.H.M.

Marsilius of Padua: (Marsiglio Mainardino) Born 1275-80, died 1343. He studied and practiced medicine in Padua c. 1311, was rector of the University of Paris Dec. 1312-Mar. 1313, later Canon of the Cathedral of Padua. A protégé of John XXII*, he was converted to Ghibellinism*, and with John of Jandum* authored Defensor Pacis, published 1324. (Edited by C. W. Previté-Orton, Cambridge, 1928). Both condemned as heretics, they fled to court of Lewis IV, and helped Lewis put the principles of their book into practice in the short-lived "Roman Revolution".

Marsilius also wrote Defensor Minor, Tractatus de iurisdictione imperatores in caussis matrimonialibus and Tractatus de translatione imperii. (Appendix ad Fasciculum Rerum . . . ab Ortuino Gratio, T. secundus,* London MDCXC).   Q.B.

Martensen, Hans Lassen: (1808-1884) Bishop, dogmatician, and moral philosopher of the Lutheran Church of Denmark. Professing to be a confessional Lutheran, Martensen was an original speculative thinker, combining influences from the idealism of Hegel, the theosophy of Franz von Baader, and the mysticism of Jakob Böhme. Over against Kierkegaard, he sought to harmonize Christianity with the human search for value.

Principal works: Christian Dogmatics (1849), and Christian Ethics (1878). See neo-Lutheranism
                                               T.A.K.

Martianus Capella: (flourished between 400 and 439) Martianus Capella of Carthage was not a Christian, yet his works exerted a tremendous influence upon the Middle Ages. In his De Nuptiis Mercurii et Philologiae, he first distinguished the "seven liberal arts" and gave us the earliest full compendium of the studies taught in his days. This book is acknowledged to be the first attempt to classify human intellectual enterprise and was often commented upon. Notker Labeo in the eleventh century translated it into German. S.C.T.

Martin, Gregory: See Bible, English.

Martin of Tours, St.: (c. 316-399) Simple, noble, and scrupulously just, he was born of pagan parents and was baptized at the age of twenty. Elected bishop of Tours, he destroyed pagan temples, uprooted superstitions, and fought against Arianism. Legend tells of a cloak he gave to a beggar, and of his subsequent vision from heaven. Founded the first monastery in Gaul.   w.h.

Martineau, James: (1805-1900) Preacher and Prof. of Phil. at Manchester New College, timely and staunch defender of philosophy against a narrow, unempirical theology and a mechanistic interpretation of evolution. A strong exponent of moral experience as independent data for a complete philosophical view. His natural and ethical theism, inspired by religious experience, rationally depends on the Design which, immanent in Nature and especially reflected in man's conscience, indicates that the cosmic Will is intelligent, omnipotent, and moral. See Unitarianism.

Types of Ethical Theory (1889), 2 vols, 3rd ed.; The Study of Religion (1889), 2 vols., 2nd ed martyr: (Gr. martus,—Aedic dialect—martyr, a witness) 1) One who suffers persecution for his faith, martyrdom to undergo torture or death for religious convictions. 2) The Martyrs, as such, are commonly understood to be the victims of the Roman persecutions during the first three centuries of the Church. Their relics* were the first to be venerated and churches were erected in their honor. 3) The martyrs in the primitive Church also connoted those who suffered in any way or were noteworthy confessors of their faith, irrespective of actual death. See intercession.

P.A.B.

J.F.T.

martyrology: An historical record listing the martyrs and/or saints, generally with a brief note on each, whose feasts or commemorations are celebrated in the Roman Catholic Church throughout the days of the liturgical year; it is read as a part of the choral office of Prime*. See Sylvester, I.   J.F.T.

Maruts: Minor storm gods of Vedic Hinduism associated closely with Indra. They are the sons of Rudra and at times are called Rudras.

C.S.B.

Marx, Karl: (1818-1883) M. proceeded from Hegel* whose metaphysics, however, he never really accepted, gradually transforming it into its very opposite. He believed himself to be the messenger of a new social Gospel* for the propagation of which he wrote all his books and pamphlets. He was accordingly not so much a philosopher but rather a political reformer. This fact is veiled by his peculiar theory derived from the Hegelian philosophy of history concerning the necessity of historical development. Like Hegel M. held that this development is ruled by a principle that can be known. But whereas the principle in Hegel's philosophy was spiritual, M. is of the opinion that material, i.e., the economic conditions regulate and determine the course of history. This is the position of the so-called "historical materialism".

The influence of M. and Marxism upon the political development of the 19th and 20th centuries is obvious, although the belief in the accuracy of his theory and of his predictions has decreased.

See bourgeoisie, dialectic; Jewish socialism; proletariat; socialism.

Dissertation (1841), Kritik der Hegelschen Rechts philosophie (1843), Das Kommunistische Manifest (1847); Das Kapital (1867 ff), Karl Lowith, Von Hegel bis Nietzsche (1941), B. Croce, Historical Materialism and the Economics of Karl Marx (tr. by C M Meredith, introd. by A. D. Lindsay, 1922).   R.K.

Mary, cult of: Technically St. Mary does not receive latreia (worship), which is due to God alone, but hyperdulia (adoration), the highest degree of dulia (veneration), which may be offered to the saints. Popularly this distinction has not always been observed. Beginning in the very earliest days of Christianity, deriving from the church's desire to safeguard the orthodox doctrine of the Deity of Jesus Christ and to maintain a human mediator before the Godhead, as well as from pagan goddess-worship, the adoration of Mary has grown with the passing years. The Middle Ages saw the development of the Rosary* and the Angelus*. In modern times Saturdays have been given to the recitation of the Little Office, the month of May is dedicated to Mary, and sodalities* of the Blessed Virgin have been established. In the early nineteenth century the devotion of the Miraculous Medal began and the decree of Pius IX* defining the dogma of the Immaculate Conception* (1854) and the apparitions at Lourdes* (1858) have caused the cult to increase immeasurably. Protestantism naturally rejects this practice. See mariology; mariolatry, Virgin Mary.   A.C.

Mary, the Virgin: See mariolatry; Virgin Mary.

Mary's Day: See Sabbatine privilege.

Masorah: (Hebr.; deriv. uncertain, usually: tradition, from root m-s-r, to hand down) The work of so-called Masoretes, men who were piously intent upon preserving unchanged the text of the Hebrew Bible, and who, accordingly, provided it with vowel points and with copious annotations. These notes, written on the margins and at the end of MSS, are not critical or exegetical but merely describe what was, according to the masoretic tradition, the correct form of the text. For the most part they are enumerations of the occurrences of words or concern their proper orthography. The Masorah accumulated from c. 500 to c. 1100.   S.H.B.

mass: (Lat. missa) The Christian eucharist; since the reformation referring only to the Roman Catholic service. The text is liturgical, the part which changes according to the season is called the Proper, the part which remains the same is called the Ordinary. The latter consists of kyrie, gloria, credo, sanctus et benedictus, and agnus dei. Low mass is spoken, whereas High mass is sung throughout. It is known as solemn mass when officiating priest, deacon and subdeacon all take part. The music for the mass may be in any style of composition from the early Christian plainsong* to the many types of polyphony* to the present harmony*. Composers are known as early as Guillaume de Machaut in the polyphonic period of the 14th century. The following century saw the introduction into the mass of secular elements such as popular folk-tunes used polyphonically with the Gregorian* song, and various technical devices without religious or musical value merely for the sake of experimentation or amusement. The impurities were purged at the time of the Council of Trent*, 1545-1563, when the polyphony of Palestrina was held up as a model for sacred composition.

Masses of the Neapolitan operatic style of the 17th century followed a liturgical text but introduced a style of music as secular as the melodramatic opera of the period. Dominating the 18th century was the great B Minor Mass of Bach. Too long for liturgical use, at places with an untraditional text, the work, consisting of great choral fugues, elaborately ornamented arias, and orchestral accompaniment, is generally accepted as the greatest choral work ever written. The mass is here conceived as a great art-form, religious in its devout emotional concepts, like a great oratorio*. See liturgy; requiem.

E. K. Chambers, The Medieval Stage (1903); R. R. Terry, The Music of the Roman Rite (1931); G. Reese, Music in the Middle Ages (1940).

E.H.B.

mass, Anglican and Lutheran: The word "mass" as a name for the Eucharist was retained by Luther (cf. his liturgical experiments, Formula Missae, 1523, and Deutsche Messe, 1526), and in the first English Prayer Book, 1549. It has survived in Scandinavia, but with changes in usage, e.g., in Sweden the morning service, with or without Communion, is Högmässa (High Mass). In England the term dropped out of use, except as preserved in such terms as Christmas, Michaelmas, etc. Since the Oxford Movement* it has been revived among Anglo-Catholics*, and is used approximately as among Roman Catholics.

E.R.H.

mass, Roman Catholic: In the Roman Catholic Church, the Eucharistic Sacrifice of the New Law, instituted, together with the priesthood for its offering, by Christ at the Last Supper, as the representation and memorial of His death (Matt. 26:26-28; Mark 14 22-24, Luke 22:19-20; cf. I Cor. 11:23-26). The Mass is organically related to Catholic soteriology*, which teaches that Jesus Christ, the Word Incarnate, was essentially Priest, and that His death on the Cross was a genuine sacrifice, whereby mankind as a unit was objectively redeemed, since the sacrifice was offered by Christ as Head of humanity, in whom all men were objectively represented; that, consequently, His sacrifice was all-sufficing in its redemptive efficacy, but not sole-sufficing, since its efficacy needs to be communicated and applied, by means authoritatively determined by Christ Himself, chief among which is the Eucharistic Sacrifice, the center and source of Catholic personal and corporate life.

Its institution was a fulfillment of ancient prophecy (Mal. 1:11; cf. 3:3; Isai. 66:21). It was in harmony with the native exigence of man's dual nature for sacrifice, i.e., for the social and liturgical expression, by a pragmatic oblation of a sensible thing, of the unique interior sentiments of adoration, thanksgiving, and propitiation which man owes to God (St. Thomas, Summa Theol., II-II, q. 85). It was especially congruous with the relation of solidarity that obtains between Christ and His Church as He was essentially Priest, and as His supremely self-expressive act was a sacrifice, He willed that the Body of which He is Head should be essentially priestly by participation of His Priesthood, and that its central religious act, as a Body, should be a sacrifice, the memorial and mystical renewal of His own.

Against this background the Roman Catholic Church has always taught, first, that the Mass is not a simple rite of commemoration, purely psychological in its effects, but a true and proper sacrifice, offered by the sacerdotal Body of the Church as a unitary whole, but acting through an ordained priesthood; secondly, that the Mass is not an independent sacrifice, but is wholly relative to the one-offered and definitive sacrifice of Christ, with which it forms a unity· "there is one and the same victim, and He who offers now by the ministry of priests is identically He who then offered Himself on the Cross; only the manner of offering is different" (Council of Trent, sess. 7, chap. 2). Because it is a real sacrifice, the Mass has a real latreutic, eucharistic, and propitiatory value, available for the faithful, both living and dead. Because it is the same sacrifice as that of the Cross, whence all its value derives, the Mass does not derogate from the all-sufficiency of Christ's redemptive act. Moreover, this inner relation of unity between the Mass and the Cross explains the efficacy of the Mass ex opere operato (see opus operatum). The Mass has also a value ex opere operantis, which is proportioned to the sanctity of the Church, and to the devotion of the celebrant and the assistant faithful.

The essential rite of the Mass is that of the Supper—a mystical immolation, which is at the same time a real pragmatic oblation, of the Body and Blood of Christ to the Father, as a Victim for the world's sin. The immolation is mystical inasmuch as the separate consecration of bread and wine symbolizes the shedding of the Blood. The oblation is real inasmuch as the Body and Blood of Christ are really present under the sacramental species, and are therefore really presented to God in their symbolic state of death. The interior spiritual significance of the rite is the penitent and loving self-dedication of the Body of Christ as a unit, and in union with its Head, to the Father. By the Mass the Church actualizes in the present the oblation once made for it on the Cross, and imbibes the power of that oblation.

Pertaining to the integrity, if not to the essence, of the sacrifice is the Communion of the faithful, or at least of the priest. Thereby the Host*, offered by the Church to God, is given back, as it were, by Him to her members, effectively to communicate to them its own sanctity, and to be the efficacious sign of their unity as the one Body of Christ (cf. I Cor. 10:17).

After the example of Christ's own prayer of praise and thanksgiving (Mark 14:22), the Church from earliest times provided the sacrifice with a liturgical setting. At first, fluidity and improvisation, within the framework of the Supper rite, were permitted. Comparatively early, however, forms were fixed. Toward the end of the fourth century strong differentiation set in between Western and Eastern liturgy. In the East two mother-liturgies are distinguished, the Syrian and the Egyptian, whence have developed a rich variety of rites, among which today the Byzantine* is dominant. The West now almost universally follows the Roman rite, its development took place between the fourth and seventh centuries, and it has since been altered but slightly. It has four progressively simpler forms—Pontifical, Solemn, Sung, and Low Mass. In all rites the same two primitive divisions of the Mass are still discernible 1) the Mass of the catechumens, a preparatory service of prayer and readings from Scripture, 2) the Mass of the faithful, in which the sacrifice itself is enacted amid a solemn setting of prayer, and is followed by the Communion, thanksgiving, and dismissal.

The Protestant tradition as a whole rejects the sacrificial character of the Eucharist, together with the Real Presence* and the ecclesiastical priesthood, its essential correlates. Orthodox Lutheranism and Calvinism regarded the Mass as subversive of the uniqueness of Christ's Priesthood and sacrifice, whose merits are applied by faith alone. Liberal Protestantism more radically excludes ritual sacrifice as a Christian act by its exclusive emphasis on the prophetic and exemplary character of Christ's redemptive function, to the exclusion of His priestly mediation, which is regarded as an ecclesiastical innovation, whose origins are variously explained. See eucharist; liturgy, Missal, Roman; pontifical mass.

Doctrine: H. J. Schroeder, Canons and Decrees of the Council of Trent (1941); F. Prat, Theology of St. Paul (1938), 2 vols.; M. Lepin, L'Idée du sacrifice de la messe d'après les théologiens depuis l'origine jusqu'à nos jours (1926); M. de la Taille, Mysterium Fidei (1924), idem, Mystery of Faith and Human Opinion (1930); E. C. Messenger, The Reformation, the Mass, and the Priesthood (1936), 2 vols.

Liturgy: L. Duchesne, Christian Worship, Its Origin and Evolution (1923); A. Fortescue, The Mass, a Study of the Roman Liturgy (1937); F E. Brightman, Liturgies Eastern and Western, I (1895); J. M. Hannsens, Institutiones Liturgicae (1930), II, III: De Missa rituum orientalium.

Rubrics· J. O'Connell, The Celebration of Mass (1941), 3 vols.   J.C.M.

Massoretic Hebrew text: See Masorah; versions of the Bible, ancient.

materia: This Latin word, coined evidently from mater, mother, clearly indicates the source of origin, that out of which something arises. It is a translation of the Greek hyle, a word which in the earliest Greek speculation was a living source out of which things arise. The English word "stuff" comes quite close to this ancient Greek meaning. Whether Plato's chora was abstract space or a stuff-like substratum, is not very easy to decide. Aristotle* differentiates first and second matter. First matter is universal potentiality to become actualized by the infiltration of forms. Second matter is something, an actualized potentiality, which is called matter, raw material, with reference to a new form, for instance the idea of a boat to be inserted in the second matter of lumber. See matter.   S.C.T.

material cause: See cause.

materialism: See Charvakas; dialectic; Gassendi; historical materialism; Hobbes, Holbach, Lokayatas, ontology; socialism. See also s.v. naturalism.

Mathews, Shailer: (1863-1941) Prominent Baptist, dean of the Divinity School, University of Chicago, 1908-33; president, Federal Council of the Churches of Christ, 1912-16; president, Northern Baptist Convention, 1915, editor, Biblical World, 1913-20.

Mathews was one of the early and most influential exponents of the "social gospel"* which sought to give a social interpretation to Christianity, and of the modernist point of view which sought to bring religion and science together in the interest of constructing a tenable world-view. He also was active in the founding of the Religious Education Association, pioneered along new paths for theological education, and gave life-long service to the cause of Christian unity, both local and ecumenical, stressing the necessity for a practical rather than a theological approach for its ultimate realization. The catholicity of his interest is indicated by the fact that he taught successively rhetoric, history, political economy, N. T. interpretation, systematic theology, and historical and comparative theology.

His more important published works are: The Social Teachings of Jesus (1897); A History of New Testament Times in Palestine (1899); The Messianic Hope in the New Testament (1905); The Church and the Changing Order (1907), The Social Gospel (1909), The Gospel and the Modern Man (1909); Scientific Management in the Churches (1911), The Individual and the Social Gospel (1914); The Spiritual Interpretation of History (1916); The Validity of American Ideals (1922); The Faith of Modernism (1924); Jesus on Social Institutions (1928); The Atonement and the Social Process (1930), The Growth of the Idea of God (1931), Immortality and the Cosmic Process (1933); Christianity and Social Process (1934); Creative Christianity (1935); New Faith for Old—An Autobiography (1936); The Church and the Christian (1938); Is God Emeritus? (1940); "Theology as Group Belief" (autobiographical) in Contemporary American Theology (1933), vol. II, edited by Vergilius Ferm.

Mathews also edited· Dictionary of Religion and Ethics, with G B. Smith (1921); The Contributions of Science to Religion (1924).   W.S.H.

matins: (Lat. ad matutinum, at early morning) Original Latin name for Office said at dawn, later transferred to Night Office, previously called Vigils* or Nocturns*; also name of Anglican Morning Office (see Divine Office).   E.R.H.

matriarchal system: A system of social organization in which women are dominant and men subordinate in contrast to the patriarchal system* in which the opposite relationship prevails. Historically, the patriarchal system has universally prevailed, but in pre-literate cultures some evidence has been found which gives credence to the possibility that a matriarchal system may have existed in some cultures or might have preceded the patriarchal system later found in others. Generally the theory of the matriarchate as a prior development to the patriarchal system is linked to the theory of the origin of the family out of promiscuity. According to this view, the earliest family* relationships were those between mother and child, the father being either unknown or at least recognizing no responsibility for the care of the child. Under these conditions the mother was the all-important member of the family group, descent being traced through her, and as she became older exercising control not only over her immediate offspring but their offspring as well so long as they remained a part of the family group. As marriage* became an established institution, common ancestry would serve to draw together larger groupings of individuals related by blood to the matriarch who would direct the affairs of the large family and eventually with other matriarchs the affairs of a tribe.

Nowhere is there conclusive evidence of the existence of a matriarchal system of society, although there have been preliterate peoples whose social organization has approached such a pattern. Chief among these were the five tribes of the Iroquois Confederacy in which the chiefs constituting the Council of the League were selected by the matrons of the maternal families represented. Not only did these matrons have the power of selecting the chiefs composing the Council, but they might also depose them if the chiefs failed to carry out the wishes of the maternal families. But even in the Iroquois Confederacy authority was divested in a Council of men, the matriarchal character of the Confederacy deriving from the fact that the matrons of the maternal families controlled the affairs of the Confederacy through their right to choose and depose the chieftains.

Robert Briffault, The Mothers (1931); Alexander Goldenweiser, Early Civilization (1922); Lewis H. Morgan, Ancient Society (1878); Edward Westermarck, History of Human Marriage (London, 1921).
E.R.M.

matter: (Lat. *materia, materies, stuff, from mater, mother) In general, the substance of which anything consists (both materia and the Gr. hulé may mean wood or tree, the substance of much early construction). 1. In logic, the content of a proposition, as distinguished from its logical form. 2. In physics and materialistic* metaphysics, that which occupies space and moves in space; nonmental substance with attributes of extension and impenetrability. 3. In Aristotle, (indeterminate) potentiality, which, by being actualized, acquires form*. 4. In Kant, sensory content or quality, as distinguished from the forms of sensibility or categories of understanding.

See B. Russell, Analysis of Matter (1927).
E.S.B.

Matthew: (From an Aramaic word meaning "gift of God") One of the twelve. In the first Gospel described as "the publican" (10 3) and apparently confused with Levi (9 9, cf. Mark 2.14, Luke 5 27).

S.M.G.

Matthew, Gospel of: The Gospel in its ethical aspect, the richest presentation of Jesus as a teacher. Written perhaps ten years after Mark*, probably in Antioch, Matthew reproduces virtually everything in Mark except a small fraction, but casts Jesus' teaching into six sermons, the first of which, the Sermon on the Mount, ch. 5-7, remains the standard statement of Christian ethics. Matthew had other written sources for his gospel, especially for the teaching of Jesus. In the recent Fall of Jerusalem the evangelist saw the punishment of the Jews for their refusal of their Messiah*, which had led to the offering of the long promised salvation to all mankind. He seeks to show that the Jewish prophecies had been fulfilled in the work of Christ and the beginnings of the church, and so to establish the Jewish scriptures as a possession of the church. Church and synagogue were already in vigorous conflict, and Christian ethics are sharply defined against Jewish. The writer is, like Paul, Barnabas and Stephen, a Christian Jew of the Dispersion, but writes not for Jews but for the people of the Greek world. Renan called Matthew the most important book in the world. See Gospel and Gospels; logia, Synoptic Gospels.

B W. Bacon, Studies in Matthew (1930) A. H. McNeile, The Gospel according to St. Matthew (1915).
E.J.G.

Matthew of Janov: (b. before 1355, d. 1393) An outstanding Czech reformer. After studying in Prague, he went to Paris (1373) where he received M.A. degree. Returning to Prague, he became a member of the reform movement. Having been forbidden to preach, he engaged in writing his greatest work, Regulae veteris et novi testamenti.

V. Kybal, M. Matej z Janova (Praha, 1905).
M.S.

Maundy Thursday: The Thursday before Easter, the traditional observance of which includes not only the commemoration of the Last Supper and part of the Passion, but the foot-washing ceremony (hence probably the name, from the command, mandatum, found in John 13), the blessing of holy oils, and the reconciliation of public penitents.
E.R.H.

Maurice, John Frederic Denison: (1805-1872) English clergyman, theologian, and social reformer. Leader of the Broad Church movement, although he viewed the name "Broad Church" with misgiving. (See Broad Churchmen) Maurice was ordained in the Church of England* in 1834. He was profoundly convinced of the truth of the Fatherhood of God. All men are divinely created in Christ and all men are therefore the children of God even though they do not all know or obey that truth. Because of the publication in 1853 of his Theological Essays Maurice lost his professorship in Theology in King's College, London. He was a leader of the Christian Socialists and of the educational movements identified with the Working Men's College and Queen's College for Women. In 1866, he was appointed professor of moral philosophy at Cambridge. See social gospel.

Main works The Kingdom of Christ (1842); The Religions of the World (1847), Moral and Metaphysical Philosophy (1848), Theological Essays (1853), The Doctrine of Sacrifice (1854); The Conscience: Lectures on Casuistry (1868).

H.W.J.

Maurists: Reformed Benedictine congregation of France, officially approved by Gregory XV, 1621; allowed to lapse, 1818. Not entirely free from Jansenist ideas, it was noted for strict liturgical observance and brilliant scholarly achievements. Luc d'Achéry, Denys de Sainte-Marthe, Martin Bouquet, Jean Mabillon, et al., are Maurist names never to be forgotten in the realms of patrology, diplomatics, literary and ecclesiastical history.

A.C.

Maurus, Magnentius Rabanus: (784-856) Abbot of Fulda, 822-842, archbishop of Mainz, 847. Alcuin's student, Gottschalk's enemy, his encyclopedic learning (astronomy, grammar, Germanic philology, poetry) made him Praeceptor Germaniae.

A.C.

Maximus the Confessor: (580-622) Easily the most eminent theologian of the seventh century. For this reason he is also known as Maximus the Theologian. He specialized in the doctrine of the Incarnation, warring in particular against Monothelitism*.

W.H.

māyā: Best known as a Hindu philosophic term signifying in the Vedanta "illusion". There is but one real, Brahman-atman. The phenomenal world has no real existence. It is māyā, illusion which rises from āvidyā, or ignorance. The illusion disappears with the knowledge of the alone reality of Brahman-atman. He who attains this knowledge attains moksha, or salvation*.

Māyā is also found in the Rig-Veda where it means occult, mysterious, or supernatural power. Also it sometimes means cunning. Indra triumphs over Vritra through Māyā.

Māyā is also the name of the mother of the Buddha.

C.S.B.

Mazda: Name of two Iranian deities: 1) Before the sixth century B.C., in the Gathic period: Ahura (lord) Mazda (Wisdom) is a great, highly moralized and personified nature power; 2) Later, Mazda is a cosmic power, whose nature is akin to all human and non-human spiritual beings, and rules all.

F.L.P.

Mazdaism: Iranian religion which evolved about the fifth century B.C., succeeding the prophetism (Zoroastrianism)* of an earlier period; a body of doctrines and practices centering about the chief cosmic deity, Mazda. See Parsiism and Parsees (the only significant fragment and development of Mazdaism extant today).

J. C Archer, Faiths Men Live By (1934), Chap 12 (on the faith and practice of the Parsee), M. N. Dhalla, Zoroastrian Theology (1914), A. V. W. Jackson, Zoroastrian Studies (1928).

F.L.P.

Mazdak: A militant religious reformer of Persia, who, near the end of the fifth century A.D., led a socialistic reform movement against Mazdaism*. His heretical doctrines and practices, together with those of his followers, brought on bitter strife with the orthodox Mazdaens, which resulted in his own death, and almost complete extermination of his followers in the early part of the sixth century A.D.

F.L.P.

Mazzella, Camillo: (1833-1900) Italian Jesuit and Cardinal. He was professor of theology in the United States at Georgetown University and Woodstock College (1867-1878), and at the Gregorian University in Rome. His theological works are esteemed in Catholic circles, and he had a part in the revival of Thomism* sponsored by Leo XIII*.

E.A.R.

McCauley Memorial Lectureship, the Rev. Charles F.: Established in 1914 this course is given annually by a pastor on some practical subject relating to the ministry at the Theological Seminary of the Evangelical Reformed Church, Lancaster, Pennsylvania. Its capital sum is $1,000.

(Data furnished by the office of the President of the Seminary.)

V.F.

McDougall, William: See psychology, schools of.

McGiffert, Arthur Cushman (1861-1933) Brilliant American church historian, author, and administrator. Studied at Marburg and Berlin, pupil of Harnack. His monograph on the Apostles' Creed advocated a theory generally held until 1919 and by some today. His reputation attained by critical translation and commentary upon Church History of Eusebius, 1890. Instructor and professor at Lane Theological Seminary, 1888-1893, Union Theological Seminary, New York, 1893-1926 (pres. 1917-1926). Ordained to Presbyterian Ministry 1888, became Congregationalist, 1899, in consequence of Briggs-Smith controversy and publication of A History of Christianity in the Apostolic Age.

C.H.M.

McLaren, Alexander: (1826-1910) Noted Baptist preacher of Manchester, England. Ardent advocate of open membership.

W.S.H.

McNair Lectures, the John Calvin: Established in 1908 at the University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill, with a capital sum of $16,000.00 by John Calvin McNair. Their purpose is "to show the mutual bearing of science and religion upon each other and to prove the existence (as far as may be) of God from nature." These lectures (three in a series) are given once or twice in a period of four years and published by the University. Among those appearing on this lectureship are F. H. Smith, Presidents Patton, Jordan, Hadley, Vincent; John Dewey, Paul Shorey, Arthur Compton, R. A. Millikan.

(The above data furnished by the Dean of Administration of the University.)   v.f.

McTaggart, John Ellis: (1866-1925) An English philosopher noted for his interpretation of Hegel*, whom he claims to follow. Indebted to experience for the concept of being, McTaggart arrives by a process of a priori dialectic at a pluralistic idealism, according to which ultimate reality is not a single, central, timeless personal self but rather the complete system or society of eternal finite selves which are the differentiations of the Absolute. See neo-Hegelianism; pre-existence.

Main works· Studies in the Hegelian Dialectic (1896) ; Studies in Hegelian Cosmology (1901); Some Dogmas of Religion (1906) ; A Commentary on Hegel's Logic (1910) ; The Nature of Existence (1921).   H.W.J.

mean, Aristotelian: Virtue as the stage of balance or moderation between the two vices of excess and defect. For example, courage as a virtue is the mean between rashness and cowardice. The mean is not a fixed point but depends on the person and the circumstances involved. It therefore requires good judgment or what Aristotle calls "insight" to determine the Golden Mean (as Horace later called it) in any particular case.   J.E.N.

means: All New England Calvinists held that God was sovereign in man's regeneration. Old Calvinists* and later Taylorites (see Taylorism) held this sovereignty was preserved in "appointed means," i.e., that God's Spirit worked through the "means of grace" (Scripture reading, prayer, sermons, etc.), to renew the understanding which in turn inclined the heart or will from sin to holiness. Their opponents (Consistent Calvinists*, Tylerites) (see Tyler, Bennet) held that man was passive until the Spirit changed the heart, which in turn effected the "holy volition" or turning from sin to God which was conversion. See New England theology.

Moses Hemmenway, Seven Sermons On the Obligation and Encouragement of the Unregenerate to Labour for the Meat which Endureth to Everlasting Life (1767) ; Samuel Hopkins, The True State and Character of the Unregenerate . . . (1769) ; J Haroutunian, Piety Versus Moralism (1932) ; S. E. Mead, Nathaniel William Taylor (1942).   S.E.M.

Mecca: (Arabic Makkah) A city in central Arabia, the birthplace of Mohammed* and the chief sanctuary of Islam. As the object of annual pilgrimage, and the worship center to face in daily prayer it is the aspiration of every devoted Moslem. (See article on "Mecca" by D. S. Margoliouth in ERE, vol. viii, 511-514.) See Medina; Mohammedanism.   P.E.J.

Mechitarists: An Armenian monastic order, following the Benedictine rule, founded by Abbot Mechitar in 1712; the Mechitarists, whose mother house is at Venice, have been of great service to Armenian scholarship and literature as well as to the Armenian Catholic (Uniat) Church.   E.R.H.

medals, devotional: A flat metal (or plastic) disk, usually suspended about the neck, bearing a religious image of Christ, His mother, a saint, shrine, or mystery of religion, etc. The origin dates to the catacombs*, when they were apparently tolerated by the primitive Church to counteract the use of pagan amuleti (mentioned by Pliny). As mementoes they are mere signs of the prototypes to which due honor is accorded, and are blessed as such by clerics of the Roman Catholic Church; in themselves they have no merit, and to look upon them as talismans is rankest superstition. There are many kinds of medals, the most famous being that of St. Benedict, of the scapular, and the Miraculous Medal. The design of the last mentioned was said to have been revealed by the Mother of Christ in honor of her immaculate conception* in a vision granted to the Venerable Catherine Labouré in 1830; its name is due to the circumstances of its origin rather than to the miracles attributed to its pious use.   J.F.T.

medicine men: Medicine men were the religious officials of the Indian tribes of America. They were specialists in the techniques of healing, sorcery and divination*, custodians of sacred objects and masters of ceremonial lore. Their functions varied greatly with the different tribes. In some cases they were shamans, mediators between man and the spirit world, who acquired their healing power and superior knowledge through their control over or possession by spirits. The shaman* was a spirit specialist and had little relation to the social phases of religion. Among the tribes of higher culture, the medicine man assumed more priestly functions. In addition to being a ritual and practical healer, he was a seer and confessor, educator, leader of "medicine" societies, master of tribal ceremonials and dances, and religious prophet. Both shaman and medicine man were trained for their work and usually selected from a special family. The shaman qualified by a predisposition to ecstatic, trance states. The medicine man was the product of elaborate training and initiation. See death and burial practices.   A.E.H.

Medieval religious drama: See religious drama.

Medina: (Arabic for town, in contrast to the desert. Also known as Yathrib) The city to which Mohammed fled from Mecca*, where his rule was first accepted, and where he was finally buried. It was the political capital of Islam during the prophet's first three successors, and the seat of the first university. Visitation to Medina is considered a dutiful act, second only to the pilgrimage to Mecca. See hegira.   P.E.J.

meditation: In religious usage the reverent, intense and sustained contemplation of God or of some religious theme or ideal. It is a strenuous spiritual exercise requiring composure of mind, internal quietude, abstraction from sense and persistent concentration of attention. Its aim is the strengthening and elevation of the moral life through communion with God. It is an important form of devotion in the higher religions and is especially emphasized and practiced by the great mystics. See mysticism.   R.W.F.

Meditation School: See Buddhist Terminology.

meekness: That quality of spirit which is marked by peaceable temper, gentleness, self-respect without vanity, and patient submission to injury and offence without resentfulness or retaliation. It connotes not feebleness of will or easy compliance with wrong-doing, but rather that firm and constant mastery of oneself under provocation which springs from calm and trustful surrender to God's will and which accepts hard and perplexing experiences as a part of the discipline of the Christian life. It is a Christian virtue of primary importance. See humility. R.W.F.

meeting house style: See art, Christian, ecclesiastical.

Megillot: (Hebr. scrolls) The name given the five books Song of Songs, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, and Esther, included in the Hebrew Bible among the Hagiographa* and read in the Synagogue on Passover, Pentecost, the Ninth of Ab, Tabernacles and Purim, respectively.
                                                                    S.H.B.

Meir: Second century rabbi who prepared a systematic edition of traditional Jewish law and doctrine, which paved the way for the final edition of the Mishnah.*   B.Z.B.

Mekilta: (Aram. measures or rules of interpretation) 1) A Midrash of the school of Rabbi Ishmael (2nd cent.) on the legal portions of Ex. 12·1-23·19; 31.12-17; 35:1-3, consisting of nine tractates. Critical text and Eng. transl. J. Z. Lauterbach, 3 vols. (1933-35).
2) Mekilta of Rabbi Simeon ben Jochai, representing the school of R. Akiba, on Exodus, reconstructed by David Hoffmann, Frankfurt a.M. (1905).   S.S.C.

Melanchthon, Philip: (1497-1560) German Reformer and theologian. His appointment as professor at Wittenberg marked the breach with the old scholastic methods and the triumph of the new spirit. He early recognized the spiritual depth of Luther's message, and it was his task to reduce it to systematic form. He played an important part in the various controversies and conferences of the period, and his conciliatory spirit made him a central figure in discussions among the Protestant leaders and between the Protestants and the Catholics. His theological position was also a mediating one, and he gradually modified the more extreme of Luther's statements. His clear thought and his polished style gave him a distinctive place as the spokesman of the Lutheran movement. See adiaphoristic controversy; Augsburg Confession, common grace; Loci Communes; Philippists; synergism.   G.R.C.

Melchites: Originally those Christians of the patriarchates of Antioch, Jerusalem and Alexandria who accepted the dogmatic decisions of Chalcedon*. They comprised not only Greek and Hellenistic elements of the population but also, at least in Syria, important native groups. At present there are Catholic and Orthodox Melchites in Syria, and Orthodox Melchites in Egypt.
                                                                    E.A.R.

meliorism: (Lat., melior, better, comparative of bonum, good) The doctrine that the world is such that it may be improved by human effort and by the advance of evolution. The term, coined by George Eliot, was popularized by Sully in his Pessimism (1877). Connected with theories of progress and humanism on the one hand, and with the doctrine of a finite God* on the other. See moral optimism; optimism, pessimism.
                                                                    E.S.B.

Melito: Bishop of Sardis, in the Roman Province of Asia, in the second half of the 2nd century. A prolific writer (Eus. H. E. 4.26.2). One work ("On the Passion") has been recovered almost in its entirety in a papyrus ms. discovered in 1940.   S.M.G.

Melkite churches: See Eastern Orthodox churches.

melody: A succession of tones with a rhythmic aspect. Plainsong* is pure melody embodying rhythmic pulsation without meter and without harmonic suggestion. Polyphony* is the combination of melodies which, because of the combination, must assume meter, and also secondarily form harmonies*. Homophony, or harmony, gives emphasis to one melody supported by a succession of chords which secondarily may or may not produce other melodies.   E.H.B.

Melville, Andrew: (1545-1622) Distinguished Scottish scholar and defender of Presbyterianism*. After a brilliant period of study in Scotland, and a decade of study and teaching in France and Geneva, he returned to Scotland in 1575 and became successively Principal of Glasgow University and Principal of the new theological college at St. Andrews. He is better known however for his leadership in the fight against the royal efforts to establish Episcopalianism in Scotland, in which he took the extreme view that episcopacy was not merely inadvisable but positively unlawful. As a result, he was imprisoned, but spent the last eleven years of his life as a professor in Sedan, where he died in 1622.   A.K.R.

memento: (Lat. remember) Two commemorative prayers, each beginning with the word Memento, in the sacrifice of the Mass*, one of the living, made at the beginning of the canon, and the other of the dead, occurring soon after the consecration.   J.F.T.

memra: (Aram., word) A stereotype employed in the Targumim (Aramaic versions of the Bible) to avoid literal renditions that may disturb the religious sense of the readers. Wherever actions ascribed to God do not beseem His spiritual nature the Targumim use God's Memra (word), Yekara (glory) or Shekinta (Presence). Unlike the Logos in Philo and in John, these seemingly related terms never designated "a 'being' of any kind or in any sense, much less a personal being". (G. F. Moore, Judaism, I, 419). See shekinah.

s.s.C.

Men, the: The name popularly given to the leaders of certain fellowship meetings of an evangelistic character, which, led by laymen, characterized the religious life of the Scottish Highlands in the eighteenth century. The movement was highly emotional and fanatically orthodox.

A.K.R.

Menaion: See Menologion.

Mencius: See Chinese Terminology.

Mendelssohn, Moses: (1729-1786) Jewish philosopher, Bible translator and humanist who stands at the headwaters of the Enlightenment* and Emancipation period of German Jewry at the close of the 18th century, was born in Dessau, received a traditional Talmudic training in his early youth, but later acquired also a wide general education in science, philosophy, languages and literature. He came to be regarded in his day as a leader of German and European philosophic thought. His Phaedon (1767) on the immortality of the soul was the most widely read book of its day and won for the author the title of the "German Socrates". Mendelssohn advocated the absolute freedom of belief and the separation of Church and State. He defined Judaism in his work Jerusalem (1783) and elsewhere not as a revealed religion in the sense of a creed or a set of dogmas which is indispensible to salvation, but rather as a revealed legislation entrusted to Israel and binding upon the Jewish people for all times. Thus, while insisting upon absolute conformity in practice, he allowed for freedom in doctrine.

Mendelssohn sought to bring his people closer to the culture and civilization of his day and out of the intellectual, economic and political confinement of the Ghetto*. He translated the Pentateuch* into German (1778-83) and printed it in Hebrew characters with a Hebrew commentary ("Biur", in which other scholars, too, collaborated) which among other services, helped his co-religionists to acquire the German language and thus opened for them a highway to the culture of the Western World. Together with a number of friends, he founded the Hebrew periodical "Ha-Meassef" ("The Collector", 1784) which served, for a time, as the mouthpiece of the Enlightenment movement among the Jews of Germany ("Haskalah", "Aufklaerung"). This movement aimed to modernize the social and intellectual life of the Jews, to spread culture and secular learning among them, to revamp the curriculum of Jewish education and to stimulate the scientific study of the Hebrew language and literature.

Mendelssohn was the friend of many of the great literary and philosophic figures of his day especially of the eminent German poet and champion of tolerance, Gotthold Ephraim Lessing*. The latter used Mendelssohn as his model for the hero of his play, Nathan the Wise (1779). See Judaism, reform.

H. Walter, Moses Mendelssohn (1930), H. Graetz, History of the Jews, Vol. V, (Eng. trans.) Jew. Encycl. (1901-05) s.v. Moses Mendelssohn.

A.H.S.

Mendenhall Lectureship: Founded in 1913 at De Pauw University by the Rev. Marmaduke H. Mendenhall D.D., from whom a bequest of about $10,000 was received. Its purpose is to provide each year a series of lectures at the University on "the Divine Origin, Inspiration, and Authority of the Holy Scriptures". Among the lecturers have been E. H. Hughes, F. J. McConnell, W. H. P. Faunce, E. F. Tittle, J. R. Mott, C. R. Brown, A. C. Knudson, H. N. Wieman, Georgia Harkness, E. B. Marlatt, F. S. Hickman.

A.C.K.

Mendicant Orders: Religious fraternities pledged to renunciation of property, individually and in common, and subject, therefore, to the necessity of mendicancy or begging. Especially significant among such orders in the Middle Ages were the Franciscans, Dominicans, Augustinians, and Carmelites. Each of these, in its own way, within the area of common mendicant experience, utilized begging as a means to greater ends. Thus among the Franciscans, alms-gathering became a proving ground for humility and poverty of spirit as well as a supplement to labor as a means of livelihood. That Francis* never meant begging to obviate the necessity of manual labor is incontestable. Labor coupled with mendicancy made possible the liberation of the Friars Minor* from economic preoccupation to versatile social service. The Dominicans, likewise, utilized mendicancy as an aid to renunciation. Founded in 1216 by St. Dominic, the Order of Preachers dedicated itself to the salvation of souls through a ministry of scholarly studies, preaching, and missionary labors. As an aid to that end the Preachers adopted poverty and begging. Less rigid in their interpretation of renunciation than the Minors, they adapted the mendicant life to their own working genius. The Hermits of St. Augustine like the Order of Carmelites brought together existing eremitical associations into mendicant brotherhoods. In all of these orders mendicancy was employed as a useful means to the ends of religious vocation. See monasticism; Trinitarians.

A. Jessopp, The Coming of the Friars (London, 1928).

R.C.F.

mene, mene, tekel, upharsin: "The handwriting on the wall" at Belshazzar's feast, Dan. 5:5, 25-28; Aramaic, meaning "numbered, weighed, divided", interpreted by Daniel as a message of impending doom.

R.B.Y.S.

Menegoz, Eugene: (1838-1921) French theologian, colleague of Sabatier*. Known for his "fide-

ism"* and his views on miracles (Publications diverses, Vol. I, 1900). His nephew, Dr. Fernand Ménégoz, is the author of Le Problème de la Prière and other theological works. w.m.h.

Menno Simons: (1492-1559) Dutch Anabaptist from whom Mennonites* later took their name. Left priesthood of R. C. Church, became Anabaptist elder. His wisdom, moderation and spirituality steered movement away from fanaticism of extremists, gave it organization and direction. Writings gave statement of principal doctrines Stress on N.T. Rejected state church, religious persecution, infant baptism, oaths, the taking of life. k.h.c.

Mennonites: American Mennonites are directly descended from three sects which originated in the European Reformation the Swiss Brethren, Obenites, and Hutterites. Coming to America largely through immigration of members, each group continued to stress the particular beliefs of its European antecedent. All the Mennonites, however, adhered to antipedobaptist and antisacerdotal doctrines.

The larger groups of Mennonites in America are the Old Mennonites, General Conference Mennonites, Mennonite Brethren in Christ, Mennoniten Brüder Gemeinde, Reformed Mennonites, and Old Order Amish.

The Old Mennonites, tracing their beliefs to the Swiss Brethren, center in Lancaster County, Pennsylvania Stressing strict discipline, baptism by immersion of believers only, and widespread home missions, the movement is lead by an unsalaried lay-clergy. Besides the usual ordinances, they practice foot-washing, the anointing of the sick, and the kiss of charity. Their organ, the Gospel Herald, is issued at the publishing house in Scottdale, Pennsylvania. Goshen College in Goshen, Indiana, is the leading school. There are about 30,000 members, 8,000 of whom live in Lancaster County.

The General Conference Mennonites, a particularly progressive branch composed of German congregations West of the Mississippi, have dropped many of their former practices. Bethel College in Newton, Kansas, and Bluffton College in Bluffton, Ohio are their leading schools. The Mennonite, their journal, is published at the Mennonite Book Concern in Berne, Indiana. Present membership of this group exceeds 13,000.

The Mennonite Brethren in Christ, a very active group, has at present around 6,000 members. They baptize by immersion, have open communion, and practice foot-washing as an ordinance. Camp meetings of the Brethren are similar in character to those of some early American Methodists.

The Mennoniten Brüder Gemeinde is divided into two parts because of differing views on the subject of baptism. The larger branch (5,000 members) immerse the applicant for baptism forward, while the smaller (1,000 members) insist on backward immersion. The larger group publishes Die Zionsbote and supports Tabor College in Hillsboro, Kansas, as its school.

The Reformed Mennonites, also called Herrites, number 1700 members living mostly in Pennsylvania. Even in Mennonite circles, they are ultra-conservative.

The Old Order Amish, numbering over 4,500 members nationally, oppose all ritualism and closely follow N T. precepts Not allowing church buildings, as the first step in sacerdotalism, they meet in houses or barns. Services, conducted in German, take four hours Their apparel and houses are very plain, and carpets, curtains, and pictures are forbidden, as is insurance. Largest settlements are found in Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, and Ontario.

Besides the listed groups, several smaller bodies of Mennonites exist, such as the Huterites of South Dakota (see communistic settlements, religious), the Old Colony Churches of Saskatchewan, the Defenseless Mennonites, the Wisler Mennonites, and several others. Cf. Church of God as Organized By Christ; Dunkers, Menno Simons, River Brethren. See Confessions, Formal of the Christian Church, shunning.

F. Ellis and S Evans, History of Lancaster Co., Pa (n d). J. F Funk, The Mennonite Church and Her Accusers (1878) Melvin Gingerich, Mennonites of Iowa (1939). *H Krehbiel, Mennonite Church Statistics (1911) *Schaff Herzog, Encycl. (1910), p. 200 ff D Musser, Reformed Mennonite Church (1878). A. H. Newman, History of the Baptists, Amer. Ch. Hist. Ser., v 2, (1894). Cornelius Ris, Mennonite Articles of Faith (1904) *C H. Smith, Mennonites in America (1909, 2nd ed 1941) C H Smith, Menno Simons (1936). Luella Smith, The Mennonite Family in the Menn. Comm. (1938). John C. Wenger, Glimpses of Mennonite History (1940). Joseph W Yoder, Rosanna of the Amish (1940). (Imp. works starred). m.g.r.—w.w.s.

Menologion: The service-book of the Eastern Orthodox Church*. It frequently is used to designate the Menaeon, a twelve-volume collection of liturgical services, a volume for each month. More commonly it designates a shorter work comprising historical sketches of the saints of the day, or the tables of scriptural lessons. Lastly, the term is applied to collections of lives of saints.

Maltzew, Das Menologion (Berlin, 1900), 2 vols m.s.

menorah: The golden, seven-branched candelabrum in the tabernacle in the wilderness (Ex. 25.31-40, 37. 17-24) and in the Temple at Jerusalem (Zech. 4. 2-5, 10b-14). It stood at the far western end of the sanctuary, just in front of the holy of holies. In popular tradition the light of the Menorah symbolized the presence of God, the Shekinah*, within the Temple. Tradition told further that this light was never extinguished until the Shekinah voluntarily departed from the Temple, in anticipation of its impending destruction. In every synagogue, in imitation of the Temple, there are always one or two Menorahs upon the altar. Moreover, in Jewish thought and literature the flaming Menorah is a fitting and frequent symbol of the unquenchable and illuminating spirit of Judaism. j.m.

mental health: See mental hygiene; psychotherapy.

mental hygiene: Mental hygiene is that body of knowledge that is necessary to the maintenance of mental health. More broadly it includes also the promotion and good care and treatment for the mentally ill and mentally defective. The organized expression of mental hygiene dates from the publication by Clifford W. Beers of his experiences as a patient in a mental hospital in A Mind That Found Itself in 1908 (26th Printing, 1942). That same year the Connecticut Society for Mental Hygiene was founded and the following year the National Committee for Mental Hygiene.

From the beginning the movement has concerned itself with the improvement of conditions in mental hospitals. Surveys of hospitals and detention facilities (jails) have been conducted that have led to improved conditions. Commitment procedures and scientific processes have been studied in order, and those most in keeping with the needs of the patient have been promoted. The services of progressive states have been publicized in order that others might be impelled to make better provision. Surveys have been made in practically all states. In 1939 the United States Public Health Service assumed responsibility for making such studies and assisting states in improving hospital facilities.

From the beginning the mental hygiene movement has become more and more attentive to provision for early treatment and prevention. In view of the wider range of a preventive effort mental hygiene has drawn on many fields that have to do with relatively normal persons or those showing beginning disturbances of adjustment. It is recognized that the family doctor, minister, social worker, teacher, public health nurse and others not only see cases in their incipiency, but are in a position to deal with such cases early or to exercise preventive measures. It is recognized that prevention must come about through the refinement of the everyday services of these professions rather than through increase in the number of psychiatrists, although there is also a paucity of psychiatrists. It is significant that the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America* has provided clinical training in mental hospitals and clinics for men entering the ministry and that the other professional groups are more and more including mental hygiene in their professional curriculum. This same council has made a special study of the chaplaincy functions of mental hospitals.

It is evident then that mental hygiene cannot be formulated as a single program and made the responsibility of one professional group. It involves individualization of the client, pupil, communicant or patient in the work of the several respective professions, and the inclusion in professional training of the determinants of human behavior and the forces that may be appropriately used by each profession to promote mental health. Many university departments of psychiatry have developed a close working relation with departments of education, theology, social work, law and nursing. Special facilities have been set up at cross roads of life to assist those who are finding the complexities of life at these points overwhelming— the failing or bewildered college student, the ineffectual in industry, the inapt in the Army, the delinquent, the criminal, the broken family, the dependent child.

Many states have organized societies for mental hygiene. There are periodicals, Mental Hygiene and Understanding the Child, that serve as a medium of interchange between the various forces in the field, and a rich bibliography of books and pamphlets on the subject. Information on such matters is obtainable from The National Committee for Mental Hygiene, 1790 Broadway, New York, N. Y. See psychotherapy.

Albert Deutsch, The Mentally Ill in America A History of their Care and Treatment from Colonial Times (1937). G.S.S.

mental reservation: In casuistry the secret qualification of a statement, in the interests of justice or expediency, which alters materially its import to the hearer. The classical illustration is the man's reply to the murderers in search of a victim, "No one is concealed here," the man reserving to himself the clause, "of whom I can justly speak to men like yourselves." F.G.E.

mental science: See New Thought movement.

mentalism: See epistemology.

Mercersburg theology, the: A movement in philosophy and theology which took its rise, about 1836, in Marshall College and in the Theological Seminary of the German Reformed Church*, then located at Mercersburg, Pennsylvania. The leaders of this school of thought were Frederick A. Rauch, John W. Nevin, and Philip Schaff*, a gifted triumvirate of scholars. The three successive phases of the movement—philosophical, theological, and liturgical—were in close touch and in sympathy with the modern evangelical theology of Germany. It caused controversy and dissent, but it quickened the German Reformed Church to new activity, both in its thought and life. The issues that occasioned the Mercersburg Theology have been superseded, but its spirit and fruits have permanently enriched the denomination.

F. A. Rauch, Psychology (1846); J. W. Nevin, The Anxious Bench (1843); The Mystical Presence (1846). Philip Schaff, The Principle of Protestantism (1845); E. V. Gerhart, Institutes of the Christian Religion (1891), 2 vols.; The Mercersburg Review, vols. 1-12 (1849-60). T.F.H.

Mercier, Désiré Joseph Cardinal: Archbishop of Malines, Belgium, b. at Braine-l'Allend, 1851, and d. in Brussels, 1926. Eight years after his ordination in 1874, Père Mercier occupied the chair of Thomist philosophy at the Univ. of Louvain; under him the Scholastic philosophy of St. Thomas Aquinas was brilliantly systematized to meet modern requirements. Consecrated Archbishop of Malines and created a cardinal by Pius X* in 1906, he shortly became the outstanding figure in Belgian public and intellectual life, as his Pastoral Works, lectures, conferences, and addresses as president of the Belgian Royal Academy testify. After the invasion of Belgium in 1914

he emerged as a world-famous and highly articulate symbol of his country's unvanquished spirit. In 1924 began the Malines Conversations, his renowned attempt at establishing grounds for a unification of the Roman Catholic and Anglican Churches. He died a few days after the last inconclusive Conversation in January, 1926.

J.F.T.

Mercury: (Lat. Mercurius, from merx, trade) The old Roman god of traders and their wares, early identified with the Greek Hermes*, whose attributes, the broad hat and caduceus (herald's staff), he assumed, along with his functions of messenger to the gods and guide of the souls of the dead.

E.M.N.

mercy: An attitude of compassion and active, gracious beneficence expressed in forgiving helpfulness toward a wrong-doer. While it is an attitude appropriate only to an ethical superior it does not denote condescension but a loving-kindness which would restore the offender to complete fellowship through forgiveness and the mitigation if not omission of deserved punishment. In the Bible the mercy of God is a free, unconstrained expression of His love and is without stint or prejudice, being open to all men, worthy and unworthy alike. Christian theology does not regard God's mercy as incompatible with His righteous judgment but looks upon both as a living expression of His love as revealed in Christ whose atoning death reconciles the divine demands of mercy and justice In Christian ethics mercifulness in man is a part of the righteousness of the Kingdom and is called for as a grateful response to the mercy of God in which it finds its model and inspiration. The mercy of God is stressed also in Jewish and Mohammedan theology, both of which stem from Biblical teaching.

R.W.F.

mercy, seven works of: See seven works of mercy.

Mercy, Sisters of: See Sisters of Mercy.

merit: A certain credit for righteous acts that may be used to compensate for the demerits of sin. The term is closely associated with that of good works, i.e., praiseworthy religious acts or conduct which are believed to deserve reward, to evoke divine approval and to entitle one to salvation.* The idea of merit is akin to the religious efficacy which primitive peoples attribute to the proper performance of rites. The higher religions, Buddhism, Zoroastrianism, Judaism, Mohammedanism, and some forms of Christianity, have doctrines of merit which emphasize in varying degrees the ethical nature of religion and the moral value of good works. In Roman Catholicism the doctrine has undergone a complex development. Various attempts have been made to correlate it with the doctrines of grace* and of faith. The doctrine finally took form in the teaching that the value of good works is due to the power of grace infused into them through the sacraments in which the communicant participates under the official sanction and control of the Roman Church. It was held, further, that good works are "meritorious . . . of eternal life" and that salvation is a reward for merit. Luther revolted against this position as absolutely opposed to the Christian gospel which teaches that salvation is by faith alone. Protestantism as a whole agrees with the position of Luther, is opposed to any conception of earning salvation by merit, and regards good works, not as a condition of righteousness, but as the inherent fruits of faith that works by love. See Thesaurus meritorum. Cf. penance.

R.W.F

Merrick Lectures, The: Established in 1884 by President Frederick Merrick (Ohio Wesleyan, 1860-1873) and given annually at Ohio Wesleyan University, Delaware, Ohio. The capital sum is $10,000. The lectureship provides for a course of at least five lectures upon experimental and practical religion, the founder "believing that the Christian religion tends above all else to the elevation of the human race" and emphasizing its importance in institutions of learning. Recent lecturers have included Canon Charles E. Raven, Dr. E. F. Tittle, Bishop Bromley Oxnam; in 1942 the lectures formed a part of the international conference on Bases of a Just and Durable Peace and in 1943 a part of the conference on Christian Bases of World Order.

(Data from the Office of the President of the College.)

V.F.

Meru: A mountain according to Buddhist mythology, situated at the center of the earth which is regarded as a vast circular island. It is said to be 160,000 leagues high.

C.S.B.

Mesopotamian religions: The religion of the Akkadian-speaking Babylonians and Assyrians of the second and first millennia goes back, essentially unchanged, to that of the Sumerians, inhabitants of Southern Mesopotamia in remote antiquity. The following sketch, though drawing on material from all periods, aims most particularly to depict the form which this religion took before the final disappearance of its originators, the Sumerians.

The Sumerian lived in a world created by gods and existing for their benefit. These gods, huge eternal beings, could move through the universe at will and were vastly more powerful than man. In all other respects, however, in form and in mentality, they were exactly like man and had his physical needs: food, clothing, housing, etc. These needs they satisfied by exploiting the natural resources of the country, in which they formed the upper social stratum, the landed aristocracy. Below them, as their family, followers and servants, ranked minor gods, and at the bottom of the social ladder, as serf, villein or sharecropper on their estates, stood man.

The relations of the individual Sumerian to the gods were of a different nature. They reflected essentially the different relations of an individual in the family, and of an individual in the community. He stood in an intimate child-parent relation to one or another deity, usually a minor figure of the pantheon, his personal god. This deity would help him to success in his personal activities and would in general act as his patron before the higher gods. With the higher gods, on the other hand, man came in contact, as an individual, mainly in case of severe personal crisis, and his contacts were those of a subject with his lord, not of a son with his father. If he were attacked by lawless elements, the evil demons of pain and disease, only a powerful god could help, and Marduk* and his father Enki (Ea*) were usually willing to assist him. Similarly if he himself by breaking some taboo had angered a god he would approach him to do penance before him or he would approach another high god to ask the latter's mediation.

In the course of time all individual suffering tended to be linked to sin. Breaking of taboos, it was thought, alienated the personal god and only thus the individual became a prey to evil forces. This raised the question of individual ethics and the gods, and the problem of the just sufferer emerged. The Babylonians answered it by denying the absoluteness of human values: what seems right to man may be evil in the eyes of the gods. Thus even the just can have no rights, must throw himself entirely upon divine mercy.

The gods would help the individual in sickness and calamity, but not in death. "When the gods created man they assigned death to him, life they kept in their own hands " When death came to the individual he went down to "the great dwelling," a shadowy, dust-filled place under the earth. His status here depended upon such things as the manner of his death and burial, how many children he left behind, and the sacrifices offered on his grave. There is no trace of any belief that evil was punished, virtue rewarded, after death.

Except for the cases quoted, man's relations with the high gods were essentially as a member of the community to which he belonged. These gods owned the Sumerian cities and ruled them through human stewards of their own choice. The steward, the so-called ensi, received his orders from the city god by way of dreams and omens and carried out the domestic and foreign policy of the city accordingly. The god's residence was the temple in which he lived surrounded by his divine family, followers and servants. Under the divine servants worked human house-servants, preparing and serving the god's meals, the regular offerings, and keeping the house in order. Here were also the administrators charged with running the temple and the huge estate. And on that estate a large part of the city's human population earned their bread as the god's villeins or share-croppers.

The divine manor-lords of Sumer were organized in a state along primitive democratic lines. Supreme authority was vested in a general assembly which met each new year to make the decisions for the coming year. The decisions were written on the "tablet of fates" to be announced and carried out by the leaders of the assembly, An and Enlil. The assembly could delegate administrative functions to one of its members, who was given dictatorial powers as king of the gods. Simultaneously his steward on earth became overlord, king, of all the other cities in the country. Kingship was granted on a term and would be given now to one, now to another god, now held in abeyance.

The social aspect of the gods, though dominating the concept of divinity in historical times, does not exhaust it. Besides his functions as ruler and administrator of city and temple, each god had close and original connection with some phenomenon, some enduring element of man's physical and mental environment. A few of the most important deities may be listed as examples:

An (Akkadian Anum), "Heaven," is lord of the city Uruk, but also god of heaven. Enlil, "Lord Wind," lord of Nippur, is god of wind and storm. Enki (Akkadian Ea), "Lord Earth," lord of Eridu, is god of the earth and its sweet waters, also of profundity and wisdom. Ninhursag, "Lady Mountain," a mother goddess, is queen of Kesh and goddess of mountains. Utu (Akkadian Shamash), "Sun," owner of the cities Larsa and Sippar, is god of the sun and of justice. Nanna (Akkadian Sin), "Moon," ruler of Ur, is god of the moon. Inanna (Akkadian Eshtar, Ishtar), "The lady of heaven" whose cult-center is in Uruk, is goddess of the planet Venus and also goddess of war and of sexual love. Ningirsu, "Lord of the city Girsu"—worshiped in Nippur under the name Ninurta "Lord . . . "— is lord of Lagash, of which Girsu was a part, and also god of the thunder showers and floods of spring. Ishkur (Akkadian Adad) is lord of Muru and other cities and god of thunder and lightning. Marduk, "the hoe-spirit(?)," who as god of Babylon became the highest god of Babylonia in later times, seems originally to have been an agricultural god personifying the powers of the hoe. Dumuzi (Akkadian Tammuz), was god of the pasture. Nergal, lord of Kutha, whose original nature is not yet clear, and his spouse Ereshkigal, queen (of ?) the subsoil, were rulers of Hades.

There is ample evidence to indicate that this connection between god and phenomenon was once much closer. In prehistoric times, it would seem, the god was not merely an anthropomorphic being standing behind the phenomenon controlling it, but was actually the phenomenon itself, the specific powers which manifested themselves in it. Correspondingly we find traces of a different attitude toward them on the part of man, one which was not merely the passive obedience of the subject to his ruler but called for active intervention: man could in the cult enter into, clothe himself with, these powers, and thus by his own action bring the phenomenon to pass. This prehistoric attitude is alive in the great body of magical practices to which the Sumerians and Akkadians were addicted. More important, however, is the fact that it also underlies—perhaps even survives in—the great periodic cult festivals which formed the core and mainspring of the religious life in the agricultural and pastoral Sumerian community.

The divine marriage, one of the most widespread rites, may be exemplified by the ritual of the city Isin as celebrated there toward the close of the third millennium. In this city each new year the king took on the identity of the god Dumuzi, god of pastures and the new vegetation of spring, and as god he united sexually with the goddess Inanna, who was, we may assume, incarnated in some priestess. Thus, by a willed act of man, was achieved divine union and in it all-pervading, life-giving, recreative potency upon which depended not only "the life of all lands" but even the steady flow of days and the renewal of the moon each month through the coming new year.

Other highly important rites centered around the death and reappearance of vegetation in the spring. The best known are those belonging to the cult of Dumuzi and Inanna (Tammuz and Ishtar). Here again man acted in the cult to achieve his end: lamenting the god of vegetation who had died or disappeared, searching for him, and finally bringing him back.

Lastly there was the battle drama in which at the beginning of each new year the battle of the gods against the powers of chaos was refought, rewon, and the orderly world reconstituted This battle is reflected in many myths, of which the best known is enuma elish. It deals with the victory of Marduk (originally Enlil) over Kingu and Tiamat, the forces of primeval chaos, and with his subsequent organization of the world. In the cult this battle was refought symbolically; the king, taking on the identity of Marduk, vanquished Kingu by burning a lamb in which that deity was realized. Whether also other forms in which humans taking the identity of gods acted out the battle mimetically occurred is as yet not certain. See temples, Mesopotamian.

Bruno Meissner, Babylonien und Assyrien (Heidelberg, 1925), Vol. II, pp. 1-197; Edouard Dhorme, La Religion Assyro-Babylonienne, Conférences données à l'Institut Catholique de Paris, par le P. Paul Dhorme (Paris, 1910) ; Charles Francois Jean, La Religion Sumérienne d'après les documents antérieurs à la dynastie d'Isin (-2186), (Paris, 1931) ; Svend Aage Frederik Dichman Pallis, The Babylonian Akitu Festival (Copenhagen, 1926).   T.J.

Messalians: See Eu-chites.

Messiah (Heb.—Mashiach; Aramaic—Meshicha, hence the Grecized form "Messias" of the N.T.— anointed; Gr.—Christos) The word Messiah is not found in the O.T. as a proper name or as a technical term. There is no reference to "a Messiah" or to "the Messiah". As such it first appears in Apocalyptic literature* (Enoch 48.10, 52.4, Pss. Sol. 17.36; 18.6, 8, etc.) In the O.T. the term is applied to men, principally kings and high priests, whose consecration to their high office was symbolized by the ceremony of pouring oil on their heads. This rite gave them a unique, sacred and inviolable status and a certain divine afflatus. Sprinkling or smearing with oil sanctified also inanimate objects such as the altar, the ark, and the various paraphernalia of the Tabernacle* (Ex. 30.26; Lev. 8.10-11). (See anointing.)

Saul, David, Solomon, Jehu, and Jehoahaz are mentioned as having been anointed into kingship. Saul is designated "the Meshiach Yahweh"—the anointed of the Lord (I Sam. 24.6). In the Biblical writings of the Persian Period, when there were no longer kings over Israel, reference is made to the anointing of the high priests. (Ex. 29.7; Lev. 8.12). Prophets also are mentioned as having been anointed. (I K 19.16; Is. 61.1). In exilic and post-exilic times, the term came to have a wider use. Anyone designated by Yahweh for a special mission is said to have been anointed. Thus Deutero-Isaiah* speaks of Cyrus as "the anointed of the Lord" (Is. 45.1). One of the Psalms speaks of the patriarchs as "mine anointed" (Ps. 105.14). Because of their role in history as "a kingdom of priests and a holy nation" the Jewish people as a whole is frequently spoken of as God's anointed (Ps. 28.8; 84.10, 89.39, 52; Hab. 3.13· Ps. 2, probably also refers to the Jewish people as a whole).

In the centuries following the destruction of Judea (586 B.C.) the Jews entertained the hope of an early restoration of their independence and the re-establishment of the monarchy under a scion of the Davidic dynasty whose throne, according to the promise, would endure forever (II Sam. 7 16, Ps. 86.30). The prophets Haggai and Zechariah saw in Zerubbabel the possible fulfillment of this hope. The future king of the restored monarchy would of course be the Meshiach Yahweh—"the anointed of the Lord".

The prophets of Israel, in their exalted conception of a united and spiritually regenerated humanity, early projected the vision of the coming of the Great Day of the Lord, when God's kingdom would be universally established, His name proclaimed everywhere and Jerusalem acknowledged as the spiritual center of the world. This hope carried with it as a natural corollary also the hope of the ingathering of the people of Israel from all the lands of their dispersion, and the restoration of the kingdom under a descendant of David who would be a just and ideal ruler. Thus the political hope of a restored Jewish kingdom headed by a "Meshiach Yahweh" came to be associated with the prophetic and apocalyptic vision of a Kingdom of God in the End of Days.

The figure of the future Davidic ruler however was not for a long time central or even prominent in the picture of the future society, nor for that matter, was it always present. Furthermore, these prophetic anticipations touching the "End of Days" as well as the political "messianic" expectations never assumed the character of dogma or of articles of faith.

After the fall of the Maccabean dynasty, and especially after the Romans imposed their yoke upon the country in the second half of the first century, B.C., the longing for the coming of a personal Messiah assumed greater and greater prominence in the minds of the people and the hope of a universal Kingdom of God became more and more centered in the coming of a uniquely endowed Messiah of the stock of David who would break the alien yoke, restore Israel to its former greatness and independence, and with his coming, the New Order, the golden age of the world would begin. A colorful and quite inconsistent variety of eschatological notions came to be interwoven with the personality, mission and times of this Messiah. The intense expectations of the people reached their climax as the age approached the year 5000 of the Creation Calendar when, according to the popular belief of the day, there would be inaugurated the millennium—the thousand years of universal righteousness, blessedness and peace, after which the world would return again to its primal chaos. See Mahdi, pseudo-messiahs; redemption.

Joseph Klausner, The Messianic Idea in Israel (1927), (Hebrew); Julius H. Greenstone, The Messiah Idea in Jewish History (1906); Adolf Posnanski, Schiloh (1904), Hugo Gressmann, Der Messias (1929), Jew. Enc. (1901-05) s.v. Messiah.
         A.H.S.

messianic hope: Strictly the expectation of the coming and reign of the Messiah (lit., anointed), destined to deliver the Hebrew nation. In the O.T. the term Messiah is not a title limited to one specific figure destined to appear in the future for a specific purpose. Rather it is employed as an adjective modifying some noun expressed or understood. The normal phrase is "anointed of the Lord," and is used of various figures—kings, high priests, patriarchs, the nation as a whole, even Cyrus. As late as the days of Herod's temple, when the high priest was no longer actually anointed, he continued to bear the title "anointed high priest."

To continue to use the term "the Messianic hope" to describe the expectations of future blessedness to which all pious Jews in the days of Jesus were looking forward is doubly unfortunate. It suggests: 1) that there was but one such expectation, whereas the evidence makes certain that there were widely differing opinions, ranging all the way from a rigorous nationalism which awaited a political restoration of Israel with a scion of David once more seated on a temporal throne to the more vague and comfortable expectation that in the future all men everywhere would recognize Israel's God as supreme. 2) It shows into undue prominence the Messiah. Actually the expectation was for the age, not for the one who was to institute it. In large blocks of Hebrew thinking, notably the prophecy of the exile, there is no mention of such a figure. God alone is to be king. After the fall of Jerusalem (586 B.C.) the hope for the coming good time—the golden age—may well have gained a new lease of life. God could not so desert his people (see eschatology). Once the temple was rebuilt all would be well. The temple was rebuilt, but Israel's independence did not materialize. In those years of unrest and subjugation undoubtedly many viewed the golden age in terms of a restoration of the monarchy. But this nationalistic view was far from universal even then. Memories of the successors of David were far too vivid. And in subsequent years there were always many Jews—especially those in comfortable circumstances—who showed little enthusiasm for such a day to dawn. It smacked too much of revolution. Such apparently was the attitude of the Sadducees* in the days of Jesus. The experiences of the past century under the later Hasmonean* kings were still fresh. Alexander Jannæus had occupied the throne of David, but aside from breaking the heads of the heathen—one of the tasks of the coming ruler (Ps. 110)—his reign had done much to dampen enthusiasm for the "scion of David" When the golden age dawned, God, not any man, would be enthroned. In the second Christian century, decades after the destruction of Herod's temple, when it was rumored in Palestine that Jerusalem was to be turned into a pagan city, there was a distinct change of attitude, a devoted, if entirely mad, nationalism was for the moment revealed, and a Messianic aspirant, Bar Kokhba* ardently championed.

On the other hand, the nationalistic form of the hopes for the future, while far from being universally held, had never been banished. The Home Rule Party (styled by Josephus* the "fourth philosophy") continued to insist on political restoration and sought to foment rebellion against Rome, precisely as had their forbears against Persia. In addition to these variant opinions which may properly be styled Jewish was the whole apocalyptic fantasy of a cataclysmic end of the present evil age with a supernatural figure descending from heaven to institute a final judgment.* To what extent these originally alien ideas had been incorporated into Jewish thinking before the Christian era is uncertain. At any rate, it seems most unwise to lump together all the variant notes and emphases having to do with expectations for the future in the one fictitiously simple and misleading phrase "the Messianic hope." See also apocalypticism; eschatology; redemption, Son of man.

G F Moore, Judaism, 3 vols. (1927 and 1930); M. S. Enslin, Christian Beginnings (1938), pp. 138-143.   M.S.E.

metamorphosis: Shape-fitting or transformation on the part of various orders of being, animate and inanimate, believed to be due to witchcraft or magic. Belief in it is common at low levels of culture.   R.W.F.

metaphysics: (Gr., ta meta ta physika—the things after the Physics—the name given by Andronicus of Rhodes, ca. 63 B.C., to Aristotle's First Philosophy, which he, as editor, placed after Aristotle's Physics. Lat., metaphysica, first used as one word by Boethius in 6th cent. and popularized in 13th cent. by Averroes and others.) In general, the philosophical theory of reality as distinguished from the normative sciences (theory of ideals) and epistemology* (theory of knowledge).

1. The first philosophy, or theology, of Aristotle; the science of being as being, the theory of first principles and causes, especially of the good (Met., 982b, 9-10). 2. The rational science of the supersensuous or supernatural (transphysica, Albertus Magnus, St. Thomas; the immaterial, Descartes). 3. The science of formal and final causes (Bacon). 4. "The science of all that is possible, so far as it is possible" (Wolff, who subdivided it into ontology, rational cosmology, rational psychology, rational theology; axiology* is a recent addition). 5. Knowledge of the transcendent, or of things in themselves (rejected by Kant as dogmatic; accepted by Schopenhauer). 6. Knowledge a priori of the principles of pure reason presented in systematic unity (Kant). 7. Systematic interpretation of experience and its implications, as a whole (Schopenhauer, Hegel); this is the predominant usage since Hegel, except among the neo-scholastics. Metaphysics is concrete and inclusive, as distinguished from the sciences which are necessarily abstract and exclusive. Hegel's "panlogism" or identification of logic with metaphysics (as "the science of things apprehended in thoughts") presupposes and includes the results of the Phenomenology of Mind, the exposition of "the concrete forms of consciousness" (Enc., Sec. 24, 25). See Hegel, Hegelianism.

In the Soviet Encyclopaedia, metaphysics is defined as "a certain kind of ontology, namely, that kind which is committed to theological, mystical, or idealistic conceptions of a changeless, supernatural reality" (tr. Hollis).

In popular language the term "metaphysical" is used loosely to mean supersensuous, occult (Marlowe), obscure, mysterious, or (dubiously) theoretical.

See articles on metaphysics in the dictionaries of Baldwin, Lalande, Eisler, Runes, and Ferrater Mora; also Webster and Oxford. See ontology, reality.   E.S.B.

metempsychosis: See transmigration.

Methodism: The religious movement, which traces its origin to John Wesley (1703-1791) and in a minor degree to his brother Charles (1707-1788) and George Whitefield (1714-1770). The name "Methodists", as John Wesley tells us, was first given "by way of reproach" to three or four young men at Oxford in 1729 or shortly thereafter because of "the exact regularity of their lives as well as studies". Several years later, in 1738, when the Wesley brothers, Whitefield, and other members of the so-called "Holy Club" had become popular preachers, the name was revived and applied to them all and to their followers.

The "conversion" of John Wesley* or the extraordinary religious experience, that he had on May 24, 1738, marked the beginning of Methodism as a distinct and aggressive evangelistic movement. At the outset there was no thought of separation from the established church. But the course of events gradually made this inevitable, despite Wesley's long struggle against it. The official separation took place in America in 1784 with the organization of the Methodist Episcopal Church. In England it was still opposed by many. But after Wesley's death in 1791 and the adoption of a compromise measure in 1795, known as the Plan of Pacification, the separatist movement rapidly gained ascendancy and became the accepted policy of the Societies.

Methodism during Wesley's life-time was dominated by his strong personality, his organizing genius, his amazing evangelistic activities, and his intellectual leadership. Field preaching, lay preaching, sustained and militant religious zeal, and strict discipline characterized the movement, and awakened much opposition and not a little persecution. After Wesley's death the same crusading type of evangelism persisted and won extraordinary successes throughout the Anglo-Saxon world. A world-wide missionary activity was gradually inaugurated, and significant contributions were made to public life and morals. In its organization Methodism developed along two different lines, episcopal and non-episcopal, but in both its non-sacerdotal character remained intact. A number of schisms arose, but of late there has been a marked tendency toward reunion. The most important reunions were that of British Methodism in 1932 and that of the Methodist Episcopal Church, the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, and the Methodist Protestant Church in America in 1939. It may also be noted that in 1925 the Methodist Church of Canada united with the Congregational Churches, the Presbyterian Church and the local Union Churches in Western Canada to form the United Church of Canada.*

In its polity American Methodism is for the most part episcopalian. But its episcopacy is an "office", not an "order." It has no connection with the apostolical succession of the sacerdotal churches. Its validity is based on its efficiency. This is also true of the Methodist ecclesiastical system as a whole. It claims no divine sanction other than that growing out of its utility. The system is complex. In the new united "Methodist Church", for instance, the governing bodies consist in an ascending scale of Quarterly Conferences in the local churches, District Conferences, Annual Conferences, Jurisdictional and on the foreign field Central Conferences, and a General Conference. In all of these Conferences laymen are represented. The Bishops are elected by the Jurisdictional and Central Conferences. Together they form the Council of Bishops, which meets at least once a year. In this Council the Bishops from the Central Conferences are limited in their voting privileges "to matters relating to their respective Central Conferences." The chief function of the Bishops, aside from supervising their "areas", is the annual appointment or reappointment of pastors to the churches. In making these appointments their authority is being increasingly limited by the wishes of the local churches. Between the Bishops and pastors are the "District Superintendents," who might be described as sub-bishops. These three orders of the Methodist ministry are closely coordinated and give a high degree of unity to the church organization and its activities.

It is characteristic of Methodism that it has throughout its entire history laid emphasis on life rather than on doctrine. "As to all opinions which do not strike at the root of Christianity", said Wesley, "we think and let think." The only thing on which he insisted as a condition of membership in the Methodist Societies was "faith working by love". To precisely formulated theological opinions both he and his preachers for the most part "sat loose". Such theological laxity, one might have expected, would lead to dissension and schism. But the very reverse was the result. Wesleyan Methodism has had no schisms due directly or chiefly to doctrinal differences. Its emphasis on life and religious experience has produced a larger degree of doctrinal uniformity and of freedom from theological strife than would probably have been possible if stricter doctrinal standards had been adopted. The Welsh Calvinistic Methodists, it is true, broke with Wesley in 1770 on theological grounds, but they owed their origin and development as a separate denomination to Calvinistic teachers, among them Whitefield*, and never accepted Wesley's leadership.

The history of Methodist theology may be divided into two periods of unequal length. The dividing line may be drawn through the last quarter of the past century. Up to that time Methodist theology was on the whole "realistic" in its philosophical background, and authoritarian and rationalistic in its method. Since then it has become increasingly idealistic in its underlying philosophy, and in its method empirical and rational.

The first period covered about one hundred and fifty years. During the earlier part of it considerable attention was given by Wesley and his preachers to certain doctrines such as those of predestination, free-will, and Christian perfection. But comparatively little was done in the way of systematic theological study. Not until 1834, ninety-five years after the beginning of organized Methodism, was the decision reached in England to establish a Methodist theological seminary; and not until 1839, seventy-three years after what is commonly regarded as the beginning of American Methodism, was a similar decision reached in America. The first comprehensive Methodist treatise on systematic theology was written in England by Richard Watson in 1823-29, and the second by William Burt Pope in 1875-1880. In America two treatises of a similar character appeared in this period, one by Miner Raymond in 1877-79, and the other by John Miley in 1892-94. These four men did creditable work in systematizing Methodist doctrine. But they were not creative thinkers, they introduced no new theological method, they were guided by no new organizing principle, they gave no new direction to theological thought. They reflected for the most part the authoritarian standpoint of the current traditional evangelicalism.

The transition from the first to the second period was in large measure due to the widespread acceptance of the conclusions of biblical criticism and the consequent abandonment of the doctrine of biblical infallibility. This change from "fundamentalism"* to "modernism" was effected in Methodism with much less strife than in most of the other Protestant churches. One reason for this was the influence of Borden P. Bowne* (1847-1910), the greatest thinker that Methodism has produced. He was a philosopher rather than a theologian. But his philosophy was one of the theological type. And it was in the religious field, and especially in American Methodism, that he exercised his greatest influence. The American Methodist theologians of the present century, such as H. C. Sheldon (1845-1928), O. A. Curtis (1850-1918), F. J. McConnell (1871-), H. F Rall (1870-), Edwin Lewis (1881-), and A. C. Knudson (1873-) have been either directly or indirectly influenced by him. In his philosophy of personalism* Methodist philosophical theology has received its most fundamental and convincing expression, and with him a new era in the history of Methodist theology began,—an era in which theology has emancipated itself from the crude realism and authoritarianism of the past, and has grounded itself in the deepest insights of modern idealism.

In general it may be said that Methodist theology has been a mediating theology. It has avoided extremes. It has been openminded to new truth, and yet has adhered firmly to the universal tenets of Christianity. It has laid no claim to uniqueness or novelty. And yet in both its "explicit" and "implicit" form it has had a definite structure of its own, and has exercized a pervasive influence on Christian life and thought.

The explicit theology of Methodism has centered in the idea of human freedom (D. D. Whedon, The Freedom of the Will, 1864). It was the pronounced belief in real freedom, the freedom of contrary choice, that underlay Wesley's life-long polemic against Calvinism and his doctrine of Christian perfection. These two outstanding characteristics of his teaching marked a significant departure from the Reformation type of theology. They introduced into Protestantism a more ethical view of "faith" and a more activistic and humanistic conception of the Christian life.

The "implicit" theology of Methodism is to be found in its emphasis on religious experience. According to Wesley the only genuine religion is experienced religion. This insight not only led to a large degree of liberality in doctrinal matters, it had in itself the germ of a new empirical type of theology. Conditions favorable to the development of this germ did not exist in early Methodism. But Wesley did much to prepare the way in the Anglo-Saxon world for the modern empirical theology associated with the names of Schleiermacher (1768-1834) and Ritschl (1822-1889).

The following statistical table gives the present approximate membership of the main divisions of world-wide Methodism, including its foreign missions and the United Church of Canada:

I. The United States.
The Methodist Church	7,732,257
African Methodist Episcopal	650,000
African Methodist Episcopal Zion	414,244
Colored Methodist Episcopal	365,000
The Free Methodist	45,890
The Wesleyan Methodist	26,720
Other Smaller Methodist Churches	51,657
II. United Church of Canada	716,064
III. British Empire
Great Britain	1,264,493
Australasia	189,437
New Zealand	24,813
South Africa	303,148
IV. Mexico, Brazil, Korea, Japan	86,169
	11,869,892

See assurance; evangelicalism and Evangelical Revival, holiness churches; United Meth. Church. Wesley's Journal (stand. ed. by N. Curnock, 1909-16), Letters (stand. ed. by J. Telford, 1931), and Sermons (stand ed. by E. H. Sugden, 1922); J. S. Simon, John Wesley, 5 vols.; F. J. McConnell, John Wesley (1939); G. C. Cell, The Rediscovery of John Wesley (1935); Abel Stevens, History of Methodism (1858) and History of Methodist Episcopal Church (1864); Luccock and Hutchinson, The Story of Methodism (1926); Discipline of the Methodist Church (1940).   A.C.K.

Methodists, Calvinistic: See Calvinistic Methodists.

Methodius: (d. c. 311 A.D.) A bishop in Lycia, Asia Minor. Wrote in support of voluntary celibacy. Opposed Origen's* doctrines of eternal creation, of the body as a fetter of the soul, of pre-existence, and of the immateriality of the resurrection body. Martyred in the Diocletian persecution.   A.K.R.

metropolitan: (Gr. metropolis, city) 1) In the Roman Catholic Church the title and rank added to that of an archbishop who presides over at least one suffragan (or supporting) see, other than his own, in a defined territory or province. A metropolitan must summon his suffragan bishops at least once every twenty years, and appeals from their courts are subject to his; but his right of interference in the dioceses of his suffragans is strictly limited by law.

2) In the Eastern churches, both Catholic and dissident, the title metropolitan, or metropolite, is distinct from that of archbishop, but tends to eclipse it entirely, notwithstanding the fact that there are numerous archbishops without provinces or metropolitical rights. See exarch; patriarch.
                                              J.F.T.

Metropolitan Church Association: A small sect, which is also known as the Burning Bush, having headquarters in Waukesha, Wis. It began in a revival in the Metropolitan Methodist Church in Chicago and became an independent sect in 1918. It is a holiness and "faith" group which specializes in evangelistic and missionary work. It has started work in several foreign countries. Its distinguishing mark is the "faith" principle. No worker receives a salary, solicits gifts, or owns property; money received is turned in to the general treasury and disbursed for the work of the association. It claims 14 churches (2 buildings) and 960 members. See Evangelistic Associations; holiness churches.   E.T.C.

mezuzah: (Lit. door-post, Heb) Name given to a piece of parchment inscribed with the passages Deut. 6, 4-9 and 11, 13-21 rolled up like a scroll and placed into a container fastened to the upper right-hand posts of the entrances of Jewish dwellings as a sign of faith in God. The biblical source of the rite is Deut. 6, 9 and 11, 20.
                                              S.R.

Micah: The authentic writings of Micah are confined to chs. 1-3 and a dozen scattered verses in chs. 6-7. The remainder of chs. 4-7 consists of appendixes by exilic optimists, post-exilic psalmists, and eschatologists*. In his six genuine prophetic poems, Micah attacked rulers, judges, priests, prophets, etc., for their corruption. Although Israel had been carried into exile twenty years earlier, Judah was becoming more corrupt instead of learning a lesson, and Assyria was encroaching farther to the west. By threat and exhortation, Micah tried to save his country from destruction as Amos and Hosea had tried in the north. Micah was a resident, probably an artisan, of the village Mareshah on the Philistine border in southwest Judah. A proletarian prophet, Micah possibly had no contacts with his older contemporary, Isaiah*, who was of the aristocracy. Micah was the most notable of the prophets in denouncing wickedness in high places and in championing oppressed classes. He was most active around 711 B.C. and 701 B.C., the two national crises when Assyria invaded Palestine. See The Prophets and their Times by J. M. P. Smith and W. A. Irwin (1941), pp. 122-30.
                                              R.E.W.

Michael of Cesena: (1270-1342) As Minister General of the Franciscans*, he led a growing party of opposition to Pope John XXII* who had in 1322-23 indicted the ideal of poverty as conceived of and practiced by the Order. Joined by a considerable party, including William of Ockham*, in his support of the Emperor Louis, he sought to unify divergent parties in his fraternity around the common repudiation of the pope, now declared heretical. But the Cesenists were repudiated by the Order at large, which accepted papal reconciliation at the Chapter General of 1329. Michael and his writings were condemned.   R.C.P.

Michael Scot: (died shortly before 1235) Trained at Oxford and Paris, Michael Scot acquired his fame chiefly through his translations from the works of the Arabs. He latinized in Toledo the astronomical writings of Alpetragius (Abû Ishâk al-Bitrûschi), some of the commentaries of Averroes* to Aristotle and the Abbreviationes of Avicenna*. This latter work he dedicated to Emperor Frederick the Second who employed him as his court astrologist.

The leading scholastics of the Middle Ages considered Michael Scot as a heterodox philosopher and he was placed in the Inferno (XX, 115) by Dante.   s.c.t.

Michaelmas: The festival of St. Michael the Archangel (Dedicatio S. Michaelis Archangeli), Sept. 29. In the Anglican calendar, St. Michael and All Angels. Cf. church year, church year cycle.   p.v.n.

Midgard-serpent: (Teut.) Midgardsormr, in Norse mythology, a great snake-like monster which lies in the sea, coiled round the whole earth. It is one of the offspring of Loki*, the earth demon, and is opposed to the gods. When the world ends the great serpent will come out of the sea on to the land, breathing out poison and aid other monsters and giants in an attack upon the gods. Thor will battle with him and be killed by his poisonous breath.   f.l.p.

midrash: From the Hebrew dorash which means probing. Rabbinic exposition of scripture aiming not alone at the simple elucidation of the Biblical text, but also at the discovery within Scripture of general norms which would have universal application. The inspiration for the Midrash was, on the one hand, the need for continued clarification of the Bible, and, on the other hand, the desire to order life in accordance with Biblical prescriptions. Since the changed circumstances prevailing in post-Biblical times had made the simple code of the Bible insufficient in itself to direct life, the rabbis sought to probe more penetratingly into the Biblical text in order to discover implications, not always apparent on the surface, that might offer the required guidance. There are two types of Midrash: the Midrash Halakah which deals with the legal sections of the Bible and the Midrash Hagadah dealing with the non-legal. The Midrash Halakah is well illustrated in the interpretation of Deut. 24 6: "No man shall take the mill or the upper millstone as pledge, for he taketh a man's life to pledge." This law mentions specific utensils, but it was clearly designed to protect the poor debtor in the possession of domestic tools which were indispensable to him in the preparation of food. The rabbinic interpretation therefore generalized that it also was meant to apply to "all tools used in the preparation of food" (Mishnah Baba Mexia 9:13). The Midrash Hagadah is well illustrated in the rabbinical interpretation of Leviticus 19:18, which forbids taking "vengeance" or bearing a "grudge". The rabbinic interpretation distinguishes between the two. "Vengeance is where a person says to his fellow, 'Lend me your sickle,' and he refuses; and the next day the latter person says, 'Lend me your axe,' and he replies, 'I will not lend you anything, in the same way that you declined to lend me.' A grude is where a person says to his fellow, 'Lend me your axe,' and he refuses; and the next day the latter person says, 'Lend me your garment,' and he replies, 'Here it is! I am not like you who declined to lend me what I wanted'." (Yoma 23 a). H L Strack, Introduction to the Talmud and Midrash (1931).   b.z.b.

Miéville, Henri: (1877-) A well-known Swiss thinker. The aim and main part of his recent work are religious in character. His is a very philosophical religion. Its great success is due to the intimate union of a very decided rationalism with a very genuine religious feeling, detached not only from all orthodoxy, but even from belief in a personal God. The work responded to the expectations of many Christians, spiritualistically inclined, who are troubled by the radical fidéisme, the extreme anti-intellectualism, of which Karl Barth* has been the eloquent propagandist. The argument against authority in matters of belief and dogmatic theology is striking. He points out with vigor whatever is anthropomorphic and immoral in the religious attitudes. His critique is nourished by a passion for goodness, truth, justice and beauty. Pure, ideal reason consists in an idea of totality, of harmony. God Himself combines in Himself synthesis and power of invention in a singularly complex unity which leaves nothing outside itself. He combines Himself with the efforts of men working to create a better order in the world, and to realize an ideal either by means of science or justice among peoples. God is at one and the same time living spiritual thought, nature, and absolute. He is above justice and reason, which are only limited and human attributes, but he is present in virtuous and intelligent acts. Vers une philosophie de l'ésprit ou de totalité, reflexions et recherches (Lausanne and Paris, 1937). h.h.

Milic, John of Kromeriz: (d. 1374) A member of the Czech* reform movement. In 1363 he resigned all his benefices in protest against the corrupt papal methods of granting them, lived in poverty, and began preaching reform. Held that the Antichrist* was to appear in 1365-67, and identified Emperor Charles IV with him. Was imprisoned, but was allowed to appear before Pope Urban V (1367). In Rome he announced the appearance of the Antichrist, and wrote Libellus de Antichristo. In it, he demanded the calling of a general council, and a reform of the church. Appealed to the Pope just then returned to Rome to initiate the reform. Returned to Prague, gave himself to fervent work of preaching (as many as five times a day). He was accused of heresy, cited before the curia of Pope Gregory XI to Avignon, but died there before his case was settled. Václav Novotny, Nábozenské huuti ceské ve 14, a 15. stol. (Prague, n. d.); F. Lützow, The Life and Times of Master John Hus (n. d.)   m.s.

military religious orders: Associations of the Crusading* period in which the monastic* and the military life were joined for the prosecution of Christian objectives. Among such were the Knights Hospitallers* of St. John, the Templars, and the Teutonic Knights. The first of these, c. 1092, opened a pilgrim's hospital in Jerusalem, adopted a basically Augustinian* rule, and, in the centuries following, became an organization of power and influence whose wealth invited sure decay. The Poor Knights of the Temple, having joined to their knightly vows those of the monastic life as well, c. 1119, functioned as protectors of pilgrims and defenders of the Christian kingdom of Jerusalem, with quarters near the Temple site. Multiplying ecclesiastical privileges, an increasingly complicated officialdom, and mounting riches, elicited jealousies in many quarters and led ultimately to suppression at the hands of Pope Clement V in 1312. The Teutonic Knights*, with generally similar aims, had their origins in hospital work among poor and sick German pilgrims at Acre, c. 1189. As finally constituted, their order comprised German free knights, priest-brothers, and serving brethren committed to the service of the sick and the protection of the Holy Land. Thus, these orders evince a striking similarity in conception, function, and institutional history. See monasticism; Knights Templar.

F. C. Woodhouse, The Military Religious Orders (London, 1879), H. Prutz, Die giestlichen Ritterorden (Berlin, 1908); W. Moeller, History of the Christian Church (1910), vol. II.   R.C.P.

milk and honey: A phrase used by several ancient culture peoples to indicate prosperity and abundance. As delicious foods, milk and honey came to be the symbols of plenty, then of happiness and well-being and finally of the material richness of the golden age to come. Use of these materials in religious rituals reflects sometimes the food* value, more often the symbolic meaning. The newly baptized person in the early Christian church tasted milk and honey, probably as a symbol of the blessedness of his new status.

A.E.H.

Mill, John Stuart: (1806-1873) British economist, logician, and moral philosopher. In economics he is in the main a defender of laissex faire capitalism, although he was aware of its abuses and at times made concessions to socialism. In logic an empiricist, he greatly improved the statement of the methods of induction. In ethics he modified the Utilitarianism of Bentham (whom in most respects he ardently admired) to admit an internal sanction of conscience and qualitative differences in pleasures. His essay on Liberty is a classical defence of individual rights, and his Representative Government (1861) prophesies correctly both the benefits and dangers of increased democracy. Although in many respects a positivist, his posthumous essays show him to have been a theist, and one of the first advocates of the conception of God as limited in power. He was an enthusiastic supporter of the liberal political and social movements of his time. See happiness.

System of Logic, 2 vols. (1843); Principles of Political Economy, edited by W. J. Ashley (1923); Utilitarianism (1863); Essays on Religion (1874); Leslie Stephen, The Utilitarians (1900).   W.K.W.

millenarianism: (Lat. millenarius, containing a thousand) Belief in the millenium or period of

1,000 years immediately following the bodily advent of Christ who with his saints will rule the world in person. Those who hold this view—commonly styled *pre*millennialists* in contrast to *post*millennialists*, who believe that Christ's return will be after the millennium—believe that the whole program read out of Revelation, especially chap. 20, will be literally fulfilled, though they commonly neglect the express statement (Rev. 20.5) that only those who have been "beheaded for the testimony of Jesus" are to live in this period.

In such apocalypses as IV Ezra and Revelation is to be seen an attempt to combine the specifically Jewish hopes for the future (see Messianic hope) with the views found in the apocalyptic* writings. Thus the earlier notion of an unending golden age is altered. In IV Ezra the Anointed (i.e., the Davidic king of Israel) is to appear, destroy all opposition, and reign for 400 years. Then he will die. The Resurrection and Final Judgment* will follow and the New Age ("Age to Come") will dawn. Similarly in Revelation Christ will reign (with his martyred saints) 1,000 years. Then Satan will be loosed for one final onslaught, but will be destroyed by God and cast into the lake of fire. There will be a general resurrection of all believers, and a new heaven and earth will be created.

These pictures have been accepted literally by many Christians, and each generation has seen complicated calculations of the date of Christ's return. The lush details as to the delights of the future which abound in both the prophetic foretastes of the coming golden age and in the even less restrained apocalyptic pictures were eagerly appropriated and exaggerated. Irenæus* quotes the lost writing of Papias* (an enthusiastic chiliast*), in which Jesus is made to promise: "The days will come, in which vines shall grow, each having ten thousand branches, and in each branch ten thousand twigs, and in each twig ten thousand shoots, and in each one of the shoots ten thousand clusters, and in every one of the clusters ten thousand grapes, and every grape when pressed will give five and twenty metretes (200 gallons) of wine" (Irenæus, Haer. v, 33, 3).

Though in the latter half of the second century the earlier expectation that the return of Christ was imminent was becoming far less central than it had formerly been, the conviction that, though deferred, it would nonetheless occur continued, and is probably held even today by the mass of Christians. In the Greek church the chiliastic views tended more and more to be discredited. Anything that went beyond the admission of the visible advent of Christ and a literal hell for sinners came to be suspect as Jewish. In the Western church millenarianism continued to be at least tolerated, partly because it was an integral part of the tradition, partly because the Gnostics and Marcion excluded it; but from the fourth century on it sank farther and farther below the surface. Augustine's insistence that the Church was the kingdom of Christ and that the millenial kingdom had thus actually started with the birth of Christ tended definitely to exclude the doctrine from Catholic theology. Nonetheless it continued beneath the surface and was a convenient weapon for opponents of the Church. In attacks on the papacy from the thirteenth to the fifteenth century and in the Anabaptists* and similar revolutionary movements of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries the earlier millenarianism bloomed again in full vigor. It became a part of the baggage of the Reformation and has continued to the present day, a seemingly necessary consequence of verbal inspiration of the Scriptures*.

G. F. Moore, Judaism, 3 vols (1927 and 1930).
M.S.E.

Millenial Dawn: A book by C. T. (Pastor) Russell* first published in 1881 at Allegheny, Pa. under the title, Food for Thinking Christians. Reissued in 1886 as Millenial Dawn, and carrying the sub-title, Plan of the Ages, it was later included in his six-volume series, Studies in the Scriptures. It reached a circulation of more than five and a half million copies.

Interpreting the Scriptures literally, Russell built up a system of prediction concerning Christ who he believed had already returned in 1874. The book presented a philosophy of history which held some dates as established, thus demonstrating revelation through an impinging of the divine in history. Using these dates as points of departure, he predicted the Millennium would occur "sometime before the end of A.D. 1914".

Russell held God had created man perfect and free, to learn by experiencing evil. The end of evil was physical death, from which man would be re-called at the resurrection. Man could be saved only by Christ, whose sinless birth and life had given him the "right to live". The result of the sin of Adam was the physical death of the race. The second death, from which there could be no redemption, would occur for willful disobedience during the Millennium which had already come. The second chance would divide forever the fate of all mankind. Russell demonstrated these beliefs with illustrations, using the Great Pyramid of Gizeth as his source.

M. C. Czatt, International Bible Students and Jehovah's Witnesses (1933); C. T. Russell, Millenial Dawn (1881); N. H. Barbour, and C. T. Russell, Three Worlds, and the Harvest of this World (1877); C. T. Russell, Studies in the Scripture, vol. I, II, (1886). M.G.R.—W.W.S.

Miller, William: (1782-1849) and Millerism. William Miller an honest, earnest Baptist farmer-preacher began, in 1839, to stir the whole nation by fixing the date of the second coming of Christ at some time between March 21, 1843 and March 21, 1844. He had reached his conclusions by a long and careful study of the apocalyptical books of the Bible. The movement resulting influenced all the revivalistic churches in the nation though the excitement subsided after the passing of the latter date. Miller had discouraged his followers from withdrawing from the churches, but those continuing to hold that the final day was at hand gradually withdrew and in 1845 a loose organization was formed which took the name Adventists.

These have since divided into several separate bodies. See Adventists. W.W.S.

Milman, Henry Hart: (1791-1868) Ecclesiastical historian and poet. A priest of the Church of England, Milman was professor of poetry at Oxford from 1821 to 1831, he became Dean of St. Paul's in London in 1849. Apart from books of poetry, his writings include fifteen volumes of historical studies, on Judaism, early Christianity and Latin Christian churches. W.N.P.

Milton, John: (1608-1674) English poet. Born in London, educated at St. Paul's School and Christ's College, Cambridge, he devoted the early years of his maturity to private study and to the writing of verse, both English and Latin, in a variety of Renaissance traditions. From 1641 to 1660 he was active in public affairs, serving as Secretary to the Council of State and producing a notable series of pamphlets on ecclesiastical, sociological, and political subjects. During his last years, spent in blindness and enforced retirement, he wrote his major epic, Paradise Lost (1667), a shorter epic, Paradise Regained (1671) and a drama, Samson Agonistes (1671), as well as a considerable body of prose. His principal theological work, De Doctrina Christiana, was probably completed about 1660 although possibly begun much earlier; it was not published until 1825.

Starting as an Anglican of moderate Puritan leanings, Milton became successively a Presbyterian and a radical Independent. His final position was Arian, Arminian, and in many other respects unorthodox. His so-called heresies, however, have been overemphasized by recent critics.

The Columbia Milton (18 vols., 1931-38) is the most inclusive edition, the only available source for much of the prose David Masson's Life of John Milton (7 vols, 1859-94) is the standard biography. J H. Hanford's Milton Handbook (3rd ed, 1939) is a compendium of modern scholarship and contains excellent bibliographical suggestions.
L.W.C.

mimbar: The pulpit* in a Moslem mosque.
P.E.J.

Miner, Alonzo Ames: Born Aug. 17, 1814; died June 14, 1895. Spent early years as teacher; later ordained to Universalist* ministry. Became noted champion of temperance, anti-slavery, and other reform movements. Was associated with Hosea Ballou* in Boston. Became President of Tufts College in 1862 and saved the institution in its days of crisis.

G. H. Emerson, Life of Alonzo Ames Miner (1896).
C.R.S.

Minerva: (Lat. Minerva, from men-, to remind) Probably an old Italian goddess of trade guilds, later identified with the Greek Athena, taking on martial characteristics. Vergil represents her as goddess of handicrafts and of war. E.M.N.

minhah: (Heb., gift or offering) Afternoon service of the synagogue*, suggested by I Kings 18.29, and corresponds to the afternoon sacrifice at the Temple* and particularly to the cereal portion of the daily offering.   S.S.C.

Minims, or Minimi: (Lat. the least) The Minim Hermits of St. Francis of Paula, a mendicant order founded by that saint in 1453 for the purpose of giving retreats, missions, and assistance to the poor and neglected. Their name was intended to characterize an even greater humility than that of the Franciscan Friars *Minor, after whom they were patterned. Once very widespread in Europe and foreign missions, they now number only about 500 religious in twenty-two monasteries.   J.F.T.

ministry: See clergy, ordination; pastor, priesthood.

ministry, preparation for: See seminaries, major Roman Catholic, theological schools, Jewish; theological schools, Protestant, United States and Canada.

Minor Prophets: Traditional classification applying to the twelve smaller prophetic collections: Amos, Hosea, Micah, Zephaniah, Nahum, Habakkuk, Haggai, Zechariah, Obadiah, Malachi, Joel, and Jonah, called the "Book of the Twelve" by Jewish writers because they were written on a single scroll. The term "minor" is based solely on the quantity rather than quality of each prophet's surviving work. Judged on a page-unit basis, many of these are not inferior to the supposed major prophets. See Major Prophets; prophets, prophecy (O.T.).   R.E.W.

Minucius Felix, Marcus: First Latin Apologist*; known by his dialogue "Octavius", written perhaps shortly before 200 A.D. Tried to show the philosophic truth and moral attractiveness of Christianity.   K.H.C.

minuscule: idem cursive*.

minyan: (Heb., count) The number of adult males required for Jewish public worship, fixed at ten.   S.S.C.

miracle plays: See religious drama.

miracles: The term miracle is used in two senses. 1) referring to an event involving the upsetting of natural laws or the intrusion of the supernatural into the realm of the natural, 2) referring to an event which is incomprehensible. In the latter sense, what is miraculous for one age becomes commonplace for another. On purely philosophical grounds, it would be dogmatic to deny the possibility of miracles in the first sense of the term. However, on scientific grounds, where antecedent-consequent relations are sought to make for an understanding of the world of experience, an appeal to the miraculous as an intrusion into a supposedly orderly process is considered hazardous if not an outright denial of scientific method. In recent liberal Christian thought under the spell of scientific method, it has become considered highly dubious to place miracle (especially the "historic miracles") at the foundation of the Christian faith, miracles may, for the liberal Christian, be believed in but they are held to belong to the less essential. Conservatives, however, tend to hold to the pattern of the traditional mind which gravitated toward explaining certain events as evidences for the special infiltration of the divine into the natural course of events.

                                   V.F.

miracles in early Christian times: The Gospels, and the early Christian writings generally, tell of many incidents which seemed contrary to the order of nature and were set down to immediate divine action. These miracles were long regarded as the most impressive proofs that God was himself operative in the Christian mission, in modern times they have provided scepticism with its chief weapon. Miracles, it is argued, are incredible, and a history which is inseparably bound up with them cannot be true. The argument has now ceased to carry much weight in either direction. It is recognized that the ancient world ascribed to supernatural power everything that could not be explained by its rudimentary science. If the Christian writings are full of miracles, so are all the books of that time, and sober authors like Cicero and Tacitus do not hesitate to explain any strange phenomenon as a miracle. From the mere fact that an event in Christian history is described as miraculous we cannot infer that it did not happen. The fact itself may be indubitable although the explanation given to it in an unscientific age may be wrong. The Gospel miracles stand in a class by themselves. We have here to deal with a Personality which, on any view, was unique. It is impossible to say, from any comparison with ordinary men, what Jesus may or may not have done. No fact in his history is better attested than that he was regarded in his lifetime as a wonder-worker. It is evident, however, that the recorded miracles fall into several categories, each of which must be considered separately. In those instances where he appears as controlling the powers of nature a spiritual fact may be presented symbolically, or a coincidence viewed as a miracle, or an actual event exaggerated or fancifully explained. By far the greater number of the miracles are acts of healing, and especially of mental healing. There is no reason to doubt that Jesus had an extraordinary gift of calling spiritual forces into action, and influencing the body through the mind. It is significant that he required faith as the necessary condition for the exercise of his power. According to the Synoptic Gospels he did not rest his claim on the miracles. He pointed to them simply as evidences that the Kingdom of God was near, and declared that his followers, if they had sufficient faith, might themselves perform them. In the Fourth Gospel the miracles are singled out as the distinctive "signs" that Jesus participated in the divine nature. Throughout the early history of the church we continue to hear of miracles. It was believed that Jesus, on his departure, had bestowed the Spirit, through which his servants could act supernaturally. Many of their miracles are recounted in the book of Acts, where we may suspect the inroad of later legend, but Paul refers to "gifts of healing" and "miracles" as well-known manifestations of the Spirit (I Cor., 12.9, 10, 28, 29). They consisted, apparently of various forms of faith-healing, and depended on a magnetism with which particular men and women were endowed. Paul never claims that he himself possessed these powers, and distinctly says that they were of secondary religious value (I Cor. 12.28). At a later time the miracle-working gift was supposed to come through official ordination and directions are laid down in the Ep of James for the performance of works of healing by church elders. Eventually the "exorcists"* were set apart as a special class in the ministry, and the office is still retained in the church of Rome.

J Wendland, Miracles and Christianity (1911); D. S. Cairns, The Faith that Rebels (1929).

E.F.S.

miracles in non-Christian religions: In pre-scientific cultures it was taken for granted that a god, a spirit, a holy man, a magician or the possessor of a powerful spell could produce results in ways that today would be called miraculous. Yet none of the men whose names stand as symbols of the great religions—Zoroaster, Lao-tzu, Mahāvīra, Gautama Buddha, Confucius, Mohammed made any use of miracles. Mohammed wondered at the blindness of his adversaries who asked for a sign. Gautama reproved his disciples for boasting to the followers of Mahāvīra of his marvelous powers. A member of the early Buddhist order who claimed to possess superhuman power was subject to discipline. Men spiritualized by asceticism, saints of superlative wisdom could of course perform miracles but, as the early texts say, miracles prove nothing by themselves. A skilled magician could match any marvel.

Yet the reverence of later generations and the growth of legends surround the lives of these great sages with an aura of miraculous events. Marvels cluster about them at conception, birth, temptation, when evil powers tried to destroy them, and at death and burial. Not only the sages themselves but also their followers who attained the status of saints worked miracles at will. They were performed to demonstrate power when challenged, to prove the authority of the prophet or his teaching, to convert unbelievers, or for such practical purposes as healing, escaping prison, providing food or speedy transportation. The saints of Hinduism and Buddhism were lavish with miracles. They could travel through the air, even to heaven, transport a company across a river without boats, bring rain, control storms and floods, heal the sick, remove barrenness, pass through the earth or a wall, assume any desired form, become invisible and invulnerable, provide illumination by burning a finger, remember past lives and foresee the future. At the birth of Buddha angelic music filled the air. The earth quaked, streams of water poured down for his bath, the four great kings of the quarters and a host of divine beings attended him. When he died flowers rained from heaven knee deep about the funeral procession and fire from heaven lit the pyre. Other religions were more restrained. Marvels accompanied the conception and birth of Zoroaster and he was miraculously rescued many times from the attempts of evil powers to destroy him. Miracles in the religion of Israel center chiefly around Moses, Elijah and his successor. Mohammed's ascent to heaven is the outstanding miracle of Moslem tradition. Some of the Moslem saints of India, however, rivaled the Hindu holy men as wonder workers. The Chinese immortals possessed supernatural power but their legends seem modest on the background of the miracle-starred lore of Chinese Buddhism. See virgin birth.

A.E.H.

Mirecourt, John of: (Fr. Jean de, Lat· Johannes de Mirecuria) A Cistercian monk of the 14th century, follower of John of Occam. With Nicholas of Autrecourt* he managed an energetic defense of the critical and skeptical tendencies of the school of Occam. In consequence, forty of the theses of his commentary on Peter Lombard's* Liber Sententiarum were condemned by the Univ. of Paris in 1347, two years after they were written for his baccalaureate in theology. A close relationship exists between his system of ontology, that of Augustine, and later, the Cartesian principle of the certitude of self. Mirecourt was strongly influenced by the theories of Thomas Bradwardine* and the ethical conception which maintains all human acts are derived from the omnipotent divine will or, more specifically, the permitting (concurrent) will of God.

J.F.T.

Mirror of Princes: 1) Augustine's brief description of a Christian emperor, City of God V, 24. 2) One of the many books written for the guidance of rulers in the Middle Ages and the Renaissance.

J.T.M.

miserere: The first word of Psalm 50 (Vulgate); hence the psalm itself. It is King David's act of contrition and plea for forgiveness after his sin of adultery with Bethsabee.

S.C.

Mishnah: (Lit. teaching, from shanah, to repeat, to teach) Refers to the digest of laws made by Rabbi Judah the Patriarch (c. 135-220). The compiler made use of all the earlier collections of laws available to him. While the Mishnah was redacted in the beginning of the third century, it embodies many laws which antedate the Christian era. R. Judah's purpose in compiling the Mishnah was to halt the chaos and confusion brought about in Jewish life by the growth of rival collections of Jewish practice and ritual, none of which possessed more authority than the other, and to make his collection a code that it would be authoritative in all matters of ritual and law. R. Judah was eminently successful in his endeavor by reason of his great scholarship and the tremendous prestige he enjoyed as a spiritual leader of the Jews. The classification of the law in the Mishnah is most interesting. As is well known, the ritual and jurisprudence are not distinguished in the Bible, and we often find them side by side in the Scripture. In the Mishnah, the law is arranged into six orders and these in turn are subdivided into treatises. The first order, with the exception of the first treatise, deals with agricultural laws. The second order with the Sabbath and Festivals, the third with family law, the fourth with jurisprudence or civil and criminal law, the fifth with Temple laws and sacrifices, the sixth with laws of impurities. See Gemara; law, Hebrew, Talmud, Tanna; Tosefta. Cf. Meir.

Cf. J Z, Lauterbach, Jewish Encyclopedia, vol. VIII, pp 609-619, Boaz Cohen, Mishnah and Tosefta (1935).   B.C.

Missa: (Lat., dismissal) The usual and official name for the Eucharistic liturgy in the Western Church, the Mass*. So called from the dismissal of the catechumens before the Offertory, and of the faithful (Ite, missa est) after communion.
         P.V.N.

Missal, Roman: (Missale Romanum) The official altar book of the Roman Catholic Church, issued in 1570 pursuant to a decree of the Council of Trent*, to supersede the various medieval 'uses' by a uniform rite. It contains, besides the Kalendar and elaborate rubrical directions a) the Ordinary and Canon of the Mass*, b) the Proper of Seasons—the variable prayers, chants, and lections of the Christian year from Advent to Advent, c) the Proper of Saints, d) various supplementary material. See Pius V.   P.V.N.

Mission Covenant Church of America: See Evangelical Mission Covenant Church of America.

missionary activities in China. See Chinese religions.

Missionary Bands of the World: A small holiness sect which grew out of a pentecostal group in the Free Methodist Church. It became independent in 1898 under the name of "Pentecost Bands of the World," taking the present name in 1925. It is Methodist in nature and general polity and is distinguished only by its stress on holiness. The sect had only 6 churches and about 200 members, but in 1933 it perfected a merger with a similar sect known as Church of God (Holiness) which reported 120 churches and 3,000 members. See Evangelistic Associations, holiness churches.   E.T.C.

Missionary Church Association: A holiness fundamentalist, and premillennial sect with headquarters at Ft. Wayne, Ind. It has 47 churches and 3,600 members. It was organized in 1898 by bringing together various holiness groups which had broken away from their old denominational affiliations. It is distinguished from several other similar sects only by the extreme degree of its attachment to the fundamentalist theology and the second coming of Christ. It claims to be an interdenominational body, and send out its missionaries through the boards of other denominations, mainly the Christian and Missionary Alliance*. See holiness churches.   E.T.C.

missionary movements, Christian: Christianity shares with Buddhism, Islam, Judaism and Zoroastrianism the expansive purpose to save other peoples. The sense of world mission arises naturally from monotheistic universalism, as a commission from the one God to serve his children everywhere. No other trait is more characteristic of Christianity throughout its history than this missionary impulse. From the heritage of prophetic Judaism came a world vision and a mission to teach and bless all nations with the true faith.

Jesus sent forth disciples first to the house of Israel, and later to the whole world, "Go ye therefore and make disciples of all nations" (Mt. 28 19). Philip, Stephen, Barnabas, Paul and others carried the gospel around the Mediterranean from Asia Minor and Greece to Rome and Spain. Justin Martyr (c. 140 A.D.) claims there are no people of any race, "among whom prayers are not offered in the name of a crucified Jesus to the Father of all." (Dial. c. Tryph. 117) Harnack estimates that by the end of the third century Christians numbered nearly one-half of the population of the Roman Empire (Mission and Expansion of Christianity, vol. ii, 325).

The ancient period of Christian missions brought an amazing expansion. From the conversion of Constantine* in 325 A.D it was not only the official religion but the fabric of civilization. Crossing the borders of the Empire Ulfilas* became apostle to the Goths about 325, Chrysostom founded in Constantinople a training school for Gothic evangelists in 404, Martin of Tours (ca. 316-400) evangelized central Gaul; Patrick* (389-461) established Christianity in Ireland as a center for missions from Switzerland to Iceland. Winfrid or Boniface (680-755) became the apostle to Germany while Ansgar* (801-865), Haakan and Fryggvason brought the message to the Scandinavians. From Constantinople missionaries won Russia and the Balkans to the eastern church. When Nestorius* and his followers were cast out in 431 they organized a powerful mission that moved from Baghdad and Babylon into China and India, surviving until the 14th century with considerable influence.

In mediaeval times Christian expansion was checked and pushed back by the Moslem* empire. The crusades* were not missionary in the true sense, but a mistaken effort to recapture the Holy Land by force of arms, which resulted in disaster and bitter rivalry. In 1245 Pope Innocent IV sent embassies to the Tartar courts, and the Polos came to China to establish relations with the Mongol leaders. Corvino, a Franciscan friar reached China in 1292 by the south sea route stopping at Madras on the way, winning royal converts.

When the new world was discovered and sea lanes opened, modern missions began. The Roman Catholic missions were immediately launched with vigor and success. Loyola founded the Society of Jesus* in 1534 sent Francis Xavier* in 1542 to India, Ceylon, Malacca and Japan. Other Jesuit missions came to Florida, Mexico, Peru, Canada, Chile, Paraguay, the Philippines, China and Tibet. Missionaries were also supported by the Augustinian, Dominican and Franciscan orders to the Americas, Africa, Asia and the islands.

The early Protestant churches were occupied at home, not yet ready for foreign missions, but settlers in the new world transplanted their faith wherever they came. In New England John Eliot translated the Bible for Indians (1661-1664), and the Quakers preached the gospel to Indians and Negroes. A bishop of London in 1701 secured a charter for a "society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts " In 1705 the King of Denmark sent a Christian mission to India, and by 1731 the Moravians were engaged in missionary work, sending John Wesley* to the Indians of Georgia, thus opening the way for Methodist missions. In 1793 William Carey* (Baptist) sailed for India and two years later the London Missionary Society was organized. In 1799 the Church of England established the Church Missionary Society for "missions to Africa and the East." In 1814 the Wesleyan Methodist Missionary Society was organized and in 1829 the Church of Scotland sent Alexander Duff, as an educational missionary. American missionary movements were also forming American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions in 1806, the American Baptist Missionary Union in 1814, the Methodist Board of Foreign Missions in 1819, and the Presbyterian Board of Missions in 1837. The British and Foreign Bible Society* was formed in 1804 and the American Bible Society in 1816.

The high point in Christian missions was reached in 1928. In that year there were approximately 30,000 Protestant missionaries in foreign lands, and an equal number of Roman Catholic missionaries. During that year $60,000,000 was devoted to foreign missions by Protestant churches and about half of that amount by Roman Catholics. (See K. S. Latourette, Missions Tomorrow (1936), p. 12). The Student Volunteer Movement* since 1886 had enlisted thousands of young people in England, Canada and the United States for foreign missionary service. Medical and educational services have met human need in every land and demonstrated the practical value of Christianity to these peoples.

The unification of missionary enterprises was first effected in the allocation of fields to prevent duplication of work, cooperation in union schools and colleges, and joint consultation in national Christian councils From the meeting of the World Missionary conference at Edinburgh in 1910 resulted the International Missionary Council, bringing together from various nations representatives of all missionary organizations. At the significant meeting of this Missionary Council at Jerusalem in 1928 where Orientals and Africans were well represented, thoughtful consideration was given to the Christian message, Christian education, relation of churches east and west, problems of race, industrialism and rural progress.

In 1932 the Laymen's Commission representing seven denominations in America published their foreign missions inquiry entitled Re-thinking Missions (ed. by W. E. Hocking, 1932) and seven supplementary volumes. Based upon intensive study of Christian missions in India, Burma, China and Japan of churches, education, literature, medical work, rural life, industrial developments, women's interests, administration and organization, recommendations were made to the missionary societies. Wide discussion and influences have followed the interpretations of emerging world culture, temporary and permanent functions of the Christian mission, the need to know, appreciate and associate with other religions.

The meeting of the International Missionary Council at Madras, India in 1938 brought together 470 delegates from seventy nations. In the face of mounting world conflicts, these delegates "call upon our fellow Christians throughout the world to join us in a new dedication. Surely God is summoning us in these times to let go our self-sufficiency, to frequent His altars, to learn of Him, and to make His ways known in all the relationships of life . . . Everywhere it involves self sacrificial service . . . till that love surround the earth, binding the nations, races and the classes into a community of sympathy for one another, undergirded by a deathless faith in Christ." Madras Series (1939), vol. vii, 170-171.

World War II is having a disastrous effect on Christian missions. The European conflict has orphaned many important missions of continental societies. The Japanese expansion has suppressed missionary activities and interned or driven out missionaries. Blockades and war requirements have blocked travel to and from fields of missionary labor. The future of the Christian world mission is at the moment unpredictable. Changes have come so suddenly and recently it is difficult to see what will develop next. However, it should be noted that heroic service of missionaries in such emergencies has won admiration and gratitude in China and elsewhere. The Christian life is deeply rooted in most of these countries, and there is reason to expect the indigenous Christian churches will carry on even though international connections may be severed. The ecumenical movement toward world unity among the churches and the sense of Christian brotherhood is standing well the stresses of global warfare. Much depends on the nature of the peace and the character of the post-war world. See China Inland mission, city missions, Grenfell; home missions; inner mission, Livingston, D.; Moffat, R.; Morrison, R. Also see anti-missionary movement in the U. S.; religious tract movement in the U. S.

Report of the World Missionary Conference, 9 vols (1910), the Complete Report of the Jerusalem Meeting of the International Missionary Council, 8 vols. (1928); W. E. Hocking, ed., Re-thinking Missions and 7 fact-finding supplementary volumes (1932): The Madras Series Presenting Papers Based on the Meeting of the International Missionary Council at Madras, India, 7 vols. (1939): J. I. Parker, Interpretative Statistical Survey of the World Mission of the Christian Church (1938); World Missionary Atlas (2nd ed., 1925); Little Atlas of Catholic Missions (Rome, 1925); The Encyclopedia of Missions, ed. by H. O. Dwight, et al. (1904).   P.E.J. missions in China and Japan: See Chinese religions, Japan, Christianity in.

missions to India: See India, missions to.

Missouri Lutherans: A body of conservative Lutherans organized under the leadership of K. F. W. Walther* in 1847 into "The Lutheran Synod of Missouri, Ohio, and Other States". It consisted originally of the congregations formed by the seven hundred pilgrims from Saxony who had settled in Perry County, Missouri, in 1839 and of the congregations in Ohio and Michigan served by missionaries sent by Pastor Wilhelm Lohe* of Neuendettelsau. Insisting upon strict adherence to confessional orthodoxy and developing effective methods of indoctrination, the Synod has enjoyed a rapid growth and now has 4,110 pastors, 4,114 congregations, and 1,361,698 members. Its theological school, the Concordia Seminary in St. Louis, with a faculty of 18 and a student body of 497 is among the largest of Protestant seminaries. Laying great emphasis upon the education of the young, the Synod has an extensive system of parochial schools* and junior colleges. Its eleven-year course of ministerial education is unique. Doctrinally, the Missourians hold the Bible to be an infallible and literally inspired revelation of absolute truth; demand acceptance of all the symbolical books of historic Lutheranism, use only purely Lutheran literature in church and school, oppose all forms of unionism and syncretism, such as prayer, worship or communion with other Christians, even with other Lutherans, condemn all synergism, i.e., man's co-operation in his salvation; consider the Pope as the Anti-Christ, denounce all lodges and secret societies. In polity, each congregation of the Synod is a sovereign unit, the Synod being only an advisory body whose resolutions are not binding unless accepted by the congregation as compatible with the Bible and suited to its own conditions. The doctrinal purity of the pastors is under close surveillance. The synod carries on an extensive evangelistic work, with thoroughly modern methods, one of its instruments being a radio station located on the campus of Concordia Seminary. See Lutheran Church in America, neo-Lutheranism.
Concordia Cyclopedia (1927), ed. L. Fuerbringer, et al.   T.A.K.

miter or mitre: (Gr. mitra, a turban) A tall ornamental headdress worn by various church dignitaries, as popes, archbishops, bishops and abbots. It has evolved from a low soft cap, originally worn by the pope alone, into a high stiff hat consisting of two like parts, each stiffened by lining and rising to a peak. It is bound by a head-band at the bottom; two fringed lappets (infulae) hang down behind. Theoretically, it is always white, though there are three degrees of ornamentation, depending upon the dignity of the wearer and the occasion. In the rite of consecration it is considered symbolically as the helmet of salvation.
J.F.T.

Mithraism: See mystery religions.

Mitnagdim: Opponents of the Chasidim*.
A.H.S.

Mixcoatl, or Camaxtli: (Mexican) Ancient hunting god, war god, and thunder god, honored in an annual ceremonial hunt, and by the making of weapons, one of the gods which aid in the creation of the world, carries a bundle of arrows in his hand to signify his possession of the thunderbolts.
F.L.P.

mizpah benediction: The name commonly given to the words of Laban at the treaty between him and Jacob (Gen. 31 49) "May Yahweh keep watch between me and thee when we are hidden (separated) from one another." Neither party is to pass the cairn or pillar, which had been set up, with hostile intent, and God (the third party of the covenant) is requested to enforce the agreement. The Hebrew world was one of covenant, and, lacking human sanctions by which agreements could be enforced, a deity or deities was or were made party to all agreements. The stabilizing element in Israelite society, therefore, was conceived to be the will of Yahweh, who was the source and protector of the social mores and the legal right (see further covenant and righteousness).
G.E.W.

Mo Tzŭ: See Chinese Terminology.

Moabite stone: Stele of basalt, discovered in 1868, bearing an inscription of the ninth century B.C. relating the revolt of Mesha, king of Moab, against the Israelites (II Kgs. iii, 4 ff.). Written in the Moabite dialect with characters closely akin to the Old Hebrew alphabet. See alphabetic writing.
S.L.T.

Moabites: Ancient people probably kindred to the Israelites, the Edomites*, and the Ammonites, and living at the East of the Dead Sea. Often mentioned in the O.T. See Chemosh, Moabite stone.
S.L.T.

modalism: An ancient doctrine that the members of the Trinity* were not three distinct personalities but only successive modes in which the one God has manifested himself. The most famous representative of Modalism was Sabellius (fl. 230), an early Christian presbyter and theologian. See monarchianism, Sabellianism.
F.G.E.

Moderates, The: A party, the best known representative of which was the eminent historian, Principal Robertson, which dominated the counsels of the Church of Scotland* for approximately a century following 1752. Its power began to wane about 1832. It stood consistently in favor of patronage*, based on the Patronage Act of 1712, and for recognizing the Civil Courts as the ultimate authority in ecclesiastical matters. At first stressing culture and morals rather than doctrine, it later became rigid in enforcing the doctrines of the Confession.
A.K.R.

moderator: The official title, in Presbyterian churches, for the constitutionally designated presiding officer in a church court, e.g., a congregational meeting regularly called, a session, a presbytery, a synod or a General Assembly.

A.K.R.

modern religious drama: See religious drama.

modern style: See church building.

Modern Times community: See communistic settlements, secular.

modern translations of the Bible: See Bible, modern translations of the.

modernism: Modernism signifying in general anything new and in particular any new doctrine refers specifically today to that new trend of thought and doctrine in the religious world which, although not universally recognized as such, culminated as a synthesis at the beginning of the twentieth century. The development however, had been going on for years and was based in some form or other on all previous theological errors, hence stigmatized by Pope Pius X* in his encyclical "Pascendi" of Sept. 8, 1907 as the "synthesis of all heresies" and by Alfred Loisy*, one of its French adherents (whose books had been placed on the "Index"*, in 1903) as "the setting aside of every Catholic doctrine". The insidious feature about Modernism, this "neo-reformismus religiosus," as Pius X in his Allocution of April 17, 1907, styles it, was the fact that it used such acceptable theological terms as "faith", "revelation", "dogma", "conscience", "truth", "church", etc., in an entirely different sense from that traditionally understood or dogmatically defined. According to the Modernists "truth" is not stable, immutable and eternal, but something that may vary with the times, even with one's own interior experiences or reactions; hence, the possibility of a temporary objective progress of dogmas, during which transition period new doctrines may always be added and old ones, no longer adjudged conformable to the times, eliminated. "Revelation" is not a truth revealed, from without, by Almighty God either directly or through the medium of the prophets and especially through His Divine Son (cf. Heb. 1, 1-2), Jesus Christ, ascertainable and demonstrable by such unimpeachable documents as the Sacred Scriptures, but rather some indefinite, undefinable inner experience (Immanence Apologetics) that is to be distinguished both from philosophic proof and dogmatic pronouncement. Religion, thus, like truth has become not only personal but likewise individualistic to the exclusion of one general (catholic) religion for all. The need, therefore, of even the Bible is entirely secondary, because (according to them) it reveals only how God acted in others; hence there is no need of ecclesiastical authority or infallible interpretation, disciplinary regulations or external congregations. (The older non-confessional Germans expressed this idea in the phrase: "Religion ist Privatsache".) The Sacraments, according to the Modernists, are not external signs instituted by Christ to give grace but rather the outward expression of the soul's inward need of external symbolism. The dogmatic pronouncements of the Church are not the result of proven divine revelation but rather the manifestation of the soul's inner experiences set down in words and terms for the guidance of others having similar interior "experiences." This "conscientia religiosa" thus becomes through communication to others in the Church a "conscientia collectiva". Correspondingly, any or all authority in the Church is not that given by Christ to Peter and to his successors as Bishops of Rome; or to the other Apostles and their successors, the other bishops of the world, but rather that which grew out of the Christian communities founded by them. Wherefore dogmas are to be approved first by the faithful, and only then obeyed. To the Modernist the Christ of Faith is not the Christ of history; He is rather an evolution or figment of the hero-worshiping mind and soul. In fact, all ecclesiastical life—doctrinal, jurisdictional, juridical (not only through expansion, but in its essential concept)—is subject to evolution. Faith, dogma, cult and church develop in the laity which must offset the teachings of the clergy. Faith and science bear no relation to one another, hence may contradict each other, as though, to quote the Council of the Vatican*, God were not the Author of both. Certain, definite and individual historical personages, including Christ and especially the characters of the Old Testament, the same as concrete events in their lives, e.g., the Incarnation, the Resurrection, God's apparitions, etc. have been "transfigured" into "hero-worship" and into exaggerated, unrealistic myths. Miracles and prophesies as proofs of Divine Revelation find no place in a religion of pure Immanentism. Since only physical phenomena are the objects of science, everything else in Religion not subject to interior or exterior experience, (Agnosticism) has been added by Faith, which the Modernist choses to eliminate from his system of religion. As Faith and Science are to be entirely divorced from each other so also the Church and the State.

Perhaps no one Modernist taught the whole system as outlined, for it was nipped in the bud before it had time to crystalize and fully synchronize. In fact no two exponents fully agreed on anything. Pius X's condemnation caught them unawares. Everyone, nevertheless, of the above-named tenets was taught by one or the other Modernist.

The origin of Modernism is to be sought remotely in Pantheism and Gnosticism; proximately in the Subjective Philosophy of the XX century. Its two basic doctrines are Agnosticism and Immanentism. It leans on the teachings of such philosophers as Kant, Jacobi and Schleiermacher, etc., who place the essence of religion in interior feeling and sentiment (Gefühlsreligion); or on James, Bergson and Spitta who find the essence of religion in man's inner yearning for God. In Germany, the theory of "sentimental" or "interiorly experimental" religion found staunch adherents in A. Ritschl and A. Har-nack, in France, in A. Sabatier and E. Méné-goz (Fideismus). These philosophico-theological concepts of Faith, Truth and Revelation gradually worked their way also into Catholic circles, both clerical and lay. In France, they found both acceptance and propaganda by Edouard Le Roy and L. Laberthonière, in England, by M. G. Tyrrell*, and in Italy by E. Buonaiuti, P. Murri and an anonymous author of Programma dei modernisti (Rome, 1907); in Germany, by Hugo Koch, Jos. Schnitzer and Jos. Wittig. In the United States foreign infiltration was hardly noticeable, although there were a few French and English teachers who sought to inoculate the American Seminaries with Modernistic theories. In one particular case the accusation was proven to have been entirely false. American Catholic theologians were too deeply rooted in the Rock of Peter to be shaken by the storm.

The Catholic Church, ever on the alert to challenge new doctrine not in conformity with the traditional teachings of antiquity, took swift action against the Modernistic movement. Many of the new tenets had already been pre-condemned by the Vatican Council in 1870. In chapters 2-4 the Council had clearly taught that faith in the Catholic sense rests on divine testimony or authority as revealed in the Scriptures and transmitted by tradition down the centuries, sustained by prophesies, miracles or other divine manifestations. A "coecus ductus", or blind leadership or impulse, resting on uncertain, individualistic and private feeling, sentiment or experience has no place in the Catholic concept of Faith. The Catholic Church demands infinitely more! Furthermore, in her Constitution "De Ecclesia Dei" the Council adamantly upheld the traditionally taught authority of the Church to defend the "depositum fidei" (the treasury of the Faith) and to spread the knowledge of the same only through her authorized teachers. Then as early as 1906 and 1907, after certain books had been placed on the "Index", individual Italian and French bishops took action against their respective priests who had become inoculate with Modernism. The first papal repercussion was the Decree "Lamentabili" of July 3, 1907 in which Piux X in the form of the Syllabus adopted by Piux IX, condemned 65 propositions and stigmatized them as: "Errores modernistarum de Ecclesia, Revelatione, Christo, Sacramentis". (See Syllabus of errors, papal.) This was followed on Sept. 8, 1907 by the Encyclical* "Pascendi" which contained a detailed characterization and criticism of Modernism. But the Encyclical went farther. It directed bishops to be vigilant regarding doctrinal tenets of their professors in philosophico-theological seminaries and concerning the books used and consulted by students. The Pope charged the bishops to establish vigilance committees to see that there be no further infiltration of false doctrines. He threatened the adherents of the latter with excommunication. On Sept. 1, 1910 Pius went even still farther and in his Motu-Proprio* "Sacrorum Antistitum" ordered every priest in the world to take the "Oath against Modernism"—a solemn profession of Faith and abjuration of all Modernistic errors, which are specifically enumerated. Those who refused to take the Oath were to be deposed and no longer permitted to function as pastors or teachers. (Decree of the Holy Office, Aug. 28, 1907). The Oath is still in vogue and demanded of all clerics before the reception of Major Orders, of professors at all Catholic philosophico-theological institutions of learning before accepting office as also at the beginning of each scholastic year; of all Pastors of souls, prelates (Bishops, Generals, Provincials) and of all Religious Superiors before canonical induction into office, or, as in the case of Bishops, before consecration or transferal to a new Diocese. This ruling was confirmed by a Decree of the Holy Office, March 22, 1918 and by the Constitution "Deus Scientiarum Dominus", of May 14, 1931, which required the Oath not only of all Catholic professors, lay and cleric, at Universities, but also of all candidates for academic degrees.

Modernism is practically a dead issue in the Catholic Church, whereas only a relatively small number of Protestant Divines still adhere strictly to its doctrines. The most of them cleve to the old doctrines and demand something more for their own convictions and from their followers than mere sentiment or personal interior experience as the basis of universal, absolute truth and the foundation of a religion that deals with eternal, unalterable values. See ecclesiastical commissions.

Lexikon f. Theologie u. Kirche VII, 249-253, Cath. Encyc. X, 415-421, Dict. de la Theol. Cath. X, 2009-47. For the recorded Acts of Pius X cf. Acta Sanctae Sedis and "Acta Apost. Sedis" of the corresponding years; also H. Denziger, Enchiridion Symbolorum pp. 564-586 (Freiburg in Br.: Herder, 1932) ; J. M. Sterret, Modernism in Religion (London, 1922) ; R. L Moxon, Modernism and Orthodoxy (ib. 1924) ; J. Rickaby, The Modernist (ib. 1908) , The New Cath. Dictionary (London and New York, 1929) p 641; Seppelt-Loffler-Frommelt, Short History of the Popes (London and St. Louis. Herder, 1932) pp 508-512 (a good explanation with citation of Papal Acts).   R.M.H.

modernist: Broadly, one who makes the methods and results of modern thought and life the norms for judging the claims of religious tradition. Specifically, a modernist insists on applying the contemporary historio-critical method without favor to the sources, distinguishes the abiding experiences of religion reproducible today from the changing categories of Scripture and creed, and accepts the deliverances of tradition to the degree they are reconcilable with evolution, immanence, democracy and similar prevailing thought-forms of the modern world. See liberal theology; modernism. Cf. fundamentalism.   F.G.E.

modes, ecclesiastical: (also medieval modes, church modes) Series of notes in scales with no definite pitch implied but with definite arrangements of whole and half-tone intervals between notes. The church modes grew out of the Greek system of modes. They were used as early as the second century. All Gregorian chant* and all polyphonic* music before 1600 was written in the modal system. In the final system of modes there were fourteen scales, the odd numbers being authentic where the extreme notes of the scale were the same as the final, and the even numbers being plagal where the final notes were the same as the corresponding authentic modes but the extreme notes were a fourth below the corresponding authentic modes. The dominant note of each mode was the reciting note. The dominant note was a fifth above the final of each authentic mode and a third above the final of each plagal mode, except when either dominant or final should fall on B in which case it was moved to C.

Mode I—Dorian Extreme note D Final D Dominant A Mode II—Hypodorian
  Extreme note A Final D Dominant F
Mode III—Phrygian
  Extreme note E Final E Dominant C Mode IV—Hypophrygian Extreme note B Final E Dominant A* Mode V—Lydian
  Extreme note F Final F Dominant C
Mode VI—Hypolydian
  Extreme note C Final F Dominant A Mode VII—Mixolydian Extreme note G Final G Dominant D
Mode VIII—Hypomixolydian Extreme note D Final G Dominant C Mode IX—Aeolian
  Extreme note A Final A Dominant E
Mode X—Hypoaeolian
  Extreme note E Final A Dominant C Mode XI—Ionian Extreme note C Final C Dominant G Mode XII—Hypoionian
  Extreme note G Final C Dominant E Mode XIII—Locrian (hypothetical) Mode XIV—Hypolocrian (hypothetical)
* exception.

Many medievalists professed that each mode had its own ethos and was especially suitable to a particular use in time or place or mood, much like the Greek idea of ethos.

G. Grove, Dictionary of Music and Musicians (1935), article modes, ecclesiastical; G. Reese, Music in the Middle Ages (1940); D. Ferguson, A History of Musical Thought (1935).   E.H.B.

modus vivendi: See concordat.

Moffat, Robert: (1795-1883) Scottish missionary, born near Edinburgh, who set out for Africa in 1816. For more than twenty years he labored in South Africa, translated the N.T. and Psalms into the Bechuana tongue, and the whole of the Bible into Sechwana. He was a versatile builder, smith, farmer, linguist, author and teacher who converted his primitive followers into civilized Christians. David Livingstone* became his son-in-law.   P.E.J.

Mohammed or Muhammad or Mahomet: (570-632 A.D.) The founder of the religion that bears his name (Mohammedanism*), was born into the powerful Kareish tribe at Mecca* in Arabia. At first he was called Ubu'l Kassim, later entitled Mohammed, meaning "the Praised

One". His father died two months before his birth, and his mother when he was six years of age. He was reared first by a grandfather, and then by an uncle, as a boy joining the latter in caravan journeys. At the age of 25 he became the chief merchant and camel driver of a rich widow, Khadija, whom he married three years later. In business enterprises he visited Palestine and Syria, met Arabians, Jews and Christians, and conversed often with them of God. His reputation for honesty and justice was well established, and with four others he vowed to take the part of the oppressed.

With time to brood upon the larger issues of life, he sought a greater revelation of God. The popular belief in many gods and idol worship was abhorrent to him. He decided there is only one God, Allah*, and salvation requires submission to him. With this conviction he committed himself to the service of the one true God, and received an urgent call to be his prophet. He recognized other prophets as Adam, Abraham, Moses and Jesus, and believed himself to be the final prophet to whom the complete revelation was given. A vision came to him and a voice saying, "Iqra" (recite), delivered a series of messages from God that became the Koran. His wife, Khadija, his nephew Ali, and the freedman adopted as his son Zaid, promptly accepted his revelations, which came over a period of twenty-three years.

In the first year of his mission he won only eight converts, who assembled in his home and prayed faithfully to Allah. After three years, with scarcely twenty followers, he publicly declared his purpose to overthrow the 360 idols and establish worship of Allah, the one God. Persecuted, boycotted and segregated, he appealed to the citizens of Yathrib (later called al-Medina, "the city", i.e., of the prophet), who agreed to receive him. His flight from Mecca to a mountain cave is known as the hijra or hejira, and initiated the era and calendar of Islam, July 16, 622 A.D.

At Medina by eloquent preaching he converted the whole city except the Jews, and became dictator upon a sixfold pledge: (1) we will not worship any but the one God; (2) we will not steal; (3) we will not commit adultery; (4) nor kill our children; (5) we will not slander in anywise; (6) nor will we disobey the prophet in anything that is right. He built a mosque for daily prayers and congregational worship, carried on a thorough program of military and religious education, attacked caravans from Mecca, and defeated Meccan armies in decisive battles.

When Mecca surrendered he became its dictator at the age of 60. His first act was to abolish the idols, a reform which has survived in Islam to this day. With military victory he changed from a prophet to a conquering ruler. He persecuted the Jews who refused to accept his religion, and reduced Christians to dependency. He sent embassies to the four great empires of Abyssinia, Egypt, Greece and Persia, demanding allegiance to the faith, and when they refused he unified Arabia and invaded these empires. Two years later he died (632 A.D.) but his armies marched on in fanatical zeal until they conquered three continents.

As a prophet Mohammed saw a vision of one God and one brotherhood of the faith. He had the conviction and the courage to attack evil and proclaim his message. As a statesman he was vigorous, astute, determined and irresistible. He won and organized his followers by contagious purpose into a compact moral force. He was faithful to his family and friends until his first wife died, then provided himself with a harem, and attacked his enemies with fury and deception. The force of his personality continues to influence the millions of his devoted followers.

Sir William Muir, The Life of Mahomet (4 vols. London, 1858-1861, abridged in one vol. 1894); D S Margoliouth, Mohammed and the Rise of Islam (1905), Tor Andrae, Mohammed the Man and His Faith (1936), Essad Bey, Mohammed (tr by H. L. Ripperger, 1936). P.E.J.

MOHAMMEDAN TERMINOLOGY: Abu

Hanifa, Admadiya; Al-Kindi or Alchindus; Al-Gazzali or Al-Ghazali, Al-Farabi or Alfarabius; Allah; Avicenna or Ibn-Sina; Averrhoes or Averroes; Bahaism; bismillah; caliph or khalif; crescent, Druses; fakih; faker or faqir; Fatiha or Fatihah; fatwa or futwa, fiqh; Gabars or Ghebers; Gehenna; Hadith or hadis, hadj or hajj; Hallaj or al-Hallaj; hegira; Hanbal; Iblis or Eblis; ijma; imam or imaum; Islam; Ismailis, Israfil or Israfel; jihad or jehad, jinn; Kaaba or Caaba, kafir or kaffir; kalam, khalif, Kharijites, kibla or kiblah; kismet; Koran or Quran; Mahdi; Malikites; Mecca, Medina, mimbar, Moslem; mosque, mufti, mujtahid, mulla, Murjites, mutakallim or mutikallimum, Mutazilites, pir; qadi; Qadarites; Qarmatians; Quran; Ramadan; Sabaism; shaikh; Shi ites, Sufism, Sunna; Sunnites, suras, taqiyya; tauhid, ulama; Wahabites, welis or walis, zakat.

The above terms appear separately in this Encyclopedia. P.E.J.

Mohammedanism: The religion of the followers of Mohammed* (570-632 A.D.), who announced himself as the prophet of the one true God, Allah*. Numerous references to Hebrew and Christian traditions indicate unquestionably his indebtedness to these faiths. For a time he allied himself with the Jews and Christians, declaring the same God, honoring many of the same prophets, and facing Jerusalem in prayer. The primitive religion of Arabia and Zoroastrianism* were other sources providing content for the new faith taking form in the dynamic mind of Mohammed. Yet the prophet did not borrow slavishly from any source; and whatever passed through the crucible of his experience came forth transformed. Islam is less dependent upon Judaism than is Christianity. Before long Mohammed turned from Jerusalem to Mecca*, and the breach among these religions widened to a chasm.

The passionate zeal for the mission of Allah, which Mohammed found in revelations, was eloquently communicated to his family and friends, but resisted by the citizens of Mecca who thought him demented. Persecution drove him to flee and seek converts elsewhere. His first religious community was established at Medina*, and after bitter contests the city of Mecca was finally won. Ten years after his flight all Arabia was united in a powerful movement of radical reform. In less than 25 years his followers had taken Egypt, Palestine, Persia and Syria. In 75 years North Africa and Spain were embraced in the crescent*, and Islam remained for centuries the dominant empire of the Mediterranean world.

For 28 years after Mohammed's death the leadership was carried on successively by four of his closest comrades Abu Bekhr, Omar, Othman and Ali. (See caliph). Thereafter permanent political divisions arose. 1) The Omayyad Caliphate (660-750 A.D.) at Damascus extended its sway over North Africa and Spain. 2) The Abbaside Caliphate (750-1258 A.D.) maintained its capital at Bagdad. 3) The Fatimite Caliphate (910-1171 A D) ruled Egypt and North Africa 4) The Spanish Caliphate was established at Cordova (755-1236 A.D.); 5) the Moorish Caliphate at Granada (1238-1492 A.D.); 6) The Ottoman Turkish Caliphate came to power in 1299 and continued to 1924 A.D., when the Sultan at Constantinople was deposed by the National Assembly.

The two main sects of Islam split over the question of the successor to Mohammed. The *Sunnites recognize the first four Caliphs as true successors of Mohammed, while the *Shi ites uphold family succession, and regard Ali and his followers as the divinely ordained Caliphs. The Sunnites number 150,000,000 and as the majority body hold firmly to the orthodox traditions. They adhere strictly to the *Sunna (Way) which has come down directly from the founder The Shi ites represent the liberal branch of Islam, and continue to look for a future leader (imam). From this group arose the mystical devotion of *Sufism, the messianic and missionary *Bahaist and other movements.

The Moslem faith (iman) rests first of all in the basic conviction of one God and no other. Allah is addressed in prayer by 99 names, and his attributes include all-seeing, all-hearing, all-speaking, all-knowing, all-willing, all-powerful. He is loving, compassionate, forgiving yet stern in punishment and arbitrary in purpose. Associated with God are angels* who support his throne, guard hell, and serve as intermediaries. The four chief angels are Gabriel, who brings revelations, Michael, guardian of the Jews, Raphael (Azrael), the angel of death; and Uriel (Israfil) who is to sound the trumpet at the resurrection.* There are also good and evil spirits (*jinn or genii).

Chief sources of revelation are sacred scriptures and prophets. Of 104 sacred books, only four are thought to have survived, The Pentateuch, the Psalms, the Gospel and the Koran. The Koran is so final that no other book is needed. It is the created word of God, eternally preserved on tablets in heaven, revealed to Mohammed by Gabriel. Many prophets are referred to and though the number is put as high as 300,000 the six chief prophets are Adam, Noah, Abraham, Moses, Jesus and Mohammed, each commissioned to proclaim a new dispensation. Mohammed, the last and greatest of the prophets is predicted by all of his predecessors.

The eschatology is an elaborate portrayal of the final judgment, heaven and hell. The souls of unbelievers will be tortured in hell until the resurrection at the end of the world, when the trumpet sounds and the graves will open. Good and evil deeds are weighed in the balance, and everyone must pass over hell on a bridge finer than a hair and shaper than a sword. As the righteous enter heaven they will be invited to feasting, music, fine garments, perfume, and large-eyed maidens.

The five duties (din) laid upon every Moslem are: 1) profession of faith, i.e., repeating the creed daily; 2) prayer five times every 24 hours facing Mecca; 3) almsgiving, or the payment of poor-rates; 4) fasting every day from dawn to dusk in the month of Ramadan, and 5) the pilgrimage to Mecca once in a life time.

Mohammedans number about 160,000,000 in Asia, 44,000,000 in Africa, 5,000,000 in Europe and 20,000 in North America, a total of approximately 209,020,000. The civil and criminal laws arise from the Koran and the Sunna. Circumcision is practiced, four wives are allowed, the husband may divorce a wife by declaration and refunding part of the dowry. Alcoholic liquors, pork and meat offered to idols, strangled or killed by a blow, are prohibited. The unity and traditionalism of Islam is deeply affected by the upheaval of modern civilization, but the loyalty of Moslems is not surpassed by adherents of any religion. See Alfarabi; sacred literatures; salvation.

A. S. Ameer, The Spirit of Islam (1922); T. W. Arnold, The Legacy of Islam (1931); R. Levy, The Sociology of Islam (2 vols. 1930-1933); D. B. MacDonald, The Religious Attitude and Life in Islam (1909); and The Encyclopedia of Islam.   P.E.J.

Mohammedanism in China: See Chinese religions.

Mohenjo-daro: Site of an ancient city in the Indus Valley excavated and described by Sir John Marshall, revealing a highly developed culture in India as early as 3000 B.C., long before the invasion of the Aryans. Of the utmost importance in the study of the origins of Hinduism*.

Sir John Marshall, Mohenjo-daro and the Indus Civilization (London, 1931), 3 vols.   c.s.b.

Mohism: See Chinese Terminology.

moira: See fate.

moksha: The general term meaning salvation in Hinduism. The specific content of the term varies according to the sect to which one belongs. See salvation, Hindu.   c.s.b.

Molinism: One of the systems which tries to explain the action of divine grace on the human will. Luis de Molina (1535-1600), the Spanish Jesuit who first developed it, emphasizes the freedom of the will without detracting from the efficacy and priority of grace. Molinism as modified by Leonard Lessius* (1554-1623) is still taught in the theological schools of the Jesuits*. It occasioned a great theological struggle in the Roman Catholic Church in the seventeenth century.

E.A R.

Molinos, Michel: (1640-1692) Spanish priest who became popular director of conscience at Rome and chief exponent of Catholic Quietism*. His Guide spirituelle revealed in 1675 his theory of the union of purified souls with God in this life, thus nullifying the offices of the Church. His book was condemned and he was imprisoned by the Inquisition* until his death, the date of which is not certain. See Guyon, Madame.   w.w.c.

Moloch or Molech: A pagan deity to whom children were sacrificed at Topheth in the Valley of Hinnom outside Jerusalem, mentioned in the Hebrew Bible in Lev. 18:21, 20:2-5; I Kings 11.7, II Kings 23·10, Jer. 32.35, in the Septuagint text of Amos 5·26, and in Acts 7.43. The form Molech is Hebrew, the Greek form being Moloch. The worship of this deity was apparently introduced by Ahaz, suppressed by Josiah, and possibly later revived. The common scholarly opinion has been that Moloch was a Canaanite fire-god Melek ("King") whose name was written by the Hebrews with the vowels of bosheth ("shame"). Recent studies have shown that there was an ancient Syro-Mesopotamian deity Muluk (or Malik), and that Punic molok meant "vow" or "pledge". · It has therefore been conjectured that Moloch was an early Semitic deity who was the special patron of vows, to whom children were sacrificed as the most binding pledge of the sanctity of a vow (W. F. Albright). See Gehenna.   J.P.H.

Molokans: See Russian sectarianism.

monadism or monadology: (Gr. monas, unit) The name referring to the pluralistic metaphysical theory which, denying quantitative monism, sponsors qualitative monism and finds in relatively (or completely) self-sufficient, animate entities autonomous and unique centers of action (monads).

Natural law and interaction among monads has received a different explanation ever since Bruno* first advanced this concept. In recent theory (cf. J. Ward, W. James, C. Hartshorne), the independence of monads has been used to explain natural evil, evolution, and to affirm some contingency at the heart of things. See Leibniz; panpsychism.   P.A.B.

monarchianism: A doctrine current within the second and third-century Church stressing the unity (monarchia) of the divine nature as against the ultimately-prevailing tendency to affirm personal distinctions within the Godhead. It is customary to distinguish two broad types. The first, called dynamistic, was represented by the Alogi, Theodotus of Byzantium, Artemon, and Paul of Samosata*. They taught that Christ was a mere man who had been adopted or constituted the Son of God, rather than possessing a metaphysical equality with the Father. The second, called modalism, held that the persons of the Trinity* were but modes of the one God's manifestation. Noetus of Smyrna, Praxeas of Carthage, and Sabellius were among its adherents. See patripassianism; Sabellianism.   F.G.E.

monarchomachs: The name was invented by William Barclay in his De regno et regali potestate (1600) to describe any writer who justified the right to resist. It did not imply an objection to monarchy as such. The monarchomachs were a group of Huguenot pamphleteers who developed arguments in opposition to absolute royal power. Their aim was constitutional monarchy, the king deriving his power from the people or community.
J. W. Allen, A History of Political Thought in the Sixteenth Century (London, 1928), J. N Figgis, Studies of Political Thought from Gerson to Grotius (Cambridge, 1923), 2 ed.; R. Treumann, Die Monarchomachen (Leipzig, 1895)   H.H.

monasticism: A concept used to denote a mode of life pertaining to people living in seclusion from the world, having religious vows, and following a fixed rule. The purpose is always the same by withdrawing from the world the religious hopes to achieve a life whose ideal is different from and largely at variance with that followed by the majority of mankind, and the means used to gain this ideal are self-abnegation and an organized asceticism*. Monasticism is not something peculiar to Christianity for we find it being practiced in every religion that has reached a high ethical development and integration. Pre-Christian monasticism flourished amongst two groups of Jews, the Essenes and the Therapeutae. The beginnings of Christian monasticism are found in Egypt of the third century A.D. where groups of hermits* bound themselves to a life of denial in certain things. Amongst these Egyptian cenobites* the most famous was St. Anthony*, and from him was derived that form of monastic life that prevailed in Egypt until the middle of the fifth century. However, this form of monasticism was more eremitical, and it was not until the time of St. Pachomius* (4th century) that true monasticism arose. About 315 Pachomius established the first Christian monastery at Tabennisi. Pachomius had introduced the idea of a "religious order" by giving laws that regulated the least detail of a monk's life, by having meals and prayers in common, and by making work a thing to be done for its own sake and not as a mere occupation, which it had been considered by the earlier hermits. The Pachomians spread rapidly through Egypt and Abyssinia until in 410 there were 7,000 Pachomian monks. This monachism began to wane about 500. In the Greek rite St. Basil* adapted the monastic ideal to the needs of the Eastern Church. (See Basilians) His variations of monasticism remained the standard among the Greeks and Eastern Slavs. Monasticism was brought to Rome by St. Athanasius* while visiting there in 340. The first permanent working adaptation of the ideal was effected by St. Benedict* who formed c. 500 the Benedictine* rule. Amongst the Benedictines the individual was enveloped in the corporate life of the community to which he bound himself. The great task of the day was the chanting of the Office, but amongst these monks work took a more important role than it had in Eastern monachism. Two innovations of Benedict were. 1) the ideal of law and order, i.e., the rule bound the abbot no less than the monk, 2) the idea of stability whereby a monk and the community were bound to each other for life. The only serious competitor in the West of the Benedictine rule was that of St. Columban* of Ireland, but in the 7th century the two rules met in the Columban abbeys of central Europe, and the rule of Benedict was adopted even by the Irish monks. With the wars against the Mohammedans arose two new types of religious orders the orders of ransom and the military orders*, and the beginning of the 13th century saw the origin of the great mendicant orders*. the Franciscans, the Dominicans, the Carmelites and the Augustinian Hermits. The beginning of the 13th century was a period of flourishing monasticism for the friars were in the first fervor of their origin and the older orders of monks were reflecting the results of Hillebrand's reforms. But in the latter 13th century and the 14th century a period of decline set in which, with the exception of some reforms, continued until the Reformation. With the Reformation a new type of religious arose, the Regular Clerks*, of whom the most famous are the Jesuits*. From the time of the Reformation until the present the lot of religious orders has been a varied one, especially since suppression by ecclesiastical and secular power has been used frequently against them. Yet beginning with the last half of the 19th century they have shown a remarkable revival and vitality of growth coupled with a great increase in new types of communities, especially in religious institutes which have the common life and take simple vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience. Most of these are called institutes or congregations. See abbey; Acoemetae, Anchorite; Cassian, Cassiodorus, Hieronymites; Humiliati, novice; prior.   T.T.M.

monergism: The doctrine of some Augustinians who affirmed that regeneration is the work of the Holy Spirit alone, the human will being passive and having no part. Cf. synergism.
                                             F.G.E.

monism, epistemological: See epistemology.

monism, metaphysical: See ontology.

Monod, Wilfred: (1867-) Professor of theology in the Faculty of Protestant Theology at Paris. Developing a modern gnosticism*, the impotency of God preoccupies him. He is of the opinion that there occurred a prehistoric moral and metaphysical fall. He distinguishes between a cosmogonic dynamism, a blind, instinctive, remarkable and demonic physical and vital impetus and a redemptive dynamism of the Logos. As the gnostics have been unjustly slandered and their dualism suppressed by the church, gnosticism did not have a chance to develop all its resources. The belief in the Demiurge*, the doctrine of the adversary, the view of "la quatrième idée" and the doctrine of trinity are the pivots of Monod's monumental system. His theology is partly a revival of Manichean* dualism. His dualism is not absolute, like that of the followers of Mani. The perpetuity and final victory of God and the good implies the ultimate redemption of the Demiurge of our world and the ultimate disappearance of demiurgic activity. Monod combines the Manichean tendencies with the theses of Giordano Bruno* and the angelology of St. Paul.

He admits that from the point of pure philosophy agnosticism is the only respectable and reasonable attitude towards the ontological problem of God. What he terms "la quatrième idée", is the hypothesis that the Father does not belong to the structure of the world. In order to believe in Him one must cease to seek Him in nature for nature remains an unknown X, sometimes divine, sometimes satanic. Thus God is different from the Father. He affirms God the Father but denies "God". The Father is neither in history nor in nature. Monod seeks to exculpate the true God from the responsibility of evil and suffering. Aux croyants et aux athees (Paris, 1906), Le problème du bien, Somme théologique; Journal d'un pasteur, 3 vols (Paris, 1935).   H.H.

monophysitism: Purely dogmatically considered the concept signifies the doctrine that insists upon the unity of the divine and human in Christ in the realm of physical life. In principle, the logos becomes flesh; in reality, however, the flesh becomes transformed into divine nature. The Syrian Jacobites*, the Coptic, Abyssinian and Armenian churches were monophysitic. The party's decisive characteristic is in opposition to the orthodox two-nature doctrine of Christ's nature adopted by the Council of Chalcedon*. See Agnoetae; Christology; Dyophysites; Eutyches; henoticon; monotheletism; Three Chapter controversy, Theopaschites.
G. Kruger, Monophysitische Streitigkeiten (Jena, 1884); H. v. Schubert, Geschichte der christlichen Kirche im Frühmittelalter (Tubingen, 1921); C .W. F. Walch, Entwurf einer vollständigen Historie der Ketzereien, Spaltungen und Religions-streitigkeiten, bis auf die Zeiten der Reformation (Leipzig, 1762-1785) in eleven volumes   H.H.

monotheism: The belief that the cosmos is a unity, that only one God exists in the universe, and that he has created and orders all things. This belief was introduced in Israel first by Second Isaiah in the exile about 440 B.C. and became increasingly popular until fully established in the course of post-exilic days. Many Egyptian scholars assert (see works of J. H. Breasted) Pharaoh Ikhnaton (1375-1358 B.C.) was a monotheist and some scholars maintain this also of Moses. See S. Freud, Moses and Monotheism (1939); W. F. Albright, From the Stone Age to Christianity (1940) and Archaeology and the Re- ligion of Israel (1942). The majority scholarly opinion is that both were still in the henotheistic stage. Although each worked relentlessly for the worship of the god he championed as the key to national unity, neither came to the point of denying the existence of other deities. The rival claims of primitive worshipers, each asserting that his particular god made sun, sky, land, sea, etc., should not be confused with monotheism, which is the product only of advanced philosophic speculation. See Amos; Elohim; henotheism; post-exilic, Isaiah (Second), shema, theism.   R E.W.

monotheletism: In its inception this Christological* doctrine held that the god-man acted as one, unitary energy. Later it asserted that Christ, as god-man, had one will. It was the monophysites who defended early a monergenetic and monotheletic Christology. The upholders of this doctrine were combated as heretics by the orthodox theologians. See Constantinople, Councils of; dyotheletism.
G. Owsepian, Die Entstehungsgeschichte des Monotheletismus (Leipzig, 1897); H. v. Schubert, Geschichte der christlichen Kirche im Frümittelalter (Tubingen, 1921).   H.H.

monsignor: (Ital. my lord, but without any feudal connotation; plural, monsignori, abbreviation, Mgr., or Msgr.) A title pertaining, by virtue of their office, to all prelates* of the Roman Catholic Church in the West. In a narrower sense the title is used for the prelates of the Roman Court, active and honorary, such as papal or domestic prelate. In Europe it is more gracefully the common title of bishops, e.g., in France, Monseigneur. See clergy.   J.F.T.

monstrance, or ostensorium: (Lat. monstrare or ostendere, to show) In the Roman Catholic Church a gold- or silver-plated vessel with a transparent section in which the Host* is carried in procession or exposed for adoration. Originally shaped like a tower, and later a Gothic chapel, the form now used is a band of precious metal about two inches deep encircling glass or crystals, front and back, between which (lunette) the Host is placed; this metal circlet, surrounded by metallic rays and surmounted by a cross, rests on a stem arising from a round and heavy base.
                    J.F.T.

Montaigne, Michel Eyquem, Sieur de: French essayist, b. at the Château de Montaigne, Périgord, March 28, 1533 and there d. September 11, 1592. Wealthy, well-educated, and somewhat of a traveller, Montaigne dabbled in law and politics until the age of thirty-seven, when he retired to his château where, for ten years, he fashioned the first two books of his famous Essays. During his absence on a year and a half of travelling, he was made, like his father, the mayor of Bordeaux, which office he held for four years. In 1588 he published a new edition of his Essays, revised and augmented by a third book. Though sometimes a sharp satirist of the Roman Catholic Church, he never renounced her, sometimes praised her greatly, and died during the celebration of Mass in his sick-room. Although his works received a certain amount of ecclesiastical disapproval because of their Pyrrhonian skepticism and occasionally deliberate lasciviousness, they are classics of charming grace and lusty vitality, fascinating in their brilliant reflections of a worldly-wise student of human nature.   J.F.T.

Montanism: A Christian sect of the second century A.D., named for Montanus of Ardabau in Phrygia. In 156 he proclaimed himself as the one through whom the dispensation of the Holy Spirit had begun. He was joined by the prophetesses Prisca and Maximilla in proclaiming the nearness of the end. The main body of the church rejected the validity of these prophets and division inevitably resulted. Many who opposed the increasing worldliness of the church were attracted to the Montanist movement, including Tertullian* the great African theologian who joined them in 207 A.D. The movement was an attempt to reassert a primitive point of view in the face of the growing Hellenization of the main body of the church. See baptism for the dead.   C.T.C.

Montgomery, James: See hymns.

Moody, Dwight Lyman: (1837-1899) The outstanding American revivalist since the Civil War. Born in Northfield, Massachusetts, one of nine children he received little formal education. He went to work in Boston at seventeen, where, in a matter of fact way he decided to become a Christian, and from that moment his life was increasingly dedicated to advance the cause of personal religion. Coming to Chicago he became a shrewd shoe salesman, though he never permitted business to crowd out religion, and soon set about organizing a Sunday School class made up of street urchins. This grew into a Sunday School, then into a Church and finally into a Bible Institute. His evangelistic career began on the close of the Civil War and his two early campaigns in England (1867, 1870) gave him a reputation throughout the English speaking world. Returning to America he was continuously engaged until his death in holding great meetings throughout the United States and in Great Britain. Moody's success as an evangelist seems impossible to explain adequately. He has been characterized as "rough, honest, sincere, flat, without frills, old-fashioned, ungrammatical, always simple and grandly in earnest". The impression he always left was that there was truth behind him greater than he.
     W. R. Moody, D. L. Moody (1930); Gamaliel Bradford, D. L. Moody A Worker in Souls (1927).   W.W.S.

Moore Lectures, T. V.: The "T. V. Moore Lectures" were founded by a bequest of Thomas Verner Moore, formerly a professor in San Francisco Theological Seminary, San Anselmo, California. According to the terms of the gift the lectures shall be positive expositions or defenses of some aspect of Biblical study or of Christian truth, and shall be given only by men who are known as sincere believers in what is known historically as the evangelical Reformed Faith.

The endowment amounts to $17,000. The first series of lectures was given by Robert E Speer. Other lecturers have been Hugh Thompson Kerr, Adolph Keller, and E. Stanley Jones.   A.C.M

moral a priori, or primacy of the practical reason: Kant, believing it "a fact of the practical reason" that man should do his duty and carry out the categorical imperative*, found implied three postulates· moral responsibility and the freedom of the will, an immortal life in which duty can be completed; God, who will recompense men according to their fulfillment of duty. In view of its capacity to affirm these postulates on subjects regarding which the purely theoretical reason can arrive at no conclusions, Kant recognizes a certain "primacy of the practical reason", sometimes called "the moral a priori".   W.K.W.

moral argument for God: See God.

moral influence theory: See Abailard, atonement, satisfaction.

moral law: The ultimate principles that should govern human conduct. For Kant these are found in the categorical imperative*. See conscience, ethics, law. Cf. haustafel.   W.K.W.

moral obligation: Moral obligation, or duty, is felt as a command to follow a prescribed course of action in preference to opposing inclinations. This feeling has been variously interpreted as: the dicta of conscience*, the voice of God, the authoritativeness of an ideal, the social pressure of one's group, the compulsive influence of moral tradition, the demand for integration in behalf of the whole self in overcoming refractory impulses; and so on. It has been attributed to intuition, reason, habit, experience, and divine revelation.   W.K.W.

moral optimism: (religious meliorism) The attitude toward life which goes beyond meliorism* in asserting a divine factor which responds favorably to man's moral endeavor. This attitude is critically optimistic and goes beyond any heroic attitude, however good, which stops short of a belief in divine providence for man. As so defined, this view is held by D. C. Macintosh. See optimism.   V.F.

moral progress: See progress.

moral realism: See realism, moral.

Moral Re-Armament: See Oxford Group.

moral sense: A capacity believed by Shaftesbury, Hutcheson, and other eighteenth century philosophers to develop in the mind as a result of the association of ideas. It affirms moral judgments intuitively, and affords pleasure of a somewhat aesthetic character in approval of right actions and displeasure in disapproval of wrong actions. See H. Bonar, Moral Sense (1930).

w.k.w.

moral theology: A term regularly used to describe the study of the Christian life in relation to God's revealed will, and by extension the entire problem of human life in relation to God, morally speaking. This subject includes the principles of the divine will and that will relative to man (eternal law, natural law, positive law, etc.), a study of the nature and "end" of man in the light of the divine law; and a consideration of human behavior in relation to that law. The study of cases (casuistry), with various theories of their treatment, is also part of the general subject.

w.n.p.

morality plays: See religious drama.

morals, double standard of: See double standard of morals.

Moravian Church, the: Its origin is traced to the evangelical movement in Bohemia led by John Hus*, who suffered martyrdom in 1415. Followers of the reformer effected an organization, 1457, called Unitas Fratrum* (Unity of Brethren). Four principles served as basis of their union (a) the Bible as the only source of Christian doctrine, (b) public worship to be conducted on the model of the Apostolic Church, (c) the Lord's Supper to be received in faith and defined in the language of Scripture, (d) true Christian life as essential evidence of saving faith. For their independent ministry the historic episcopate was secured through the Waldenses*, yet church polity inclined to the conferential pattern. Growth of the Church in Bohemia and Moravia was rapid. (See Bohemian (or Czech) Brethren.) By 1500, there were about 400 parishes and 200,000 members. Ecclesiastical resources were developed through elaboration of a confession of faith, translation of the Scriptures from the original tongues, schools, colleges, and theological seminaries, publication of catechisms and hymn-books. The Unitas Fratrum was the first church to put a hymnal* in the vernacular into the hands of the people, first edition 1501.

The history of the Unitas Fratrum, for two centuries, was largely one of cruel persecutions. Its organization was crushed during the Thirty Years' War*. With the death of Bishop John Amos Comenius*, famous educator, the first part of the history of the Unitas ends, but not before this man of vision had provided for possible resuscitation by perpetuating the episcopacy through regular consecration and by publication of his "Ratio Disciplinae", embodying the principles of the polity, the teaching, the work, and the discipline of the Unitas.

The second part opens, 1722, when a company of fugitives from Moravia (hence the modern name Moravian Church), who had preserved traditions of their fathers, found refuge in Saxony on the estate of Count Nicolaus Ludwig von Zinzendorf*, in the event their leader. Their settlement, Herrnhut, became the rallying center for like-minded compatriots, German pietists*, and others, so that renewal of the Church on the old principles was invigorated by an infusion of new life from the evangelical Church of Germany. The fame of Herrnhut, as presenting a union of spiritual life with good works and industrial activity, led to similar settlements elsewhere. Within two decades, centers were established in England and America. And a wonderful spiritual experience, 1727, inspired evangelizing zeal which led Moravians to embark on mission efforts in distant fields, thus inaugurating the modern Protestant missionary movement.

Present Condition and Characteristics.

(I). Enterprises. (a) Foreign missions in Labrador, Alaska, among the Indians of North America. in the West Indies, Nicaragua, Honduras, Demarara, Surinam, Africa (South Africa and East Central Africa), West Himalaya. (b) The "Diaspora Work", an extensive agency for promoting spiritual life within the National (Protestant) Churches, without drawing members into the Moravian Church, carried on in Germany, Denmark, Norway, Sweden, Switzerland, and Russia. (c) Boarding schools, colleges, theological seminaries. (d) Church evangelization in Bohemia and Moravia.

(II). Constitution and Government. The whole Moravian Church, home provinces and mission fields, is still an organic Unity, each portion maintaining its own characteristics. Constitution and government are essentially conferential. General Synods and Provincial Synods meet periodically, General and Provincial Boards discharge the administrative functions. Moravian orders of the ministry are bishops, presbyters, and deacons.

(III). Worship. This combines the liturgical element with large measure of freedom in order and forms of service. A litany is used at Sunday morning worship. Special liturgical services distinguish the festivals of the ecclesiastical year and certain "Memorial Days" in the history of the Moravian Church. The hymnology is rich and the music fully developed.

(IV). Doctrine. The Modern Moravian Church has not put forth a formal confession of faith, but the cardinal points of doctrine are found in its catechism, its Easter Morning Litany, and in its "Synodal Results". The Scriptures are held to be the only rule of faith and practice. In substantial agreement with other evangelical churches, the following truths are held to be essential, the doctrine of the total depravity of human nature, the love of God the Father, the real Godhead and the real humanity of Jesus Christ, our reconciliation to God and our justification by faith through the sacrifice of Jesus Christ, the Holy Ghost and His operations, good works as the fruit of the Spirit, the fellowship of believers, the second coming of the Lord, the resurrection of the dead unto life or unto condemnation, the Headship of Christ over the Church, which is His Body. See Spangenberg, A. G.

GENERAL STATISTICS (1942).

	Number of Congregations	Communicants	Total Membership
Continental Province (Europe)	25	8,022	9,909
Czechoslovakia Province	10	1,232	5,395
British Province	42	3,166	3,524
American Province, North	105	18,553	22,486
American Province, South	42	10,660	14,430
Totals of the Home Church	224	41,633	55,744
Foreign Missions	337	55,624	171,554
Affiliated Societies "Diaspora", Europe	42	———	30,000
Totals	603	97,257	257,298

E deSchweinitz, History of the Church Known as the Unitas Fratrum (1885); J. Th. Mueller, Geschichte der Boemischen Brueder, 3 vols. (Herrnhut, 1922-1931); J. T Hamilton, History of the Moravian Church during the 18th and 19th Centuries (1900).   W.N.S.

More, Henry: (1614-1687) For this Cambridge Platonist God is infinitely extended throughout space and time and has at his disposal a subordinate spiritual being, the spirit of nature by which he can hold together in an orderly and purposive system a world which if left to mechanical forces would inevitably fly apart.

A Collection of Several Philosophical Writings (London, 1712), 4th ed.; Opera omnia (London, 1675-79), 4 vols.   H.H.

More, Paul Elmer: (1864-1937) American critic and philosopher, leading exponent of the New Humanism*. Although he taught for brief periods at Harvard and Bryn Mawr, was for five years editor of The Nation, and later lectured occasionally at Princeton, he devoted himself mainly to writing.

His principal works include Shelburne Essays (11 vols, 1904-21), Platonism (1917), The Religion of Plato (1921), Hellenistic Philosophies (1923), The Christ of the New Testament (1924), Christ the Word (1927), New Shelburne Essays (3 vols, 1928-36), and The Catholic Faith (1931).   L.W.C.

More, Sir Thomas: (1478-1535) His political satire, the Utopia, though modeled externally on Plato's Republic, really expressed its author's dislike of an acquisitive society, the economic business enterprise. His sharpest shafts of irony were reserved for the perfidy of diplomacy. The morality of an ideal community, as he saw it, was to produce good citizens and men of intellectual and moral freedom, to do away with idleness, to supply the physical needs of all without excessive labor, to abolish luxury and waste, to mitigate both poverty and wealth, and to minimize greed and extortion. His moral idea expressed the reasonableness and open-mindedness of humanism, the futility of a moral aspiration that cannot make its account with brute fact.

W. E. Campbell, More's Utopia and his Social Teaching (London, 1930), R. W. Chambers. "The Saga and the Myth of Sir Thomas More" Proceedings of the British Academy (London, 1927).   H.H.

Morehouse, Henry L.: (1834-1917) For thirty-eight years prominent in Baptist Home Mission work. Supported founding of University of Chicago and selection of Harper as its first president. Established Ministers and Missionaries Benefit Board of the Northern Baptist Convention.   C.H.M.

mores: See culture.

Morgan, Thomas: See deism.

Morgan, Thomas Jefferson: (1839-1902) Soldier, Baptist clergyman, educator, denominational leader. Favored just war Commissioner of Indian Affairs under Harrison. Corresponding Secretary American Baptist Home Mission Society.   C.H.M.

Mormon, Book of: Record of early inhabitants of America.

Joseph Smith, Jr.,* claimed angel visits in spring of 1820 and in September 1823, and that gold plates were given him September 22, 1827. The translation of these plates is the Book of Mormom, first published in March 1830, by E. B. Grandin, Palmyra, New York. (There have been over one hundred editions since then.) It relates to three migrations. a) circa 2200 B.C. from Tower of Babel. These were al' killed. b) Descendants of Manasseh from Jerusalem circa 600 B C. c) Colony from Jerusalem led by son of Zedekiah 588 B.C. The latter two immigrations combined, and later divided to form the Nephites and Lamanites. These were visited by Christ after his resurrection and for two hundred years lived in peace. Later, circa 400 A.D., war destroyed all but the Lamanites, who are the ancestors of the American Indians.   S A.B.

Mormons: See Latter Day Saints, Utah Mormon communism. See communistic settlements, religious.

Morrison, Robert: (1782-1834) The first Protestant missionary to China, born of Scottish parents at Buller's Green, Northumberland. He studied the Chinese language in England and was sent in 1807 by the London Missionary Society to Canton, where he became translator for the East India Company. He published a translation of the N.T. in 1814, and with Rev. William Milne a translation of the O.T. in 1818. He founded an Anglo-Chinese college in 1820, trained Chinese evangelists, and opened a dispensary. He constructed a Chinese grammar (1815) and a Chinese dictionary (6 vols. 1821.). He died in Canton, August 1, 1834.   P.E.J.

Morse Lectureship, the: A lectureship established in 1865 by Professor Samuel F. B. Morse, the inventor of the telegraph. Its capital sum is $10,000, it is given at least once in two or three years at Union Theological Seminary, New York City. The donor expressed his desire that the lectures deal with the relation of the Bible to the sciences, "the vindication of the inspiration and authority of the Bible against attacks made on scientific grounds". Among the lecturers who have appeared on this foundation: J. H. Barrows, William Sanday, H. O. Taylor, J. H. Breasted, H. R. Marshall, G. F. Moore, mortal and venial sin: The major distinction in Catholic moral theology in regard to seriousness of sin*. Mortal sin is a deliberate sin in some weighty matter and thus an offence against God by which one cuts himself off from God or, in the scholastic phrase, deprives himself of sanctifying grace or, following I St. John v. 16, 17, brings on himself spiritual death. The act need not be with this deliberate intention, as in formal apostasy*, but only in fact, as in an act deliberately chosen that subverts right order in essential relations to God, fellowman, or self. Venial sin is that which is slight in matter or which is done without deliberation. See penance; retention of sins.   T.J.B.

J. A. Thomson, J. E. Frame.

(Data furnished by the Office of the Registrar of Union Theological Seminary, N. Y.)

V.F.

Moses: (Gr. form of Heb. moshen) The Egyptian name of the founder of the nation and religion of ancient Israel*, reputed author of the Pentateuch* and of the Oral Law of Judaism, and traditionally famous as the law-giver of Mount Sinai. Undoubtedly an historical person though no contemporary records of his life survive, except as incorporated in the Pentateuch from tradition transmitted orally for at least four centuries. The narratives of Exodus*, though in the form of a theological interpretation of Israel's constitutive period, and coloured with legend, embody the recollection of decisive events in which Moses was the leading figure, viz., a) the escape of the tribes from state-slavery in Egypt, culminating in an apparently miraculous deliverance from pursuit at a "sea of reeds" (traditionally, the Red Sea), and b) the creation of Israel as a people through a covenant mediated by Moses at Mount Sinai (Horeb) between Yahweh, whose presence was manifested by volcanic phenomena, and the escaped tribesmen. To the account of these events is prefixed the personal story of Moses, his Egyptian upbringing and Midian exile, his call to prophetic leadership and his return to demand, with the support of plagues sent by Yahweh, liberty for his people.

In spite of its theological setting, legendary elements and imaginary detail, there are good reasons to credit the substantial historicity of this account the strength of the tradition, its congruity with the dating and circumstances of Egyptian history, Moses' Egyptian name and connections, and above all the distinctiveness of Israelite prophetic religion as reflecting the outstanding personality and work of a religious founder. Moses is remembered neither as a warrior nor as a law-giver in his own right, but as a prophet commissioned to speak for and to his people, to announce and interpret Yahweh's actions on the plane of history, to claim for Yahweh the exclusive allegiance of Israel, and to be a spokesman of Yahweh's will. The classical prophetic movement of the 8th and 7th centuries B.C. was consciously a renewal of Mosaic prophetism (see prophecy), and is inexplicable without it as an antecedent. To the moral stature and spiritual experience of Moses may be traced the thought of a God who is not localized, is without sex or consort and indeed is anthropopsychic rather than anthropomorphic and therefore cannot be represented by a god-image; who passionately demands the exclusive allegiance of his people, and whose presence is most distinctively felt in the demands of his ethical will for gratitude, loyalty and response to his righteous purpose and his mercy, whose power is manifest in abnormal physical and psychic phenomena, but also in the arena of events which condition man's moral choices, whose worship is the bond of society because it is fulfilled not only by cultic acts but by moral behaviour producing social cohesion and well-being. See decalogue; Israel, religion and theology; Old Testament; tables of the law.

R.B.Y S

Moses, Apocalypse of: See Jubilees, Book of.

Moses, Assumption of: See Assumption of Moses.

Moses ben Nahman, known also as Bonastruc Da Porta: (1194-1270) Celebrated Spanish Jewish Talmudist, theologian and exegete. Born in Gerona, Spain, the Jewish community of which he later served as rabbi, he very early won fame as a Talmudic* scholar. The most popular of his writings was his semi-mystical and semi-rational commentary on the Pentateuch*. His success in defending Judaism against Christianity in a disputation held before King Jaime of Aragon in Barcelona in 1263 was responsible for his exile from his native land. In 1267 he migrated to Palestine where three years later he died. Cf. Jewish Encyclopedia, Moses ben Nahman. See Kabbalah.   S.R.

Moses de Leon: See Zohar.

Mosheim, Johann Lorenz von: (1694-1755) German Lutheran theologian and Church historian, professor and chancellor at Helmstedt, later at Goettingen. Considered the outstanding scholar of the Lutheran Church of his day, Mosheim wrote on all branches of theology but he is best remembered for his historical writings, especially his Institutes of Ecclesiastical History (1726). He describes his theological position as "neither Pietist nor over-orthodox".   T.A.K.

Moslem: (Arabic, muslim, active participle of aslama of which the noun is islam, meaning submission) One who professes the faith of Islam; a follower of Mohammed*. See Mohammedanism.   P.E.J.

mosque: (French mosquee from Italian moschea; from Arabic, masjid; from sajada, to bow down, adore) A Mohammedan temple or place of worship. The mosque is also used to refer to the collective body of those who worship in mosques.

P.E.J.

motet: A short, unaccompanied, polyphonic*, choral composition based upon a Latin text which is usually liturgical. Superseding the more restricted style of the conductus* the motet came into prominent usage at the opening of the 13th century and was applied to every choral part of the mass except the Credo. The lack of devotion shown in the use of secular texts in some of the parts in combination with the liturgical Latin in other parts was gradually eliminated by the 16th century when the motet reached its greatest development in compositions by Orlando di Lasso, Josquin des Prés, Giovanni Pierluigi da Palestrina, William Byrd and Orlando Gibbons. In the 16th century the motet ceased to be employed for the regular parts of the mass and was used in prescribed places much as the anthem* was used in Protestant services.

H. Leichtentritt, Geschichte der Motette (1908).

E.H.B.

mother of god: See Virgin Mary. See also mother goddesses.

mother-goddesses: Familiar figures in primitive nature cults where the maintenance of fertility is a central interest of religion. Each early civilization around the eastern end of the Mediterranean had its traditional mother-goddess, e.g., Isis* in Egypt, Ashtart (see Ashtoreth) in Phoenicia, Cybele in Phrygia and Demeter in Greece. In each case she was originally the patroness of productivity but in the course of time her life-giving power was transferred also to the souls of men. She insured a blessed immortality for the dead. This development was especially conspicuous in the case of Isis There was a mother-goddess connected with all of the chief mystery religions* except Mithraism which was strictly a man's religion. The only mother-goddess to attain state recognition at Rome was Cybele from Phrygia. Tradition reported that the Romans, when hard pressed by Hannibal shortly before the year 200 B.C., officially introduced the worship of Cybele by importing a sacred meteoric stone from Pessinus in Phrygia and installing it with great solemnity in a shrine on the Palitine. Later a temple was reared upon the site where its remains may still be seen. She was known as "the mother of the gods" and in some respects was the prototype of the Christian Mary as "the mother of God." In general the function of a mother-goddess was to represent the deification of the female principle in the life of nature and mankind. See Gods; Roman religions. Cf. Kali; Mut.

G Showerman, The Great Mother of the Gods (1910); H A. Strong and J. Garstang, The Syrian Goddess (1913), L R Farnell, Cults of the Greek States (1907), vol. III, S. J. Case, Evolution of Early Christianity (1914), pp. 284-330.   s.j.c.

motherhood: Term applied to the experience of performing the function of caring for the needs of the young child by the mother. Usually includes the biological experience of giving birth to the child, the early satisfying of the organic needs of the infant, and its emotional development until maturity. Traditionally motherhood has been thought of as woman's primary role and the greatest honor accorded her has been for this function. Ancient cultures have glorified motherhood even though woman's status has been low, legally, socially, and religiously. With the emancipation of women leading to work outside the home, more careers open to them, motherhood in a more limited sense has come to be recognized in many groups, and a part of the traditional function has been transferred to others. Thus the role of the mother has undergone tremendous change. While her position in our culture is still exalted, other careers as well as that of motherhood have been opened to her. She is no longer expected to spend all of her time with her child, in fact modern psychology cautions against over-attachment, over-solicitude, and projection of her own ideas and aims upon the child. It is because of the early intimate association between the mother and child that the mother exerts a profound effect upon the personality pattern the child develops and his later social adjustment. See matriarchal system; woman, religious and ethical status of.   h.r.m.

motive: Whatever consciously or unconsciously induces one to adopt a certain course of action. In ethics the term means a consciously desired end which prompts to decision and action. The Utilitarians* distinguished motive, as referring to the foreseen desired end, from intention, as referring to all the expected consequences of a decision. This is a distinction made for purposes of analysis and in view of the integral nature of the emotional and intellectual aspects of all action breaks down as a description of psychological fact.   r.w f.

motu proprio: (Lat. of his own accord) A term designating the manner of composition, issuance and interpretation of certain acts of the Roman Pontiff as embodied in a personal document (cf. rescript*). It signifies that the disciplinary decree in question has been issued on the Pontiff's own initiative after a diligent examination, and is an expression of the certain knowledge and positive wish of the occupant of the Apostolic See. This term is sometimes loosely used substantively to indicate the famous rescript, the Instruction on Sacred Music of Pius X* in 1903, which is only one of many such documents issued by the pope. See bull, papal.   j.f.t.

Mozarabic liturgy: (Arabic musta' rab, meaning uncertain) The old Spanish liturgy, of the Gallican* type, preserved since 1500 by Cardinal Ximenes' Mozarabic Chapel at Toledo Cathedral. See liturgy.   e.r.h.

mozetta: (Ital. mozzo, shortened) An abbreviated cape with a rudimentary hood of silk or wool, red, violet or black in color, reaching to the elbows, and with an open front that may be closed by a row of small buttons. It is a non-liturgical vestment, signifying jurisdiction, and is worn at functions whereat the prelate* is present officially but is not officiating.   j.f.t.

Muenzer, Thomas: (1489-1525) Enthusiast, Anabaptist* preacher at Zwickau, Muhlhausen and elsewhere. A radical leader in the peasants' war*, he incited the peasants to violence and bloodshed, but was himself beheaded after his defeat at Frankenhausen in 1525.   E.C.K.

mufti: (Arabic mufti, active participle of afta, to give a *fatwa or legal decision) A Mohammedan priest or expounder of the law. Often an assessor to a court. In Turkey, it referred to the official head of the state religion and to deputies appointed by him.   P.E.J.

Muhlenberg, Henry Melchior: (1711-1787) "Father of the Lutheran Church* in America". Ordained in Germany, former instructor in Halle and author of Defence of Pietism (1741), he was sent by Francke* to assume charge of the scattered Lutheran churches of eastern Pennsylvania and arrived in Philadelphia in 1742. With Ecclesia Plantanda (the Church must be planted) as his motto, he carried on an extensive missionary work from New York to Georgia, organizing congregations, training and ordaining pastors, and writing liturgies, hymnals, and church constitutions. In 1748 he founded the first Lutheran synod in America, now known as the Ministerium of Pennsylvania. Evangelist, scholar, and administrator, Muhlenberg combined fervency with tolerance and made a constructive adaptation of Lutheranism to American life. The United Lutheran Church today represents the fruit of his labors. Muhlenberg was also the founder of a distinguished family, the father of three illustrious sons. Peter (1746-1807), Revolutionary general and U. S. Senator; Frederick (1750-1801), speaker of the first and of the third Congress; and Gotthilf Henry Ernst (1753-1815), clergyman and botanist who discovered nearly 200 new species of American flora. Muhlenberg's Journals are being published in English translation, the first volume having appeared in 1942.   T.A.K.

mujtahid: (Arabic, meaning one who exerts himself) A Moslem theologian. Among the Shiites*, a religious teacher, who is an authority on matters of law or theology.   P.E.J.

mukti: A variant term meaning salvation in Hinduism. See salvation, Hindu.   C.S.B.

Mulert, Hermann: (1879-) Before he became professor at the University of Kiel, he successively taught at Leipzig, Halle and Berlin. He is particularly known by his various writings on Schleiermacher*. He also devoted his energies to the investigation of the creeds. Since 1932 he also is editor of Die Christliche Welt.
Schleiermachers geschichtsphilosophische Ansichten in ihrer Bedeutung für seine Theologie (Giessen, 1907); Schleiermachers Sendschreiben an Lücke (Giessen, 1908); Weihnachtsfeier (Leipzig, 1908); Wahrhaftigkeit und Lehrverpflichtung (Tübingen, 1911); Der Christ und das Vaterland (Leipzig, 1915); Gebetserhörung, Freiheitsglaube, Gottesglaube (Leipzig, 1921); editor of 2 ed. of Wilhelm Diltheys "Leben Schleiermachers" (Berlin, 1922); Konfessionskunde (Giessen, 1927, 2 ed., Berlin, 1937); Evangelische Kirchen und theologische Fakultäten (Tübingen, 1930); Religion, Kirche, Theologie (Giessen, 1931); Schleiermacher und die Gegenwart (Frankfurt a. M., 1934).   H.H.

mulla: A learned teacher or expounder of laws and doctrines of Islam*. One trained in the mosque* schools who ranks as an official theologian. See ulama.   P.E.J.

Müller, Friedrich Max: (1823-1900) Gifted orientalist of German origin, whose active life was spent in Oxford; distinguished exponent of comparative philology and of comparative religion; editor of The Sacred Books of the East, in fifty-one volumes (1875-).   E.J.G.

Müller, George Friedrich: (1805-1898) German-born minister of Teignmouth, Devonshire, later the founder and superintendent of a large orphanage near Bristol, and author of many religious tracts and the widely popular book, The Lord's Dealings with George Müller. He taught that prayer should be relied upon to supply all temporal, as well as spiritual, needs, and accordingly, as a pastor, he refused a fixed salary. In old age he travelled and preached in many lands, including America.   L.H.DeW.

Müller, Julius: (1801-1878) He taught at Marburg and Halle. He opposed the effacement of Christianity with speculative philosophy and pantheism. He greatly influenced both Neander and Tholuck in their struggle against liberal theology, the enemies of Christianity, and confessionalism. He was in favor of the union of the confessional churches. Against the softening of the conception of sin on the part of the Enlightenment and idealism, he succeeded in reviving the full seriousness of sin. Müller's conception of sin, however, suffered from the same individualistic slant as that of the Enlightenment and idealism.
Christliche Lehre von der Sünde (Breslau, 1938-44), 2 vols.; Die Union, ihr Wesen und ihr göttliches Recht (Berlin, 1854).   H.H.

Müller, Karl: (1852-1935) German Protestant theologian. He was born in Langenburg, Würtemberg. In 1880 he became privatdozent in Berlin, in 1884 professor of Church History in Halle, in 1886 at Giessen, in 1891 at Breslau, and from 1903-1922 at Tubingen. Outstanding church historian, his aim was to discover the dynamic of the historical process and to describe its leading forces rather than to enumerate all the historical events irrespective of their historical significance.
Principal works:
Kirchengeschichte (1892-1919, 2nd ed. 1924-1929), 2 vols. in 3; Der Kampf Ludwig des Bayern mit der römischen Kurie (1879-1880), 2 vols.; Luther und Karlstadt (1907); Kirche, Gemeinde und Obrigkeit nach Luther (1910); Beiträge zur Geschichte der Verfassung der alten Kirche (1922), Autobiography in: Aus der akademischen Arbeit (Vorträge und Aufsätze) (1930).   O.A.P.

Mullins, Edgar Y.: (1860-1928) Baptist clergyman, educator, author. Professor of Theology and President, Southern Baptist Theological Seminary, Louisville, 1879-1928. Author of Axioms of Religion (1908).   C.H.M.

Munger, Theodore Thornton: (1830-1910) Graduated Yale, 1850, Andover, 1854; Pastor, Congregational Church, North Adams, Mass., 1877-1883, United Church, New Haven, 1885-1910. Dr. Munger was notably influential in freeing religious thought and in relating the New Theology* to literature and to education.

Author. The Freedom of Faith (1883), The Appeal to Life (1887), articles in literary periodicals.

Dr Munger was notably influential in freeing religious thought and in relating the New Theology* to literature and to education

Cf Theodore Thornton Munger (1903), by Benjamin W. Bacon   J.W.B.

Muratorian canon: A list of the N.T. books that might be read in public worship in church. It is evidently a translation from a Greek original, and probably represents the usage of the church at Rome about A.D. 200, indeed it may be the work of Victor of Rome. It takes its name from the Italian scholar who found it in the Ambrosian Library at Milan and published it in 1740 as an example of barbarous Latin.

E.J.G.

Murjites: (Arabic, meaning postponers) One of the early Moslem sects, which in opposition to the Kharijites*, declined to judge who was entitled to salvation as good Moslems. They were called "postponers," because they left to God to decide on the last day who was a true believer.

P.E J.

Murray, John: Born in Alton, England, Dec. 10, 1741. Died in Boston, Mass. Sept. 3, 1815. Rebelled against Calvinism; declared that all men will finally be saved. He came to America in 1770, preached up and down the New England coast, settled as pastor in Gloucester and Boston. Chaplain in the Revolutionary Army. Controversialist and author. Usually considered founder of the Universalist* movement in America.

Autobiography (1816); C R Skinner and A. S. Cole, Hell's Ramparts Fell (1941).   C.R.S.

Muse: (Greek root men-, think, remember) A goddess, one of nine, all daughters of the ancient Zeus and Mnemosyme, and all inspirers: of music, poetry, dance, etc.; spirit which presides over the arts and sciences; a genius or spirit which dominates the poet or composer in his creative moments.   F.L.P.

music: See agnus dei; alleluia; Ambrosian chant; anthem; benedictus; canon; cantata; canticles; chant; choir; chorale; conductus; credo; communion; diaphony; discant; dynamics; fugue; gloria; gloria in excelsis; gloria patri; gradual; Graduale; Gradual Psalms; Gregorian chant; Gregorian tones; harmony; hocket; hymns, hymns, Hebrew and Jewish; hymnology; introit; kyrie eleison; liturgics; liturgy; mass; melody; modes; motet; musicology; neumes; offertory; oratorio; organum; passion music; plainsong; polyphony; prose; psalmody; Psalms; Psalter; requiem; rhythm, musical; sanctus; schola cantorum; sequence; timbre; tonality; tract; trope. See also: bells; negro spirituals; piyyut.

musicology: Systematized knowledge about music resulting from the studies of scholars, philosophers or scientists. The field includes historical studies, theoretical systems, aesthetics, musical anthropology and ethnology, psychology, and acoustics.

G Haydon, Introduction to Musicology, a Survey of the Fields, Systematic and Historical, of Musical Knowledge and Research (1941)   E.H.B.

Muslim: See Mohammedanism.

Mut: The ancient mother-goddess of Thebes, Egypt, who represents the powers of the watery flood, the wife of the Nile, consort of Amon, her emblem of maternity is the vulture; protector of kings; queens represent her by wearing a vulture head-dress.   F.L.P.

mutakallim or mutikallimum: (Arabic, meaning debaters) The scholastic theologians of Islam, who sought to confirm truth by reason. They were stigmatized "debaters" as those who foolishly argued about things God had put beyond reason, to be accepted as revelation.   P.E.J.

Mutazilites: (Arabic, mutazilah, a body of seceders) A Shi ite* sect founded by Wasil ibn Ata in the 8th century. They admitted reason as a source of knowledge beside revelation. They accepted the Koran as a divine revelation, yet held everything in it must be interpreted to accord with reason. They called themselves "the Party of Equity and Unity" to emphasize the oneness and justice of God.   P.E.J.

mutilation: The disfiguring, maiming, deforming or crippling of the body, a practice common among primitive peoples and one that survives in restricted form among civilized peoples. The motives for such mutilation are tribal custom, initiation ceremonial, indication of rank or prowess, adornment, punishment, health and religion. In religion mutilation is practiced as ascetic discipline and to signify submission to, propitiation of or special dedication to deity. For the various forms of mutilation see Encyclopaedia Britannica, Vol. 16, 14th ed. (1939).   R.W.F.

mutual aid societies: See friendly societies.

Mysos, Demetrius: (1519-1570) A deacon who was sent to Wurttenberg by the Greek Patriarch (1557), in order to study the Protestant movement. He stayed with Ph. Melanchthon over a year studying the new religious movement. He cultivated a close friendship with Melanchthon and through him the Greek Orthodox Church had learned all about the Protestants.   G.E.Z.

mystery plays: See religious drama.

mystery religions: A distinctive type of cult that had attained wide popularity in the Roman Empire contemporary with the rise of Christianity. The term is Greek in its origin and is now commonly employed to designate various religions that received initiates by secret rites the meaning of which might not be divulged to the public. And the possession of this secret knowledge was supposed to insure special blessings for the devotee both in the present and in the life beyond the grave. The Greek, the Phrygian, the Syrian, the Egyptian, and the Persian mysteries are most worthy of note.

1) The mysteries celebrated at Eleusis a few miles from Athens were the most famous among the Greeks. Originally these were agrarian rites honoring the mother-goddess* Demeter and her daughter Persephone. The teaching of the cult explained how Persephone while picking flowers in the field had been snatched away to the lower world by its ruler Hades. In her grief Demeter gave herself up to mourning and ceased her care for the maintenance of life in nature. When the earth produced no fruit starvation threatened mankind. But Zeus interfered to arrange that Persephone should be restored to her mother for eight of the twelve months of the year, and thus the mother went into mourning for only the four winter months. Thus it is apparent that the worship of Demeter was originally designed to insure divine help for the productivity of the soil. In the course of time, as cultural interests shifted to a more individualized type of social experience, the Eleusinian rites took on a more personal significance. They were thought to insure happiness in the world to come, to necessitate better morals in the life of the initiate, and to provide him with the true understanding of how life should be ordered in this world and the next.

Other Greek mysteries were celebrated at Andania in Messenia and on the island of Samothrace, but next to the Eleusinian cult the most popular was that of Dionysus whose mysteries were observed at different places by migratory groups of adherents. Originally these ceremonies were highly orgiastic in character. When the devotees imbibed the sacred wine, ate the raw flesh of the sacrificed animal, and drank its warm blood, they went into a frenzy of ecstasy inspired, as they believed, by the very presence of the deity within the worshiper. When the Dionysiac mysteries became more closely connected with the name of Orpheus they took on a more sober and speculative character. Members of the religious society were guaranteed a blessed immortality and furnished with passwords that would secure for them a happy entrance into Hades. See Greek religion.

2) The Phrygian mysteries centered around the mother-goddess Cybele, with whom the youthful male deity Attis had come to be associated at an early date. The doctrines of the cult clearly indicate that originally it was a spring festival celebrated in honor of the deity who was thought to awaken nature from the death of winter. Cybele was the wild nature-goddess who mourned the violent death of Attis until he arose to life again in the springtime. His triumph over death was the central theme of the ritual and the participant in the rites undoubtedly believed that his attachment to the victorious deity would insure a similar triumph for the devotee. This Cybele-Attis cult spread widely about the Mediterranean world reaching even to Rome where it was conspicuous in the first and second centuries of the Christian era.

3) In Syria a similar type of religious interest was fostered in the rites of different deities. In the Hellenistic* period Aphrodite and Adonis became the gods chiefly connected with the same sort of mysteries that had emanated from Phrygia. The goddess personified mother-life in nature and her male associate represented the dying and awakening vitality in vegetation. The death of Adonis was depicted in a mystic drama. Lamentation for his decease was followed by wild rejoicing over his return to life. The devotees expected to enjoy the gracious favor of the risen god throughout the remainder of the year and doubtless also in the hereafter.

4) The Egyptian mysteries of Isis-Osiris (Serapis) spread widely about the Graeco-Roman world. Isis was the mother-goddess who grieved for the violent death of her consort Osiris until she recovered his dismembered body, restored him to life and installed him as king in the nether world. Formerly as king of Egypt he had been engaged in bestowing the blessings of civilization upon mankind. Thus he was peculiarly fitted for entrance into the abode of the blest after death and to guide his worshipers to a similarly happy reward. Isis was honored by her followers as the queen of every land who had designed the arts of civilization, had taught men the mysteries of religion, and had ordained binding decrees in accordance with her divine knowledge. Men insured for themselves these blessings by a process of initiation requiring purificatory rites, preliminary fasting and devotion culminating in a mystical religious experience of attachment to, or union with, the deity. Ultimately one was sure of a blessed existence in the future life. See Egypt, religions of.

5) The last mystery religion to become popular in the Roman Empire was Persian Mithraism. Mithra was a hero-divinity who while upon earth had devoted himself to the service of mankind and, after a last supper celebrating the success of his redemptive labors, he ascended to heaven. Henceforth he continued to minister help to the faithful in their conflict with Satan* and his hosts. The process of initiation into full membership in the cult was elaborate. The candidate passed through seven grades which prefigured the passage of the soul after death through the seven heavens to the final abode of the blest. Each grade was entered by observing ablutions, sacred meals and other sacramental rites. Mithraism was the only mystery religion that restricted its membership to men and it prospered especially among the soldiers. During the second and third centuries it became Christianity's most popular rival, especially on the frontiers of the Roman world.

Ultimately Christianity supplanted the mystery religions by combining in itself many of the functions and values that the older mystery cults had sought to conserve, and by meeting more effectively the type of religious need that had been contributing to the popularity of the mysteries in Roman imperial times. In several respects Christianity and the mysteries occupied common ground:

1) Both in Christianity and in the mysteries membership rested upon the voluntary choice of the individual. Other religions conditioned membership upon locality of birth or racial inheritance; one's rights in the religion depended upon belonging in some clan, city, state or race. But in the fluid social conditions of Roman imperial times the individual was thrown more especially upon his own responsibility and he needed a religion capable of ministering to his personal necessities under all the varying conditions of life. The mysteries were of this type. Any person, irrespective of sex (except in Mithraism) or race or nationality, could gain equal favor with the gods of his voluntary choice. After Paul had won his battle with the Judaizers Christianity also met this current demand. When he made this move away from Jewish racialism in religion the Christian apostle was moving, either consciously or unconsciously, in the direction of the gentile mystery cults.

2) Both Christianity and the mysteries provided a lively emotional experience on entering the religion. The society of believers constituted a new fellowship of regenerated people who had submitted to specific ceremonies of initiation and had received a body of teaching the significance of which could be truly known only by those who had experienced the purificatory or sacramental rites necessary for membership in the cult.

3) In Christianity as in the mysteries the ultimate goal of the religious quest was for salvation to be obtained through the favor of a suffering but triumphant divinity to whom the believer became attached by means of a formal initiation into the new religious society. This divine help was thereafter available during the present life and in the world to come.

Following the lead of the apostle Paul, the Christian missionaries on gentile soil finally made of Christianity a more appealing religion than any of the older mystery cults. This was accomplished, not by any slavish process of imitation, but by a serious attempt to meet better the specific religious needs that the mysteries had awakened and nourished, and by phrasing religious assurances more convincingly in similar terminology. In this competition Christianity had certain great advantages. It was the most recent movement, and by its early break with Judaism it freed itself of hampering institutional techniques. At the same time it carried forward the rich moral heritage of Judaism. Also it discarded the multitude of different divinities in which the gentiles were losing faith and it eliminated confusion by substituting the supreme God of Judaism and the deified Christian Christ for the numerous gentile gods. And it was able to heighten the sense of reality for its heroic savior by stressing remembered facts about his earthly life supported by explicitly fulfilled predictions recorded in the ancient Hebrew scriptures. Thus the Christian mystery could claim to be older, deeper, more accurately reflective of the hidden purposes of God, more concretely historical in its manifestation, more rigid in its ethical demands, and more efficiently sacramental in its operations, than any of its older gentile rivals. But it owed no small measure of its success to the degree to which the mystery religions had prepared the soil for the Christian planting. See baptism, non-Christian; blood, gods, initiation rites, Gnosticism; regeneration; Roman religions; sacramental meal; theophagy.

Franz Cumont, Oriental Religions in Roman Paganism (1911), Samuel Angus, The Mystery-Religions and Christianity (1925); H. R. Willoughby, Pagan Regeneration (1929); A Loisy, Les Mystères païen et le mystère chrétien (Paris, 1919).

s.j.c.

Mystical School, Buddhist: See Buddhist Terminology.

mysticism: Mysticism may be defined as the intuitive and emotive apprehension of spiritual reality. Goethe termed it "the dialectic of the feelings." Dean Inge described it as "the love of God." Its mission is to secure the vivid realization of eternal spiritual-personal values.

Mysticism infuses religion itself, as a sense of the sacred It emerges in primitive religion* (where it is subject to many imaginative aberrations) as the apprehension of the numinous. It is present and patent in varied forms in all advanced races and religions—in China as Taoism, in India as Bhaki and Yoga, in Persia as Sufism*, in Israel as Prophetism and in the Psaltery. It exists in various degrees, from what has been called "mild mysticism" ("Everyone is something of a mystic," said George Tyrrell,* while E. W. Hocking declared, "Everyman is an avowed or unavowed mystic.") to intense and absorbing forms of experience, mounting at times to ecstasy, and often accompanied by ascetic practises in living and devoted acts of service.[1]

Mysticism creates distinctive group as well as individual life, as the Friends of God, the Brethren of the Common Life, the Moravians and the Quakers witness In fact the life of the Christian Church itself, when it is true to its purpose has a mystical vein in it giving it warmth and devotion.

As a spiritual technique mysticism has developed what is known as the Mystic Way having three (sometimes four) stages (1) awakening (2) purgation (3) illumination (4) unification.

In its wider manifestation the following types of normal mysticism may be distinguished, although they are often united in the same person or group 1) Contemplative mysticism, generally with a monistic tendency, as in Plotinus, Augustine, Eckhart, the Christian Platonists, Emerson; 2) Personal mysticism in which personal communion with God (or Christ) is dominant as in Jesus, Paul, Luther, Thomas à Kempis, Fra Angelico, George Fox, Fenelon, Kagawa; 3) Nature mysticism in which Nature is invested with religious mystical meaning and feeling, as in St Francis,* the chief of Nature mystics, Wordsworth and other nature poets, and in a number of nature writers, notably John Muir, and 4) Practical mysticism in which sacrificial service prompted by love is the ruling characteristic. Christian mysticism is predominantly Personal mysticism although it has also given large place to the Platonic contemplative type and especially to practical mysticism.

While the strongest impulse and ardor of Christian mysticism has been, and is, devoted to loving and exalting God (or Christ) and even to losing oneself in Him its effect has been to develop also individual personality and to produce characters of great strength and attractiveness, such as Paul, Augustine, St. Francis, St. Bernard, Eckhart, Boehme, St. Teresa, St. Elizabeth, St. Catherine of Genoa, Tauler, Luther, Pascal, Wesley, Zinzendorf, Jonathan Edwards, Schleiermacher, Phillips Brooks.[2]

The mystics have always avowed (and truly) their experience to be inexpressible in its depth and joyousness, yet their spontaneous literary productions are among the chief treasures of literature, including the Psaltery, Second Isaiah, the Epistles of Paul, the "Confessions" of Augustine, the Itinerarium Mentis Dei of Bonaventura, Dante's "Divine Comedy," the Theologia Germanica, the Imitation of Christ, William Penn's Fruits of Solitude, Tauler's Sermons, Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress, Milton's Sonnet on his Blindness, John Woolman's Journal, George Herbert's The Temple, Whittier's Hymns, Thompson's "The Hound of Heaven" and a host of others. Next to the Psaltery the Christian Hymnal is the richest repository of the mystical spirit engaged in the act of devotion and praise.[3]

The lessons taught us by the mystics may be summarized as 1) to look for reality within, 2) to find meaning in mystery, 3) to discover the eternal in the temporal, 4) to realize the value of solitude, 5) to find joy in service, 6) to discern honor in humility, 7) to give supremacy to love.

A marked renascence of interest in mysticism sprang up in Britain and America soon after the opening of the present century—induced by Baron Friedrich von Hügel's* The Mystical Element of Religion (London, 2d e., 1923), 2 vols., Dean W. R. Inge's Christian Mysticism (third ed. 1913), William James' The Varieties of Religious Experience (1902), Rufus M. Jones' Studies in Mystical Religion (1909), Some Exponents of Mystical Religion (1930) and other volumes, Evelyn Underhill's* Mysticism (1913), The Mystic Way, etc.

Perhaps the most significant philosophical evaluation of mysticism that has yet been made is Henri Bergson's,* The Two Sources of Religion and Morality (translated by Audra and Brereton, 1935). See Dionysius the Areopagite; ecstasy; Eriugena; Hasidism; John of the Cross; Law, Wm; Neo Platonism; Quietism; Ruysbroeck; Suso; Tagore; unio mystica. Cf. Meditation School under Buddhist Terminology.

[1] One may be mystical without being, strictly speaking, a mystic.
[2] Most of these would be properly described as mystical, rather than mystics.
[3] Nowhere does mysticism find more complete expression than in music. Bach is one of the purest and most ardent of Christian mystics.   J.W.B.

mysticism, Jewish: See Chasidism; Hasidism; Kabbalah; Zohar.

mystics of Saint-Victor: General term for the school of mystic philosophy centered at the Abbey of Saint-Victor on the outskirts of Paris. The Royal Abbey and School of St. Victor was founded in 1108 by the renowned William of Champeaux,* later Bishop of Châlons. In a short time it became richly endowed, by 1260 it had nurtured several cardinals, many bishops and abbots, and had become a center of piety and learning to which scholars flocked from all over Europe, with the schools of Notre Dame and St. Genevieve it cradled the University of Paris. In time, the Abbey of St. Victor was known as the calix of the flower of mysticism which radiated throughout the Continent. Among its greatest teachers were Hugh of Blankenburg, better known as Hugh of St. Victor* (1096-1141), called the Augustine of his time, Peter Lombard* (c. 1100-1162), the "Master of Sentences," Adam, the greatest of medieval poets, and Richard,* the Scottish doctor of mystical theology. By the end of the 15th century the Abbey had fallen into disrepute, its canons enmeshed in the Jansenist* movement. The end finally came with the French Revolution, in 1800 the church and other buildings were sold, the famous library was dispersed, and a few years later everything had disappeared.

                        J.F.T.

myth: Most realities important to our living cannot be apprehended in the way required for our welfare unless we act in some appropriate manner. In case of water we must make contact with it and drink it. Inasmuch as true statements do not necessarily impel to the kind of action required, it is often necessary to supplement them with a story which will induce this needed behavior. For example, when one is thirsty for water or for God, he may be directed to the reality in question by true statements about it. On the other hand, a story may be told under such circumstances that one will be impelled to act in the manner required to find the living water or the living God. This latter is myth. It is said that American Indians were induced to meet the conditions for an abundant crop of corn by the fiction that a fish buried in the hill of corn gave its spirit to the budding grain. This fiction was a myth because it enabled them to deal effectively with the process of growth without understanding it. Indeed when fictions arouse and direct the attitudes and other behavior whereby important realities are most effectively appropriated, truth is hardly required.

The myth is generally believed to be a statement of fact by the people who use it. That belief is an error, but the error lies in taking the myth to be a truth. A myth is not a truth, but neither is it to be regarded, when recognized as a myth, to be false. Therefore, it is always a mistake to say that an effective myth is a kind of truth. Rather it is a stimulus to required behavior in dealing with some important reality. Effectiveness and not truth is the criterion to be applied to a myth. Truth may, of course, direct conduct beneficially, but when an assertion is justified on the ground of its edifying influence and not by rational, empirical evidence, it is a myth.

We appropriate the air and transform vital energy without our knowing the truths involved. Tradition, habit, and automatic reflexes, like breathing and heartbeat, do this for us. However, in case of other intimate, important and profound realities, the automatic reflexes are not sufficient and must be supplemented by myths. Further, when myths are insufficient, truth must be added. Truth is only sought and used as a last resort, and even then is never adequate to guide us but must be always supported by the automatic reactions and the myths.

When one single, coherent and inclusive tradition shapes the lives of all in the group, this tradition is like a channel guiding them to whatever reality is accessible by this route. In such case truth is not needed. All they need is some stimulus to drive them to follow the ways of the tradition. Myth serves this end. When, however, the guiding tradition breaks down, as all inclusive traditions are breaking today, the myth may lead to disaster. Truth must then intervene to take its place. Perhaps we shall always need myths, but control by myths must decline and control by truth must increase, as social complexity advances. See culture; symbolism.

Andrew Lang, Myth, Ritual and Religion (1901); G F Lipps, Mythenbildung und Erkenntnis (1907); Bronislaw Malinowski, Myth in Primitive Psychology (1926), A. N Whitehead, Symbolism, its Meaning and Effect (1927).   H.N.W.

mythology (defined): Mythologies are the organized bodies of myths belonging to peoples having in common a tradition and inheritance. Mythology in a scientific sense is the exact study of the origin, history and nature of myths. It has been through the science of mythology that modern man has been able to survey, interpret and inter-relate the numerous mythologies. This science dates only from the end of the 18th century. Since De Brosses and Schelling, the interpretation of myth has advanced through the philological school of Max Mueller, the anthropological school of Mannhardt and Tylor, through Andrew Lang and Frazer to the modern psychologists, Jung, Freud. These men have uncovered a vast store of mankind's history, revealing inadvertently both why he acted as he did and how he explains his own acts. Also hidden with them, innocent as a buried potsherd, are references to customs, folkways, geography and climate, indispensable value to the social historian.

All religions, both primitive and advanced, require myth. For the relating of the experience with the divine can be conveyed only in mythological conceptions. The creation myth in Babylonia tells the story of Marduk, his titanic struggle with the dragon Tiamat, as preparation for the creation of earth and man. In Hinduism, there is the story of Brahma, breathing in and out the life of the created universe. There are hero myths like that of Romulus and Remus, star myths to explain the constellations and star movements, the Egyptian sun myth, picturing Ra as crossing the firmament in a boat, myths of the underworld, such as that of Osiris, Orpheus, Charon, Izanagi, myths about the gods and a great flood, such as the Babylonian Ut-Napishtim, the Hebrew Noah, myths to explain festivals and customs, such as the flight from Egypt as an explanation of the Passover. Myths are designed to tell in story form the nature of an experience or awareness of God. Mythologies were the early teachers of mankind See folklore, primitive religion.   M.L.C.

Bibl. mythology Cyril Bailey, ed., The Legacy of Rome (Oxford, 1936), Sir Paul Harvey, Oxford Companion to Classical Literature (Oxford, 1937); R. W. Livingstone, ed, The Legacy of Greece (Oxford, 1937), H J. Rose, A Handbook of Greek Mythology (1929).   E.M.N.

N

nabi, the: See soothsaying.

Nāgārjuna: See Buddhist Terminology.

Nahum: A collection of five poems on the fall of Nineveh (612 B.C.), written immediately before and after that event. A late acrostic psalm has been prefixed to the book. The first two poems (3:1-13) warn Nineveh of approaching doom. Nahum's poetic art climaxes in the third (1.11-2.10) which describes Babylonian mobilization, march northward, sack of Nineveh, slaughter, plunder, and desolation. The poems in 2 11-12 and 3.16-19 cast retrospect on this passing of empire. Nothing is known of Nahum. Perhaps he was an exile who witnessed these events. Instead of a prophet, he was a brilliant poet. The ethics, religion, and reforming genius of the prophets are missing. His was an outburst of indignation against Assyria, world tyrant for centuries and captivator of the ten tribes, with a song of rejoicing over her downfall. See The Prophets and their Times by J. M. P. Smith and W. A. Irwin (1941), pp. 149-55. R.E.W.

naiads: (Gr. Naiades, from nao, to flow; ad-, patronymic) Nymphs* of springs, rivers, and lakes. E.M.N.

name: (in primitive thought) A person's name is considered very important, and is often given him with ceremony. It is often that of a dead relative, and may be determined by some fixed rule, or by divination, dream, etc. Secondary names, indicating tribal and other relationships, may be added. Primitive people often seem to identify one's primary name with one's inmost self, and the pronunciation of this name is supposed most efficacious in magical rites. For this reason, it is often kept a secret and pronunciation of an individual's name, especially that of a chief or a god, is often tabu. The name may be changed in order to escape injury from the dead, or after the death of a child or any striking and important event. See baptism, non Christian. R.B.B.

Nanak: (1469-1538) Founder of the Sikh* faith in India. Born a Moslem in 1469 A.D. he was strongly influenced by Moslem ideas as was the poet Kabir an older contemporary. His faith combines both Hindu and Moslem elements. He was a Bhakta poet and sang innumerable songs of devotion to Hari (God). These, together with others from Kabir and some of the later Sikh gurus, constitute the Granth,* the sacred book of the Sikhs. C.S.B.

Nantes, Edict of: (1598) Issued by Henry IV* to define the position of the French Reformed Church. It granted freedom of conscience but in various ways limited the liberties of Protestants. Its revocation (1685) a disaster for French Protestants. See Camisards; Wars of religion. G.R.C.

Nārāyana: An epithet, applied to various Hindu gods, most frequently of all to Vishnu.* Shankara applies it to Brahman, but in modern India it is universally recognized as a name of Vishnu. C.S.B.

narthex: (Gr. narthēx, a portico) Any enclosed entrance or portico of a church. F.T.P.

Nashoba (Tenn.) community: See communistic settlements, secular.

Nasi: (Heb., prince) Political ruler of Judea (Ezra 1.8) and subsequently the president of the Sanhedrin.* S.S.C.

National Baptist Convention: See negro church, the.

National Baptist Evangelical Life and Soul Saving Assembly of the U. S. A.: A group of 28 churches (2,300 members) organized in 1920. There seem to be no distinctive doctrines or practices. The body specializes in personal evangelism. E.T.C.

National David Spiritual Temple of Christ Church Union: A sect founded by D. W. Short, a Baptist preacher, in Kansas City in 1932. There are eleven local churches and 1,900 members. The group refuses to be called a denomination and claims to represent the original church founded by Jesus Christ. In general it opposes all other churches as apostate and believes in healing, miracles, prophecy, sanctification, and speaking in unknown tongues. See pentecostal sects. E.T.C.

National Intercollegiate Christian Council: See student religious organizations.

National Lutheran Council: See Lutheran Church in America.

National Sunday School Convention: See Sunday School movement in the United States.

National socialism: See socialism.

Natorp, Paul: (1854-1924) Professor of philosophy at the University of Marburg. He was one of the chief philosophical representatives of the social movement of his day. He continued tendencies initiated by Pestalozzi. He was a thoroughgoing social ethicist. His ethic was an idealized democratic idealism. He defended a religion without God. He idealized human dignity. He understood by the religious, moral acts.

Religion innerhalb der Grenzen der Humanität (Tübingen, 1908) 2 ed.; Allgemeine Psychologie nach kritischer Methode (Tübingen, 1912) 2 ed.; Sozialpädagogie (Stuttgart, 1920) 4 ed.; Die logischen Grundlagen der exacten Wissenschaften (Leipzig, 1921) 2 ed.; Platos Ideenlehre (Leipzig, 1921) 2 ed.; Sozialidealismus (Berlin, 1922) 2 ed.; Gesammelte Abhandlungen zur Sozialpädagogik (Stuttgart, 1922), 3 vols, 2 rev. ed.   H.H.

natura naturans, natura naturata: Natura naturans is God as the active power of nature; natura naturata is the world as the complex unity of individual things. The former is regarded as the creative force, the latter as the created substance. The terms were first used by Averroës, later by Nicholas of Cusa, Giordana Bruno and Spinoza.   J.E.N.

natural law: 1) In politics and jurisprudence, the doctrine that positive laws rightly rest upon a higher law attested by the common awareness of what is just, which is a natural endowment divinely set in man's nature, and indestructible. Christian thought took over the concept from antiquity and especially from Cicero. Phrases in Rom. 1.18-21 and 2.14-15 were generally interpreted by the fathers, scholastics and Reformers as affirming the doctrine, and the OT law was regarded as a codification of the lex naturae. Variations in the treatment of the topic are made with relation to the doctrine of sin and grace. (C. G. Haines, The Revival of Natural Law, 1930; O. Gierke, Natural Law and the Theory of Society, transl. E. Barker, 2 vols., 1934). 2) In physical science the body of generalizations reached by empirical study, or, in the plural, these generalizations themselves. See natural rights.   J.T.M.

natural law: In scholastic theory that part of the divine law(ius divinum*) that is known to man through reason. The notion of an eternal Law of Nature as constituting the standard of evaluation of all man-made law was taken from Stoic philosophy. It has maintained a prominent place in political philosophy in post-medieval times. Conservative, liberal, revolutionary and collectivist schools of political thought have equally claimed for their respective basic postulates the transcendental validity of natural law and even the force of overruling positive law at variance with its maxims. The Natural Law of liberalism, which was developed by the philosophers and jurists of the Enlightenment and which is often referred to as Natural Law pure and simple, became of particular importance as constituting an effective check to monarchical absolutism, as providing the guiding principles of modern individualistic liberalism and democracy, including the doctrine of inalienable rights, and as furnishing since Grotius* the ideas guiding modern International Law. Cf. American theology, early.

A. Gurvitch, "Natural Law", vol 11 Enc. Soc. Sci., p. 284; C. Brinton, "Natural Rights", vol. 11 Enc. Soc. Sci., p. 299; O von Gierke, Natural Law and the Theory of Society, 1500-1800 (tr by E. Barker), 2 vols (1934) F Pollock, "History of the Law of Nature" in Essays in the Law (1922); C. G. Haines, Revival of Natural Law Concepts (1930); W. Seagle, The Quest for Law (1941), ch. 14.   M.Rh.

natural rights: The capacity to get the protection of the state for some interest, privilege, or power, on one's own motion, is called a legal right. (Loosely, the interest or privilege protected may be called a right.) The capacity to get protection (not necessarily from the state) which one ought to have is called a moral right. The word "natural," here combined with "right," is one which historically has been used in ethics and politics to mean that an ethical or political principle was accepted universally as opposed to what had only local acceptance; or that it was rooted in the nature of things, in harmony with the course and purpose of nature and required by man's instinctive nature, as opposed to the customary, conventional, and merely traditional, or that it was self-evident, or that it was or would be practised in a state of nature as opposed to what occurs in civilization. Thus the conception of natural law* (in which the doctrine of natural rights may be said to have been implicit to some degree), as a fundamental law of reason, was distinguished from positive law as early as by Aristotle and the Stoics; in Roman law, as ius naturale, it was closely related to but not identical with ius gentium. Natural law consisted of generally accepted principles of equity, good faith, and moral principle. such as that no one should be allowed to profit by injuring others. At the beginning of the modern era it began to be asserted explicitly that there are natural rights, a claim which, in its fundamental defense of equality against privilege, was in part a result of Protestant ideas (cf. the Levellers and the Diggers). Hooker, Hobbes, Locke, Halifax, and (in one part of his work) Rousseau* all held that in some sense man as man self-evidently has certain inalienable rights. This doctrine is embodied in the Virginian Declaration of Rights, the Declaration of Independence, the French Declaration of the Rights of Man, the preamble to the Constitution of 1793, etc. Such rights as the right to life, liberty of thought and private conduct, public meeting, contract, equality, property, pursuit of happiness, and government only by the consent of the governed are often mentioned. The Utilitarians* in practice accepted as an absolute right the greatest freedom compatible with the like freedom of others although in theory they accept utility as their only first principle. In more recent times this theory of natural rights has declined, partly because of general scepticism about supposed self-evident principles. Some writers would still use the term, partly to distinguish certain fundamental rights from those, e.g., which arise out of contract, that is, it may be said that protection of some privilege or power is a "natural right" if the realization of the ideal society requires that all persons receive such protection, at least where it does not conflict with the rights of others or interfere seriously with the general welfare. See American theology, early.

Ernest Barker, preface to Otto Gierke, Natural Law and the Theory of Society (1934); D. G. Ritchie, Natural Rights (1924), James Bryce, Studies in History and Jurisprudence, vol II (1901); J. C. Gray, Nature and Sources of the Law (1921); T. H. Green, Principles of Political Obligation (1895); W. E. Hocking, Present Status of the Philosophy of Law and Rights (1926); A. O. Lovejoy and G Boas, Primitivism and Related Ideas in Antiquity (1935); G. H. Sabine, A History of Political Theory (1937).   R.B.B.

natural theology: It is that knowledge of God obtained by observing the visible processes of nature. The inward frame of man responds to the external condition and circumstance of life, and his ability to observe the visible processes of nature is a means to discover what he is made for, and what duties bind him. The more man follows the tendency of nature toward a moral government the more joy he realizes, and the more he approaches a full harmony with the moral law. As he obeys the natural law the moral law becomes more categorical. Man is a law unto himself and he is obliged to obey this law from the simple fact that it is the law of his nature. Natural religion seeks no authority except natural theology.   W.G.H.

naturalism: Methodological naturalism is the name for that characteristic of scientific method which constructs its pattern of thought on the basis of natural causation as distinguished from a supernatural or occult explanation. Such a naturalism tends to be positivistic.

Metaphysical naturalism is a view of reality which holds that reality is nature; within the framework of nature is found the ultimate. For this view, the so-called "world-beyond" or supernatural is set within a wider interpretation of nature. The early Ionian thinkers were naturalists when they launched the view (the beginning of classical Western philosophy) that explanations are to be sought by looking for the original stuff of the world in the world rather than relying upon the traditions of their priests and extranature mythologies. Naturalists divide in their conception of nature. The old materialism of atoms-in-motion is a materialistic naturalism. Later materialistic naturalists, including contemporary, tended to make energy (conceived to be physical) the basis of their metaphysics. There are dynamistic as well as neutralistic naturalists. (See ontology). Spiritualistic naturalists hold nature to be fundamentally akin to spirit or the categories applicable to mind. Spinoza may be interpreted as a spiritualistic naturalist if his Substance is interpreted as

God. An agnostic naturalism is the view which hesitates to commit itself to any ultimate explanation of the character of nature (e g. Herbert Spencer's Unknowable). Positivistic naturalism is the view which holds that a philosophy of nature should be limited to human experience, and speculation beyond that experience avoided. (Auguste Comte* and John Dewey are examples).

In philosophical literature the tendency has been to equate naturalism with materialism. This spells much confusion. For a spiritualistic naturalist the immanence of the Divine is stressed (where the divine is affirmed) although some spiritualistic naturalists hold that the divine has transcendental characteristics as found in nature (see panentheism). Such a naturalism is not necessarily deterministic and mechanistic since nature may be held to reveal the broken relations of new beginnings as a characteristic of its processes.
                                                          V.F.

naturalism and theology: The most marked development in the newer naturalism is the growing recognition that there are many levels and orders in nature. Values, ideals, personality, community, the sense of beauty, tragedy, heroism, religion and God are as readily acknowledged and upheld by some forms of the newer naturalism as the quantum theory and the physics of relativity.

Naturalism was once identical with materialism and mechanism. It is not so any longer. Naturalism did once teach, and in some instances does still, that what physics says about nature is the basic truth about all reality, even as theology did once teach, and in some instances does still, that the Bible is verbally inspired. Students of naturalism continue to attribute to religious thought the beliefs which have been discarded by its advanced representatives, and students of religion still interpret naturalism in terms which have been cast off by its foremost exemplars.

Naturalism is based upon a certain method of inquiry. Its method accepts as data anything which can be experienced such as a priori propositions, "innate truths," authority, revelation, esoteric intuition. But these are data only and do not yield knowledge until they have been subjected to the method of inquiry by which knowledge is achieved. Knowledge is achieved by discovering how events (happenings) are related to one another, or how they might possibly be related. Therefore all the reality we can ever know must be reality made up of interconnected happenings and their possibilities. These happenings may be infinitely rich in the qualities of beauty, tragedy, pathos, heroism. Also every happening is made up of component happenings. But when happening or event is analyzed it is seen to be necessarily temporal and spatial, whatever else it may also be. Therefore naturalism holds that all actual reality is necessarily temporal and spatial. It does not deny the reality of ideal structures and possibilities which are not temporal and spatial, but these are not actual. They are only possible ways in which actual events might be distinguished and connected. Nature is precisely the totality of all that is temporal and spatial together with whatever possibilities this temporal and spatial process may carry. History, community, personality, God or any other actual reality is a structure of events distinguished and connected in the way that characterizes the particular reality under consideration. Some basic structure of events might, of course, be everlasting.

The doctrine of perspectives has greatly enriched the concept of nature. When the naive person speaks of nature he commonly means only one perspective, namely, his own. But nature includes an infinity of perspectives. None of these is self-sufficient by itself. The doctrine of perspectives can be easily illustrated. The penny in one perspective is a circle, in another a heavy line, and in still another an ellipse. But no one of these is self-sufficient since it requires all the others to make up the total penny. So our perspective of nature is not self-sufficient even though we cannot roll the universe around as we do the penny to get the other perspectives. If we live long enough we shall have another perspective.

The self-sufficiency of nature does not mean in the newer naturalism any self-sufficiency of that particular system which at any one time may be all that we happen just then to know. This system is not self-sufficient for two reasons: nature includes far more than our little system of knowledge at any one time can comprehend, nature will change so that what we know and what we do not know will both be different. This is the doctrine of the creativity of time which is one of the major teachings of the newer naturalism.

The self-sufficiency of nature in the sense stated is defended as follows: Anything whatsoever that we can ever experience must have the character and constitution which is necessary to experience. An analysis of experience reveals that it is impossible apart from time and space. In other words, experience is necessarily and essentially temporal and spatial. Therefore anything that we can ever experience must be some quality, form or movement pertaining to temporal and spatial reality. Since nature includes all temporal and spatial reality together with its possibilities, all that we can ever experience must be nature. This is the view of naturalism.

Vergilius Ferm, "Christianity—A Naturalistic Point of View", Crozer Quarterly, vol. XVII No. 3, July, 1940; B E. Meland, Modern Man's Worship (1934); M. C. Otto, The Human Enterprise (1940); H. N. Wieman, The Growth of Religion (1938); F. J. E. Woodbridge, An Essay on Nature (1940); George Santayana, The Realm of Spirit (1940).

                               H.N.W.

nature worship: Expression of the feeling of dependence or gratitude toward helpful phases of the natural environment and of the feeling of fear of the dangerous elements. Almost all the gods of the early world were nature powers. Like other forms of life, man had to adjust his needs to the environment to secure the essential values of food,* shelter and safety. In that early adventure in living he found that nature in many of her forms and moods was kindly and helpful, in others hostile and destructive. He was grateful for fresh spring waters, fruit and nut bearing trees, the refreshing winds, cooling shade, the dawn which drove away the cold and dangers of the dark, the stimulating sun, the storm rain which revived the pasture lands and the crops after drought, the fertile, food-bearing earth. Many of these things lost their quality of mystery and were accepted without ceremony as parts of the commonplace world, but the great nature powers were beyond man's control and were so important for his wellbeing that he expressed his gratitude to them in elaborate cult and made appeals to them for ever larger benefits. These nature powers were the early gods. Against the dangerous powers man set up protective techniques. If he could win them to his service they too became gods, otherwise they were devils.* When the nature powers became spirits* and were humanized their nature origin was often obscured or forgotten. See Baalism, Gods.   A.E.H.

Nauvoo (Ill.), communistic colony: See communistic settlements, religious, secular.

nave: (Lat. navis, a ship) The central or principal part of a three-aisled church, the upper portion of which, rising above the aisles, is called the clearstory.   F.T.P.

Nazarenes: Two Greek adjectives are translated by this word in the NT: nazarenos (Mk. 1.24, etc.) and nazoraios (Matt. 2.23, Acts 2.22, etc.). Though the former is clearly derived from Nazareth, there is no clear derivation for the latter. This is the term used for the Christians in Acts 24.5. It has been held that the Nazoraioi were a pre-Christian sect. (For refutation see G. F. Moore in The Beginnings of Christianity, Vol. I, by Foakes-Jackson and Lake). In the Apostolic Age, "Nazarenes" was probably the usual designation of Christians by Jews In the fourth century it was used of Jewish-Christians* in Syria, either the same as Ebionites,* or similar to them.

                               C.T.C.

Nazarites or Nazirites: (Heb. nazar to consecrate; cf. nadar to vow) An ascetic group in Judaism, who put themselves under a vow to abstain from wine, from cutting the hair, and from contact with anything unclean. Among the ancient Hebrews this vow would seem to have been binding throughout their lifetime (cf. Samson). Amos 2.12 suggests that they were regarded as an important group. The later legislation provided for a temporary vow—Josephus (B. J. ii, 15, 1) suggests that thirty days was the minimum period—but with an increased strictness. At the end of the period the hair was shaved and burnt as a sacrifice. The (later) Nazarite vow is given in Numb. 6:1-20. See article "Nazirite" in Encyclopaedia Biblica, cols. 3362 ff. See asceticism.

                               M.S.E.

Neale, John Mason: See hymns.

Neander, Johann August Wilhelm (1798-1850) As a converted Jew (his original name was David Mendel), he taught at the universities of Heidelberg and Berlin. Prepared by biographical and monographic studies, he wrote his main work in church history. The key to his church history was edification for the strengthening, purification and invigoration of the Christian life and community. His theology was borne by a piety which denied nothing of the religious awakening, of romantic idealism and supernaturalistic enlightenment. It was mildly pietistic, bible-believing and filled with profound love for Jesus Christ. Neander rejected the narrowness and brutality of ecclesiastical restoration. His historical studies have something of the lyrically monotonous. See Lives of Jesus.

Dr. August Neanders Werke (Gotha, 1862-67) 14 vols ; History of the planting and training of the Christian church by the apostles (Edinburgh, 1842) 2 vols.; General history of the Christian religion and church (Edinburgh, 1847-1855) 9 vols.; Light in the Dark Places, or Memorials of Christian life in the Middle Ages (1855) ; Life of Jesus Christ in its historical connexion and historical development (1848).   H.H.

necessary being: (Lat., necessitas) That which cannot not-be; its essence is to be; that is, its existence is identical with its essence. Cf. contingent. See cause.   L.R.W.

necessary cause: See cause.

necessitarianism: See s.v. libertarianism.

necrology: A list of the dead, often employed for purposes of prayer on All Soul's Day* or on some other occasion.   W.N.P.

necromancy: Foretelling the future by communicating with the dead, strictly; but used loosely for all forms of divination.* Compare the story of Saul and the witch of Endor.   P.G.M.

need-fire: A fire obtained in primitive manner by friction caused by turning a pole in or on another piece of wood, and supposed to have supernatural properties, particularly that of protecting or curing animals from 'pestilence. All other fires in the neighborhood must be extinguished while the need-fire is kindled, according to the superstition; the cattle then must be driven through it; and finally the family fires should be relit from a brand struck from the need-fire. The practice of using it was widespread among the peasants of Europe as late as the 19th century. See J. G. Frazer, The Golden Bough, Pt. VII, Vol. I, (3d edn., 1935).   R.B.B.

Neeser, Maurice: (1883-   ) He is professor of theology at the university of Neuchâtel, Switzerland. Inspired by Ritschl, Höffding, and above all by R. Eucken, he distinguishes the aesthetic and the ethical type of religious thinker. In their absolute purity these reduced religion to nothing. Unrestricted immanence suppresses prayer, and absolute transcendence renders prayer impossible. There is something deceptive in the theological systems which pretend God in terms of human personality.

Le problème de Dieu (Neuchatel, 1915).   E.H.

negro church, the: The Negro Church: It is the term given to distinguish the churches operated mainly for and by Negroes from those operated mainly for and by white people. It is one of the separate or segregated branches of the Christian church in America. According to the 1936 Government Census of Religious Bodies of the 256 denominations reporting, 59 reported Negro churches. Of the 59, the Census reveals that 33 were exclusively Negro in membership. The Baptists, the African Methodist Episcopal, The African Methodist Episcopal Zion, the Colored Methodist Episcopal, several Holiness* groups (see pentecostal sects) are illustrative of those religious bodies that are exclusively Negro in membership. The Negroes in the Methodist, Congregational, Episcopal, and Catholic churches are examples of Negro churches that are organically a part of white churches.

How the Negro Church Came to Be

"In accounting for the origin of the Negro church, three closely related factors must be taken into account: First, the Negro was hardly wanted in the white church. There, he was often segregated. The second largest Negro denomination, the African Methodist Episcopal Church, came into existence because in St. George's Church, Philadelphia, around the close of the eighteenth century, Negroes had been forced from their knees during prayer because they were not seated in the segregated places provided for them.

"The second reason for the existence of the Negro church grows out of and is a part of the first. A growing race consciousness stimulated the desire on the part of the Negroes to have their own churches. They wanted to preach, sing, direct the choir, and serve as chairmen of boards of deacons. Feeling that they would hardly have an equal chance to do these things in a church completely controlled by members of the dominant group, they set out to organize their own churches with the help and encouragement of the whites. Here in a church of their own they would be free .o exercise their talents, display their pent up emotions, and prove their ability to organize in a way not permitted them in the white church.

"The third reason is inseparable from the second. The white church, and particularly the white minister, could not speak pointedly and effectively to the needs of the Negro. He spoke from the perspective of a free man who had never experienced what it really meant to be a slave and what it meant to be told by words and deeds that it was the will of God that he be a slave. When the white minister preached equality of the slave before God, he seldom meant that this equality should fulfill itself here and now.

"The Negro church, accordingly, sprang into existence partly because the Negro needed a church where a gospel could be preached which would speak to the needs of his soul, it was born out of the heartfelt needs of the Negro people. The writer makes bold to assert that, if there had been no segregation in white churches and if the Negro had been wholly welcomed in the white church, the needs of the race would have produced the Negro church. But if it had come wholly that way, it would have been a separate church, not a segregated church " Benjamin E. Mays, "The Negro Church in American Life," Christendom, Summer Number, 1940.

Number and Membership of Negro Churches

The Government Census of Religious Bodies shows that 38,303 Negro churches reported in 1936 (13,528 urban and 24,755 rural). These churches reported a membership of 5,660,618. Of this number, 2,958,630 were urban and 2,701,988 were rural members. In all probability there are approximately 42,000 or more Negro churches. These Negro churches in 1936 reported 390,454 Sunday School officers and teachers and an enrollment of 2,424,800 pupils in the Church school. In the same year these churches spent close to $28,000,000 on their programs.

The Seven Largest Negro Denominations The Baptists* still lead in number of churches and in membership. The 1936 Religious Census reported 23,093 Negro Baptist churches with a membership of 3,782,464. More than 66 per cent of all Negro churches are Baptist. The second largest Negro denomination is the A.M.E. Church The Religious Census of 1936 reported 4,578 A.M.E. churches with a membership of 493,357, approximately one half million members. The A M.E.Z. Church comes third with a membership of 414,244. The fourth largest religious body among Negroes is the C.M.E. Church and it has 2,063 churches and 269,915 members. The 1936 Census of Religious Bodies reveals further that the number of Negroes in the Methodist Church constitute the fifth largest church group among Negroes. There are 1730 Negro churches with a membership of 193,761. The Negroes in the Roman Catholic Church are the sixth largest Negro church group. There are 178 Catholic churches for Negroes with a membership of 137,684. The Protestant Episcopal Church occupies the seventh place. There are 145 Negro Episcopal churches and the membership is 29,738. These seven denominations constitute more than 93 per cent of the total Negro membership in the. 59 religious bodies reporting Negro members. In all these churches there are more than 25,000 Negro clergymen. Since space is at a premium in this encyclopedia, a statement of the number of churches and members in each of the other 52 denominations reporting Negro members is not possible.

Further Differentiation of Negro Denominations

The National Baptist Convention, Inc.: A statement by Doctor James M. Nabrit, Secretary of the convention follows: "The National Baptist Convention, Inc. is a religious organization with the largest constituency of any Negro religious body covering the entire United States. Primarily it is missionary in character doing both home and foreign mission work. Secondarily, it promotes ministerial and religious education, in cooperation with the denominational colleges in the several states and through the Seminary and Training School in Nashville, Tennessee. Finally, it develops business organizations through its publishing interests giving employment to its most competent writers and mechanics."

The National Baptist Convention of America: It should be noted here that the National Baptist Convention Incorporated and the National Baptist Convention of America were formerly one body. Dr. Henry Allen Boyd writing of this convention says. "The National Baptist Convention of America is a missionary Baptist convention, suporting the principles and the doctrines of the NT Church. It fosters Foreign Missions, Home Missions, Religious Education, Publishing and dissemination of religious helps and tracts. It has a benevolent Board, and is composed of the following boards. Foreign Mission, Home Mission, Educational, Publishing, B.Y.P.U., Evangelical, and Committe on Army and Navy Chaplains, with the Women's Auxiliary Board. It is a continuation of the expression of our foreparents in self-help religiously under chosen leadership, believing, as they did, so do we, in the virgin birth and that the administrator must be authorized, otherwise he cannot administer church ordinances." It is the second largest Negro church body in the United States.

The African Methodist Episcopal Church. This church began around the tenth decade of the eighteenth century. It had its beginning when an attempt was made to separate Negroes in St. George's Church in Philadelphia. Richard Allen, William White, and Absolom Jones led the movement when attempts were made to force them from their knees during prayer because they refused to sit in segregated seats planned for them in the gallery of St. George's. After the prayer was over they walked out of St. George's and organized a church of their own. They hired a storeroom and held worship. This was the beginning of the rise of the first church of the denomination which in April, 1816 became known as the African Methodist Episcopal Church. (Bishop Richard Allen, The Life, Experience, And Gospel Labors, pp. 1, 19, 20, 21, 22, 32.) Richard Allen was the first bishop elected April 10, 1816.

African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church· "A number of Negroes, most of whom were members of the John Street Methodist Episcopal church in New York City, took the first step toward separation from the connection in 1796. They had a "desire for a privilege of holding meetings of their own, where they might have an opportunity to exercise their spiritual gifts among themselves and thereby be more useful to one another. Such permission was obtained from Bishop Francis Asbury by a group of intelligent Negro Methodists. ... "These workers continued in this situation until the year 1799 when with a further increase in the Negro membership of the Methodist Episcopal Church in New York City, they proposed to build a separate house of worship rather than merely hold separate meetings in the edifice belonging to the white Methodists." (C. G. Woodson) So in 1800 they erected a building at the corner of Church and Leonard Streets (New York) naming the edifice the African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church. They organized into a national body in 1821 with James Varick as first Bishop elected in 1822. (Ibid).

Colored Methodist Episcopal Church. The Methodist Episcopal Church, South, in conference in New Orleans in 1866 made provision for the organization of Negro members in a separate denomination if the Negroes so desired. It was further agreed that if the Negroes approved they could have a general conference like that of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South. Four years later in 1870 the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, met in Memphis. It was reported there that the Negroes had organized five annual conferences and had expressed desire to be a separate and distinct body. Resulting therefrom the first General Conference was held in Jackson, Tennessee, December 15, 1870 The first two bishops were W. H. Miles and R. H. Vanderhorst. (Ibid).

Richard Allen, The Life, Experience and Gospel Labors; Monroe Work, ed., The Negro Year Book; 1937-38 (Tuskegee Institute Press), "Understanding Our Neighbors" published by the Commission on Interracial Cooperation, Atlanta; James Weldon Johnson, The Book of American Negro Poetry; Carter G. Woodson, The History of the Negro Church; B. E Mays, J. W Nicholson, The Negro's Church (Institute of Social and Religious Research); Benjamin E. Mays, The Negro's God; Census of Religious Bodies, 1936; U S. Dept of Commerce, Bureau of Census, Volumes I, II, III: "The Negro Church in American Life" Christendom, Summer Number, 1940 by Benjamin E Mays.   B.E.M. negro's conception of God, the: Like the Jews in Biblical history, the Negro's ideas of God have grown out of his social situation. They are mainly the ideas of God found in the Old and New Testaments. But almost in every case they are 'ideas of God fashioned out of or influenced by the social situation in which the Negro finds himself. A study of the Negro's literature reveals that his "ideas of God are developed along three principal lines: 1) Ideas of God that are used to support or give adherence to traditional, compensatory patterns, 2) Ideas, whether traditional or otherwise, that are developed and interpreted to support a growing consciousness of social and psychological adjustment needed, 3) Ideas of God that show a tendency or threat to abandon the idea of God as "a useful instrument" in perfecting social change.

"The data show that however the ideas are used, they develop at the point of social crisis; at the point where justice is denied, hopes thwarted, and plans shattered, owing in part to the hampering proscriptions imposed upon the Negro by the dominant group. His ideas of God, so to speak, are chiseled out of the very fabric of the social struggle. Virtually all of them express the unfilled yearnings of the Negro group, whether they be worldly or other-worldly. They developed, as can be validated historically, along the line of the Negro's most urgent needs and desires. Prior to 1860, the Negro's ideas of God were developed around slavery. After the Civil War, they grew out of the wrongs of Reconstruction. Since 1914, they are inseparable from the social and economic restrictions which the Negro meets in the modern world.

"Unlike that of many people, the Negro's incredulity, frustration, agnosticism, and atheism do not develop as the results of the findings of modern science nor from the observation that nature is cruel and indifferent, but primarily because in the social situation, he finds himself hampered and restricted. The Negro is not interested in any fine theological or philosophical discussions about God. He is interested in a God who is able to help him bridge the chasm that exists between the actual and the ideal. The Negro's life has been too unstable, too precarious, too uncertain, and his needs have been too great for him to become sufficiently objective to theologize or philosophize about God "[1] negro education: There are 109 Negro colleges and junior colleges. Approximately 45,000 students are enrolled in these colleges in normal times. There are in addition close to 2,500 Negro students enrolled in colleges that are not strictly Negro. It is estimated that 5,000 are graduated a year in normal times with college degrees. More than two hundred Negroes have won the Ph.D. degree and an equal number have earned membership in the Phi Beta Kappa Society.

[1] Benjamin E. Mays, The Negro's God, (1938), pp. 245, 255.   B.E.M.

                                                                B.E.M.

negro spiritual, the: The Negro Spiritual is one of the chief contributions the Negro has made to American culture. Though defined in various ways, in essence all definitions of the spiritual harmonize. Speaking of the spiritual, Kemper Harreld, Director of music at Morehouse and Spelman Colleges, has this to say. " 'The Spiritual' is generally understood to be any Afro-American religious folk song. There are however, some songs to be found among the "mountain whites" that are called spirituals—"Round About the Mountain."

"A more specific classification is sometimes needed

Spiritual.—A song of prayer and contrition. "Swing Low Sweet Chariot." "Lord I Want to be A Christian in my Heart."

Jubilee.—A song of triumph. "Study War No More," "I'm Going Down to the River of Jordan," "Tell me How Did You Feel When You Come Out of The Wilderness."

Sorrow Song.—Can be sacred or secular. "I'm so Glad Trouble Don't Last Always," "Soon One Morning."

"There is also a sacred folk song that is difficult to classify between the spiritual and jubilee— "There is a Balm in Gilead." "

Frederick H. Hall of Montgomery State Teachers' College, Montgomery, Alabama, interprets the spirituals in the following manner: "The Spiritual had its beginning in the heart of the Negro as he labored in the fields of the South. These songs are outbursts of religious fervor and in many cases are influenced by conditions which surrounded the people in whose minds they were born.

"They are called Spirituals, Jubilees, Melodies, Folk Songs. Either name is correct. They are called Jubilees because of the ray of hope that is expressed in each. Regardless of how sad the song may be, or how miserable the conditions surrounding its birth, there is always found in it the hope of a great day of jubilee when all sadness will be turned into joy. They are called Spirituals because of the deep religious feeling they express. They are called Melodies because of the striking melody built upon a scale that was originated by the slaves. When a new song was born it usually began with a new melody hummed by one person. After the tune was caught, the whole group or congregation would join in, increasing the strength of the melody and adding harmony. These songs are called Folk Songs because they satisfy the well-known scientific definition of that term."[1]

Mays and Nicholson write of the Spiritual "The creation of the spirituals was not an accident in Negro life. It was an imperative creation in order that the slave might adjust himself to the new conditions in the New World.

"These songs are the expressions of the restrictions and dominations which their creators experienced in the world about them. They represent the soul-life of the people. They embody the joy and sorrow, the hope and despair, the pathos and aspiration of the newly transplanted people; and through them the race was able to endure suffering and survive. Clearly, the Negro spirituals are not songs of hate, they are not songs of revenge. They are songs neither of war nor of conquest. They are songs of the soil and of the soul."[2]

[1]Understanding Our Neighbors, (Atlanta: Commission on Interracial Cooperation, Inc), p. 16
[2]Mays and Nicholson, The Negro's Church, (Institute of Social and Religious Research, 1938), p 2.
                                                        B.E.M.

Nehemiah: Historical book of the O.T., which is contained in the third division of the Hebrew canon, the "Writings" or Hagiographa*. In Hebrew this book formed originally a single work with the Book of Ezra*. It is an account of the rebuilding of the wall of Jerusalem under the leadership of Nehemiah, promulgation of the Law by Ezra*, and subsequent reforms by Nehemiah. The book was written by the same author as I, II Chronicles* and the Book of Ezra, in the third or fourth century B.C. His principal source was the Memoirs of Nehemiah, comprising most of chaps. 1-7 and possibly also 12 27-43; 13 4-31, a highly authentic and valuable autobiography. Nehemiah was Persian governor of Judaea in 444-432 B.C., and a very efficient man of affairs who afforded much-needed leadership to the small Jewish community of Jerusalem in this period. His most important work was that of rebuilding the wall of Jerusalem, but he is said also to have promoted racial exclusiveness in marriage and stricter Sabbath-observance. See Esdras, Books of.
See L. W. Batten, The Books of Ezra and Nehemiah (International Critical Commentary), (1913).
                                                        J.P.H.

Nelson, Leonard: (1882-1927) As the leader and founder of the Neufriessche Schule, he was professor of philosophy at the University of Göttingen. In contrast to almost all neo-Kantians, he was like J. F. Fries* and E. F. Apelt for a psychological interpretation of Kant His school has been severely criticized by representatives of the Marburger school, who interpret Kant from the point of transcendental philosophy.

Abhandlungen der Friesschen Schule. vols 1-4 (Tübingen, 1904, 1908, 1911, 1914), Vorlesungen über die Grundlagen der Ethik (Leipzig, 1917), Die Rechtswissenschaft ohne Recht (Leipzig, 1917), Democratie und Führerschaft (Leipzig, 1920), Die neue Reformation. 2 vols (Leipzig, 1918), 2 ed. (Leipzig 1922)
                                                        H.H.

Nemesis: Goddess, daughter of Night in the Greek mythology. Her function was the pursuit and punishment of the proud, the insolent, and criminals generally Used in later literatures to express the inevitability of retribution, and even unjustifiable personal persecution.   P.G M.

neo-Catholic: Term occasionally employed to describe the renascent Catholic movement in the Anglican Church (i.e., Anglo-Catholicism*), and the revival of interest in traditional Catholic ceremonial, doctrine and practice in other groups (as Lutheranism's St. James's Society) A common character of all these groups is their non-Roman nature, coupled with their insistence on "Catholic values".
                                                        W.N P.

neo-Confucianism: See Confucianism.

neo-Friesian School: See Fries; Nelson, Leonard.

neo-Hegelianism: The philosophy of certain British (especially Scottish) and American idealists, influenced by Hegelianism*. Arose about the middle of the 19th century. Among British Neo-Hegelians are J. H. Stirling (whose Secret of Hegel was not very revealing), John and Edward Caird, T. H. Green, F. H. Bradley, B. Bosanquet, J. M. E. McTaggart* (Commentary on Hegel's Logic, Studies in Hegelian Dialectic, Studies in Hegelian Cosmology), and A. S. Pringle-Pattison* (The Idea of God in Recent Philosophy). In America, Neo-Hegelianism began with the St. Louis School (W. T. Harris, H. C. Brokmeyer). J. Dewey was influenced by it, but later departed from it; it was developed by J. Royce* (The World and the Individual) and M. W. Calkins (Persistent Problems of Philosophy). The movement was conspicuous for its idealistic philosophy of religion, and its tendency to reconcile absolutism with personalism.
See G W Cunningham, The Idealistic Argument in Recent British and American Philosophy (1933), A. K. Rogers, English and American Philosophy since 1800 (1922); and Muelder and Sears, The Development of American Philosophy (1940)   E.S.B.

neo-Kantianism: A German movement promoted first by Otto Liebmann and Albert Lange in the philosophical, and by Albert Ritschl* in the theological field about the middle of the 19th century and flourishing until about 1914. Neo K. had three different branches.
1) the so-called Marburg school, founded by Hermann Cohen* (successor of A. Lange in the chair of philosophy in the university of M.); his pupils are P. Natorp and E. Cassirer (now at Yale U.),

2) the so-called South-West Germany school represented by W. Windelband and H. Rickert, and their pupils, especially Emil Lask (died at the front in the first world war);

3) the Berlin school, founded by A. Riehl* whose only pupil is R. Hönigswald (now in this country).

The Marburg school can be characterized as the rationalistic, the Berlin school as the empiricist wing of Neo K.; the South-West-Germany school tried to reconcile the claims of reason and experience.

O. Liebmann, Kant and his successors (K. und die Epigonen, 1865); A. Lange, History of Materialism (1866).   R.K.

neo-Lutheranism: During the 18th century the Lutheran churches had almost completely lost their specific character and emphasis, and had given way to rationalistic or pietistic interpretations of the Christian faith. In Germany the Romantic movement and the new historical sense led in the first third of the 19th century to a rediscovery of Luther's message. It resulted in a revival movement, which unlike pietism* laid the main emphasis on belief in justification* by faith, regular use of sacraments and regenerated community life, including church discipline (Klaus Harms* 1778-1855, Louis Harms 1808-1865, Volkening 1796-1877). The fresh interest in Luther led—after an interval of more than seventy years—to a new publication of his works Erlanger Ausgabe (1826 ff, 2nd ed. 1862-1885). This movement was followed by a renewal of Lutheran Confessionalism that fought against church union with the Presbyterians, and confessional indifference, and for the supreme authority of the confessional Lutheran standards in the organized life of the church (the poet K. F. Philipp Spitta 1801-1859, L. A. Petri 1803-1873, Hengstenberg* 1802-1869, Stahl 1802-1861, Luthardt* 1823-1902).

The interest then turned toward a historical study of the Lutheran confessions of faith (Fr. H. R. von Frank*, A. von Harless 1806-1879, Heinrich Schmid 1811-1885) and of the theology of Luther (Theodosius Harnack* 1817-1889, Julius Köstlin 1826-1902). Practical considerations led to a special study of Luther's idea of the church. Here two antagonistic groups came gradually into existence, those who under the influence of the earlier revival or of pietistic ideas laid the main emphasis on the congregation as the fellowship of the believers (Harless, Höfling 1802-1863, Carl Ferd. Walther 1811-1887), whereas the other group praised the dignity and upheld the authority of the organized church and its ministry (Löhe, Kliefoth 1810-1895, Stahl, F. A. Philippi* 1809-1882, Vilmar 1800-1868). Historically this resurgence of Lutheranism strengthened the centripetal tendencies in continental Lutheranism. It preserved the churches in Europe from splitting up into sects and small groupings, and enabled them to eliminate the weeds of rationalism. But once this task had been accomplished, the movement became largely apologetic (Zöckler, Rich. Grutzmacher*, Reinhold Seeberg*). Over against the barrenness and rigidity of a narrow Lutheran confessionalism the Erlangen School* (Thomasius, Hofmann, Harless, Frank) insisted on the derived authority of the confessions and their Biblical foundation. Through their insistence on the primacy of Biblical exegesis these men enabled Lutheran theology to enrich the traditional beliefs by new thoughts on Christology, eschatology, sacraments and ethics. Between 1860 and 1870 the Lutheran movement had reached its climax. Even Ritschl*, in so many respects its antagonist, was deeply indebted to it. The subsequent generation lacked a vital interest in Luther, though in the historical field very valuable contributions were made, especially in the field of Luther biographies (Köstlin, Kolde, Berger, Kawerau, Rade). K. Knaake suggested the publication of a great critical edition of Luther's works, especially for the use of the scholar, and publication started in 1883 (Weimarer Ausgabe).

The twentieth century witnessed a fresh approach to Luther, in many respects similar to the earlier Luther revival (so-called Luther renaissance). Whereas the later 19th century assumed the identity of Luther's own thoughts with those of the Luther schoolmen, and thus interpreted Luther himself in terms of their theology, recent scholarship has noticed the influence of foreign ideas (especially Neo-scholasticism) upon the development of Lutheran theology in the second half of the 16th century. Thus the attempt is made to interpret Luther out of his own personal experience as contrasted both with piety and theology of the Middle Ages, and also of Protestant orthodoxy. Luther is no longer regarded primarily as a theological teacher, but rather as a religious genius and thinker in his own right (Karl Müller, Otto Scheel, Karl Holl, Carl Stange, Reinh. Seeberg, Aulén, Althaus, Hirsch, Gogarten*, Elert and a whole pleiad of younger scholars).

The 19th century developments in Germany had their repercussions upon the Lutheran churches in the Scandinavian countries. In Sweden the contact with German Lutheranism called forth a type of High Church Movement in the 1850's, and a vital Lutheran theology in recent years (School of Lund). (See Lundensian theology). In Norway influences from the south resulted in a High Church Lutheran orthodoxy in theology and the conception of the ministry (Hersleb, Stevensen, W. A. Wexels), which opposed the prevailing pietism of the laity (Hauge*). But Gisle Johnson* succeeded in uniting the two movements into a living and active Lutheran national church. In the Danish church Mynster and Martensen* combined Lutheran confessionalism and High Church ideals with idealistic humanism over against Madsen's* orthodoxy. But their most powerful opponent was Sören Kierkegaard*, who interpreted Luther in the light of pietistic experiences. Kierkegaard's view in turn played a decisive role in Norwegian Lutheranism as well as in the German Luther Renaissance.

The Lutheran Churches in the U.S.A. faithfully reflect the European development. Their sole original contribution was the idea of the ministry held by C. F. Walther*, the leader of the Missouri Synod, which combines Lohe's emphasis on the local congregation with a very high conception of the authority and dignity of the ministry. See konfessionskünde.

The Church Histories by Karl Muller, Stephan-Leube, Gustav Kruger; the Histories of modern theology by Gustav Frank, F. Kattenbusch, F. H. R. von Frank.

Werner Elert, Der Kampf um das Christentum seit Schleiermacher (1921).   O.A.P.

neo-orthodoxy: A term which designates that movement in contemporary Protestant theology which re-emphasizes the classic Protestant doctrines of God's transcendence, man's sin, and justification by faith, as over against the liberal conceptions of God's immanence, man's goodness and his gradual improvement. The roots of the movement go back to emphases in Paul, Augustine, the Protestant reformers, and Kierkegaard*. The leader of the movement in its beginnings was the Swiss pastor and theologian, Karl Barth*. Wide variations of view point among Barth's own followers and other representatives of the movement have appeared. Its influence has now been extended throughout Christendom. Few of its representatives apply the term "neo-orthodox" to themselves, though Edwin Lewis in America has done so.

Edwin Lewis, The Faith We Declare (1939), pp. 167 ff.   D.D.W.

Neo Platonism: Neoplatonism is a blend of almost all the major lines of philosophical thought which preceded its epoch: one of the most remarkable attempts in history to weave all the strands of existing systems into a single web of thought. Its greatest interpreter was Plotinus who was born near Alexandria in 205 A.D. and died in Rome 270. He was initiated into philosophy by the self-taught Ammonius Saccas, who is the real founder of the movement.

Plotinus was a passionate disciple of Plato*, but he drew extensively upon Aristotle and the Stoics for the material of his own intellectual structure. The work which the Arabic and Medieval Christian scholars entitled, "The Theology of Aristotle," was in reality a paraphrase of the philosophy of Plotinus. The influence of Plotinus and later Neoplatonists on Christian theology is of immense importance, especially on St. Augustine, Pseudo-Dionysius, John Scotus Erigena and St. Thomas Aquinas, and, through successive revivals, on the later Christian thought of Europe.

At the center of all reality in the universe, in Plotinus' system of thought, set forth in his Enneads, is the Godhead, the One, the Absolute Good, the Source, which transcends thought and concrete being and utterance, an undivided and undifferentiated Unity. From this ultimate One, by an overflow from the superabundant Godhead, a succession of emanations* radiate out in stages of decreasing splendor and reality. First in Order is the Nous, Mind or Spirit, which radiates from the One as light emanates from a luminous body. This is the Over-Mind of the Universe, the World of Ideas, Patterns or Forms, of which all minds, and everything real and intelligible, partake. The Third Order of Plotinus' Trinity, and the second emanation, is the Over-Soul, which is the principle of life, of activity and process. It's the Life of all life and enfolds all souls. It floods out and makes the concrete world   Matter by itself is unreal. It is the limit or barrier against which the outflowing reality of soul is broken and splashes into multiplicity and differentiation. Soul is amphibious and may live downward in the lower world or live upward in the World Yonder.

For Plotinus there is "a way down", by emanation, and "a way up", or return to Source. The Soul must first of all come to itself, withdraw from desires, objects of sense, and contemplate the true patterns of things, and rise to the height of thinking God's thoughts, and so attain the realm of Spirit—Nous. The last stage of the journey to the Fatherland, the Divine Center, or Source, can be reached only by a leap of ecstatic mystical experience, which Plotinus called "the flight of the alone to the Alone." He is the "father" of western mysticism which St. Augustine and "Dionysius" brought into the Christian stream. Porphyry* (232-304) was his disciple and biographer. Other members of the School were Jamblicus, the Syrian (died 330) and, greatest of all after Plotinus, Proclus (411-485). See Platonism; Pletho.

The Enneads of Plotinus were translated in five volumes by Stephen Mackenna (London, 1917-1930); Proclus' Elements of Theology by E R Dodd (Oxford, 1933) Dean W R Inge. The Philosophy of Plotinus (London, 1918).   R.M.J.

neo-Pythagoreanism: Although Pythagorean* philosophy was revived in Rome as early as Cicero, it did not acquire vogue until the time of Apollonius of Tyana (fl. 1st cent.). Its teachings contained elements from Plato., Aristotle, Stoics and Epicureans as well as from Pythagoras and the early Pythagoreans. According to Neo-Pythagoreanism a hierarchy of Gods existed. The supreme one should not be designated by a name but be apprehended only by reason. Numbers were still sacred, particularly the first ten, "one was God, reason, the principle of form and goodness, and two, the principle of inequality and change, of matter, evil, etc."

Ueberweg. A History of Philosophy I, 234.

                                                            P.R.H.

neo-realism: Idem New Realism*.

neo-Scholasticism: (Gr. neos, new; Lat. scholasticus, lecturer) A revival of Scholasticism* in the middle of the nineteenth century in Italy (Sanseverino, Cornoldi, Zigliara, Lorenzelli, Matussi); Germany (Kleutgen, Stockl, Grabmann, Schneid, Ehrle); France (Farges, Dormet de Vorges); and Belgium (Dupont, Lepidi). The movement sought to reassert basic philosophical principles and notions, carefully elaborated by Aristotle and the scholastics, which the prevailing positivism, materialism and scientism ignored. Leo XIII* recognized this trend in the encyclical "Aeterni Patris" August 4, 1879 and invited Catholic scholars to rediscover and represent the unchanging truths of the scholastic masters, enriching them with the well-founded truths of their successors in the philosophical tradition, eliminating excessive subtleties, and correcting the errors associated with their historical periods. This recommendation was implemented in 1891 by the foundation of the Institut Superieur de Philosophie at Louvain, Belgium under the direction of Désiré (later Cardinal) Mercier. Natural science, modern philosophy and psychology, and history were studied along with the original texts of St. Thomas and other medieval philosophers. The impetus furnished by the pope opened a vast movement of exhaustive historical (Grabmann, Ehrle, DeWulf, Mandonnet, Gilson, Van Steenberghen, Phelan) and critical (Nys, Noel, Maritain, Olgiatti) research to the enrichment of modern scholarship regardless of religious affiliation.

Cardinal Mercier and Professors of Louvain, A Manual of Modern Scholastic Philosophy, trans by T. L Parker (London, 1923-28) ; Cardinal Mercier, Origins of Contemporary Psychology, trans W. H Mitchell, M. A., (London, Manchester, 1918) , Maurice de Wulf, Scholasticism Old & New, (Dublin, 1910) ; John S Zybura, Present-Day Thinkers and The New Scholasticism, (1926) ; Joseph Louis Perrier, Revival of Scholastic Philosophy in the 19th Century, (1920) ; Louis J A. Mercier, Challenge of Humanism, containing "Neo-scholasticism and the tradition of Dualism". (1933).   J.J.F.

neo-Thomism: See Thomism.

nephesh: (Heb. nephesh; Arab. nafs) Hebrew: 1) Pre-Exilic Kingdom Period; the religious factor in man, the soul or shade understood to be in its nature different in kind from that of the natures of spirits, demons, gods, and spirit of Yahweh, all of which were spirits of non-human nature, and immortal, nephesh experiences death, is indestructible, eternal but not immortal. 2) After the 6th century B.C., the religious factor in man, the soul, understood to be ruah in its nature, the same nature as Yahweh; man's nature is now different from that of Yahweh in degree but not in kind: Nephesh identified with ruah in man. Arab. Evolution in meaning of nafs is similar to that of the Hebrew nephesh mentioned above, except that the great change in meaning occurred in the seventh century A.D. when Arabic primitivism was succeeded by Islam; after that time man is ruh nature. See ruah, ruh.   F.L.P.

Neptune: (Lat., Neptūnus, cf. nimbus, rain) An old Italian water-deity, who under Greek influence assumed the attributes of Poseidon*. His festival is the Neptunalia (July 23).   E.M.N.

nereids: (Gr. Nēreides, from Nēreus, son of Ocean and Tethys; id-, patronymic) Sea-nymphs, as opposed to naiads*, spring-nymphs. The most famous were Thetis, mother of Achilles, Amphitrite, wife of Poseidon, and Galatea. See nymphs.   E.M.N.

Nergal: See Mesopotamian religions.

Nerthus: A Norse earth-goddess, sometimes iden-tified with Frigga*, and idealized in Swinburne's famous poem Hertha. Also known as Huldra and Vrou-elde. The Milk Way was known as the street of Hertha.   P.G.M.

Nestorianism: The doctrine of the Person of Christ set forth by Nestorius, Patriarch of Constantinople (428-31 A.D.) and the Antiochene School (See Antiochian School) represented by St. John Chrysostom and Theodore of Mopsuestia. The School represents a rebellion against the hypostatic Christology* of Alexandria and the heresy of Apollinaris* by its own emphasis on the historic Jesus as well as the divine Son. The starting point of the controversy is to be found in their opposition to the attribute Theotokos applied to the Mother of Christ; in its place Nestorius suggested Christotokos, which offended contemporary piety. In place of *hypostatic union of the divine and human natures, Nestorius suggested prosopic union· "The manhood is the face (prosopon) of the Godhead, and the Godhead is the face (prosopon) of the manhood." The doctrine was attacked by Cyril of Alexandria* who mistook prosopon as a philosophical term—either intentionally or ignorantly—and it was his caricature which was condemned at the Councils of Ephesus (431) and Chalcedon (451) See Christology.

J. F. Bethune-Baker, Nestorius and his Teaching (1909) ; F. Loofs, Nestorius (1914) ; R. V. Sellers, Two Ancient Christologies (1940) F Nau has produced traditional evidence suggesting that Nestorius was not of Syrian but of Magian extraction See canons of various churches. Cf. Syrian churches; Virgin Mary.   F.W.B.

Nestorians: The followers of Nestorius, under Piroz, the Sasanid King (457-96), Barsauma assured the King that the doctrine of the Persian Christians differed from Constantinopolitan orthodoxy (at the time Monophysitism), and in 499 Nestorian doctrine became the orthodoxy of the Sasanid Church (Persia) under the Patriarch (Catholicus) of Babylon, who was duly invested by the Great King with the insignia and rank of a wazir, a custom continued under Muslim rule. Its centres of learning were Edessa (to 457) and then Nisibis. The Church accepted the Canons of Nicaea but not the Canons of Ephesus and Chalcedon. In 553, the condemnation of The Three Chapters* at Constantinople aroused indignation and under the Catholicus Ishu-Yahb (582-96) the Nestorian Church reaffirmed the orthodoxy of Theodore of Mopsuestia*. The changes from Sasanid to Muslim and later Mongol rule had little effect on the life of the Nestorian Church, whose jurisdiction extended to its missions in China (See Chinese religions), India, Arabia Felix, Egypt (after 644) and into the heart of Central Asia. In the fifteenth century the patriarchate became hereditary. Under the Ottoman Turks the Nestorians became the victims of severe persecution and to the encroachment of the Church of Rome. In 1551 the Uniate Patriarchate of Babylon was established. The orthodox Nestorians joined the Allies against Turkey in 1914, but in the years following the Peace treaties of Sèvres (1920) and Lausanne (1923) their interests having been carelessly neglected by the diplomatists, they were almost exterminated.

Their present Patriarch (1942) is Isa Mar Shimun XXI, who has been living in England and the U. S. A.

B J. Kidd, The Churches of Eastern Christendom
(1927); J Labourt, Le Christianisme dans l'Empire Perse (1904), G. P. Badger, Nestorians and their Rituals (1862)   F.W.B.

ne temere: The opening words of a decree issued on August 2, 1907 by the Sacred Congregation of the Council to clarify the Church's legislation on marriages*. The decree went into effect April 19, 1908. It set forth the proper conditions for betrothal and valid marriage. The chief article decreed that marriages of Catholics were thereafter null unless celebrated before a duly qualified priest and at least two witnesses. The same law obliged when either party was a Catholic but did not bind those who were not and had not been Catholic. It also set forth other regulations concerning Catholic marriages. The chief points of this decree were embodied in the canons on marriage in the new Code of Canon Law*.   T.T.M.

Neuchâtel, Independent Evangelical Church of: (organized 1873) has its origin in the preaching of Farel* in the canton of Neuchâtel. Churches were established independent of the State. They were governed by a body composed of the pastors, known as the "Company of Pastors" till the Revolution of 1848 when the "Company" was replaced by a synod of pastors and laymen. About 1865 the State seriously curtailed the freedom of the Synod, e g., in appointments to the theological professorships. There were then forty churches.
In 1873 twenty-one of these seceded from this state-controlled system to return to the old independence. The Independent Evangelical Church of Neuchâtel is controlled by a synod (all the pastors plus three laymen for each pastor). Pastors were paid from a central budget, not by parishes.
About one-half of the congregations use church buildings owned by the State. Among the better known savants at its theological school was F.
Godet*. See Godet's article in the New Schaff-Herzog Encyclopedia of Religious Knowledge
(1910).   Q.B.

neumes: (Gr. neuma, sign) A system of musical notation originating in Constantinople at the Church of Hagia Sophia in the seventh century.
It was in common usage in both Byzantine and Latin churches by the ninth century. Neumes designate accentuation, changes in intensity and speed. Meter was not required since the words of Gregorian chant* follow prose rhythms and were sung as they would be spoken.

G. Grove, Dictionary of Music and Musicians
(1935), Article on Notation; C. F. A. Williams,
The Story of Notation (1903).   E.H.B.

neutralism: See ontology.

New Apostolic Church, the: See Catholic Apostolic Church.

new birth: See conversion; regeneration, repentance.

New Church, the: See New Jerusalem, Church of the.

New Congregational Methodist Church: See holiness churches.

New England Primer: See catechumenate.

New England theology: Technically the "New England Theology" was the dominant theology of New England Congregationalism* during the last half of the Eighteenth and the first half of the Nineteenth Centuries. It may be dated quite specifically from Jonathan Edwards'* sermon on "Justification by Faith" in 1734. It lost its last authoritative defender and expounder when Edward Amasa Park* of Andover Theological Seminary was made emeritus in 1881. The system was, therefore, continuously taught, "improved" and preached for a century and a half and accepted, at least nominally, by New England orthodoxy. The preeminence of New England in American religious and educational life during most of that long period gave to its theological thought an unusual significance It was from first to last geographically provincial, but it had an outstanding formative influence upon many movements in American christianity and was recognized in Great Britain.

The system was fundamentally Calvinistic in direct line of succession from the Continental Reformed churches and English Puritanism. The "Cambridge Synod" (Massachusetts Bay Colony) adopted the Westminister Confession* as authoritative for the Churches there represented in 1648.
Ten years later (1658) English Independents supported by Oliver Cromwell* made their own "Declaration of the Faith and Order Owned and Practiced in the Congregational Churches in England."
This is known from the place of meeting in London as the "Savoy Declaration."* It was rigidly Calvinistic and especially precise about "predestination."* Massachusetts made the "Savoy Declaration" official in 1680, Connecticut in 1708.

The New England Theology therefore inherited two Calvinistic formulae—one Puritan-Presbyterian, the other Independent-Congregational. The peculiar New England interest in theology was due in part to the isolation of the Colonies, their specific religio-political character, the predominance of the clergy in all their affairs and, beginning with Jonathan Edwards, a succession of speculatively-minded clergymen of unusual intellectual force.

More definitely the theology was the endeavor to find a working doctrinal basis—inside the pattern of inherited Calvinism—for the "revivalism" which began under the elder Edwards and prevailed in the orthodox churches for a hundred years. It was primarily a theology of the evangelical pulpit rather than the divinity school classrooms.

A resumé of it may be organized under two approaches, even the approximate indication of which is not possible here. First: the succession of the theological leaders Joseph Bellamy (1719-1790) studied under Edwards and reflected his influence. Samuel Hopkins (1721-1803) organized his own theology into a "system." Nathaniel Emmons (1745-1840) continued the succession. Nathaniel William Taylor (1786-1858) so modified the rigidities of the system as to make Horace Bushnell* and his successors possible. The succession ended, as said above, with E. A. Park of Andover. But there were also many thinkers and writers of less stellar magnitude.

The doctrines developed and debated were for the most part solutions of theological problems—human depravity, the function and responsibility of the will, the origin and nature of sin; the atonement, justification, the tests and nature of virtue, the rewards and punishments of the future life and, centrally and continuously, the sovereignty of God in the administration of all human affairs. There was always a background of controversy against rival systems, against "Arminianism" (the equivalent of later Liberalism); against Unitarianism, Universalism, against the disestablishment of tax-supported churches, against the secularization of what began as a theocratic society.

A voluminous literature was created, in which even the specialists in the history of theology tend to lose themselves. In general there was a progressive modification of the extreme rigidities of inherited Calvinism. The movement founded three theological seminaries, Andover, Yale and the Hartford School, its powerfully motivated Foreign Missions and toward the end fostered agitations for various reforms in society. A new type and era of Congregational theology began with Horace Bushnell (1802-1876) and in general (again a loose but necessary phrase) the inherited theologies as closely articulated systems were dissolved in a new mind-order. See American theology, early; benevolence, disinterested; Calvinists; Hopkinsianism; means; New Haven theology, New School Presbyterian Church; New theology; Progressive orthodoxy.

Standard reference works are Williston Walker's The Creeds and Platforms of Congregationalism (1893). The biographies of the outstanding leaders specifically F. H. Foster, A Genetic History of New England Theology (1907), and G. N. Boardman, New England Theology (1899). G.G.A.

New England transcendentalism: See transcendentalism, New England.

New Harmony community: See communistic settlements, secular.

New Haven theology: New England Calvinism as "improved" by a group of Yale men and their friends to meet the changing currents of thought of the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries. The notable leaders of the movement were Timothy Dwight, Lyman Beecher, Chauncey A. Goodrich, Eleazer T. Fitch, and Nathaniel W. Taylor. Taylor (1786-1858) made the most extensive statement of the system, which is therefore also known as "Taylorism".

Arminians, Deists, infidels and Unitarians in turn pressed upon Calvinists the inconsistency of determinism with man's responsibility. Edwards*, in his defense of Calvinism, upheld determinism and annihilated the Arminian notion of indeterminism as the basis for responsibility. But by drawing the distinction between "natural" and "moral" inability he was able to assert that man was responsible even though his will was determined, because he had freedom to do as he pleased and he pleased to sin. The New Haven men rejected Edwards' solution and held that the only possible basis for responsibility is the freedom to choose as well as to do. They defined all sin as the voluntary transgression of known law, and total depravity as the occasion but not the cause of sin. In spite of their protestations of loyalty to the essentials of Calvinism a large conservative group led by Bennet Tyler* rejected their leadership, separated from them, and founded Hartford Seminary in 1834. Cf. Calvinists, Old. See American theology, early.

Eleazer T. Fitch, Two Discourses on the Nature of Sin (1826) ; Nathaniel W. Taylor, Concio ad Clerum (1828) ; Zebulon Crocker, The Catastrophe of the Presbyterian Church (1838) ; F. H Foster, A Genetic History of the New England Theology (1907) ; Sidney E. Mead, Nathaniel W. Taylor, A Connecticut Liberal, (1942). S.E.M.

New Humanists: See Humanism, the New.

New Jerusalem, Church of the: Followers of Swedenborg* organized the first congregation, or society, in London, 1788. The founding of the New Church is regarded by its members as dating back to the second coming of Christ, which took place when Swedenborg received the key to the interpretation of Scripture. His revelation of the spiritual meaning of Scripture became the doctrinal basis of the Church, whose former phases now gave way to the New Jerusalem. A General Conference met in 1789, organized in 1821 as the "General Conference of the ministers and other members of the new church signified by the New Jerusalem in the Apocalypse or Revelation of John." In 1926 this British Convention counted about 70 societies and 7,100 members. Since 1810 the Swedenborg Society had produced a great amount of literature, especially translations of Swedenborg's work into many languages. Missions of the New Church spread to Italy, Denmark, Austria, Russia, India, Africa, South America and other countries. The numbers were never large. In Swedenborg's home country, Sweden, there were in 1940, hardly 200 members.

The first New Church Society in the United States was organized at Baltimore in 1792. The "General Convention of the New Jerusalem in the United States" dates from 1817. Each local society has great freedom, but cooperates in an association, which in turn functions under the General Convention, meeting annually. The Convention provides for education and ordination of pastors, carries on missions, and orders the worship of the church. An American liturgy was adopted in 1876. Pastors serve local societies, while ministers may serve throughout the Convention. In 1890 the Pennsylvania Association, influenced by several leaders toward regarding the writings of Swedenborg as divinely inspired and insisting upon greater distinctiveness of life and work, withdrew from the Convention, and in 1897 adopted the name, "The General Church of the New Jerusalem." The bishop, cathedral, and school of the newer body is at Bryn Athyn, Pennsylvania. In 1930 the General Convention included 79 congregations and 5,363 members, served by 74 ministers. The General Church in the same year had 11 churches, 1,112 members, 25 ministers.

In general, the New Church follows the system of doctrine which Swedenborg found as the inner meaning of the Scripture. Confirmation, about the age of fourteen, admits to Junior membership, adult membership from about the age of twenty admits to the Communion Table. Baptism is retained as also modified forms of the marriage and burial service. The Liturgy (London, 1903) follows in the main the Anglican Book of Prayer, just as the polity of the church is a modified episcopate.

C T Odhner, Annals of the New Church (1904) ; R Hindmarsh, Rise and Progress of the New Jerusalem Church in England and other Parts (London, 1861) , C F Dole, The New Church· What, How, Why? (1906) ; Headquarters General Convention of the New Jerusalem in the United States, Boston, Mass ; The General Church of the New Jerusalem, Bryn Athyn, Pa. c.j.b.

New Lights: The nick-name applied to the revivalists among New England Congregationalists during the Great Colonial Awakening*. In the great Western Revival, at the beginning of the nineteenth century, the name New Light was also applied to the revivalistic wing of the western Presbyterians, and later particularly to the followers of Barton W. Stone co-founder of the Church of the Disciples. w.w s.

New Measures: The name given to the practices of certain American Lutherans of the earlier part of the 19th century emphasizing measures (regarded as questionable Lutheranism). Doctrinally lax, this group advocated experimental religion, conversion, revival meetings and even the "anxious bench". See Kurtz, Benjamin. v.f.

New Realism: See epistemology.

New School Presbyterian Church: The Presbyterian Church* in the U. S. A. underwent a schism in 1837. In 1838 one party, already known as the New School, being denied ecclesiastical recognition by the other, which controlled the General Assembly, formed its own organization. This claimed to continue the Presbyterian Church, as did also the other group or Old School*. The New School comprised about four-ninths of the church, mostly in the north and above all in New York. It contained many people of New England and Congregational antecedents. The two parties, which had been in controversy for several years before the separation, were generally progressive and conservative. The New School contended for liberal interpretation of the standards of the church in doctrine, recognizing some ideas of the New England theology* (see Auburn Declaration), and in polity, allowing the continuance of work in union with the Congregationalists*, it favored voluntary societies for missions and education rather than church boards, later modifying this position, it was prevailingly opposed to slavery, and hence at length in 1853 lost its presbyteries in border states. During the separation it embodied liberal Presbyterianism   The two Schools reunited in 1869, "each recognizing the other as a sound and orthodox body". See American theology, early.

                                                                                              r.n.n.

New Side Presbyterians: The Great Awakening* occasioned a division among American Presbyterians*, as in other churches. The party called New Side favored the revival and practiced its methods. They considered spiritual experience more important as a qualification for the ministry than academic education. They were liberals regarding doctrinal standards and church discipline. They were largely, though not wholly, of New England antecedents   The controversy with the Old Side* caused the Synod, the general organization of colonial Presbyterianism to be divided in 1741   The New Side formed the Synod of New York (1745)   This was by far the more active part of Presbyterianism during the separation. The two Sides reunited in 1758 as the Synod of New York and Philadelphia.   r.h n.

New Testament Books, the, in chronological order: See Books of the New Testament, dates of the.

New Testament, literature: The N.T. is the collection of Christian sacred books which was added to the Jewish Bible, the latter being known thereafter among Christians as the O.T.   The word translated Testament (Greek, Diathêkê) might better be translated Covenant; the use of the term implies that the two collections contain the records or documents of the two Dispensations, one the Dispensation of the law given through Moses, the other the Dispensation of grace through Jesus Christ.

I Canon   When the Christian books were gathered together and added to the Hebrew Bible, both had already been long in use in Christian services of worship. The O.T. was of course read in the Greek version, the Septuagint. The early Christian writings were likewise in Greek. It was by no arbitrary act or decision that the Christian sacred books were collected, instead it was a gradual process extending over three or four centuries. By the middle of the 2nd century the four gospels had been singled out and were viewed as inspired and authoritative. (The 'Four-Gospel Canon' was presupposed by Tatian's Diatessaron, c. 180 A.D., and Irenaeus assumed that there could be no more and no fewer gospels, since they corresponded with the four quarters of the heavens, the four beasts in Ezekiel's version, etc.). It has been thought that Marcion's N.T., containing the Gospel of Luke and the Pauline Epistles (omitting the Pastorals) had great influence, positively or negatively, in producing our New Testament, but this view is contested.

It is probable that the Epistles of Paul had been gathered together somewhat earlier, perhaps even before the end of the first century or early in the second   There is ample evidence to support the theory of Professor Goodspeed that the Pauline epistles were gathered together after the compilation and perhaps publication of Luke-Acts. Readers of this Lucan writing now became aware of the great importance of the Apostle Paul. His letters were in a somewhat fragmentary state of preservation. The Corinthian correspondence was incomplete and had to be pieced together, many scholars think that our 2nd Cor, e.g., is made up of at least two and possibly three letters or parts of letters. Romans is thought to contain miscellaneous fragments in chs. 12-16. The Epistle to the Ephesians may not be a letter by Paul but a kind of encyclical made up of Pauline quotations or paraphrases of his teaching, put together (as Goodspeed thinks) as the 'covering' letter or introduction to the Pauline corpus. The pastoral letters, (1st 2nd Timothy and Titus) are much later and probably come from the first half of the 2nd century. They presuppose conditions in the church which did not obtain in the lifetime of Paul.

Some of the later books of the N.T. like the Epistle to Hebrews, the Epistle of James, Jude, and 2nd Peter, and the 2nd and 3rd Epistles of John were admitted to the Canon only after long-continued debate. At the same time certain other books were acknowledged by some writers and were used in some parts of the church—books like the Shepherd of Hermas, the Epistle of Barnabas, 1st Clement, and the Apocalypse of Peter. This means that these books were used, here and there, both in public worship and in private study. One of the main tests for admission into the list of the sacred (i.e., 'canonical') books was apostolic authorship—or at least authorship by those close to the apostles and teaching their doctrine.

Eusebius of Caesarea, early in the fourth century, classified the Christian books as 1) canonical, 2) doubtful or disputed, 3) unauthentic and 4) heretical (History of the Church, 3.25).

Although a N.T. was in existence by the end of the 2nd century (Tertullian and Clement of Alexandria used the term), and although its chief components can be traced back to the 1st century, the canon was not completed until the 4th and 5th century. The books of the N. T. were first listed exactly as we have them today, in the Easter Epistle of Athanasius in the year 367. Athanasius' list was definitive for the East. It had great influence in the West though it was not finally adopted until the year 405, when Pope Innocent I sent a list of the canonical books to the Bishop Exsuperius of Toulouse.

II. Text: Although there have been many discoveries of early manuscripts*, chiefly in the papyrus collections from Egypt, we do not have a single autograph of a N.T. book, that is, the manuscript written by the author himself. This is not surprising, for the same is true of all ancient literary works. We have only copies of copies and we have no way of telling how many copies intervened between the autographs and the oldest surviving manuscripts. Hence, considerable variety was introduced into the text of the N.T. books at the very earliest stage of transmission. In general, our N.T. manuscripts seem to be descended from five or six leading textual 'families' in the 2nd century. These are probably to be associated with the great centers of Christian activity—Egypt (esp. Alexandria), Caesarea, Syria, Italy, North Africa, Gaul   The oldest versions (Old Latin and Old Syriac) also belong to this period and represent local types of text.

It is from these families or, rather, these leading local texts that our present manuscripts have descended, most of them, of course, bearing the marks of cross-influence of other types upon each other. The great Greek Uncials (e.g., Codex Sinaiticus, 4th century, Codex Alexandrinus, 5th century, Codex Vaticanus, 4th century, etc.), probably contained revised texts. The older theory of Westcott and Hort, viz., that Sinaiticus and Vaticanus are the best of all manuscripts and contain a 'neutral' text, has now been either greatly modified or abandoned by textual experts. They probably contain a text revised partly by consultation of good ancient manuscripts, partly by consideration of grammar and syntax.

The later manuscripts (Minuscules, that is, written in flowing script as contrasted with the Uncials, which were written in capital letters) date chiefly from the 9th to 16th centuries and contain a type of text which apparently resulted from conflation of variant readings. Thus the later text (Byzantine, or textus receptus) preserved quantities of divergent and sometimes incompatible readings. The task of textual criticism is to work back through this common or received text to the great 2nd century types and then, often by conjecture, to something approximating the autographs.

A distinction must be made between the text of the gospels which were as a rule copied as a whole and that of the Pauline Epistles, which also were copied as a body.

In addition to the early versions, Latin, Syriac, Coptic, there are many quotations of the N T. in the writings of the early church fathers, e.g., Irenaeus, Clement of Alexandria, Origen, Tertullian, Hippolytus, Cyprian, and others. Of course the manuscript tradition of the writings of these fathers must itself be examined critically, for the copies of their writings which have come down to us have in many cases been influenced by the text of the N.T. current in the copyist's locality.

In spite of the thousands of variations found in the N.T. manuscripts, it is nevertheless true that very few of them would make any difference in the interpretation of the N.T. Most of these variations were the result of mistakes in copying; very few resulted from doctrinal differences or from propaganda. Where the latter is the case, there is little difficulty in recognizing the fact, and other manuscripts are at hand to check the aberration.

III. Growth of the N T. The earliest N.T. writings were undoubtedly the Epistles of Paul, piobably in this order 1-2 Thessalonians, Galatians, 1-2 Corinthians, Romans, Philippians, Colossians, Philemon. These letters come from the latter part of Paul's missionary career and the period of his imprisonment at Rome, that is, from 50 to 62 or 64 A.D., when Paul was martyred The Gospel of Mark probably comes from about 68, and from the City of Rome, that is, after the martyrdom of Peter and Paul. The Gospel of Matthew is variously dated, a number of scholars assigning it to a date soon after A D. 70, while others date it nearer the end of the centuiy, and some even later still. Perhaps an exac' date is impossible, since the book contains material new and old, and some additions were perhaps made to it even after it had left the author's hand. Luke-Acts is probably to be dated toward the end of the century. It is an apologetic work designed to prove that Christianity is not inimical to public order and to Roman authority, the most appropriate date is during the persecution under Domitian, probably about the year 95. To this same period belongs the Revelation of John which also, however, includes older material, some of it probably from the time of Nero, some from the time of Caligula, some perhaps even pre-Christian. The whole book presupposes persecution of the Christians by the champions of the emperor-cult.

Following the "publication" or circulation of Luke-Acts, the Pauline letters were gathered together and the Epistle to Ephesians was compiled to form an introduction to the collection This means that Ephesians probably dates from the end of the century or soon after. The Pastoral Epistles (1-2 Timothy and Titus) are to be dated considerably later, either between 100 and 110 or possibly (with Goodspeed) around 150. Jude and 2d Peter are also late. Even conservative critics allow that the latter probably comes from the middle of the 2nd century.

It is extremely difficult to date the remaining N.T. literature. The Epistle to Hebrews presupposes some knowledge of the Pauline letters and probably comes from Rome. The title ("To Hebrews") is mistaken and is only an inference from its large amount of O.T. quotation. Perhaps a date soon before or after A.D. 95 is as close as we can come.

First Peter is also Pauline but in a different sense. Paul's theology is presupposed but is developed in a different direction than that followed by Hebrews, but its dependence upon Paul may be either upon Paul's collective letters or upon Paul's surviving influence in the Aegean mission field. It presupposes a persecution and it addresses Christians scattered over northern, western, central, and eastern Asia Minor—all but southern.

The Epistle of James was probably in its origin a homily, making use, as was natural, of a considerable amount of Jewish material. It is very difficult to say when it was probably written, or where. On the whole it seems not unlikely that it comes from Syria, perhaps Antioch, and probably early in the 2nd century.

The Gospel of John is undoubtedly the latest of the gospels and is really a reinterpretation of the gospel story with the purpose of setting forth the meaning of Christ in terms of popular Hellenistic religious philosophy. It assumes the doctrine of the Logos or Word of God and in fact substitutes this concept for the old concept of Messiah, as the key to the personality, the career, and the authority of Jesus. The author has placed upon the lips of Jesus a number of discourses and a whole body of doctrine which express the thought of the writer's time and place rather than the teaching of the historical Jesus. It is a sublime dramatization of a theological idea, rather than an historical record (see "Johannine Problem"). The date is probably early in the 2nd century, possibly between 115 and 125. Cognate with the Gospel of John is the 1st Epistle, probably by the same author The other two epistles of John no doubt date from approximately the same period, but seem to come from another hand. B. W. Bacon and others have thought that the appendix to John (ch. 21) was added about the middle of the 2nd century. It is undoubtedly an appendix, but it is difficult to date.

Thus the N.T. literature grew, not as the result of certain great literary personalities producing the works of a 'school', but in order to meet the needs of the early church. The classic literature of Christianity is thus an 'occasional' literature—that is, designed to meet specific occasions and needs. In the case of the Pauline letters, this is perfectly obvious. It is true also of the gospels, which grew out of the old oral tradition of the church (see arts. "Gospel," "Synoptic Gospels," and "Form Criticism"). The Gospel of Mark was addressed to a martyr church and contained a selection of incidents from Jesus' life and sayings from his lips, designed 1) to encourage his followers faced with persecution, and 2) to prove that he had been Messiah even during his earthly life. The Gospel of Luke and the Book of Acts form one continuous apologetic work designed to show that Christianity was not an anarchistic movement, though it had been severely libeled by its enemies, instead, it deserved the same recognition and protection that the Roman authority accorded Judaism. The Gospel of Matthew is a didactic work arranged in five great sections, probably for convenience in teaching and in public reading and exposition. It presupposes a developed church which required rules for its regulation and it sets forth the teaching of Jesus in terms of the Christian Halakah or 'new law'. The Gospel of John is a polemical anti-Jewish, anti-Gnostic, reinterpretation of the whole gospel story, designed to show that Jesus was the Incarnate Logos, indeed, really God who had existed from the beginning, who "became" flesh, manifested his glory by many signs—chiefly the great seven described in chs. 2-12—and then, dying and rising again from the grave, returned to the Father. The theme of the Gospel of John is thus in essence the great epic of salvation.

The successive stages in the development of this religious literature correspond to stages in the development of early Christian theology. But it must not be supposed that these stages came in strict chronological succession. Instead, the N.T. presents us with a series of types of early Christian thought, probably six or seven in number, which reflect the spread of early Christianity into various areas of religious thought and feeling, of religious and moral outlook. See under specific N.T. books. Also see Books of the N.T., dates of the, canon, Old and New Testament, koiné, versions of the Bible, ancient.

I. See art, "New Testament Canon" (by K. Lake) in Standard Bible Dictionary (1936), 3rd ed , E J. Goodspeed, The Formation of the New Testament (1926) ; A Harnack, The Origin of the New Testament (1925) ; E C. Moore, The New Testament in the Christian Church (1904).

II. F. Kenyon, The Story of the Bible (1936) ; The Text of the Greek Bible (1937) , Our Bible and the Ancient Manuscripts (1939) , K Lake, The Text of the New Testament (1928), 6th ed.

III. Introductions to the New Testament E. J Goodspeed (1937) ; E. F. Scott (1932) ; J. Moffatt (1912) ; A. H. McNeile (1927) ; K and S Lake (1937) ; M Dibelius, A Fresh Approach to the New Testament and Early Christian Literature (1936) ; M. S. Enslin, Christian Beginnings (1938). F.C.G.

New Testament theology: This is a misleading term in so far as it suggests that the N.T. writers all teach the same doctrines, while differing in their modes of presentation. In the N.T. period the Christian mind worked freely. Every teacher made his own interpretation of the gospel, under the sole direction of the Spirit. The result was a number of theologies which need to be considered separately, and the effort to reduce them to a single type is futile. We have now learned to speak, not of a N.T. theology, but of the teaching of the primitive church, of the Pauline Epistles, of the Fourth Gospel, the Epistle to Hebrews, the book of Revelation. Besides the main types of teaching others can be discerned, more or less distinctly, and each of them must be taken by itself. At the same time the general term is a convenient one, and cannot well be dispensed with. N.T. thought is radically different from that of the O.T. The books comprising the N.T. were all produced within a given period, and represent an attitude of mind which must not be confused with that of later times. As we speak of Greek philosophy or Elizabethan poetry, so we can apply the name "N.T. theology" to all the types of thought which emerged in the primitive church. The term is thus employed by modern writers (e.g., Holtzmann, Feine, Weinel) who deal with the general subject of early Christian thinking, as set forth in the various N.T. books. See separate N.T. books. E.F.S.

New theology, the:

I

A term used in America to designate the movement toward a liberalized, evangelical theology in the last two decades of the 19th century. The movement was influenced by the new humanitarian developmental views which found expression in Horace Bushnell*. It was sensitive to problems created for Christian thought by the development of modern sciences, particularly the evolutionary hypothesis and scientific biblical criticism. It incorporated the emphasis on religious experiences derived from Schleiermacher and his followers. The definitive characterization of New Theology was given by Professor Theodore T. Munger* in 1883 in his book, The Freedom of Faith, in which the first essay was entitled "The New Theology". Munger stressed the organic connection of the New Theology with historical Christian thought, its developmental conception of theology, its emphasis upon reason and intuition, its critical method of scriptural interpretation, its concern for the solidarity of humanity over against an excessive individualism, its broader and more scientific anthropology and its liberalized eschatology. Consult in addition to Munger's book, R. J. Campbell, The New Theology (1908) and F. H. Foster, The Modern Movement in American Theology (1939). D.D.W.

II

This term was quite generally used of the theological renascence in America represented by Horace Bushnell, Henry Ward Beecher, T. T. Munger, Washington Gladden, George Gordon, Lyman Abbott, the Andover theologians, Newman Smyth, James M. Whiton, Henry C. King and others, covering a period from about 1850 to 1920. Beecher once said that for many years he had been "hauling bricks for the New Theology." Gerald Birney Smith* wrote in Religious Thought in the Last Quarter Century: "There was much popular discussion in the last decade of the nineteenth century of the 'New Theology' which was being advocated by influential liberal preachers like Lyman Abbott, Washington Gladden and David Swing." (p. 95).

Regarding Bushnell as its leader, it may be said that the movement was chiefly indebted to Coleridge*; for Dr. Munger wrote that to Coleridge's Aids to Reflection (published in America by James Marsh in 1829) "it may almost be said that we are indebted for Bushnell." Its leading doctrinal emphases were: the Divine immanence, the centrality of Christ, continuous creation (evolution), rejection of verbal inspiration and materialistic ideas of future punishment, and, in general, acceptance of the conclusions of Modern Science with stress also upon Christian education vs. evangelism.

Although later in its rise than Unitarianism* and for the most part independent of it, it had much in common with the Unitarian movement, though less controversial and more constructive and "evangelical." Nor had it more than slight connection with Transcendentalism or with Universalism.

George E. Ellis in the last chapter of his Half Century of the Unitarian Controversy wrote: "If the New Theology shall prove to be so much truer and better than Unitarianism as to obliterate the sect, whose visible increase it does withstand, we are ready to welcome it." (p. 402).

The only outstanding book bearing the title The New Theology was the controverted volume by R. J. Campbell, which however had little relation to the American movement bearing the name.

While the title "The New Theology" is colorless, and the movement long since gave place to others, there is much to be said for retaining the name as attached to it and indicating its nature when it arose and assigning it a definite place in the succession of theological movements and schools of theology in America. See Progressive Orthodoxy.

Cf Horace Bushnell· Christian Nurture (1846), Nature and the Supernatural (1858), T T. Munger: The Freedom of Faith (1883); George A. Gordon: Religion and Miracle (1909), The New Epoch for Faith (1901); Progressive Orthodoxy (1885) by members of the Faculty of Andover Seminary; Washington Gladden· How much is Left of the Old Doctrines? (1899), Present-day Theology (1913); Newman Smyth Old Faiths in New Light (1879); Lyman Abbott The Theology of an Evolutionist (1897). Cf also J. W. Buckham Progressive Religious Thought in America (1919); Report of the Commission on Congregationalism and Theology, International Congregational Council (1920). J.W.B.

New Thought movement: The constitution of the International New Thought Alliance adopted in 1916 states the purpose of the Alliance as follows "To teach the infinitude of the Supreme One, the Divinity of Man and his Infinite possibilities through the creative power of constructive thinking and obedience to the voice of the Indwelling Presence which is our source of Inspiration, Power, Health and Prosperity".

The movement derives from the work of Phineas P. Quimby (1802-1866) of Portland, Maine, who practiced mental or spiritual healing for a quarter of a century prior to his death. Among those whom he healed was Mrs. Mary Baker Patterson, later and better known as Mary Baker Eddy. It is still a moot question as to how much Mrs. Eddy was indebted to him for the ideas and techniques which she later incorporated into Christian Science*. Certainly both she and another who had been brought back to health by Quimby, W. F. Evans, a former clergyman of the New Church (Swedenborgian), did much to spread the ideas of mental healing in the years which followed. Evans in his later work stressed the mental rather than the spiritual aspects of the healing and is more responsible for the "mental science" phase through which the movement passed than any other.

Quimby created no organization. Individuals whom he had benefited adopted his method and in turn passed it on to others, adding to or modifying it in the process. The result was that there developed many small groups under different names such as Divine Science, Unity, Practical Christianity, Liveable Christianity, Home of truth, the Church of the higher life, etc. It was in the nineties that the term New Thought began to be used to characterize the general outlook of these groups, which had now come to embrace much more than the healing interest, particularly, inspiration, power, prosperity or plenty, and general well-being. National conventions were held annually from 1894 on.

In 1908 the name, The National New Thought Alliance, was adopted and in 1914 it became the International New Thought Alliance. New Thought groups are found in Europe, South America, Australia and Asia. Their literature has been translated into many languages and circulates widely even where there are no New Thought organizations Among the more popular books are those of Ralph Waldo Trine, especially, In Tune With the Infinite and the works of Orison S. Marden. Typical of the magazine literature are The Nautilus and Unity For the history of the movement see H. W. Dresser, A History of the New Thought Movement (1919).

C.S.B.

New Year, Jewish: (Heb., Rosh Hashanah) The first day of the civil year and the first day of the seventh month of the ecclesiastical year (generally occurring in September), described as "a memorial proclaimed with the blast of the horn, a holy convocation", upon which no servile work is permitted. (Lev 23.23-25, Num. 29.1-11) Invested by the Rabbis* with the character of a Day of Divine Judgment, it acquired great solemnity. The sounding of the ram's horn (shofar) during the morning service stirs the people to thoughts of repentance. The elaborate liturgy of the day dwells upon God's sovereignty, providence, revelation, and redemption. Orthodox Jews observe two days of Rosh Hashanah. See Jewish religious festivals. S.S.C.

New Year's celebrations: 1) Judaism, in harmony with the Talmud* and probably with much earlier practice (as suggested by Nu. 29 1 & Neh. 8 1-10), observes the 1st of Tishri (falling in Sept. or early Oct) as Rosh Hashana or New Year's. 2) The Christian Church has had no official New Year's Festival. Indeed, in the ancient world it regarded the Roman celebration of New Year's (Jan. 1 under the Julian Calendar) as viciously pagan (see e.g , Tertullian, De Idol., xiv). To offset these festival debaucheries, to which its members were often attracted, the Church began, sometime after the 4th Cent. (when Dec. 25 was fixed as the birthday of Christ), to commemorate the day as that of the Lord's Circumcision* (i.e., 8th day after Christmas, Lk. 2·21). That this practice was well established by the 6th Cent. is clear from Canon 17 of the 2nd Council of Tours (567), which took for granted the designation of the first three days of Jan. as fast days "fixed by the Fathers to combat the heathen customs" and provided for a Missa Circumcisionis. By the Middle Ages, the secular celebrations associated with Jan. 1 continued (although March 25 had come to be regarded in Europe as the beginning of the year), indeed developed into the extravagant Feast of Fools. These excesses were finally suppressed by the Church. With the adoption of the Gregorian Calendar (1582), Jan. 1 again became New Year's Day (not until 1700 in Germany and 1751 in England), although not recognized as such in the ecclesiastical calendar, remaining simply the Day of the Circumcision of Our Lord. Within Protestantism the Reformers were generally hostile toward any revival of New Year's celebrations, an attitude which became particularly strong among the Puritans Gradually, however, popular interest in observing the occasion overcame Protestant scruples and it became widely celebrated, with many churches holding "watch nights" (a Methodist practice, see Wesley's Journ., Dec. 31, 1761), singing the old year out and the new in, preaching New Year's sermons, extending greetings, etc. Cf. festivals and holy days, Christian, Jewish religious festivals.   E.T.R.

Newcomer, Christian: (1749-1830) Leader of the westward expansion of the Church of the United Brethren in Christ*, crossed the Allegheny Mountains on horseback fifty times (1799-1829). Bishop, 1813-1830. His Journal (1795-1830) is an important historical document.   W.E.R.

Newman, John Henry, Cardinal: (1801-1890) English theologian and man of letters. Newman's early career centered at Oxford, where in 1828, after being successively undergraduate, fellow, and tutor, he became vicar of St Mary's, the University church. In 1833 he joined Keble* and others in the Oxford Movement*, advancing the cause both through his sermons and his contributions to Tracts for the Times. Tract XC (1841), on the compatibility of the Thirty-nine Articles with Catholicism, provoked such a violent reaction that he withdrew from the movement, gradually severed his Anglican connections, and four years afterwards entered the Roman Church. His later life was spent mainly at the Oratory of St. Philip Neri which he established near Birmingham. In 1879 he was created Cardinal.

Among Newman's voluminous writings the Apologia pro Vita Sua (1864), undertaken in reply to an accusation by Charles Kingsley, is his literary masterpiece. Other representative works are The Arians of the Fourth Century (1833), Essay on the Development of Christian Doctrine (1845), Discourses on the Scope and Nature of University Education (1852), and A Grammar of Assent (1870). Of his Verses on Various Occasions (1868) best known is the hymn "Lead, Kindly Light," written in 1833. See Anglo-Catholics, Tractarianism.

The standard biography is by Wilfred Ward (2 vols., 1912). Joseph J. Reilly's Newman as a Man of Letters (1927) is a good brief account.   L.W.C.

Newton, Sir Isaac: (1642-1727) A sublime genius of physical science, who, peculiarly English, upheld the alliance between science and religion. He wrote as many theological treatises as scientific classics. A pronounced Arian flavor pervades his theological works. He held that indubitable evidences of intelligent purpose in the cosmic order attest the divine origin of the world. Nature was for Newton not its own self-sufficient end. Instead of making the world of nature independent of God for its continued existence, he assigned to God the duty of actively preventing the fixed stars from collapsing in the middle of space, and of providentially reforming the system of the world whenever its mechanism ran out of gear too far The aesthetic and physical features of the universe are rooted in the continued exertions of the divine will which had chosen them as ends of his creative labor. See Copernican astronomy, Enlightenment, the.

The Mathematical Principles of Natural Philosophy (London, 1803), 3 vols, Opticks (London, 1721), 3rd ed., corrected   H.H.

Nicene creed: See creeds of Christendom; Christology.

Nicene—Constantinopolitan Creed, the: See Constantinopolitan Creed.

Nichiren: See Buddhist Terminology.

Nicholas of Clémanges: (of Clamanges) (1360 (?)-1437) French conciliarist. Clémanges was a Paris scholar, with an interest in the classics. He became secretary to the Avignon pope Benedict XIII, but later supported the Council of Constance* and wrote (ca. 1320) De corrupto ecclesiae statu. See festivals and holy days, Christian.

A. Coville, La traité de la ruine de l'Eglise de Nicolas de Clamanges (1936).   J.T.M.

Nicholas of Cusa: (1400-1464) A German cardinal and philosopher, finally also bishop of Brixen. His writings concern philosophy, theology, law and science. The title of his principal work, De Docta Ignorantia shows his views on the restricted powers of the human mind.   C.R.

Nicholas, Saint, of Myra (or Bari): He was bishop of Myra, in Lycia, where he died in the fourth century as a confessor. His relics were transported in the eleventh century to Bari in southern Italy. His feast is almost universally observed on December 5, when he assumes the role of Santa Claus in some European countries. He is the patron saint of Russia and Greece, and of some localities and cities in Western Europe.   M.S.

Nicholas I, Pope: (858-867) Saint Nicholas I, called "The Great", was a champion of the Holy See*, defended Christian unity in the affair of Photius*, and stood for the integrity of Christian marriage against Lothair, King of Lorraine, and Charles the Bold of Burgundy. Nicholas was a tireless worker, an impartial defender of justice, and a generous friend of the poor.   C.V.

Nicodemus, Gospel of: Or Acts of Pilate* A fourth century work in two parts, 1. An account of the trial, passion and resurrection of Jesus, in which Pilate and Nicodemus are prominent; and 2, an account of the Descent into Hell, which was appended to Part 1 probably some time after 425.   E.J.G.

Nicolaitans: 1) A party in Ephesus (Rev. 2.6), Pergamum (Rev. 2.15), and possibly more widely distributed in Asia Minor, described as hateful to the Holy Spirit but not otherwise specified. It probably had no historical connection with 2) the Gnostic sect of the same name which falsely traced its origin to Nicolaus the Deacon (Acts 6.5). It cultivated immorality as a method of asserting superiority to everything fleshly. For this reason it was regarded by Christians with such horror that, as late as the Middle Ages, the name Nicolaitanism was employed to designate practices among the clergy that were attributed to fleshly lusts.   A.K.R.

Nietzsche, Friedrich Wilhelm: (1844-1900)

"Prophet of a non-religious religion and an un-philosophical philosophy" (Wilamowitz-Moellendorf), sometime professor of classical philology at Basel, later a free-lance essayist whose works were hardly read during his lifetime but have been of great influence and have caused tremendous controversy since his death. Nietzsche rebelled against philosophical pretensions at arriving at "Truth" or knowledge of "Being", and adopted for himself, perhaps under the influence of Pascal, the aphoristic mode of writing, developing not so much a systematic philosophy as a series of brilliant thrusts at the accepted ideas of his time. Claiming that the individual should not passively accept but should impose his will on his environment, and should adopt a personal relation to his problems ("All truths are bloody truths"), he rebelled against Christianity for its stress on the weak virtues of pity and love, against nationalism, commercialism, democracy, the scientific spirit, and nineteenth century ideals in general. Influenced by Schopenhauer, but rebelling against him also, he developed the theory of the will to power as characteristic of all life and as providing for man the only acceptable basis for value. He thus argued for a "transvaluation of all (accepted) values" and for an "immoralism" which should teach men to be hard, live dangerously, adopt a "master-morality" which should justify the rights of the strong, and work to produce the "super-man", since "man is something that is to be surpassed." Making one exception to his rule against metaphysical conceptions he maintained belief in "eternal recurrence", taking his own inconsistency here as evidence of the strife in all things.

Nietzsche maintained that "God is dead", killed by the uncompromising will of man himself to discover the facts. The result is tragedy and a new emphasis on suffering. Nietzsche agrees with Christianity that suffering must be given meaning but disagrees as to what the meaning is. The God on the Cross pronounces a curse on life and attempts to win salvation by appealing to what is higher than life. The god Dionysos cut to pieces is, on the other hand, a promise of life, since he is ever re-born out of his own destruction. Man must learn amor fati, love of the fate which eternally returns.

The eternal recurrence of contradictions in Nietzsche's own thought has led to the most diverse interpretations of his work. Christians have found in him a passionate plea for sincerity and an eloquent defence of the divine discontent. Anti-Christians have emphasized the need of taking literally his fulminations against the Christian virtues. In recent years the Nazis have claimed him because of his protest against pacificism and humanitarianism and his praise of authority and physical strength. They pass over in silence his revolt against nationalism and totalitarianism, his dislike of Germans and anti-Semites, and his plea for "good Europeans".

Works Werke (19 vols 1895-1913), The Complete Works of F. Nietzsche (18 vols tr O. Levy, 1909-13); also The Philosophy of Nietzsche (1937), 1 vol Eng tr of the principal works with introd. by H W Wright Of the scores of commentaries: K Jaspers Nietzsche, Einführung in das Verständnis seines Philosophierens, (1936), W M Salter, Nietzsche the Thinker (1917); C Brinton, Nietzsche (1941); G A. Morgan, Jr. What Nietzsche Means (1941).   J.S.B.

Nihil Obstat: See imprimatur.

nihilianism: (Lat. nihil, nothing) A view holding that the human nature of Christ had "no true subsistence"—that it was nihil. Mistakenly attributed to Peter Lombard*, it was condemned in 1179 by Pope Alexander III*.   R.C.P.

Nihongi: "The Chronicles of Japan." Also known by the longer title of Nihon Shoki. Published in thirty books in 720 A.D. Tells the story of Old Japan from creation down to 697 A.D.   D C.H.

nimbus: In art, the halo of light and glory, usually of gold, surrounding the head of Christ, the Virgin Mary, or the Saints, as opposed to the aureola, which surrounds the whole body. Appeared in Christian art in the 5th century, but was known earlier in India and Egypt, and among the Greeks and Romans. See symbolism.   R B.B.

Ninurta: (Nin-ib) Babylonian-Assyrian god of war and storms, protector of the boundaries of fields, patron of physicians, son of Enlil* the god of Nippur.   R.H.P.

nirvāṇa: See Buddhist Terminology.

Nitzsch, Carl Immanuel: (1787-1868) He was professor in Bonn and Berlin. Brought up in a Kantian purified supernaturalism, he overcame the latter through the influence of German idealism, above all through Schleiermacher*. In systematic theology his great service was mediation. In the development of practical theology he was a pioneer.

System der christlichen Lehre (Bonn, 1829), Praktische Theologie (Bonn, 1859), 2 ed.   H.H.

Nitzsch, Friedrich: (1832-1898) He taught in Giessen and Kiel. He was less meritorious through his systematic theology than through the panorama and faithfulness with which he characterized the hitherto existing discussion of individual problems.

Grundriss der christlichen Dogmengeschichte (Berlin, 1870); Lehrbuch der evangelischen Dogmatik (Freiburg, 1889, 2 ed., Freiburg, 1896, 3 ed., ed by H. Stephan, Leipzig, 1911).   H.H.

Noachic laws: See Israel, religion and theology.

Noble Lectures, The William Belden: These lectures at Harvard University were established in 1898 by Nannie Yulee Noble with a gift of $20,000, the income of which was to be used for a lectureship in memory of her husband, William Belden Noble. The deed of gift provides that there shall be at least six lectures annually and that they shall be published. The lecturers were originally appointed by a board of seven trustees but, in 1906, at the suggestion of the Founder, this function was transferred to the President and Fellows of the University. According to the deed, the purpose of the lectures was "to continue the mission of William Belden Noble, whose supreme desire it was to extend the influence of Jesus as the way, the truth, and the life; to make known the meaning of the words of Jesus, 'I am come that they might have life, and that they might have it more abundantly.' In accordance with the large interpretation of the influence of Jesus by the late Phillips Brooks . . . it is intended that the scope of the lectures shall be as wide as the highest interests of humanity . . . The lectures may include philosophy, literature, art, poetry, the natural sciences, political economy, sociology, ethics, history both civil and ecclesiastical, as well as theology, and the more direct interests of the religious life. Beyond a sympathy with the purpose of the lectures, as thus defined, no restriction is placed on the lecturer."

Among the Lectures published in this series are The Field of Ethics, by George Herbert Palmer; Witnesses of the Light, by Washington Gladden; The Adventure of Life, by Wilfred T Grenfell; The Spiritual Interpretation of History, by Shailer Mathews, Mysticism and Democracy in the English Commonwealth, by Rufus M. Jones, and The Church and its Teaching Today, by William Temple.

J.E.N.

nocturn: Originally a monastic service sung or recited at night. Now one of the divisions (usually three) of the Roman Catholic Breviary* office called "Matins,"* designed so to be recited but almost invariably used the evening or afternoon before.

B.S.E.

nolo episcopari: "I do not wish to be made Bishop", from a possible Latin verb episcopare, reluctance to accept episcopal office—sometimes actual, sometimes merely an ecclesiastical convention.

L.R.H.

nominalism: (L. nomen, name fr. noscere, know; nominalis, titular) In logic and epistemology, the view that universals*, i.e., abstract ideas or concepts, are mere words or empty sounds, having no basis in reality or objective counterpart. It is more extreme in the direction of subjective idealism than conceptualism* and is opposed to and by moderate and extreme realism. It has been attributed to Antisthenes, Roscelin, Aureolus, Durandus, Hobbes, and Locke. The fictionism of Vaihinger is a modern version and the views of Mach likewise resemble nominalism.

Nominalism has much in common with sensism, phenomenism, empiricism, positivism, physicalism, operationalism, etc. However it is more than mere verbalism or psittacism.

See realism; Scholasticism; universals, battle over.

D.C.O'G.

nominatio regia: Signifies royal designation of a person for ecclesiastical office. It is based on the right of patronage*, and generally pertains to the higher ranks (bishops, etc.). Institution must be made by the church. For controversies respecting nominatio regia see Concordat, esp. 1122, 1516, 1801.

Q.B.

nonconformity: An early seventeenth century term descriptive of those Puritans who would neither subscribe nor separate. It included both the Episcopalian and Presbyterian groups of the Puritan party. Some historians have used the term for the Elizabethan Puritans, while others have utilized it as a broad term covering all dissent. After the Restoration, when the Nonconformists were put out of the established church and forced into dissent, the term did take on a broader meaning and was used as a descriptive label for all dissenting Protestant groups. See Dissenter, sect; Separatist.

W.S.H.

non expedit: (Lat., it is not expedient) A decree from Rome in 1868 forbidding Italian Catholics to take part in certain elections.

L.R.W.

non-jurors: Anglican Bishops and other clergy who refused to break former oaths to James II by swearing allegiance to William and Mary in 1689, and their followers—also later adherents of the sect, whose last Bishop died in 1805. Though few in number, the non-jurors carried much learning and piety out of the Church of England*, to its great loss. In theology their early emphasis on divine right was replaced by one on the spiritual freedom of the Church, growing out of their original refusal to recognize political depositions of Bishops*. In the early 18th cent. they did much for liturgical revival, especially in Scotland (where the Episcopalians generally were non-jurors till 1789). William Law*, controversialist and mystic was their greatest figure, though somewhat isolated among them. The memory of the non-jurors continued to be venerated among Anglo-Catholics*.

Thomas Lathbury, A History of the Nonjurors (1845); Henry Broxap, The Later Nonjurors (1924).

E.R.H.

non-liturgical churches: See liturgics.

none: The office of the ninth hour—but in the Middle Ages often said by anticipation about 12 M., therefore called noon in English. See div'ne office.

E.R.H.

norito: (Jap.) Shinto* prayers recited in Shinto ceremonies by Shinto priests and, in state ceremonies, by high government officials. Classical, stately, dignified, and unique in style and standardized in form, these prayers give thanks to Shinto deities and invoke their blessing. The recitation of norito is not only an expression of piety but also a ritual believed to have magical effect. Orthodox prayers are found in the *Engi Shiki and other classics, and official prayers have been issued by the government in recent years.

W.T.C.

Norm day or Norm year: See Westphalian Treaties.

norman: A type of architecture that existed in northern Europe and the British Isles during the latter part of the 11th and through much of the 12th centuries. It is allied closely to the Romanesque*, utilizes the wall-bearing form of construction, its walls are of considerable thickness, its arches usually round and in its later stages its arch rings were richly ornamented.

Many very small churches in the normal style still exist in England, and a number of larger examples as well. Some of the smaller churches seat but 100 or so people. Some have but a simple rectangular nave and a semi-circular apse, as at Nately Scures, 40 miles west of London. Others have a square chancel, separated from the nave by means of a low, massive chancel arch, as at Adel Church, near Leeds. Others have a rectangular chancel, a square central space and a rectangular nave, and with a central tower rising above the roof, as at Iffley, just south of Oxford. In these small churches, the side walls are usually three feet in thickness, and the main entrance is often in the south wall of the nave. The roofs are generally slightly more than 45 degrees in pitch, and supported by simple timber trusses. Windows are very small, and well above the floor level; although in many Norman churches, larger windows were inserted at a later date.

Norman work is often found in the great cathedrals*. At Exeter, the remarkable transeptal towers are Norman. Winchester's transepts are Norman, and much Norman work exists at St. Alban's, Peterboro, Ely and elsewhere. Many cathedrals and parish churches, originally in the Norman style, were enlarged or partially rebuilt in the Gothic style, but still retain portions of Norman work. In the large examples, clerestories are frequently present, supported by massive stone columns. See art, ecclesiastical, Christian; cathedrals; church building.   F.R.W.

norns: The three "fates" of Norse mythology, Urd, Verdandi and Skuld. "Maidens, much knowing . . . laws they established, life allotted to the sons of men; destinies pronounced." B. Thorpe's Vóluspa.   P.G.M.

North African Church: (early centuries) A term usually restricted to Christianity in the Roman Provinces of North Africa stretching from Cyrenaica on the East to the Atlantic on the West. See Carthage, Synods of; Scillitan martyrs.   S.M.G.

North American Phalanx: See communistic settlements, secular.

Norwegian Lutheran Church: See Lutheran Church in America; Sverdrup, G.

Notarikon: See Kabbalah.

Notre Dame (Fr. notre dame, our Lady) Notre Dame or "our Lady" is a title used in many places; e.g., for churches or cathedrals, such as Notre Dame in Paris, in Chartres, and so on, and for shrines such as Notre Dame du Chêne, and pilgrimages; and also in the U. S. for the University of Notre Dame, and the Sisters of Notre Dame, and the Schools Sisters of Notre Dame.   L.R.W.

nous: (Greek) Only a mental attribute of a living person, until after the 6th century B C., when it represents the religious factor in nature, common to all things human and non-human, the unifying factor, having no antithesis in its composition, the destiny-determining link in nature which made 'gods and men' akin. Nous is not the sole, but probably the most representative, word used by Greeks for this universal religious factor. In man it is the determining factor of the psyche, or is completely identified with the psyche. An early tendency to define the nature of the universal nous in antithetical terms led subsequently to a dualism in religious thinking from which historical Christianity, which took it over, never recovered. See Anaxagoras, Neo Platonism; psyche.   F.L.P.

Novatian: A Roman Presbyter whose writings reveal considerable doctrinal and exegetical ability. His defence of the Trinity* against the Monarchians* is especially able, though it reveals subordinationist* tendencies. In opposition to the milder policies of Cornelius, bishop of Rome (A D. 251-253), Novatian denied the right of the Church to restore the lapsi and advocated an extremely "purist" conception of church membership. He was chosen bishop by the dissenting party. The result was a schism which spread over most of the Roman empire and which continued to exist until the sixth century. Their strong support of the Nicene orthodoxy won for them friendly treatment from the Catholic Church, though towards the end of the 4th century they began to be treated as heretics. See lapsed.   A.K.R.

novena: (Lat., ninth) A nine-days' devotion for some specific purpose or in honor of some saint. While such devotions are not part of the public cultus of the Roman Catholic Church, a number of novenas are authorized. Certain evangelical groups have (unofficially) made use of the term to some extent.   P.V.N.

novice: (Lat. novicius, new) A person of either sex regularly admitted to a religious order*, usually after a period of preliminary testing, for a more extended probation of at least a year. Having been found free of legal impediments, the novice accepts a habit and gives himself to a formative religious discipline. Subject to arbitrary dismissal, and at the same time free to leave, during this period, he must, upon its completion, be professed, dismissed, or granted further trial. See monasticism.   R.C.P.

Noyes, John Humphrey: See Oneida community, the.

number symbolism: See symbolism, Medieval number, neo-Pythagoreanism; Pythagoreanism. Cf. Kabbalah.

numbers, 666, 888: See s.v. beast.

Numbers: The fourth book of the Pentateuch*, which narrates the closing events in the sojourn of the Israelites at Sinai, including the taking of the census from which the book derives its name (1 1-10 10), their wandering for thirty-eight years and journey to the plains of Moab (10.11-22:1), and the events during their stay on the plains of Moab (22 2-36 13). The book is traditionally ascribed to Moses*, but is actually the work of J. E. and P. The first section was written by P, and the remainder is a combination of the three sources. It is often difficult to disentangle J and E, but the JE material is not closely interwoven with P. P is concerned chiefly with the twofold census, the arrangement of the camp, and ritual laws, while JE consists largely of historical narrative and a few ancient poems. One of the original sources of the book is named in 21·14 as "The Book of the Wars of Yahweh." The authenticity of the basic narrative of JE is hardly to be doubted, but there are few extra-Biblical materials for verifying its details. Some of these details, however, are inherently improbable, for example, the figures given in the census imply a total population during the wilderness sojourn of two million persons or more, far more than the desert could have supported and inconsistent with other Biblical passages (e.g., Judges 5:8). See G. B. Gray, Numbers (International Critical Comm. 1912, 2nd ed, J. H. Greenstone, Numbers (The Holy Scriptures with Commentary, 1939).

J.P.H.

numen: In Roman religion* a divine power or spirit, anonymous as were most of the indigenous Roman deities, whose presence was felt, but of whose nature and personality they had but the vaguest conception. Cf. kami, mana, wakan.

P.G.M.

numinous: A word coined from the Latin "numen" by Rudolph Otto* to signify the mysterium tremendum et fascinans which is the unique object of religious apprehension, beyond reason, the good or the beautiful. The mysterious, awe-inspiring, terrible, holy, sacred quality that is of Deity. See his Idea of the Holy (rev. ed., 1925).

V.F.

nun: (Late Lat. nonna, an old woman) General designation for a member of a religious order of Catholic women. Canon Law* distinguishes between nuns properly so called, who belong to orders pronouncing solemn vows, and sisters*, who belong to congregations with simple vows. The various orders and congregations engage either in the active or the contemplative life, or in a combination of both. See under abbey.

C.V.

nunc dimittis: The Song of Simeon, Lk. 2, 29-32. The evangelical canticle assigned to Compline* in the Latin Church and used at Vespers among the Eastern Orthodox.

P.V.N.

nuncios: See legates and nuncios, papal.

Nuremberg, Religious Peace of: Made July, 1532, between the Emperor and the Protestants. In return for support in the war against the Turks, the estates were granted peace until the calling of a council or until the next diet.

E.C.X.

Nusku: The Assyrian parallel of the Babylonian god, Girru. A god of fire.

P.G.M.

Nut: Wife of Seb and mother of Isis, Osiris* and other Egyptian gods and goddesses. Usually represented on all fours as the sky, her arms and legs being the horizons, and the stars decorations on her body. Sometimes spelled Nout.

P.G.M.

Nygren, Anders Theodore Samuel: (1890-) Since 1924 Nygren has been professor of theology at the University of Lund. His and colleagues' works have been given name, Lundensian theology*. Nygren has sought to describe essential nature of Christian love, agape, as over against love in a human sense, and re-interpreted history of Christian doctrine to show adulteration of genuine Christian revelation.

C.J.B.

nymphs: (Gr. Nymphai) Lithe, graceful female sprites, sportive and gay, usually friendly, but occasionally destructive. They reside in various natural objects: the naiads* in springs, rivers, and lakes, the nereids* in the sea, the oceanids* in ocean, the oreads in the mountains, the dryads* and hamadryads in trees. Possessing certain divine gifts such as prophecy, they are long-lived, though not immortal. Only the dryads and hamadryads are distinctly short-lived, since they die with their trees.

E.M.N.

O

oath more judaico: Special oaths, accompanied by a variety of weird ceremonies, which were imposed on Jews by the courts in the Middle Ages, on the assumption that those outside the dominant faith required special intimidation to tell the truth. B.Z.B.

oaths: The scruple against oaths has been a characteristic of various mystical and perfectionist* groups, including the Anabaptists, Mennonites and Quakers. Originally based on the Scriptural prohibitions of Matthew 5 34 and James 5:12, it is also prompted by the ideal of a single standard of honesty, which needs no outward sanction for truth-telling. See blessing and cursing; Roman religions. H.G.R.

Obadiah: Similar to Nahum and Habakkuk, hardly worthy of the name "prophetic." Obadiah was primarily a poet, writing (in contrast with earlier opinion which placed him in the sixth century) shortly after 485 B.C. (Morgenstern) when Edom joined with other nations in unseating Menahem from his assumed throne and in despoiling Judah. Written on the eve of the Arab-Nabatean advance, which was to vanquish Edom, Obadiah cried for revenge on her for what she had done to Judah. See The Prophets and their Times by J. M. P. Smith and W. A. Irwin (1941), pp. 265-66. R.E.W.

obedience: The practical submission of one's will and the ordering of one's conduct with reference to what is held to be rightful authority. In ethics it is compliance with the moral law conceived as universally valid. In religion moral obedience to the will of deity may be regarded as the way of salvation or as evidence of piety. The will of God is held to be the absolute good to which one owes submission. In the Roman Catholic Church obedience is one of three monastic vows and requires conformity to the rule of the order and the will of its superior. R.W.F.

Oberammergau, The Passion Play of: See religious drama.

Oberlin, John Frederick (1740-1826) Alsatian pastor, educator, philanthropist, noted for his wise and effective system of Christian work in the Steinthal, an impoverished district in the Vosges Mountains. Here he lived most of his long life, building roads, improving agriculture, founding infant schools, and transforming the whole life of the region, materially and spiritually. Oberlin College in Ohio bears his name. He has influenced rural reconstruction movements in many distant lands, including Brazil and China. W.M.H.

Oberlin theology: A term applied to the theology that prevailed at Oberlin under the administrations of Charles G. Finney* and James H. Fairfield. Most characteristic teachings duty of Christian perfection and "the simplicity of moral action", i.e., a Christian's will was either utterly surrendered to God at a given moment, and hence perfectly holy, or else not so surrendered and hence perfectly unholy. The Oberlin theology may be regarded as a further development of Taylorism*.

F. H. Foster, A Genetic History of the New England Theology (1907). W.M.H.

oblate: (Lat. oblatus, offered) A lay person who, though not monk or nun, joins in some rules and works of a religious order and shares in its benefits. See Catholic Societies. L.R.W.

obligation: A bond or necessity laid upon one to act in a certain way or to do a certain thing. The binding power may arise from the external compulsion of law and custom or it may come from internal moral constraint. In the latter case religion interprets the obligation as having its ultimate ground ~~in the moral goodness~~ and sovereignty of God as man's creator while acknowledging its immediate source in the moral nature of man. See natural rights. R W.F.

Observants: Members of a reform movement within the R. C. Order of Friars Minor* (Franciscans). They advocated and practised a return to the original strictness of the rule of St. Francis. St. Bernardine of Siena (1380-1444 A.D.) was the most famous early member. The movement existed from the 13th to the end of the 19th century and during part of that time constituted a separate branch of the Franciscan* Order. In 1897 the Friars Minor were unified by order of the Pope into a single Order. V.J.B.

obsession: An idea or notion that persistently invades and engrosses the mind, is usually inaccessible to critical appraisal and tends to control thought, feeling and action. Formerly attributed to demonic possession or spiritualistic control, latterly traced to suggestion and subconscious drives. The group consciousness is regarded by some as liable to obsessional ideas.   R.W.F.

occasionalism: A theory of causality to explain the interaction of mind and body, inexplicable (even by pineal gland) on dualistic Cartesian principles, by assuming that man's willing a certain act is the "occasional cause" for God to make a corresponding change in the physical world, and vice versa. The theory was developed by Arnold Geulincx*, who held that God is the sole cause both of perceptions in the mind and of bodily movements.   Nicholas Malebranche taught that God produces in man a world of ideas which correspond to the corporeal world he has created and therefore we "behold all things in God." The view led to pantheism and determinism, although it was later adapted to theism by a personalist like Bowne*. See Cartesianism.
                                                              J.E.N.

occultism: (Derived from "occulo" I conceal) A name given to a loosely organized group of rejected sciences—Astrology, Alchemy, Palmistry, and so on. Sundry writers have attempted to gather the disjecta membra of these human wanderings in blind alleys, to salvage what each considered worth saving, to build therefrom his own system. The word was favorably regarded by early Theosophists*. Cf. parapsychology.
   A. W. Lair, The Great Mystery (1938).
                                                              P.G.M.

Oceanids: (Gr . Okeanides, from Okeanós, Ocean, id-, patronymic) The 4000 daughters of Ocean and Tethys. In Homer, Ocean is the Great River which encircles the flat disc of earth, returning to itself; in Hesiod, he is personified as one of the Titans, father of the Oceanids. See nymphs.   E.M.N.

Ockham, William of: (1280-1349) A fourteenth century Scholastic philosopher and polemical writer. Desiring to reform the method and content of Scholasticism*, he aimed at simplification and tended toward skepticism. He denied the existence of intentional species, the distinction between essence* and existence, and the Thomistic doctrine of active and passive intellect. In ethics he maintained that the distinction between right and wrong depends on God's free will. His theory on universals is a modified Nominalism*. Although rejecting the rational proofs for several truths which are basic to Catholic theology, he nevertheless adhered firmly to these truths from reasons of faith.   See foreknowledge, Divine; law of parsimony; twofold-truth theory.
   E. A. Moody, The Logic of William of Ockham (1936).
                                                              C.V.

octave: The prolongation of a festival for eight days, brought into the Western church year* by analogy from Jewish festivals.   E.R H.

Odin or Odhin: (Teut) One of the chief gods of early Sweden, middle member of the Norse triad with Thor and Freyr, an aristocratic court-god, wandering war-god to whom warriors appeal for help, as war-god he receives human sacrifices. Due to outside influences Odhin is represented as lord of the Hall of the Dead (Valhalla), the wise god of the court poets. Due to Christian influence he is also represented as the creator and director of the world, a sky-god, an all-father god. His omens are carried by wolves and ravens. He is pictured riding a gray horse, wearing a cloak, and carrying a spear. See Woden.   F.L.P.

Oecolampadius, Johannes: (1482-1531) (Oecolampadius, Greek for candlestick, his name having been Heussgen—pronounced Hausschein) Born in Wurtemberg, he assisted Erasmus* in publishing his Greek N.T., was influenced first by Luther, then by Zwingli. He became the reformer of Basel.   E.C.K.

Oesterreich, Traugott Konstantin: (1880-) He is professor of philosophy in Tubingen, Germany; and is the author of the fourth volume of the 12th ed. of Uberweg's Geschichte der Philosophie (Berlin, 1923). He upholds the indestructibility and identity of the ego. The essence of religion consists for him in specific states of exaltation in which man experiences values of a particular scale of quality. Expressing themselves in affective and conative relations, these experiences are a complete justification of religion, even if intellectual faith is in error. Oesterreich made penetrative analyses of obsession, vision, glossolalia and inspiration and their significance in the history of religion. He is the leading student of the religious significance of the parapsychological* data.
   Die Phänomenologie des Ich in ihren Grundlagen (Leipzig, 1910) ; Einführung in die Religionspsychologie als Grundlage f. Religionsgeschichte und Religionsphilosophie (Berlin, 1917) ; Grundbegriffe der Parapsychologie (Pfullingen, 1921) , Occultism and modern science (1927) ; Possession, demoniacal and other. (1930).
                                                              H.H.

Oetinger, Friedrich Christoph: (1702-1782) A Swabian theologian whose biblical realism was an interweaving of spirit and nature, of consciousness and unconsciousness. As a pupil of J. A. Bengel* he burst the limits of the orthodox-pietistic attitude. Faithful to the biblical Lutheran belief, he strove towards a philosophia sacra in which Christ receives a cosmic-metaphysical significance.
   Theologia ex idea vitae deducta (Frankfurt u. Leipzig, 1765) ; Werke. 11 vols. ed. by K. C. E. Ehmann (Stuttgart, 1858-63) ; K. A. Auberlen, Über die Theosophie Oetingers (Tübingen, 1847) .
                                                              H.H.

Oettingen, Alexander v.: (1827-1906) He was professor at the University of Dorpat (now Tartu, Estonia). He gave ethics a new turn by combining Schleiermacher's conception, the romantic conception of organism, the modern realism, the awakening of the social question and the experience of the rise of modern nationalism with the Christian conception. He gave his ethics empirical and statistical bases. His social ethics was an opposition against every spiritualistic personal ethic and against every materialistic social physics. It was Emil Brunner* who in our day revived Oettingen's importance.

Die christliche Sittenlehre (Erlangen, 1873), 2 vols ; Die Moralstatistik in ihrer Bedeutung für eine Socialethik. 3 ed. vol II of his Die christliche Sittenlehre. (Erlangen, 1882).　　　　　H.H.

offertory: Traditionally employed to describe the presentation of the bread and wine before their consecration, in the Eucharistic rite. In ancient days (cf. Hippolytus' Apostolic Tradition, c. 215), other articles were also presented at this time, and offered to God for blessing. Later, the term was restricted to the eucharistic elements. An appropriate selection from the Psalms is said or sung here (also called the Offertory). In Protestant denominations, the term has been taken to mean the presenting of alms, or the taking of a collection during a church service, and the choir anthem sung at this time. See plainsong; psalmody.　　　　　W.N.P.

Office, Sacred Congregation of the Holy: An administrative branch of the Roman Catholic Church, erected in 1542 as a continuation and supersession of the Universal Roman Inquisition*. Its purpose is the protection of faith and morals, and to that end it passes judgment on heresies, dogmatic teachings on the sacraments and indulgences, impediments to marriage with non-Catholics, books considered pernicious or contrary to faith (Index*), etc. The pope is the prefect of this congregation, and its decisions are not considered infallible.　　　　　J.F.T.

office of the dead: Service of psalms and lessons modelled on Vespers, Matins, and Lauds of the Divine Office*, used in commemoration of the dead or as part of funeral service; used in Roman rite since c. 800, and basis of Anglican Burial Office. See prayers for the dead.　　E.R.H.

oharai or ohoharahi: (Lit. "Great Expulsion") The Japanese purification ritual.　　　　D.C.H.

oils: The Bishop consecrates three holy oils on Holy Thursday. 1) Oil of Catechumens (O.C.), named derived from the use of oil in the baptism of Catechumens*. It is also used in the consecration of churches, blessing of altars, ordination of priests, and in the coronation of Catholic monarchs. 2) Chrism (S.C.), mixture of olive oil and balsam used at Baptism, Confirmation, Holy Orders; in the consecration of churches, altars, chalices, patens; in the blessing of bells and baptismal water. 3) Oil of the Sick (O.C.), olive oil used in Extreme Unction*. See anointing; chrism.　　　　　B.R.

Olavus Petri: See Petri, Olavus.

old Calvinists: See Calvinists, old.

Old Catholics: A group of Churches professing loyalty to ancient Catholic principles, but repudiating such Tridentine* and later Roman decisions as do not conform thereto. Owing to difficulties caused by disputes between Jesuits and secular clergy (accused of Jansenism*), the Chapter of Utrecht has elected Archbishops independent of Rome since 1723. After 1870 German and Swiss Catholics who rejected the Vatican Council* formed Old Catholic Churches, obtaining episcopal succession from Holland. The Declaration of Utrecht, 1889, is the common doctrinal basis. There are probably about 20,000 Old Catholics in Holland, 50,000 in Switzerland, rather more in Germany (including German Austria and Czechoslovakia); some in Jugoslavia, and the Polish National Catholic Church in U. S. and Poland is affiliated—first Bishop consecrated at Utrecht, 1907. Certain unhappy consecrations have produced other self-styled Old Catholic Churches, repudiated by Utrecht. Within Old Catholic principles the Dutch tend to be conservative, Germans nationalist, Swiss liberal, Utrecht has followed the others in allowing marriage of clergy and adopting a vernacular liturgy (1909). There is a Seminary at Amersfoort, Netherlands, and a theological faculty at Bern. Interest in reunion on constitutional Catholic lines led to Bonn Conferences of 1874-5, the Old Catholics share in ecumenical movements, and intercommunion with Anglicans has been established on basis of mutual recognition (Bonn Agreement, 1931, since generally ratified). Cf. Dollinger; Liberal Catholic Church.

J. M. Neale, History of the so-called Jansenist Church of Holland (1858); B. A. VanKleef, "An Outline of the History of the Old Catholic Church," in Williams and Harris, Northern Catholicism (1933); Internationale Kirchliche Zeitschrift, (theological periodical), Bern.　　　　E.R.H.

Old Latin version: See versions of the Bible, ancient.

Old Lights: A nick-name applied to those who opposed revivalism among New England Congregationalists in the Colonial Awakening.　　w.w.s. old Lutherans: See s.v. American Lutheranism.

old Mennonites: See Mennonites.

Old Order or Yorker Brethren: See River Brethren.

Old Roman Symbol: Early in the twentieth century, Professor A. C. McGiffert* of the Union Theological Seminary ably contended that the entire Apostles' Creed was pointed against the heretic Marcion*; identification of Creator-God with Father of Jesus; Jesus with son of Creator-God; genuine sonship not adopted at baptism; judge; resurrection of the flesh. In 1919 Karl Holl proposed a new interpretation of origin of Apostles' Creed which is now rather generally supported. See Apostles' Creed; creeds of Christendom.　　　　　C.H.M.

Old School Presbyterian Church: See for origin: New School Presbyterian Church. The Old

School party, controlling the General Assembly at the division of the Presbyterian Church* in 1837, carried on the organization of the church, while the New School also continued the church from 1838. The Old School, comprising about five-ninths of the church, was located chiefly from Pennsylvania south and west. The Old School party, which had been in controversy with the New School before 1837, was conservative and the Old School Church was of this character. It maintained a strict interpretation of the standards of the church in doctrine and polity, against liberalizing tendencies of the New School, it favored church boards for missions and education. Because of its large southern element the Old School Church took no stand against slavery During the separation it grew more than the New School, but in 1861 it lost its southern presbyteries, which withdrew to form the Presbyterian Church in the Confederate States of America. This in 1865 became the Presbyterian Church in the United States, still existing. The Old School and New School reunited in 1869, "each recognizing the other as a sound and orthodox body". See American theology, early.   R.H.N.

Old Side Presbyterians: American Presbyterians who doubted the value of the Great Awakening* and disapproved of the methods of its supporters, the New Side* men, particularly the practice of itinerating in other ministers' parishes, what they considered censorious and denunciatory preaching, and emotional outbreaks. They insisted on full academic education for the ministry, were conservative theologically and stood for strict ecclesiastical discipline. They were almost all Scotch-Irish. When the Synod was divided in 1741 the Old Side maintained its organization in the Synod of Philadelphia. The two Sides reunited in 1758 as the Synod of New York and Philadelphia.   R.H.N.

Old Syriac version: See versions of the Bible, ancient.

Old Testament, early Christian use of: In the time of Christ it was taken for granted by all pious Jews that the books of the O.T. contained the express revelation of God's will. All the N T. writings are based on this assumption, and the O.T. is constantly quoted, and its word on every question is accepted as final. Paul is never satisfied unless he can adduce a text of scripture in support of any statement he makes. He believes that he himself possesses the Spirit; he is anxious, too, as a Hellenistic thinker, to find rational proof for what he believes. Yet he regards all other evidence as valid only when it is confirmed by the word of God himself as given in scripture. This is the attitude of all the N.T. writers, and finds expression in the formulae by which scriptural quotations are introduced: "It is written", "The Holy Spirit says"; "The scripture says"; "God said through the prophet". Particular O.T. writers are rarely mentioned, and when they are named it is always understood that they were only the mouthpieces of the divine voice. This reliance on scripture might seem difficult to reconcile with the Christian belief that a new revelation, superseding all others, had been given through Christ. It was apparent, too, that the Christian position was often widely at variance with that of the O.T. There was the further objection that the O T. books, written by different men over a long period of time, often contradicted each other, so that support for almost any view could be found somewhere in scripture. These difficulties, however, were overcome in various ways. 1) By subtle exegesis a new meaning was assigned to the biblical text. 2) The text was expounded allegorically, and so brought into harmony with Christian truth. 3) Scripture was answered by scripture. Among conflicting texts there was always one which came nearer than the others to the Christian position, and this one was chosen as revealing the true mind of God. Jesus himself adopted this method. He never challenged the authority of scripture, and his enemies pointed out, ever and again, that it was opposed to his teaching. On each of these occasions he quoted some verse which was in agreement with his own thought, and which cancelled the others. The later writers follow this method of Jesus, and are never hampered by scripture. They can invariably find some text which answers their purpose, and on the strength of this they can claim that scripture is on their side. Thus it is only in appearance that the N.T. teaching is based on the O.T. The real authority is the gospel as proclaimed by Jesus, and by this standard the word of scripture is itself tested. Most of the quotations are from the Psalms and the Prophets. All the O.T. books are formally acknowledged to be on the same level, and there are stray references to almost all of them, but the Christian mind fastened on those writings which are nearest in spirit to the gospel. It has been observed that the same texts appear repeatedly, sometimes in a cluster, and from this it has been inferred that the church used an abbreviated Bible, made up of O.T. passages which appeared to foreshadow the work of Christ. Quotations are made for the most part from the LXX version (see Septuagint), but sometimes the Hebrew Bible is used directly, particularly in the Synoptic Gospels and the book of Revelation. The O.T., in its Greek form, continued for more than a century to be the Bible of the church, and is quoted as freely by Gentile as by Jewish writers. It was only in the middle of the 2nd century that the need for a distinctively Christian scripture began to make itself felt. The movement in this direction came first from heretical teachers like Marcion*, who were shocked by the discrepancy between Christian beliefs and many statements in the O.T. When the N.T. came into being there was a danger for some time that the O.T. might be discarded. Its preservation was due, partly to the sound judgment of the church at large, and partly to the growing aversion to Gnosticism* and all the ideas connected with it.

R. Harris: Testimonies (1920); C. H. Toy, Quotations in the N.T. (1884).   E.F.S.

Old Testament Books, the, in chronological order: See Books of the Old Testament, the, in chronological order.

Old Testament, literature: The Christian name for the Jewish Scriptures, which constitute the first of the two parts of the Christian Bible. In its principal English versions it comprises the thirty-nine books of the Jewish Canon, which is written in Hebrew, with brief sections in Aramaic. The word "testament" (Lat. vetus testamentum) came into use through the ambiguous meaning of Gr. diathēkē (agreement, testament) by which Heb. berith (covenant) was translated in the Septuagint (LXX)* version. The Jewish Scriptures are first in 2 Cor. 3 14 called "the old covenant (or, testament)", i.e., through Moses* (cf. Exod. 34 27,28) in contrast to the new covenant through Christ (2 Cor. 3 6, cf. Mark 14: 24, following Jer. 31 31). By the end of the 2nd century this had become the established Christian designation for the Jewish Scriptures (cf. Origen. De Princip. iv:i).

The O.T. comprises a variety of literature composed during the first millennium B.C., as preserved and edited in Judaism for religious purposes, and increasingly regarded (especially the Law, Prophets and Psalms) as authoritative for religion. The beginning of a canon or authoritative collection of sacred writings is seen in the reverential treatment accorded a book found in the temple in 621 B.C., apparently an earlier edition of Deuteronomy (2 Kings 22-23). This book was accepted as the written form of a' prophetic utterance (in this case of Moses), and on the same principle the canon was expanded in subsequent centuries, all books included were ascribed to authors of a prophetic succession ending with the 5th century, though in fact many of them were composed or expanded later than this. The five books of Moses (Pentateuch, Torah), as successively enlarged from the book found in 621, were canonical scripture by the 4th century B.C., as such they were translated into Gr. at Alexandria in the 3rd century (the LXX). The Torah has remained Jewish scripture par excellence. A second group of books, the Prophets*, attained final form and (in Palestine) canonicity of a second rank c. 200 B.C. In the LXX, however, these were not distinguished from a third group of more miscellaneous books, the Writings, which was gradually formed with the Psalms as a nucleus (cf. Luke 24:44), and the limits of which in the Heb. canon were determined by rabbinic decision c. 100 A.D. The Gr. version included other books (the Apocrypha), not found in the Heb. Bible, and since this was the first Christian Bible these are held as canonical by the R. C. Church (Council of Trent, 1546-), whereas Protestantism (following Jerome) has adhered to the Heb. canon.

The standard text of the O.T. is that edited by ben Asher in Palestine in the 10th century A.D., concluding the labours of Rabbinic scholars through 800 years to establish and safeguard a uniform text. The autographs had already long since disappeared, and Heb MSS. now extant (except for a few fragments) are not older than the 10th century. Witnesses to earlier variations in the O.T. text are the ancient Versions, of which the LXX is the chief. This is the Greek O.T. derived by Christians from the Bible of the Alexandrian Jews which has not otherwise survived, it was translated from Heb. in the 3rd to 1st centuries B.C., and is found in MSS. of the 4th century A.D. and later. In the 3rd century Origen* collated the LXX with other Gr. versions, and brought the LXX into line with the existing Heb. text. Derived from the LXX are the Syriac translation of the Hexaplaric text, the Old Lat., Coptic, Ethiopic and other Versions. The Syriac Peshitta (2nd-3rd centuries) and the Lat. Vulgate of Jerome (390-405) were translated from Heb., (except for the Vulg. Psalter which is Jerome's revision of the Old Lat. from the Hexapla). The classical English version is the King James version of 1611, which climaxed the succession of translations by Tyndale (1530-31, partial), Coverdale (1535, from Vulg. and German), the "Matthew Bible" (1537), the "Great Bible" (1539), the Genevan Bible (1560) and the "Bishops' Bible" (1568). A Revised Version was published in England 1881-85 and in the U. S. A. in 1901, a further revision is now in progress.

Critical examination of the contents of the O.T. has demonstrated that the (late) Jewish traditions as to authorship are mistaken, that most of its books are composite and all bear the marks of editing in various periods. The order of the books is chronological neither in the Heb. canon nor in the LXX (followed by Eng. O.T., omitting Apocrypha), but is to some extent topical.

The Pentateuch is a corpus of religious and civil law ascribed to Moses in a narrative setting (Exodus from Egypt, Covenant at Sinai-Horeb, 40 years' wanderings), together with an introduction (Genesis) relating the origins of the earth, of mankind and of Israel. It has been edited from various materials, including continuous documents (J, E, D, P), mainly of the 9th-4th centuries, but incorporating more ancient fragments of folk song, legends, and possibly reminiscences of Moses' teachings. The "Former Prophets", (Joshua-2 Kings), are a sequel to the Pentateuch narrating the history of Israel and Judah from the conquest of Canaan (13th century) to the fall of Jerusalem (586); they were edited chiefly in the 6th century, and (apart from Joshua) incorporate much authentic historical matter.

The "Latter Prophets" comprise a) the literary remains of the oracular prophets of the 8th-5th centuries (oracles, i.e., rhythmic utterances of the Word of Yahweh, together with memoirs and narratives), and b) derivative literary prophecy of the 6th-3rd centuries, partly in the form of supplements to a). The books of Isaiah 1-39, Amos, Hosea and Micah contain substantial remains from these prophets of the 8th century, as do Jeremiah, Zephaniah, Nahum and Habakkuk (?) from the 7th century (Jer. continues into the 6th century), Obadiah, Haggai and Zechariah 1-8 from the 6th century, and Malachi from the 5th century. Jonah is a 5th century prophetic parable. Isaiah 40-66 (with 35) includes the greatest of the written prophecies (6th or 5th centuries); Ezekiel includes remains of 6th century oral prophecy but in its present form is a 4th century literary work, Joel dates from the 4th century, Zechariah 9-14 from the 3rd or 2nd centuries.

The remaining books of the O.T. '(the Writings) are the Psalms, a much edited collection of liturgical and devotional poems ranging in origin from the 10th-2nd century, Proverbs, a collection of religio-ethical teachings in gnomic couplets and in longer poems, 6th-3rd centuries, Job, dramatic poem with prose prologue, 6th-3rd centuries (?); Song of Songs, love lyrics related to fertility cult, 4th-3rd centuries, Ruth, parabolic romance, based on fact, 4th century; Lamentations, small Psalter of dirges over Jerusalem, 6th-4th centuries, Ecclesiastes, the philosophy of a Jewish agnostic, 3rd-2nd centuries; Esther, a secular, nationalist romance, 2nd century; Daniel, cc. 1-6, edifying tales of faithful Jews, 3rd century, cc. 7-12, apocalyptic visions, 2nd century; Ezra-Nehemiah, a history of the post-exilic reconstitution of Judaism, by the author(s) of Chronicles, 4th-3rd centuries. Chronicles, an ecclesiastical, apologetic re-writing of pre-Exilic history, 4th-3rd centuries. See under specific books of O.T.; apocrypha, Old Testament; canon, Old and New Testament, manuscripts of the Bible; versions of the Bible, ancient. See also Books of the O.T., the, in chronological order.

O. Eissfeldt, Einleitung in das Alte Testament (1934); R. H. Pfeiffer, Introduction to the Old Testament (1941); Abingdon Bible Commentary (1929), edited by F. C. Eiselen, E. Lewis and D. G. Downey.   R.B.Y.S.

Olevianus: See Heidelberg Catechism; Ursinus.

Olivetans: An offshoot of the white monks of the Order of Saint Benedict, founded by Saint Bernard Ptolemei on his mountain-top estate, Mount Olivet, near Siena, and approved by John XXII in 1319. Though more rigorous at first than the Benedictines*, whose rule it copied, the order was graced with a flexible constitution which kept it in close harmony with the age, and accounted in part for its comparatively quick growth and widespread influence. The famous Benedictine reform, from which the present Cassinese Congregation resulted, is considered by many authorities to be attributable to the Olivetans. At present the monasteries and members of the order are small in number.   J.F.T.

Ollé-Laprune, Leon: (1830-1899) One of the greatest precursors of French modernism. Preoccupied with the problem of moral certainty, he combatted fideism* and intellectualism. His conception of original sin was opposed to that of Luther, Calvin and Jansenism. To him human reason and will were insufficient but not impotent. Catholicism was for him the only form of religion which corresponds with human life.

La philosophie et le temps présent (Paris, 1890), Le prix de la vie (Paris, 1893); De la certitude morale (Paris, 1898), 2 ed., M. Blondel, Ollé-Laprune (Paris, 1932).   H.H.

Olney hymns: See hymns:

Olshausen, Justus: (1800-1882) Christian German orientalist. Professor of oriental languages at Kiel and Königsberg. His scientific activity was only partly devoted to O.T. criticism and theology. His commentary on the Psalms* (Leipzig, 1853) was epoch-making in its textual and historical criticism. His first work on the O.T. was a series of emendations, published in 1826. He was also a pioneer in the modern study of Hebrew grammar, forming a system opposed to that of Ewald*.   H.K.—L.F.

Olsson, Olof: (1841-1900) Born in Sweden, and ordained, 1863, after studies at Upsala, Olsson emigrated in 1869 and became the spiritual leader of the Swedish settlement at Lindsborg, Kansas. In 1876 he became professor at Augustana College and Theological Seminary at Rock Island, Illinois, and was president of this institution 1891-1900. He opposed the Socinian doctrine of the atonement as preached by Waldenstrom* in Sweden, and combined in his character a warm pietism with broad humanistic interests. At Lindsborg and Rock Island he was ahead of his time in the place he gave art and music in the liberal arts. His charitable nature found expression in movements leading to the Deaconess Institute at Omaha and the Augustana Hospital at Chicago.   C.J.B.

Oltramare, Paul: (1854-1930) A Swiss indologue and historian of religions. He assigned to the origin and value of religion an essentially positivist interpretation. Ignorance and impotence are the basis of all religions. With the progress of civilization, notably of science, industry and poetry, the raison d'être of religion diminishes increasingly. Spiritually man gains nothing by religion as he can achieve all that religion is able to give by other means. Revelations disclose nothing transcendental, only the desires, sentiments and illusions of their all too human intermediaries. The human soul does not yearn by nature for eternity, infinity, transcendence or the absolute. The immense services religion rendered to mankind do not necessarily prove its truths nor that it always is indispensable. As the spirit goes from conquest to conquest in the other domains, the church with its superannuated dogmas, its incomprehensible cult, and its absurd formulas, impoverishes the spirit. Oltramare proposes to substitute for religion biosophy, human wisdom, the science that shows men the way to the spiritualization of their existence.

La théosophie brahmanique (Paris, 1906); Vivre. Essai de biosophie théorique et pratique (Genève, 1919); La théosophie bouddhique (Paris 1923); La religion et la vie de l'ésprit (Paris, 1925).   H.H.

Olympus: (Gr. Olympos) 1) A mountain in southern Thessaly, overlooking the Vale of Tempe.

The loftiest peak in Greece (9794 ft.), always cloud-capped, it was reputed to be the home of the gods. Whence the epithet of the Olympian Zeus. 2) Mysian Olympus, a peak in northwestern Asia Minor.   E.M.N.

om: A mystical Indian symbol upon which devout Hindus of all schools meditate. Spelled also "aum" it serves to express the nature of Brahman or the world soul, represented in the three manifestations, Brahma, creator, Vishnu, preserver, and Shiva, destroyer. Properly used it is a powerful spell. It is usually pronounced at the beginning of the recitation of the *mantras.
                                                                    C.S.B.

Oman, John Wood: (1860-1939) Professor of theology at Westminster College, Cambridge, 1907-1935. A leader in British liberal theological thought, he wrote several books urging that the conception of infallible revelation and the older ideas of faith, salvation, and grace are less consistent with the spirit of Christianity as a whole, and less compatible with morality than the thesis that religion is personal insight into sacred values, obligation, and the personal relation of the individual to God. In his most important work, The Natural and the Supernatural, he defends this personal insight as a veridical but specially religious form of knowing, contrasted with the abstract thought of science, closer to the experience of the poet or the child. He criticizes psychological theories of religion which "explain away", he asserts rather that religious experience can be reasonably supposed to be a response or adjustment to the (in this case, supernatural) environment like any others of man's higher capacities. This insight, he holds, introduces man to absolute values, and to a fuller comprehension of the world as akin, and responsive, to human ideals and purposes. See religious datum.

The Natural and the Supernatural (1931); Grace and Personality (1917); The Problem of Faith and Freedom (1906); Vision and Authority (1929), and others.   R.E.B.

omen: (Lat., osmen, possibly from audire, hear and-men) Occurrence or object supposed to portend or show the character of a future event. A wider usage among two-factor religions*, related to the subject of divination* the endeavor to obtain information about things future or otherwise removed from ordinary perception, by consulting sources other than human. Omens are used a) in relation to a system built up, as is divination, from vaguely interpreted recurrences in nature; and b) apart from such systems.

What constitutes an omen, either good or bad, varies widely with peoples of the world. They derive from dreams, ghosts, man's bodily acts, ordeals, from behavior of animals, plants and other objects in the natural world. The use of omens survives to a considerable degree among peoples of complex religious systems.   F.L.P.

omnipotence: (Lat., omnis, all; potens, powerful) Power over all things, the perfect form of power. It is sometimes viewed as a monopolistic concentration of power—the wielding, by one agent, of all the power there is or could be. This implies that all other beings are powerless. But if "being is power" (Plato), then power over being is power over power, and the ideal or perfect agent will enjoy the optimal concentration of efficacy which is compatible with there being other efficacious agents. This is the social view of being and power, according to which even the greatest possible or perfect power (see perfection) "influences", rather than coerces or fully determines, the partly self-determined actions of others. The non-social or monopolistic view seems to be involved when it is said that omnipotence conflicts with human freedom, or that the omnipotent must be able to prevent all evil, that is, render others powerless to produce it.

The social conception of divine power implies two things 1) the reality of secondary causes, causes other than the supreme cause, 2) the ability of secondary causes to produce effects even upon the primary agent himself. 1) was denied by Occasionalism*, but asserted by Thomism and most theologians 2) was until recently generally denied. God was said never to be passive or acted upon in any relation. But this meant that secondary causes produced no effects that were real as measured by the being of God, since their effects made no difference to him, and thus, since his omniscience* is the measure of reality, the effects could not be real after all. To avoid this and other paradoxes or contradictions there is today a strong tendency to combine 1) and 2), making influence between God and creatures a fully social relation.

It is often held that "omnipotence" cannot be used for the social view, since the term means "power to do all things"—absolute or unlimited power—whereas power which is shared is limited or relative. But if power is in principle shared, then the ideal power, though in a sense relative, need not be "limited" if this means, "less than the greatest possible." The greatest possible power cannot be absolute or monopolistic, if being is essentially social. The possibility of an absolute monopoly is too controversial to put into the definition of so universally used a term as omnipotence. Furthermore, ideally great social power may be truly absolute in goodness, the "unqualifiedly righteous" as well as the greatest possible power, relative only in the sense of involving some sort of partial dependence upon others for the effects it achieves (including effects upon its own being). One may question whether all-powerfulness, as a religious idea, ever has meant unqualified power to do all things, leaving nothing else for others to do. For instance, it has not meant power to commit sins or to repent of sins. There has always been a distinction between God's power and the power or powers that effect evil. Finally, to say, with the high religions, that God "loves" us, accords ill with denying that we make any difference to him by our actions, or effect in him any joy or sorrow which he would not as well have had without us. Just as the greatest possible power may be the same as the optimal form and degree of power, but not the same as a power-monopoly, so the greatest possible independence, or freedom from effects produced by others, may be the same as the optimal or best way and degree of suffering (or enjoying) such effects, but quite different from the zero degree. To be influenced, no matter how appropriately and excellently, by others, will seem a defect only to one who sees no meaning to "ideally appropriate reception of influences."

Omnipotence is influence (and susceptibility to influence) ideal in quality, degree, and scope, so that all beings are subject to its optimal (not absolute) control. This control is "irresistible" in the sense that no being can simply withdraw from its reach, and that nothing can prevent it from continuing its beneficent work everlastingly. Thus the idea of some skeptics that it is at least barely possible that all existence should cease, vanish into non-entity, is a denial of the omnipotence of God, who exists necessarily, and whose continued existence in some sphere of activity or universe cannot fail.

Since a social result is jointly produced by mutual influences, the best possible power will not be best in that no greater results than it achieves were possible, but in that such better results were possible, not because the supreme power might have been more supreme, but because the lesser powers might have been less inferior. Thus a best possible power in God need not imply a best possible world, for any possible world is in part self-determined, a world of partly self-made and self-making constituents. Further, if the very meaning of power is social interaction, then mechanical analogies should give way in theology to those drawn from the higher life of man. God does not, then, "make" the world as a carpenter makes a table, with the alleged difference that his material is "nothing" rather than wood, he leads the world as a father leads his children, the good father being he whose sensitiveness enables him also to be led by each child in proportion to the ability of each to contribute to life, including even, or especially, the life of the father. If this proportionality of passivity admits ideal perfection—and why should it not—then only God could possess such perfection. And proportional passivity, not the traditional impassivity, seems to describe God as the being imitation of whom constitutes the ideal for human striving. Mere independence of others seems not a valid ideal, but a caricature of the error of Stoicism.

See attributes of God; cause; God as personal; infinite; perfect; transcendence.

G. T. Fechner, Zendavesta (1851), Chapter 11; A. E. Garvie, The Christian Faith (1937); O. Pfleiderer, Grundriss der Christlichen Glaubens- und Sittenlehre (1888).   c.h.

omnipresence: Property (of deity) of being in all places and things. Sometimes said (as by Kant*) to be merely virtual, a presence as to power or control, not as to being; but others hold that space and time being essentially patterns of interaction, where a thing acts (and is acted upon) is where it actually is. So far as two things interact directly, without time lapse or mediation by other things, they are, on this view, in the same place. "My neighbor is he with whom I intimately interact." (Peirce*). Omnipresence is opposed, not only to total, but also to partial, absence, or localization—action upon this thing and not upon that (unless perhaps ineffective, negligible action).

Except God, entities are present only partially or locally, so that when it is said God is not really in space, it may be meant that he suffers no localization, no limitation upon his active relations with things.

Presence relatively without localization is a common phenomenon. The human mind seems to be in many parts of the brain at once, not in some one atom or point. This gives analogical basis for conceiving strict omnipresence. If all things are to God's mind as brain cells, that is, each directly contributing and receiving influences to and from his consciousness, then God is strictly everywhere, present but non-localized. Newton's* "Space is the sensorium of God" seems to point in this direction. Even Thomism* uses this analogy.

The reason more was not made of it is that God was supposed, by nearly all theologians until recently, to act but not to interact, to impart influences but receive none. On this, see G. W. Leibniz*, Correspondence with Clarke—Opera philosophica (ed. by Erdmann, 1840), 746 ff.

See infinity; omnipotence; transcendence.

c.h.

omniscience: (Lat., omnis, all; scire, know) Knowledge of all things, perfect knowledge. Traditionally, "all things" was taken to include future events as determinate in every detail, whereas many recent thinkers deny that there are any such entities as determinate future events and hold, with Gerson*, Socinus, et. al., that God knows the future as it is, as more or less indeterminate. As the future becomes present, or the indeterminate determinate, there will be new facts for God to know. Thus "knowledge of all facts" does not necessarily imply in the knower, either foreknowledge* in the traditional sense or immutability; for the "all" may not be a sum eternally complete, but a growing totality which must be known temporally if at all.

An explanation of omniscience sometimes given is that the Cause of all, in knowing himself and his power, necessarily knows what he is able to produce, hence knows all things. But this would imply only that God knows all possible worlds as possible, and not that he knows just which world, of those he might produce, he actually does produce. If knowledge-of-the-world-as-actual is contained in God's self-knowledge, then the actuality of the world must be part of the divine being, and if this actuality is contingent, then there must be contingency in God. It seems, indeed, self-evident, that infallible knowledge-of-X must have X as part of its own being. Human knowledge seems often not to contain its objects, but human knowledge is in large part highly indirect, and for this very reason highly fallible.

Perfect immediate knowledge can hardly have the actuality of its objects simply outside itself. This does not imply "pantheism"* in the usual sense, for there may be two aspects of God, only one of which knows or contains contingent things (see pantheism, panentheism, transcendence).

The knower of all facts must know the facts of evil. Does this make evil a part of God? To know the quality of suffering, it seems that one must suffer. An idea of a feeling depends for its content entirely upon possession, at some time at least, of a feeling of the kind in question. It may seem that we can know as a fact that another is suffering without ourselves suffering at the time, but this knowledge is pale and abstract, and even it is dependent upon past suffering of our own. Traditional treatments of omniscience (as "impassive", wholly independent, etc.), seem to imply that God's knowing is akin to our most abstract and indirect awareness of things, a "knowledge about" not a "knowledge by acquaintance", remote not intimate, and by implication fallible and inadequate in the highest degree. And even so the implication remains that if God knows about suffering he must also in some measure be acquainted with it, that is, feel it. Thus the idea of a suffering God, who knows our sorrows by sharing them, is the only consistent, as it is the most religiously inspiring, conception of the Omniscient.

Though to be acquainted with suffering is to suffer, to be acquainted with sin is not to sin, for moral evil is not a quality but the absence of one. (See perfection.) It is the wilful failure to give adequate place in one's awareness (at the moment of choosing a course of action)to the interests of others. It is a kind of ignorance, though a voluntary and perhaps momentary one. To know ignorance it is not necessary to be ignorant, any more than to understand "not large" one must be small. If God sees the future (truly) as indeterminate, he can understand ignorance, for ignorance is an indeterminate awareness (or absence of determinate awareness) of what in itself is determinate, and thus ignorance is subjectively like knowledge of the future except that in true knowledge of the future the object is itself indeterminate and given as such. Thus ignorance is the double privation: absence of determinate awareness and absence of awareness that the object is similarly indeterminate. Hence God can know by acquaintance all the positive elements of ignorance and of sin without being ignorant or sinful. But there are no negative elements out of which the feeling of suffering can be constructed. Pain does not consist in the absence of pleasure. Thus the omniscient must suffer but he may and must be sinless.

A. E. Garvie, Christian Faith (1937); O Pfleiderer, Grundriss der Christlichen Glaubens- und Sittenlehre (1888); O. Fock, Der Socinianismus (1847), pp. 437ff.   C.H.

one-factor religions: A word coined by Fred L. Parrish to identify the great division of the historical religions of the world in which all religious ideas and practices of the faiths are based upon the assumption of the unity of nature the interpretation that there is a common bond, natural and destiny-determining, linking the nature of man with natures of all non-human objects and powers and forces; the kind of religion represented by each religion in the great division, religion that assumes there is one common denominator through which world order operates and man makes his adjustments.

(About ninety per cent of the peoples of the world today belong to historical religions using the one-factor assumption, the one-factor assumption is basal to all the philosophical systems in world cultures.) See his The Classifications of Religions (1941). See classification of religions; religious 'powers'; two-factor religions.   F.L.P.

Oneida community, the: A communistic society of religious Perfectionists* at Oneida, N. Y., 1848–1880. It was founded by John Humphrey Noyes, a graduate of Dartmouth and a student of law, who was deeply influenced by the New England revivalism of the early 1830s, and who entered training for the Congregationalist ministry, first at Andover and later at Yale. In 1834, as a result of a profound religious experience, he adopted Perfectionist views. The following year he returned to his boyhood home at Putney, Vt., where he organized the Putney Bible School, and began the development of the religious system which formed the basis of his communistic experiment. Noyes taught that the Second Coming of Christ had occurred with the Fall of Jerusalem in 70 A.D. and the events described in the twenty-fourth chapter of Matthew, that Christ now demands and expects of his followers perfection here on earth; that believers can and must live without sin as a result of their experience of fellowship with God, that selfishness is the root of all evil, and that the soul becomes free from sin only as selfishness is destroyed. These doctrines gradually led to the establishment of communism in property among the believers, and finally to a system of "complex marriage" in which any exclusive or monogamic relationship between the sexes was sternly disallowed as partaking of selfishness, and hence of sin. It was not, however, a system of promiscuity or license, and sex relations were carefully regulated by the community, which assumed responsibility for the support and education of the children. To this system in its entirety Noyes applied the term, Bible Comunism.

Internal dissension, court litigation, and public hostility forced the community to leave Putney and relocate at Oneida, N. Y. early in 1848. Here Noyes guided the community with great ability and business capacity, although Noyes himself attributed its success to the novel system of mutual criticism, under which each member sat silent while all the others disclosed his most intimate faults and attainments. These social pressures, tactfully guided and tempered by Noyes, served the ends of government and discipline within the group.

Beginning in 1849, branches were maintained at Putney and Campbridge, Vt., Wallingford, Conn., and Brooklyn and Manlius, N. Y, but after 1855 all the interests of the community were concentrated at Oneida and Wallingford, and the membership limited to a more gradual increase. The success of the experiment dates from this concentration, and the next decade and a half was later looked back upon by the older members as their "happiest years" After a few years of struggle to live by agriculture, the community prospered through the addition of such industries as canning, lumbering, and the manufacture of steel traps, sewing and embroidery silk, and silverware.

The community carried on an extensive propaganda through periodicals, books, and pamphlets published by its own presses. This publicity aroused an intense hostility against the communists, especially among the churches, which was greatly intensified by their attempt, stimulated by the work of Francis Galton, to apply what scientific knowledge they possessed to the production of the best possible offspring by a system of selective mating within the community. Internal difficulties also developed with the rise of a new generation who lacked the religious fervor of the early founders and converts who had never ceased to consider themselves as revivalists and Perfectionists first, and social reformers secondarily. As a result of these influences, the system of "complex marriage" was abandoned in 1879, and a year later the community was reorganized as a joint stock company known as Oneida Community, Limited. It has gradually withdrawn from its varied industries, but has continued to prosper as manufacturers of Community Silver, for which it is internationally known. The present company declares that it "has no connection with the old beyond the personnel and traditions which it inherited from its forty years' experience as a community" See communistic settlements, religious.

Robert Allerton Parker, An American Saint; John Humphrey Noyes and the Oneida Community (1935) ; William Alfred Hinds, American Communities and Collective Colonies (1908) ; Pierrepont Noyes, My Father's House: An Oneida Boyhood (1937) , John Humphrey Noyes, History of American Socialisms (1870).   H.E.J.

Onesimus: Runaway slave of Philemon*, who fell under Paul's influence probably at Rome, and became a Christian. Paul sent him back to his master at Laodicea, with a letter to Philemon urging the latter to accept him as a Christian brother, and let him return to Paul to help him in his religious work. Onesimus may be identical with Onesimus, bishop of Ephesus, who many years after befriended Ignatius of Antioch*.
                                                          E.J.G.

ontological argument: See God.

ontology: (Gr. on: being; logos: study of) The study of being or the fundamental stuff of existence. The problem of reality. A metaphysical inquiry. The following terms occur: In the question of reality, two considerations come to the fore: 1) the question of quantity or the number of realities; 2) the question of quality, the character· of the fundamentally real. Metaphysical monism or singularism is the view that there is one reality, metaphysical dualism holds that there are two realities (generally mind and matter, or, God and the world-stuff), metaphysical pluralism asserts that there are many realities. As to the quality or character of the fundamentally real, the following positions may be taken *Metaphysical idealism or spiritualism asserts that reality is akin to mind or spirit. Metaphysical materialism holds that reality is fundamentally akin to the world of matter or that physical categories suffice to explain it. Metaphysical neutralism asserts that the fundamental is neither of the character of mind nor matter but neutral (entities, relations), static rather than dynamic. Metaphysical dynamism is the view that reality is sheer energy or process, neither mental nor physical, and dynamic. Other views relating to the character of reality are: Hylomorphism (Gr hule matter; morphe. form), a view held by Aristotle which asserts the close union of form and matter, God being the unmoved Mover, the incorporeal, indivisible, perfect, eternal, pure energy or form from which and to which things come and tend *Positivism in general asserts that the ontological inquiry is traditionally sterile and that the philosopher's quest may well end with the world of the here and now, our philosophy should be concerned with the making of successful practical adjustments. Skepticism is the avowal that our knowledge of the whole of reality is too fragmentary to make assertions thereof.

Each of these schools of metaphysical thought subdivides as to theory of the character of reality. Metaphysical idealists thus, are either rationalistic (emphasis upon mind as reason), romanticists (emphasis upon mind as feeling) voluntarists (mind as activity or will), *personalists (mind as person or self) or *panpsychists (all nature is soul-like). Thus, a metaphysical idealist may differ widely from another of the same school in theory. Metaphysical materialists may be atomists (the material atom being fundamental) or physical energists. Neutralists may differ as to whether reality is of the character of number (Pythagoreans) or "pure experience" (James) or compresent events (B. Russell). Dynamists may hold to the elan vital as fundamental (Bergson) or to activity-systems (Boodin). See metaphysics; naturalism.

For a survey of the ontological problem see V. Ferm First Adventures in Philosophy (1936), Chapters V-XIII.   V.F.

opera supererogationis: See supererogation, works of.

Ophites: (Gr., ophianoi, followers of the serpent) A Gnostic* sect originating in Syria which regarded the serpent as the symbol of the supreme emanation* of the Godhead.   S.M.G.

Optatus, Saint, bishop of Mileve: (4th century) A contemporary of Augustine and writer on the Donatist* schism. He defended the Catholic conception of the church independent of Augustinian ideas.   H.H.

optimism: (Lat., optimum, best, superlative of bonum, good) The view that the world, especially human life, is wholly good, or as good as possible (Plato, Timaeus 53B, Leibniz, Théodicée, 1710, attacked by Voltaire in Candide, 1757), or that the good will eventually triumph (eschatology), or that the whole is good even though parts are evil (absolute idealism). In some sense optimism or meliorism* characterizes religion and idealism. See meliorism; moral optimism, pessimism; value.

E.S.B.

opus operatum: The term appears for the first time in the Gloss on the Sentences attributed (falsely) to Peter of Poitiers, disciple of the Lombard. (See Peter Lombard) It seems to have been coined in the twelfth-century Porretan school to designate the sacramental rite itself in contra-distinction from the opus operans (or operantis), which was originally the activity of the minister and was later widened to include the activity of the recipient. St. Thomas mentions the use of the antithesis "by some" (In IV Sent., d. 1, q. 1, a. 5, qc. 1, sol.). Its common later use was sanctioned by the Council of Trent*, which adopted the phrase *ex opere operato as apt to express the distinction between the traditional Catholic doctrine on the efficacy of the sacraments and that of the Reformers. The latter (cf. Confessio Augustana, art. 13, Melanchthon, Apologia Altera, Bretschneider and Bindsel, Corpus Reform., XXVII, 570) equated the efficacy of the sacraments with that of the preaching of the word, limiting it to a purely psychological effect, the arousal of faith in the promise, properly, therefore, the content of the sacraments is not grace but the word of grace, and their efficacy lies not in their being performed but in their being believed. In the Catholic tradition the sacraments have a mode of efficacy distinctive of themselves, and produce an effect not simply on the consciousness, which alone is reached by the word, but on the very substance of the soul. Given the proper conditions in recipient and minister, they are instrumental in operating a union of the soul with God that takes place below any level to which introspection can reach. This effect is not caused by the conscious activity of the soul, which is natively powerless to effect its own supernatural union with God; it is directly the work of God, the sole cause of grace, done mediately through the sacramental sign itself, as validly demonstrated and administered—thus ex opere operato.

This doctrine rests on the fact that the sacraments* were instituted by Christ as means of sanctification in harmony with the incarnational character of God's redemptive counsels, wherein the visible (in the first instance, the humanity of Christ) is made the channel of God's invisible, creatively sanctifying action. It supposes, moreover, that the sacramental action is the action of Christ, vicariously performed through His Body, the Church, with which He is mystically one. In consequence, the sacraments "contain the grace which they signify" (Council of Trent, sess. 7, can. 6), as a practical sign contains its own significance. However, they actually confer it only "on those who put no obstacle" (loc. cit.), a formula which does not imply pure passivity (save in the baptism of infants), but vitally responsive religious activity, which varies according to the case, for instance, actually to receive the grace of baptism the adult must have faith, hope, the desire of arriving at the grace of God, penitence for sin, the will to obey the divine law. However, the negative formula, "non ponentibus obicem," points the fact that these dispositions simply condition, and do not cause, the efficacy of the sacrament, which in their presence has its effect ex opere operato, as the sanctifying instrument of the mystical Christ. In the controversy over the phrase ex opere operato, it is sometimes interpreted as implying "magic," of an immoral and mechanical concept of sanctification, Catholics assert this to be a radical misunderstanding of the theandric realism of their sacramental theology. Actually, the controversy has its roots in initially divergent doctrines on the whole God-relationship involved in the term grace.

J.C.M.

Opzoomer, Cornelius Willem: (1821-1892) He was professor of philosophy at Utrecht. At first he was a follower of Karl Christian Friedrich Krause. Then he represented a partially carried out empiricism akin to positivism. He was an emancipator of philosophy from the chains of classical philology and theology. On the basis of the doctrine of panentheism* he denied the supernatural. Christianity was for him one of the individual forms of religion and was not to be set up against the others as final. He contended at first that we must have theoretic knowledge of God, that we reach God by thinking. After he had embraced a peculiar empirical philosophy, he adopted religious feeling as one of the sources of knowledge. He held a special interference of the deity in prayer, inspiration and miracles as impossible as nature was the external form of appearance of the deity. There are no breaks in the fixed order of nature. In his view man had five sources of knowledge sense perception, the feeling of pleasure and displeasure, aesthetic, ethical and religious feeling. The first three yield materialism, the first four positivism, the last a harmful mysticism, but the combination of all gives a sound knowledge of reality, a scientific and religious view of the world. Of the famous triad of beliefs God, freedom and immortality, Opzoomer regarded only the first as essential to religion. Insistence upon freedom is irreligious since the religious man desires only that God's will be done. Faith in immortality is not a religious but a scientific question. Evil was for him a necessary but temporary element in the evolution of the world. Evil exists only from man's point of view. Christianity was for Opzoomer the religion of loving trust in God as taught by Jesus. He used the N.T. as a source of historical knowledge. Protestant orthodoxy was not true Protestantism for him. Lessing, Herder, Goethe Schiller, Kant, Fichte and especially Schleiermacher were for him the forerunners of the new reconciliation of faith and knowledge, the exponents of a new reconciliation of faith and knowledge, the pioneers of a new scholasticism.

De Leer van God bij Schelling, Hegel, en Krause. Een wijsgeerige Proeve. Eerste Stuk, Krause (Leiden, 1846) ; De Weg der Wetenschap. Een Handboek der Logica (Leiden and Amsterdam, 1851) , Wetenschap en Wijsbegeerte (Amsterdam, 1857) ; De Waarheid en hare Kenbronnen (Amsterdam, 1859) ; Het Wezen der Kennis. Een Leerboek der Logica (Amsterdam, 1863) ; De Godsdienst (Amsterdam, 1863) ; Losse Bladen. 3 vols. (Haag, 1886 f) ; T. Cannegieter, De moderne Richting (Baarn, 1908) ; A M Brouwer, De moderne Richting (Nijmegen, 1912) ; K H. Roessingh, De moderne Theologie in Nederland; hare Voorbereiding en eerste Periode (Groningen, 1914) ; Het Modernisme in Nederland (Haarlem, 1922).   H.H.

oracle: (Lat., oraculum, from oro, to pray) 1) The answer given by certain divinities to inquiries of pilgrims coming to their shrines. The methods of expressing the reply varied, e.g., the rustling of the oak leaves at Dodona, the cries of the priestess at Delphi, dreams at Epidaurus. In dealing with the future, replies were obscure and equivocal, capable of being interpreted in accordance with the event. 2) The shrine where oracles were given. The most famous were those of Zeus at Dodona in Epirus and of Apollo at Delphi. The Delphic Oracle came to be the most influential power in Greece, consulted by all states alike. There were no shrines in Italy comparable to the Greek ones, but the Sibyl's Cave at Cumae under the Temple of Apollo and the Temple of Fortuna at Praeneste are worthy of mention. See Sibylline oracles.   E.M.N.

oral law: See Israel, religion and theology; law, Hebrew; Moses.

oratio: See collect.

Oratorians, or Oratory of St. Philip Neri: The Congregation of the Oratory was founded by St. Philip Neri at San Girolamo, a parish church in Rome, and canonically erected by Gregory XIII in 1575. It consists of independent communities of priests living under obedience to a rule but without vows. The central objective is the salvation of souls by means of prayer, preaching and the administration of the sacraments. The English Oratorians, living under the same rule, were founded by Cardinal (then Father) Newman* in 1847. The French Congregation of the Oratory, inaugurated by Cardinal (then Père) Peter de Bérulle in 1611, followed the general lines laid down by St. Philip Neri, but is a distinct organization under its own superior general.   J.F.T.

oratorio: Originally musical services held in the Oratory founded by St. Philip Neri (d. 1595) at Rome; later applied to elaborate musical compositions on sacred themes employing orchestra, chorus, and solo voices—popularized in 18th cent. England by Handel (as a substitute for opera in Lent), his Messiah is the most popular and probably greatest oratorio.   E.R.H.

ordeals: Methods for determining the guilt or innocence of suspected or accused persons by subjecting them to tests of a physically painful or dangerous nature. The tests were supposed to be under superhuman control although administered by human hands. Escape from injury was taken as evidence of miraculous divine intervention and proof of innocence. Ordeals have been employed among many peoples, primitive and civilized, as a part of judicial procedure. They persisted officially in Europe until the end of the Middle Ages and sporadically since then. See Hastings Encyclopaedia of Religion and Ethics for extensive discussion.   R.W.F.

order of salvation: The logical order of the various acts by which the Holy Spirit originates, sustains and develops faith. The simplest division of this order includes Conversion, Justification and Sanctification. Some dogmaticians however further elaborate upon the distinctions within the Order of Salvation and include also under varying arrangements The Call, Illumination, Regeneration, Conversion, and Mystical Union.   H.W.J.

orders, religious: See Augustinians, Benedictines; Capuchins, Carmelites, Dominicans; Franciscans. See also Catholic religious orders; Catholic societies; mendicant orders; monasticism. See holy orders.

ordinal: A liturgical text containing the forms used in ordination. (Usually incorporated in the Pontifical (R.C.) and in the Anglican Book of Common Prayer*.   P.V.N.

ordination: The formal bestowal of ministerial office (see holy orders), supplementing the inward call (vocatio) of the Spirit with the authority of the Church publicly given by its agents competent to ordain (bishop, presbytery). Since the Reformation wide divergence has prevailed alike as to the form and theory of the ministry, the liturgical forms used in ordination, and the proper minister of ordination. In the Eastern and Roman Catholic Churches ordination (the sacrament of Order) is held to confer grace and indelible character, and therefore not to be repeated. Many Anglicans, and presumably the Prayer Book Ordinal, share this position. In churches of Catholic order ordination is set in the framework of the Eucharistic liturgy and restricted to bishops of historic succesion, as was the universal rule from the second to the 16th century.

The essential form of ordination consists of the laying on of hands* with prayer (major orders); admission to minor orders is by the giving of the appropriate symbol of office (out of which has developed the porrectio instrumentorum). This primitive simplicity has been retained by the Eastern Church, and to it the Reformed Churches have returned. In the Roman Catholic Church the ceremonial of ordination has been complicated by the fusion, in early medieval times, of old Roman and Gallican elements, so that the primitive form is somewhat obscured by later accretions (vesting, anointing, porrectio, imperative formulas, etc.). See clergy; initiation rites; ordinal; priest; re-ordination; sacraments; vocation.

A. C. Headlam and R. Dunkerley, editors. The Ministry and the Sacraments (1937); J. Hastings, Encyclopedia of Religion and Ethics. Art "Ordination (Christian)", by A J MacLean   P.V.N.

Ordo Romanus: A text prescribing the ceremonies used in the Roman Church from the eighth to the fifteenth century. There are fifteen such Ordines extant. Ordo Primus describes the Pope's manner of celebrating public mass on greater days in the 8th century.   P.V.N.

oreads: See nymphs.

orenda: (Iroquois) Inherent potency or energy which objects, in some characteristic manner, possess and exert. See manitou, wakanda.   F L.P.

organum (or diaphony) The earliest form of polyphonic* music. One voice part parallels the original unmeasured plainsong* at the interval of a fifth or a fourth with an octave added at times. The earliest record of "pure organum" comes from the end of the 9th century, from Hucbald, a monk of Flanders. The Micrologus of Guido d'Arezzo a century later describing "free organum" permitted the use of the occursus, a coming together of the parts at the cadence points. By 1100 John Cotton, an Englishman, in Musica, laid down rules for the "new organum" which, through the use of contrary rather than parallel motion of voices, established the independence of voice leading and the principles of polyphonic music.

H. E. Wooldridge, Oxford History of Music, Vol. I (1901).   E.H.B.

Origen: (A.D. 185-251? or 254?) Christian scholar, teacher, and thinker—one of the greatest of all time. Educated in Alexandria under Clement and Ammonius Saccas (the teacher of Plotinus), he was head of the celebrated Catechetical School of his native city from 203 till 232. A little later he settled in Caesarea and opened a school. Here he died as a result of tortures endured in the Decian persecution.

Origen as a theologian sets out from the Rule of Faith but ends with a system which is a profound amalgamation of Christianity and Platonism. A third influence was the great Gnostic systems. His cosmology is inwardly a soteriology. Its determining end throughout is redemption, its presupposition an ante-mundane fall of finite spiritual beings or souls (called by Origen now rational essences, now intelligences, powers, and ideas). The agent of redemption as of all creation is the Divine Logos or Son of God, who is the perfect image or reflection of the eternal Father though a being distinct, derivative, and subordinate. The Logos is the educator, the inspirer, and, as incarnate, the redeemer of all fallen souls, though their free will remains a constant factor in the process of return to God. The historical impact of Origen was registered primarily through his Logos doctrine. On the one hand, he was the "grandfather" of Arianism and it is his widespread influence which explains the prolongation of the Arian conflict for sixty years. On the other hand, he taught the Church to think away time in conceiving of the generation of the Son and so paved the way for the idea of an eternal and immanent Trinity. See allegorical interpretation, pre-existence, restorationism; Rufinus Tyrranius, senses of Scripture, versions of the Bible, ancient.

Besides the Hexapla—one of the most monumental enterprises ever undertaken by a single scholar—and the Commentaries on St. John and on St. Matthew, the most important writings of Origen are De Principiis, Contra Celsum, and De Oratione. Of these De Principiis, the foremost treatise on systematic theology in the ancient Church, has survived in the main only in Rufinus' largely emended Latin translation. Koetschau's edition (E. T. based on it by Butterworth, 1936) of this work in the Griechischen Christlichen Schriftsteller is indispensable. Othewise Migne and The Ante-Nicene Fathers suffice.

E. R. Redepenning, Origenes, Eine Darstellung seines Lebens und seiner Lehre (1841, 46) 2 vols.; J. Denis, De la philosophie d'Origène (1884) ; C. Bigg, The Christian Platonists of Alexandria (1886; 2nd ed, 1913) ; E. de Faye, Origène: sa vie, son oeuvre, sa pensée (1923-28) 3 vols , Origen and His Work (E T, 1929) ; C. W Lowry, "Origen as Trinitarian" in Jour Th. Studies, July 1936 Arts. on Origen by Westcott in Dict. Chr. Biog., by Harnack in Ency. Brit. (11th ed.).   C.W.L.

Origenistic Controversies: An outgrowth of the Arian* controversy, though grounded largely in personalities, occasioned by the frequent appeals of the Arians to the authority of Origen* (A.D. 185-254). It involved hostile bands of Egyptian monks, spread to Palestine about 394, where Jerome*, who had first supported Origen, was led to condemn his errors and thus became involved in bitter controversy with Rufinus*; and presently was carried to Constantinople where it was the occasion of the exile of Chrysostom*.   A.K.R.

(Original) Church of God, the: A pentecostal sect with headquarters at Chattanooga, Tenn. It was organized in 1886 by R. J. Spurling. Its distinctive feature is speaking in unknown tongues. There are 58 churches and 2,200 members. See pentecostal sects.   E.T.C.

original nature: See heredity.
For list of instincts see: psychology of religion.

original sin: The problem of the roots of sin in human life has pre-occupied religious thinkers and theologians throughout the ages. Christian theology has generally sought to derive sin* from man's abuse of the freedom with which he was created. But this explanation requires an answer to the question how it is possible for man to misuse his freedom so that as a sinner he will set himself against God. This answer is given in the doctrine of original sin (peccatum originis, sin of the origin). Its content is that the sin which caused Adam's* fall and expulsion from paradise is transmitted from generation to generation, so that all descendants of Adam must be regarded as being of a "perverted" or "depraved" nature.

The apostle Paul introduced this interpretation of the fall of Adam into Christian thinking. When he taught that as in Adam all men have sinned, so in Christ they are saved, he not only suggested an interpretation of the Genesis story of the fall of the first parents which no Jewish exegete had made before (as far as we know), but he also furnished Christian theology a major theme of thought. The ancient theologians (Irenaeus, Tertullian) who first adopted this pattern of thought, never undertook to explain how the sin of Adam could be transmitted to all his descendants. They seem to have presupposed (as Paul himself probably did) a mystical identity or relationship between Adam and mankind. Only Augustine* fully developed the theory that Adam's sin is transmitted from parents to children throughout all generations through the sexual act which, by virtue of the lust that accompanies it, is inherently sinful. In this form the doctrine was adopted by medieval Roman Catholicism and later also by Orthodox Protestantism. In his own time, Augustine was opposed by Pelagius* who taught that sin originates in man's following the bad example of Adam and that it is continued in mankind by force of habit. His fundamental concern was to preserve the principle of human moral freedom over against Augustine's doctrine of man's total (moral) disability. Medieval Roman Catholic theology combined Pelagianism with Augustinianism insofar as it developed a doctrine of man which distinguished between the natural and supernatural aspects of human nature. Thus it could be asserted that Adam's fall entailed the loss of original righteousness insofar as the supernatural gift of divine grace was concerned, but not the destruction, only the staining of the natural endowment of man (particularly his rationality and therefore his freedom) by which he is distinguished from the beasts. The reformers rejected this doctrine of the dual character of human nature. They eliminated all traces of Pelagianism from their teaching and returned to a strict Augustinianism. They were concerned to emphasize the radical sinfulness of man over against the sovereignty of divine grace, believing (rightly) that their doctrine of salvation* by grace* alone required such teaching.

Modern Protestantism gradually rejected the theory of the origin of sin in Adam's fall and of the congenital depravity of human nature. Biblical criticism and the results of natural science have rendered it untenable. But the old doctrine of original sin nevertheless continues to be of importance in Protestant thinking, for it directs the attention of the modern Christian to two fundamental aspects of the Christian life, namely the recognition of the universality of sin and the acknowledgment of man's dependence upon divine grace. See depravity; fall of man; guilt; imputation; infant salvation; predestination; psychologists, English school of.

Lit: F. R Tennant, Sources of the Doctrines of the Fall and Original Sin. 1903; Reinhold Niebuhr, Nature and Destiny of Man. 2 vols. 1941-43. w.p.

Ormazd: (Ahura Mazda) High god in the Zoroastrian religion. See Amesha Spentas, cosmogonies, Persia, religions of, Zoroastrianism.
v.f.

orphanages: Children's institutions probably arose as a means of caring for large numbers of children made destitute by some catastrophe, such as famine, war or pestilence. Early Christian orphanages are mentioned by Julian (361-363 A.D.), but most institutions during the middle ages were hostels, in which children might be placed. This was also true of the English almshouse which came in with the Poor Law (1601). Religious motives, however, were responsible for establishing and maintaining most of these institutions on the Continent and in Great Britain. When the disadvantages of placing children in institutions with dependent, ill and delinquent adults became obvious, about the 18th century, separate orphanages for children were established. The first one in what is now the United States was established in New Orleans by the Ursalines in 1729 following an Indian massacre; and the first public one in Charleston in 1787.

Orphanages became the most popular form of benevolence, and by 1930 there were over 1500 in the United States, but less than one-tenth under public auspices.

Criticism of institutional method of caring for children came to be voiced about the middle of the XIX Century, and there is coming to be general agreement that no child should be placed in an orphanage because of dependency, no matter how caused, that orphanages should be reserved for special services, such as diagnostic study of children about to be placed in foster homes or adopted, certain sick children, children presenting serious behavior problems and seriously defective children.

There is not uniformity of judgment regarding the institution's function in the treatment of delinquent* children. Some authorities stress the value of foster home placement; but for the most part, institutions are still used for their treatment; the sexes in separate locations; and attention directed toward re-education along physical, intellectual, emotional and vocational lines rather than punishment. Cf. widows, treatment of .

W. Healy, B. Bronner, and P. Murphy, Reconstructing Behavior in Youth (1929) ; R. W. Reeder, How Two Hundred Children Live and Learn; Homer Folks, Care of Destitute, Neglected and Delinquent Children (1911) ; H. W. Thurston, The Dependent Child (1930). f.j.b.

Orphics, the: See Greek religion; mystery religions; soul; transmigration.

Orthodox Churches, Eastern: See Eastern Orthodox Churches.

orthodox Judaism: See Judaism, orthodox.

Orthodox Presbyterian Church, The: See Machen, J. G.

orthodoxy: (Gr. orthos, right, straight; doxa, opinion) Correctness of religious belief, according to an authoritative standard; opposed to hetero-doxy, or heresy. The standard presupposed by orthodoxy may be, as with the Roman Catholic, dogma as defined by the Church in its creeds and by the deliverances of the Pope, or the official confessions, or, more generally, the teaching of Scripture, as with the Protestant. Orthodoxy, thus, is a relative term, varying with the norm. The Roman Catholic regards himself as orthodox in contrast with the Protestant, while the Trinitarian Protestant looks on himself as orthodox with respect to the Unitarian. Orthodoxy varies, too, with time; what is heterodox at one period may be orthodox in a later one. Christ was heterodox with respect to the Judaism of his day and yet was to become the founder of a new orthodoxy. It is to be noted that the standard by which orthodoxy is judged is established by social, or institutional, agreement. The deliverances of an individual's conscience or religious experience might be correct from the standpoint of truth but at odds with the accepted, authoritative view, and, hence, be heterodox. Orthodoxy is, thus, conformity to the official formulation of truth.

F.G.E.

orthodoxy, neo: See neo-orthodoxy.

Orthodoxy, Progressive: See Progressive Orthodoxy.

Osiander, Andreas: (1498-1552) German reformer. Pastor at Nuremberg, where he introduced the Reformation, 1522. Published Copernicus' "On the Motions of Heavenly Bodies," 1543. Pastor and professor at Koenigsberg, 1549. Here he aired his long-harbored views on justification, which led to the so-called Osiandrian controversy in the Lutheran church. Rejecting the forensic theory of justification*, Osiander held that God acts as physician rather than judge, "makes" rather than "declares" man just. He emphasized the part played by the divine nature of Christ and minimized the atonement. "The indwelling of Christ's divine nature is our righteousness." The controversy spread from the clergy among the people and lasted for many years after Osiander's death. It was finally settled in the Formula of Concord*.

E.C.K.

Osiris: In the old Egyptian Kingdom: early Nile-god of Busiris in the delta, famous shrine up the river at Abydos. In the myth, Osiris is murdered by Set*: by piety his son Horus* brought together the dismembered body and restored life to Osiris. The means by which Osiris was restored must be equally potent for others. Life like that which was restored to Osiris becomes a possibility to men. Osiris lived and ruled the underworld. Later Osiris and the afterworld were transplanted to the sky where he sat on a throne. The King of Egypt is his son. Salvation through Osiris is achieved for the individual by the performance of rites, set up by priests, by which Osiris is held to have attained immortality.

In the later Middle Kingdom and Empire, moral conditions are involved for a future blessedness. There is now a formal judgment of the dead. Osiris is King of the Dead, and the dead are brought before him and tried. He is pictured seated on a throne with a sceptre and scourge in his hands.

In the annead of Heliopolis, Osiris is a member of the last generation in descent from Atum. In a myth, it is Isis and not Horus, who searches and finds the body of Osiris after he was slain by Set.

In the Roman Empire, Osiris is linked with Isis in the form of a mystery cult, of a god who died and became alive again. See Egypt, religions of, mystery religions.

F.L.P.

ostensorium: See monstrance.

other-worldliness: See asceticism; conversion; monasticism.

Otterbein, Philip William: (1726-1813) A missionary to America from the Reformed Church in Germany, became a leader of the evangelical movement and, with Martin Bochm*, founded the Church of the United Brethren in Christ*. Bishop, 1800-1813.

W.E.R.

Otto, Rudolf: (1869-1937) Protestant theologian and philosopher. Born Peine (Hanover), 1897 privatdozent Goettingen, 1904 professor Goettingen, 1914 professor Breslau, 1917-1937 professor of Systematic Theology Marburg. Applying philosophy and comparative religion to the study of theology O. attempted to establish a firm basis for the Biblical truth by pointing to its historical uniqueness, and thus to demonstrate the absoluteness of the Christian faith. His most remarkable achievement was his book on The Idea of the Holy. Therein he described the subject of religion as the Numinous*, which manifesting itself to man in a specific way could be apprehended only by means of man's religious faculty (Ahnung, divination). In this view he followed the philosopher Fries* (1773-1843), of whose works O and his friends published a new edition. Like his brother he was a great student of Indian religion. He applied his philosophy of religion not only to the study of the N T. and German mysticism, but also to the organization of the 'Religiöser Menschheitsbund', an organization that was to unite adherents of all the world's faiths in the service of international understanding and collaboration. See phenomenology.

Naturalism and Religion (1907); Das Heilige (1917); Translated into all modern languages. Engl. tr. The Idea of the Holy (1923, rev ed 1929), Religious Essays, a supplement to The Idea of the Holy (London, 1931); Mysticism, East and West (1932); The Kingdom of God and the Son of Man. A study in the history of religion (1937); Sünde und Urschuld und andere Aufsätze zur Theologie (Munchen, 1932).

Theodor Siegfried, Grundfragen der Theologie bei Rudolf Otto (Marburger Studien) (Gotha, 1931), J. M. Moore, Theories of Religious Experience, with special reference to James, Otto and Bergson (1938).

O.A.P.

ousia: A Greek word meaning "essence," or "substance," that Being which really is, that remains or abides in contrast to the fleeting, flowing particulars of the world phenomena,—as the genus abides in the members of the species. It figured in the Arian* controversy of the 4th century, which was over the relation of the divine ousia to the persons of the Trinity*. The orthodox party held that the Son was homoousios, "of the same substance," with the Father, while the Arians held variously to homoiousios, "of similar substance," and heteroousios, "of different substance." The Neo-platonists* said that God was hyperousios, beyond ousia, transcending the possibility of definition.   F.G.E.

Overbeck, Franz Camillo: (1837-1905) Reared in France, Leningrad and Dresden, he taught at the universities of Jena and Basel. Of sharp critical mind, in intimate connection with the modern intellectual development through his friendship with Nietzsche, Treitschke and Rhode, he gradually grew cool towards religion and Christianity. His inward coolness towards religion, Christian belief and theological tradition enabled him to see many things clearly in the prevailing theology. As a historian of original Christianity, he took issue with the modernizing interpretations of the original historical sources and figures. He clearly recognized the eschatological attitude of primitive Christianity. He posed similar questions as did Kierkegaard about the possibility of Christianity in the modern world and the genuineness of every appeal of later generations to original Christianity and the N.T. Not his intellectual productivity—he wrote numerous studies on N.T. topics and the history of the ancient church—but his inner remoteness against religion and Christianity paralyzed his influence. Scientific theology was for him not a servant but a grave-digger of Christianity. He was led to a religious scepticism whose negative view of Christianity did not mentally disturb him in the least. Über die Christlichkeit unserer heutigen Theologie (Leipzig, 1873); Christentum und Kultur, ed by C A. Bernoulli (Basel, 1919); R Kiefer, Die beiden Formen der Religion des Als-Ob (Langensalza, 1932); W. Bigg, Franz Overbeck (München, 1931).   H.H.

Owen, Robert: (Owenism) See communistic, settlements, secular.

Oxford, Franciscan School of: Brilliantly inaugurated by the lectures of the secular master, Robert Grosseteste*, its theological and philosophical studies flourished under Minors like Adam Marsh and Roger Bacon.   R.C.P.

Oxford Group: A contemporary life-changer movement instituted by Frank Buchman, Lutheran minister, sometimes known as Buchmanism. Buchman is said to be the human founder and the Holy Spirit the real head. Buchman became disappointed with conventional religion and after heart-searching experience came to the conclusion that there was need to return to a kind of first-century Christian fellowship with more emphasis upon personal commitments than credal or theological loyalties. After a period of social service, Buchman, wide traveler, concentrated his efforts at Oxford University where conditions seemed ripe for just such an emphasis. The movement has spread into the far corners of the earth by the work of devoted crusaders, enlisting prominent men. There is no set organization, rather the movement claims to be an inner church in all churches for the deepening of the spiritual life. Meetings are held in the manner of house parties where divine guidance and testimony form the informal ritual. The human ego must surrender to the Christ "I". There is to be no compromise with the absolutes of honesty, purity, love and unselfishness. Surrender, restitution and sharing are implied in the changed life. The movement lacks a formal theology, which is considered a virtue. Its latest title: Moral Re-Armament.

A. J. Russell, For Sinners Only (1932).   V.F.

Oxford movement: A movement within the Church of England, initiated at Oxford in 1833 under the leadership of John Henry Newman, John Keble, Edward B. Pusey and others. In opposition to the prevailing latitudinarian and Erastian* tendencies of the day, these men insisted upon the historic significance of the Church as "more than a merely human institution" and as possessing "privileges, sacraments, a ministry, ordained by Christ." A revival of liturgical and ceremonial usages followed upon a reawakened sense of the values inherent in Catholic Christianity, and in its later phase the movement became identified with what was popularly known as "ritualism."* The emphasis of Newman and his associates, however, was primarily doctrinal. See Anglo-Catholics, Tractarianism.

See R. W. Church, The Oxford Movement (1891); S. L. Ollard, A Short History of the Oxford Movement (1915); W. G. Peck, The Social Implications of the Oxford Movement (1933).   L.W.C.

Oyomei: (Jap.) Idem Wang Yang-ming*.
                                                    W.T.C.

P

P: See Priestly Code; Hexateuch.

pa kua: See Chinese Terminology.

Pachomius, Saint: Founder of the cenobitical life, was born and died in Egypt where he introduced community life among the hermits who gathered around him. He was the founder of nine monasteries for men and two for women. His Order continued until the 11th century. His feast is celebrated on May 14. See Cenobite; monasticism.   J.B.C.

pacifism, Christian: A word which the Oxford English Dictionary records as occuring for the first time in 1905 and denoting a doctrine or belief that international disputes can be settled "by peaceful means." But the term has come to mean, at least in religious writings, the doctrine that Christians can have no part in war. There are, of course, different interpretations of this general principle, most holding that police power within the state is not inconsistent with pacifism and some even conceding the necessity of an international police force. More commonly, however, the word pacifism is being reserved for what is known as the "absolutist" position, that a Christian can under no circumstances use armed force for the settling of international difficulties.

It is frequently said that the Early Church was pacifist, but this is a generalization which leads to an easy misunderstanding of the attitudes of the early Christians. The early Christians did not face the problem of war as we have it today, and there are no unquestioned statements concerning the Christian's participation in war before the middle of the second century. During the first three centuries there were several writers who took the position that a Christian can under no circumstances be a soldier. But these writers—the most often quoted was Tertullian*—also held that a Christian cannot hold civil office. After Constantine the Christians, who before his time were members of an organization not recognized by the state, had to decide whether the Christian could assume the burdens of civil and military office. The majority seem to have believed that, however dangerous such offices might be for the Christian, he should not shrink from them.

The Church has always condemned war, and no Christians have been more outspoken than some who have believed that under certain circumstances it is lawful for them to bear arms. During the Middle Ages efforts were made by the Church to mitigate the evils of war, and churchmen, both Catholic and Protestant, contributed to the creation of International Law. Notable among these were Vitoria and Suarez of the Catholics and Grotius, a Protestant. The pacifist tradition was kept alive by the monastic orders and by such minority groups as the Waldenses in the Middle Ages and the Quakers in modern times.

In recent years a new type of Christian pacifism has arisen. Admitting the duty of the citizen to support the state, even in its police power, the modern pacifist denies only the right of the citizen himself to use force. Frequently, too, this is restricted to the use of force in international warfare. This view is sometimes said to have arisen partially, at least, out of the optimism which has been so characteristic of recent religion, especially in America. Following the first World War many seemed to believe that war could be avoided by a refusal on the part of Christians and others to take part. Unfortunately, there were too many exceptions made for this to become a successful program for avoiding war. Some were willing to admit the possible necessity of class warfare; others were willing to resort to economic sanctions against aggressor nations without seeming to understand that such sanctions are ineffectual unless backed up by force. The second World War has taken this question out of the realm of ecclesiastical debating societies and made it once more a problem of life and death for millions of Christians. Many, especially such groups as the Quakers and Mennonites,* have maintained· the absolute-pacifist position concerning war; and the democracies, at least, have⁻ tried to protect the consciences of the objectors. But those who have been content to hold at one and the same time the necessity of a power state to promote the general welfare and the doctrine of absolute pacifism in international matters are compelled to rethink their positions. About all that can be said of discussions concerning pacifism growing out of the second World War is that the question is once more being set in the larger problem of the Christian's relation to the state.

James Moffatt, art. "War", Dictionary of the Apostolic Church; A. T. Cadoux, Jesus and Civil Government (1923); C. J Cadoux, The Early Church and the World (1925), G H. C. Macgregor, The New Testament Basis of Pacifism (1936); Sherwood Eddy and Kirby Page, The Abolition of War (1924); Richard B. Gregg, The Power of Non-Violence (1934), Reinhold Niebuhr, "Why the Church is not Pacifist", Christianity and Power Politics (1940), Umphrey Lee, The Historic Church and Modern Pacifism (1943).   U.L.

Paddock Lectures: Endowed at the General Theological Seminary, New York, by G. A. Jarvis in 1880 in honor of Bishop Paddock of Massachusetts, for the defence and confirmation of the faith and the historic order of the Church; lecturers have included W. R. Inge, W. Temple, J. N. Figgis, A. E J. Rawlinson, A. J. Lilley, L. Hodgson, B. S. Easton, M. B. Stewart.   E.R.H.

paedobaptism: See pedobaptism.

pagan: Derived from the Latin paganus, a "countryman." The term was first applied to those who clung to Greek and Roman faiths. Since Christianity first spread in the cities, this was true more of the rural than the urban population. It has also been held that the term was adopted because of the contrast between the regular soldier and the raw rustic. Pagans were civilians in contrast to the "soldiers of Christ."

The term "pagan" is now applied to one who does not belong to one of the great monotheistic faiths. In contrast to "heathen"* it implies a disinterested rather than a hostile point of view.
                                                          C.T.C.

pageants: See religious drama.

pagoda: See temples, Far Eastern.

Paine, Thomas: (1737-1809) American pamphleteer of English birth, whose radical views on politics and religion found expression in Common Sense (1776), The Crisis (1776-83), The Rights of Man (1791-92), and The Age of Reason (1794-95). The last, a repudiation of the Bible and institutional Christianity, evoked violent controversy. Although he has been popularly regarded as an atheist, Paine's position was essentially deistic.   L.W.C.

Palace school: Next to the monastical schools of a monastery, to the cathedral schools attached to the cathedral church at a bishop's seat, the episcopal schools, supported by some bishop, the capitular schools, maintained by the bishop's council the capitulum, the Middle Ages produced another type of school also: the palace school, schola palatina. This school usually was the foundation of the royal family itself or one of the great magnates of the country. Great fame was obtained by the palace school of Charlemagne at Aix-la-Chapelle (Aachen) in which children of the Frankish nobility received instruction. At this school Alcuin,* the famous monk from York, England, served as master of the school. See Theodulf of Orleans; Warnefrid, Paul. Cf. magister sacri palatii.   s.c.t.

Palestrina: See s.v. mass; motet; requiem.

Paley, William: (1743-1805) A British moralist who made a most important contribution to ethical literature, namely, the statement of the doctrine of "theological Utilitarianism" in such clear, vigorous style and in such an unmistakable form. He respected the Scripture as a means of enforcing, by sufficient sanctions, known rules of morality evident through natural reason; and not as a means of bringing new principles to man's attention. In his Natural Theology (1802) he developed the famous analogy of the watchmaker (the design argument was common in the 18th century): God, the superhuman watchmaker has fashioned the machine of the world Traces of an Intelligent Maker are in evidence in the structure of the world.

See God, Tucker, Abraham; Utilitarianism, theological.

His works include Natural Theology; Evidences of Christianity (1794); Horae Paulinae; Moral and Political Philosophy (1785); Sermons on Several Subjects; Sermons on Public Occasions; Clergyman's Companion.   w.g.h.

palimpsest: A parchment manuscript from which the writing has faded or been erased, and on which some other text has been subsequently written. The Codex Ephraemi Rescriptus (at Paris) and the Old Syriac Gospels (at Mt. Sinai) are examples. See manuscripts of the Bible.   e.j.g.

pall: (Lat., pallium, cover, cloak) A cloth, usually of linen and inclosing a cardboard, to cover the chalice during Mass; also a black cloth spread over the coffin in church at a funeral, or over the catafalque.   L.R.W.

pallium: (Lat., cloak) In the Roman Catholic church a badge of jurisdiction conferred by the pope on archbishops, conventionalized into a circular band of white wool with pendants.   B.S.E.

Palm Sunday: The Sunday before Easter. At Jerusalem in the fourth century Christians met on the Mount of Olives and, carrying palm branches, escorted the bishop into the city in commemoration of the event described in the Gospels (especially John 12:12ff). The practice of similar processions spread generally and gave the name to the Sunday. Cf. church year.   B.S.E.

Palmer, Benjamin Morgan: (1818-1902) First Moderator, Presbyterian Church, U. S., 1861. Pastor, First Church, New Orleans, 1856 onward. Instrumental in establishing Southwestern, Presbyterian college, now at Memphis. Destroyed infamous Louisiana lottery.   A.C.

Palmer, Christian David Friedrich: (1811-1875) He was professor in Tübingen. As a mediating theologian he did his best in developing the means of influence for the church.

Evangelische Homiletik (Stuttgart, 1842, 6 ed., Stuttgart, 1887); Katechetik (Stuttgart, 1844, 6 ed., Stuttgart, 1875); Pädagogik (Stuttgart, 1852, 5 ed., Stuttgart, 1882); Hymnologie (Stuttgart, 1865).
                                              H.H.

Palmer, George Herbert: (1842-1933) Harvard U. 1864, U. of Tübingen 1867-1869, Andover Seminary 1870. Tutor in Greek, Harvard U.

1870-1873, instructor, prof. philosophy 1873-1889, Alford Professor natural religion, moral philosophy and civil polity 1889-1913, overseer Harvard U. 1913-1919. An unsurpassed exemplar of the theory and practice of the art of teaching, disciplined and proficient in the field of philosophy and ethics, a resolute protagonist of Christian theism and a devoted member of the church of the Pilgrims, "Glorious old Palmer," as William James called him, exerted a wide and constructive influence in the sphere of religious thought in America.

Author: The Odyssey: A Translation (1891), The Glory of the Imperfect (1898), The Field of Ethics (1901); The Nature of Goodness (1904), The Life and Works of George Herbert (1906), 3 vols; The Life of Alice Freeman Palmer (1908), The Teacher (1908), The Problem of Freedom (1911), Intimations of Immortality in the Sonnets of Shakespeare (Ingersoll Lecture) (1911), Formative Types of English Poetry (Earl Lectures) (1918), Altruism (1919); The Autobiography of a Philosopher (1903).

J.W.B.

panentheism: (Gr. pan, all; en, in; theos, god) The view that all things are within the being of God, who yet is not merely the whole of actual things. If God were merely the system of actual things, then, should a different system be possible, it would be possible that God should not exist, or should not be himself. Hence either God must be a purely contingent being, and anything might happen to him, including his destruction, or all things, just as they are, are necessary. On either construction God and other things are upon the same metaphysical level, whether of pure contingency or of pure necessity. Panentheism holds, on the contrary, that the self-identity of God is independent of the particular things which exist and the particular totality they form, and that consequently God may exist necessarily, although all other beings exist contingently. God exists, to be sure, in a different state for every difference in the existing whole, for he is that whole, but it is a different state of the same being, or of the whole as having a flexible selfhood, the individual essence of which is unaffected by the accidents of existence. This makes the inclusive whole analogous to a human personality, which contains many things not essential to its self-identity. A man is the sum of things which fall within his experience, but he is more than that sum, and many an item could have been missing (or have been replaced by another) without making his self-identity impossible. Panentheism claims to reconcile the legitimate motives of ordinary pantheism* (God is simply the de facto—or the eternal—whole of things) and the contrary extreme (things other than God are in no way parts of his being). Panentheism admits that there is in God something independent of particulars, but holds that this something is merely the "essence" of God whose entire nature includes also accidents, each of which is the integration of all the accidental being in a given state of the universe. Panentheism sees in God not just another example of whole or totality, unity in multiplicity, but the supreme and most excellent example, as He is the most excellent example of "goodness," "knowledge," and other conceptions. This supreme example as such deserves to be interpreted with care, and not (as commonly happens) according to casual associations, of such words as "all," "universe," "whole," "parts."

The earliest clear-cut panentheism (though without use of the term) seems to have been that of Fechner. The theological views of Montague and Whitehead are recent examples. See God as Personal; omniscience; pantheism; perfection; transcendence.

G. T. Fechner, Zendavesta (1851) Chapter 11; W. P. Montague, The Ways of Things (1940) Chapter 6, A N Whitehead, Process and Reality (1929), last chapter, V Ferm's article, Panentheism, in the Dictionary of Philosophy (1941), ed by D Runes panlogism: (Gr., pan, all; logos, word) Describes Hegel's* doctrine, "the real is the rational, the rational the real", hence logic (theory of thinking) coincides with ontology (theory of being).

C.H.

C.H.

panobjectivism: See epistemology.

panpsychism: (Gr., pan, all; psyche, soul) The view, closely related to ancient hylozoism, sponsored by such thinkers as Bruno, Leibniz, Fechner, Lotze Renouvier, W. K. Clifford, C. A. Strong, J. Ward, and C. Hartshorne, that all of reality is constituted by psychic unities so graded in perceptive quality and purposive organization as to explain inorganic, organic, and human phenomena. See Leibniz, monadology; ontology.

J. Ward, The Realm of Ends 3rd ed (1920); C. Hartshorne Man's Vision of God (1941)

P.A.B.

Pantaenus: The earliest of the masters of the Christian Catechetical School at Alexandria of whom we have any knowledge Flourished ca. 200 A.D. The teacher of Clement of Alexandria.* Said by Eusebius to have made a missionary journey to India. See Alexandrian school.

S.M.G.

pantheism: (Gr., pan, all, theos, god) The doctrine that the universe, the all of reality, is God. Unless further defined, the doctrine is exceedingly vague. What sort of unity and character has the cosmic whole which is equated with God? Is it a growing or a forever-fixed totality (see eternity)? Is it conscious? Do the parts possess freedom in relation to the whole, or the whole in relation to the parts? To which of the parts is the whole most analogous in character? Such questions are not answered by the mere identification of universe (in some sense) with God (in some sense). Confusion must result, therefore, from the employment of the term (without careful qualification) as synonym for an "impersonal" God, as though the universe as a whole could not possibly possess personality, or for the absence of freedom in man, as though a whole must coercively control its parts; or for sin and ignorance on God's part, as though properties of parts may automatically be ascribed to their wholes, so that, for example, a small part would mean a small whole! Such usages are attempts to smuggle highly controversial doctrines into the mere definition of a term in common use.

The phrase, "all is God," has two chief meanings, according as we construe the "all." 1) The totality of actual being, just as it stands, is simply God. In that case, God is completely bound by actuality, and actuality is completely bound by God. (See transcendence.) Neither God nor anything else has an identity distinguishable from that of other things, all is simply one and one is simply all. This view does indeed deny personality to God, and indeed it denies all definite character to anything, contradicting freedom, making it impossible to absolve God from responsibility for evil, at the same time making man as necessary to all the good in the world, and so by implication as much its creator, as God (there being no degrees of necessity). Spinoza's* philosophy is the classic example of this type of pantheism.

2) The totality of actual being and of potential being, this totality viewed as having a "flexible self-identity" independent of its actual parts, is God On this view, actuality is not an eternally fixed sum but a variable, and God is the being who alone preserves his essential self-hood no matter what else may or may not be actual, or who has enjoyed and will enjoy "himself" at all times whatever. Not that God is in all respects the same no matter what his parts may be, but that he is in all cases the same individual, as a man (though here not in all circumstances) is the same person through the variety of his experiences. On this view there is an individual essence of God which is not identical with the whole of actuality, nor is any actual thing part of this essence; even though God as a whole, essence and accidents, is the same as actuality as a whole. (See transcendence.) This second form of pantheism is better called panentheism.* The first form might be called "traditional" pantheism, since it is usually, though perhaps not often clearly and unambiguously, intended by the term. See David of Dinant; immanence, omniscience, perfect; theism; Toland.

Wm. James, A Pluralistic Universe (1909) ; W. P. Montague, The Ways of Things (1940) ; B. Varisco, Know Thyself (1915).   C.H.

Pao-p'o Tzŭ: See Chinese Terminology.

papacy: See pope.

papal bull: See bull, papal; encyclicals.

papal constitutions: See bulls and briefs; encyclicals.

papal legates: See legates and nuncios.

papal nuncio: See legates and nuncios, papal.

Papal States: The historical aspect of the Papal States is intimately connected with the moral and juridical rights of the popes,* as Bishops of Rome, to possess properties and lands lawfully acquired and to rule over the peoples inhabiting them as their temporal rulers and sovereign lords. That bishops in general, like other heads of organizations, ecclesiastical or political, needed funds to administer their dioceses properly, support the clergy, take care of the poor, etc., seems self-evident and is based on apostolic tradition. (Selection of Judas e.g. as treasurer of the Apostolic College; institution of the first seven deacons, etc.) Like other bishops, the popes of Rome also received properties and lands through pious donations, legacies, etc. from rich benefactors such as opulent private individuals, royal families, princes, (often in satisfaction for their sins), rulers and emperors, especially in Sicily and Dalmatia. All such lands became known in history, especially since the days of Pope Gregory I, the Great, (590-604)* as the "Patrimonium Petri." Eventually they embraced a stretch of land running crosswise across Italy from the Adriatic on the East to the Tyrrenian Sea on the West. Eventually also, as in feudal days, whole kingdoms became vassals of the Holy See with the Pope as Sovereign Lord, e.g. Naples, Apulia, Calabria, and even England and Ireland, etc. Chief among such donors to the Holy See were Constantine* (the "Constantinian Donation")* however as a document is an admittedly forged document of the early Middle Ages), Pepin, the Short ("Donation of Pepin") and Charlemagne.* The two last named Merivingian kings had responded to the appeals of the popes when they were molested by the Greeks (Exarchates of Ravenna as representatives of the Byzantine Emperors) and the Lombards. The pious kings not only came to the rescue of the popes but likewise gave them the lands which they conquered. With the founding of the Holy Roman German Empire* in 800 A.D. under Charlemagne* and Pope Leo III, the popes retained the right to their possessions and the German King as crowned Emperor was merely looked upon as the protector of the Papal States, as their illustrious predecessors had been who first protected the papal lands and then augmented them. Unfortunately later German Emperors had a wrong conception of their position; but this did not alter matters and the popes persistently protested against their usurpations and violations of trust. As temporal rulers the popes administered their lands through lay and clerical officials or through certain organizations which during the late Renaissance began to be known as "Roman Congregations" instituted as well for the spiritual care of the Church as for the temporal administration of the Papal States. The papacy reached the height of its glory as a political organization under Papal State Status and ecclesiastical prestige in virtue of the Primacy under Innocent III (1198-1216).* In virtue of the "Golden Bull" of 1213, Innocent was declared to be in possession of the Patrimonium Petri; of the March of Ancona; the Duchy of Spoleto; the bequest of Mathilda, countess of Tuscany; the exarchate of Ravenna and the Pentapolis (Rimini, Pesaro, Fano, Sinigalia and Ancona). Due to encroachments or threats of exploitation, especially by German emperors (Frederick I, Frederick II), French and Spanish rulers (Francis I; Philip IV; Charles V, etc.), and fears of Turkish invasions, during the Renaissance period especially, the popes were frequently, for the sake of self-protection and preservation of their rights and estates, obliged to enter into treaties with neighboring Italian Republics (Pisa, Genoa, Venice, Florence, etc.) or other European countries, sharing with them their gains and losses. To prevent or punish encroachments on the Papal States the popes, furthermore, often made use of ecclesiastical censures such as excommunications and interdicts, e.g. in regard to Venice by Pope Paul V. During the so-called Babylonian Captivity (1308-78) at Avignon* the authority over the Papal States was usurped at times by petty rebels (e.g. Cola di Riense, the "Roman Tribune" etc.). Only Cardinal Albornoz, by use of stringent measures was able to restore peace and bring order out of chaos. Despite the occasional tendency of the Papal States to break up into petty states and independent cities (e.g. Pesaro in charge of the Malatesta and Ferrara under the Este Family) Cesare Borgia, by the end of the XV century was able to unite once more the Church's lands. Julius II (1503-1513) completed the work begun by the Borgias. From 1500 onward the Papal States hardly changed their boundaries, excepting for the re-acquisition of Umbria, Pesaro and Ferrara, and the loss to the Farnese Family (due to nepotism of Paul III, 1545) of the valuable Parma and Piacenza territories. Although the sovereignty of the Papal States was repeatedly attacked and threatened, the worst defeat came at the hands of Napoleon I, who at one time (despite the Concordats of 1801 and 1806) annexed all the Papal States (including the Comtat Venaissin around Avignon) to his empire, only to see them restored practically in their entirety at the Congress of Vienna, 1815 through the dextrous manipulations of Cardinal Consalvi. Thereafter the Papal States enjoyed a new lease on life until 1860 when all of the States, excepting the Patrimony, joined in the rebellion for independence. In 1870 under the guise of national unity, which Pius IX* was willing to grant, plus Parliamentary representation under himself as traditional head, already in the very first years of his pontificate (1846-1878) the anti-clerical forces of Piedmont and Sardinia, aroused for decades by such leaders as Cavour and Mazzini and led by Garabaldi, broke through the walls of Rome, Sept. 20, 1870 and taking the city, declared Victor Emmanuel I the first King of United Italy. Pope Pius IX refused to recognize the usurpation and rejected the proferred indemnities and guarantees, as well for his own person as for the Church. From that time on the popes became the voluntary "prisoners of the Vatican." The same policy of aloofness which created the "Roman Question" was retained by Popes Leo XIII, Pius X and Benedict XV, although during the latter's pontificate, especially after the First World War, a more friendly rapprochement was discernable. Pope Pius XI* finally solved the "Roman Question" when in the name of the Holy See Cardinal Pietro Gasparri, and Signor Benito Mussolini, as representative of the King and of the Italian Government, signed the Lateran Treaty Feb. 11, 1929, thus founding the Vatican City and placing it together with other papal property in and around the city of Rome (e.g. the Lateran Palace, Castel Gandolfo, summer home of the Popes on Lake Albano, etc.) under direct papal sovereignty and administration. With the subsequent signing of the Concordat between the Holy See and Italy, diplomatic relations were established for the first time. By the Lateran Treaty the Pope was made as independent as he ever was, but was now no longer encumbered by his predecessor's temporal cares, excepting in as far as they concern the 110 acres of Vatican City and adjoining properties. Cath. Encyc. XIV, 257-268.   R M.H.

Papias of Hierapolis: Author of a five-volume Exposition of the Lord's Oracles, small fragments of which—notably concerning the Gospels of Matthew and Mark—are known by quotations from Eusebius (H. E. iii, 39). The exact nature of this lost work has been the subject of much controversy. Next to nothing of his life is known. According to Eusebius he was bishop of Hierapolis. Irenæus calls him a companion of Polycarp. The dates of his birth and death are not known. Perhaps the most probable date of his literary activity is ca. 150 A D. The extant fragments of his writings, together with such early notices of his life and views as have survived, are conveniently assembled (in Greek and English translation) in J. H. Lightfoot, The Apostolic Fathers (1889, 1890), 5 vols., 2nd ed. See also logia.   M.S.E.

papyrus, papyri: A water plant, most abundant in Egypt, where among other uses a writing material was very early developed out of the pith of its triangular stem. The green rind was cut away and the pith cut into thin slices, which were laid side by side to form a sheet ten or twelve inches square. Over this another layer of strips was laid at right angles, and the whole was dried and pressed together. Such sheets were then glued or pasted together into rolls, which in Egyptian mortuary texts were sometimes 150 feet long, but among the Greeks were usually not more than 25 to 30 feet. The Greeks called papyrus "biblos" and a roll of it a "biblion."* Only one side of the roll was ordinarily used, and that was smoothed with pumice. Papyrus was the regular material used in the publication of books in Greek antiquity. In the second century after Christ leaf books of papyrus began to come into use, especially for Christian texts, including the Greek version of the OT.

The discovery of great numbers of Greek papyrus documents of private life, from the fourth century before Christ to the seventh after Christ, in various places in Egypt, in the course of archeological excavations in the past fifty years, has revealed the fact that the NT was written in the familiar colloquial, not the literary, Greek of its day, and this has led to the large number of modern speech translations, which seek to translate the NT in the style in which it was written. See koiné; manuscripts of the Bible.

                                                                         E.J.G.

parable: (From the Greek word parabole, "a placing beside," or a "comparison") This was commonly used in the LXX* to translate the Hebrew maschal (comparison). In the OT it is used of proverbial expressions (I Sam. 10.12) as well as illustrative stories (II Sam. II, 1f). The so-called "Parables of Enoch"* (40-71) get their name from the use of symbolic speech. Strictly speaking, a parable is an expansion of a simile as an allegory* is an expansion of a metaphor. It is not an illustration, but the lesson is to be transferred from one realm of experience to another.

See article by A. Jülicher in Encyclopedia Biblica; the best book on the parables of Jesus is that by B. T. D. Smith, The Parables of the Synoptic Gospels (1937).   C.T.C.

Paracelsus: (1493-1541) Translated name from the German von Hohenheim (Aureolus Theophrastus). A native of Switzerland. One of the initiators of modern natural science. Outstanding physician who combines observation with theory. Chief work· Opus Paramirum (Muhlhausen, 1562). Although lost in astrological, alchemistic and theological speculations, his naturalistic approach to the "mysterium magnum" of the world makes him an influential figure in the history of thought.   s.c T.

paraclete: A term applied in the Fourth Gospel to the holy Spirit, though in the First Epistle of John it is also used of Christ himself. It means literally "called to one's side," for the purpose of assistance, and thus corresponds exactly to the Latin "advocatus." In the newer versions of the NT it is generally translated "Advocate," but this unduly narrows its meaning. It implies not merely intercessory help but help of every kind, and the old rendering "Comforter" is still the best one, when taken in its original sense of "strengthener."   E.F.S.

paradise: (from Old Pers. pairidaēza, Gr. paradessos, enclosure, park) The Garden of Eden of Gen. 2f. Then, figuratively, a state of bliss. So, Heaven,* the abode of righteous souls.   S.H.B.

paralipomenon: Anything omitted or neglected; the plural, paraleipomena is the title given in the Greek version of the OT to the Books of Chronicles,* as containing matters not included in the Books of Kings.   E.J.G.

parament: (Lat, parare, to prepare) Ornamental hangings, furniture, etc., as of a state apartment; rich and elegant robes worn by men of rank,— chiefly in the plural. (obsolete). The presence chamber of a monarch.   F.T.P.

parapsychology: Being a recently emerged branch of psychology, it investigates the psychical and the psychophysical phenomena of mediums such as telepathy, visions and apparitions, monitions, premonitions, automatic writing and other forms of automatism, facts of psychometry, coincidental dreams, states of impersonation, clairvoyance and clairaudience, predictions, the physical phenomena of mediumship, such as materialization, telekinesis, rapping and other sounds. While the number of parapsychic phenomena scientifically established is still restricted, most investigators in the field consider the reality of all or most of the paranormal phenomena as possible of scientific verification. Fichte, Schelling, Baader, Hegel and other romantics shared the recognition of parapsychic manifestations. With the success of materialism and the scientific world view, the German and French parapsychical studies gradually fell into oblivion. Interest in occult phenomena was revived by representatives of the speculative theistic current in German philosophy. About the middle of the last century a new extra-scientific movement, spiritism, set in. The movement originated in America and was transplanted to Europe. It has been fashionable for mechanistic scientists to deny the reality of mediumistic phenomena.

It seems that parapsychic phenomena are almost completely neutral as far as religious meanings are concerned since they suggest to people with different cultural and personal backgrounds either divine or biological and completely impersonal dynamic forces. It is generally felt that the psychology of religion* and parapsychology are essentially separate and unrelated topics. One possible exception is James Leuba's The Psychology of Mysticism wherein he attributes mystical phenomena to sensory disorders. Religious interpretations of paranormal phenomena are, however, perfectly legitimate. But most religious experiences involve no paranormal phenomena. Some paranormal phenomena have religious significance to the individuals who experience them. The Proceedings of the London Society for Psychical Research* constitute by far the best source of scientific material in studying the relationship between religion and paranormal phenomena. See Oesterreich, T. K.

A. Beyer, Religion and Suggestion (Halle, 1922); W. J. Crawford, The Reality of Psychic Phenomena, (2 ed, London, 1919), Experiments in Psychical Science (London, 1919); The Psychic Structures of the Goligher Circle (London, 1920); Th Flournoy, Dès Indes a la Planète Mars (Geneve, 1909); F. Grunewald, Physikalisch-mediumistische Untersuchungen (Pfullingen, 1920), Graf H. Keyserling, Das Occulte (Darmstadt, 1923); M Kemmerich, Prophezeiungen, 3 ed., Munchen, 1921); A. F Ludwig, Geschichte der metapsychischen occulten Forschungen von der Antike bis zur Gegenwart (Pfullingen, 1922); T. K. Oesterreich, Grundbegriffe der Parapsychologie (Pfullingen, 1921); Occultism and Modern Science (London, 1923); J B Rhine, New Frontiers of the Mind (1937); Ch. Richet, Traité de Metapsychique, (2 ed, Paris, 1923); Baron v. Schrenck-Notzing, Phenomena of Materialization (1920); R. Tischner, Telepathy und Hellsehen, (2 ed., Munchen, 1921).   H.H.

pardon: In Catholic ecclesiastical use, an indulgence,* or the day or festival when this is granted. Otherwise equals forgiveness* (Gr., aphesis, most common NT word); three words in OT all rendered by both English words in A.V. (e.g. 'pardon' in Isa. 55.7 same in original as 'forgiveness' in Psa. 130.4).

P. Lehmann, Forgiveness: Decisive Issue in Protestant Thought (1940).   J.L.

Pareto, Vilfredo: (1848-1923) With Ludwig Feuerbach and Sigmund Freud Pareto shares in contributing to the conception of religion as wishful thinking. He was wholly destitute of sympathy for, or interest in religion, except in so far as he discovered religious phenomena to be social facts. They merely reflect for him the influence of group interests. Being a purely external critic of religion, his biting attack on all religion and metaphysics is unreasonable.

The Mind and Society (1935), vols 4.   H.H.

parish: Normally, the area or district within which a regularly installed pastor or priest rightfully exercises the pastoral office.   A.E.R.

Parjanya: A minor Vedic deity of storm and fertility. Some scholars regarded him as one of the Adityas. In the hymn to Parjanya, Rig-Veda V. 83, he is addressed in terms almost identical with those addressed to Varuna.   C.S.B.

Park, Edwards Amasa: (1808-1900) Theologian, was born in Providence, R. I. and was a son of Calvin and Abigail Ware Park. He graduated from Brown University in 1826 and from Andover Theological Seminary in 1831, after which he was pastor in Braintree, Mass. till 1835. After teaching for a year at Amherst he became in 1836, Professor of Sacred Rhetoric at Andover and in 1847 was transferred to the Abbott chair of Sacred Theology in which he remained for the rest of his active life.

Park was an exponent of the "New England Theology,"* a modified form of Calvinism* which he had formulated into a rigid system, which he persistently taught to the exclusion of all modern religious thought. He was the last teacher of Calvinism at Andover. He resigned his professorship in 1881, but spent the remainder of his life at Andover, laboring to perfect his system, which however, was never published.

He edited and translated Selections from German Literature (1839), he was co-editor and editor of the Bibliotheca Sacra (1844-1884); editor of the Atonement, by various authors (1859), co-editor of The Sabbath Hymn Book (1858), author, Discourses on Some Theological Doctrines (1885). A Memorial Collection of his sermons was published posthumously in 1902. See Congregationalism; New England theology.

Dictionary of Am. Biography, v. 14, p. 204; Congreg. Yr. Bk., 1901, p. 35.   F.T.P.

Parker, Theodore: (1810-1860) American preacher and theologian, introduced German Biblical criticism and idealistic philosophy into Unitarian thought. Andrews Norton, a Unitarian of the Channing* school, described Parker's abandonment of supernaturalism for idealistic monism as "the latest form of infidelity"; but Parker's influence (along with Emerson's) dominated Unitarianism* in the next generation.   W.M.H.

Parmenides (c. 470 B.C.) Ancient Greek philosopher, Eleatic,* classical exponent of extreme monism. Reality for him is Being (corporeal and material) filling all space, remaining constant in quantity, without beginning or end (early expression of the law of the conservation of mass). Creation is impossible since something cannot arise from nothing, change is impossible since whatever is cannot be different from what it is. Appearances are illusions (multiplicity, time, space, change). True being is thought, the one unchanging reality. His famous pupil, Zeno of Elea* developed an apologetic of this block-reality philosophy by his famous paradoxes.   V.F.

parochial schools: A parochial school is here defined as a school, ordinarily at the elementary level, conducted by a religious group, for the purpose of general as well as religious education.* Roman Catholic parochial schools* are the most familiar, but several other religious bodies in the United States have, or have had, schools of this nature.

Prior to the American Revolution the Dutch, Moravians, Mennonites, German Lutheran, German Reformed, Quakers, Presbyterians, and Baptists held the conception that education was the responsibility of the church, and in the middle colonies parochial schools were the usual type.

With the gradual establishment of common schools there came also the secularization of public education. Many Protestant bodies debated whether to go with the tide as far as general education was concerned and rely on religious instruction in Sunday School and home, or to establish a system of parochial schools. The "Old School" Presbyterians* chose to experiment with the latter alternative, in 1846 the Assembly formally adopted a policy looking toward the establishment of a parochial school in every congregation, under the care of the Session, for all branches of elementary education, including religion. At least 264 Presbyterian parochial schools were established in 29 states, many being financially aided by the Presbyterian Board of Education. But the system never was popular, it met with numerous difficulties, especially since public systems of education were coming increasingly into favor; and it was formally abandoned as a denominational policy in 1870.

The Lutherans have concerned themselves with elementary education throughout their history in the United States. Their work in this respect falls into two periods. First: beginning in early Colonial days, in eastern colonies and states, several Synods pushed educational work which reached a peak about 1830, by that time some 400 schools had been established. In the second period, reaching to the present, school systems were established by the German Synods of Ohio, Missouri, Wisconsin, Iowa, Minnesota Michigan and Buffalo; by the Norwegian Synods; by the Augustana Swedish, and by Danish and Slovak Synods. By the end of the nineteenth century, Lutheran parochial schools exceeded 2500 in number. At present, Lutheran parochial schools are found principally in the Lutheran Synodical Conference, i.e., the Missouri, Joint Wisconsin, Norwegian and Slovak Synods and the Negro Missions. Chief among these is the system of parochial, or "Christian Day Schools," of the Missouri Synod, in 1942, with 3601 congregations, they report 1241 parochial schools, using 2248 teachers and enrolling 71,068 pupils.

Most of the teachers are men, called and installed in permanent positions. There is a carefully developed curriculum, with religion holding the leading place. (See Missouri Lutherans).

The Christian Reformed Church has a system of "Christian Schools." In this body much stress has been laid on the educational implications of the covenant of grace. They maintain 91 schools (1942), using 145 male teachers and 327 female, and enrolling 14,814 pupils.

The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints ("Mormons") have given much attention to developing a system of education in which the teaching of their faith might have its desired place, but accurately speaking they do not maintain parochial schools. In the present program "Institutes of Religion" are established in connection with colleges, 93 "Seminaries" are associated with Senior High Schools, and 385 "Junior Seminaries" are associated with Junior High Schools. These three types of institution, functioning chiefly in the Rocky Mountain states, offer courses in religion. In Juarez stake, (Mexico), the five elementary schools that are maintained might be called 'Parochial.'

The orthodox section of the Jewish group in the United States is said to have some 30 parochial schools in New York City, and a quite small number in other cities. These schools are called Yeshivah (Sing.) or Yeshivoth (Plu.). Some of them devote half the day to teaching Hebrew and religious subjects, the remainder to English and secular subjects. Others are private "progressive schools," interweaving Hebrew and religious subjects into the regular schedule. See catechumenate.

W. H. Beck, Lutheran Elementary Schools in the United States, (1939); The Corner Stone of the Christian School [Christian Reformed] (1934); E. P. Cubberley, Public Education in the United States (1919); General Course of Study for Lutheran Elementary Schools (1943); L. D. S Department of Education Bulletin No. 1, 1937-38, L. J. Sherrill, Presbyterian Parochial Schools 1846-1870 (1932).

L.J.S.

parochial schools, Catholic: This is the name usually given to the system of schools, primary and secondary, conducted under the auspices of Roman Catholic parochial or diocesan supervision. Although elementary Roman Catholic church-schools were founded in the regions of the present United States under the Spanish dominions as early as 1629, the special quality of parish support which we now associate with the parochial school system of the United States was found only in the English speaking settlements where Roman Catholics were a minority and were without state support. The usual history of the beginnings of the Catholic parochial schools, before the rise of large Catholic urban populations, consisted first of weekly religious instruction by the missionary and, then, when numbers permitted, of schools taught by Catholic laymen or laywomen; as soon as growth permitted the support of two or three teachers, religious sisterhoods or brotherhoods took over the teaching in the parochial establishments. In recent times in larger communities the formal parochial schools have frequently been begun with the foundation of the parish. The establishment of high schools frequently followed, chiefly in the larger centers of Catholic population and especially since 1900. Many private academies and colleges, under the direction of religious communities have supplemented the parochial arrangement, and in 1889 the Catholic University of America was founded at Washington, D. C. to unify and complete the system.

The provision of such religious instruction has always been a special interest of the Catholic hierarchy from colonial times. The First Provincial Council of Baltimore* in 1829 ordered the establishment of schools where religious instruction could be joined with instruction in "letters." Subsequent provincial councils of Baltimore reiterated this command and at the same time gave witness to a constant growth in the number of Catholic elementary schools where support could be obtained. The efforts to obtain state aid for the schools were unsuccessful and in some places, such as New York in 1842, caused outbreaks of anti-Catholicism. The First Plenary Council of Baltimore in 1852 begged the bishops to see that church schools be established and, if necessary, to use church funds for that purpose. The Second Plenary Council in 1866 added a plea to the parents to cooperate with the pastors in founding such schools. In 1875 the Sacred Congregation of the Propaganda in Rome, in a special "Instruction to the Bishops of the United States," classified the non-sectarian public schools as dangerous unless safeguards to the faith of the children were added, and urged the founding and fostering of Catholic schools. The Third Plenary Council of Baltimore in 1884, while admitting that many Catholic children must attend the public schools, ordered a school to be established within two years near each church unless the bishop allowed a postponement. The Council insisted on the obligation of Catholic parents to provide Catholic education for their children.

At the present time, while the parochial school is ordinarily under the supervision of the pastor the instruction is carried on by religious communities especially devoted to such work or by the clergy, assisted where circumstances require it by lay persons. The parish schools are in turn under the supervision of a diocesan superintendent or diocesan examiners appointed by the bishop. Some of these schools, especially high schools, are supported and directed by several parishes acting jointly or under the direct supervision of the bishop. Private academies and colleges are usually directed and owned by religious communities, although the seminaries devoted to the education of the secular clergy and some other diocesan institutions are directly under episcopal supervision. The Catholic University of America is a pontifical institution with the rector appointed by the Pope, but is under the general supervision of the hierarchy of the United States according to a definite constitution. The number of Roman Catholic parochial educational establishments in the United States according to the Census of Re- ligious Bodies in 1936 was 6,825 with 65,001 officers and teachers and 2,095,254 scholars.

James A Burns, The Growth and Development of the Catholic School System in the United States (1912) , James A Burns, The Principles, Origin, and Establishment of the Catholic School System in the United States (1908) ; National Catholic Education Association Bulletin (Washington, D. C. 1904 ff).   T.T.M.

parousia: The return of Christ in glory. The word means literally "presence" or "coming," and in Greek usage of the first century was often applied to a royal entry. This is the significance which it bears in the N T. Christ, who on earth had appeared a man like others, will manifest himself hereafter in his true character of Messiah.* This will be, not his "Second Coming," but in the full sense his "Coming." See redemption.   E.F.S.

parsimony, law of: A principle of scientific thinking and one which should be kept in mind in all thinking, viz., new phenomena should be explained in the simplest terms, by the already known in place of adding new terms or new concepts. William of Ockham* formulated this law: entia non sunt multiplicanda praeter necessitatem. The rule is sometimes called Ockham's razor, i.e., shaving down entities to the fewest in number and the simplest terms.   V.F.

Parsism and Parsees: Parsism is also known as the religion of Zoroaster, whose original home was Pars or Persia. See India, religions of; Persia, religions of; Zoroastrianism. See also bibliography under Mazdaism.   H.H.

Particular or Calvinistic Baptists: See Baptists.

Pārvatī: A Hindu goddess of the Shivite school, one of the consorts of Shiva;* a gentle, beautiful, attractive figure in contrast to Kali.*   C.S.B.

Pascal, Blaise: (1623-1662) French mathematician and natural scientist, who turned to mysticism under the influence of the Jansenists of Port Royal. His Pensées sur la religion, a famous document of devotional literature, rejects rationalism and expresses the conviction that the heart or will is the means of discovering God. The Pensées were published in garbled form in 1670; a somewhat better edition appeared in 1776, edited by Condorcet, and a new edition from the original manuscript was brought out in 1844 by A. P. Faugère. Brunschvicg's is a standard modern edition.

His Provinciales (1657), written anonymously in defense of Antoine Arnauld of the Sorbonne against the Jesuits, were of high literary excellence. See mysticism; supernaturalism. Cf. probabilism.   J.E.N.

Pascendi Dominici Gregis, Encyclical of Pope Pius X, Sept. 8, 1907: See modernism; Pius X, Pope.

The Encyclical will be found in Acta Sanctae Sedis (1907), vol. 40, 593-650. Cf. Kirchl. Handlexikon (München, 1912), II, 1345.   R.M.H.

paschal candle: In the Roman Catholic liturgy a very large candle, lighted with solemn ceremonies the day before Easter and kept burning at service time until Ascension Day.*   B.S.E.

paschal lamb: (Paschal is an adj. from the Gr. form pascha of the Hebr. pesah, passover.) In origin probably a pastoral sacrifice, then brought into connection with the Exodus—a lamb (or kid —Ex. 12.5), slaughtered, cooked and eaten, its blood sprinkled on the doorposts to ward off evil. Later applied symbolically to Jesus. See Passover.   S.H.B.

paschal season: See church year cycle.

Passavant, William Alfred: (1821-1894) Pioneer in American home missions, of a wealthy, cultured family, originally Burgundians, who had settled near Pittsburgh Pa., he is known for his benevolence, editorial work and as the founder of orphanages in Zelienople and Rochester, Pa., and of hospitals at Pittsburgh, Chicago Milwaukee and Jacksonville, Ill. He studied philanthropic efforts in England and Germany and persuaded Pastor Fliedner of the Kaiserwerth Deaconess School to come to the U. S. A. with four deaconesses* in 1849. Passavant planned to establish schools for training institutional workers. He was instrumental in establishing the Lutheran orphanages in Germantown, Pa., Mt. Vernon, N. Y., and Boston, Mass., and the Emigrant House on State Street, New York City.   A.S.

passion: (Lat., passie, from pati, to suffer) Term applied to the sufferings of Christ and his atoning death upon the cross; and by extension, to the sufferings of the martyrs.

Passion Sunday is the fifth Sunday in Lent,* and Passion Week the week preceding Holy Week. The period of two weeks from Passion Sunday to the eve of Easter is called Passiontide.

The long lections from the Gospels in Holy Week are technically termed Passions.   P.V.N.

passion music: The solemn chanting of the story of the passion, begun by the eighth century, had by the twelfth been developed for the sacred ministers of the Mass* in the form and to the melodies now known. In Germany after the Reformation* the music* was separated from the liturgy * in this form it reached its culmination in Bach's St. Matthew Passion.   T.J.B.

A musical setting of the events of Holy Week. The passion grew from the medieval mystery play. The form was patterned after that of the motet or the oratorio. The most famous were those by Schütz, Handel, Bach, Haydn, and Beethoven, whose Mount of Olives is a passion.   E.H.B.

passion offices: Commemorations of the passion of Christ in the Canonical Offices, first developed for the Passionist Fathers c. 1775 and now widely used on the Fridays in Lent and at other times.   T.J.B.

passion plays: See religious drama.

Passionists: The common name for members of the Congregation of Barefooted Clerks of the Most Holy Cross and Passion of Our Lord Jesus Christ. This institute was founded in Rome in 1720 by St. Paul of the Gross, known in the world as Paul Francis Danei, a native of Genoa. His brother John was closely associated with him in the first organization of the institute. Its rules were approved by Pope Benedict XIV on May 15, 1741. Its purpose is twofold first, the sanctification of its members, and secondly, the sanctification of others. The idea of the founder was to unite in it the solitary life of the Carthusians* or Trappists with the active life of the Jesuits.* Its members are engaged in giving missions and retreats, doing parish work and carrying on foreign missionary work. The rule calls for recitation of the Office in choir, three fast days a week, and other austerities. They were introduced into England in 1841 and into the United States in 1852. Passionist nuns constitute a distinct group although founded under the direction of St. Paul of the Cross. They devote themselves to the contemplative life. There is also a second Order of Passionist nuns founded in England in 1850 which devote themselves to more active work.

T.T.M.

Passiontide: See church year cycle.

Passover: The name of a Hebrew festival—the translation of the Hebr. verb pasah, to skip or pass over, so named because of the tradition that the "destroyer" passed over the houses marked with the blood of the paschal lamb when he slew the first-born of Egypt (Ex. 12.21ff.). Pastoral in origin the festival may actually have been named for the "skipping" of lambs. But it came to be associated with the Exodus and in Canaan joined to itself the rites of an agricultural festival of Unleavened Bread.* It is still celebrated for 7 (8) days from the 14th of the first month (Nisan) as a memorial of the liberation of the Hebrews from Egyptian bondage. See Easter; Haggadah; Jewish religious festivals; sacramental meal; Seder.

S.H.B.

pastor: (Lat., shepherd) A Christian clergyman in charge of a congregation (Eph 4:11). The imagery is OT (Jer 2:8 RV, etc.) and perfectly natural in Christianity (John 21:15-17, compare John 10.7-16, etc.). See clergy.

B.S.E.

pastor aeternus: See pope; Vatican Council.

Pastoral Epistles: This inclusive title has been given, since the 18th century, to the three Epistles of First and Second Timothy and Titus, which are closely related to one another, and are addressed, not to communities, but to individual church leaders They deal, in the main, with subjects of a practical nature, church order and discipline, the selection of church officers, the character and duties of church members. Frequent mention is made of heresy, and one purpose of the Epistle, perhaps the chief one, is to safe-guard the church from the inroads of false teaching. The Epistles are written in the name of Paul, and are probably based on notes by him, which have been worked up into their present form by a later teacher.

W. Lock, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Pastoral Epistles (ICC, 1924), E F Scott, The Literature of the New Testament (1932).

E.F.S.

pastoral theology: A systematic study of the work of the minister, as pastor, in the light of Christian principles, and of all relevant experience.

A K.R.

Patarenes: A dualistic sect, originating in the Balkans, particularly in Bulgaria; in the twelfth century they became quite numerous in the Serbian territories now known as Bosnia-Herzegovina, where they became the predominant religious organization and where they survived till the Turkish conquest. This group is closely connected with the Bogomils* in Bulgaria. In northern Italy there appeared in the late twelfth and early thirteenth centuries a group of dualists known as Patarini; this name is commonly derived from Pattaria, a slum section of Milan. But on the theory that it represents a transplantation of the Patarenes from the Balkans, the name would more properly be traced to the latter group In the thirteenth century, the name was applied indiscriminately to all such dualistic heretics as the Cathari, Albigenses, and even other, non-dualistic groups as the Waldenses. Cf. Paulicians.

Matthew Spinka, A History of Christianity in th Balkans (1933).

M.S

paten: A plate, usually of precious metal, for the bread at the Communion service. See chalice.

B.S.E.

patience: That endurance of any evil, small or great, which is calm and self-controlled rather than dogged, peevish, defiant or cynical. It is a virtue in most religious ethics although it varies in accent from the passive, disciplined indifference of the East and the "apathy" of the Stoics* to its active Christian form of a glad perseverance in love and good works born of submission to the will of God and of trustful waiting in hope upon Him. Chrysostom called it the queen of the virtues.

R.W.F.

patriarch and patriarchate, ecclesiastical: High ranking ecclesiastical officer in R C. and Eastern churches, superior in authority to the metropolitans or archbishops. Patriarchate is territory over which he has jurisdiction. Name was applied on analogy of Jewish usage but in a somewhat general way in early days of growth of episcopacy.* Church organization followed model of civil government of Roman Empire, and bishops* of more important areas became metropolitans* as they assumed control over a group of dioceses. Certain of these metropolitans asserted authority over other metropolitans. The first to gain superior recognition were Alexandria, Antioch and Rome and to them were added Constantinople and Jerusalem. By 5th cent. these stood at head of the most important ecclesiastical provinces and from 8th or 9th cent. "patriarch" was official title of a definite rank in the hierarchy. Patriarch of Constantinople became head of Eastern Church and still retains primacy of honour among all Eastern Orthodox churches* except Bulgaria. Each national section of the Eastern Orthodox Church has its own patriarch also. In addition the "heretical" Eastern churches and the Uniate churches* have their separate patriarchs. Rome as the only patriarchate in the west had predominant position Bishop of Rome is both pope* and patriarch. See Holy Synod.   K H.C.

Patriarch, the: See Jeremiah II.

patriarchal system: While scattered traces of matriarchal* family organization appear in the OT, the patriarchal system prevailed in Israel from the very beginning of history It forms the background of the traditions, institutions, and mode of thinking of Israel. The family unit was the bet ab, the father's house (Gen. 38.11, Judg. 6.15, 1 Sam. 18.18). The clan is an extension of the family, as the tribe is an extension of the clan (1 Sam. 9.20-21, Judg. 18.1, 11, Num. 1.20-43). The whole nation is descended through the heads of the tribes from the patriarchs. The Priestly* writer traces the history of the entire human race to a common father, Adam. Eve herself was fashioned out of a rib taken from Adam's body. In his geneologies this writer deals exclusively with the men. The seventy nations descended from the three sons of Noah (Gen. 2; 5, 10).

The Israelite family centers around the father. Marriage meant acquiring ownership of a wife. The husband is called baal, lord and master. He owned the wife as he owned his children and children's children and servants (Gen. 31.43; 46.26). His authority over them was at one time absolute (Gen. 22; 38.24, Judg. 11.39; etc.). In course of time his authority was checked somewhat. He could sell his daughter only while she was a minor (Ex. 21.7-11, Lev. 19.29; Num. 30.4-15). The relation between husband and wife was an intimate one. None the less he was the head and she was his helpmate (Gen. 2.18). She bore his name (Is. 4.1). Her foremost task was to bear him children and to help him establish a house (Gen. 30.23; 1 Sam. 1). (See levirate marriage). The marriage laws were determined from his standpoint (Lev. 18, Deut. 22.20-21). It is he that could dissolve the marriage, but not his wife. Polygamy naturally follows such marriage arrangements. The husband might add to his principal wife a number of secondary wives. In such case his children were differentiated by being designated by their maternal names. The family property, too, was bound up with the husband, the wife sharing in it by virtue of belonging to him. On his death, the inheritance went to his sons (Num. 27.8-11).

However, the mother was the equal of the father in the claim upon the respect of the children (Ex. 20.12; 21.15, 17; Lev. 19.3; 20.9, Deut. 21.18-21, 27.26, Ezek. 22.7, Prov. 20.20). In turn both parents were obligated to care for their children, to teach and to guide them (Prov. 1.1; Deut. 6.6-7).

M. Burrows, Basis of Israelite Marriage (1938); David Jacobson, The Social Background of the O. T. (1942); Johs Pederson, Israel (1926).   s.s.c.

Patrick: (Lat., Patricius) Saint (389-461) Missionary to and patron saint of Ireland. He was born of Christian parents in Scotland, taken captive at the age of 16 by Irish marauders. After six years' bondage in Ireland he fled to a monastery, perhaps in Gaul, and prepared to return as a missionary to Ireland. In 432 he was consecrated bishop and proceeded to challenge the pagan faith and practices of Ireland. He built churches, established a monastery, trained clergy, organized Christian societies, introduced Latin, and brought Ireland in touch with Rome and European culture.   P.E.J.

Patrimony of St. Peter: In early times the revenues and landed possesions of the Holy See* and called by Gregory the Great the property of the poor, also a term used sometimes up to 1870 for the States of the Church. See Papal States. L.R.W.

patripassianism: (Lat., pater, father; patior, suffer) A nickname applied by Cyprian* to the Modalistic Monarchian* Doctrine that the redemptive suffering of Christ was the suffering of God the Father, since Christ and the Father are the same Person. Noetus and Praxeas were prominent advocates of this doctrine which flourished during the second and third centuries. Cf. modalism, monarchianism; Sabellianism, Theopaschites.
      H.W.J.

patristics: The branch of historical theology dealing with the lives, writings, and doctrines of the Fathers. These are commonly divided somewhat arbitrarily by the Council of Nicæa (325 A.D.) into ante-Nicene and post-Nicene Fathers. With even less justification certain of the earlier noncanonical writings (I and II Clement, the epistles of Ignatius, the epistle and Martyrdom of Polycarp, the Shepherd of Hermas, and the Epistle of Diognetus) are styled Apostolic Fathers.* The writings of the early Fathers (e.g., Justin, Aristides, Quadratus, Tatian) are often styled apologies, i.e., defenses of Christianity against heathendom. In some quarters, notably Alexandria, the early Fathers (Pantænus, Clement, and Origen) strove, as had Philo before them for Judaism, to show that the best of pagan thought was in accordance with—had, in fact, been anticipated by—Christianity. Among the most influential figures of the rising orthodoxy at the end of the second and beginning of the third century were Clement and Origen, Tertullian, Cyprian, and Novatian, Irenæus and Hippolytus. Leaders of thought among the post-Nicene Fathers included Arius, Athanasius, Hilary, Basil, Gregory of Nyssa, Cyril of Alexandria, Theodore of Mopsuestia, Jerome, and (perhaps the most influential of all) Augustine, who laid the foundations upon which orthodox Christianity was long to stand. In the reconstruction of the text of the biblical writings quotations of Scripture from the writings of the Fathers (patristic citations) are of great importance to the textual critic. Some of the Fathers have been admirably edited. Critical editions of the rest are greatly needed.

A. Harnack, Geschichte der altchristlichen Litteratur (1893-1904) 3 vols.; O. Bardenhewer, Patrologie (1910), 3rd ed.; Geschichte der altchristlichen Litteratur (1913-1932), 5 vols.; E. J. Goodspeed, A History of Early Christian Literature (1942).

M.S.E.

patrology: That part of historical theology which deals with the lives, writings and teachings of the Fathers of the Christian Church. See patristics.   B.W.J.

patron: See patronage.

patron saints: A saint chosen to be the guardian, special intercessor with God and protector of a place, person or association, according to the practice of the R.C. and Eastern churches. Developed in part from veneration* felt for early Christian martyrs and in some cases possession of their relics.* Churches, countries, towns, villages, professions, etc., as well as individuals are dedicated to a patron saint and are under his care. Many saints* are traditionally associated with a particular country or trade. There may be lesser patrons as well as a principal patron. St. Joseph is patron saint of the universal church. See wake.   K.H.C.

patronage: Signifies the rights and obligations of a person(s) (clerical or lay) with respect to a benefice. In early medieval church history (both Greek and Latin) the patron often was a lord who at his own expense had built a church. The usual rights of patronage pertain to presentation,* honorary distinctions, and support of the patron's person when he is in need. The obligations involve duties of maintaining the benefice (rebuilding, etc.). Claims of patrons to control of appointments, interference in policy, and the like, have been modified in the course of history in accordance with varying traditions (e.g., R. Cath., Anglican). See also advowson; benefice; eigenkirche;´simony.   Q.B.

Paul, the Apostle: A first-century Jewish opponent of the followers of Jesus, commonly styled Saul of Tarsus, who following his conversion became an ardent and influential champion of the growing movement through his activity as a protagonist of the gentile mission and through his letters to his converts. The early years of his life are unknown. All that can be safely inferred from his letters is that he was a Jew of orthodox parentage; that he was strict to the point of fanaticism in his reverence for the Jewish law, in the interpretation of which he followed (as did all orthodox Jews) the Pharisees,* that he joined heartily in persecuting the early Christians. In the canonical Book of Acts* (the source of most biographical sketches of Paul, but of definitely secondary value for the historian) he is depicted as born in Tarsus, as possessing Roman citizenship, as a young man having studied in Jerusalem "at the feet of Gamaliel,"* an eminent Jewish teacher, and as being present at the stoning of Stephen. Nothing in his letters guarantees any of these data, the references to his pre-Christian activity in Jerusalem are distinctly suspect. During the fourth decade he suffered a right about-face, apparently in or near Damascus, becoming convinced that Jesus, far from being accursed of God as he had earlier apparently believed, had but done God's will, that he had risen from the dead and was now in heaven at God's right hand, and would soon come to judgment. From persecutor he became champion of the faith he had earlier sought to destroy. Following a period of work in Arabia (apparently hinted at in Gal. 1 17, but without details), he spent many years in Syria and Cilicia, eventually becoming prominent among the Christians in Syrian Antioch.* Then followed a decade or more of itinerant work in the hitherto untouched districts of Asia Minor and eastern Europe (Macedonia and Greece), in the course of which he wrote many letters to the churches which he had founded, some of which letters having been preserved came later to be regarded as sacred, eventually becoming part of the NT. He apparently planned to continue his missionary activities in the Roman West, after making a final visit to Jerusalem with a gift from his gentile churches to the Jewish Christians of that city. According to the narrative in Acts his plans miscarried; he was mobbed in Jerusalem, arrested, and after an imprisonment at Cæsarea was sent to Rome, where he drops from sight. The tradition of his martyrdom in Rome may well be correct; the traditional date for the execution (67 A.D.) is surely far too late, and rests upon the (probably) unjustified tradition of a temporary release, a short period of renewed missionary activity, and his subsequent re-arrest and condemnation.

Appraisals of Paul have been many and varied. To some he was the virtual founder of Christianity, to others a comparatively insignificant figure thrown into unwarranted prominence by the narratives in Acts. He has been represented as the greatest Christian theologian of all time, and as the muddleheaded and sinister figure who muddied the limpid waters of the preaching of Jesus. Probably both extremes are incorrect. He may well have been the most influential of the missionaries to the gentiles; he was surely neither the first nor the only one. The evidence would seem to indicate that others, for the most part to us unknown, were working in about the same general way as was he.

The debt of Christianity to Paul is threefold, and in each part it is concerned with human conduct. To the Jews, Paul insisted upon freedom from the law*—the law was not, could not be, the criterion of life· that was implicit and self-revealed in the mystic union of the believer with his crucified and risen Lord. In protest against the laxity in morals in the hellenistic world, he stressed the sturdy Jewish morality with its insistence on the purity of family life. For Paul morals and religion were to all intents indissoluble, if not actually identical. The proof that a man was "in Christ" was the quality of life he lived. The third, and perhaps the most lasting, note he struck was that of fellowship (koinonia), not alone with Christ but with the fellow believers. Thus he sought to weld his converts into an organic unity bound by the closest ties to a living source. This vertical bond to their common Lord must result in an equally real horizontal bond with their fellows. All Christians together—each one individually "in Christ"—comprised literally the body of Christ. Logically Paul's position was indefensible. By baptism the convert, the initiate, was plunged into mystic union with the risen Lord, by the impartation of whose spirit a new life began. He was so completely linked to Christ that he was no longer able to distinguish between his own desires and goals and those of his Lord. He had the mind of Christ, not because he thought like Christ but because Christ was actually thinking in him. Thus faith was not the intellectual assent to notions, however valuable they might be. To all intents it meant for Paul new life. The faith of the Christian was the new life he was living in Christ, the life Christ was living in him, the new life that was being lived by the newborn Christ-man. Yet Paul's letters make perfectly clear that a large part of his time was devoted to ethical admonitions to faltering Christians and a constant warning of the impending judgment. Logically, his admonitions and sharply defined rules of conduct—what was worthy, as he saw it, of one "in Christ"—were unnecessary. He who was in Christ would have supplied by the Spirit all necessary insights and help, would find himself borne along on the current streaming from Christ. The reason for the breakdown in logic is obvious. All about him Paul saw fellow Christians whose conduct he strongly disapproved. By precept and example he sought to encourage and strengthen those who, while in Christ, were but "babes in Christ"—instead of ostrichlike refusing to see the dangers to his theological opinion. (If no other evidence existed, this would be enough to prove Paul was not a theologian!) The breach in logic is obvious—was perfectly obvious to many of his gentile converts, as is evidenced by Galatians and the correspondence with Corinth—and is not to be rationalized away. Paul was not a theologian nor a logician but an eminently practical and forthright man who never seems to have shrunk from doing what he felt compelled under God to do by the fear or charge of being inconsistent. See Christology; justification; reason in religion; righteousness, N.T. conception of; soul. See also Pauline Epistles.

The Pauline literature is huge. Among others may be mentioned: Percy Gardner, The Religious Experience of St. Paul (1911); A. Deissmann, The Religion of Jesus and the Faith of Paul (1923); M. S. Enslin, The Ethics of Paul (1930); F. C. Porter, The Mind of Christ in Paul (1930); K. Lake, Paul; his Heritage and Legacy (1934); A. D. Nock, St. Paul (1938); D. W. Riddle, Paul, Man of Conflict (1940).   M.S.E.

Paul of Samosata: Bishop of Antioch (260-272), the most famous expositor of dynamic monarchianism*. He taught that the power of the essentially impersonal Logos from above inspired the man Jesus, who had been born of the Virgin. Thus endowed by the Logos, Jesus was inseparably united to God in a perfect moral unity of will, but not in a unity of substance. Because of his merit Jesus was raised from the dead and exalted by the Father to a position of divinity. Paul of Samosata was excommunicated by the third of three synods meeting at Antioch from 264 to 269, but remained in his position until 272 when Aurelian conquered Zenobia.   H.W.J.

Paulicians: The Paulicians were an Armenian Adoptionist* sect. Its origin is traditionally traced to a certain Bishop Paul of Samosata* in the third century, or a certain Constantine in the seventh century, although the adherents liked to derive the name from St. Paul. They were strongly iconoclastic, and opposed the cult of the Virgin and the saints. Some groups of them having been transplanted to Thrace by Emperor Constantine V, their influence (among other causes) gave rise to a native Bulgarian dualistic sect of Bogomils*. This latter movement received the name of Patarenes* in Bosnia-Herzegovina, and in ways no longer clear influenced the rise of the dualistic sects in southern France, such as the Cathari and the Albigenses.

Matthew Spinka, A History of Christianity in the Balkans (1933); Karapet Ter-Mkrttschian, Die Paulicianer in byzantinischen Kaiserreich (Leipzig, 1893); F. C. Conybeare, The Key of Truth (Oxford, 1898).
                                                    M.S.

Pauline Epistles: Thirteen so-called epistles (more properly letters) in the N.T. are commonly ascribed to Paul: Romans, I and II Corinthians, Galatians, Ephesians, Philippians, Colossians, I and II Thessalonians, I and II Timothy, Titus, and Philemon. Three of these—I and II Timothy and Titus—commonly styled the *Pastoral Epistles, are widely (though not universally) regarded today as sub-Pauline, although, in the judgment of some critics, containing fragments of genuine Pauline material. The authenticity of three others—Ephesians, II Thessalonians, and Colossians—has frequently been challenged. Attempts at separation of the letters into two clear-cut groups—Earlier or Missionary vs. Later Epistles—and deductions as to fancied developments in Pauline thought have not infrequently been made but cannot be pronounced as of more than doubtful value. Four of the letters—Philippians, Colossians, Philemon, and (if genuine) Ephesians—appear to have been written while Paul was in prison, but opinions differ as to whether the imprisonment was in Ephesus, Cæsarea, or Rome. All of the genuine epistles would seem to fall within a brief space of years (50-55 A.D.; perhaps less probably 50-59 A.D.). Indications in the letters themselves suggest that these which have survived are but a fragmentary part of a larger correspondence and themselves show evidence of having been edited. For more detailed information as to the several letters and their purpose see articles Paul, Romans, Ephesians, etc.
                                                    M.S.E.

Paulists, the: Members of the Missionary Society of St. Paul the Apostle, a community of priests founded in 1858 by Father Isaac Thomas Hecker in Rome and New York with the aid of Fathers Augustine F. Hewit, George Deshon, Francis A. Baker, and Clarence A. Walworth.

These men had been members of the Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer and had been active in the American missions of the Congregation When Father Hecker went to Rome to explain certain difficulties which had arisen concerning them, he was expelled from the community on August 29, 1857. Father Hecker,* with the support of many prominent American bishops appealed to the Pope, and he and the other priests were released from their vows. They then formed their own community with the approval of Archbishop John Hughes of New York. He assigned to them the mission and church which has since become their motherhouse in West 59th Street, New York. Their rule is based upon that of the Redemptorists*, although they do not take vows, their formula of profession, taken after their novitiate, calls for a declaration of their intention to obey the rules, to aspire after Christian perfection and to devote themselves to the Apostolic ministry. Besides their own personal sanctification the Paulists devote themselves particularly to the conversion of non-Catholics. They engage in lecturing, preaching, the printing and distribution of missionary literature and private conferences with prospective converts. They conduct some parishes, give missions and from 1925-1937 conducted their own radio station in New York They publish the Catholic World, and conduct their own printing establishment for the publication of missionary magazines, pamphlets and books.

W. Elliott, The Life of Father Hecker (2nd ed., 1891) ; James M. Gillis, The Paulists (1932).

T.T.M.

pax: (Lat., peace, and so, kiss) The "holy kiss" (Rom. 16·16, etc.), became a general liturgical custom in the Eucharist. In the middle ages the "pax" was a small decorated tablet, kissed by the priest and then by the others in order.

B.S.E.

peal ringing: Peal ringing is an art practiced throughout the British Isles, in some of the colonies, and here and there in America. A peal is composed of eight, ten or twelve bells, although a few peals may be rung on as few as five or six bells. Such bells are always in the form of either a simple diatonic scale, or else a diatonic scale with two to four added notes above.

Bells for peal ringing are hung so as to be swung through a complete circle, with headstock, stay and slider arranged to prevent upsetting the bell. They are rung by means of wheels and ropes, the latter passing through the floor of the belfry and down into a ringers chamber below. There are as many ringers as there are bells, and they stand in a circle, facing toward the center.

Peal ringing, also called change ringing, is accomplished somewhat as follows: Usually the bells are played in rapid succession, in the form of a descending scale. Then, upon a signal from the leader, bells are made to change places with one-another, until finally a most intricate melody is rung. These melodies follow certain well-recognized methods, not easy to recognize by those unfamiliar with peal ringing. These melodies are constructed upon sound, scientific patterns, and require a considerable degree of skill on the part of the ringers. Some of the simplest methods require three hours and a half to complete. Others require more time Among many famous peals that have been rung was a peal of 21,363 Stedman Caters, rung at Appleton, Berks., (tenor bell 14 cwt.), on April 22, 1922, which required twelve hours and twenty-five minutes. It was rung by the Oxford Diocesan Guild and Ancient Society of College Youths and the tempo of the peal was twenty-eight changes per minute.

On three bells, playing three successive notes of the diatonic scale, six changes may be rung. On four bells, 24 changes are possible. On five bells one may ring 120 changes. On eight bells (the usual number) 40,320 changes may be rung. On a peal of 12 bells, 479,001,600 changes may be rung, requiring 91 years, were they rung at the usual rate of two per second.

While peal ringing is practiced in comparatively few churches in America, and these largely in the New England states, yet poetry and literature contain frequent references to the art, and many familiar hymns refer to it. Without a little knowledge of the basic principles of ringing, many of these literary references are easily misinterpreted.

Many churches in America have a succession of eight or more bells, and often an attempt is made to ring changes on these either by means of hand levers or else by an Ellacombe wall rack. This is not true peal ringing, and must not be confused with the scientific method in which eight, ten or twelve men "ring the bells up" and then proceed with the intricate work of correct change ringing. See carillon.

F.R.W.

peasants' war, the: Armed rising in Germany, 1525. It took place at a period of great unrest, but was due rather to social forces of long standing than to the effect of the religious freedom proclaimed by the Reformation.* Feudalism* had destroyed the old peasantry. Virtual serfdom bound the rural worker to the land, and even the law was powerless to protect him from the burden of intolerable exactions.

The rising was the first clear effort to organize the whole peasantry of Germany, but there were various strands within the movement. The strongest centre was in Swabia, and here a clear programme was put forward as a basis for negotiation with the nobles. It took its inspiration from the Gospel, upheld the communal principle, and was primarily concerned with genuine agrarian grievances. Its twelve articles put forward in strong but moderate terms the peasants' demands. Though some nobles were willing to negotiate, others used discussions only as a screen for military preparation. Truchsess, the leader of the Swabian League (nobles), aimed at keeping the peasants divided and then utterly overthrowing them. Other strands in the peasants' movement were represented by the "Heilbronn plan" (a programme for radical political reconstruction as well as agrarian reform), while the extreme wing was Muenzer's* theocratic communism. In the actual struggle the peasants were quickly overthrown.

The significance of the peasants' war is threefold. 1) It is historically important because, though primarily an attempt to unify German peasantry, it brought into association the lower classes of town and country. 2) The social and economic results were appalling. The peasants were ruthlessly suppressed, and at the end their outlook was blacker than at the beginning. 3) Religious results. Luther's* relation to the rising was complicated both by his outlook and by the development of the rising. At the outset he hoped, by being honest with both sides, to initiate a reconciliation, but the outbreak of violence drove Luther into unbridled denunciation of the peasants. His horror of the rising combined with certain elements latent in his theology to confirm the erastianism* to which Lutheranism has always been liable. See Philip of Hesse.

Cambridge Modern History, ii, E. B Bax, The Peasants' War in Germany (London, 1899); W. Stolze, Der Deutsche Bauernkrieg (Halle, 1907).

G.R.C.

Pécaut, Felix: (1827-1898) He was inspector general of primary instruction and co-founder of the Free Church in Neuchâtel, Switzerland. Opposed to compromise between orthodoxy and complete denial of the supernatural, he held that the logically clear and convincing problem of religion to be the complete humanisation of the Bible and the stripping off of the traditional magical disguise of the person of Christ, whose divinity Pecaut reduced to a mere moral sainthood. The name of Jesus was for him the symbol of popular idealism. Liberal Christianity was for him neither a congealed dogma nor a closed system but a grain capable of development.

Le christ et la conscience (Paris, 1859); De l'avenir du théisme chretienne (Paris, 1864); De l'avenir du Protestantisme en France (Paris, 1865), Le christianisme libéral et le miracle (Paris, 1869); De l'argument de utilite liberal en matière de la religion (Paris, 1870).

H.H.

Peck, John Mason: (1789-1858) Baptist pioneer preacher, missionary, author. Favored enforcement of Fugitive Slave Law. Promoted the founding of Shurtleff College.

C.H.M.

pedobaptism: See infant baptism.

Peirce, Charles Sanders: (1839-1914) American philosopher and scientist. Recognized by William James* as the originator of philosophical Pragmatism*, a theory of meaning which sees the import of concepts in their "conceivable practical bearings" (the emphasis is on "conceivable" a concept need not be actually useful to have meaning, provided one can imagine a use for it). Peirce also influenced James (and Royce*) through a daring cosmology, which regarded the laws of nature as merely the most stable habits of nature, not absolute or immutable, but evolving from an aboriginal chaos in the infinitely remote past toward perfect regularity in the infinitely remote future. Matter he held to be "mind hide-bound by habit," the portion of nature in which creative spontaneity is slight, hence largely without consciousness, though not without feeling. There is a continuum of all possible (though not of all actual) forms and qualities, so that differences commonly regarded as of kind (such as that between a color sensation and a sound sensation) are really differences of degree (theory of Synechism). The whole of evolution is a "divine poem". In a few passages of Peirce's writings it seems to be suggested that God is in some manner enriched by the world process, himself a temporal being, but in others God is referred to in traditional fashion as wholly independent of time and the world.

Primarily a logician, Peirce thoroughly revised many portions of logic and was one of the chief creators of symbolic logic. Among the matters best worked out in his fragmentary and often difficult writings are his frequency theory of probable reasoning, his theory of the categories (also called Phenomenology*), and his studies of the kinds and uses of signs.

The categories are First, Second, Third; or Feeling-quality, Reaction and Representation. A mere feeling, abstracted as much as possible from contrast and relation, is monadic or first, an experience of effort-resistance or passivity-activity, is dyadic or second, a sign, involving something meant, something by which it is meant, and a state of mind or mental habit for which the meaning obtains, is triadic or third. Signs or thirds themselves can be classified according to the same triadic system. Thus if a sign means primarily through its quality or internal character it is called an Icon (or resemblance); if through its reaction with something else, an Index, if through a mental habit, a symbol. An Icon tells us what something might be like, an Index that something exists, a Symbol that something is thought. In combination these elements yield propositions, arguments, and all the logical forms (never before so completely analyzed by one simple key idea).

Peirce published only articles in his lifetime Six volumes of Collected Papers, edited by C Hartshorne and P. Weiss, appeared in 1931-35. They contain all the philosophical articles published in Peirce's lifetime, and, in greater quantity, writings found among his remains On Peirce's theological views see Hartshorne, "A Critique of Peirce's Idea of God," Philos. Rev, L (1941), 516-23

The best life of Peirce is by Weiss, in the American Dictionary of Biography (1928-36), ed. by A. Johnson and D. Malone Material on Theory of the Categories is chiefly in Vol. I, on Pragmatism in Vol. V, on Metaphysics and Philosophy of Religion in VI, and on Logic in II.

C.H.

Pelagianism: The body of teachings named after Pelagius*. Pelagianism denied original sin* and man's hereditary guilt. Physical death whether in the case of Adam or of his descendants is not the result of sin, but is necessarily involved in nature. Spiritual death is not the inherited consequence of Adam's sin, but comes to each individual will which misuses its power of free choice by choosing to sin. All men by virtue of their reason and free will have the power to avoid making this unrighteous choice. If in the exercise of his free and morally responsible will man so chooses, he may grasp the external aid of divine grace which is bestowed according to man's merit. Divine grace* is variously and ambiguously described as being the natural constitution of 'man, or as being God's Law which reveals the divine will, or again, as being the grace of Christ which works through His assurance of forgiveness* to those who are baptized and through the teachings of the Church. The unassisted human will however takes the determining initiative in the matter of salvation. After having been rejected by the North African Synods of Carthage* and of Mileve in 416, Pelagianism was officially condemned by the Third General Council of Ephesus* in 431. See Julian of Eclanum, libertarianism; Semi Pelagianism.   H.W.J.

Pelagius: A monk of great learning and high moral character. He is said to have been of British birth. About the year 400 he went to Rome. There he was shocked by the lax morals of professing Christians and endeavored earnestly to raise the ethical standards by affirming the responsibility which men have before God for their actions. In 410 Pelagius with his follower Coelestius went to North Africa. Pelagius remained there but a short time, then going to Palestine. The teachings of Pelagius were zealously opposed by his contemporary Augustine*. The two North African Synods of Mileve and Carthage* condemned Pelagianism in the year 416. This condemnation was confirmed by Pope Innocent I₁ and later by Zosimus. Pelagius died about the year 420. See Pelagianism.   H.W.J.

penal theory: See satisfaction.

penance: 1) The virtue of penitence, heartfelt sorrow for sin with the purpose of sinning no more. 2) In the early church, a canonical punishment for grave offenses (see longer article "penance"). 3) A prayer or work of reparation enjoined upon a penitent in the sacrament of penance, regarded as punitive (at least to the degree of indicating the penitent's willingness to receive punishment) and remedial. See penitential (manual).   T.J.B.

penance: A sacrament of the Roman Catholic Church, consisting of contrition, confession*, and satisfaction on the part of the penitent, and absolution by the priest. It has to do only with baptized Christians who have sinned after baptism. The Eastern Orthodox Church* also regards penance as a sacrament; the Anglican Church* leaves its practice to the conscience of the individual.

Three stages may be distinguished in the development of penitential practices which culminated in the sacramental theory of penance. 1) In the early centuries, public penance was a means of discipline and probation whereby the Church sought to maintain its purity in a world of appalling moral laxity and to conserve its life in the face of severe and repeated persecution. Homicide, sexual impurity, and apostasy* were mortal sins* which necessarily excluded the sinner from the communion and fellowship of the Church; and he could be restored only by submission to a strict regimen of public penance for a set term of years, which might be shortened or lengthened at the discretion of the bishop. Persons were admitted to penance but once.

2) From the fifth century public penance fell into disuse, and there gradually developed a system of private penance and recurrent confession, which first grew up within the monasteries, but became finally established as the practice of the Church by a decree of the Fourth Council of the Lateran*, A.D. 1215. "Every fidelis of either sex shall after the attainment of years of discretion separately confess his sins with all fidelity to his own priest at least once in the year, and shall endeavor to fulfill the penance imposed upon him to the best of his ability, reverently receiving the sacrament of the Eucharist at least at Easter."

3) The first clear definition of penance as a sacrament was by Peter Lombard* (c. 1100-1160) who made it one of the list of seven sacraments which he devised His doctrine on this point was accepted and elaborated by Thomas Aquinas, and became the faith of the Church by vote of the Council of Florence in 1439. The sacramental character of penance was reaffirmed, after the protest of the Reformers, at the Council of Trent*.

The sacramental system of penance had been the possession of the Church for three hundred years, when the Protestant Reformers denied it. Their attack was particularly upon the practice of absolution* by the priest, with the correlative theory of the power of the keys,* and upon the requirement of satisfaction. Even perfect contrition is viewed by the Roman Catholic as unavailing apart from the sacrament of penance, and attrition*, or imperfect contrition*, is held to be made sufficient by it; the priest thus becomes the indispensable means and administrator of forgiveness and salvation. The term satisfaction does not refer to the restitution or repair of wrong done (though the Church's insistence upon this principle was an important part of the service it rendered to the moral life), but it refers rather to the sinner's satisfaction of God's justice by working out the penalties assigned to him by the priest. The Canons of the Council of Trent draw a distinction between guilt and punishment, culpa and poena. The sinner's guilt is remitted by the words of absolution, and with it the eternal punishment which belongs to sin; but there is left a temporal punishment, of a degree and character suited to his guilt, which must in equity be endured, in order that the eternal justice of God may be satisfied. This distinction dates from the theologians of the twelfth century, Richard of St. Victor* being the one to fashion the form in which it became a permanent part of the Roman Catholic doctrine.

The distinction between culpa and poena is the root from which spring many of the errors and abuses which finally stirred Luther to protest—particularly the theory of indulgences and the practice of their sale. In opposition to the Roman Catholic system of penance, Luther asserted the doctrine of justification by faith. Repentance, he held, is no sacramental transaction, requiring the intermediation of a priest and the satisfaction of God through works of penance. It involves contrition and faith—sorrow for sin and turning to God in trust and obedience. And good deeds are the fruit and consequence of repentance through faith, rather than the price with which men buy, or the merit wherewith they deserve, the salvation that comes from God. See commutation of penance, composition, forgiveness, lapsed, retention of sins, sacraments, satisfaction, sin, Thesaurus Meritorum.

J. Morin, Commentarius Historicus de Disciplina in Administratione Sacramenti Poenitentiae (Paris, 1651), Henry C. Lea, History of Auricular Confession and Indulgences in the Latin Church (1896); Oscar D. Watkins, A History of Penance (1920).

L.A W.

Penates: Gods of the storeroom (penus) in Roman religion*, or as we should say, of the larder or pantry. Usually associated and invoked with the Lares (familiares), household spirits. Both groups were beneficent. The city of Rome, as the expanded household of the king also had its lares and penates.

P.G.M.

Penington, Isaac: (1616-1679) Son of a distinguished Puritan father, Penington led an unsettled religious life until adhering to Quakerism* in 1658, with his wife Mary. His spirituality and polished literary style, evidenced by previous writings, now made him an important Quaker spokesman. No Quaker writings exceed his Letters in spiritual maturity and depth.

Complete Works of Isaac Penington (1863), Letters (1859), For Life and Teachings: M. W. Hess, The Name is Living (1936).

H.C.

penitence: Sorrow or repentance for sin as an offence against God, involving also a resolve to reform. These three factors are essential. 1) Regret for sin. 2) Acknowledgment of its offensiveness to God. 3) Determination af amendment. In Protestantism true penitence meets with complete forgiveness by ' God. In Roman Catholism the Church forgives.

R.E.E.H.

penitential: (manual) One of various libri penitentiales (collections of penitential rules) according to which penances* suitable to sins* committed and confessed were imposed. Some of these rules were formulated by synods, some were suggested by Fathers of the Church. The most ancient of these books belonged to the Irish and British Churches of the sixth century. Subsequently they were known in France and Saxony. No such book was ever issued for the universal Church. With the collapse of the ancient penitential discipline these books fell into disuse. See confessional, seven deadly sins.

C.V.

penitential orders: (Lat., paenitens, repentant) Those congregations or bodies of religious which stress the performance of works of penance*. Probably the most outstanding penitential Orders are the Carmelites and the Capuchins.

W.H.

penitents, congregations of: Various confraternities* that flourished especially in Italy, Spain, and France from the 13th to the 16th century. Each confraternity had its own distinctive habit, worn during processions and ecclesiastical functions. Their rules prescribed works of mercy and penance, such as fasting, assisting prisoners, visiting the sick, burying the dead.

C.V.

Penn, William: (1644-1718) Quaker* convert, leader, writer, and colonizer, one-time promoter and co-proprietor of New Jersey, founder and proprietor of Pennsylvania, 1681. An ardent advocate of civil and religious liberty in England, Penn sought to demonstrate his ideas in America. The charter, laws, and institutions of colonial New Jersey and Pennsylvania reflect his religious and political liberalism. See Works (1726).

T.E.D.

penology: That branch of criminological science which relates to the treatment of convicted offenders Etymologically the term denotes punishment, and such a meaning would characterize most of those measures which have been undertaken against offenders, historically, and down to the present time. The severity of penalties have varied from capital punishment, under many different forms, to the infliction of bodily or mental suffering which stops short of death, and less severe measures as represented by fines, and, in modern times, by the use of incarceration or of probation under a suspended sentence. Banishment and transportation to penal colonies would need to be included in such a historical perspective, the one an ancient, and the other a relatively modern device. It would seem that the sadistic ingenuity of man had been thoroughly expended upon offenders against the customs or laws of society.

In modern times the merely punitive character of the treatment of criminals has been somewhat mollified due to a variety of considerations, such as the rise of humanitarian sentiments accompanying the revolutionary movements of the 18th century in Europe and America which were especially represented in the teachings of Beccaria (1738-1794). Another modifying element in modern penology came from the religious teachings of the Quakers*. Furthermore, the development of the social sciences during the 19th and 20th centuries has had its effect on penology, leading still further away from punitive sanctions, and toward an understanding of the criminal and his behavior as the basis of treatment. However, it can 'be said without question that there is a considerable lag between the methods of treatment that such an understanding might imply, and the punitive spirit which is still embodied in the law.

Meanwhile, it is important to emphasize that a radical change took place when toward the close of the 18th century in Europe and America incarceration in prisons became the chief means of punishment. Problems in penology, since that time, have largely centered in the prison system, with contending ideas as to what its purpose should be. Is it to punish or to reform the criminal? Or, is its main function the protection of society? Confusion of thought results from the fact that different answers are given to these questions, though among enlightened people one suspects that the merely punitive idea is giving way to the other two.

A still more recent alternative to incarceration in the treatment of offenders has come about through the system of supervised probation under a suspension of sentence. By this means a convicted person is permitted to live and work in the community under the supervision of a probation officer. If at the end of a certain period, one to five years, he has not violated the conditions of his probation he is completely released from custody, but, if he does break the probationary rules, he may then be made to serve a prison sentence for his offense. The aim of probation is not leniency, but rather to effect a more satisfactory readjustment of the offender than would be possible through a prison commitment. It is a type of treatment most suitable for first offenders, though not necessarily restricted to them, nor always desirable even for them. Whether such a milder form of treatment may be regarded as punishment, as the term penology implies, may be open to question, unless one holds that the irreducible element in punishment is the restriction of liberty on the part of the offender. The unmistakable trend in modern penology is in the direction of a more extended use of probation. Otherwise, the emphasis is upon the creation within our prisons of a regime conducive to the rehabilitation of such prisoners as may be amenable to an enlightened policy of treatment. For those who are not so, a rational procedure would be to keep them in permanent custody, not with the intent to punish, but solely as a measure for the protection of society. Provisions for this last step have yet to be embodied in law. See prison reform.

Harry Elmer Barnes and Negley K Teeters, New Horizons in Criminology (1943) ; Arthur E. Wood and John Barker Waite, Crime and Its Treatment (1941) ; Edwin H Sutherland, Principles of Criminology (1939) , F. H Wines, Punishment and Reformation (1895) ; John Lewis Gillin, Criminology and Penology (1926) , Margaret Wilson, The Crime of Punishment (1931) .   A.E.W.

Pentateuch: See Ezra; Hexateuch, Old Testament, Samaritan Pentateuch, Zohar.

Pentecost: (Literally "fifty days") The biblical festival which came exactly fifty days after the Passover* (Lev. 23. 15-21; Deut. 16. 9-12). It was originally a harvest festival of the Canaanites*, the pre-Israelite inhabitants of Palestine, and was borrowed from them by the Israelites, when they settled in that country. It was celebrated at the end of the seven weeks period of the grain-harvest, after the last sheaf had been gathered. In the earlier biblical writings it was called "Festival of the Harvest" (Ex. 23.16) or "Festival of First-fruits." Later it came to be known as Shabuot, "Festival of Weeks" (Deut. 16.10). In post-biblical Jewish literature it is said to commemorate the anniversary of the revelation of the Law at Mt. Sinai (Ex. 19).   J.M.

Pentecost, Christian: (Gr., pentekoste, "fiftieth (day)") In Acts 2 1 the Feast of Weeks* (which see). In Christian usage the seventh Sunday after Easter, commemorating the descent of the Holy Spirit. So observed from at least the early third century (Hippolytus*, Apostolic Tradition, ch. 29) and now a major feast in all liturgical churches. Known also as "Whitsunday"* (from "White Sunday," not "Whitsun Day"). Cf. church year.   B.S.E.

Pentecostal Assemblies of the World: See pentecostal sects.

Pentecostal Church of God in America: See pentecostal sects.

Pentecostal Church, Inc.: See pentecostal sects.

Pentecostal Fire-Baptized Holiness Church: See pentecostal sects.

Pentecostal Holiness Church: See pentecostal sects.

pentecostal sects: A group of ultra-perfectionist* sects* which magnify the "gift of tongues" (Acts 2 1-13), and insist on "speaking with other tongues* as the Spirit gives utterance" as the proof of the blessing of holiness. While espousing the customary doctrines of the "fundamentalist" type of theology, they lay stress on sanctification of the "second blessing" type, spirit guidance and "gifts," and premillenarianism. Not all holiness or perfectionist sects, however, are pentecostal in character. Their ever-present distinguishing mark is speaking with tongues. They are frequently dubbed "holy rollers," from the fact that extremely emotional devotees sometimes fall to the ground in trances or other experiences of an orgiastic nature.

The leading pentecostal sects in this country are Catholic Apostolic Church (Irvingites); Church of God, The (Original) Church of God*, (Tomlinson) Church of God*, Holiness Church*, Assemblies of God—General Council, Apostolic Faith Mission*, Pentecostal Holiness Church; Pentecostal Assemblies of the World; Pentecostal Assemblies of Jesus Christ; Pentecostal Church, Inc , International Church of the Foursquare Gospel*; International Pentecostal Assemblies, Pentecostal Church of God of America; Pentecostal Fire-Baptized Holiness Church, Calvary Pentecostal Church; Church of God in Christ* (Pentecostal); New Apostolic Church*; Congregational Holiness Church*; General Council of the Italian Pentecostal Assemblies of God, Unorganized Italian Christian Churches of North America. (See Italian pentecostal sects.)

Many Negro sects are pentecostal in character and "tongue talking" and similar emotional automata are practiced among groups which have not definitely developed the theology of left-wing perfectionism. Among the Negro bodies which "speak in tongues" may be mentioned: Apostolic Overcoming Holy Church of God*; Church of the Living God*—Christian Workers for Fellowship; Church of the Living God—The Pillar and Ground of Truth; The House of Prayer*; Church of God in Christ*—Pentecostal; Fre

Church of God in Christ, Church of God-Holiness*, Church of Christ—Holiness*, Fire-Baptized Holiness Church of God of the Americas*, Christ's Sanctified Holy Church Colored*, House of the Lord*, National David Spiritual Temple of Christ Church Union*.

The pentecostal sects in the United States have approximately 5,650 local congregations and 350,000 members. The largest are the Assemblies of God, General Council* (2611 churches, 194,000 members), Church of God (1081 churches, 45,000 members), (Tomlinson) Church of God (441 churches, 18,000 members), Pentecostal Assembly of Jesus Christ (245 churches, 16,000 members), Pentecostal Holiness Church (375 churches, 13,000 members); Pentecostal Church, Inc. (168 churches, 10,000 members). Cf holiness churches.

E T Clark, The Small Sects in America (1937); F M. Davenport, Primitive Traits in Religious Revivals (1910); Cartwright, Autobiography, Frodsham, With Signs Following, the Story of the Latter-Day Pentecostal Revival; and the numerous tracts and publications issued by the Gospel Publishing House, Springfield, Mo, and the Church of God and (Tomlinson) Church of God, Cleveland, Tenn.   E.T.C.

Peraldus (Guillaume Péraud): Author of a treatise on the education of a Prince.   S.C.T.

perfect, perfection: (Lat., per, through, facere, do, make) Literally, finished, made thoroughly. Since God is generally viewed as not made at all, his "completeness" requires special analysis. Traditionally it is explained as the total absence of "defects," or the presence of all possible positive values. But many thinkers deny that all possible values are "composible," capable of realization in one actuality. An alternative to the traditional view is that in God all actual values are present actually, and all possible ones are bound to be present if and when actualized. Thus God would pool the values of existence, the actual as actual, the potential as potential. Any possible being other than he must then in its value be but a fragment of his value, and thus he must surpass any even possible being other than himself. Yet he could also surpass himself; for, as hitherto potential values became actual, his own actual value would increase. So the perfect would be "the selfsurpassing being who surpasses all conceivable others than himself " This may be called "dynamic perfection," since it admits change in the perfect—though only change toward more value. Perfection is perfectibility (Tsanoff). The other, or static, form of perfection is, "the un-selfsurpassing being who surpasses all conceivable others." This has been the usual view, defended by the query, how can the perfect, that which lacks nothing, have any further value to acquire? But if the total absence of potentiality of further value, or the total realization of possible actuality in a "pure actuality", is itself not possible, then the "failure" to possess it is not a defect in the proper sense—the "it" being here meaningless, a mere absurdity.

Dynamic and static perfection contradict each other only if applied to the same being in the same respect, since there is no formal contradiction in the idea of a being dynamically perfect in respect R and statically perfect in respect A. Thus God may be selfsurpassingly happy or blissful, yet happier than all others than himself, but at the same time, un-selfsurpassingly good or benevolent, while more benevolent than all others. For, as the world which his goodness cherishes gains new values, his satisfaction in this world may increase. This assumes a genuine indeterminacy in the future as known by God (see foreknowledge), but the traditional view of omniscience as a seeing of the real as it is at all times, or from the standpoint of eternity, also involves an assumption, namely that there exists a final sum of reality, complete once for all, and capable of being known "in a single now." This assumption is now widely challenged.

The perfect as static-dynamic enjoys both self-identity and self-difference. As selfsurpassing, the perfect enjoys self-contrast; as un-selfsurpassing, he enjoys self-equality. If unity with difference is the obvious trait of concrete experience, from which mere unity or mere difference is abstracted, then static perfection must be abstract, and reflexive all-surpassing or dynamic perfection must be perfection in its concreteness. Abstractions naturally cannot surpass themselves; only concrete subjects or persons can do that. (See God as personal) The static perfection of God means that his abstract aspect surpasses all other abstractions, while his dynamic perfection means that he, as selfsurpassing, surpasses all other concrete beings or selfsurpassers. For example, only he grows without ever decaying, takes on new values without ever losing any—since his being pools all actuality, and since the past has the mode of actual, and only the future the mode of potential, reality. (See time).

Are there negative values in the perfect? Just as the total absence of potentiality may be impossible, so may the total absence of evil, suffering, for instance, be impossible. And if the perfect pools the actual, it must contain suffering. But whereas suffering is a positive quality, not the mere absence of one, moral evil, like ignorance, is a non-quality—namely a (wilful) not-taking-account of the interests of others. It is non-interest in interests. True, it is deliberate, but the evil is not in the deliberateness, but in the deliberate non-interest. The being which is perfect in knowledge (see omniscience) can no more be uninterested in, than it can be ignorant of, any real interest. The whole-value no more includes, as its own property, the absence of qualities in this or that part than a whole is small because its parts are so. Thus the traditional theory of the negativity of evil is applicable to evils of ignorance and neglect, but not to suffering, for it is precisely positive knowledge of and attention to the sufferings of others that compels, and indeed consists in, sympathetic suffering of our own.

As static, the perfect is immutable, independent, simple, unextended, absolute in knowledge, goodness, and power—nearly all the traditional attributes. As dynamic, the perfect is mutable (though only through additions to his reality), dependent (though only for the particular degree and kind of accidental values it attains, not for his existence or basic character as static-dynamic), he is complex (though incapable of dissolution into parts), he is identical with the whole of the real in space-time, ever gaining new objects to know and exert his goodness upon, and thereby reaching new satisfaction (tinged with suffering).

In sum, the perfect is superior to the non-perfect in all positive abilities, including the ability of self-enrichment through the enrichment of others, or the enrichment of others through self-enrichment. He surpasses the very essence of others, but only in accidents can he surpass himself. See infinite; omnipotence, omniscience; panentheism.

R. A. Tsanoff, Religious Crossroads (1942); E. S. Brightman, The Problem of God (1930), C. Hartshorne, Man's Vision of God (1941).   c.h.

perfectio christiana: See perfectionism.

perfection, perfectionism: The attainment of perfection in God's sight is the content of all eschatological hope. This means that the human achievement of religious and moral perfection (sinlessness) belongs to the future rather than the present.

Generally speaking, such has been the teaching of the Christian religion. It has attributed perfection to God alone. Moreover, on the basis of the gospel of the divine forgiveness in Christ, it has also given to men the sure hope of reaching perfection. The Christian is told to believe that under divine grace he is on the road to perfection. In this sense, he is a pilgrim.

Perfectionism as the teaching that it is possible for man to attain and maintain religious and moral perfection has been comparatively rare in Christianity. It has been advocated particularly by mystics and moralists, who on account of an overemphasis either upon the experience of union with the divine or upon the possibilities of moral growth denied or qualified the teaching of the doctrines of sin and grace and of justification and sanctification.

Under the impact of their religious enthusiasm, some of the early Christians seem to have believed that they were able to keep themselves sinless. Origen* incorporated a perfectionist streak in his theology under the influence of Greek, especially neo-Platonic mysticism. Roman Catholic monasticism and mysticism were and are in part perfectionist. During the Reformation period, Anabaptist and Spiritualist sects and individuals opposed the Reformers' teaching on justification in the name of a religious perfectionism, the chief feature of which was the claim that the ethic of the Sermon on the Mount was an uneschatological ethic. Their direct and indirect descendants in Protestantism (particularly Mennonites and Quakers) have been and still are determined by a similar outlook. In the history of American Christianity, there have appeared numerous small perfectionist sects,* all of which were short-lived (e.g., the communities of Oneida*, N. Y., New Harmony, Ind., etc.). Today, perfectionism appears particularly among the so-called holiness* sects. In connection with pacifism*, it has become a partial attitude or conviction of many moralistically and mystically inclined liberal Protestants.   w.p.

perfectionism: (Gates style) See Battle-Axe experiment.

perichoresis: (Literally, a surrounding, but used in a sense that involves permeation) A term used by John of Damascus, e.g., in Exposition of the Orthodox Faith IV, xviii (Migne, Patrol Graec. XCIV, 1183f.) to indicate the mutual inherence of the divine and human natures in Christ's person. In Greek theology, to which Lutheranism is here indebted (Cf. Formula of Concord, Article VIII), the communicatio idiomatum or sharing of properties is a development of this concept.   j.t.m.

pericope: (Gr., perikope, something cut out, a section of a book) A portion of Scripture read at service time or used as a sermon text. Prescription of set sections for Sundays and feast days began probably in the early fifth century but the first known Roman list of such (Gospel) sections dates from the seventh century; at present at least the Roman Catholic, the Eastern, the Anglican and the Lutheran churches have official lectionaries*. The purpose of these lectionaries is partly to secure appropriate lessons for the various church seasons, partly to secure the orderly reading of representative Scriptural passages throughout the year.   b.s.e.

perpetual adoration: (Lat., perpetuum, perduring, and adorare, to adore) Adoration of the Blessed Sacrament, literally perpetual, or interrupted after some days or at short intervals.
   l.r.w.

Perrinists: See Libertines.

persecution: In Christian history persecution has been directed against the church by hostile powers such as the Roman Empire and the modern totalitarian states, and by the church against dissenting groups and individuals.

The persecution of the church by the Roman Empire was motivated primarily by political and social considerations. Religiones were not persecuted as such, but only when considered subversive to public morality and order. Restrictions, however, were imposed on the dissemination of some foreign cults, and thus arose the distinction between religiones licitae and illicitae. Judaism was a permitted religion, but Christianity, when it emerged as a distinct cult, forfeited the immunity, and was persecuted as politically dangerous because of the Christian rejection of emperor worship*, as socially subversive because of Christian abstention from many walks of life and in general because Christian "atheism" with reference to the pagan gods would incur divine displeasure for the community. The charge of immorality was also levelled in a few instances, when Christians were accused of incest and cannibalism.

Christian persecution of dissenters was possible by force only after the state under Constantine came to be on the side of the church. The theory altered from that of the Roman Empire in that concern was no longer so much for tranquillity on earth as for salvation in heaven. The conditions of salvation were believed to be orthodox belief and membership in the visible church. The first instance of persecution on an extensive scale was that against the Donatists* of northern Africa in the early fifth century, who were both schismatics and disturbers of the peace. St. Augustine formulated the theory of Christian constraint. On two necessary counts he was already well convinced' that the truth of the church's teaching can be known and that the points rejected by the heretics are important. On a third requisite point he was convinced by the actual success of coercion against the Donatists, namely that persecution is effective. Such constraint was harmonized with Christian love on the ground that force was designed to save alike the heretic and his victims from damnation. Heresy must be amputated like a diseased member to conserve the health of the body. Such statements were relatively innocuous in the mouth of St. Augustine because he did not personify the state nor admit the death penalty. But when these two further steps were taken the way was open for the Inquisition.

It was a long' time in coming, however, for the western church was free from any important heretical movements from the barbarian invasions to the twelfth century, when after the first crusades dissenting movements began to swarm. Against them was established the Inquisition*. The Protestant Reformation brought little immediate change. The outstanding reformers like Luther, Calvin and Zwingli believed in the death penalty for heresy, or, as Luther preferred to say, for blasphemy. Though the legislation against heresy in the canon law was rejected by the reformers, the prescriptions of the revived code of Justinian took its place. But the Reformation, by breaking the unity of the medieval church, contributed unwittingly to the rise of religious liberty*.

E. G. Hardy, Christianity and the Roman Government (1894, reprint 1925); Persecution and Liberty, Essays in honor of George Lincoln Burr, 1931).   R.H.B.

Persephone: Daughter of Demeter, in Greek mythology. Abducted by Hades to become his wife and queen of the underworld, she was allowed to spend two-thirds of each year with her mother. This myth is believed to have been the core of the Eleusinian* mysteries.   P.G.M.

perseverance of the saints: The last of the five points* of Calvinism*, as formulated by the Synod of Dort*, 1619, is thus named. The meaning is that those elected by God are sustained by Him in a state of grace*, despite weaknesses and falls, and thus assured of final salvation. The doctrine is stated in the Westminster Confession of Faith, chapter XVII. An old subject of controversy between Calvinists and Arminians (Methodists) was the possibility of falling from grace. See final perseverance.   R.H.N.

Persia, religions of: The Aryan, Zoroastrian, and Shiite religions. The religion of the ancient Iranians (Aryans), who invaded Iran about 2000 B.C., was that of their kinsmen, the Vedic Indians: they worshiped gods of nature or Daivas (Indra and the Nasatyas) and gods of human society or Asuras (Mithra and Varuna); they recognized the inflexible order of the world (rita, Iranian asha), they prepared the sacred drink soma (Iranian haoma), and they told the myths of the first man Yama (Iranian Yima) and of the killing of the dragon.

Zarathustra ("rich in camels"), or Zoroaster*, reformed this ancient Aryan religion. He was probably born in Media about 660 B.C. and was active in Bactria where, after many discouraging experiences, he converted king Vishtasp (Hystaspes). His teaching is best preserved in the five Gathas, the oldest hymns of the Avesta* (Yasna, chs. 28-53). In addition to the liturgical psalms of the Yasna, the Avesta includes the liturgies of the Vispered ("all lords"), the ritual prescriptions of the Vendidad* ("the law against the demons"), the 21 hymns in praise of angels (in part ancient Aryan deities) in the Yasht* ("worship by praise"), and the layman's prayer book called Khorda Avesta ("little Avesta"). Zoroaster did not entirely suppress the ancient Aryan mythology, but he emphasized, like Buddha* "good thoughts, words, and deeds." The world is the battlefield between the forces of good and evil. The ranks of the good are headed by Ahura Mazda* ("Lord Wisdom") or Ormuzd, the supreme god, and his seven Amesha Spenta ("blessing immortals"): Spenta Mainyu ("blessing spirit" or Holy Ghost), Vohu Mana ("good mind"), Asha ("truth," the cosmic order), Khshathra Vairya ("desirable royal rule"), Armaiti ("piety"), Haurvatat ("salvation"), Ameretat ("immortality"); two other angels are Sraosha ("obedience") and Ashi ("deserved good luck"). The army of good includes the diligent farmer and useful animals like the cock and the dog. The ranks of evil include demons who are the counterpart of the angels, particularly Druj ("deceit") and Aeshma ("wrath"); after Zoroaster Angra Manyu ("evil spirit"), or Ahriman*, was opposed to Ahura Mazda as the embodiment of evil. Plundering Bedouins, teachers of falsehood, sorcerers, snakes, wolves, ants, and the like, are fighters in the army of evil and darkness. The duties of Zoroaster's followers are the cultivation of the soil, the care of the flocks and herds, the persistent fight against the nomads, and the spread of the true doctrine. Their rewards are both terrestrial prosperity and heavenly bliss, but when an evil soul tries to cross after death, the Cinvat ("separation") Bridge, it precipitates into the House of Lies, to be tormented and be fed revolting food. At the end of time, after the final battle, there will be retribution "through the spirit and the fire": the truthful will receive eternal glory, the wicked will moan in darkness. In the late parts of the Avesta this teaching of Zoroaster was supplemented with survivals of Aryan mythology (in the Yashts), and more elaborate details about the liturgy and the eschatology (including the resurrection). Through the doctrine of Zurvan ("time" in the sense of fate) an attempt was made to solve the dualism between Ormuzd and Ahriman. Zoroastrianism survives today among about 10,000 Gabars in Persia and about 100,000 Parsis in Bombay and vicinity. After the Moslem conquest (637-650), the Persians adopted Islam* in its orthodox (Sunnite*) form, but after 1500 the Shiite* (from Shi'ah, party) movement, which regards Ali (d. 661) and his descendants as divinely inspired Imams, became the national religion of Persia. See mystery religions; Sufism, Zervanism.

A. V. W. Jackson, Zoroaster the Prophet of Ancient Iran (1899); J. H. Moulton, Early Zoroastrianism (1913); M. N. Dhalla, Zoroastrian Theology (1915); History of Zoroastrianism (1938); H S Nyberg, Die Religionen des alten Iran (Mitteil. d. Vorderasiat. Gesellsch. 43, Leipzig, 1938).

R.H.P.

personal, God as: See God as personal.

personal counseling: See counseling, personal.

personalism: (Lat., persona, a mask, an actor, his role, dignity; cf. Allport, Personality, 25-29) A philosophical system in which persons (or selves) are the sole (or dominant) metaphysical realities, as well as the only ultimate intrinsic values. Personalism means by person "an individual substance of a rational nature" (Boethius, 6th cent., although most modern personalists reject the old view of substance), rather than the psychophysical organism.

1) History. The term personalism was first used by Schleiermacher in his Reden (1799), as equivalent to theism*. It was first used philosophically in England by John Grote (1865). It seems to have been introduced into American terminology by Walt Whitman in his essay, "Personalism" (in the Galaxy, 1868); Bronson Alcott probably derived his use of the term from Whitman. Renouvier's Le Personnalisme (1903) led to its adoption in America by M. W. Calkins (1907) and B. P. Bowne (1908). W. Stern's critical personalism (1906) further popularized it. Some neo-scholastics (Maritain, Mounier) call themselves personalists. Modern personalism is especially influenced by Plato, Aristotle, Plotinus, St. Augustine, St. Thomas, Berkeley, Leibniz, Kant, Fichte, Hegel, Schleiermacher, Lotze, and Eucken.

2) Types. Personalisms may be classified (following Knudson) as atheistic (M'Taggart), psychophysically neutral (Stern), relativistic (Renouvier), absolutistic (E. Caird, A. E. Taylor, J. Royce, M. W. Calkins) and theistic, which latter group may be subdivided into idealistic (Bowne, Howison, H. Rashdall, W. R. Sorley, Knudson, Flewelling, Buckham, Brightman, D. Baumgardt, J. S. Moore), panpsychistic (J. Ward, C. Hartshorne, D. H. Parker, W. T.

Stace), and dualistic (G Harkness, Maritain, and perhaps P. Tillich and N. Berdyaev).

3) Main Ideas Personalism proposes a psychology (self psychology, gestalt), a logic (synoptic method, coherence of total personality as criterion of truth), an epistemology (activity of mind in knowledge, dualism of idea and object), and a metaphysics (the universe a society of persons).

4) Theology. The predominant Christian theology is theistic personalism, despite the inroads of naturalistic, humanistic, and impersonalistic thought. Personalistic philosophy has exerted a fruitful influence on diverse theological movements, such as neo-scholasticism (Gilson, Maritain), Christocentric thought sympathetic with neo-supernaturalism (E. Lewis, J. S. Moore, N. Ferré), and the ethical and social interpretation of Christianity (Scheler, H. E. Fosdick, F. J. McConnell). In the main, personalism has appeared in theology as a liberal, "modernistic" force, defending the concept of an omnipotent and absolute God (Bowne, Knudson, Rall, Buckham, Flewelling, Wilson, Youtz, Calkins, Sorley, Temple, Pratt), but more recently developing the idea of a God whose will is limited by factors not created by that will (Rashdall, Brightman, Tsanoff, Hartshorne, Parker, Stace, Harkness, Berdyaev, Bergson, Tillich, Bertocci). The nature of religious experience and the relations of Christianity to culture, society, and world religions have been investigated by Knudson and Hocking.

Personalists in general agree on the personality of God (M'Taggart excepted), teleology and freedomism vs. mechanistic interpretations, synoptic method as opposed to mere analysis, the objectivity of ideal values, and emphasis on ethical and social experience. Liberal personalists incline toward an ethical, personal, rational reinterpretation of Christian thought about the Trinity* (most personalists are modalists), the incarnation (rejecting the "two natures"), inspiration, revelation (denying the revelation of fixed dogmas), the sacraments (note Bowman, A Sacramental Universe), conversion (see Strickland, Psychology of Religious Experience), and salvation. Personalists tend toward semi-Pelagianism and toward Arminian rather than Calvinistic views. Liberal personalists oppose traditional authoritarianism, irrationalism, romanticism*, abstract impersonal Platonism and mediaeval realism, as well as Barthianism*. (Cf. reason in religion.) Kierkegaard*, like Nietzsche, is, however, irrationalistic and romantic but personalistic.

The Personalist (Los Angeles) and Luminar (Mexico City) are quarterly journals largely devoted to personalism and its relations to theology. Cf. Bois, Henri.

See B. P. Bowne, Theism (1902); A. C Knudson, The Philosophy of Personalism (1927); Rall (ed.), Religion and Public Affairs (1937); E. S. Brightman, A Philosophy of Religion (1940): and C. Hartshorne, The Vision of God (1941).

E.S.B.

personalistic psychology: See psychology, schools of.

Peshitta: Standard Syriac version of Bible produced and authorized by Bishop Rabbula about 420 A D for use in churches of Syria and Mesopotamia, the O.T. was based on Old Syriac translation of Hebrew O T made in second or third century A D, the Greek Septuagint, and perhaps other sources; the N.T was partly based on the Greek, partly a revision of the Old Syriac "Separated Gospels" translated from Greek about 200 A D., and perhaps partly based on the still earlier Syriac Diatessaron* of Tatian*; valuable at places for determining original text of Bible. See s. v. Edessa, versions of the Bible, ancient. See works of F. C Burkitt.   R.E.W.

pessimism: (Lat., pessimum, worst, superlative of malum, bad). The view that the world, especially human life, is wholly bad, or at least as bad as possible. Introduced by Schopenhauer*, first used in English in this sense in 1878 (Oxford). For pessimism, evil is lasting, permanent, always victorious; good, transitory and doomed to defeat. Life is not worth living. F. C. S. Schiller in Riddles of the Sphinx states that pessimism may be based on frustration of the ideals of 1) happiness (Gautama Buddha*, Leopardi, Schopenhauer), 2) goodness (St. Paul's view of man apart from God), 3) beauty (aesthetic pessimism, the supersensitive Oscar Wilde), and 4) knowledge (skepticism, as Pyrrho, Sextus Empiricus, and irrationalism, as E. von Hartmann). To these may be added 5) culture (Spengler*). In addition to these theoretical pessimisms, there is psychological or pathological pessimism, an habitual mood of melancholy and despair. See evil; happiness; meliorism; optimism, value.
　　See articles "Optimism and Pessimism" in Baldwin; "Pessimism" in D Runes, Dictionary of Philosophy (1942)   E S.B.

Petau, Denis: (Dionysius Petavius, 1583-1652) French Jesuit distinguished as an historian of dogma and chronologist. His theological works inaugurated a Roman Catholic theology less given to speculation and more to historical research Because of his works on chronology, Petau is considered the founder with Scaliger of the science of ancient chronology.   E.A.R.

Peter: A name conferred by Jesus himself on Simon, the disciple who stood closest to him throughout his ministry. In his house at Capernaum, Jesus made his home, and in almost all the incidents of the Gospel history he takes a prominent part. He was the one disciple who tried to defend Jesus when he was arrested, although during the trial his nerve broke down. It was Peter who had the first vision of the risen Lord, and the church at Jerusalem grew up under his leadership At a later time he took second place to James, whose influence was perhaps responsible for his breach at Antioch with Paul, whose liberal position he had previously shared. According to tradition he finally made his way to Rome, and was put to death in the massacre on the Vatican hill in 64 A.D. Matthew, in his account of the Messianic declaration at Caesarea Philippi, inserts a passage in which Jesus acclaims Peter as the rock on which he will build his church The passage itself is of doubtful authenticity, but it may be granted that without Peter the church could hardly have survived. By his faith and ardour, his kindly and broad-minded temper, and not least by his intellectual gifts (for Paul always speaks of him as his equal) he saved the church in its earliest and most difficult days. See chair of St Peter; Peter, St., First Bishop of Rome, Roman Catholic Church.   E.F S.

Peter Aureoli, O.F.M.: Renowned French scholastic theologian and philosopher. The date of his birth is unknown, he died in 1322 at Avignon. He lectured at Bologna, Toulouse (where he vigorously defended the doctrine of Mary's Immaculate Conception*), and Paris. In the theory of cognition he favored a conceptualistic nominalism*. In 1321 he was appointed Archbishop of Aix, and was created cardinal. He is called the "Doctor Facundus" on account of his ready eloquence.   c.v.

Peter of Chelcice: See Bohemian Brethren.

Peter Comestor: (died 1178) Chancellor in Paris and one of the first ones to write a commentary to the Four Books of the Sentences of Peter Lombard*. He is known as a writer in Homiletics and Biblical History. See biblical history in Christian instruction.   s C.T.

Peter Damian: Born at Ravenna in 1007, Peter passed through a childhood of hardship. Educated at Ravenna and at the University of Parma, he entered the hermitage of Fonte-Avellana around 1035 Friend of Gregory VII and other popes, he spent most of his life combatting evils among the clergy. He was named Cardinal-Bishop of Ostia by Stephen X in 1057. He died at Faenza in 1072. Though Peter was never formally canonized, his feast was extended to the whole Church by Leo XII in 1823, who also pronounced him a Doctor of the Church.   P.S.M.

Peter de Bruys: (?-c 1130) A zealous preacher of gospel poverty burned by a French mob (c 1130) for his excessive attacks on the institutional church   See Petrobrusians   Cf   Henry of Lausanne Schaff-Herzog, Religious Encyclopaedie (1883) Vol. III, p. 1818   R.C.P.

Peter the Hermit: Peter was born at Amiens about 1050. Little is known of his earlier life into which legend has been woven. His rôle as instigator and preacher of the First Crusade has been exaggerated far beyond historical fact. He was but one of many preachers, and his preaching did not begin until after the Council of Clermont. As leader of a small band he went to the East, arriving in Constantinople in August, 1096 He was present at the siege of Antioch in January, 1098, and sometime after this he returned to the West. At Liége he founded the monastery of Neufmoutier, where he died in 1115.   P.S M.

Peter Lombard: Peter Lombard, as his name indicates, was born in the Italian province of Lombardy around the year 1100, and died as bishop of Paris in 1160. He studied first at Bologna, then went to Rheims, and from there to Paris, where he most probably arrived in 1139. His teaching in the cathedral school began soon thereafter, and between 1145-1152 he produced his greatest work, the Libri IV Sententiarum. Though this work was not characterized by originality, it was by far the most complete and systematic compendium of theology that had appeared. It soon became and long remained the theological textbook of the Middle Ages. More commentaries were written on it than on any other book, the Bible alone excepted. More important, Peter and his Sentencebooks inspired a school of speculative theologians at Paris, whose great works developed theological speculation, crowned by the Summa Theologica of St. Thomas Aquinas*. The Lombard also left two great biblical commentaries, one of the psalms, the other on the epistle to the Romans. Together these commentaries came to be designated as the Magna Glossatura. See mystics of Saint Victor; penance; Peter Comestor; satisfaction, Sentences. Cf. Gratian.　　P.S.M.

Peter Lombard's Four Books of Sentences displaced all other existing textbooks. The work is a compilation of the opinions of the Fathers, especially of Augustine, and of his contemporaries. He formally follows Abailard's* method of contrasting the patristic authorities, and in content he largely follows Hugo of St. Victor*. In refraining from the discussion of purely philosophical problems and from the application of philosophy to theology, he follows the example of both. He rejected Abailard's special views and Hugo's speculative elements. By the express recognition of the authorities he helped Abailard's method to victory. Although Hugh of St. Victor had already factually mentioned seven sacraments —baptism, confirmation, eucharist, last unction, marriage, ordination and repentance—it was Lombard who definitely effected their fixation in theological thought.

F. Protois, Pierre Lombard (Paris, 1881); J. N. Espenberger, Die Philosophie des Petrus Lombardus (Münster, 1901); M. Grabmann, Geschichte der scholastischen Methode, (Freiburg im Breisgau, 1911) Vol. II.　　H.H.

Peter, Acts of: A wholly apocryphal* work, giving a legendary account of Peter's last months in Rome and his martyrdom. Written in Greek in the early third century, it is known chiefly through an incomplete Latin version. See pseudepigrapha, N.T. English translation in M. R. James, Apocryphal New Testament (1924), pp. 300-336.　　B.S.E.

Peter, Apocalypse of: An early second century apocryphal* book, describing in some detail the rewards of the righteous and the pains of the wicked. The text, originally in Greek, has been preserved chiefly in Ethiopic. English translation in M. R. James, Apocryphal New Testament (1924), pp. 505-524.　　B.S.E.

Peter, First and Second Letters of: First Peter is an appeal from the church at Rome to all believers in the principal provinces of Asia Minor, to accept the test of persecution without hatred or bitterness for the emperor or the authorities. It seems to be a corrective for the vengeful spirit that found expression in the Revelation (18 6, 20). Christ's way of enduring persecution must be their pattern in the fiery trial that is now coming upon them. They must obey the authorities and respect the emperor. The Roman church had been called upon by the Letter to the Hebrews* to teach the other churches, 5 12, and responded not only with First Peter but with First Clement*, written to the church at Corinth at this very time. But to overtake the dangerous note in the Revelation it claims the authority of Peter, one of its great historic sponsors, who had suffered martyrdom in Rome, and whose tomb is guarded. It was written not far from A.D 95, while the demand for emperor worship* still hung over the churches.

Second Peter was written not long after the middle of the second century, to recall the churches to a lively expectation of the Second Coming of Christ. The writer knows the Fourfold Gospel, and the collected letters of Paul, which ignorant unsteadfast people twist to their own ruin, a clear reference to the followers of Marcion*. He also knows I Peter, Hebrews and probably the Revelation, certainly Jude, which he reproduces practically in full in his second chapter, giving that passionate invective a new object in those who deny the Second Coming. See pseudepigrapha, N.T.

F. J. A Hort, The First Epistle of St. Peter (1898); J. B. Mayor, The Epistle of St. Jude and the Second Epistle of St. Peter (1907).　　E.J.G.

Peter, Gospel of: A Syrian docetic* work, written about 150. Only a fragment has survived, describing the Passion and Resurrection. English translation in M. R. James, Apocryphal New Testament (1924), pp. 90-94. See pseudepigrapha, N.T.　　B.S.E.

Peter, Preaching of: A second-century defence of Christianity, preserved only in short patristic* citations; English translation in M. R. James, Apocryphal New Testament (1924), pp. 16-19. But the first three extracts on p. 19 may come from a different work, The Doctrine of Peter. See canons of various churches.　　B.S.E.

Peter, St., First Bishop of Rome: (Catholic Conception) Since Christ established His Church as a perennial, living organization (cf. Math. 16, 18) there must be at all times someone to take His place as its official visible head. No perfect society can be conceived without members, a head, and a common purpose that unites all. Christ's first Vicar on earth as head of His Church was Peter. This is generally admitted, according to the well-known text: "Thou art Peter, and upon this rock I shall build my Church" (Matt. 16, 18-19). Since the Church was instituted as a living, perpetual organization ("the gates of Hell shall not prevail against her" Math. 16, 18) she was not to cease with the death of Peter. This seemed self-evident to the first Christians and thus, as Eusebius* (315) in his History (IV 1) narrates, they selected "Linus (67-79?) who was the first after Peter that obtained the Episcopate of the Church of the Romans". Then they selected Cletus (or Anacletus) and thereafter Clement (98-99?)*, etc., to take Peter's place as their head and bishop. (Cf. Vatican Council, Sess. 4, ch. 1, 2, ib Canon 1, also ib ch. 4, H. Denziger-Umberg, Enchiridion Symbolorum, Freiburg in Br., 1932, pp. 501-8). Not only did the early Christians look upon every Bishop of Rome as successor to Peter, but likewise believed and professed that since his position was identical with that of Peter as primate of the Church universal, he was also endowed by the Saviour with the same prerogatives as was Peter (cf. Decree of the Council of Florence, 1439; cf. Denziger, 1 c. p. 253 No. 694), for, any and every head of any given organization enjoys the same rights, honors and privileges as his predecessor enjoyed, in virtue of his office, unless curtailed or enlarged by constitutional amendments made by duly qualified representatives of the whole body. Accordingly, the Apologists* and Fathers of the Church attribute to the successors of Peter, as visible head of the Church, who came to be known as popes* or Roman Pontiffs, the same attributes that Christ conferred on Peter, i.e.,. 1) unified and unqualified executive power, based on John 21, 15: "Feed my lambs, feed my sheep", and on Math. 16, 18 "to thee I give the keys* of the kingdom of Heaven", 2) universal legislative power, "Whatsoever thou shalt bind on earth, shall also be bound in Heaven, whatsoever that thou loose on earth shall also be loosed in Heaven" (Math. 16, 19); 3) supreme judicial power. "And if he (i.e., a brother who has sinned against another) refuse to hear them (i.e., two or three witnesses) appeal to the Church; but if he refuse to hear even the Church, let him be to thee as a heathen and the publican. Amen, I say to you whatsoever you bind", etc. (Math. 18, 17-18); 4) infallibility (not to be confounded with impeccability or prognostication, etc.) "I have prayed for thee, Peter, that thy faith fail not" (Luke, 22, 32) and finally, 5) primacy over all other bishops in the Church. "And thou in turn confirm thy brethren" (ib.); "feed (not only) my lambs (i.e., the younger, the faithful of the flock, but also) feed my sheep" (John, 21, 15) i.e., the bishops or spiritual parents of the lambs (cf. I Cor. 4, 15; Philem. v. 10). That Christ refers here to a spiritual food, i.e., doctrine is evident from the whole context. After all St. Peter was not a shepherd by occupation, but a fisherman and even that trade Christ bade him relinquish for the spiritual catch of fish: "Henceforth thou shalt catch men" (Luke 5, 10). Peter's name invariably precedes the names of all the other Apostles (cf. Math. 10, 2; Mark. 3, 16; Luke 6, 13-14; Math. 17, 1), and yet he was not the first in point of time to have been called to the Apostolate by the Saviour. It is Peter who presides over the first Council of Jerusalem (Acts. XV). That the Bishops of Rome were also considered successors of Peter as head of the Church universal (not only of the See of Rome), is borne out by historical facts and references in both the Eastern and Western Churches to the complete satisfaction of Catholic Apologists, theologians and historians (cf. "Pope"). These latter hold also that the primacy of the Roman Pontiff both of honor and of jurisdiction over the Church Universal is entirely independent of the question of the historical proofs for the presence of Peter in Rome, although all hold that fact can be conclusively proven (cf. B. Conway, C.S.P. Question Box (1929), p. 143), that it is independent of the military power and expansion of the Roman Empire during the first three centuries which rather did everything to stay the progress of this Primacy rather than assist in its spread, and finally that it is entirely independent of Constantine's conversion (313) and the favors of subsequent Roman Christian Emperors, both before and after Charlemagne (800 A D.). The position of the Roman Pontiffs, as successors of Peter, the first Bishop of Rome, rests primarily on biblical texts and traditional documents. It is for that reason both dogmatical and historical. All else is supplementary and corroborative. See clergy.

For the Catholic interpretation of the Biblical texts used cf A Commentary on the New Testament Prepared by the Catholic Biblical Association (1942).   R.M H.

Peter, St., chair of: See chair of St. Peter.

Peter's pence: The name given to an annual tax, originally of a penny from each householder, levied in England by the papacy.   W.S.H

Petrarch: (1304-1374) Poet, scholar and rhetorician, who is regarded as the pioneer of the Renaissance* in Italy. A writer of Latin verse and prose and of Italian lyrics, a collector of mss., an amateur diplomatist; a priest who remained orthodox in religion, and a close friend of Boccaccio*.   S.M.G.

Petri, Laurentius: (1499-1573) A younger brother of Olavus Petri* became the first Lutheran archbishop of Sweden in 1531. His long episcopate marked the establishment of the evangelical church in Sweden, to which he gave the first legal constitution (ready, in main, in 1561, though first adopted in 1571). He gave his church leadership in resisting royal encroachment and maintaining independent status. The inner life of the church was enriched by his contributions in catechetical, homiletical, and devotional material, in Bible translation, hymn writing and liturgical formulations. The ecclesiastical structure of the Swedish Church in the Reformation period was due to his persistent and wise labors.   C.J.B.

Petri, Olavus: (1493-1552) The spiritual leader of the Reformation in Sweden. Following training in Leipzig and Wittenberg, Olavus returned to Sweden and, with Laurentius Andrae* joined the king, Gustavus Vasa, in introducing reforms in Swedish Church and State. He was the ablest literary force of the Swedish Reformation, using his talents to produce devotional literature, Bible translation, apologetic treatises, a Swedish Mass, a Swedish Hymn Book, homiletical and historical works. Though aiding Gustavus in establishing a church independent of Rome, he withstood the royal attempts to dominate the Church. For generations to come the contributions of Olavus determined the spirit and character of the Lutheran Church in Sweden.   C.J.B.

Petrobrusians: As followers of Peter de Bruys*, they reputedly disavowed church buildings, crosses, infant baptism, the Lord's Supper, prayers for the dead, ecclesiastical chants, and, indeed, all ceremonialism.
    The Catholic Encyclopedia (1913), Vol. XI, p. 781.   R.C.P.

Pfister, Oskar Robert: (1873-   ) He was pastor of one of the city churches in Zurich, Switzerland. He recommended as an enthusiastic follower of S. Freud* the method of psychoanalytical healing for dealing with the problems of pastoral care. As a leader in the psychoanalytic movement, he rejected Freud's view that all the higher developments of spiritual life, Christianity included, are so-called sublimations of repressed sexual complexes.
    The Psychoanalytic Method (London, 1913), Die Frömmigkeit des Grafen Zinzendorf (Wien, 1925), 2 ed, Zur Psychologie des philosophischen Denkens (Bern, 1923); Analytische Seelsorge. Einführung in die praktische Psychoanalyse für Pfarrer und Laien. (Göttingen, 1927).   H.H.

Pfleiderer, Otto: (1839-1908) A German Protestant scholar and theologian. An adherent of the so-called Tubingen School*, an Hegelian in philosophy, Professor of Practical Theology at Jena from 1870, and of N.T. and Systematic Theology at Berlin from 1875. Most important writings Religionsphilosophie (3rd ed. 1896) and Das Urchristentum 2nd ed. 1902.   S.M.G.

phallic, phallicism, phallism: The worship of the generative or reproductive powers of nature symbolized by the sex organs, the phallus being the male organ of sex. Phallicism is found widely scattered over the whole earth among most primitive religions, and usually wherever there is a fertility cult*. The lingam*, emblem of the Hindu God Shiva*, found in temples dedicated to his worship is an example. Vestiges of phallicism are found in most of the more highly developed religions. See E.R.E., Vol. 9, Article, Phallism.
                                              C.S.B.

Pharisees, the: The Pharisees (in Hebrew, Perushim, a word whose meaning is shrouded in uncertainty) emerged as a distinct group a short time after the Maccabean Revolt. Though the official adherents of this party were not many, they were the representatives, in actuality, of the religious beliefs, practices, and social outlook of the vast majority of the common people of their day. The Pharisaic leaders usually rose from the ranks of the masses and their long and bitter struggle against the Sadducees*, the representatives of the priestly aristocracy, was in essence an attempt to democratize the Jewish religion and remove it from the rigid control of the Temple priests. Thus, for example, a great many of the ceremonies introduced by the Pharisees in the home were originally part of the Temple ritual and limited to the confines of the Temple*. Similarly, in their theological doctrines, such as the belief in the future life and the existence of angels* (doctrines denied by the Sadducees) the Pharisees voiced the hopes of the oppressed masses

The Pharisees, as a whole, possessed a high degree of ethical sensitivity. The N.T. characterizations of the Pharisees as "hypocrites" and "offspring of vipers" were directed against a minority of insincere, hypocritical members who were condemned by the recognized authorities of the group itself, and not, as is mistakenly assumed, against the Pharisaic group itself. See Hasideans; Israel, religion and theology; scribe.
    Louis Finkelstein, The Pharisees, The Social Background of their Faith (2nd Rev. Ed 1939); R. T. Herford, Pharisaism, Its Aim and Method (London, 1912), What the World Owes to the Pharisees (London, 1919); "The Significance of Pharisaism " in Judaism and the Beginnings of Christianity (London, 1924) pp 125-166, The Truth about the Pharisees (1925), The Pharisees (London, 1924); H Loewe, "Pharisaism," in Judaism and Christianity, I, edited by W O E Oesterley (1937), pp. 3-58; "The Ideas of Pharisaism," JQR, N S., VI. (1915-1916), pp. 415-422.   E.B.—L.F.

phenomenalism: See epistemology.

phenomenology: Hegel uses the term to indicate the particular facts which express the progress of mind from the lower forms of experiencing to the highest stage of absolute thought. In current philosophical literature it is used chiefly to refer to the philosophy of Edmund Husserl* (1859-1938) and his associates. Literally it means "science of phenomena", where phenomenon is taken not in the Kantian but in the Greek sense of "that which displays itself". Influenced by Brentano's "intentional" theory of conscious states as always "of something" and by Dilthey's "correlativistic" view of subject and object as contributing mutually to a necessary relation, Husserl tried to apply Descartes's method of rigorous doubt in such a way as to eliminate all except the phenomenon as it must appear to pure consciousness. All relation to fact and the empirical world is "bracketed". In the phenomenological intuition we see the object as eidos or essence (Wesen), i.e., as it must be and cannot help being. In this way we begin where Kant left off and ask not how knowledge, but how logic itself is possible. We find that it is possible because we can intuit directly its relationships. Our task is that not of deducing the rational but describing the conceivable, or that which comes with Evidenz as incontrovertibly given.

After analyzing the essence as the noema or objective pole of an intuition, the subjective pole of which is the noesis, Husserl went on in his later work to explain the nature of the transcendental consciousness which gives meaning to experience, and attempted to work out an a priori science of pure consciousness which should provide the groundwork for all science and knowledge. But his apparent withdrawal into idealism did not solve the problem as to the status of objects of intuition, or the relation of the empirical to the transcendental ego, or the extent to which what is "given" in intuition has already been "taken" by mind. Much debate has ensued.

In general, Husserl's followers have adopted his method of rigid analysis rather than his attempts at system building, important as he himself considered the latter, and have applied the method with significant results in different fields. Thus Max Scheler* (1874-1928) has used it in his analysis of values as essences and in his description of the experience of the holy, and Martin Heidegger* (1889-) has applied it to ontology, while Nicolai Hartmann* (1882-) has employed it in ethics. Moritz Geiger (1880-1937) applied phenomenology to aesthetics and Alexander Pfänder (1870-1941) rebelling, with Husserl, against psychologism, used Husserl's methods in his study of motivation. The Gestalt psychologists point to Husserl's article Philosophie als strenge Wissenschaft (1910) with its plea for a special psychological method as influencing their emphasis on configurations and on the intuitable nature of meanings Rudolf Otto's (1869-1937) Das Heslige (1917) was accepted by Husserl as an application of phenomenology to religion. In the work of Karl Jaspers* (1883-) phenomenology fuses with the philosophy of Existenz. Cf. Peirce, C.

Cf E Husserl, Logische Untersuchungen (1900-01) 2 vols , Ideen zu einer reinen Phanomenologie und phänomenologischen Philosophie (1913, Eng. tr. 1931) ; Max Scheler, Der Formalismus in der Ethik etc. (1926) ; M. Heidegger, Sein und Zeit (1926) ; N Hartmann, Ethik (1926, Eng tr. 1932) 3 vols , M Geiger, Zum Problem der Stimmungseinfühlung (Zeitschrift für Aesthetik etc. vol. VI) , A. Pfander, Einführung in die Psychologie (1920) , M. Farber, Phenomenology as a Method etc. (1928), ed Philosophical Essays in Memory of Edmund Husserl (1940) , E. P Welch, The Philosophy of Edmund Husserl (1941) ; D. Cairns, Art. Phenomenology in Dictionary of Philosophy (1942) ; S. Hook, "Husserl's Philosophical Idealism" Journal of Philosophy (1930). Also articles in Jahrbuch für Philosophie und Phänomenologische Forschung (1913-30) and Philosophy and Phenomenological Research (1940-)   J.S.B.

philanthropy: See practical religion.

Philemon, Letter to: A runaway slave, named Onesimus*, probably from Laodicea found his way into Paul's circle at Rome and became a Christian. Paul knew well enough that there could be no safety for him until he had made matters right with his master Philemon, so he sent the young man back to him with a short letter of explanation. Paul wishes Philemon to receive Onesimus not as a slave but as a Christian brother, and intimates a wish that Philemon would send Onesimus back to him, not to be his servant but to help him in his religious work. In the Roman empire a master could punish a runaway slave with the utmost cruelty, and Paul addresses his letter not only to Philemon but to Apphia (his wife?), Archippus (the minister of the local church?) and the church that meets in Philemon's house, thus making the whole local church aware of Onesimus' case and presumably of Philemon's action about it. Paul was sending Onesimus into the lion's mouth when he induced him to return to his master, and could hardly have done less than bring the social pressure of the local church to bear upon Philemon. This encourages the idea that Philemon is the Letter from Laodicea referred to in Col 4 16, and explains why Paul should have wished this personal letter read to the neighboring church at Colossae. A prisoner far away at Rome, he could still throw the protection of these two churches of the Lycus valley about the defenceless slave Onesimus, when he made his appearance before his master Philemon. Probable date, 60 A.D.

John Knox, Philemon among the Letters of Paul (1935).   E.J.G.

Philip of Hesse: (1504-1567) Landgrave of Hesse, the most eminent of the Protestant princes at the time of the Reformation*. Having taken a leading part in the crushing of the Peasant* Revolution in 1525, Philip adopted the reformed faith and devoted himself to promoting unity among the Protestants and in securing military aid for them from abroad. Seeking to bring together the followers of Luther and of Zwingli he arranged the Marburg colloquy between the two leaders in 1529. The formation of the Schmalkald League* in 1530 was largely his work. In 1534 he won a brilliant victory over Emperor Charles V* at Laufen and restored Ulrich of Wuertemberg to his duchy. Philip's ambitious and successful course was halted by the disgrace attending his bigamy with Margaret von der Saale whom he married in 1540 with the consent of his legal wife Christine of Saxony. Philip had also wrung permission from the reformers on the condition that the second marriage be kept secret. It soon became known, however, alienating Philip from his confederates while strengthening the hand of his enemies. Surrendering to the Emperor in 1547, Philip was kept prisoner until 1552 when the defeat of the Hapsburgs at the hands of Philip's son-in-law Maurice of Saxony enabled him to return to Hesse.   T.A.K.

Philippi, Friedrich Adolf: (1809-1882) He was professor in Dorpat (now Tartu, Estonia). As a converted Jew he applied Jewish legalism to the doctrines of the church. Showing an inquisitorial enthusiasm, he, with Kliefoth* and Diekhoff, made the Mecklenburg church one of the most intolerant churches in Germany. See neo-Lutheranism.

Kirchliche Glaubenslehre (Stuttgart, 1854-79) 6 vols.   H H.

Philippians, Letter to the: Paul's most loyal friends, so far as we know, were the Philippians, who when they learned of his removal to Rome as a prisoner to await his trial, raised money for his needs and sent one of their number, Epaphroditus, to look after him. This is the situation reflected in 4 10-20, and the second half of our Philippians, 3.2—4 23, may be a letter sent them by Paul when he first received their gift. Epaphroditus became very sick in Rome, however, and when he was better, Paul sent him back to Philippi, with a letter explaining his return This is the situation reflected in 2 19-30, so that the first half of our Philippians may be a letter put in the hand of Epaphroditus when Paul sent him home to Philippi. The outburst against the Judaizers, 3·2, is in strong contrast to the tranquil tone of 3.1, and favors this explanation of the letter as the putting together of two notes to Philippi, representing two stages in the matter of the Philippians' aid. If the letter is a unit, however, it is difficult to see why the "business" should not have been treated in one section, toward the end, which seems to have been Paul's way. The enforcement of humility by the example of Christ's humbling himself leads to a great Christological passage, 2 1-11. Paul's own disappointed hopes for a western mission have taught him the great lesson of thinking on what is true, worthy, right, pure, amiable, kindly, 4 8. The letter or letters, if it is two, must have been written early in Paul's stay in Rome, probably in A.D. 59 or 60.

J. B. Lightfoot, St. Paul's Epistle to the Philippians (4th ed., 1878). Marvin R Vincent, The Epistles to the Philippians and to Philemon (1897).

E.J.G.

Philippists: Followers of Philip Melanchthon* who toned down Luther's doctrines of salvation by faith alone and of the Lord's supper, the latter to accommodate Calvinism. They accepted the Leipzig Interim* in 1548, were stoutly opposed by staunch Lutherans, and suppressed in 1574 by the Elector of Saxony. Cf. Formula of Concord.

E.C.K.

Philistines: Ancient people who gave to Palestine its name and are often mentioned in the O.T. By their attacks on the Israelites, they are partly responsible for the rise of the Israelite monarchy.

See R. A. S. Macalister, The Philistines, their History and Civilization (1914) ; O. Eissfeldt, Philister und Phönizer (1936).

S.L.T.

Philo Judaeus: (30 B.C.-50 A.D.) Being a pure combination of Hebraism and Hellenism, his extant writings form a fairly comprehensive theological system of the intellectual life of Diaspora Jewry in Hellenistic Egypt. His work is not systematic, being in the nature of a commentary on Holy Writ. As an apologist he tries to show that all wisdom of Hellas has its origin in the teachings of Moses. He explains God's relation to this imperfect world through the intervention of the logos. His negative theology is only a means of stressing the perfection of God. Not self-effacement, but ecstatic rapture, "enthusiasm" or "sober ebriety", will bridge the gap between man and God. By resorting to allegorical interpretation, Philo transforms the historical personalities and events recorded in Scripture into personifica-tions of abstract ideas and virtues   See Alexandrian school; Platonism.

W Bossuet, Die Religion des Spätjudentums im neutestamentlichen Zeitalter (Leipzig, 1926), 3rd ed by H. Gressmann, J S Boughton, The Idea of Progress in Philo Judaeus (1932) , E Brehier, Les Idées philosophiques et religieuses de Philon d Alexandrie (Paris, 1925) ; F. Geiger, Philon von Alexandreia also sozialer Denker (Stuttgart, 1932) , I Heinemann, Philos griechische und jüdische Bildung (Breslau, 1932) philosophical theology: See theology.

H.H.

philosophy: (philos lover; sophia, wisdom) The following, taken together, may well serve to define the subject-matter of philosophy. Philosophy is the "attempt to think clearly and methodically about certain notions (concepts) which are always turning up in our thinking and which seem necessary to our thinking but which the special sciences do not tell us about." (William James). "Philosophy is an attempt to combine the common experiences of life on the one hand and the results of the special sciences on the other into a consistent and harmonious world-theory." (G. T. W. Patrick). "The philosopher", said Plato, "is the spectator of all time and of all existence." "Philosophy is the attempt to see life steadily and see it whole." (Matthew Arnold.)

Introductory texts G T W Patrick, Introduction to Philosophy (rev. ed , 1935) ; E S Brightman, An Introduction to Philosophy (1925) , Vergilius Ferm, First Adventures in Philosophy (1936).

V.F.

philosophy of history: Herodotus is not only the "father of history", he is also the first philosopher of history. "The god likes to check exceeding things", he says. He wrote his book in order to prove the power and efficacy of Divine Providence. He does not, however, recognize any fundamental difference between nature and history. In that he is a genuine Greek. Greek thought is centered in the idea of the cosmos as the divine order, this order is eternal, it does not change. The strongest philosophic expression of this view is the Platonic conception of the realm of Ideals, in such a scheme no place exists for the ultimate meaning of an historical development, of the uniqueness and originality of the individual, of historical progress and eschatological visions. These aspects arose not before the Christian faith began to influence the thinking mind.

The first representatives of a philosophy of history proper were therefore Christian thinkers like Tertullian, Origen and Augustine. Especially the last deserves the name of the first great thinker who gave an account of the meaning of history. Antiquity held that the cosmic forces produced cycles* of ever returning periods. This theory was seriously examined and rejected by Augustine (De civitate dei XII). The cosmos no longer is the ultimate reality, God is not like the gods subordinate to the cosmic order and to the all-powerful might of Fate*, He is the Creator of the world and His main purpose is the salvation of man. The appearance of Christ on earth is a unique event that makes history ultimately meaningful. History has a beginning in God, it has its center in Christ and its end in the final consummation and the Last Judgment*. It is not a process that repeats itself over and over again. Only by this Christian conception, a philosophy of history as distinguished from mere historical reports and from cosmological speculation becomes possible.

In modern times thought partly returned to the Greek cosmocentric point of view though in a fashion modified by the natural sciences. Instead of the religious philosophy of history a secular reflection emerged. Human life was regarded as akin to animal life, human development as akin to the biological evolution. The first thinker of rank in this respect is Giovanni Battista Vico (1668-1744). He described the development of nations as an analogue to that of the individual and tried to find out the law that controls both. This naturalistic, neo-pagan contemplation of man and human acts and accomplishments culminates in the 19th century in the materialistic conception of history proclaimed by Marx* and his followers and by the Darwinists.

In the classical period of German thought and poetry men like Lessing* and Herder, Kant and Fichte, Schelling and Hegel created a philosophy of history that would combine both the Christian and the modern views by means of speculative ideas concerning the origin, the course and the end of human life. The greatest, but also the most severely criticized panorama of the entire world history in its concrete development was displayed by Hegel* who ventured to derive even details from his fundamental metaphysical principles in a dialectical fashion.

After the decay of this metaphysical period a new philosophic science of history was produced· the theory of historical knowledge. Especially in the last third of the 19th century a manifold of aspects in this field was discovered by thinkers like Gustav Droysen, Grundriss der Historic, engl., tr. The Principles of History (Bonn, 1893), Wilhelm Dilthey, Einleitung in die Geisteswissenchaften (1883), Georg Simmel, Die Probleme der Geschichtsphilosophie (1892); and Heinrich Rickert, Die Grenzen der naturwissenschaftlichen Begriffsbildung (1896-1902). See Heilsgeschichte; progress.   R.K.

philosophy of religion: An inquiry into the general subject of religion from the philosophical point of view, i.e., an inquiry employing the accepted tools of critical analysis and evaluation without a predisposition to defend or reject the claims of any particular religion. Among the specific questions considered are. the nature, function and value of religion, the validity of the claims of religious knowledge; the relation of religion and ethics; the character of ideal religion; the nature of evil; the problem of theodicy; revealed versus natural religion; the problem of the human spirit (soul) and its destiny; the relation of the human to the divine as to the freedom and responsibility of the individual and the character (if any) of a divine purpose; evaluation of the claims of prophecy, mystic intuitions, special revelations, inspired utterances, the value of prayers of petition; the human hope of immortality, evaluation of institutional forms of expressions, rituals, creeds, ceremonies, rites, missionary propaganda, the meaning of human existence; the character of value, its status in the world of reality; the existence and character of deity, the nature of belief and faith, etc.

The subject of the philosophy of religion is regarded in conservative circles not as a discipline given to free philosophical inquiry but as a particular religion's philosophy. In this form it is a more or less disguised apologetics or defense of an already accepted religious faith. While the data for this subject include the so-called classical religions, philosophy of religion, in the genuinely philosophical sense, takes for its material religious expressions of all types, whether classical or not, together with all the psychological material available on the nature of the human spirit and man's whole cultural development.

The philosopher of religion and the philosophical theologian in so far as they employ the spirit of free inquiry and philosophical method to matters pertaining to the question of God and related questions find their fields merging. Numbers of contemporary theologians are philosophers of religion and philosophers of religion theologians. In so far as the theologian may limit his inquiry to the problem of God and/or to a particular religion, his field becomes much more restricted than that of the philosopher of religion. See reason in religion, religion, theology

W. E. Hocking, The Meaning of God in Human Experience (1912) ; J. Royce, The Problem of Christianity (1913), vols. I and II; G. Galloway, The Philosophy of Religion (1914) , H. Hoffding, The Philosophy of Religion, tr from the German, 2nd ed. (1914) , A Sabatier, Outlines of a Philosophy of Religion (n d) ; S. Radhakrishnan, The Reign of Religion in Contemporary Philosophy (1920) ; W. R Matthews, Studies in Christian Philosophy (1921) , W K. Wright, A Student's Philosophy of Religion (1922) ; D C. Macintosh, The Reasonableness of Christianity (1925) ; F. R Tennant, Philosophical Theology, in two volumes (1928, 1930) ; D C. Macintosh, The Pilgrimage of Faith (1931) , H Bergson, The Two Sources of Morality and Religion (1932) ; Contemporary American Theology, vol. I (1932), vol. II (1933), ed. by Vergilius Ferm; H N. Wieman and B. E. Meland, American Philosophies of Religion (1936) ; V. Ferm, First Chapters in Religious Philosophy (1937) ; E. S. Brightman, A Philosophy of Religion (1940) ; A. C. Garnett, A Realistic Philosophy of Religion (1942).   V.F.

Phoenicians: The word "Phoenician" is historically, geographically and culturally synonymous with "Canaanite*." The Phoenicians called themselves Canaanites down to the end of Phoenician cultural life in Syria; and their Carthaginian descendants still did so in the fifth century A.D. Canaanite language and religion can be traced back to the beginning of the second millenium B C., and there is no serious reason for denying that Canaanites had been living in Phoenicia and Palestine long before, in the Early Bronze Age.

Thanks to the great discovery of hundreds of Canaanite texts of circa 1400 B.C. at Ras Shamirah (ancient Ugarit*) in 1929-1939, we can show that the Phoenicians had just as sharply defined a religion as the Egyptians* and Sumero*-Accadians, though cruder in type.

The head of their pantheon was El and his consort was Ashirat. The great active god was Baal or Haadu (Hadad), the storm god and king of gods. His common later title is Baal Shamem (lord of heaven). The goddesses Astarte (Ashiat) and Anath were pictured as naked goddesses of fecundity, though also considered as virgins. See Baalism. H.K.—L.F.

Photius: (858-67, 877-86) Patriarch of Constantinople, was chosen for his office by Caesar Bardas, after the previous patriarch, Ignatius, had been deposed. Photius, the most learned man of the age, was a layman at the time of his appointment, and was consecrated uncanonically, within five days. He soon came into conflict with the masterful Pope Nicholas I*, who refused to acknowledge Photius as patriarch, for the latter had rejected the pope's request for the restoration of Illyricum and Calabria to papal jurisdiction. Consequently, Nicholas resolved to champion the cause of Ignatius. Acting on his claim to supreme jurisdiction, Nicholas excommunicated Photius and declared Ignatius restored (863). But Photius repudiated the papal claim to supremacy, and championed the theory that Rome's primacy is that of honor, not of jurisdiction. The ensuing struggle, augmented by the quarrel over Bulgaria, resulted in a schism.

When Emperor Basil I came to the throne (867), he deposed Photius, thus terminating the schism with Rome, and restored Ignatius. But after the latter's death (877), Photius once more took possession of the patriarchal throne, to be deposed the second time when Emperor Leo VI came to the throne in 886. He was sent into exile, where he died in 891.

W Norden, Der Papsttum und Byzanz (Berlin, 1903) ; B J. Kidd, The Churches of Eastern Christendom (London, n. d.). M.S.

phylacteries: (Gr. phylakteria, amulet; Heb. tefillin, sing. tefillah, some word as for prayer, i.e., object used in worship) Two small boxes of black leather, containing parchment slips on which are inscribed the four texts, which prescribe the use of "frontlets" (tatafoth, which the Targumim render with tefillin)· Deut. 6.4-9, 11.13-21; Ex. 13.1-10, 13.11-16, and are bound on the forehead.and on the left arm by straps. The phylacteries may have replaced the practice of tatooing or the use of magic charms to protect against evil powers. Presented as "sign" and "memorial" of God's deliverance from bondage, they also aimed to direct the heart of the Jew to God and His commands. Worn by the Pharisees and the Rabbis all day (cf. Matt. 23.5), they are limited in present Orthodox practice to morning worship by adult males on week days. See charms and amulets. S.S.C.

Phyrgian mysteries: See Mother Goddesses; mystery religions.

Physiologus: An allegorical treatise on real and imaginary animals to which fabulous qualities were ascribed. It originated in Alexandria, was widely translated in the West, and gave rise to an extensive series of "bestiaries."* J.T.M.

Pico della Mirandola, Giovanni, Count: (1463-1494) Renaissance* scholar, philosopher, Platonist*. Though devoutly Christian, he dreamed of a synthesis of Hebrew, Greek and Christian ideas. He studied Hebrew and Arabic as well as Greek, and knew Ficino's Latin translation of Plato, which was completed on the day when Pico first visited Ficino at Florence. Pico's strength was the breadth of his sympathy with man's quest for truth in all lands and ages. In this he followed Ficino who wrote that "a certain divine philosophy" was born among the Persians and Egyptians, nourished among the Thracians under Orpheus, came to youth in Pythagoras and to maturity with Plato, and reached the climax of its powers in Plotinus*. His weakness was an excessive addiction to the occult, hermetic and allegorical. His Hebrew studies led him to a preoccupation with the Kabbala*, and he dwelt less on the Dialogues of Plato than on the most fantastic writings of the late Neo-Platonists*. The brilliant precosity of his mind and the winsomeness of his personality have woven about his name a legendary charm disproportionate to the meagre value of his actual work. Pico was a friend and admirer of Savonarola*, but it was his nephew, Giovanni Francesco Pico della M., who was the biographer of Savonarola. Pico died in Florence at the age of 31.

Sir Thomas More, Life (1510). Prefatory essay by J. Rigg in edition of More's Life (1890), Walter Pater Chapter in Studies in the History of the Renaissance (1878) ; J A. Symonds, The Renaissance in Italy (1885-1887), vols I and V; J. B. Fletcher, Literature of the Italian Renaissance (1934) ; F. Schevill, History of Florence (1936). W.E.G.

Pierson, Allard: (1831-1896) He was for some time joint pastor with Albert Reville at the Walloon church in Rotterdam. As a result of his disbelief in supernatural religion he found his position as pastor of a church meaningless and unnatural. He first lectured on theology at the University of Heidelberg, then he lectured on aesthetics, the history of art and modern literature at the University of Amsterdam. A brilliant pupil of C. W. Opzoomer*, he was a sharp theological critic and humanist. He ended in total agnosticism. With A. D. Loman and W. C. van Manen he reached the radical view that probably both Jesus and Paul had never existed as persons. He was unable to reconcile religion and the newer results of natural science, religion and philosophy. He regarded Christianity as a free religious movement within Judaism, in which the conviction arose that the Messiah had appeared.

Bespiegling, Gezag, en Ervaring (Utrecht, 1855) ; De Oorsprong der moderne Richting (Haarlem, 1862) ; Rigting en Leven, 2 vols (Haarlem, 1863) ; De moderne Richting en de kristelijke Kerk (Arnhem, 1866) ; Gods Wondermacht en ons geestelijk Leven (Arnhem, 1867) ; Schoonheidszin en Levenswijsheid (Arnhem, 1868) ; De Bergrede en andere synoptische Fragmenten (Amsterdam, 1878) ; A. Pierson and S. A. Naber, Verisimilia (Amsterdam and The Hague, 1886) ; A. Pierson, Oudere Tijdgenooten (Amsterdam, 1888) ; S. A. Naber, Allard Pierson herdacht (Haarlem, 1897) ; J. Herderschee, De mod- ern-godsdienstige Richting in Nederland (Amsterdam, 1901) K H Roessingh, Het Modernisme in Nederland (Haarlem, 1922).   H.H.

pietism: (Lat., pietas, piety) Historically, the movement originated by Philipp Jakob Spener* in Germany, seeking a return to vital evangelical Christianity as over against the intellectualism and formalism of seventeenth century Protestant orthodoxy While the main stream of Lutheranism became channelized in rigid doctrinal and sacramentarian forms, and Calvinism settled into dogmatic legalism, the original emphasis of the Reformation upon heartfelt personal religion had been kept alive by such leaders as Johann Arndt, author of True Christianity (1606), and Theophilus Grossgebauer, author of Alarm Cry (1661). Pietism crystallized into a specific movement through the informal devotional meetings (conventicles, collegia pietatis) conducted by Spener in his home while serving as pastor in Frankfurt-am-Main. In his Pia Desideria (1675) Spener gave the movement a definite platform. The first of his recommendations, Bible study in conventicles, established the method for the spread of Pietism. It was from one of these groups, at Leipzig, that Spener obtained his principal associate, August Hermann Francke. From the University of Halle, founded by Spener, Francke*, and Christian Thomasius, pietism spread through Germany, Scandinavia, and Switzerland. The new spirituality which it engendered found expression in Francke's philanthropic institutions, the establishment of Protestant foreign missions (Ziegenbalg), the hymns of Paul Gerhardt, and the Moravian Church*, organized by Spener's godson Count von Zinzendorf*. Insisting upon individual regeneration, emotional warmth rather than correct doctrine, personal godliness and denial of the world, and universal spiritual priesthood, pietism effected a genuine and widespread spiritual revival, until its course was checked by the Enlightenment of the eighteenth century. In its decadent phase the movement led to the·extremes of fanaticism, asceticism, and separation from the organized Church. The term "pietistic" thus came to have the derogatory connotation of religious affectation or a religiosity with more heat than light. The term has also been used to designate any form of personal, devotional, and mystical religion as distinguished from intellectual and formal types. See adiaphoristic controversy; assurance, Boehme, Jacob; hymns, sanctification, terminism.
  A. Ritschl, Geschichte des Pietismus (1880-1886), 3 vols, W. Mahrholz, Der deutsche Pietismus (1921)   T.A.K.

pietistic sects in America: A new religious emphasis was introduced into the American colonies with the coming of the Germans. Stressing Christianity as a life rather than a creed pietism gave chief place to the devotional side of religion. Mennonites, Dunkers, Schwenkfelders, and Moravians constituted the principal bodies in the colonial period, though pietistic influence was strong among the German Reformed and German Lutheran bodies and also exercised a decided influence among the Dutch Reformed. Theodore J.

Frelinghuysen (1691-1748) a pietist was the leader of an increasing revivalistic wing among the Dutch Reformed people and was one of the principal leaders in the great Middle Colony revival Henry M Muhlenberg*, the father of American Lutheranism, was also a pietist, having been sent to America through the influence of G A. Francke* of the University of Halle, the center of pietistic emphasis in Germany. Through Muhlenberg's (1711-1787) influence other pietistic ministers came out from Halle to serve Lutheran churches in the colonies. Michael Schlatter (1716-1790) who may also be called the father of the German Reformed Church in America exercised a decided pietistic influence among the German Reformed people. Out of this pietistic strain in American Lutheranism and in the German Reformed church has come two independent revivalistic American churches, the United Brethren in Christ and the Evangelical Church. In its early years Methodism was influenced by pietism through John Wesley's contact with the Moravians. Cf. evangelicalism and evangelical revival.
  W. W. Sweet, Religion in Colonial America (1942), A. W. Nagler, Pietism and Methodism (1918)   w.w.s.

Pilate, Acts of: (or Gospel of Nicodemus*) A Christian bit of pseudepigraphy* from about the middle of the 4th century, composed to assert the sole responsibility of the Jews for the death of Christ. Later an account of the Descent into Hell was added.   s.m.g.

Pilgrim Fellowship: (Congregational) See Young People's Societies, Christian.

pilgrimage of grace: The name given to a revolt in the north of England during 1536 and 1537. It was the result of discontent engendered by the religious changes and by the economic dislocations attending the suppression of the monasteries.
  See M H Dodds, The Pilgrimage of Grace 1536-1537 and the Exeter Conspiracy 1538 (1915).
                                                 w.s.h.

pilgrimage to Lourdes: See Lourdes.

Pillar of Fire: A holiness sect with headquarters at Zarephath, N. J. It was first organized as the Pentecostal Union in Colorado in 1901 and took its present name in 1917. Its founder is Mrs. Alma White, who is also the bishop of the sect. Mrs. White was the wife of a Methodist preacher. She came in touch with the "second blessing" theology and experience in Kentucky. Difficulties arose with the Methodist authorities when she began preaching and establishing missions, as a result of which Mrs. White branches out for herself. The theology of the sect is fundamentalist, premillennarian, literalist, and holiness. There are 46 churches and 4,000 members. See Evangelistic Associations, holiness churches.   E.T.C.

pilpul: (derived from pilpel, to season, to spice, and figuratively, to debate) Dialectical method of studying the Talmud*. One of the outstanding characteristics of pilpul, is the harmonization of contradictions, and the establishment of unity in the Law.

Cf. J. Z Lauterbach, Jewish Encyclopedia (1905), vol X, pp 39-43.   B.C.

Pindar: Great lyric poet of Thebes (Greece). Born Cynoscephalae, near Thebes, 522 B.C Died at Argos, c. 443 B.C. His works include hymns, songs, and panegyrics, both to gods and men. He celebrates the religious festivals, athletic games, the athlete's victory, the local hero, the illustrious dead, the men of noble birth Men and gods, he held, have a common parentage but different destinies. Probably influenced by the Orphics which rose shortly before his day, he held that souls of men "come from the gods", and that human souls carry within themselves the power to free themselves, by their own efforts in a morally upright life, from the body or flesh which imprisons the soul. His influence was strongly felt in later classical thought in religion and philosophy. Historically, his religious ideas appear among the first of the Greeks to unify the spiritual order of the gods with the spiritual order of men.

F.L P

pious associations: See Catholic Societies.

pir: A religious guide in the mystical pursuit of Islam. The term is used especially in India to indicate a Moslem teacher in contrast to the Hindu guru. See shaikh   P.E.J.

Pitris: Literally the "Fathers", the ancestors to whom reverence is paid in two hymns in the tenth book of the Rig Veda, (15, 56). The custom has persisted until the present in popular Hinduism. Theoretically every devout Hindu home pays daily .cult to the spirit of its ancestors.   C.S.B.

Pius V, St., Pope: (1566-72) Michael Ghilieri (b. Jan. 17, 1504, d. May 1, 1672) entered at the age of fourteen the Dominican Order* in which later he distinguished himself as a preacher, professor and provincial. A friend as well as a near relative of Giampietro Caraffa (later Pope Paul IV) he received from him in 1556 the diocese of Nepi-Sutri, and in 1557 the purple (Cardinalis Alexandrinus). As General Inquisitor for the Roman Curia* in Milan and Lombardy he incorporated in his own person everything that the Catholic Reformation* exacted. Even as pope he continued the strict life he had led as a religious. One would not style him exactly a polished diplomat. This together with a certain lack of worldly experience placed him and the Church at times in precarious and delicate positions. But as a reformer in the church his memory will remain immortal. He doggedly pushed forward the reform in clergy and people as demanded by the Council of Trent*. In fact one might justly say that he not only pointed out the way in his own person but also influenced for all future times the papacy and the Roman Curia; the Catholic clergy and the Catholic people in the observance of the conciliar decrees. He likewise carried out the wishes of Trent in publishing the Catechismus Romanus (1566), the reformed Roman breviary (1568) and the Roman Missal (1570). He re-inculcated the Bull "In coena Domini" directed against secular princes for undue interference in matters purely ecclesiastical (1568), and reorganized the tribunal (in foro interno) of the Sacred Penitentiaria (1569) and other curial departments. One of the main external objectives of his pontificate was to break the Spanish politico-ecclesiastical pressure under Philip II; to fight new heresies and to keep the old faith intact, especially in Italy. (cf. "Bernardino Ochino", "Peter Valdes", etc). On Oct. 1, 1567 he condemned 79 propositions of Michael Bajus, professor at Louvain. In virtue of the Bull "Regnans in coelo", Feb. 28, 1570, he excommunicated Elizabeth of England and released her Catholic subjects from the oath of allegiance—the last time such an ecclesiastical penalty was invoked. But it signalized further persecutions of the Catholics of the realm, rather than desistance therefrom, neither did it hinder the eventual execution of Mary Queen of Scots. In the external regime of the Church, Pius, after the loss of Cyprus in 1571, was able to rally Spain and Venice to combine their forces with those of the Papal States* and obtain, under Don Juan of Austria, the brilliant naval victory of Lepanto, Oct. 7, 1572. Pius was beatified in 1672 and canonized in 1712, the last pope to date to be raised to the honors of the altar.

Litt Official Acts in Bullarium Diplomatum et Privilegiorum Summ Roman Pntif. (Torino, 1860), Editio Taurinensis vol. VI, vol VII (Naples, 1882), cf L Pastor, History of the Popes (1929), vols XVII-XVIII; for Letters of a diplomatic nature cf. F Gouban (Antwerp, 1640) Biographies by. F van Ortroy, Anal. Bolland. vol XXXIII, pp 187-215; Dict de la Théol Cath XII, col 1647-53; Lexikon f. Theologie u. Kirche VIII, 304.

R.M.H.

Pius VI, Pope: (1775-99) Count Giovanni Angelico Braschi was born Dec. 17, 1717 at Cesena. Stationed since 1740 in Rome in the service of Cardinal Ruffo and Benedict XIV*, he became Papal Secretary and Canon of St. Peter's (1755), treasurer of the Roman Church under Clement XIII; Cardinal in 1773, and was elected pope on Feb. 15, 1775. The papacy at this time was in a precarious condition and the new pope was faced with an empirical age of doctrinal and political "enlightenment", defense of episcopal prerogatives entirely independent of Rome, and royal absolutism. Through his fine sense of diplomacy Pius was able to brave the storm, gain many a point for the papacy and save the dignity of the Church, even in the face of apparent utter defeat. He had to combat Febronianism* in Germany (Congress of Ems, 1784-85); Josephinism in Austria, which a personal visit of the pope to Vienna in 1782 or even the Concordat of 1784 failed to remedy, and in Tuscany, where Joseph II's brother was ruler; also Gallicanism in France. The schismatical Synod of Pistoia (1786) under Bishop Scipio Ricci forced the Pope to issue the Bull "Auctorem Fidei", Aug. 28, 1794 condemning 85 Gallican and Jansenistical propositions. But the pope's greatest cross was the French Revolution and all that it implied for the Church and the papacy. Avignon and Venaissin (cf. "Papal States") rebelled and were annexed to France, because Pius in his Brief of April 13, 1791 had condemned the "Civil Constitution" of the Clergy as schismatical and heretical and had enjoined the oath-bound clergy to repudiate it within 40 days. His alliance with the powers in 1792 who were opposed to the French Republic and the provocatory death in Rome of the Secretary of the French Legation at Naples, Basseville, induced Napoleon Bonaparte to occupy the Papal States* In the Treaty of Peace of Tolentino, Feb. 19, 1797 insult was added to injury by forcing the pope not only to give up Avignon, Venaissin, Ferrara, Bologna and the Romagna, but likewise to deliver to France 500 valuable manuscripts, 100 works of art and to pay a war indemnity of thirty million francs. (In 1796, on the occasion of the Truce of Bologna, twenty-one million had already been paid.) On Nov. 19, 1797 Ancona too was torn from the papal possessions. To fill to the very brim the chalice of the pope's woes, Joseph Bonaparte, the French Ambassador, induced Rome itself to rebel against the pope. After General Duphot had fallen during the revolution, French soldiers under Berthier entered the Eternal City, Feb. 10, 1798 On Feb. 15, the Roman Republic was proclaimed and during the night of Feb 20th the pope, now in his 80th year, was dragged under military guard first to Siena and Florence, then in March, 1799 by way of Bologna and Modena to Parma and Torino, and finally, despite illness, over the Alps to Briancon, Grenoble and Valence where, succumbing to the inhuman hardships of so long drawn-out journey, the aged pope died in exile, Aug. 29, 1799. Buried at first at Valence, it was only in February, 1802 that his remains could be returned to Rome and interred (Feb. 17) at St. Peter's. In response to an appeal of the clergy of the United States, Pius VI, in virtue of a Papal Bull of 1789, erected the first Catholic diocese in the U S. A., Baltimore, Md. with John Carroll as the first bishop.

. Bullarii Romani Continuatio ed Barberi (Rome, 1842), vols. V-X; Collectio Brevium Pii VI, 2 vols (Augsburg, 1796); Acta Pii VI, 2 vols (Rome, 1871), Biographies by J. Bertrand, 2 vols (Bar-le-Duc, 1897); Ferrari (Padua, 1802); J Gendry, 2 vols (Paris, 1907); L. Pastor, Geschichte der Päpste (Freiburg in Br, 1932) Eng tr not yet published XVI, 3, F Hayward, Le dernier siècle de la Rome pontificale (Paris, 1917), pp 56-154; Dict. de la Théol. Cath, XII, 1653-69, Sampson, "Pius VI and the French Revolution" in Amer. Cath. Quarterly Review (1906), Cath. Encyc., XII, 132, Lillian Brown-Olf, Their Name is Pius (1941)

R.M.H.

Pius VII, Pope: (1800-23) Pope during the Napoleonic era, Pius VII, (born Luigi Barmola Charamonti, July 14, 1740 at Cesena) saw the Papal States* reduced to their lowest ebb, but also almost completely restored in the Congress of Vienna, 1815. At the age of 16 he entered the Benedictine Order*, became later, 1782 Bishop of Tivoli and in 1785 Bishop of Imola. Created cardinal (Feb. 14, 1785) by his predecessor, he was elected pope on March 14, 1800 at Venice. Venice was at that time under Austrian rule due to the fact that Pius VI* in exile (Nov. 13, 1798) had provided that on account of the French Revolution and the Napoleonic invasions of the Papal States, including Rome, the conclave be held in whichever city after his death, the largest number of cardinals chanced to be living. Crowned on Mar. 21, he was able to enter Rome, then under French domination, but enthusiastically welcomed by the people, July 3, 1800. Pius VII's greatest aide throughout practically the whole of' his pontificate was the able Ercole Consalvi, Secretary of the Conclave, later chosen by Pius to be Cardinal-Secretary of State (Aug. 11, 1800). Two important problems immediately confronted the new pope the return of normal conditions in the Papal States and, at the wish of the First Counsel, Napoleon, a rehabilitation of relations between Church and State in France, so flagrantly disturbed during the French Revolution. Negotiations threatened time and time again to be broken off indefinitely due to the violent opposition of the Constitutional Church of France, the unwarranted assumptions of the legitimist monarchists and the unreasonable demands of Napoleon himself. It was only when Consalvi personally went to Paris and made wide concessions that the Concordat* of 1801) which despite future alterations and even repudiation was to play for a whole century so important a rôle in later French politico-ecclesiastical relations) was signed (promulgated, April 18, 1802). At the same time, however, Napoleon published his hitherto secretly concocted 77 Organic Articles referring to the Catholic Church and 44 to the Protestant Churches, all infected with Gallicanism* and, in general, subjecting every public act of the Church to the previous approval of the government—in other words an enslavement of the Church by an inimical government. Despite the protest by the pope in 1803 and again in 1817, refusing to regard them as part of the Concordat, as also protested repeatedly by loyal French bishops, the Organic Articles (excepting Art. 24 referring to the subscribing to and teaching of the four Gallican Articles, adopted in 1682, by professors in ecclesiastical seminaries) remained nominally at least in force until 1905 when all diplomatic relations between the Church of Rome and France were severed. (cf. "Pius X") The Corsican violated with equal disregard of pledges and obligations the Concordat of 1803 regulating ecclesiastical conditions in the Italian (French controlled) Republic. When on May 18, 1804 Napoleon was pronounced hereditary emperor of the French, he invited Pius VII to Paris to perform the traditional unction and solemn coronation. Hoping to obtain perhaps concessions for the Papal States and a suspension of the Organic Articles, Pius rather reluctantly consented. Any illusions the pope might have entertained regarding the future Emperor's greater conciliatory attitude towards his person, the Church and the Papal States, must have been dispelled by the unceremonious reception accorded him, and by the self-coronation of the emperor at the Notre Dame Cathedral, leaving to the pope only the annointing. The sole favor received by Pius referred to

Religious Orders. On May 16, 1805 Pius in virtue of a previously pledged and signed agreement was able to return to Rome, although even then the Emperor would have preferred to retain him under guard somewhere in France. The emperor's hatred towards the pope mounted when the latter protested that he could not grant a divorce to Napoleon's brother, Jerome, from Miss Paterson of Baltimore, to crown his other brother, Joseph, King of Naples; or finally to become Napoleon's vassal in matters referring to the Emperor's enemies. On Feb. 2, 1808 Rome was invaded by the imperial troops and on May 17, 1809 the rest of the Papal States were incorporated into the French empire. When Pius retaliated with the Bull of excommunication (Quum memoranda) against the robbers and usurpers of the Papal States (the Patrimonium Petri) and all their abettors, even though the emperor's name was not mentioned, he was taken captive on the night of July 5-6, and together with Cardinal Pacca transferred by coach first to Grenoble, and later alone to Savona, where deprived of all his counsellors, he was treated most shamefully. To regulate ecclesiastical matters within the empire, with or without the consent of the pope, Napoleon convoked on June 17, 1811 a National Council that convened at Paris. Although not entirely submissive to his will, the Council did decide under pressure that if the pope refused to install the bishops selected by the emperor, this right should devolve upon the Metropolitans. An imperial commission succeeded in pressing from the weary and ailing pope his consent thereto. But Pius remained adamant in the question of the emperor's divorce from Josephine. Although seriously ill the pope was dragged (June, 1812) to Fountainbleu, where Napoleon importuned him to consent to 11 preliminary statutes of a new Concordat (Jan. 25, 1813) which the emperor then promulgated as the new Concordat of Fountainbleu. Tormented by qualms of conscience for his momentary weakness in signing an agreement that meant at least the indirect cession of the Papal States, Pius, advised and encouraged by Pacca and Consalvi, recalled his previous consent on March 23, 1813. The fall of Napoleon brought an end to all further pressure and humiliations on the weary exiled Roman Pontiff. On May 24, 1814 Pius once more entered the gates of Rome. Although once more forced by Murat to flee the Capital, March 22, 1815, Pius was finally able to return permanently on July 7. Consalvi's dextrous diplomacy was able to regain at the Congress of Vienna, 1814-15, with the consent of England and such statesmen as Wellington, Tallyrand and Metternich practically the complete return of the Papal States to the papacy. Only a small strip of land remained in the hands of Austria and this usurpation was protested. The intra- and inter-relations with the other powers were fixed by Consalvi and promulgated in the papal motuproprio of July 6, 1816. Certain modifications (reforms) already adopted during the French occupation were retained. Banditry however, continued, until finally on Sept. 17, 1821 Pius took strong measures by publishing his Bull against certain secret refractory agents known as the "Carbonari" (charcoal-burners) On Aug 7, 1814 the Society of Jesus* was re-established, in 1817 concordats made with Bavaria and Sardinia, and in 1818 with Naples and Russia (referring especially to Catholic Poland). In 1808 the Pontiff erected for the growing Catholic Church in the U. S. A. the four new dioceses of Boston, New York, Philadelphia and Bardstown (later transferred to Louisville, Ky.) with Baltimore, now elevated to the rank of an Archdiocese, as the Metropolitan See. To these dioceses were added in 1820 Charleston and Richmond, and in 1821 Cincinnati. In 1817 Pius VII signed a new concordat with Louis XVIII, which provided for an additional number of dioceses and repealed the Organic Articles, but the French Chamber of Deputies refused to approve it, so that the Concordat of 1801 was again invoked. The erection of a few new French dioceses was the only appreciable effect obtained through the discussions. During the latter part of the reign of Pius VII the prestige of the papacy was enhanced by the presence in Rome of several European rulers. Under Pius' pontificate Rome became, despite the arious changes of government, the favorite abode of sculptors and artists, including such renowned men as the Venetian, Canova, the Dane, Thorwaldsen; the Austrian, Fuhrich, and the Germans, Overbeck, Pforr, Schadow and Cornelius. Pius VII re-opened the English, Scotch and German colleges in the Eternal City and established new chairs in the Roman College. The illustrious pope died Aug. 20, 1823. His faithful secretary, Consalvi, was destined to follow him into eternity in less than a year (Jan. 24, 1824).

For the Papal Bulls and official Acts of Pius VII cf Bullarii Romani continuatio, edit. Barberi, vols. XI-XIV (Rome, 1846-53), C. D'Haussonville, L'Eglise Rom. et le premier empire, 5 vols. 3 (Paris, 1870, ff.), F Hayward, Le denier siècle de la Rome Pontificale (Paris, 1927), vol. I, 55-238, G. Constant, L'Eglise de France sous le consulat et l'empire (Paris, 1928). Recent monograms and biographies by. Mary H. Allies (London, 1897); Lillian Brown-Olf, Their Name is Pius (1941); and J. Schmidlin, Papsttum der neuesten Zeit (1933), I. pp. 1-366; cf. Dict. de la Théol. Cath. XII col 1670-83; Cath. Encyc. XII 132-4; Wiseman, Card, Recollections of the Last Four Popes (1858), J. MacCaffrey, History of the Catholic Church in the Nineteenth Century 2 (Dublin and St. Louis, 1910); Acton, in The Cambridge Modern History vol. X: "The Restoration" (1907); G. Head, Eng. tr. (London, 1850), Bartolomeo Card Pacca, Memorie Istoriche (1830, 2d ed. 1843); Artaud de Montor, Histoire du Rape Pie VII 2 vols. 3 (Paris, 1839).   R.M.H.

Pius IX, Pope: (1846-78) Count Giovanni Maria Mastei-Ferretti, born May 13, 1792 at Sinigallia, received his early education at Volterra (1802-09) and later at Rome. In 1823 he was sent as Auditor to the Papal Legation in Chile, thus becoming the first (future) pope to labor on (south) American shores. Returning to Italy he was named Archbishop of Spoleto, May 21, 1827, Bishop of Imola, Feb. 17, 1832 and, after fruitful services in both dioceses, created cardinal, Dec. 14, 1840. After an unusually short conclave he was elected pope, June 16, 1846 and crowned on June 21. His pontificate is particularly noted 1) for the loss of the Papal States* on Sept. 20, 1870, thus creating the "Roman Question" (cf. "Concordats"), despite the fact that in the beginning he was not adverse to a Parliamentary form of government, 2) for the Declaration of the Dogma of the Immaculate Conception*, Dec 8, 1854, to date the last definition *"ex cathedra" (cf "Chair of St. Peter"), 3) for the celebration of the Vatican Council⁴, 1869-70 defining papal infallibility and re-affirming the primacy of the See of Rome, 4) for the Syllabus of Dec 8, 1864 condemning 80 propositions of either theologically adjudged false or philosophically unsafe propositions, and 5) for the erection of many dioceses throughout the world, especially in the U. S. A., and the creation of many prefectures and vicariates in missionary countries. After having occupied the Chair of Peter longer than any of his predecessors (32 yrs) he died at Rome, Feb. 7, 1878 and was buried, in accordance with his wish at San Lorenzo beyond the walls of Rome. See Kulturkampf, Syllabus of errors, papal.

Litt Acta Pii IX (Rome, 1854-78) ; monograms and biographies by· J M Stepischnegg, 2 vols. (1879) , A Pougeois (Paris, 1877-86), 6 vols ; E. Vercesi (1934), J. F. Maguire (London, 1878) ; W Molitor, 4 (1875) , M. F. Cusack (London, 1878) , Th O'Dwyer (London, 1879) , Dr. Aen M Dawson, Pius the Ninth and his Times 1792-1878 (Canada, 1880) , J Gilmary Shea (1878) ; J. Mac Caffrey, Hist. of the Cath. Church in the Nineteenth Century (Dublin, 1909) , L. Browne-Olf, Their Name is Pius (1941).   R.M H.

Pius X, Pope:

(1903-1914) In marked contrast to the pontificate of his predecessor, Pope Leo XIII* but complementary to it, was the reign of Pius X. Giuseppe Melchiore Sarto was born June 2, 1835 at Riese in the Province of Treviso, northern Italy. Ordained priest in 1858 he was named chaplain in Tombolo, Pastor at Salzano, 1867, Canon of the Cathedral of Treviso, 1875, Bishop of Mantua, 1884; Patriarch of Venice and Cardinal, 1893, and in the conclave of Aug. 4, 1903, following the Austrian veto against Cardinal Rampollo, former Secretary of State under Leo XIII (instigated by Italy), he was elected pope. A simple devout soul, Pius was unalterably opposed to external pomp and ceremonial beyond what his dignity required. While criticized by some for his method of procedure, he had as pope only one purpose in view as announced in his first encyclical* of Oct. 10, 1903 and in his motu proprio of Mar. 19, 1904 "to renew all things in Christ." Among the outstanding solicitudes and reforms of his pontificate may be mentioned the preservation of the Faith against the initial inroads made by Modernism against which he issued the decree "Lamentabili" and the Syllabus of Errors* (1907), accentuated by the encyclical Pascendi of Sept. 8, 1907 and the Motuproprio of Sept. 1, 1910 with corresponding explanations from the Sacred Congregation of the Consistorial dated Sept. 25, 1910 demanding that the oath against Modernism be taken by all ecclesiastical authorities (still in vogue); 2) the new codification of Canon Law* ordered on March 19, 1904 (Arduum sane) and virtually completed at the time of his death in 1914 (*Codex Juris Canonici); 3) the reorganization of the Roman Curial Congregations, the first since the days of Sixtus Vᵛ (1587), 4) the creation of the periodical Acta Apostolicae Sedis, the official organ of the Holy See (first number Jan 1, 1909), 5) regulation regarding the ascetical and scientifical education of clerical students, especially in Italy (1907-08), concerning advanced studies in Biblical matters (Encyc. Quoniam in re biblica), March 27, 1906, and institution of the Biblical Institute at Rome (May 7, 1909), 5) reform of the Roman Breviary* through a re-arrangement of a complete weekly recitation of all of the Psalms, and the according of special privileges for the Sunday formulas of the Missal* (Divino afflatu, 1910), 6) prohibition of theatrical music during Divine Services and a re-accentuation of the Gregorian Chant*, but not exclusive of philharmonic motets (Dec. 20, 1905), and 7) re-inculcation of regular explanation of the Word of God by the Clergy, especially in Italy (Acerbo nimis April 15, 1905), and 8) the early and frequent reception of Holy Communion (Dec. 20, 1905).

Pius sought to regulate as far as the existing disturbed conditions in Italy permitted the relations between Church and State, without however, actually permitting Catholics, generally and formally speaking, to take part in public political elections (1905). He abolished the hateful veto so frequently, and even in the conclave which elected him, exercised by Christian kings and princes, thus insuring for all future times complete freedom of papal election. The ecclesiastical hierarchy was expanded and augmented through the erection of Apostolical Delegations* (cf. "Papal Legates") in Mexico, 1904, in Australia, 1914, through the creation of new missionary vicariates in foreign fields and dioceses, especially in the U. S. A. Interest in the Oriental Churches was fostered not only through the permission to use the Ruthenian Rite* in North America (1910) but also in the erection of special Ruthenian dioceses in Canada and in the U. S. A.; through the celebration of the Jubilee of St. John Chrysostom in 1908, Armenian National Synod at Rome, 1911 (Ex quo, Dec. 26, 1910) and the Constitution, Tradita, Sept. 14, 1912. Diplomatic relations with France, which had already been strained during the last years of the pontificate of Leo XIII* were entirely broken off in 1905 through the repudiation of the Concordat of Pius VI* of 1801, with subsequent separation of Church and State. The pope also rejected the politico-social errors of the "Sillon" (1910), a French association of young Catholics independent of their bishops. In 1914 he condemned the L'Action Francaise due to its monarchistic tendencies. Diplomatic relations were also severed between Portugal and the Holy See (Encyc. Jamdudum, May 24, 1911), the same was true of Spain, at least temporarily (1910).

Kind but determined, intent on the inner supernatural elevation and purification of the Church rather than on her exterior glory before nations, Piux X seems to have been destined by Providence to guide the Bark of Peter through the troublesome waters that agitated and rocked it during the first years of the XX century, prior to the First World War, which despite heroic efforts and personal appeal to the Emperor of Austria he was unable to prevent. Honored after death as much as he was revered in life, the process of his beatification was opened in 1923. He lies buried in the crypt of St. Peter's, where, in the basilica itself, a colossal statue by Astorri perpetuates his memory.

Acta Santae Sedis and Acta Apostolicae Sedis (1903-14) Seppelt-Löffler, Papstgeschichte (Munich, 1933) 494-521, Eng. tr of an earlier edit. by Frommelt (1932), Eng biographies by F. A. Forbes (London, 1919), Pieranini (London and Torino, 1928 and '29), A. Waal, Eng. tr. by Berg (1909); L. Brown-Olf, Their Name was Pius (1941). The Pope's encyclicals were published by Herder.

R.M.H.

Pius XI, Pope: (1922-39) Ambrosio Damiano Achille Ratti was born at Desio, near Milan, May 31, 1857; was ordained priest Dec. 20, 1879; obtained the doctorates of Philosophy, Theology and Canon Law at the Gregorian University, Rome, became professor at the Diocesan Seminary at Milan, 1882, librarian of the Ambrosiana, Milan, 1888, and Prefect of the same in 1907, during which tenure of office he edited many documents and studies pertaining to the Church of Milan (4 vols. Milan, 1890-99). Promoted to Pro-prefect of the Vatican Library in 1912 he collaborated with Francis Ehrle, S.J., whom he succeeded as Prefect in 1914. It was in this capacity that Msgr. Ratti represented the Vatican at the 700th centenary of the birth of Roger Bacon commemorated at Oxford. Benedict XV* made of the "diplomatist" a "diplomat" by sending him in 1918 to Poland as Apostolic Visitator and raised him to the rank of a Nuncio (cf. "Papal Legate"), Oct. 28, 1919, after that war-torn country, following the Treaty of Versailles, had received the status of an independent Republic. While functioning in this capacity he was named and consecrated Titular Archbishop of Lepanto In 1920 the pope sent him as Commissary to watch over the important plebescites in Oberschlesien, East and West Prussia to determine the future German or Polish allegiance of those countries. In 1921 Ratti was appointed Archbishop of Milan and on Feb. 6, 1922 created cardinal. On the death of Benedict XV, he was elected pope on the seventh ballot, Feb. 6, 1922 and crowned on Feb. 11. The motto of the new pope "Peace of Christ in the Kingdom of Christ" became the program of his whole pontificate, viz., to instill peoples and nations with the spirit of Christ in their personal lives and in their relations to one another. Among the notable achievements of his busy pontificate (he was an indefatigable worker) should be accentuated: 1) his many encyclicals on timely topics that attracted the attention as well as the admiration of the Christian world, e.g., on the Christian Education of Youth, on Christian Marriage and Family Life (Casti Connubii condemning illicit birth control), on Christian Sociology, etc., 2) the celebration of three Jubilees, 1925, '29 and '33, unparalleled in the history of the papacy, 3) his interest in Home and Foreign missions insistance on the imparting of Christian Doctrine, Catholic Action or the Lay Apostolate, advocacy of a native clergy and the personal consecration of one Japanese and six Chinese Bishops in St. Peter's, Rome, 4) his love for the Oriental Church as manifested in the founding of a special commission for the Codification of Oriental Canon Law, the erection of the Russian, Ruthenian, Roumanian and Ethiopian Colleges, the solemn commemoration of the 1500th anniversary of the celebration of the Council of Ephesus* (431-1931); 5) the holding of the Mission and Press Exhibits at the Vatican and the founding of the Institute for Christian Archeology, the erection of the new Picture Gallery (Pinacotheca) to house the Vatican treasures of art; the building of the new Gregorian University and of the new seat of the Roman Congregations in Transtevere, Rome, 6) his promotion of higher studies through the famous encyclical "Deus Scientiarum Dominus" regulating university studies and the awarding of academic degrees in the Church, the founding of the Pontifical Academy of Sciences (cf. "Pontifical College"), the insistence on the reform of Church Music, 7) the solution of the Roman Question (cf "Papal States" and "Pius IX") and the subsequent Lateran Treaty and Concordat with Italy (1929), 8) the defense of the Church and of her institutions against Atheistic Communism, Fascism and Naziism; 9) his great charity in finding homes for the poor refugees of Eastern Europe, including Russia, and in subsidizing the needs of Central Europe after the World War I; and finally 10) the Beatification and Canonization of many Servants of God including the English Martyrs, Sts. John Fisher and Thomas More, and the Canadian-American martyrs, Isaac Jogues and companions.

A highly educated and sympathetic soul, but at the same time a fearless and determined character (Fides Intrepida, according to the prophecy attributed to Bishop Malachy), Pius XI will live in history as one of the great popes of the Catholic Church. His life was blameless; his doctrines always abreast of the times, his viewpoints international and universal, and his philosophy of life dominated by one thought, the knowledge of the principles taught by Christ and the practice thereof by men and nations of all creeds, colors, races and professions.

Litt. For all official Acts: cf. Acta Apostolicae Sedis (Rome, 1922-39). Many of the Pope's encyclicals, transl. into English, were published by the NCWC of Washington, D. C., by the Paulists Press and by the America Press, both of New York City. Cf. F. R. Hoare, The Papacy and the Modern State (London, 1940); George Seldes, The Vatican, Yesterday, Today, Tomorrow (N. Y. and London, 1934); The Catholic Church in Contemporary Europe (1919-31) edit. by Msgr. Peter Guilday (1932); Seppelt-Löffler, Papstgeschichte (Munich, 1933); English adaptation of an earlier edition by H. Frommelt, History of the Popes (St. Louis, 1932) 542-552.

Biographies by. C. Fumagalli (Rome, 1925); R.
Fontenella (Paris, 1928), F. v. Lana 2 (1930);
A Ehrhard (Cologne, 1929), P R Veneziani
(Rome, 1935); P. T. Lombardo (1925); W L.
Townsend (London, 1930); Hugh Walpole, Roman Fountain (1940), Philip Hughes (London, 1932);
L Brown-Olf, Their Name is Pius (1941), Benedict Williamson (London, 1931), Denis Gywnn (London, 1932). Special Studies Lord Clonmore, Pope Pius XI and World Peace (London, 1938); William Teeling, Pope Pius XI and World Affairs
(1937), Cuddihy and Schuster, Pope Pius XI: Public American Opinion (1939); Morgan, An American Reporter at the Vatican (1936). Cf The International Year Book for the year 1939 (1940). For the Pope's own literary works cf. Achille Ratti, Scritti Storici (Florence, 1932) (also trans. into Eng.), N Malvezzi, Pio XI nei suoi scritti (Milan, 1923), G Galbiati, Bio-Bibliografia di Achille Ratti
(Milan, 1923).   R.M.H.

Pius XII, Pope: (1939-) Born at Rome, March 2, 1876 of a (papal) noble family, Eugenio Pacelli was first destined by his father, a Vatican Lawyer, to the study of law, the same as his own brother, Francesco, who was later made a Papal Marquis for his services in helping to settle the Roman Question (cf. "Pius IX" and "Pius XI"), in 1929 as intermediary between Pope Pius XI and Benito Mussolini. Young Eugenio, however, preferred to study for the priesthood, entered the Capranica College and was ordained in 1899. He began his studies in diplomacy at the Pontifical Academy, where he later became professor of Canon Law*. Under the influence of (the later Cardinal) Pietro Gasparri, Msgr. Pacelli devoted his talents exclusively to the work of the Congregation of Extraordinary Ecclesiastical Affairs. In 1912 he became Under Secretary to Cardinal Merry del Val, then Secretary of State to Pope Pius X* and held this position until April 20, 1917, when he was named Nuncio (cf. "Papal Legates") to Munich and consecrated Titular Archbishop of Sardis, May 13, 1917. In the summer of 1917 he held, in the name of the Holy See, important conversations with the German Chancellor Bethmann-Hol-weg and, at military headquarters on the Western Front presented a personal letter from Pope Benedict XV* to the Kaiser urging him to endeavor to restore peace to the world. It was through Archbishop Pacelli that the pope in the following August (1917) made attempts to mediate between the Central Powers and the Allies. During the turbulent days after the war Pacelli remained in Munich and concluded negotiations for a Concor-dat with Bavaria. On June 22, 1920 he moved to Berlin as the first nuncio accredited to the German Republic and there on June 14, 1929, he won one of his greatest diplomatic victories by the arrangement of a successful concordat with the predominantly Protestant State of Prussia. On Dec. 16, 1929 he was created cardinal and recalled to Rome by Pius XI*. There, on Feb. 11, 1930, one year after the Lateran Treaty had been signed, he was appointed Papal Secretary of State to succeed Cardinal Gasparri. In this post as chief diplomat of the Church (he was also Camerlengo of the Sacred College of Cardinals) he shared with Pius XI the grave concern regarding the persecution of the Church in Russia, Mexico, Spain and Germany, despite in the latter case, the concordat of 1933, which Cardinal Pacelli himself had signed. On the death of Pius XI, Feb. 10, 1939 and in the conclave which followed, on March 2, 1939 he was chosen pope unanimously on the third ballot (61-1) and assumed the name of Pius XII. He was crowned on March 12, 1939 on the balcony of St. Peter's overlooking the piazza. On that occasion Joseph P.

Kennedy, former United States Ambassador to England, represented President Roosevelt. The present pope is one of the most travelled of Catholic prelates. In 1911 he was a member of the Vatican delegation at the Coronation of George V in London, in 1934 he was Papal Legate to the International Eucharistic Congress at Buenos Aires, in 1935 he represented Pius XI at Lourdes, France, and in 1936 he visited the U. S. A.,
where he travelled extensively by rail and air, visiting many of the leading cities of the country.
Throughout the World War II, Pius XII has been making constant efforts to effect conciliation, and alleviation of the sufferings attendant on the war. "Peace" (Pax-Pacelli) was the theme of practically everyone of his addresses during public audiences, allocutions, in consistories and radio addresses. Like Pius XI after the First World War he has been most charitable in trying to alleviate the sufferings of the Central and Eastern European peoples robbed of their homes and possessions through German invasion of their territories. One of the greatest consolations to the saddened heart of the Father of Christendom was the appointment by President Franklin D.
Roosevelt of Myron C. Taylor as his personal ambassador to the Vatican where repeatedly he has both delivered and received messages of a highly important but confidential character. The present conflict has not only strained somewhat the relations between the Holy See and Italy but also, early in June 1940, caused the American College in Rome to be closed and the students to be sent back to American shores for the completion of their education. Many of them resumed their studies at the Catholic University of America at Washington, D. C. Fearlessly Pope Pius has not only exposed the persecution of the Church in Germany under Nazi regime but likewise in other countries: Poland, Alsace-Lorraine, Belgium, etc. On May 7, the Holy See signed a concordat with Portugal, one of the few countries in Europe to maintain peace. Despite the war, there were to date two canonizations of saints during his pontificate, Gemma Galgani and Mary of St. Euphrasia Pelletier, foundress of the universally known Sisters of the Good Shepherd who take care of wayward girls (May, 1940). Among the Beatifications was that of Bl. Rose-Philippina Duchesne, who established the Religious of the Sacred Heart in the U. S. A. in 1818. Among the important jubilees or commemorations of significant events was the fourth centenary of the canonical approval of the Jesuits*; the holding of the first Synod of the ecclesiastical jurisdiction of the Greek Rite in Italy, which began at the Greek Abbey of Grottaferrata, Oct. 13, 1940 to commemorate the Seventh Ecumenical Council held at Nice in 787; the 150th anniversary of the founding of the North American Hierarchy and the consecration of John Carroll as the first Bishop of Baltimore (cf. "Pius VI"), the Golden Jubilee of the founding of the Catholic University, Washington, D. C., etc. Deaths in the Sacred College of Cardinals have reduced their number, as of Oct. 24, 1942 to 49 of whom only twenty are foreigners. No new cardinals have been created since the Consistory of Dec. 13, 1937 under Pius XI. Among the missionary concerns of the Holy Father saddened by the ruin of so many chapels, churches and religious houses in mission fields was the consecration of twelve missionary bishops of various races, on the Feast of Christ, the King, October, 1939. Thirty nations now have diplomatic relations with the Holy See, the latest to send a representative being Uruguay, the first time since 1898.

For the official Acts of Pius XII to date cf Acta Apostolicae Sedis (Rome, 1939, ff). Cf The Americana Encycl. Annual (1941), pp. 617-20, 723, ib. (1942) p 629, The New International Year Book 1939 (1940), p. 681 ff.; (ib. 1941) Events of 1940, p. 661.   R.M.H.

pixy, pisky: In English folklore, a fairy*, a possible origin or connection in Swedish pysk, a little demon or goblin*.   F.L.P.

piyyut: (derived from the Greek poietes, poet) Hymns that were added to the older liturgy. The author of the piyyut was called payyetan. Some of the oldest payyetainim were Jose ben Jose, Yannai and Eldzar Kalir.

Cf. G. Deutsch, Jewish Encyclopedia, vol. X, pp 65-68, I Elbogen, Der judische Gottesdienst in seiner geschichtlichen Entwicklung, 2nd edition (Berlin, 1924), pp. 281 ff.   B.C. placet: (Lat., "it pleases"), or Regium placet (royal approval) The right claimed by the State to approve of Ecclesiastical enactments prior to their promulgation or execution. The practice made its appearance during the Western Schism* (1378-1417). In France it was applied by the Pragmatic Sanction* of 1438 as an instrument to regulate all acts and decrees emanating from Rome. Soon it spread to Spain and Portugal. In Germany it flourished especially during the periods of Josephinism and Febronianism. The Catholic Church has constantly and energetically opposed the Placet as an intolerable abuse against her liberty and rights.   C.V.

plain chant: The ancient form of singing the church service, in unison and without meter. Known also as "Plain song"* or "Gregorian chant."*   B.S.E.

plainsong: Monodic solo or unison chant, unaccompanied, unmetrical, modal. Gregorian chant* is plainsong, a prose text set in free rhythm making use of the ecclesiastical modes. Chants are either syllabic, in which one note serves each syllable, neumatic, in which some syllables have one note but most have groups of notes, or melismatic, in which several notes or groups of notes serve each syllable. See psalmody.

Rev. Dom. Johner, A New School of Gregorian Chant (1906).   E.H.B.

Planck, Gottlieb Jakob: (1751-1833) He was professor at the University of Gottingen. Posing as a rational supernaturalist, he evaded theological quarrels He was the founder of the comparative study of the confessions and of the history of Protestant theology. He delighted to unmask the history of the Christian church of its glorified reputation. He robbed history of its ideal meaning and had the mania of deducing the great historical events from accidental and insignificant causes. He ruthlessly criticized the bestialities and atrocities of church history. He debunked the great and famous men of the empirical church of their abiding value. Church and Christianity were not identical for him.

Geschichte der Entstehung, der Veränderungen und der Bildung unseres protestantischen Lehrbegriffs bis zur Konkordienformel (Leipzig, 1781-1800), 6 vols.; Geschichte der protestantischen Theologie von der Konkordienformel bis in die Mitte des 18. Jahrhunderts (Gottingen, 1831); Geschichte der christlich-kirchlichen Gesellschaftsverfassung (Hanover, 1803-1809), 5 vols.   H.H.

Plato: (c. 427-c. 347 B.C.) Son of Ariston and Perictione (a descendant of Solon's family), pupil of Socrates, one of the greatest philosophers and writers of all time. Born in Athens (or on Aegina). While accounts of his life are partly legendary (including the story that Apollo was his father), a highly probable outline can be established (largely following Ritter); there is a recent tendency among scholars to recognize some of Plato's "Epistles" as authentic sources for his life.

First period (427-407). through his ephebate. He received an excellent education, including music or poetry. As a boy he heard Gorgias and Protagoras, the sophists, and his first teacher was Cratylus the Heraclitean. Plato was impressed by the Peloponnesian War (431-404), which ruined the Athenian Empire.

Second period (407-399): as pupil of Socrates. During this time Plato learned the Socratic method, the dialectic, the irony, the doctrines that knowledge is virtue and virtue happiness. Xenophon until 401 was also in the Socratic group. Plato was present at the trial, but not at the death of Socrates (Apol. 34A, Phaedo 59B). The Protagoras, and perhaps the Hippias Minor, Laches and Charmides, may have been written before the death of Socrates in 399.

Third period (399-387). study and travel. From 399 to 395 Plato seems to have been at Megara with Euclides, and may have written the Euthyphro, the Apology, and the Crito at this time; and the Hippias Major (if genuine), the Euthydemus, the Cratylus, the Meno, and the Menexenus (387). In 389 he made his first journey to Sicily, where he met the elder Dionysius at Syracuse. Stories are told of his capture by pirates and his ransom by Anniceris on the return from Sicily. In 388 he purchased the Academy, a public park or grove, equipped as a gymnasium, and founded his school of philosophy there. He wrote the Gorgias (388 or 387) as a program of principles for his school.

Four period (387-367)· constructive activity. Plato developed the Academy and engaged in his most brilliant literary activity, producing the Symposium, the Phaedo, the Republic (which was not all written at one time), the Phaedrus (379?), and the Theaetetus (369-368). In the Parmenides (367-366) Plato engaged in a closely reasoned dialectical self-criticism. In 367 he undertook his second journey to Sicily, meeting Dionysius II, with hopes of carrying out political reforms, but made an early and disappointed return.

Fifth period (367-347): the dialectical period. In 367, Plato's greatest pupil, Aristotle* entered the Academy. Aristotle said of his teacher: "Plato is my friend, but truth is a greater friend." About 364, Plato wrote the Sophist; after that, the Statesman (Politicus), the Philebus, the Timaeus, its sequel, the (unfinished) Critias, and the Laws. Plato made his third journey to Sicily (362-360). After his return, his friend Dion was murdered (352). Plato is said to have died while in the act of further literary composition.

See Platonism for bibliography.   E.S.B.

Platonism: The philosophy of Plato*, and later systems influenced by him. It is based on the dialectic* of Socrates*, as a method of inquiry; its main tenet is that objects of thought (Ideas, forms, noumena) are eternally real, as opposed to the transitory and relatively unreal objects of sense perception (phenomena). Man can have knowledge (epistēmē) of Ideas, but only opinion (doxa) about phenomena. Mathematical objects and ideal values (such as justice, the Beautiful, the Good) are the highest realities, from which God and man alike derive the meaning and goal of their existence. The aim of life is the knowledge of truth and the control of individuals and society by reason, although Plato also manifested mystical traits. Platonism has exercised great influence on Christian thought.

The thought of Plato was presented chiefly in the original and brilliant literary form of Socratic dialogues, not in the lecture or textbook style of Aristotle. His mind was continually developing, and the results of many of the dialogues were vague and tentative. He did not present a complete or unified system, nor can one be reconstructed from the dialogues. Nevertheless, certain main ideas, summarized in the following, are characteristically Platonic.

I. Socratic Elements in Plato's Thought.

Note.—There is difference of opinion about the degree of originality to be assigned to Plato All agree that the earliest dialogues are reports of the thought of Socrates*; most hold that from 387 (or earlier) on, the "Socrates" of the dialogues is to some extent a literary fiction, serving as spokesman for the thought of Plato. J. Burnet and A. E. Taylor, however, hold that most of the dialogues in which Socrates is spokesman are historically authentic. This article is based on the majority opinion. It is assumed that Plato agreed with the views of Socrates, whether historical or fictional, much as St. Paul agreed with Jesus and the tradition about him.

1. Criticism of the Sophists*. The Sophists, popular teachers of rhetoric and virtue, accepted pay for their instruction and held (Protagoras) that "man is the measure of all things." Socrates refused pay and taught that, not the individual, but the rational, universal man is the measure, as Plato said, therefore, "God is the measure" (Laws).

2. Method of dialectic.* This consisted of truth-seeking by question-asking, Socrates asked for a definition and then asked whether given instances fitted the definition, this led to search for a new definition.

3. Belief in universals. Particular facts are not knowledge, true science comes only from logical universals, correct definitions arrived at by dialectic

'4. Ethical emphasis. Socrates held that man's chief concern is knowledge of the good, knowledge is virtue for him, and virtue is happiness.*

5. Religious faith. Socrates, while not concerned about metaphysics, was a man of prayer, who believed in divine guidance (the daimonion), and in immortality (Apology, Phaedo).

II. Plato's Main Ideas.

Note—While accepting the thought of Socrates, Plato went beyond him by moving from an almost exclusively ethical to a comprehensive interest, including all realms of experience and all values, by moving from a purely logical view of universals to to metaphysical view of them as eternal Ideas or Forms, and by a more developed psychology. He presented many of his highest thoughts in myths (cf the parables of Jesus).

1. Psychology and ethics The soul consists of reason and two "irrational" parts, spirit (man's active, conative nature) and appetite (sensuous desires). Reason is man's highest part, when properly developed, it produces wisdom. When wisdom controls the "irrational," spirit manifests courage, and appetite is controlled by temperance. The ethical ideal is realized by justice, that state of the soul in which each part functions under control of wisdom, "minding its own business" (cf. the charioteer in Phaedr. 246, 253-256). Piety is a part of justice (see Lodge, 531, n. 17).

2. Social philosophy. Plato's social philosophy is simply applied ethics. To each virtue, or part of the soul, there corresponds a social class (in the Republic) To wisdom, the philosopher-kings who are the chief guardians of the State (and live by communistic principles), to courage, the military class (auxiliary guardians); and to temperance, the class of workers (artisans, farmers). That state is just in which all classes do their work under the guidance of philosophical truth. This just state is an aristocracy, lower types are timocracy, oligarchy, democracy (which Plato strongly opposed), and tyranny (the worst of all).

3. Theory of knowledge. Plato was a rationalist*, holding that science (epistēmē) did not arise from sense perceptions, which yield only opinion (doxa). Universals (especially mathematical ones) are the objects of true knowledge, and their a priori character is symbolized by the doctrine of reminiscense—the theory that the universals were perceived in the soul's previous existence and are recalled by appropriate stimuli in this life.

4. The hierarchy of Ideas. The true universals (Ideas, forms) are objects of thought (nooumena, noēta), "colorless, nonspatial, intangible, truly existing essence" (Phaedr. 247), the eternal, objective source of truth and happiness for God and man alike. The highest Idea or Form is that of the Good, all others (such as justice, beauty, knowledge, etc.), are subordinated to it in what has been called the hierarchy of Ideas. This is the first classic formulation of the objectivity of values*, or ideals. The problem of the precise nature of the Forms, and their relation to the particulars of sense (participation, imitation, limitation), is perplexing both to Plato and to his students.

5. Philosophy of religion. Plato was deeply religious. His religion was both rational and mystical (influenced by the Orphic mysteries), ethical (hence his censure of the immoralities of the Homeric Olympian deities), and metaphysical. In religious devotion Plato is comparable to an Isaiah or a Jeremiah. The Euthyphro, a dialogue defending piety, composed shortly after 399, was the first book ever written on philosophy of religion. Plato's conception of God was that of ethical monotheism, although he often used the language of polytheism and expressed his thought in consciously inadequate myths. "We have never seen or rightly conceived a god" (Phaedr. 246, cf. 1 Jn. 4·12). The Platonic God is good (Rep. and Laws X), and the descriptions of the Idea of the Good have led some to identify it with God. The Phaedrus and Timaeus, however, plainly represent God as personal and the Good (the pattern) as external to God. God is the Father, Builder, Maker, Framer, or Artisan (Demiourgos) of the universe. He is not a Creator in the Jewish-Christian sense, but organizes a cosmos out of the chaotic matter (space-time) of the "receptacle," ordering it in the "best possible" way in accordance with the eternal pattern (paradeigma). Plato is therefore an exponent of the idea of a finite God*, and his view is a metaphysical dualism*, corresponding to his epistemological dualism of phenomena and noumena, illustrated in the famous myth of the Cave (Rep. Bk. VII). Thus Plato laid the foundation for the Christian realm of nature and realm of grace, and for Kant's idea of "man as a citizen of two worlds." Despite this dualism, Hegel rightly says that Plato teaches "how near to God and how truly one with him the human reason is."

III. The Development of Platonism.

1. The Old Academy (347-247), with Speusippus following after Plato, emphasized Pythagorean and ethical traits of Platonism. Aristotle* was, of course, the greatest of Platonists, although too independent to be head of the school.

2. The Middle Academy (247-129) became skeptical. Arcesilaus (315-241) advocated suspension of judgment; Carneades (213-129) taught that probability is the guide of life. Neither wrote books.

3. Neoplatonism* (250-529 A.D.) was founded by Ammonius Saccas (175-242) and brought to brilliant development by Plotinus (203-279). Emphasizing the mystical, dualistic, and pantheistic tendencies in Plato, Plotinus conceived the physical world as an emanation from deity (like a central sun), and regarded human individuality as the original sin, due to union of being with non-being (outer darkness). Man is redeemed when he finds mystical reunion with God. St. Augustine was for a time a Neoplatonist. The Academy was closed by Justinian (529 A.D.).

4. Alexandrian Platonism. Philo* of Alexandria* (20 B.C.-50 A.D.), a Jewish theologian, emphasized the similarities between Plato and Moses, which he ascribed to dependence on Moses as Plato's source. The New Testament and Neoplatonism were influenced by him. The Fathers, Clement (died 220 A.D.) and Origen (c. 185-253), were chief among those called "Christian Platonists of Alexandria" (see Bigg's work of that title, 1913). (Boethius of Rome (c. 470-525) was famous for his definition of personality.)

5. Platonism in the Middle Ages. Until about 1200, the influence of Plato (chiefly through the Timaeus and the versions of Neoplatonism in Augustine and the Pseudo-Dionysius) was predominant in Christian thought. John Scotus Eriugena (c. 800-877) held to a modified Neoplatonic pantheism. Anselm (1033-1109) and the School of Chartres (12th cent.), owed much to Platonic thought. Neoplatonic mysticism influenced Christian mystics, notably Meister Eckhart* (c. 1260-c. 1327). The doctrine of mediaeval realism*, that universals (especially man, the church, the body of Christ), are real arose from Platonism, although there was a tendency to interpret the universals as thoughts of God.

6. Platonism in Italy. During the Renaissance* (late 15th cent.), Platonism experienced a revival, especially at Florence (Marsilius Ficinus, Pico della Mirandola). See Pletho.

7. Cambridge Platonism*. Ralph Cudworth (1617-1688) and Henry More (1614-1687) used a modified Platonism to oppose atomistic and mechanistic philosophies. Berkeley* (1685-1753), in his Siris, although not of the Cambridge School, presented numerous Platonic ideas. "Many an empty head is shook at Plato and Aristotle," said he.

8. Recent philosophy. Plato continues to be the source of vigorous philosophical development. Platonic forms appear in the guise of the neutral entities of neo-realism (R. B. Perry), the essences of G. Santayana, and the eternal objects of Whitehead. W. R. Inge is the leading modern Neoplatonist. Modern estimates of Plato evidence his continued hold on men's minds. "All philosophic truth is Plato rightly divined; all philosophic error is Plato misunderstood" (Ferrier). "The safest general characterization of the European philosophical tradition is that it consists of a series of footnotes to Plato" (Whitehead). See Aristotle and Aristotelianism; immortality, arguments for and against; pre-existence; soul; universals, battle over.

The standard English translation of Plato is by Jowett (Oxford, Random House), the Greek text and more accurate translations appear in the Loeb Classical Library (Harvard University Press). See, in addition to the familiar works of Zeller, Gomperz, Wilamowitz-Moellendorf, and Lutoslawski, W. Pater, Plato and Platonism (1893) ; A. E. Taylor, Plato (1927), R C Lodge, Plato's Theory of Ethics (1928), P E. More, The Religion of Plato (1928), J Burnet, Platonism (1928) ; J. H. Muirhead, The Platonic Tradition in Anglo-Saxon Philosophy (1931), C Ritter, Essence of Plato's Philosophy (1933), L Robin, Platon (1935), F. M. Cornford, Plato's Cosmology (1937), R. Demos, The Philosophy of Plato (1939), F. Solmsen, Plato's Theology (1942).   E.S.B.

Plenary Council: A council of the bishops and archbishops of a region, with a papal legate as chairman, power is had only over church government and discipline in the region.   L.R.W.

plenitudo potestatis: (fullness of power) In the language of Leo I it was the unrestricted authority of the pope as against that of a metropolitan bishop. Medieval popes and their supporters often added to the expression "in temporalibus et in spiritualibus" in asserting absolute claims over church and secular power. This claim is controverted by Ockham, Marsiglio, the later Conciliarists and the Reformers.
O Gierke, Political Theories of the Middle Ages (1900), trans. F. W. Maitland.   J.T.M.

Pletho, George Gemisthus: (c. 1355-1450) A Byzantine who lived in Greece until in his eighties, then came to Florence for the Council (1439), and remained to lecture on Plato. He had founded a Neo-Platonic cult in which he interested Cosimo de' Medici and Cardinal Bessarion. It was chiefly through his influence that Plato was introduced to Renaissance Italy. His "Pletho" was an assumed name.   W.E.G.

Plotinus: See Neo Platonism.

pluralism: See ontology.

Plymouth Brethren: A religious society founded in England in the early 19th century as a small opposition movement to the Anglican establishment. Particular protest was voiced against the close connection between church and state, the stereotyped forms of worship, and the church organizations which forced believers into many different groups. The first meetings were held in Dublin, Ireland, in 1827, and the first permanent organization was set up in 1829. The name Plymouth Brethren was taken from its prominent society at Plymouth. The most notable early leader, John Nelson Darby, established congregations over much of Europe, and made several visits to the American churches, after the movement came to America around 1850 through immigration.
Doctrinally the Brethren are non-credal, using the Scriptures as their only guide. They have strong millenial hopes, and stress the atonement of Christ for man and eternal punishment of the unregenerate. In organization, the Brethren hold that all are members of one great but invisible church, with Christ at its head, which was "begun at Pentecost and will be completed before the second Advent." Being loosely organized, they have divided on ecclesiastical grounds into six general bodies, all holding similar theological positions. The last available census listed 633 churches with 22,961 members, and property valued at over $1,186,000 for the six branches of the denomination in the U. S. A.

Bledsoe, art in Southern Review (April, 1877) ; J. S Teulon, History and Doctrine of the Plymouth Brethren (London, 1883), J J. Herzog, Les freres de Plymouth et J. Darby (Lausanne, 1845) ; William B Neatby, History of the Plymouth Brethren (London, 1901), Henry Pickering, Chief Men Among the Brethren (London, 1931). Census of Religious Bodies, "Plymouth Brethren", 1926 (1928).
M.G.R.—W.W.S.

pneuma: See soul.

pneumatics: See Ambrosians.

Pneumatomachi: See Macedonianism.

poetry and theology: Poetry has made a unique, extremely valuable and far too little recognized contribution to Theology, vitalizing and enriching it intuitively, emotionally and imaginatively.
Most of the classic poems of universal literature are to a high degree theological in import, including Job, The Bhagavadgita, the Greek tragedies, Second Isaiah, the Divina Commedia (see Dante), the Tempest, Paradise Lost, Paradise Regained (see Milton), Faust (see Goethe), In Memoriam (see Tennyson), and others and a multitude of the best beloved lyrics are not only religious but in their own way doctrinal, pregnant with ideas of God, Christ, Immortality, etc.
The influence of poetry in arousing, modifying and giving direction to religious thought is very great. In the rejection or modification of Calvinism*, for example, Robert Burns in Scotland and John G. Whittier* in America were quite as widely influential as the seated representatives of theology. In tempering and transforming the disturbing effects of evolutionary theory upon religious thought Tennyson and Browning (and later Corruth in his widely read poem "A jelly fish and a saurian") have exerted a widely mediating and salutary influence.
The Fatherhood of God, the brotherhood of man, the love of God, the reality and consequences of sin, the character and teaching of Christ and the influences of the Spirit have been instilled into the mind and heart of the people by poetry in effective manner and full measure. Faith, hope and love have been given their vital worth and expressiveness by poetry, not only as graces but as ideals, in a way that has greatly illumined and reinforced Church theology and ethics.
Hymnody, as a form of poetry, constitutes what might almost be called a branch of theology, the more effectual in that it animates and beautifies ideas and motives through the instrumentality of imagination and musical harmony. See hymnology; hymns.   J.W.B.

poetry, Hebrew: Hebrew poetry has certain earmarks differentiating it from prose. The most obvious is the parallelism of lines. But there is also metre (really only rhythm) governing the length of lines. There are various theories of Hebrew metrics. The dominant one asserts that Heb. metre is "anapaestic" (ascending); the number of accented syllables is important, that of the unaccented possibly of no account. Thus a "3+3 metre" means that each of two parallel lines has three beats. Quite distinct is the Kina or Lamentation* metre, 3+2 beats The existence of "strophe" is debatable. Refrain occurs, though rarely. (cp. Ps. 42-43, 46). Alphabetic Acrostics are poems in which each unit of one or more lines begins with the next letter of the alphabet. W. O. E. Oesterley and T H Robinson, Introduction to the Books of the O T. (1934).

E.G.K.

poimenics: pastoral theology*.   A.K.R.

polemics: Argument among professing Christians, in an effort to determine the true Christian view with regard to specific questions.   A K.R.

politia ordinata: (appointed or organized government) Although the Holy Spirit is operative in the church, it nevertheless is an appointed orderly government in which as in the secular state, it is necessary that there exists a gradation of rulers. The church therefore as a congregation of believers is also a political congregation.   H.H.

political law: See law.

political science: See sociology.

polity: The provision made by a denomination for government and discipline. These differ widely. Perhaps the most radical distinction is between the "low" type, which thinks of the Church as constituted "from below", and the "high" type, which thinks of the Church as constituted "from above". The former, in its extreme form, regards all authority in the Church as residing in, and inalienable from, the individual member. The Church, which is identified with a single congregation, is constituted by a compact wherein a number of individual believers agree to common action for mutual spiritual benefit and service. Any officers chosen may act only in the name of the congregation, and not by right of authority delegated to them as inherent in their office. Any groups representing more than one congregation have only advisory authority over the participating congregations. The "high" type of polity attributes to the denomination as a whole, or to the Church Universal, an authority of its own (under God) which limits, or from which is derived, such authority as constituent groups, officers or individual members may possess or exercise. But "high" Churches still differ widely in polity. Some think of the Church as an indispensable mediator of saving grace from God to the believer, so that rights and authority move from God, through the Church, to the individual members; others think of grace as moving directly from God to the individual, who thus becomes a member in a body which is more than the sum of its members and which has an authority of its own over the individual members. The former is monarchical or aristocratic, while the latter is republican in its polity. The best example of a monarchical polity is that of the Roman Catholic Church, as conceived in accordance with the "ultramontane"* theory which now prevails in it. The Pope* is God's vice-gerent, all authority resides in him; the church is "the Pope's house". The Church of England*, as conceived by the "Anglo-Catholic* party" is the best-known example of an aristocratic polity. For them, supreme authority in the Church resides, under God, in the bishops*. Our best example of a republican polity is the Presbyterian*. It is "evangelical" because, like the congregational* type, it is based on the doctrine of the priesthood of all believers; but, unlike the congregational, it is "high" because it attributes to the body of believers an authority of its own, under God, which conditions the liberty of the individuals. It constitutionally delegates power to its elected officials. The four basic types of polity, then, are the congregational, the monarchical, the aristocratic and the republican; the actual polity of any denomination may, however, cut across these distinctions and may be still further modified by such factors as its attitude towards the civil authority. See Canon Law, clergy; deacon, ecclesiastical courts; hierarchy, presbyter, priest. Also see under various churches.

A K.R.

Pollok Lectureship, The: Established in 1902 and 1912 by friends of Principal A. Pollok at Pine Hill Divinity Hall, Halifax, Nova Scotia. The capital sum is $4000. Lectures are presented about every three years dealing with the subject of homiletics. Among those who have appeared on this foundation are Professors Denny of Glasgow, H. R. Mackintosh of Edinburgh, James Moffatt, Basil Matthews of London.

(Data from the Office of the Principal of Divinity Hall.)   V.F.

polyandry: The marriage* of one woman to several men. This is a relatively rare form of marriage, the best known people practicing polyandry being the Todas of India prior to the period of British influence. Polyandry among the Todas was accompanied by female infanticide, a natural counterpart to a marriage system in which there is a plurality of husbands since universally the birth ratio between the sexes is essentially equal. Compare with polygamy.   E.R.M.

Polycarp: Born about 69 A.D., died most probably in 159 A.D. He became bishop of Smyrna, and entertained Ignatius* on his way to martyrdom. His one surviving work is his letter to the Philippians, covering a collection of the Epistles of Ignatius. Shortly before his death he visited Rome, to support the Asian view of the celebration of Easter, and was received with veneration as the most eminent figure in the church. Returning to Smyrna he died at the stake during a popular outbreak against the Christians, and bore his martyrdom with unflinching courage.

596

J B. Lightfoot, The Apostolic Fathers (1890); E. J. Goodspeed, Early Christian Literature (1942).
                                                                E.F.S.

polygamy: The marriage* of more than one woman to a man, of one woman to more than one man, or of several women to several men. In commonsense the word is misused since it generally refers to marriages in which a man has more than one wife, i e., polygyny. Polygyny has been a widespread form of marriage among both historical and pieliterate peoples. Compare with polyandry.   E.R.M.

polyglot Bibles: Editions of the Bible in which the original text and several translations are placed in parallel columns. The first and most famous was the Hexapla of Origen*, which contained the O.T. in Hebrew, with a Greek transliteration and four Greek versions. The Complutensian Polyglot (1514-17) contained the N.T. in Greek and Latin, and the O.T. in Hebrew, Vulgate, Septuagint* (with a Latin translation) and Chaldaic.   E.F.S.

polygyny: See polygamy.

polyphony: The combination of two or more melodies* simultaneously. The emphasis is horizontal in contrast to homophony which emphasizes the vertical combination of tones supporting a single melody. The history of music from the 9th century to the present is the history of polyphony. In the 17th century homophony challenged the supremacy of the polyphonic style. The greatest compositions of all times, vocal and instrumental, are those which maintain a balance between the polyphonic and homophonic principles. See canon; conductus, discant, fugue; modes; motet, organum.   E.H.B.

polytheism: See theism.

Pomponazzi, Pietro: (1464-1525) Influential philosopher of the Italian Renaissance*. He held that the immortality of the soul, the possibility of miracles, and the freedom of the will could not be demonstrated philosophically, but admitted that these truths were established on the basis of faith. In general he upheld the "double verity", assigning philosophy to the speculative reason, and religion to the practical reason. In spite of his philosophical views, he insisted on his readiness to submit all his tenets to the judgment of the Church.   C.V.

pontifical: The term "pontifical" (from the Latin: pontifex: pons facere, a bridge maker, intermediary between God and man) is applied to any number of objects or functions referring to a "pontifex" or bishop, and especially to the Roman Bishop as supreme head of the Catholic Church. In the pagan Roman Law the pontifices formed the supreme council of the emperor for the regulation of all religious matters and services. At the disestablishment of the old Roman religion and the introduction of Christianity, the Pope* as supreme head of the Church and Bishop of new Christian Rome assumed the title of Pontifex Supremus or Maximus.   R.M.H.

pontifical college: In ancient Roman pagan parlance, the term signified the close advisers of the Pontifex Maximus in the administration and legislation concerning matters religious (College of the Pontifices). During the period immediately following the Protestant Reformation in the British Isles, the term signified any college or seminary even outside of Rome (hence the expression "Seminary Priests") founded by or placed directly under the jurisdiction of the Holy See, especially the Sacred Congregation of the Propaganda, for the education and training of Catholic missionaries intended specifically for England, Ireland, and Scotland, e.g., the missionary colleges at Douai, Valadolid, Lisbon, Paris, etc. Later the term was applied to all similar colleges or seminaries erected primarily for the education and training of foreign missionaries or intended for missions abroad, e.g., in South America, Asia, Africa, etc. Many of those in South America were in charge of Religious Orders*. Primary among all pontifical missionary colleges is the College of the Propaganda at Rome, known also from its founder, Urban VIII, Collegium Urbanum (Aug. 1, 1627), intended for the education of missionaries for all countries subject to the Sacred Congregation of the Propaganda. Since the publication of the decree "Deus Scientiarum Dominus" (May 24, 1931) the term has also come to apply to all those Catholic universities and colleges where academic degrees may be conferred presupposing of course a full observance of all the provisions required for such degrees as laid down by the decree, e g., the Catholic University of America, Washington, D. C. If a College or seminary is empowered to give a degree only in one or other branch, e.g., in Sacred Theology it is classified as a Pontifical Institute or "Facultas Theologica Pontificia". From both are to be distinguished Pontifical Academies, which under the patronage of the Popes, are associations of learned men for the promotion of sciences or spread of religious devotions, etc.   R.M.H.

pontifical mass: A pontifical mass is one celebrated by the Pope, a Bishop, or Prelate enjoying certain privileges of a bishop but not consecrated as such, e.g., a Protonotary* Apostolic or Monastic Abbot. The pontifical mass represents the oldest liturgical celebration and sacrifice of the Eucharist*. It was celebrated by the bishop, assisted by priests (who co-celebrated) and surrounded by the faithful. In distinction to this stood the Mass of the Catechumens, in which the bishop assisted, not at the altar but at the throne or faldstool. Among the distinctive features of a Pontifical Mass is, besides the vesting at the throne (if an Ordinary) or at the faldstool (if not the Diocesan Bishop, or if indeed an Ordinary, but celebrating in the presence of a Cardinal) the use of the Pontificalia, the kissing of the Book of the Gospels at the beginning of the Mass; chanting and recitation of the Introit and all succeeding prayers or lessons up to the Credo inclusive at the throne or faldstool; the washing of the hands before the Offertory (reminiscent of the old oblations of the faithful before the Offertory of the Mass), finally, the recitation of the Last Gospel of St. John (part of the first chapter of St. John) as the celebrant leaves the altar. During the celebration of a Pontifical High Mass today there are besides the minor clerics, also a Presbyter Assistens, two Deacons of Honor, a Deacon and Subdeacon of the Mass, and usually two Masters of Ceremonies. The ceremonies of the Pontifical Mass, as also of all other pontifical functions, are regulated by the Ceremoniale Episcoporum. See mass, Roman Catholic.   R.M.H.

pontificalia: The word (cf. "pontifical") is used canonically and liturgically. According to Canon No. 337 of the new Code of Canon Law Pontificalia signify those episcopal functions at which in accordance with liturgical prescriptions the bishop must use mitre and crosier, e.g., at a Pontifical High Mass, e.g., for the conferring of Major Orders, celebration of Solemn Vespers, etc. Liturgically speaking pontificalia signify all strictly episcopal rights and privileges, e.g., a) the right while performing or assisting at solemn functions to use such liturgical garments or paraphernalia when and as prescribed by the Ceremoniale Episcoporum, e.g., pontifical slippers, buskins or liturgical stockings, gloves, tunicella, dalmatic, mozetta, cappa magna and, formerly, the rationale breast-plate, furthermore such insignia as mitre, crozier, ring, pectoral cross and pallium* (if a Metropolitan Archbishop), and finally such sacred vessels or pieces of furniture as the bugia (candlestick and candle), Book of the Canon, throne or faldstool and canopy or baldachin over the throne; b) the right to perform such functions as reserved by the Pontificale Romanum, specifically to consecrated bishops, e.g., the conferring of Holy Orders, Major orders in particular, administration of the Sacrament of Confirmation; consecration of churches, etc., and finally c) to function or assist at functions not restricted exactly to bishops, but accompanied nevertheless by special ceremonies as prescribed by the Ceremoniale Episcoporum when and if performed by them, e.g., the celebration of High Mass, ceremonies of Holy Week, exequies, etc. If the Ordinary of a Diocese is present, e.g., at the chanting of the Libera after a Solemn Requiem Mass he and he alone, besides the Celebrant, has the right to give the last absolution, even though he has not celebrated the Mass. Cardinals, however, do enjoy this privilege likewise and have the right of the pontificalia in all of the above named cases, excepting that they may not confer Major Orders unless they be also consecrated bishops. Abbots too, Prefects Apostolic and Protonotories* may use the pontificalia, but in a more restricted sense. Abbots may confer Minor Orders upon their own subjects and while doing so make use of the pontificalia.   R.M.H.

pope: The word "Pope" is derived from the old ecclesiastical Latin "papa", from the Greek papas, meaning father, in classical Latin pappas, as used by Juvenal Satires VI, 633; hence the expression as applied to the Pope "Father of Christendom". Catholic theologians maintain, in accordance with the Constitution Pastor Aeternus of July 18, 1870 edited by the Council of the Vatican*, that all the prerogatives — Primacy, Infallibility, Universal Power, etc., accorded by Christ to St. Peter* ("Cath. Concept.")—are also the pope's in virtue of his being the successor of Peter as Bishop of Rome, Peter's See. Hence only he who rightfully and canonically succeeds to that See as Bishop is actually entitled to, and factually exercised down the centuries, the prerogatives of Peter (cf. "anti-pope"). In proof of this assertion Catholic historians point to the evidences of history. St. Cyprian*, e.g., in the middle of the III century (there is no doubt after that) claims that Cornelius succeeded to "the place of Fabian which is the place of Peter". (Ep. IV 8, cf. LIX, 14). Firmilian of Caesarea observes that Pope St. Stephen claimed the right to decide the controversy regarding the rebaptism of heretics in Northern Africa on the ground of his succession from Peter (Cyprian, Ep. LXXV 17). Tertullian*, writing about 220 A.D., when he had already lapsed into Montanism*, although disagreeing with the pope on the matter of absolution from sins against the flesh which he (Tert.) held to be irremissible, unwittingly calls him the "Bishop of Bishops" or "Episcopus Episcoporum" (De Pudicitia XXI) "who claims that he has the same power to forgive sins as Peter had". Tertullian, living at Rome would certainly have contested the claims of the pope had the papacy as such begun only in the III century. About the same time Hippolytus*, whom even Lightfoot* admits to have been the author of the first part of the famous "Liberian Catalog" of popes, reckons Peter in the list of Roman Pontiffs (Clement of Rome, I 259). A very ancient poem "Adversus Marcionem", written at the beginning of the III century, refers to Peter as having passed on to Linus "the chair" (cathedra· cf. "chair of St. Peter") on which he himself had sat" (Migne, PL II, 1077). In the second century we have the famous passage of Irenaeus* (d. 202) concerning the necessity of all churches, i.e., in this case, dioceses, being obliged to conform with and agree to Rome on account of its "superior primacy" ("potiorem principalitatem"). Irenaeus again speaks of Hyginius, "the ninth Bishop of Rome", thus employing an enumeration that necessarily included Peter as the first Bishop of that See. In the I century we have St. Clement, a disciple of the Apostles, who after Linus succeeded Peter as the fourth in the line of popes. In his famous Epistle to the Corinthians (cf. "Clement, St., Pope of Rome"), written in 95 or 96 A.D. he so evidently and authoritatively exhorts them in the Holy Ghost to receive the bishops who had been expelled through a turbulent faction, that Lightfoot (Clement I 70) calls it "the first step towards papal domination". St. Ignatius* of Antioch (about 107) in his opening letter to the Romans refers to their churches as

"presiding over the brotherhood of love". But the most important testimony concerning both the primacy and the infallibility of the See of Peter is Irenaeus' celebrated passage (Adversus Haereses III 3, 2) telling the Gnostics that if they wish to know the truth all they need do is to look at the doctrines taught at Rome, because this is the Church founded by the glorious Apostles Peter and Paul, for which reason every other church must conform to it. The well-known decision of Pope St. Victor (189-98) in the question of the celebration of Easter in Asia Minor is an excellent example of the exercise of papal supremacy even and also in the Eastern Church in the II century. The primacy of the Roman Pontiffs, although long taught by the Catholic Church, was re-confirmed in 1870 by the Vatican Council in the famous Constitution of the IV Session under date of July 18, 1870, entitled Pastor Aeternus. As for the primacy, the above text of Irenaeus is important also for the infallibility of the Roman Pontiffs, based on Luke 22, 32 (cf. "St. Peter· Cath. Concept"). That this prerogative also was passed on to Peter's successors as heads of the Church was solemnly defined by the above quoted Constitution of the Vatican Council "Pastor Aeternus", which based itself "upon the decisions of numerous other Councils"—words taken from the Council of Florence*, (1439). Although there were a few Catholic Bishops opposed in debate to the definition of papal infallibility or at least to the advisability of defining it at that time, once the definition was declared they unanimously accepted it. The declaration was accompanied by an adequate definition that infallibility applied only when the Roman Pontiff spoke ex cathedra (cf. "chair of Peter") i.e., as supreme pastor and teacher of the whole church in a solemn pronouncement, thus excluding any private opinions which a pope may have as an individual. The extent of papal infallibility was not defined explicitly, but declared by the Council to be the same which the Divine Master desired His Church to possess. Hence whatever the extent of the infallibility of all the bishops of the world assembled under their common head, the pope, enjoy, that same infallibility the pope himself enjoys when he speaks ex cathedra, and this irrespective of the subsequent assent of the Church because the prerogative under the given conditions is personal, vi officci. Having once established the Pope's primacy and infallibility, his universal coercitive power ex jure divino logically follows (cf. Math. 16, 19), his immediate and ordinary jurisdiction over each and all the faithful taken singly or collectively; also the right to convoke, preside over and confirm Ecumenical Councils, his right of entertaining, as the supreme judge, appeals of all ecclesiastical causes, whether presented by an individual or by a canonically established diocesan or Roman court or tribunal. It thus follows that as supreme teacher, ruler and judge, the pope controls every department of the Church's life, whether immediately, as through the Roman Congregations (departments of State) and Tribunals; or mediately, through the appointment of bishops or promotion of archbishops, who while enjoying ecclesiastical jurisdiction (whether immediately from God, or mediately from the Pope, the Council of Trent* preferred not to decide) are nevertheless responsible to him as to the Supreme Pastor in their so-called quinquennial reports, subject to his rulings and amenable to his decisions in cases of appeal (Causae Majores)—and, in fact, even liable as to advancement and also to deposition or removal from office, even for disciplinary reasons or expediency. The pope, as Bishop of Rome, is also Patriarch of the West, Primate of Italy, Archbishop and Metropolitan of the Roman Province and Sovereign of the Vatican City. He is Prefect of the Holy Office (which decides in all matters pertaining to faith and morals), of the Consistorial (in charge of the appointment of bishops) and of the Oriental Congregation. He bears the titles of Pope, Summus Pontifex, Pontifex Maximus, Servus Servorum Dei, etc. Among his insignia and marks of honor is the use of the tiara* or triple crown signifying his supreme doctrinal, executive and judicial powers. The pope does not, like ordinary bishops, use the bent pastoral staff (sign of a restricted jurisdiction) but only the erect cross, wears the pallium* at all solemn ecclesiastical functions and consents to the kissing of his foot (or slipper), as the characteristic sign or reverence to the Vicar of Christ, a custom going back as far as the IX century. The Pope ranks as the first among the Christian princes and in Catholic Countries his ambassadors have precedence over all other members of the diplomatic corps. Although, especially during the Middle Ages often put into office through the influence of German emperors or powerful Roman families, the popes were elected, at first through the Roman Clergy and Roman people and, since the epoch-making decree of Nicholas II of 1059, by the cardinals of the Church. While elections were frequently delayed for months, even years, and often tampered with by ambassadoral interference and the use of the veto, the cardinals according to present day legislation as ratified by Pius X and Pius XI meet in conclave at least 15 days (it may be extended to 20) after the death of a pope, and elect freely and accept unanimously the choice of the majority. A few days after his election the new pope is crowned with impressive ceremonies by the Cardinal of Ostia, whose historical privilege this is. The most important of the older chronological lists of popes are that of Irenaeus (d. 202), who writing between 175-190 A.D. enumerates the series from Peter to Eleutherius (Adv. Hereses III, 3, 3, Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. V 6); the "Liberian Catalog", so named from the pope whose name ends the list (Liberius 352-366); and the "Liber Pontificalis"* (composed at the beginning of the V century) and, as regards the earlier popes, dependent on the "Liberian Catalog". A complete list of canonically elected or appointed popes can be found in any authorized Church History or ecclesiastical encyclopedia. (cf. Cath. Encyc. e.g., XII 272-4). See clergy, patriarch.

    Roskovany, Romanus Pontifex (Neutra, 1867-79), 16 vols.; Duchesne, edit., Liber Pontificalis (Paris, 1892); H Hurter, S. J, Theologia Dogmaticae Compendium (Innsbruck, 1903), vol. I, Cath Encyc. XII 260-275, VII 790 800, Lexikon. f. Theol. und Kirche VII 927-42 (Freiburg in Br, 1935).

R M.H

popes, captivity of: See Avignon.

popes or Roman pontiffs: Chronological List. Cf Fernand Hayward, History of the Popes (1903), The New Catholic Dictionary (1929) p. 774. The Catholic Directory publ. each year by Kennedy, (N. Y.), World Almanac publ. each year by the New York World-Telegram, e g., 1940 edition, p. 572, Cath. Encyc. XII 272-5. Any authorized Catholic Church History usually carries a list of popes at the end -of the book or last volume See end of article "pope". R M.H.

Porphyry: (232 or 233—ca. 300 A.D.) Outstanding follower of Plotinus mainly in the ethical and religious doctrines of his master. His chief source of fame, however, comes from the treatise Essagoge whereby he became one of the best known logicians throughout the ages. Also known for his polemic work against the Christians, the earliest attempt of biblical text-criticism. See s.v. Neo Platonism. S.C.T.

Porter Foundation, the Henry D.: The Henry D. Porter Foundation, in the amount of $3,500, was given to Pomona College, Claremont, California, in honor of the Reverend Henry D. Porter for many years a missionary in China. The income is used annually to bring to the college some prominent worker in the field of Christian Missions The lecturer upon this foundation may share in the regular classroom work related to the history, geography, politics, or religion of the region from which he has come. A.C.M.

Poseidon: Brother of Zeus and god of the sea in Greek mythology. He appears in the Odyssey as the enemy of Odysseus and the source of that hero's misfortunes. P.G.M.

positio: 1) A course, or portion of food, served to monks. 2) In theology or philosophy, the thesis or view upheld in controverted questions.

C.V.

positivism: The philosophy of Auguste Comte* and of thinkers influenced by Comte or by ideas similar to his It starts, like Bacon's philosophy, with a rejection of final causes, and goes on to banish entirely the search for any causes, especially for a First Cause. It restricts knowledge to mathematics and to sciences derived from phenomena observable by the senses. This anti-theistic philosophy of science is accompanied by an anti-theistic "religion of humanity", combining a lofty altruistic ethics with a somewhat fantastic cultus.

Positivism exerted a wide influence in France (H. Taine, E. Renan, L. Weber, E. Durkheim, L. Lévy-Bruhl), Germany (E. Dühring, E. Laas, Zeitschrift für positivistische Philosophie), Austria (E. Mach), Switzerland (R. Avenarius), England (F. Harrison, J. H. Bridges, T. H. Huxley, W. K. Clifford, K. Pearson, The Positivist Review), and Italy (Ferrari, Villari, Marchesini, Fulci); a lesser influence in Hungary, Czechoslovakia (where Masaryk was inclined to positivism), Poland (J. Sniadicki), Russia (P. Lavrow—but positivism is heresy for Communists), and Rumania (B Conta)

Comte's thought was introduced to the United States by a theistic critic of positivism, G. F. Holmes, in The Methodist Quarterly Review (1851), as is shown by R. L. Hawkins in Auguste Comte and the United States (1936). The chief positivist in the United States was P. Carus (Chicago), although positivistic ideas have had a rather wide influence through religious humanists* and certain writers on sociology and naturalism. J. Dewey's instrumentalism is colored by positivism.

During the nineteenth century positivism was the dominant philosophy in large sections of Latin America, representing, in part, a democratic reaction against scholasticism. Among the leading figures are· Enrique José Varona (1849-1933) of Cuba, Gabino Barreda (1818-1881) of Mexico; Eugenio María de Hostos (1839-1903) of Puerto Rico (whose interests were chiefly ethical, political, social, and educational, and whose works and bibliography were edited ably by his son, Adolfo de Hostos, in 1939-1940 under a governmental commission); González Prada (Peru), J. Alfredo Ferreira and José Ingenieros (1877-1925) of Argentina, the former being active in a specifically Comtean movement. It was in Brazil, however, that positivism had a more extensive influence than in any other part of the world. A positivistic motto, Ordem e Progresso (order and progress), appears on the flag of Brazil. Even earlier than the founding of the Republic (1889), a "church and positivistic apostolate," had been established in 1881 with a Temple of Humanity in Rio de Janeiro, it survives until the present time. One of its prominent leaders was R. Teixeira Mendes. Thought in Latin America has moved away from positivism in recent years under the influence of men like J. Vasconcelos, A Caso, and E. Nicol in Mexico, J. A. Fránquiz in Puerto Rico; and A. Korn, C. Alberini, and F. Romero in Argentina.

At present positivism is more influential as a philosophy of science (logical positivism) than as an organized religious movement, although its indirect influence is evident among humanists. See naturalism, ontology.

See E Caird, The Social Philosophy and Religion of Comte (2nd ed., 1893), F. Harrison, The Positive Evolution of Religion (1913), J. Dewey, Reconstruction in Philosophy (1920); L. Zea, El Positivismo en México (1943). For bibliographies of positivism, see Rand in Baldwin's Dictionary, vol. III, Pt II, pp. 634-638, and art. "Positivism", by Guido de Ruggiero in Encyclopaedia of the Social Sciences. The article is indebted to an unpublished paper by F. Romero, "Contemporary Tendencies in Hispano-American Thought" (1942). E.S.B.

post-exilic: In contrast with pre-exilic (before 586 B.C.) and exilic (586-538 B.C.), post-exilic designates the time between the first return and the Christian Era (538-1 B.C.); an obscure period with little historical writing except Ezra, Nehemiah, and Maccabees; time of persecution of Jews, priestly dominance, legalism, and emerging scribalism. The religion of this period is spoken of as "Judaism" in contrast with "Hebrew Religion" or "Religion of Israel" in pre-exilic times. See exile; pre-exilic.   R.E.W.

postillae: See Biblical history in Christian instruction.

postmillennialism or postmillenarianism: The belief that the thousand year reign of Christ on earth will come after the gospel has been spread and become effective throughout the world. The condition thus reached will last for a thousand years. In this period the Jews will be converted to Christianity. After a brief but terrible conflict between the Christian and evil forces Christ will appear and the general resurrection and the final judgment* will follow. The earth will then be destroyed by fire and a new heaven and a new earth will be revealed. See premillenarianism; millenarianism. S. J. Case, The Millennial Hope (1918).   w.w.s.

post-Nicene Fathers: See patristics. Cf. Ante-Nicene Fathers.

postulant: (Lat., postulans, petitioner) Usually an applicant for admission to a religious order under preliminary probation. In the Episcopal Church a similar applicant for admission to ordination.   B.S.E.

potentia: (L. potens, partic. of posse, to be able) Literally, power, ability, capacity. More adequately, the ability to change or a tendency toward actuality. Whereas possibility is the mere conceivability or non-repugnance of an idea, potency or potentiality is possibility plus, implying raw-material or sub-matter over and above the mere conceivability. Intrinsic possibility is but a thought, while potency is part of a thing and it exists in the real order. Aristotle escaped the extremes of Heraclitus and Parmenides by holding that all beings in the real order excepting the Pure Act (God) are compounded of potency and actuality.   D.C.O'G.

poverty, evangelical: The voluntary surrender of outer possessions and inner possessiveness by those seeking gospel perfection through following Christ's counsels to renunciation. Some have espoused their ideal with religious vows. Others have served it without ecclesiastical authorization or in open criticism of the organized church. Poverty idealism throughout Christian history has been distinguished from both the nominal sacrifices of "average Christianity" and the involuntary indigence of humanity at large.
S. J. Turner, The Vow of Poverty (1929).
R.C.P.

practical religion: See charity and almsgiving; charity organization; communistic settlements, religious, friendly societies; humanitarianism; institutional church, the; orphanages; social gospel; social work of the churches.

practical theology: In theological education, mostly American, a division of the curriculum. The expression is differently used in theological institutions and covers various subjects, among them preaching (homiletics), worship, pastoral care, church administration, church polity. See theology.   R H.N.

Praemunire, Statute of: The first Statute of Praemunire was enacted in 1353. It was designed to prevent appeals being made from the royal to papal courts.   W.S.H.

pragmatic realism: See epistemology.

pragmatic sanction: (Lat., sanctio pragmatica) A late Roman term for a royal decree on public affairs, also applied to some mediaeval and modern French and Spanish royal edicts. See placet.   L.R.W.

pragmatism: Called by Wm. James* "a new name for some old ways of thinking" pragmatism has become a blanket term covering theories of meaning, of truth, of being, of knowledge, and of intellectual method. Common to all is an emphasis on the evolutionary and changing character of reality, on the relevance of knowledge to practical situations, on the need of testing truth by its ability to "work", and on the instrumental nature of ideas. Thought is taken as a mode of conduct which arises in felt need and works purposefully to solve problematic situations in such a way as to produce future satisfactions, instead of "reflecting" or "copying" antecedent reality. Pragmatists thus minimize the distinction between thought and practice, claiming that thinking is a part of the continuous process of interaction characteristic of the real world and that to set it apart is bad or anti-social ethics as well as bad or inaccurate psychology and metaphysics.

Pragmatism is commonly supposed to have originated with a famous article by C. S. Peirce* in 1878 which defined the meaning of a concept in terms of its consequences. It was taken up by James who emphasized the notion of expectancy but modified Peirce's views by stressing the sensory and the particularistic aspects of the future experiences to which ideas point. Influenced by his biological studies and his belief in the primary role played by desire, purpose, and will in determining attention, and therefore what shall be "real" for the observing subject, James went on from the pragmatic method, or interpretation of ideas in terms of consequences, to a pragmatic definition of truth as an attribute of ideas. Truth "happens to ideas", ideas are "made true" by events, so that truth becomes, in some of James's more extreme writings, the process of verification by which ideas practically establish themselves. Throughout his work James was concerned to point out the ambiguity of ordinary definitions of truth in terms of "conformity" or "agreement". These terms, he argued, need explanation, and it is better to say that ideas are true when they lead to satisfactory adaptation to their objects or take account of them in a practical way. Mind "engenders truth upon reality." It acts not to copy its world but to complete it.

F C. S. Schiller developed a "humanism" which had much in common with James's pragmatism and was welcomed by James as a substantially similar view, the chief difference being that where James stressed the claims of objective fact, its giveness, and the possibility of its presence in immediate perceptual awareness, Schiller was more inclined to say that all knowledge is provisional, that the object is what it is for the subject, and the individual with his beliefs is the more concrete object of study.

John Dewey was also welcomed as an ally by James, (although he uses the word "pragmatism" less than "instrumentalism" or "empiricism") and he has become the most influential thinker in the movement today. Dewey is more naturalistic and less individualistic than James and inclined to make much of the social categories of communication and participation. He is also preoccupied with the experimentalism of the scientific method and eager to see it become the dominant intellectual method in philosophy itself. Dewey's metaphysics is a reflection of his instrumental epistemology*, for which an idea is a means to controlled and enriched experience, since "knowledge is reality making a particular and specified sort of change in itself."

With its emphasis on ideas as working hypotheses pragmatism is still influential, especially in contemporary "operationalism" and the revival of an empirical positivism.* The vagueness of the movement and the name is shown in the fact that it has also had a direct effect on religious thought, chiefly through James's stress on the right of the individual, "other things being equal", to trust his emotions, including his hopes and spiritual ambitions. In recent years Dewey and the "Chicago School"* have affected methods and objects of religious education by interpreting religion as a life of practical devotion to social ideals rather than intellectual acceptance of a theological creed.

Cf C. S Peirce, "How to Make Our Ideas Clear" Pop. Sci. Mo. (1878) XII, 286, Wm. James, The Will to Believe, etc. (1897), Pragmatism (1907), The Meaning of Truth (1909), "Philosophical Conceptions and Practial Results" U. of Cal. Chronicle (1898), p. 4, F. C. S. Schiller, Humanism (1903), Studies in Humanism (1907), "Axioms as Postulates" in Personal Idealism (1902) ed. H. Sturt; J. Dewey, The Influence of Darwin on Philosophy (1910), The Quest for Certainty (1929), "What Does Pragmatism Mean by Practical?" Journ. Phil. (1908) V, 85; A O. Lovejoy, "The Thirteen Pragmatisms" Journ. Phil. (1908) V. 5 and 29; J B. Pratt, What is Pragmatism? (1915); J. Royce, "The Eternal and the Practical" Philos. Rev. XIII (1904), 129.   J.S.B.

Prajāpati: Literally, lord of creatures, appeared first in the Vedas as an epithet of Savitar and of Soma but in the late tenth book as an abstract god, the apotheosis of the creative activity of the universe. He becomes the chief deity in the later period of the Brahmanas.   C.S.B.

prakriti: An Hindu term meaning primeval matter. In the Sankhya* system prakriti and purusha are the dual bases of all existence, material and spiritual.   C.S.B.

prapatti-mārga: The Hindu way of salvation by complete and utter surrender to God. No effort on man's part is required aside from his surrender. Sometimes known as the "cat-way", referring to the way in which a kitten without effort on its own part is carried by the mother—in contrast to the "monkey-way" in which the little monkey must cling to the mother.   C.S.B.

prayer: The act of prayer, whether with words or without, is the act of putting ourselves more completely into the power of God's working so that some good may be attained or some evil escaped. This essential act of prayer is not that of communicating our wants to God or of begging God, although the verbal forms of communication and petition may be the necessary devices by which the essential act is performed.

Prayer is here distinguished from worship. (See worship.) Prayer includes worship but has an added element which is petition. It is this element of petition which we here examine. Prayer is seeking some good, or escape from some evil, by appeal to God. We cannot understand its efficacy without some idea of that working reality of God which answers prayer. The understanding of prayer is the understanding of its answer, for prayer is meaningless unless it is answered.

The good which God creates most commonly requires the casting out of lesser goods which we with restricted vision uphold. This recreating of us operates by making us more actively and appreciatively aware of one another's interests. Innumerable obstructions and perversions hinder and retard this reciprocal apprehension of the hopes and fears, joys and sorrows, strivings and aversions which make up the lives of each and all. But in so far as the mind of each participates in the mind of all and the minds of all in the mind of each, we have the work of God in our midst. The Bible calls this love and identifies it with God. (I John 4 8) It is this creativity generating mutual awareness of one another's interests which answers prayer.

Most people agree that the words we use are not the prayer since we can use the words of prayer and not be really praying at all. Yet the same people often persist in thinking that prayer is a kind of language directed to God. Obviously it cannot be a language if it is not the use of words. Prayer is a certain attitude or predisposition of the personality by which we give ourselves more completely to the creativity of God. We use the language of prayer to acquire this predisposition, but the language is for ourselves, not for God. It is this predisposition which God demands, and not the words. Prayer, therefore, is not a language although we ordinarily must use the language to perform the act of prayer.

The act of prayer, when it is genuine, puts us under the control of that creativity which makes us more sensitive and responsive to the interests of people round about us and they reciprocally become more sensitive to our interests. This deepening and widening of community wherein we are more responsive to one another is what answers prayer. But this deepening and widening of community, this magnified inter-responsiveness and mutual awareness, is precisely the work of God in answer to the act of prayerful self-giving to God   Therefore when prayer is answered in this way, it is God that answers prayer.   Study of the instances of answered prayer, when any line of a cause and effect can be traced, will reveal that this is the way prayer is answered, namely, by some wider and deeper inter-responsiveness of people to one another which God accomplishes in answer to that predisposition of personality which is the act of prayer.

By the act of prayer we so yield our established order of being to the creativity of God that our wants are.   1) so transformed that they can be fulfilled and then 2) are fulfilled to the extent that we participate in a community of persons made more responsive to one another by the work of God in answer to our prayer.   Thus God answers prayer.

Friedrich Heiler, Prayer, A Study in the History and Psychology of Religion (1932) , Baron Friedrich von Hugel, The Life of Prayer (1929) , Pico Mario Puglisi, Prayer (1929) ; Evelyn Underhill, Worship (1937) , H. N and R W Wieman, Normative Psychology of Religion (1935) , Robert Will, Le Culte (1924) .   H.N.W.

Prayer of Manasses: See Manasses, Prayer of.

prayers for the dead: Natural affection and community life that involves moral and spiritual welfare, coupled with a belief in survival, make prayers for the dead widespread.   Out of Egypt the custom is first noticed in Judaism in 2nd century B.C· (2 Mac· 39·44), and has continued there to the present.   It was apparently taken over by Christians, although little mention is found in early writers.   The N.T. references (1 Cor. 15·29, 2 Tim. 1: 16-18, 4 19) are obscure.   The Catacomb* inscriptions, the Fathers, and liturgies make increasing references that show it a custom known by the 3rd or 4th century for both private and public prayer (cf. St. Augustine, Conf. ix).   The early prayers were restrained in wording, although asking forgiveness.   In the West, after St. Gregory's descriptions of visions of purgatory*, prayers more frequently asked release from suffering, and liturgical language still restrained took on a dolorous note.   The western medieval doctrines of purgatory, especially in popular form, made for a greatly increased use of public and private prayers, especially the Office of the Dead* and requiem* masses.   The attack of the Reformers* on indulgences* and votive masses* and the whole cultus of the dead led generally (despite Luther) to its disrepute and, following Calvin, most Protestants hold that the silence of the canonical scriptures weighs against the custom and that, because the souls of the righteous are in heaven awaiting the resurrection of their bodies, prayers for them are unavailing.   The Anglican Church made varying reforms, never denying the practice and making provision for it in recent liturgical revisions.   The Eastern Orthodox belief is that prayer especially the offering of the Eucharist aids the souls not yet ready for heaven. See Etruscan religion; intercession.

R H Charles, Eschatology (London, 1913) ; F. von Hugel, Eternal Life (Edinburgh, 1912) ; J H. Newman, Dream of Gerontius (1866) .   T.J B.

preaching: The proclamation of the gospel in sermon* form   The apostles, following Jesus' example and command, developed the missionary sermon, which became a feature of services in the early church   Influenced in form by the discourse of Graeco-Roman rhetoricians, it reached its height in the pulpit eloquence of Chrysostom and Augustine.   The trend toward liturgy crowded preaching into second place for centuries. Repopularized by the friars, it was reforged by Luther and Calvin in the fires of the Reformation as a true sword of the spirit.   Since then, whether wielded in time of peace or war, by pulpit orator of 17th century England or France, orthodox Lutheran, Wesleyan revivalist, modern gospel—or social gospel*—preacher, it has remained one of the church's mightiest weapons. See expository preaching, homiletics, homily, rhetoric.

Article in Schaff-Herzog, Encyclopedia of Religious Knowledge (1911) vol IX, H Hering, Geschichte der Predigt (1904) , A E Garvie, The Christian Preacher (1920) (Survey with bibliography)   E.C.K.

pre-Adamite: An inhabitant of the earth before Adam*; or, the belief in the existence of inhabitants before Adam.   This term is associated especially with Isaac de la Peyrère (1594-1676), a French Calvinist who in 1655 published a book seeking to prove that Adam was the progenitor only of the Jews, the Gentiles being descended from previous inhabitants of the earth.   According to his view, Gen. 1 26ff, describes the creation of the Gentiles' ancestors on the sixth day of creation, and Gen. 2 7 of Adam after the seventh day   He found support for this in the history of Cain and in Romans 5 12-14.   He later renounced this theory and became a Catholic. The problem which pre-Adamitism sought to solve does not exist for critical O.T. scholars who do not consider the Genesis* account of creation as literal history.   J.P.H.

prebend: (Lat., praebeo, grant) The stipend of a canon or member of Cathedral Chapter in England, or the land or tithe which provides for this stipend, hence, prebendary, for the holder of such a stipend.   W.N.P.

precentor: A singer who directs the singing, especially in cathedrals the canon in charge of music.   T.J.B. precious blood: The Blood of Christ, shed on Golgotha for the redemption of mankind.   Because it is essentially a part of our Lord's Humanity, it is honored and adored, and since 1849 a feast (July 1) is officially observed in its honor.   L.R.W.

predestination: The doctrine of predestination is implied in the doctrine of salvation* by divine grace alone.   If it is affirmed that man cannot save himself by reliance upon powers (also religious potentialities) inherent in him, but that he is redeemed only by the initiative of a gracious, merciful God, it must also be said that his eternal destiny is determined by God. The doctrine of predestination therefore stands in an immediate context with that of grace* and with that of original sin*. In the last resort, it is a soteriolo-gical and not metaphysical doctrine, for it is not designed to assert the truth that everything is predetermined by God (although it must be admitted that the doctrine of divine providence* has always stood in a close relation to the teaching on predestination), it is designed in order to give doctrinal expression to the religious conviction that man is altogether dependent upon God for his salvation. As a soteriological doctrine it was expounded and defended by Paul, Augustine, Luther, Calvin and their followers and spiritual descendants. In all these forms, it bore the imprint of the faith of the Hebrew prophets and their witness to the work of the living God as the only fountain of the spiritual life.

It was inevitable, however, that the predestina-rian faith elicited metaphysical speculations about the work of an omnipotent* God of grace. Thus Paul developed a philosophy of history in connection with his consideration of the fate of the Jews in the light of divine predestination (Rom.
9-12). Augustine*, Luther, and particularly Calvin were led to assert a divine determinism as a consistent expression of their predestinarianism, although they always carefully distinguished it from fatalism*. Also the teaching that there is not only predestination to salvation but also one to damnation must be regarded as a metaphysical and logical outcome of soteriological predestinarianism. It was in part supported (as the theologies of Bucer and Calvin show) by the sociological observation that some people appear to be incapable of a positive response to the religious message of salvation.

The doctrine fell into discredit either when its assertion of the omni-potency of divine grace was denied (as it is in the case in Roman Catholicism which in the interest of preserving room for human religious freedom identifies predestination with divine foreknowledge) or when its metaphysical implications and consequences were rejected. Socinianism and Arminianism criticized it on account of its moral insufficiency with regard to God as well as to man. Rationalistic criticisms of the doctrine were made particularly easy when the Calvinists* of the period of Protestant Orthodoxy argued about the question whether God had issued the predestinarian decree before or after the fall* of Adam (supra—and infralapsarianism). All these discussions and criticisms were of a philosophical rather than a religious character. They did not really touch the central meaning of the doctrine, namely, that man is saved by divine grace alone. Also the discussion of the problem of the interconnection between divine predestination and the reality of evil is of a philosophical-speculative rather than of a religious-soteriological nature. See double predestination; election; fatalism, fate, foreknowledge, foreordination; libertarianism, reprobation; Semi-Pelagianism

Karl Barth, Kirchliche Dogmatik, vol. II, 2
(1942).   w.p.

predication: (Lat., prae, before, and dicere, to speak) In logic, the affirmation or denial of something of some subject.   l r.w.

pre-exilic: Period of Hebrew history before 586
B.C. (date when last Hebrew tribes were exiled to Babylon). Although it includes the Prehistoric, Patriarchal, Mosaic, and Judges periods, in practical usage the term pre-exilic usually refers to the period immediately before 586 B C, i.e., the time of the Hebrew monarchies (1037-586 B.C.), the golden age of Hebrew prophecy, nationalism, and Solomon's Temple. See exile, post-exilic.   r.e.w.

pre-existence: Existence of the human soul* before its incarnation in the body with which it is now united. More specifically, the existence of Christ before the Incarnation. The term is rarely used also of the existence of any being other than God before the creation of the world The doctrine of the pre-existence of the soul is of ancient and obscure origin. It appears to have arisen independently in various lands. Often it is taught in conjunction with the doctrine of transmigra-tion*, as among the Buddhists, Hindus, ancient Egyptians and Pythagoreans, and in many primitive animistic religions. On the other hand, the soul may be thought of as having lived previously as an independent, unembodied spirit. Plato* taught the pre-existence of the soul as a strong evidence for post-existence or immortality. His main supporting argument was his doctrine that learning is actually reminiscence of earlier experience, when the soul, unfettered by the body, contemplated the eternal Ideas in their purity. Only so, he held, can we explain man's recognition of the validity of moral and intellectual ideals—as in mathematics—which are never objects of sense experience, but which are recalled to our minds, Plato believed, by associations with objects of sense perception. This doctrine has been revived in the present century by J. M. E. McTaggart*, and given added "proof" from the phenomena of "love at first sight," from individual differences in mental aptitude, and from McTaggart's metaphysical principles. Since the evidences adduced seem more plausibly explicable on other grounds, and since the facts of mental growth and the lack of memories are opposed, most occidental thinkers reject the idea of pre-existence as "strange and improbable" (Lotze*). Many Jews continue to hold the doctrine as revealed truth, since it appears frequently in the Talmud, but others critically reject it. Among Christians, both Manichaean and Platonic influences led to adoption of the belief in pre-existence by a number of thinkers, including Origen*, and it occasionally reappeared in Christian theology until the sixth century, when it was firmly suppressed.
See Plato, Phaedo, Phaedrus, and Republic; J.
M. E. McTaggart, Human Immortality and Pre- existence (1916) ; W. S Bigelow, Buddhism and Immortality (1908) , and G. F. Moore, Metempsychosis (1925).   L.H.DEW.

prefect apostolic: (Lat., praefectus, one in charge) One in charge of a territory lacking a resident bishop, he directs mission work and has many of a bishop's powers.   L.R W.

prelate: (Lat, praelatus; praeferre, to prefer) Holder (e g., a bishop or an abbot) of a prelature or church office with jurisdiction in external matters and with rights of precedence, or with the dignity but not the powers.   L.R.W.

premillenarianism or premillennialism: The belief that the thousand year reign of Christ on earth will come at the beginning of the millennium rather than at its end. After the proclaiming of the gospel throughout the earth has proven to be of no avail and the world has become a hopeless wreck, then Christ will return and with his saints reign for a thousand years. The righteous will be raised and Satan bound and locked in the abyss. At the end of a thousand years Satan will be unbound and attempt to regain his power, but to no avail. Lost souls will then be raised, and they, together with Satan and his angels will be judged and hurled into a lake of fire where they are doomed to everlasting torment. The earth will then be cleansed by fire and become the eternal dwelling place of the redeemed. See millenarianism, postmillennialism. H. F. Rall, Modern Premillennialism and the Christian Hope (1920).   w.w.s.

Premonstratensian Canons: Members of an order of canons regular founded by St. Norbert in 1119 in the valley of Premontre near Laon, France. St. Norbert adopted the habit and a modified rule of St. Benedict. The duties of the Canons included teaching, the care of souls, and preaching. The order spread throughout Europe, but its success was spectacular in Germany and other northern kingdoms. Their chief house in the United States is at St. Norbert's Priory, West de Pere, Wisconsin.   T.T.M.

presbyter: A transliteration of Greek presbuteros, an adjective meaning "older" and noun meaning "elder"*. The Greek N.T. records presbuteroi (plural) in Christian organization, the word being translated "elders". Some of Paul's churches were governed by two groups of office-bearers, one of presbyters-elders, also called (Ac. 20:17, 28 ARV) bishops*, i.e., overseers; and another of deacons*. In the second century the threefold government of the local congregation by bishop, presbyters, deacons became practically universal in the catholic church. In the third century the clerical-lay distinction was established, so that the presbyterate became an order of the ministry. As the work of the bishops increased they assigned duties, including the administration of the sacraments and finally the care of churches, to their presbyters. Thus arose the state of things represented by the fact that "priest"* is a contraction of "presbyter". In episcopal polities now presbyter is the title of ministers next below bishops. In polities recognizing only one order the word is sometimes applied to ministers. See clergy; polity.   R.H.N.

Presbyterian Church: A Church is presbyterian when it acknowledges in its polity no higher office than that of "presbyter"* or elder, and when its highest courts, therefore, are composed of presbyters. It is Protestant in the sense that it claims historical continuity with the Protestant Reformation, and adheres to the basic Reformation principles. It is catholic in the sense that it recognizes, and is proud to claim membership along with other non-Presbyterian bodies in one, universal Church, the body of which Christ is the Head, constituted by Him "from above". As evangelical, i.e., believing that the grace of God in salvation comes directly to the individual constituting him a priest unto God, it holds that the supreme authority in the Church, under God, resides in the body of the membership, and that the legitimate authority of its various courts is theirs by delegation from the membership. (See polity)

In addition to this common doctrine of the Church, and this common polity, Presbyterian Churches are united into a family by adherence to a common system of theology, usually designated as Calvinistic*. The importance which they attribute to this doctrinal allegiance is indicated by the number of great credal statements produced by this ecclesiastical family. They include the two Helvetic Confessions (1536 and 1566), the Heidelberg Catechism (1563), the Gallican Confession (1559), the Belgic Confession (1561), the Scotch Confessions (1560 and 1581), the Irish Articles (1615), the Canons of the Synod of Dort (1619), and the Westminster Doctrinal Standards (1647).. Indeed Presbyterian Churches regard the common doctrinal allegiance as the basic aspect of their unity, the ecclesiology being a harmonious part of it, and the polity being derived from it or at least held as conformable to it. And so it might seem more appropriate to derive their name from their theology rather than, as in the name "Presbyterian", from their polity. Perhaps that is what is attempted in the name "Reformed", by which Churches of this family are commonly known on the continent of Europe. In practice, however, since their Calvinistic theology is also held by Congregationalists, by the Anglican Church in its Thirty-nine Articles, and by many Baptist bodies, the Presbyterian polity does serve as their most distinctive characteristic.

While it is claimed that the Calvinistic doctrine is the system taught in Holy Scripture, and that the Presbyterian polity is found (though perhaps not exclusively) in the New Testament, the historical origin of the Presbyterian Church, as a distinct member of the Church Universal, is traced to the work of John Calvin* in Geneva. There and then the system of theology, achieved through a significant clarification of Augustinianism*, which had been briefly but completely outlined in the first edition of Calvin's Institutes, was elaborated and established. There and then, also, the polity was expounded, and was put into practice as far as it could be within the limits of a single city. That is to say, since Geneva was thought of as constituting only one congregation, its government called for no court of wider scope than a Presbytery or Consistory. It was in France, where a formerly unorganized Protestantism quite suddenly took organized form in 1555, that the higher courts, first came into being. There the First National Synod (Paris, 1559) adopted a Constitution which, as subsequently modified, provided for a Consistory (or Session*) in each congregation, Colloques* (Presbyteries), Provincial Synods (our Synods), and a General Synod (our General Assembly) Thus the distinctive, Presbyterian system of government was complete.

This is the kind of Church which was adopted as the national Church of Scotland in 1560, and which, except for about a century of struggle with Episcopalianism, has been overwhelmingly dominant there ever since. The Scottish Presbyterian "members" number about 1,500,000, but there are numerous "adherents" in addition. In spite of a strong bid in the reign of Edward VI, which was cut short by the accession of Mary Tudor, and an even stronger bid in the first half of the English Revolution in the seventeenth century, Presbyterianism has never been strong in England. At present, the Presbyterian Church in England claims only about 190,000 members. Presbyterianism is the dominant form of Christianity in Northern Ireland*, whence it spread from Scotland during the first half of the seventeenth century. It now claims a membership of about 400,000. In spite of bitter opposition from Lutheranism, which was the dominant expression of Protestantism in Germany, Presbyterianism spread rapidly north and east into Germany after the middle of the sixteenth century, and was officially recognized as legal in the Treaty of Westphalia*, 1648. Its strength in Bohemia was an important element among the causes of the Thirty Years War* (1618-1648). In Prussia, through royal pressure, it was merged with the Lutheran Church, though a separate Lutheran Church survived the union. Presbyterianism was formally introduced into the Netherlands by the Synod of Antwerp in 1563, and it emerged as the dominant Protestant force during the struggle for independence from Spain.

It came to the American Colonies, mainly from Northern Ireland and Scotland, but also from the Netherlands and France. A total membership of about 3,000,000 is claimed by the nine bodies which are Presbyterian by name, though the addition of the membership of those Churches which are Presbyterian in fact but not in name would greatly increase this total. Various Presbyterian bodies, coming mainly from Scotland and from the Colonies to the South, were combined into one Presbyterian Church in Canada in 1875. By 1925, this was the second largest Protestant body in the Dominion. In that year, about seventy per cent of its membership entered, with the Congregationalists and the Methodists, into a United Church*, which is basically Presbyterian in polity, and which now claims a membership of about 2,000,000. The other thirty per cent continued as the Presbyterian Church of Canada, with a present membership of nearly 900,000. In Australia, the Presbyterians number about 700,000, and in New Zealand nearly 400,000.

All of these Presbyterian bodies, and others not mentioned, participated actively in the modern missionary movement; with the result that Presbyterians are represented, either as separate bodies or in fellowship with other denominations, in every land where Christianity is to be found.

See Alliance of Reformed Churches; Auburn Affirmation, Auburn Declaration, Cameronians, Covenanters, Cumberland Presb Church; General Assembly, Knox, John, New School Presb. Church, New Side Presbyterians; Old School Presb. Church, Old Side Presbyterians, Reformed Presb. Church in N. A., Scotland, Church of, United Presb. Church of 1847, United Presb. Church of N A.; Wee Free Church, Westminster Assembly. Cf. Puritanism.

Charles Hodge, The Constitutional History of the Presbyterian Church (1851), 2 vols , C A Briggs, American Presbyterianism, its Origin and Early History (1885) , T. C. Johnson, A History of the Presbyterian Church in the U. S American Church History Series, Vol II (1894), D H Fleming, The Scottish Reformation (London, 1900). A.K.R.

presbytery: A body of presbyters*. The word occurs in I Tim. 4 14. Its principal modern use is in Presbyterian* polity*. Here the presbytery consists of the ministers of a region and elders* representing the churches, and exercises authority over churches and ministers, under the superior judicatories. In other Reformed polities "classis" and "colloquy" are equivalent. In ecclesiastical architecture the presbytery is the part of the choir of a church where the high altar stands, which is reserved for seats for priests=presbyters.   R.H.N.

presentation: A right of patronage* to nominate a cleric for a benefice The patron may be either cleric or lay, and if the presentation is free from simony* the presented cleric has full right to institution Presentation can be distinguished from election* and nomination*. See also eigenkirche.   Q.B.

pretas: Literally the departed. They are the ghosts of the dead in India, spirits not yet at rest which haunt cemeteries and other places. C.S.B.

preterition: See double predestination.

prevenient grace: See grace.

pride: An attitude of lofty valuation of one's self, talents, attainments or possessions. At its best it has found ethical justification in that noble self-esteem exemplified in Aristotle's highminded man who is worthy of great things and holds himself worthy of them. But it tends toward an inordinate self-esteem marked by self-exaltation, independence of others, conceit of superiority and arrogance. In Christian ethics pride is one of the chief sins of the spirit. Dante gives it first place in his seven sins* following Thomas Aquinas for whom it was a mortal sin* of the most serious kind because at bottom it involves non-subjection to God. It is thus the central sin* for the Christian because it is essentially self-sufficiency.

R.W.F.

priest, priesthood, Christian: All Christians believe the priesthood of the Christian Church to be the priesthood of Jesus Christ (cf. Hebrews) exercised in and through the Church only by grace of God conferred in ordination*, but Christian churches differ in their beliefs how and by whom that priesthood is exercised in the Church, which reflect differences of historical judgment about the development of the ministry and differences in theological understanding of the nature of the work of Christ.

Congregationalist* polity (among both Congregationalists and Baptists*) holds the ministry an office conferred by each local congregation as a function of its life. Less individualist, Lutheran* polity holds the priesthood to be that "of all believers" but holds the magisterium to be conferred permanently to ordinands' by congregations acting on behalf of all believers. Other churches are more concerned to preserve continuity as well as unity. Calvinist polity (in Presbyterian and Methodist churches) thus holds the ministry of the Church to be continued by the presbyters* acting in their joint episcopal capacity. And the Roman Catholic, Anglican, and Eastern Orthodox Churches hold the ministry to be conferred by episcopal ordination only (which is called "apostolic succession*").

Historically the ministry has developed into hierarchical* form in accordance with the two functions of administration of the sacraments and leadership in worship, and administration of discipline and jurisdiction. The latter is seen in the development of the monarchial episcopate by the 2nd century and in its universalization during the next three centuries when broader jurisdictional order was assigned to important sees in fashion parallel to the imperial administration. The former is seen in the development of the priesthood itself and of minor orders. The priesthood came to have regular administration of all the sacraments and priests became the normal celebrants of the Eucharist, while the diaconate and minor orders were developed for division of function in the local congregations and cities. The polity* of the Church in N.T. times is obscure historically; questions now under discussion include the Dominical institution of the ministry, mediate or immediate; the origin of the episcopate by elevation from the presbyterate or localization of the apostolate; the origin of the presbyterate in copy of the synagogal organization; the validity of the term priest for the Christian minister; the relation of the diaconate in Acts with that in 3rd century Rome. See clergy; deacon.

H. B. Swete, Early History of the Church and Ministry (London, 1928); J. B. Lightfoot, Christian Ministry (London, 1929); J. Moffatt, Presbyterian Churches (London, 1928), T. M Lindsay, The Church and Ministry in Early Centuries (Glasgow, 1902), and J. Pohle and A Preuss, Sacraments (1924) priesthood, Hebraic and Jewish: Biblical tradition sees the origin of Hebraic priesthood in the consecration at Sinai of Aaron and his sons as priests and the remainder of the tribe of Levi as priestly assistants. Actually, however, there were several stages in the development of the priesthood in Bible times: 1) a primitive stage in which priestly functions were performed by any Israelite, 2) the Deuteronomic stage in which all members of the tribe (or guild) of Levi served as priests, 3) a transitory stage, represented by Ezek. 40-48, in which Zadokite* (Jerusalem) priests were favored, and 4) a late post-exilic* stage, continuing into rabbinic times, in which the priesthood was monopolized by the supposed descendants of Aaron—other Levites occupying subordinate positions and ordinary Israelites excluded from priestly functions. It was in this last Biblical stage that the office of High Priest* had its origin. The priests had the right to tithes and portions of the offerings They cared for the sanctuary and its utensils, presided at the altar and worship, consulted the oracle and rendered judgment, safeguarded the purity and holiness of the people and performed rites of atonement. In later Judaism the priest (cohen) retained the privilege of pronouncing the priestly blessing* and being called first to the reading of the Law.

T.J.B.

S.H.B.

Priestleyanism: See Unitarianism.

Priestly Code: P, the symbol conveniently employed to designate the PRIESTLY CODE, the latest and most extensive of the four major literary and legislative strata of the Pentateuch*. It includes all of Ex. 25-31, 35-40, Lev. 1-16, Num 1-10.28, as well as scattered sections, more or less extensive, of Gen., Ex. 1-24, Lev 17-26, Num. 11-36 and a few passages in Deut. 31-34. A considerable section of Josh. must also be assigned to P. In significant contrast to the older literary strata of the Pentateuch and almost all the prophetic writings, P is animated very largely by that spirit of legalistic and ritualistic separatism and isolationism which evolved amid the Jewish exiles in Babylonia in the sixth and fifth centuries B.C. It is in the main the composition and reflects the theological and particularistic point of view of Zadokite* priests, who returned from Babylonia from 458 B.C. onwards. It was composed in Palestine, largely in the latter third of the fifth century B.C. and, speaking broadly, it records the ritual practice of the Jerusalem Temple from about 400 B.C. onwards. Fairly extensive secondary passages were interpolated from time to time until as late as approximately 250 B.C. It was late P writers and editors who first incorporated the somewhat older Holiness Code* (Lev. 17-26, in the main, dating from the last third of the sixth century B.C.) into their work, and then combined the older JE and D* documents with their own work to form, first, the Hexateuch*, and then, with the omission, for theological reasons, of the Book of Joshua*, the present Pentateuch.

J E. Carpenter and G Harford, The Composition of the Hexateuch (London, 1902) ; R H. Pfeiffer, Introduction to the Old Testament (1941).

J.M. priests: See magic, medicine man; sacred literatures, shamanism; tabu.

primacy: See Peter, St., "Catholic Concept", pope.

primate: An honorary title of certain archbishops, whose sees are or were the chief church centers in their respective countries.   E.R.H.

prime: (Lat., ad primam) It was the office of the first hour of the day allegedly introduced at Jerusalem c. 400 to keep monks awake in morning. See divine office.   E.R.H.

prime cause: See cause.

Primitive Adventist Christian Church: See Adventist sects.

Primitive Baptists:
A group of ultra-conservative Baptist churches, found mainly in the South. They drew apart from other Baptists in connection with the controversy over missionary societies near the middle of the nineteenth century, the conservatives holding that such societies were unscriptural. These are the so-called "Hard Shell"* Baptists. They are strict Calvinists, believe in the total depravity of man and the "final perseverance" of the saints, practice immersion, "close communion," and feet washing, and oppose missionary and similar societies, Sunday schools, lodges, and the use of instrumental music in the churches. They do not encourage education for the ministry. There are 1726 churches and 69,000 members. There is also a group of Colored Primitive Baptists with 1,000 churches and 43,000 members. In the matter of missionary or aid societies and Sunday schools they appear to be somewhat more liberal than the white churches of the same general order. See anti-missionary movement in the U. S.   E.T.C.

Primitive Methodists:
A religious society begun in 1810 in Staffordshire, England, when Hugh Bourne and William Clowes seceded from the Methodist movement. While preserving the broad characteristics of Wesleyan Methodism, the Primitive Methodists laid greater emphasis on camp-meeting evangelism and field preaching (especially in the early days) and lay participation in the activity and government of the church. They united in 1932 with the Wesleyan Methodists and the United Methodist Church to form the Methodist Church. See Methodism. On the Primitive Methodist Church in the U. S. A. see holiness churches.   F.G.E.

primitive religion: The "religious" phenomena among contemporary primitive peoples are so varied and so integral a part of the whole complex of life that it is difficult to define what may be properly called religious, and to mark it off from the non-religious. Nice definitions are, however, the less important, partly because the desideratum of science is an historical and psychological explanation of cultural complexes as a whole, and partly because it is now clear that the nature and value of present religious phenomena are independent of their cultural antecedents.

"Primitive religion" is a term which may be applied to any one, or complex, of several related phenomena, spread among primitive peoples, all of which are focussed upon the supernatural, and most of them on supernatural power. (a) Belief in spirits which, within the complex of attitudes and behavior derivative from it, has been called "animism" (Tylor), from the fact that persons and objects are believed animated by spirits. The spirits may or may not be the ghosts of departed ancestors. They sometimes inhabit objects (e.g., the moon, or a grove of trees) and persons which are striking or dangerous, or they may lead a disembodied existence which, however, is often sufficiently connected with the mundane to permit their control of sickness, death, and the well-being of individuals and the group in general. The primitive idea, although generally vague, is that a spirit is a subtle kind of corporeal being, which may have bodily needs, and at least in the case of the ghosts of the departed is often conceived to grow old and feeble, and finally to die. In some places specialists (shamans*) with proper gifts and information have trance communication with spirits for purposes of divination, healing, etc.; among the Crow Indians, however, visions are expected of all. An interesting feature of American religion is the development of the idea of a guardian spirit either of the individual or the tribe. Tylor took primitive religion to be primarily the supplication and propitiation of these spirits, and hence for him the problem of the origin of religion was simply that of an explanation of the belief in spirits, this he supplied by a theory of primitive inference from the difference between the living and the dead, and from adventures in dream and hallucination. His explanation of belief in spirits is still widely accepted. (b) "Pre-animistic" religious phenomena, sometimes called animatism (Marrett), centering around *mana (Codrington· The Melanesians), i.e., impersonal supernatural power. Marrett emphasized this primitive notion of mana as a kind of potent fluid in important or dangerous persons or objects, partly because there are very primitive tribes which do not have the idea of spirits but which do have the idea of supernatural power, partly because it is apparently a simpler and more primitive idea, and partly because an explanation was needed for the fact that only certain spirits are worshiped, or only certain objects regarded as inhabited by spirits. Those spirits are worshiped, and those objects are regarded as the dwelling places of spirits, apparently, which are felt to have mana, and what has mana is whatever is extraordinary or remarkable, which evokes feelings of awe, admiration, or interest, i.e., what, as contrasted with the work-a-day, may therefore evoke a thrill such as a successful fighter, a chief, a hurricane. Lowie remarks that in Polynesia "Mana was shown when a man undertook to do an unusual and almost impossible thing and yet succeeded . . Conceived as somewhat in the nature of a supernatural fluid, it could be conducted into weapons by placing them in temples, where they might absorb the potency vested in the gods." (c) Belief in and worship of "high Gods". Andrew Lang (1898) questioned that the idea of a supreme deity and "maker" presupposed a developed idea of spirit and must be the culmination of an evolutionary process originating in more primitive ideas, and hence placed in doubt Tylor's theory of chronology and development. He called attention to evidence of belief in a supreme deity in many primitive societies, often alongside belief in spirits and relatively unconnected with this. Father W. Schmidt, relying on the methods of F. Graebner, has tried to prove that a fairly sophisticated approximation to monotheism can be proved to be chronologically prior to animism. Schmidt also went beyond Lang in claiming a definite cult for this God in the form of supplication and sacrifice, in very primitive peoples. It seems certain that many very primitive groups do believe in a supreme being, generally benevolent toward men, and "creative" in some crude sense. (d) Mythology. Primitive peoples have theories, often enormously complicated, about the origin and biography of important gods, the origin of the world and in particular of their own locale, the foibles of local spirits, the vicissitudes of ghosts after death, and so on. (e) Ritual, sacrifice, exorcism, prayer. Corresponding to these different conceptions of the supernatural, various types of conduct are thought proper. Some (more evolutionary) writers believe that sacrifice and prayer developed out of spells and magic when the idea of a spirit with a will of its own became developed, others held that some sort of sacrificial offering appeared very early in connection with belief in a "high-god", independently of desires to influence his will and rather as a result of a feeling of its suitability.

Two further phenomena, less directly continuous with developed religion, should be noted. (f) Magic.* Primitive peoples distinguish natural means of achieving results (e.g., cultivation of a garden) from supernatural ones, which may be called magical, although the line is sometimes hard to draw. Some writers think magic is distinguished from religion on account of the different attitude of will· in religion, one of submission and dependence; in the use of magic, one of desire to control. Nevertheless, both concern the supernatural, and both involve the emotion of awe or religious thrill. Some writers think that magic is essentially the art of controlling either mana or spirits. Frazer* developed the conception of sympathetic magic (operation, e.g., by imitating the desired effect, on something connected with the object to be "treated"), which he explained by appeal to the laws of association of ideas. Public rituals (e.g., to increase the catch of fish), the use of spells, rituals to prevent the penalty for infringing a tabu, trances and other forms of divination, and occasional use of supernatural methods for injuring others, are varying forms which primitive magic takes (g) Tabus*, or restrictions on behavior or contact with certain objects, which are sanctioned by penalties supernaturally controlled. (E.g., the offender is expected to become ill.) Objects which have mana are often tabu, apparently because they are thought to be dangerous. (Cf. the stories of the Ark* of the Covenant.) Thus the person and name of the chief are often tabu, and his possessions are likely to be so. Certain foods are tabu for various groups, at least during certain periods (see totemism). Many kinds of behavior are tabu during festivals or when the community is about to undertake some important business. If breaking a tabu injures, endangers or outrages the community, it may have a natural penalty in addition to the supernatural one, at least in the form of criticism and disapproval.

Attention should be called to the theory of Durkheim, who has built his conception of religion very largely on totem phenomena in Australia. Durkheim* thinks that the real source and object of religious attitudes is society, whose influence on individuals he has emphasized in discussion of crowd situations generally. Society both dominates the individual and is the source of his strength, hence it is able to evoke attitudes of worship and respect. From the psychological point of view, society is the real god. Accordingly, the most distinctively religious behavior occurs in group activities, e.g., religious festivals. The true object of religion is too abstract for the primitive mind, so that it is represented symbolically by the totem animal, but the totem animal is not the object of worship, but only its symbol. See altar, ancestor worship, animals, worship of; blood, credulity, primitive, death and burial practices, family, fasting; feasting; fetishism; gods; harvest festivals, heart, human sacrifice; idols and images; initiation rites; law, progress; resurrection, rewards and punishments, soul; spirits, stones in religion; sun; cf. anthropology.

See Grant Allen, Evolution of the Idea of God (1897); Emile Durkheim, Elementary Forms of the Religious Life (1914), J. G. Frazer, The Golden Bough (1911); A A. Goldenweiser, Anthropology (1937) and History, Psychology, and Culture (1933); A. L. Kroeber, Anthropology (1923); Andrew Lang, The Making of Religion (1898); R. H Lowie, Primitive Religion (1924), B. Malinowski, "Magic, Science, and Religion" in Science, Religion, and Reality (1925) ed Needham; R. R. Marrett, The Threshold of Religion (1914); Paul Radin, Primitive Man as Philosopher (1927), and Monotheism among Primitive Peoples (1924); Wilhelm Schmidt, The Origin and Growth of Religion (1931); E. B. Tylor, Primitive Culture (1871).   R.B.B.

primitive religious drama: See religious drama.

Pringle-Pattison, Andrew Seth: Originally Andrew Seth (1856-1931), Prof. of Logic and Metaphysics at Edinburgh, 1891-1919, acute critic of British Hegelianism and mechanistic evolutionary naturalism. He argued that the coherence criterion must be guided especially by the experience of value. Man, who is "organic to nature," reveals through his realistic intuitions of value, as well as by natural knowledge, the nature of things. Pringle-Pattison also labors to keep the independence of the individual self from being lost in the Absolute. See neo-Hegelianism.

The Idea of God in the Light of Recent Philosophy (1920), The Idea of Immortality (1922).   P.A.B.

prior: (Lat., prior, elder) A monastic* superior differing in degree of importance and jurisdiction according to the Order or Congregation. Before the 13th century the superior corresponding to the term prior could be an abbot or another official, but since then it has been applied to the coadjutor of an abbot or the superior of an independent monastery which has no abbot.

Prioress (Lat., priorissa, fem. of prior) Superioress of a monastic community for women. Ordinarily her rights and duties correspond to those of a prior. See abbey.   J.B.C.

Priscillianism: An ascetic doctrine with leanings towards Gnosticism and Manichaeism. Priscillian, a Spanish theologian and mystic, was excommunicated by the Church in 380 and put to death by the emperor in 385. The doctrine persisted in Spain and Gaul into the 6th century. See Toledo, creed of.   S.M.G.

prison reform: Relates to efforts toward the adoption of more rational and humane methods in the management of prisons. It may first be noted that the rise of the prison system, during the closing decades of the 18th century was a reform movement, for, in case of the great majority of offenders, it substituted incarceration in penal institutions for death or the infliction of some form of physical punishment such as whipping, the stocks, the pillory or other devices. Such a substitution has but shifted the area of interest in reform which is now concerned with the spirit and methods of penal administration.

We are here confronted with a long history of exploitation, public indifference and even brutality as affecting the treatment of imprisoned offenders. In general the concern of American prison reform has been with the following problems. a) the structure and size of prisons, b) prison labor, c) medical and psychiatric care; d) education; e) prison discipline, f) the individualization of treatment, g) release and after care of prisoners, h) the improvement of administrative personnel. Brief comment is made on developments within these fields.

In place of the monstrous Bastilles of the traditional type a few progressive states and the Federal government are developing differentiated systems of smaller prisons, adaptable to the needs of different classes of prisoners, and providing varying degrees of security. In regard to prison labor there has been a long struggle against exploitive systems, resulting in the adoption of the so-called state-use system whereby the products of prison labor are kept from the general market and sold only to other public institutions within the several states. This method is designed to remove entirely the element of private profit from the prison labor system. Ironically, however, it has increased the amount of idleness among prisoners, an evil commensurate with the traditional forms of exploitation. Progress is being made in many jurisdictions in the matter of improved facilities for the medical and psychiatric care of prisoners. Likewise, more attention is being given to the educational facilities and opportunities of prison inmates in the threefold aspects of academic and vocational education, and training for personal living. Moreover, purely arbitrary and mechanical systems of prison discipline are in some measure giving way to more enlightened methods in which a degree of recognition is given to prisoners' participation in the handling of some disciplinary problems. The better morale which this induces is enhanced by recreational programs in the planning and direction of which prisoners are being encouraged to participate.

These trends in modern prison reform all point to the substitution of individualized for mass treatment of offenders, culminating in some progressive institutions in the establishment of what is called classification. In accordance with this individual case records of prisoners are compiled, and effort is made to develop a suitable institutional program for each inmate, whose case is periodically reviewed by the members of the classification committee. Thus, the response of the inmate to the institutional program is noted, and decision is reached concerning the time when he may be safely released under parole. It follows that the parole system by which prisoners are supervised for a period after release from the institution is a necessary adjunct to the work of the prison itself, and much reform effort has been directed toward the improvement of this function. In short, the training of men in prisons, and their careful guidance for a period after their release on parole are dual aspects of the process of rehabilitation, which is the ultimate criterion of prison reform.

Implicit in all this discussion is the suggestion that the crowning objective of the movement for prison reform lies in the recruiting and training of personnel for the important work of prison administration. The removal of our prisons from the arena of political spoils has been achieved in some of the states and in the notable program of our Federal government for the penal institutions under its charge. To make prison administration a professional task for which men are trained and selected as they are for other professions is the foundation upon which must be laid all other plans for prison reform.

It must not be supposed that the progressive developments we have outlined characterize more than a substantial minority of our penal institutions. The majority of them still carry on under a burdensome heritage of outmoded architecture, overcrowding, political control and untrained personnel. Moreover, the improvements that have been made have affected but slightly conditions in the many thousand jails of the country that remain nothing short of a national disgrace. Penal institutions are an interrelated system, consisting of prisons, reformatories, jails, and other types. Reform must needs be all along the line. It is a task which requires the concentration upon it of all the moral forces of the nation in the coming decades. See penology.

Donold Clemmer, The Prison Community (1940); Sanford Bates, Prisons and Beyond (1936); Negley K Teeters, They Were in Prison (1937); Frank Tannenbaum, Crime and the Community (1938); Orlando F. Lewis, The Development of American Prisons and Prison Customs (1922); Fred E. Haynes, The American Prison System (1939).   A.E.W.

prithivi: Literally "earth". The ancient Vedic earth mother, celebrated alone in one Vedic hymn and in six in conjunction with the Sky-Father Dyaus* as Dyaus-Prithivi.   C.S.B.

privation, divine: See Aristotle and Aristotelianism, omniscience.

privileges, ecclesiastical: Those granted in Canon Law* (canons 119-123) to all clergy and all religious in good standing; e g., the privilege of ecclesiastical court. These cannot be waived.   L.R.W.

probabiliorism: A system of teaching in Catholic moral theology which holds that it is wrong to act on an opinion favoring liberty as against law unless that opinion is the more probable.   T.J.B.

probabilism: A system of teaching in Catholic moral theology since the 16th century, associated popularly with the Jesuits* although used generally by all Catholic moralists, which holds that in case of doubt about the lawfulness of a proposed action, the conscience may lawfully follow a solidly probable opinion, even though an opposite and more probable opinion favors the existence of a law that would forbid the proposed action. Laxity in application of this teaching provoked Pascal's* Lettres Provinciales, and led to its restatement by St. Alphonsus Liguori*, whose view is now generally followed. See equiprobabilism.   T.J.B.

probation: See penology.

procession of the Holy Spirit: This differentiates the relation of the Spirit to God from that of the Son, the Son is begotten of, the Spirit proceeds from, the Father (John 15: 26). An issue that long exercised the Church was whether the Spirit proceeds also from the Son; the addition, at the council of Toledo in 589, of "filioque"* to the "who proceedeth from the Father" of the Nicene-Constantinopolitan Creed has never been accepted by the Eastern Church.* The Western position claims N.T. justification (both the Father and Christ send the Spirit. John 14: 26; 15: 26; cf. Acts 2. 32, 33) and to favor the co-equality of Christ and God; though the question has receded in modern theology which uses other symbols than "filioque" of its Christological* differences.

H. B. Swete, History of the Doctrine of the Procession of the Holy Spirit (1876); E. F. Scott, The Spirit in the New Testament (1923).   J.L.

processional: 1) A hymn sung in an ecclesiastical procession or by clergy and choir entering the church. 2) The liturgical book containing litanies, hymns, and anthems used in procession.   P.V.N.

processions: To proceed from one shrine or church to another in solemn manner, singing hymns or psalms, is a Christian custom dating from at least the 4th century in Jerusalem. An original practical purpose is still apparent in the funeral procession to the church and to the graveyard, the marriage procession to the altar, in the Rogation* blessing of the fields, or in taking the Blessed Sacrament to the sick or in the Maundy Thursday* liturgy to an altar of repose. A mystical meaning is seen in the ancient processions of the Pope from the stational churches in Rome, or in processions before the high mass*, which indicate the inclusion of the whole congregation in the act of worship, and a mystical and dramatic meaning is seen in the Palm Sunday and Candlemas processions. A precatory use is found in processions of the Host, as on Corpus Christi, and in litanies.   T.J.B.

Proclus: See s. v. Neo Platonism.

profession of faith: Usually employed in Protestant denominations to describe the act by which, at a public service, an intending member of the body indicates his belief in the creed of the group; and is, after this act, received into membership.

The term "Profession" is also used in Catholic circles to describe the formal ceremonial by which a novice becomes a member, either junior or fully professed, in a religious order.   W.N.P.

progress: A term denoting the cumulative achievement in time of a desirable goal. In human affairs the term denotes the gradual realization of higher stages of culture.

The notion of progress, while not unrelated to other concepts, has received its full statement only in the modern period of Western thought. It arose in theories of the progress of human knowledge (Fontanelle), and was generalized by Abbe de St. Pierre, Condorcet, and others as a theory of the movement of all human life toward a more perfect state. Much of the thought of the nineteenth century developed on the basis of the fundamental assumption that human history "has moved, is moving, and will continue to move in a desirable direction" (Charles A. Beard).

The notion of progress cannot be equated with the notion of evolution* or with any particular theory of evolution. It is true, however, that in the nineteenth century Darwinian biology was taken by many as supporting the general theory of progress and the two concepts became constituent elements in the world view of the liberal movement in Christian theology. (See liberal theology). Christian theologians, however, were more cautious in dealing with the concept of progress than they have frequently been given credit for being. They distinguished between material progress and moral progress. They showed caution in treating the rate of progress and they suggested a distinction, which has become increasingly important in contemporary discussion, between the possibility and the inevitability of progress. Contemporary theology and philosophy are generally skeptical regarding universal and inevitable progress. Over the question whether there are at least some areas in human life in which a modified conception may still be held, there are varying view points.

J. B. Bury, The Idea of Progress (new ed., 1932), with Introduction by Charles A. Beard, E. L. Schaub, Progressism: An Essay in Social Philosophy; and the Oxford Conference publication, The Kingdom of God and History (1938).   D.D.W.

progress: In the sense of a gradual advance in social life with respect to those qualities to which man can rationally attach value, is a relatively modern conception. To primitive man, existence is at best precarious and uncertain. His experience leads him to a belief, not in progress, but in luck. His best efforts are constantly overruled by the forces of a mysterious and baffling nature which he can neither comprehend nor control. The best he can hope for is to make these forces accessory to his efforts through the development and use of magic*. Nor were early civilizations more hospitable to the idea. Here its place was pre-empted by the widespread belief in a Golden Age*. In the classical cultures, some foretokens of the possibility of general social improvement through human effort did arise, but nothing corresponding to the modern conception of indefinite, if not infinite, progress. Thus Plato*, although he believed that the world had deteriorated from a more perfect state and was destined to pass through successive cycles of regeneration and relapse, also thought of man as capable, to a degree, of directing and controlling its course. The Epicureans* went further and developed a rudimentary theory of social evolution. The present state of civilization, they held, was not a relapse from the Golden Age, but a gradual achievement from a miserable and beast-like condition. But, although their Roman disciple, Lucretius*, used the word "progress," they did not think of the process as continuing into an indefinite future, and were often doubtful as to its value. On the whole, the outcome of both Greek and Roman thought was pessimistic. The universe and the social order within it were conceived as bound to an inexorable fate* which it would not only be impossible but impious to alter. This view paralyzed social effort, and left man only the possibility of an individualistic escape if perchance through the consolations of philosophy he might find for himself a tolerable life. And this Epicurean and Stoic* alike sought to do, each according to his own philosophical creed.

Diametrically opposed to this individualism and pessimism stand the Hebrew Prophets*. They scorned any solution of the problems of life that was not social in character. But they thought of themselves as restorers and conservators of Israel's ancient spiritual heritage. After the collapse of the Hebrew state their social message underwent a gradual transformation until it emerged at last as an ideal of a perfect state conceived of in ethical terms. But it differed from the idea of progress in at least three ways. It was to be achieved, not by human effort, but by the intervention of a Divine Deliverer, it was to be shared, not by the whole people, but by a Remnant, the Good Seed who had brought themselves into conformity to the will of Yahweh*, and it was thought of as the end of the world process, beyond which there lay no possibility of further achievement. As the great prophets passed and their work was taken up by the apocryphal and apocalyptic writers, the idea degenerated in the hands of these lesser imitators. God was to bring all things to pass according to His own plan, in His own good time, and men had but to wait and hope. Such an idea, when consistently held, could neither inspire nor direct men in active effort for social reconstruction.

Whether or not Jesus repudiated this apocalyptic conception of an earthly state to be reserved for the elect of Israel, established by Divine intervention, and ruled by a Davidic Prince, and taught in its stead the Gospel of a Kingdom of God* to be realized inwardly in personal experience and outwardly in an ethical social order is at present a controversial question among New Testament scholars. At any rate, the early Church Fathers* shared the prevailing pessimism of their times. Despairing of the world, they sought the realization of their ideal either in an earthly millennial kingdom or in a life beyond the grave, but in any event, the blessed estate was reserved for the elect few. Man was created perfect, corrupted by the Fall*, and saved by Grace. The earth was the stage for the playing of a heavenly drama, history was its enactment, and men the puppets of the play. The play was in its last act, and the end was soon. It might, thought some, be possible to ameliorate somewhat the conditions of these last days, even to increase knowledge, or at least knowledge of the Divine Revelation, but the chief end of human effort was to make one's calling and election sure, that he might reign with the redeemed saints in an earthly millennium, or in a celestial city of God eternal in the heavens. "For here we have no abiding city." Early and medieval Christianity did, however, thoroughly condition men's minds to the idea of an ultimate happy destiny for mankind, and thus laid the foundation for the development of the modern conception of progress. It also accustomed them to think in terms of a universal human brotherhood, an idea which, assimilated to the Greco-Roman ideal of world unity, furnished the basis for the medieval doctrine of a world-wide spiritual and political community. Here is probably the most fundamental element in the theory of progress, for it is becoming increasingly clear that a world-wide integration of human interest and purpose is an essential condition of the perpetuation of civilization itself.

The conditions necessary to the development of the idea of progress began to appear only with the Renaissance*, and culminated toward the end of the 19th century. They may be summarized as the accumulation of recorded history, the growth of the humanitarian spirit, and the new confidence in human reason achieved through the accomplishments of scientific method and invention in the explanation and control of nature. The tragic course of events during and following the First World War have again been unfavorable to the doctrine of progress, and an increasing number of writers have arisen to challenge the idea. Some, like Oswald Spengler in his Decline of the West, are returning to the Greek notion of cycles* of change, while others, like P. A. Sorokin in his Social Mobility and other works, are interpreting social change as a trendless flux.

Much confusion in the discussion of this problem is due to a failure to distinguish between progress as a philosophical conception and progress as an historical fact. It is a fact that social life has advanced with respect to at least some of those qualities to which man can rationally attach value. Knowledge of nature and the mastery of physical forces have developed with few if any serious losses since earliest times, and with a greatly accelerated pace during the past century. Although progress in native intelligence and in the normal and spiritual aspects of life is more difficult to establish, there can be little doubt of rationally demonstrable improvement in mankind as a whole in these respects also since the appearance of the first fossil races recognizable as human. Philosophically, however, certain writers, like J. B. Bury, in his Idea of Progress, have held that the concept is logically inconsistent, in that it implies perpetual change, and at the same time implies a final goal beyond which further change is retrogression, for progress seems to be meaningless unless there is an ultimate objective. Thus, Comte's* objective as the final positive stage of knowledge which society was then entering, Hegel's* objective as the freedom already realized in the Prussian state, or Marx's* classless society which would bring to an end the process of class struggle through which history proceeds, all explain the past by a process which at some time ceases to explain the future.

But criticism of the idea of progress on account of its inconsistency in positing a final goal reveals a curious misconception as to the nature of the problem. It admits the possibility of progress with respect to the means whereby ends are achieved, but it denies its possibility as regards the ends themselves. The problem of progress is concerned with the extent to which man is able rationally and volitionally to determine his own destiny, while the demand for a fixed goal implies that he is moving automatically, irresistibly, inevitably toward an end which he can not miss, which his intelligence may hasten or his stupidity delay, but which in any event his errors can not ultimately defeat. Such criticisms illustrate how slow are men's minds to grasp the full meaning of the concept of progress. For centuries the prevailing theory of man's destiny has been that it does not lie within himself, but with his stars. He is the sport of chance, the victim of Fate, the pawn of Providence*, or the darling child of evolution*, the beneficiary, willy-nilly, of forces that guarantee him the attainment of an earthly paradise at the end of a cosmic joy-ride. Theories of progress which posit an ultimate goal, though modern in their phrasing, do not differ essentially from the views of antiquity and medievalism. The problem of progress is, to what extent are man's times in his own hands? To what extent can he profit by what experience has taught him of success or failure in modifying his methods and changing his goals? To demand a fixed goal by which progress can be measured reduces to the absurdity of demanding that man's control over his own destiny be measured by a standard which places his destiny beyond his own control.

Progress in the field of science, where all authorities admit that the clearest evidence for its reality exists, does not consist in setting up a definite content of science as a goal to be attained, for to do so would presuppose foreknowledge of facts and laws not yet discovered. Nor does it consist in the quantity of concepts and laws, for many of the most marked advances of science have resulted in reducing their multiplicity to more fundamental discoveries. The progress of science is not a matter of quantitative measurement, but of logical judgment, that is, it is a matter of its growth in validity, of the increasing adequacy and universality with which its concepts and laws symbolize objects and their relationships, of the consistency, unity, and absence of contradiction in the theoretical formulation of its principles as a body of logical propositions, and, therefore, of its dependableness in providing intelligible explanation and effective control over the phenomena with which it deals. Progress in science does not consist in a finality of content, but in adequacy of method to purge and enrich its content, less by increasing its discoveries quantitatively than by improving them qualitatively in order that they may better satisfy the logical criterion of validity as the universal of knowledge.

Nor is it otherwise in other fields of human interest and endeavor. Moral progress, like scientific progress, does not consist in the development of a final body of truth nor the increase in the number of generally accepted concepts and principles, but in qualitative changes in the concrete content of moral values which satisfy more adequately the logical requirements of validity; that is, in the development of a conception of the good life in terms, not of what men subjectively and individually desire, but in terms of what is rationally and objectively desirable, and an objective ordering of the chaos and confusion of personal aims and ends into a common purpose directed toward the common good. So conceived, the achievement of progress is a joint enterprise of ethics*, science, and practical endeavor. As L. T. Hobhouse expressed it, it involves 1) an inquiry into the nature of values*, the problem of ethics, 2) an inquiry into the actual relations of human beings, the problem of social science, and 3) the development and utilization of means of applying our knowledge of facts in the service of values, the problem of social improvement.

L T. Hobhouse, Social Evolution and Political Theory (1911); H. E Jensen, "A Forecast of Progress," in W. P. King (ed.), Social Progress and Christian Ideals (1931).   H.E.J.

Progressive Orthodoxy: The title of the papers, later published in book form under the same title, which the new faculty at Andover Theological Seminary published in the early years of the Andover Review—about 1884-5. This term, they felt, described their own theological position, which at that time they regarded as both within the framework of Calvinistic orthodoxy and also moving toward necessary modifications. Within a very few years they dropped this term as a descriptive title for their position as they moved farther from their Calvinist base line.

See New England theology, New theology. D. D Williams, The Andover Liberals (1941)
                                                       D.D.W.

prohibition: See temperance movement.

prohibitions: See tabu.

proletariat: A socialist term used to indicate a growing and more or less permanent and class-conscious wage-earning group. Under a money economy this group is assumed to have a considerable degree of freedom and mobility but its economic dependence upon capital and the capitalists is held to make its position relatively hopeless. Hence it offers a good soil for revolutionary proposals and is expected, when the time is ripe, to rise up in its despair, overthrow the capitalist* system, and introduce the collective commonwealth.

The wage-earning group has been recruited from the remnants and surpluses of previous labor systems, such as the family or clan system, slavery and serfdom, and the handicraft or guild system, but in most cases its position, however low, may be held to have been improved instead of being made more miserable, as the Marxian* assumption implies. Wage-payment existed even in ancient times and is mentioned in several Bible passages. In Great Britain a labor supply to man the factory system in the eighteenth century was drawn, often with the domestic system as a half-way house, from a class of handicraftsmen and apprentices who had been left stranded in the decline of the guilds, from a landless agricultural group usually with a high birth rate, and in some measure from immigration, especially from Ireland. Much the same has been true in other industrial countries. In the United States we depended principally, down to about 1850, on the sons and daughters of native farmers, but thereafter more and more upon immigrants, first from northern and western Europe, later from Italy, Austria-Hungary, Greece, and Russia. Many of these people were landless farmers or farm laborers before they came. In 1910 more than half of the employees in several of our large industries, such as coal-mining, iron and steel, textiles, and the garment trades were foreign-born. Today it is more largely the second and third generations from these strains.

Whether the wage-earning status, either on higher or lower levels, is to be regarded as relatively permanent for the individual and for his children after him, is a complicated matter, depending in part upon the ability or kind of stuff with which different people are endowed, upon the extent to which the size of the business unit and the amount of capital required (often several thousand dollars per laborer) limits entrance to a trade, upon the degree to which our supposedly democratic educational system and other legal and social arrangements afford complete equality of opportunity, and upon the chances for advancement on the basis of merit in the business world itself. See labor movements.

H. W. Laidler, A History of Socialist Thought (1927), ch xiv; W. B. Catlin, The Labor Problem in the United States and Great Britain (1935) 2nd ed, ch ii-iii, x, P. Sorokin, Social Mobility (1927), esp pp. 438 ff., 457 ff.   W.B.C.

propaedeutics: The preliminary or preparatory instruction connected with any art or study. Used by Schaff, Theological Propaedeutic (1893), to designate an introduction to the entire field of theology in which the various departments of theology were outlined, and their respective natures, aims, limits, organic connections, and values were defined.   A.K.R.

Propaganda, Congregation of: The body or congregation de Propaganda Fidei founded in 1622 by Gregory XV to look after ecclesiastical matters in missionary countries, i.e., wherever the Church is yet imperfectly established.   L.R.W.

prophets: See Major Prophets, Minor Prophets.

Prophets, "the Former": See canon, Old and New Testament; Old Testament.

Prophets, "the Latter": See canon, Old and New Testament; Old Testament.

prophets, prophecy: (Old Testament) A succession of Hebrew men of religion who claimed to be inspired by their God and to speak in his name, and whose claim is confirmed by the spiritual vitality and permanent worth of their work and message. The essence of spiritual religion was clarified in the course of their struggle against Nature (Baal) worship*, its social and cultural forms and its ethic. The prophets were not forecasters or philosophers, but mystics, preachers, moralists, poets and men of action who felt themselves to be mouthpieces of Yahweh (cf. Exod. 4 14-16; 7·1) and instruments of Yahweh's creative purpose in man's historic life.

The classical prophets of the 8th and 7th cents. B.C. mark the emergence of a new, unique quality in a movement with a long history and lowly beginnings. Among their antecedents were the priestly diviners, augurs, and seers who undertook to ascertain the divine will and to forecast the future through instruments of divination, dreams and induced ecstasy (I Sam. 30 7 ff., Deut. 13 1, 2 Kings 3 15). The first prophets so-called were dervish ecstatics, like "the prophets of Baal" (I Kings. 18 25-29) and other contemporary groups whose psychopathic acts and cries were attributed to divine possession (I Sam. 10 5, 6). These eventually became institutionalized communities of "sons of the prophets" (2 Kings 1-6), among whom individuals of exceptional insight and integrity stood out as immediate forerunners of the classical prophets (I Kings 18 1 ff., 22 5-28). The professional prophets continued into the classical period when they were denounced as "false prophets" who speak without authentic inspiration what men wish to hear (Micah 3 5, Jer. 28, 29:8 ff.). Divination and related practices are rejected as alien to true prophecy after the fashion of Moses (Deut. 18:9-22). The predictive element in prophecy is incidental, not primary, it extends the margin of the moral and religious present into a future which is its immediate consequence, and is morally conditioned (Isa. 1·19, 20).

The primary literary record of prophecy consists of oracles written down after oral utterance, these, as subsequently collected and edited along with narratives of the prophet concerned, and sometimes incorporating his memoirs (e.g., of Jeremiah) form the substantial nuclei of most of the prophetic books. Again, there is later written prophecy, mostly anonymous and undated, added as supplements to the prophetic collections; in 2 Isaiah (cc. 35, 40 ff.) this rises to great heights. There are also three types of material relating the antecedents of 8th Cent. Prophecy, viz., in the Pentateuch, the picture of Moses as prophet, in Judges, Samuel and Kings, narratives in which individual prophets appear, and the narrative sections (partly legendary) in 1 and 2 Kings which relate the actions (rather than the words) of Elijah and Elisha.

Hebrew prophecy can best be understood from the records of its greatest representatives, Amos, Hosea, Isaiah and Micah of the 8th Cent, and Jeremiah of the 7th and 6th Cents. The prophet is a man called and commissioned through an ecstatic experience (Amos 7.15, Isaiah 6 1 ff., Jeremiah 1 4 ff.), and henceforth possessed by a knowledge of Yahweh's will which demands articulation from time to time in a "word" from Yahweh related to a particular situation. The oracle is a new kind of ecstatic speech (in contrast to the meaningless babblings of the old ecstatics), it is intelligible, searching, morally profound, revealing behind phenomena the true spiritual situation and the immediate demand of Yahweh's holy will. The God whose mouthpiece the prophet is manifests himself as a passionate, righteous will to whose unique sovereignty man must conform in the sphere of his ethical, historic life, or suffer. Sin is rediscovered as a dreadful reality, rooted in the failure to recognize the true nature of God and of the Divine covenant which is the bond of human community. The "Day of Yahweh"* is the imminent moment of his characteristic action of judgment, righteousness and mercy in the light of man's moral and spiritual state. The divine·will is the final determinant of human history where man makes his moral decisions.

The prophets were deeply concerned with the social order because of their belief that 'it was Yahweh's purpose to create a people through a social covenant* embodying the ethical imperatives of his nature The actual society they knew was an uneasy accommodation of Israelite tradition to Canaanite* mores and institutions, which were based on nature worship and derived from the pagan view that security and satisfaction are to be sought through power and material possessions. They rejected the form and purposes of constituted society as they denounced its particular denials and frustrations of Yahweh's justice--and right, and at the same time they exposed the falsity of the Canaanized religious cult by which it was sanctioned, and in which Yahweh's name was honored while his nature was outraged. The cult was in all but name the worship of other gods because it sanctioned a way of life abominable to Yahweh.

The prophets taught men to know and reverence God as he really is, a living personal Being of unique ethical character, not a static or abstract "Being" but a "Doer", Lord of nature and history, whose good purpose for humanity leads to his concern for man's character and behaviour, and to his participation in man's historic experience. To serve such a God means to discern and honour his presence by living in social relationships which are right in his sight, and so to give to him the obedience in life's actual decisions, of which formal worship is the symbol. Religion is the response through· loyalty, obedience and trust to the ethical reality of God It is the building of life upon the genuine conviction that the Supreme Power in the beginning, now and in the end, is a God who seeks to realize his goodness in the life-experience of individuals and of a people. See Major Prophets; Minor Prophets; progress, word of God. See under separate books of the O.T. Also, see Old Testament literature.

B. Duhm, Israels Propheten (1922) 2nd ed ; J M. P. Smith, The Prophets and their Times (1941) 2nd ed edited by Irwin; W. C. Graham, The Prophets and Israel's Culture (1935), A. Lods (tr. Hooke), The Prophets and the Rise of Judaism (1937).   R.B.Y.S. propitiation: (Gr., hilaskomai, to propitiate, render favorable to one alienated, to make propitiation for [Heb. 2 17], hilasmos [1 John 2 2, 4 10], hilasterios [Rom. 3 25], propitiation, atoning sacrifice* (mercy-seat, the gold covering of the Ark* of the Covenant in the Holy of Holies* on which was sprinkled the blood of the victim on the day of atonement*, in Heb. 9: 5).

General sense of mankind has been that wrong cannot be done with impunity; redress is necessary, forgiveness* not just gratuitous or without cost or condition. Sin* against God especially an affront for which there must be amends. In the Jewish system, moral or ceremonial offence excluding from the favor of God expiated by the sin-offering. For Christians expiation, propitiation, made once for all by Christ, the Cross*, Christianity's sin-offering (Heb. 9 24-28). Its effect is continuous ('there is no more offering for sin' Heb 10· 18), on condition of repentance* man by it can evermore be restored to divine favor ('by one offering He hath perfected for ever them that are sanctified' v. 14). The Cross is the perfection not alone of the sacrifice where the victim is offered by another, but of that higher vicarious propitiatory in which the victim offers himself. It must be remembered that, while the figure of propitiation is valuable as indicating benefits to men of Christ's sacrifice, it is not complete, God, in view of man's sin, does not just wait to be placated, He is Himself the source of the benefits, the sacrifice is His gift to win a rebellious world back to its allegiance.

See atonement.
   V. Taylor, Jesus and His Sacrifice (1937) ; A. B.
Macaulay, The Death of Jesus (1938).   J.L.

prose: See sequence.

proselyte: (Ger in Hebrew) Meaning a stranger and denoting a convert to Judaism. The "righteous proselyte" became part of the Jewish people, and his initiation included the baptismal bath as well as, in the case of a male, circumcision.
The "Proselyte of the Gate" did not affiliate with the Jewish people but he accepted the universal element of the Jewish religion as summarized in "seven Noahitic laws", which stressed the promotion of justice, and the prohibition of idolatry, cruelty to animals, theft, murder and blasphemy.
Perhaps the best known modern Proselyte to Judaism is Aimé Palliere, a student of a Catholic Theological Seminary, and a candidate for the priesthood in France, who recently embraced Judaism. He subsequently wrote the story of his conversion in The Unknown Sanctuary (1930) 3rd ed.   B.Z.B.

pro-slavery doctrine: The most effective Biblical and theological defense of slavery* was that advanced by James H. Thornwell* in the Southern Presbyterian Review, July 1850. He held that the Holy Scriptures unequivocally authorize the relation of master and slave, that masters and slave alike, when believers, are brethren, each having duties toward the other grounded upon their relation to God. In a perfect world there would be no slavery, just as there would be no poverty or disease. Both have come as a result of man's sin. Both slavery, poverty and disease are a part of the curse which sin has introduced into the world. But slavery is not a sin any more than poverty is a sin, both however are great evils. After death, master and slave would have equal status, provided both had lived as God had ordained,—the slave as an obedient servant;
the master as just in the fulfillment of his obligations.   w.w.s.

prosopic union: See Nestorianism.

Protestant seminaries: See theological schools, Protestant, United States and Canada.

Protestant social work: See social work of the churches.

Protestantism: At present a neutral, collective, covering term for all Christian groups immediately or remotely related to the Reformation*.
The word derives from the "protestation" made at the meeting of the Reichstag at Speyer, 1529, by the minority of evangelical estates. Historically and sociologically, Protestantism was merely the religious phase of the transition to the modern age as democracy, capitalism, and public education were the political, economic, and cultural aspects of that transition.
   What Protestantism unknowingly accomplished was the weakening of the medieval church system by the destruction of its supernatural postulates.
When the complete deification of the church as an institution was abandoned, the supernatural hierarchy, creeds and Bible came tumbling down like a row of dominoes and what is now lamented as "secularization" began to spread over all Western culture. The price of puncturing the authority of the Holy Father included, before accounts were fully settled, the adoption of the historical approach to the Bible, the discovery of the Jesus of history, the re-examination of the God idea, the definite assignment of the church to sociological classification, and its surrender to the modern state.
   The earlier Protestant types were Lutheranism, Anabaptism, Calvinism and Anglicanism with democratic Christianity appearing toward the close of the sixteenth century. In addition to the larger denominations, Protestantism has meant narrow biblicism and apocalypticism. Whether American cults should be classified as Protestant is still violently debated. Unity in Protestantism stems from opposition to Roman Catholicism, the insistence upon the Bible as primary, the emphasis upon the congregation as religious cell, and the universal priesthood of all believers. Protestantism by raising the historical question of the origin and content of the Bible and emphasizing the right of private judgment has made doctrinal unity and conformity impossible. Cf. American theology, early, on Protestant Canon see apocrypha, Old Testament.
   A. C. McGiffert, Protestant Thought Before Kant
(1911) ; C. H. Moehlman, Protestantism's Challenge
(1939), Wilhelm Pauck, "Nature of Protestantism," Church History, March, 1937, Ernst Troeltsch, Protestantism and Progress (1912).   C.H.M.

Protestantism in China: See Chinese religions.

Protestantism in India and Japan: See India, missions to; India, religions of; Japan, Christianity in.

prothonotary: In the Roman Catholic church, in the Middle Ages, a very high official of the papal chancery; since 1838 the number of this group has been fixed at seven members, not counting the honorary protonotarii.   M.S.

protopope: The highest rank which a priest of the Eastern Orthodox or the Uniate churches may attain. Since the hierarchs are chosen exclusively from among the monks, the hierarchical rank may never be attained by the married priest, unless he become a widower and assume the monastic habit. The rank of protopope corresponds in general to the archpriest or dean of the Western churches.   M.S.

Proverbs: Representative book of Oriental "wisdom" literature* in Hebrew adaptation. This type of literature giving practical counsel tinged with hedonistic philosophy of life was much cultivated in Egypt. Present book a compilation of seven collections I) 1 1-9 18, the youngest (4th-3rd century B C), II) 10 1-22 16, perhaps pre-exilic* but with younger accretions, III) 22 17-24 22, pre-exilic directly dependent on an Egyptian wisdom-book of 1,000 B C. (Amenemope), IV) 24 23-34, a brief collection with a title of its own, but no clues as to date, V) 25-29, origin at time of Hezekiah may be correct; VI) chapter 30, Words of Agur of Massa (Arabian tribe, Gen. 25 14), showing dependence on Book of Job*, VII) chapter 31, Words of Lemuel, King of Massa (v. 10-31 ascribed to Solomon* in Septuagint which arranges some materials differently). Not impossible that some sayings of Solomon or of his time (I Kings 5.9f.-10 1f.) may have been preserved amid younger materials. The "wisdom" attitude, on the whole, is secular, though the attempt is made to harness it to religion by the principle that "the fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom" (ch. 1.7). Cf. R. H. Pfeiffer, Introduction to the Old Testament (1941). J. A. Bewer, Literature of the Old Testament (rev. ed., 1933). On Amenemope, see W. O. E. Oesterly, The Wisdom of Egypt and the Old Testament (1927).   E.G.K.

providence: The doctrine of providence is a phase of Christian theism*. It is to be distinguished from Deism* on the one hand, and impersonalistic conceptions of God on the other. Thus it holds that God, the Author of the world, is ever active within it, with power to direct or overrule events. He employs this power not arbitrarily, nor from necessity as a Force or Principle of nature. But His activity is of conscious intent and always with a view to ends, which He foresees and wills. An aspect of providence is divine Guidance, God's assistance to individuals in the ordering of their lives. Providence as distinct from Guidance is seen in the divine direction, not so much of individuals, as of outward events that affect their life and welfare. Yet providence means that human history and nature alike are the sphere of divine determining action. As men of their will and purpose produce change in the inner and outer conditions of others' lives, so God from His profounder initiative and to His infinite sweep of command can effectually will and do, always in harmony with His own character and conformably to the sure good and faith of those who know their dependence upon Him. Providence is specially meaningful as moral providence God's provision for man's growth in righteousness and constant help in his endeavour to fulfil God's righteous demands Cf. predestination provincial: In the monastic organization, the provincial is the ecclesiastic who presides over a province, a province is an area, which may include one or more countries, comprising several departments, each of which includes a number of cloisters. At the head of any one monastic order may be the general, and the provincials rank next below him.   A.K.R.

H. H. Farmer, The World and God (1935). K. Barth, God in Action (1936).   J.L.

Provisors, Statute of: The first Statute of Provisors was enacted in 1351. Its purpose was to prevent the filling of ecclesiastical benefices in England by means of papal provisions. W.S.H.

provost: (Lat., praepositus, one placed before) In ecclesiastical usage the term is applied to 1) the chief dignitary of a cathedral or collegiate chapter in England, Scotland, Poland, Austria, etc., sometimes he is second in dignity to a dean or prior whose duties approximate his own, 2) a Protestant clergyman who has charge of the principal church in a district of Germany, 3) provost general, the superior of certain Roman Catholic religious orders and congregations, e.g., the Passionists, Discalced Carmelites, Fathers of Charity, Barnabites, etc.

In civil usage the term is applied to 1) the head of a faculty at Oxford or Cambridge Univ., the principal of the Univ. of Dublin, or the head of the Univ. of Penna. and a few American colleges, 2) the mayor of a Scottish city; 3) the keeper of a prison, 4) the judge of certain royal and feudal courts in France.   J.F.T.

prudence: (Lat., prudentia) The control of conduct in the light of consequences, practical wisdom, foresight. "Skill in the choice of means to one's own greatest well-being" (Kant). Cf. hedonism, Plato, St. Thomas.   J.E.N.

Przywara, Erich: (1889-) Born in Kattowitz, Germany, student in Jesuit schools, professor of theology in the University of München and associated with various Catholic publications. His work in the philosophy of religion is notable both as an indication of the role of Catholic thinkers in the general cultural movement and for its own intrinsic value as a speculative achievement. His fundamental concept which serves as the center of reference is the doctrine of the analogy of being (analogia entis). He sees the task facing Catholic philosophers of religion in the embracing in one comprehensive system the metaphysical foundation developed by the Scholastics and the modern scientific and psychological superstructure. His doctrine of the analogy of being is for him the basic ideological law of all sound philosophy. The ontological relation between creator and creature is for him the best formulation of his central doctrine. For him immanence and transcendence must enter into polar relation or unity of contraries, that is analogia entis, if they are to pretend to be transcriptions of reality. His investigations in the history of philosophy and his analyses of contemporary tendencies led him at every turn to his central notion of polarity as the basic law of reality and the metaphysical foundation of an adequate philosophy of religion. In the development of his central principle he took St. Augustine and St. Thomas Aquinas as his guides.

Religionsbegründung (Freiburg im Breisgau, 1923), Gottgeheimnis der Welt (Munchen, 1923); Ringen der Gegenwart (Augsburg, 1929) 2 vols, Das Geheimnis Kierkegaards (Munchen, 1929), Kant Heute (Munchen, 1930), A Newman Synthesis (1931), Analogia Entis (München, 1932); Polarity (1935).
                                                                B.H.

psalmody: The liturgical use of the Psalter, particularly in the Divine Office (Hours). In the Breviary* the psalms of the Psalter are distributed among the hours (variable in Matins and Vespers) in such wise as to be sung or read through in the course of a week. In practice, however, this use of the Psalter is impeded by the intrusion of saints' days (the Sanctorale) with recurring proper psalms.
In the Anglican Prayer Book the Psalter is divided into sixty portions for use morning and evening through a month.   P.V.N.
The practice of singing Psalms in the Christian Church, begun in the earliest times and probably adapted from a similar Hebrew practice. The precursor of the chorale* and the hymn*, and indirectly, of the motet, the anthem, and the cantata. Antiphonal psalmody is an alternation of two choirs. Responsorial psalmody is an alternation of choir and soloist. Direct psalmody uses no alternation. See plainsong.
G. Reese, Music in the Middle Ages (1940).
                                                                E.H.B.

Psalms: The Psalter has been called the hymnal of the Second Temple. While it contains some pre-exilic* poems, most of the psalms are post-exilic*. Ascription of Psalms to David in the titles is due to pious imagination of late editors. The phraseology even of late psalms, however, often shows traditional affinity with old North Canaanite poetry (Ras Shamra). The Psalter is divided into five books—the echo of praise elicited in the heart of the Jew by the five books of his law: I, 1-41, II, 42-72, III, 73-89; IV, 90-106; V, 107-150. This arrangement succeeded earlier ones, thus 42-83 must once have formed a collection that underwent "Elohistic" revision, the holy name "Jahweh" being replaced by "God" (cf. the duplicates 14 and 53, 40:14-18 and 70). The recent study of the Psalms has been dominated by Gunkel's "form-criticism". He tried to establish the "life situations" out of which such productions arose. Comparative study of Oriental, notably Babylonian, psalmody lent much help. There were three primary occasions for such poetic effort—when it was desired to praise, to give thanks, and to lament, out of these situations arose the Hymns, the Songs of Thanksgiving, and the Lamentations. The second and third groups may be either "collective" (i.e., the utterance of a group) or "individual." A number of minor categories stem forth from these. Thus a song in praise of a king is really related to a hymn, and a penitential psalm is only a species of lamentation. There has been some disruption of original patterns in our Psalter. Some poems of a "mixed" nature take on the character of "liturgies". In others the stereotyped forms have been softened because the individual has begun to assert himself and utter his feelings. Ideas not germane to the old cultic situations, such as the "prophetic" or "wisdom" elements, have also crept in. See Olshausen; seven penitential psalms.

James Fleming, Thirty Psalmists (1938); R. H. Pfeiffer, Introduction to the Old Testament (1941); E O W Oesterley, A Fresh Approach to the Psalms (1937)   E.G.K.

Psalms of Solomon, the: A Jewish pseudepigraphic* work, consisting of eighteen poetic compositions, patterned after the biblical psalms, written in Hebrew, in Palestine, about the middle of the first century B.C., and, in general, voicing Pharisaic thought and doctrine. Tradition has mistakenly regarded Solomon* as the author.
                                                                J.M.

Psalter: (Lat., psalterium, fr. Gk., psaltērion) The Book of Psalms, particularly as arranged for use in the Divine Office*, as in the Breviary or the Book of Common Prayer.   P.V.N.

pseudepigrapha: Etymologically, collection of writings fictitiously claiming the authorship of great men of the past. Practically, the non-canonical and non-apocryphal Jewish books written between 200 B.C. and 200 A.D. and dealing mostly with apocalyptic* matter. They include The Book of Jubilees*, c. 135-105 B.C.; The Letter of Aristeas, c. 130-70 B.C.; The Books of Adam and Eve, uncertain date, probably A.D.; The Martyrdom of Isaiah, 1-50 A.D.; The Book (or Books) of Enoch and fragments, the more important of which are The Parables of Enoch (chapters xxxvii-lxxi), c. 94-64 B.C., and The Secrets of Enoch, 1-50 A.D.; The Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs, c. 109-107 B.C.; The Sibylline Oracles, uncertain dates (second century B.C., first century A.D.); The Assumption of Moses*, 7-30 A.D.; The Syriac Apocalypse of Baruch or Second Baruch, uncertain date; The Greek Apocalypse of Baruch or Third Baruch, uncertain date; The Fourth Book of Ezra or Second Esdras, first century A.D.; The Psalms of Solomon, uncertain dates, before 70 A.D.; sometimes included are also The Fourth Book of Maccabees, The Story of Akhikar, and Pirke Abhoth or Sayings of the Fathers. See R. H. Charles, The Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha of the Old Testament (1913) vol. ii. See apocrypha; apocalyptic literature; canons of various churches; eschatology; kingdom of God.   S.L.T.

pseudepigrapha, New Testament: (From the Greek pseudepigraphos, meaning "false or spurious writings") More often called The Apocryphal New Testament, gospels and acts written under the name of apostles. None of our canonical books of this type makes any claim to authorship, though II Peter* might be included under pseudepigrapha. Not all of the apocryphal* gospels are pseudonymous but we might include the Gospel of Peter* and the Gnostic Gospel of Thomas* The Acts of Paul, of John, and of Peter* belonged to a popular type of religious fiction. (The fullest edition in M. R James, The Apocryphal New Testament (1924), the books are fully described in E. J. Goodspeed, A History of Early Christian Literature (1942), Ch. 3-5). The Apostolic Fathers* (as Clement) and the Apologists (as Justin) do not belong in this category. See apocrypha in the N T church, canons of various churches; Pilate, Acts of.   C.T.C.

pseudepigraphy: The ascription of a writing to some other hand than its real author's. The practice of ascribing all Hebrew laws to Moses, all Psalms to David and all Proverbs to Solomon is a sweeping gesture of pseudepigraphy. The ascription of Hebrews to Paul, as in the King James and English Revised versions, although it is silent as to its writer, is an individual instance.   E.J.G.

Pseudo-Dionysius: See Dionysius, the Aeropagite, Neo Platonism; Platonism, "Platonism in the Middle Ages".

pseudo-Isidorian decretals: See canon law; clergy, decretals; False Decretals; Hincmar.

pseudo-Messiahs: The hope for the coming of the Messiah* was continuous among the Jewish people from the time of the loss of their national independence. Critical events in the history of the world, which affected the Jewish community, invariably stimulated messianic anticipations and frequently projected messianic pretenders. The Maccabean wars, the struggle with Rome, the fall of the Temple, the Bar Kochba* uprising, the Perso-Roman wars, the fall of Rome, the rise of Islam, the Crusades, the coming of the Tartars, the expulsions, the Ottoman conquests, the religious wars of the sixteenth and the seventeenth centuries, the Cossack rebellion of 1648, and many other momentous occurrences intensified, each in its time, the messianic hope among the people and precipitated adventist speculations and movements in Israel.

Calculations based upon the Book of Daniel* which seemed to hold the key to the mysteries of "the end of days", as well as other Biblical passages, frequently set the time for these messianic movements.

Prior to the first century B.C., the messianic interest was not great, but the first century, especially the generation before the destruction of the Temple, witnessed a remarkable outburst of messianic emotionalism due, principally, to the popular chronology of the day which indicated that the age* was on the threshold of the Millennium—the year 5000 in the Creation Calendar. Josephus mentions a "false prophet", Theudas, in the procuratorship of Cuspius Fadus (44 C.E.) who was put to death. Numerous false messiahs appeared under the procuratorship of Felix (52-60 C E.). Mention is also made by Josephus* of an Egyptian prophet, undoubtedly an Egyptian Jew, whose short messianic career brought sharp reprisals upon the Jews (also mentioned in Acts 21.38). The century following the destruction witnessed intense messianic hopes and produced the revolutionary leader, Bar Kochba*, whom many acclaimed as the Messiah. Following the frustration of the messianic hopes in the second century, it was not until the fifth century that another strong resurgence of such hopes occurred. A pseudo-messiah by the name of Moses appeared in Crete. The rise of Islam in the seventh century and the crumbling of the Persian and Byzantine empires again set aflame messianic hopes among the people. This period gives us at least three pseudo-messiahs. Abu Isa al Ispahani in Persia (8c), Serene about the year 720 C.E. and Yudghan of Hamadan, surnamed al-Rai. In the 9th century, there also appeared Eldad Ha-Dani, who though not claiming to be the Messiah, brought reports of the lost Ten Tribes whose restoration was an essential feature of the Messianic saga.

During the period of the Crusades, numerous pseudo-messiahs appeared. In 1121, there appeared a Karaite pseudo-messiah in northern Palestine In Chazariah, Solomon ben Doudji announced himself as the forerunner of the Messiah, and his son, Menahem, as the Messiah. Maimonides mentions the appearance of false messiahs in Yemen in 1172, in Fez in 1127, in Spain in 1117, and in France in 1087. The most spectacular messiah of this period is David Alroy who appeared among the Babylonian Jews in 1147.

In 1284, in Sicily, Abraham Abulafia announced himself as the Messiah. Two of his disciples, one Samuel called the prophet, in the City of Ayllon, in the Spanish province of Segovia, and the other Abraham, in Avila, in Old Castile continued Abulafia's messianic prophecies and pretensions.

Soon after the terrible persecutions of the Jews in Spain (1391), the Spanish Kabbalist, Moses Botarel, proclaimed himself Messiah in Cisneros (1393). The expulsion of the Jews from Spain in 1492 and the catastrophies which followed brought to the fore a number of pseudo-messiahs. Asher Lammlein, a German Jew, in 1503, David Reubeni (c. 1490-d. after 1535), who was received by Pope Clement VII, and who aroused great messianic fervor among the people; and Solomon Molko (c. 1500-1532), a Portuguese Marrano who was burned at the stake in Mantua. The foremost messianic pretender of them all, and one who stirred the Jewish world profoundly, was Shabbetai Zebi* (1621-c. 1676) of Smyrna whose advent focused in the miracle years 1648 and 1666. A sect of his followers known as Dönmeh has survived to this day.

After the disastrous Shabbetian movement, there set in a recession in pseudo-messiahs. Official Judaism came to frown upon messianic speculations. A few false messiahs, however, did make their appearance. Prominent among them were Jacob Frank (1726-1791), founder of the Frankists. Of lesser moment were Chaim Malach, Mordecai Mochiach of Eisenstadt, Judah Chasid and Löbele Prossnitz, all of the 18th century.

A. H. Silver, Messianic Speculations in Israel (1927), Julius H Greenstone, The Messiah Idea in Jewish History (1906)   A H.S.

pseudonymity: The literary practice of writing in another's name, as in the Book of Enoch, in Daniel, ch. 7-12, and in Ecclesiastes, which without naming Solomon speaks in his person. Ephesians, based on all the genuine Pauline letters, probably as an introduction to them when first collected and published, I and II Peter, I and II Timothy and Titus are N.T. examples. The Gospel of Peter and the Revelation of Peter are also pseudonymous.   E.J.G. psyche: (Greek). 1) Before about the Sixth Century B.C. the religious factor in man, the soul understood to be, in its nature, different in kind from that of non-human powers of nature, such as gods, demons, etc. It is indestructible and eternal, but not immortal unlike the spirit powers, it experiences death. 2) Later, the religious factor in man, understood to share the same kind of nature as that of a cosmic Zeus, and divinities, the psyche is closely identified with nous, or as nous in man See nous, soul.   F.L.P.

psychiatry: See psychotherapy.

psychical research, societies for: Though the phenomena of apparent telepathy*, clairvoyance, premonitions, etc, have attracted attention since before the dawn of history, organized research into the basis of such occurrences did not begin until past the middle of the nineteenth century. A group of scholars in England established in 1882 a Society for Psychical Research, Henry Sidgwick being its first president, Eleanor Mildred Sidgwick being an active investigator, and Frederic W. H. Myers playing an important role in the gathering of data and the systematization of results.

The Society has published since that date Proceedings and a Journal. Studies of telepathy have been reported throughout the history of the Society, while from time to time the chief research has been concerned with the phenomena of mediumship, involving the analysis of messages purporting to come from the deceased, and as reported, containing large quantities of material not known to the medium or sitter. Such studies of mediumship were largely in the hands of Dr. Richard Hodgson during the closing years of the nineteenth century and until his death in 1905. Similar investigations have been carried on throughout the present century, notably by Dr. James Hervey Hyslop, Sir Oliver Lodge, Hon. Gerald Balfour, Mrs. W. H. Salter and Rev. C. Drayton Thomas. Since 1920 there has also been much research in clairvoyance and precognition. The alleged physical phenomena of psychical research, though studied now and then, have been subordinated to the mental phenomena.

In 1885 an American Society for Psychical Research was founded, William James* playing an important part. In 1890 this became a branch of the parent society in London   Dr. Hodgson died in 1905 and the American Branch of the English Society was dissolved. The year before this, in 1904, Dr. James Hervey Hyslop founded the American Institute for Scientific Research, the chief concern of which was the study of psychical phenomena, Dr Hyslop himself doing extensive studies of mediumship until his death in 1920. The name of the corporation was changed in 1922 to the American Society for Psychical Research, Inc.   The Society publishes a quarterly Journal, and Proceedings without a fixed date.

1942—President of the Society for Psychical Research, London—Dr. R. H. Thouless
1942-43—President of the American Society for Psychical Research, Inc.—Dr. George H. Hyslop

From 1925 until his death in 1934 the Boston Society for Psychic Research carried on extensive investigations under the directorship of Dr. Walter Franklin Prince. In 1941 the Boston Society amalgamated with the American Society for Psychical Research, Inc.

There is in France the Institut Metapsychique International, founded in 1920. There are similar societies in almost all countries. See parapsychology.

F. W. H. Myers, Human Personality and Its Survival of Bodily Death (1903, reprinted in 1939); W. F. (Sir) Barrett, Psychical Research (1911); G. N. M. Tyrrell, Science and Psychical Phenomena (1939); Pratt, Rhine, Smith and Stuart, with Greenwood, Extra-Sensory Perception After Sixty Years (1940).   G.M. psychoanalysis: See Freud; psychology, schools of, psychotherapy.

psychologism: Often defined by the phrase "Idealism as opposed to sensationalism." Used in general to refer to the effort to limit problems of knowledge, value, and being to the data studied by psychology, as, e.g., in the work of J. H. Leuba.   The term is used frequently in recent German literature, sometimes to refer to subjectivism, such as that of Franz Brentano*, and, by contrast, the revolt against that feature of Brentano's work by Edmund Husserl.* Ordinarily used to stigmatize the exaggeration of psychology by one's opponent.

Cf. Karl Heim, Psychologismus oder Anti-Psychologismus (1910).   J.S.B.

psychologists, English school of: A group of clergymen, psychologists, psychotherapists, neurologists and physicians in England and Scotland who, during World War I, almost succeeded in forming a special school of religious and moral psychology based upon a revised Freudianism* with a direct application to morals, Christianity and the shocks of war.   The outstanding book of this group was J. A. Hadfield, Psychology and Morals (1923). Other writers were. T. W. Pym, C. E. Hudson, E. J. Bicknell, R. S. Moxon, R. H. Thouless, W. M. Mackay, E. R. Micklem, F. R. Barry, William Brown.   This unorganized group ("the New Psychology") made much of man's fundamental drives (instincts, instinctive emotions) as the raw material of human behavior and the maladjustment of these nonmoral drives to his social order. Intelligent sublimation and the techniques thereof formed much of the basis of their constructive practical psychology Original sin* was made distinct from actual sin, the latter being the refusal to moralize inherited drives. Moral disease (organic and functional nervous disorders) is to be distinguished from sin. Sin and guilt, horribly confused terms in theological theory, receive their proper distinctions in moral theory based upon the genetic approach. Later books developed a special interest in a type of psychology aimed to be practical for the use of ministers in the work of the parish and general counselling. See clinical psychology, psychotherapy.

T W. Pym, Psychology and the Christian Life (1922), F. R. Barry, Christianity and Psychology (n. d); C E. Hudson, Recent Psychology and the Christian Life (1923), R. H. Thouless, An Introduction to the Psychology of Religion (1923), E R. Micklem, Miracles and the New Psychology (1922); Also see W. M. Horton, A Psychological Approach to Theology (1931); V. Ferm, First Chapters in Religious Philosophy (1937), p. 159 ff   v.f.

psychology, abnormal: See abnormal psychology.

psychology, clinical: See clinical psychology.

psychology of religion, the: The psychology of religion, originating during the last two decades of the nineteenth century, is the result of the determination to study the facts of religion (a) objectively and factually, (b) critically and scientifically, (c) universally,—not religion just, but the religions,—of persons and peoples; and (d) appreciatively, that is, to apply the factual and experimental findings to the nature and setting in human experience of the meanings and values of religion which are among the reals by and for which we live.

This new department of study and research has borne rich fruitage in articles and volumes by Coe, Leuba, Pratt, Ames, Thouless, James, Clark, Conklin, Ferm, Josey, Hocking, Seldie, Jones, Inge, Dunlap, Stratton, and many others among the best trained psychologists.

What are the "problems" of the psychology of religion? How are they attacked and with what results? A brief catalogue of a few of them may be the clearest and most concise way of "defining" the nature and temper of this field of thoughtful concern.

The first five of them may, at first flush, feel like more of the metaphysics, or theology, or philosophy, from which the psychology of religion, which ventures to be "scientific," has broken away. Empiricism, however, must keep clear its orientations. "Science" that has become self-sufficient,—is it not like the spoiled child severing the apron strings that have bound it to its mother?

1. Man Viewing the Majesty of the Universe and His Place Therein. Psychology interweaving with all the other sciences tries to gain perspective. Where are we and what are we,—this genus homo,—in the total scheme of things?

We are residents of a big,—or little,—planet, the Earth, which, with eight other planets, is held captive in its repetitious circuit around the sun. We designate the time required for the journey, "a year" "Our" sun, so bright and hot because it is so near,—only 93,000,000 miles,—seen from afar, would look like a star. In fact, it is a star,—one of billions of others, that playing their game together, form our "stellar system" or "star cluster." Then, beyond our stellar system there are at least a hundred million other such systems, separated from each other, on the average, by a distance of two million light years. And light travels pretty fast,—186,000 miles per second In total picture, we live in an observed and computed universe at least a thousand million "light years" across.

What is man that he should parade his little conceits? They and the petty deities he has forsooth created to gratify his trivial desires might well sublimate themselves into simplicity and adoration, so that he could respond heartily to Walt Whitman "And I say to any man or woman, let your soul stand cool and composed before a million universes."

2. Man as a Psychic Entity. No longer is it needful to affirm that man is basically a body which possesses attributes of mentality. Physics, chemistry, physiology and other sciences, working together, have arrived at an "energy concept of matter." Every atom of the stuff of which sticks and stones and stars and the flesh and bone of our bodies is composed is a dramatic center of pulsing energies, not necessarily different in kind from those energies that would grasp the sticks, hurl the stones, admire the stars and manipulate the body. Materialism in the old-fashioned sense has hardly a devotee amongst those of academic distinction. Perceptions and ideas, as also their objects, are abstractions from realities and it will remain a fascinating problem in each and every case the extent to which they are abstractions of elements in relatively abiding reals. The escape from rude factualities may lead even to an enrichment of meanings and values. Thus the joys of Christmas time may be enriched for the child and the spirit of worship enhanced for the grown-up when Santa Claus for the one and absentee deities for the other are treated symbolically. Both may be fitting events on the highway leading to the temples of Beauty and Devotion. It may not be straining a point or belaboring a truth to assume that we are spirit and live in and by and for a world of meaning and values, whose real reality is indubitable.

3. Man as Resident of a Planet that is Pregnant with LIFE. In the earliest stages of earth history, as soon as temperature, terrain and assemblages of biochemical elements were congenial, —there arose, spontaneously, the living cells. These cells could divide,—and thus multiply. Many of them colonized,—by twos, and fours and more, into simple organisms. Life, pulsing, pushing, moving on, hit upon many devices for release. One of the most fortuitous of these was the discovery of masculinity and femininity. Through the union of basically similar but complementary pairs of cells,—ova and spermatozoa—, it was possible to shake out or shell out, in a big way, eccentricities, or variants, upon which "selection" could operate while watching the "fittest" creatures survive.

Life pressing on! An organism with myriads of cells in cooperation, and becoming highly integrated. A dozen or so special senses sensitive to needed adjustments within and without the body. A central nervous system for coordinating all of them in the interests of fuller life. Awareness and self-direction ripening into choice and thoughtfulness. Anticipations developing into idealisms.

There were always devices for the deepening of life and of lives, and binding them into the totality of Life. One of the mightiest of these is the law of *recapitulation. Each individual must start, in the egg or womb, as a single cell and repeat in its individual career the myriads of centuries of earth history. The species is thus deepened and enriched and all species share something of the common life of the plant kingdom and of the entire animal kingdom.

4. The Perfection of Childhood. Development and evolution can, with the aid of selection, become anticipatory. The child, at birth and after, bears so many indications of its superiority, when viewed comparatively in the human scale of perfections, that one stands in admiration and wonder in its presence. Among these marks are largeness of head as compared with size of body, hairlessness, shortness of jaw, fewness of teeth, texture of skin, fineness of feature, grace of movement, quality of voice, sensitiveness of social responses, fullness and roundness of mental and somatic integrations, radiance of facial expressiveness. A sort of "Heaven lies about him" and is incarnate within him.

He usually stumbles out of this Heaven of perfection into a rude world of specificities and jobs, and duties, and social and institutional compulsions; and teachers trained in quantity production of definite knowledges and skills.

He may enter, in the teens or later—the chances are against it—another Paradise of the dramatic, higher cultures of the race, incarnate.

Is it not possible, through right culture and training, to build the racial highway, straight and sure, from the Paradise of Childhood into the land of the All-pervading Beauty and the Righteousness of an adult world?

Should humanity not worship constantly at the sacred shrines, not of a child, but of the child!

5. Religion as a Symphony of Urges, or Drives, or Instincts or Native Tendencies, and of their Affective Qualities. We do, in a way, during foetal life and after, clamber up the biological tree. We travel the racial highway. Not only do we share basic structures and metabolisms of the various creatures all the way from the inception of life to the present, but are inheritors of the tones and overtones, the motifs and melodies of feeling and valuation that express themselves, on occasion, in every organism. We hunt names for these mechanisms or devices. In the caption just above we have been content to sling four names at them, knowing that not one of them is satisfactory.

As we start the list of "instincts" or "urges" or "native tendencies," with their feelingful qualities, we are coming into immediacy with the red blood of human experiences,—the pure gold of valuation, which it is the function of religion to try to release, to idealize and to glorify. Among these are self-preservation, "the first law of life", fear, leading to caution, and if all goes well, may be "the beginning of wisdom"; mating, that guarantees the continuity of life and does ripen into ideal Love, "the fulfillment of the law", anger, the raw stuff out of which resentment at injustice is made, and culminating sometimes in "righteous indignation" and "holy wars", hunger, when disciplined and rightly used, may be an element in righteousness, sociality, that may bind the many into a blessed fellowship, ownership, with its scores of fruitages, good and bad, when discreetly seasoned may lead to "treasures in Heaven", enjoyment of simple Beauty, blossoming into appreciation, admiration and adoration, the Ego, maturing into the joys of high leadership, the sense of melody and harmony interfusing and glorifying all of life's relationships.

It would be possible to extend greatly the catalogue of basic urges and drives and their ramifications which it is the function of education, art and religion to cultivate and glorify. William James* was inclined to think it possible to list profitably a score or perhaps a half hundred of them.

The game of rightly interpreting the basic drives has perhaps been delayed slightly by persons with a desire for simplification. All persons with a monistic propensity can speak and write truly, if not adequately, for the reason that all the urges or drives interfuse to such an extent that a strain or coloring from a favorite "instinct" is found in every impulse and response.

We venture to return to the analogy of the Symphony of urges and of valuations. Each person carries in his thought and heart those themes and motifs that make now and progressively for the fullest and most satisfying living. Each, in a small or great way, is an orchestral conductor, in home or playground or church or school or business house or laboratory or congress, in some phase of the music of humanity that gives fresh release to Life.

6. Periodicities in Religious Development. The fact that religious maturing is eventful rather than evenly continuous is indicated by many researches. There are, for example, the studies by Starbuck, Coe and others on the age of conversion*. The instances appear sparsely at ages 8 to 10. The curve of frequency rises at 11 and 12, declines for both sexes at 13, swings upward sharply at 15 to 17, near the period of pubescence, declines abruptly into the early twenties, after a definite bit of an increment at 18-19, and pretty much disappears after that age. As evidence that these eccentricities are not accidental is the fact that the pattern of the age curve of frequencies was very similar for each of the eleven quite diverse groups that together built up the picture for the 1250 cases that were studied in that particular research. The sex-theorists can, of course, extract quite a blessing out of the coincidence of pubescence and the main peak of the conversion curves. They will have some difficulties with the phenomena of "sanctification" (Starbuck, Psychology of Religion, Chap. XXIX), the story of many converts who, after a lapse of a decade or so (only one of the cases studied was short of 10 yards), with ups and downs and difficulties, move on into "a second experience" in which "the service of God is a constant delight," "far exceeding in depth and fullness the first blessing." (Page 384).

It is rather characteristic of religious geniuses to be disrespectful of conventional types of religiosity and of modal curves of frequency. Mrs. Jonathan Edwards entered suddenly her deep and lasting religious career at the age of eight. Tolstoi's most dramatic revolution of values was in his middle years and he was in the midst of a still more challenging soul-reach as his career was coming to a close.

7. The Center of Gravity of the Religious Personality. The religious attitudes, convictions and behaviors that count for most in the personal life and in the human drama have their sources, for most part, in the intimate, inner feelings of meaning and worth and values rather than in rational constructs and conceptualized forms and patterns of thinking,—just as is true in friendships, in love relations, artistic participations—and in scientific achievements and discoveries. We suffer from our sentiments of rationality. We think that we think. By actual testing there is little ground for the conviction.

Only latterly (one or two or three decades), have students of structures and functions of the organism begun to appreciate fully the fact that we have two nervous systems the central nervous system with its cerebral cortex, cerebellum, spinal cord, spinal ganglia and efferent nerves in control of the striped or striated musculature, and another nervous system, the autonomic, or sympathetic, consisting of the hypothalamus, basal ganglia, and substations in the vital organs of the body, busy with the control of the smooth muscle tissue that regulates circulation, digestion, reproduction, metabolisms, secretions and the activities of a dozen sets of glands, and is in control of the vital functions. The autonomic is older biologically and doubtless more basic in feeling out the intricacies of right adjustments and adaptations.

The heart, consisting of both striated and smooth muscle tissue, stands between the central nervous system and the autonomic as the sensitized determiner of needs and aspirations.

Those who edited the Bible appealed to the things of the heart more than 60 times, always with warmth. The word "belief" occurs less than half as frequently, and often unsympathetically. "The devils also believed."

8. Lower-Sense Imagery in Religious Meanings and Values. Since sight and hearing present to the mind definable data that are readily perceived and shared, the custom arose of designating them the "higher" senses, leaving the other eight (or more), taste, touch, smell, temperature, pain, equilibrium, kinaesthetic and organic—as the "lower." There has been a lag in appreciating generally the fact that in capturing specific meanings and values in appreciated experiences and then in words, the lower do not suffer in the comparison. That fact led the graduate pupils of the writer of these lines to attempt to rate the work-value or worth or meaning-significance of all the words or phrases in favorite selections of literature, like the 23rd Psalm or the "Blow, blow" of Shakespeare. The report on sample instances is in Volume I of The Journal of Religion. In total picture, the kinaesthetic and organic imagery values essentially match those of sight and hearing, with the other six falling much lower, but always significant. We proposed to make a new designation and classification, calling the two,—the visual and auditional,—the "defining sensory processes" and the other eight the "intimate sensory processes." In religious observances not one of the ten types of imagery has been slighted. In literature the success of the artist seems to correlate positively with his ability to thrum the subtler end of the imagery scale.

9. The Imagination, the Light and the Life of the Mind. It is the imagination rather than ideation and reason that releases values. It is delicate, with wings like those of a fairy. It emancipates the mind from the thraldom of things. It gives orientation, perspective, knowledge, wisdom.

10. Intelligence, Thought, Reason, as the Stabilizers of Life. It is ours to know that, within limits, truth is inviolable. Two and two make four. The law of falling bodies works. To be a vertebrate with a straight spine and not molluscan. To find in the shifting sands of time a hut and dwell therein. To find a friend, forever and a day. To walk straight with steady step towards the greater Temple of Wisdom and Beauty and Righteousness.

See psychologists, English school of.

E. S. Ames, The Psychology of Religious Experience (1910) ; W. E. Bingham, "A Study of the Relations which the Galvanic Skin Response and Sensory Reference Bear to Judgments of the Meaningfulness, Significance and Importance of 72 Words" in Journal of Psychology (1943), 16, 21-34 ; George A. Coe, Motives of Men (1928) ; Elmer T. Clark, The Psychology of Religious Awakening (1929) ; E. S. Conklin, Psychology of Religious Adjustment (1929) ; G. B. Cutten, Instincts and Religion (1940) ; John Dewey, A Common Faith (1934) ; Knight Dunlap, Mysticism, Freudianism and Scientific Psychology (1930) ; J. M. Evvard, "Is the Appetite of Swine a Reliable Indication of Physiological Needs?" Proceedings of the Iowa Academy of Sciences, vol. XXII (1915) ; V. T. A. Ferm, Religion in Transition (London, 1937) , Ruth Griffiths, A Study of Imagination in Early Childhood (London, 1935) ;P. R. Hightower, "Biblical Information in Relation to Character and Conduct." University of Iowa Studies in Character, vol. III, No. 2 ; W. R. Inge, God and the Astron- omers (1933), W. E. Hocking, Living Religions and a World Faith (1940), William James, Varieties of Religious Experience (reprint, 1938); W. L. Jones, Psychological Study of Religious Conversion (1937), C. C. Josey, The Psychology of Religion (1927), Richard Kroner, The Religious Function of Imagination (1941), B. C. Leeming, Imagination, Mind's Dominant Power (1926), James H. Leuba, A Psychological Study of Religion (1912), E. M. Ligon, Their Future is Now (1940), E. L. Mudge, "The Lower-Sense Complexes Conditioning the God-Experience." Summarized in following citation: E. D. Starbuck, "The Intimate Senses as Sources of Wisdom", Journal of Religion, vol I, pp 129-145 (1921), J B Pratt, The Religious Consciousness (reprint, 1930), Research Publications, vol XX. The Hypothalamus and Central Levels of Autonomic Function (1940), Research Publications, vol. XXI. The Diseases of the Basal Ganglia (1942), A. A. Roback, Psychology of Character (London, 1927); W. B Selbie, The Psychology of Religion (1929), Edwin D Starbuck, "The Intimate Senses as Sources of Wisdom", Journal of Religion, vol. I, pp. 129-145 (1921), The Psychology of Religion (1899), K. R. Stolz, Psychology of Religious Living (1937), G. M. Stratton, Psychology of the Religious Life (2nd ed.), L. P. Thorpe, Psychological Foundations of Personality (1938), R. H Thouless, Introduction to the Psychology of Religion (1936); John B. Watson, Kinaesthetic and Organic Sensations Their Role in the Reactions of the White Mice to the Maze (1907), Henry N Wieman, Normative Psychology of Religion (1935).   E.D.S.

psychology, schools of: Groups into which psychologists may be classified on the basis of their leanings toward one or another general conception of psychology. Members of a school agree in general, though not necessarily in detail, on such topics as the definition of the subject matter, approved and preferred methods of research, significant problems, general organization and interpretation of the body of factual material. A system of psychology usually consists of the organized tenets of a school, but may represent the views of only one person. At present schools are not organized groups and systems are regarded as working hypotheses Many psychologists neither adhere to a school nor subscribe to a system.

Schools have centered about the following points of view.

Rational psychology. A speculative treatment of the soul as contrasted with empirical and experimental psychology. Typical problems concern the unity, immortality, and powers of the soul. It characterizes scholastic thought and parts of Aristotle's psychology.

Faculty psychology: A system which, classifying mental performances into groups, explains them by mental powers or faculties assumed to correspond to those groups,—e.g., a faculty of reason explains judgment and inference. It is characteristic of scholastic thought. A typical representative is Christian Wolff (1679-1754)*.

Associationism. The theory that all mental formations are reducible to elements (simple ideas, sensations) variously and lawfully associated. Laws of association (similarity and contiguity) were first stated by Aristotle, but associationism as a comprehensive system was the work chiefly of a succession of British writers of the seventeenth, eighteenth and nineteenth centuries: Hobbes, Locke, Berkeley, Hume, Hartley, J. Mill, J. S. Mill, and Bain. Associationism is noteworthy as an empirical psychology which preceded experimental psychology

Herbartianism A system proposed by J. F. Herbart (1776-1841)* who, unlike the associationists, emphasized the dynamic relations among ideas. Ideas, inhibiting and otherwise influencing each other, strive singly and in groups to rise to consciousness and repel competing ideas. The apperceiving mass, the ideas already present in the mind, determine to what extent and in what manner new ideas are received and incorporated into knowledge. The conception of the apperceiving mass was influential for a time in educational theory and practice. Herbart believed mental processes capable of quantitative, but not experimental treatment. He opposed faculty psychology.

Wundtian psychology The system formulated by Wilhelm Wundt (1832-1920)* founder of the first psychological laboratory (Leipzig, 1879). Consciousness is accepted as the subject matter of psychology, experimentally controlled introspection as its distinctive method Consciousness is conceived as analyzable into elementary processes (sensation, affection, image) which, combined in various ways (fusion, assimilation, complication, etc), give the more complex forms of consciousness. The system is sometimes called Existentialism to characterize its subject matter as sensibly experienced, sometimes Content Psychology in contrast with Act Psychology, and sometimes (in America) Structuralism in contrast with Functionalism. Its chief representative in America was E. B Titchener (1867-1927).

Act psychology: A system formulated by Wundt's contemporary, Franz Brentano (1838-1917)* who recognized in the subject matter of psychology mental acts in addition to contents—e.g., the act of sensing red, as well as the sensational content red. His distinctive method is phenomenological observation as contrasted with experiment and experimentally controlled introspection. The system is called empirical in traditional contrast with Wundt's experimental psychology. Among its adherents were Lipps, Stumpf, Witasek, Husserl, Messer, and Kulpe, each of whom introduced modifications.

Functionalism: A point of view widely and informally adopted which, as represented by John Dewey (1859-) and J. R. Angell (1869-) became the rallying point of an American school opposing the Wundtian tradition. It was greatly influenced by William James (1842-1910)* himself not identified with any school. Functionalists study psychological processes not primarily as conscious contents, but as activities having utility in the organism's adjustments to its environment. Bodily activities,—e.g., motor learning and other adjustments—are included in the subject matter of psychology. Introspection, though not rejected, is not regarded as central; objective methods are emphasized. In America Ladd, Baldwin, and Carr, in Europe Höffding, Ward and Stout were among those who adopted a functionalistic standpoint.

Behaviorism: A system advanced in America by J. B. Watson (1878-) who wholly rejecting consciousness and introspection as unsuitable to scientific treatment, regards psychology as the study of behavior by objective methods exclusively. Watson treats psychological events—i.e., behavior—as reducible to the action of stimulus-response mechanisms variously combined and conditioned. The role of conditioning (learning) is emphasized, that of heredity minimized. Instincts are denied. Many variants of behaviorism have arisen, among them E C. Tolman's (1886-) Purposive Behaviorism which studies behavior not as a composition of minute or 'molecular' stimulus-response mechanisms, but as 'molar' wholes or behavior acts from which immanent determinants such as purposes and cognitions are inferred, not introspectively observed.

Gestalt psychology A theory advanced by M. Wertheimer (1880-), W. Kohler (1887-) and K. Koffka (1886-1941) who deny that psychological processes, whether behavioral or conscious, are explicable as elements in association. The central concept is the gestalt or organized whole, which if analyzed loses its distinctive properties. The gestalt-principle, originally utilized in explaining perceptual phenomena, has been extended throughout psychology, and by Kohler into biology and physics. Gestalten differ from the form-qualities recognized by certain act psychologists in that form qualities are conceived as based on fundaments which are themselves elements. Kurt Lewin's Topological and Vectorial Psychology, a variant of Gestalt Psychology, emphasizes problems of action and motivation utilizing topology for mathematical representation of its concepts. Gestaltists utilize both objective and introspective (phenomenological) methods, characteristically arranging conditions which permit experimentation on wholes and their properties.

Hormic psychology The theory of William McDougall (1871-1938) that human behavior, essentially purposive, is basically determined by inherited psycho-physical dispositions called instincts. Seven primary instincts (pugnacity, flight, curiosity, repulsion, self-assertion, self-abasement, the parental instinct) each paired with a primary emotion, are the prime movers of human activity, including the intellectual, and are the major determinants of social customs and institutions.

Psychologies deriving from psychoanalysis Psychoanalysis, developed by Sigmund Freud (1856-1939)* was designed to relieve neurotic patients by bringing to consciousness their unconscious motivation. Freud originally conceived the human personality as organized about two poles, a superficial conscious self (ego) in conflict with a vast, powerful unconscious (libido) the seat of primitive urges, mainly sexual. These, repressed but active, achieve indirect expression, circumventing or overcoming the ego's resistances through numerous devices. Conflicts in infancy and childhood largely determine the adult personality pattern. Freud's later works picture a more complexly organized personality centered about an unconscious Id, a perceptive Ego, and the Superego or conscience, the individual's unconscious morality. Many variants of Freud's system have arisen. C. G. Jung's (1875-)* Analytic Psychology differs from Freud's teachings in placing less emphasis on sex, and more on present conflict as compared with infantile and childhood experiences A. Adler's (1870-1937)* Individual Psychology traces personality disturbances to feelings of inferiority which may express themselves in various forms of overcompensation.

Personalistic psychologies Systems that regard the proper subject matter of psychology as the whole, concrete, individual person. W. Stern (1871-1938) defines his immediate subject matter as experience 'in its matrix, the unitary goal-seeking person'. G. W Allport (1897-) emphasizing the uniqueness of the individual personality, seeks general laws which account for uniqueness. The Verstehungspsychologie, of W. Dilthey (1833-1911)* a student of biography and E. Spranger (1882-)* aims at a description of the total personality based on an understanding which transcends scientific explanation. See psychologists, English school of.

R. S Woodworth, Contemporary Schools of Psychology (1931), E. Heidbreder, Seven Psychologies (1933), E. G. Boring, History of Experimental Psychology (1929, 3rd printing, 1935), G. Murphy, A Historical Introduction to Modern Psychology (1929, 2nd ed. 1932), G S. Brett, A History of Psychology, vol. I (1912), vol II (1921), vol. III (1921); C. Murchison (ed), Psychologies of 1925 (1925); Psychologies of 1930 (1930); F. S. Keller, The Definition of Psychology (1937).   EDN.H.

psychology, systems of: See psychology, schools of.

psychopathology: See abnormal psychology.

psychotherapy: (Gr. psyche—mind, therapeia, cure) The attempt to heal or cure by means of personal conferences with the patient. As distinguished from psychiatry it is not limited to the more severe disorders, and where psychiatry includes all that has to do with the more serious disorders of the personality, psychotherapy is limited to the realm of psychic influence. The term is strictly a medical one. Among religious workers the common equivalent is "personal counseling."

Two major types of psychotherapy may be distinguished those which rely primarily upon suggestion, and those which seek to discover and correct the fundamental maladjustments and to enable the patient to achieve some degree of autonomy and maturity.

The first of these may be designated as "faith-healing." It is the type which has prevailed among religious workers. It takes the patient as he is, making little or no attempt to discover the roots of his difficulty, and directs his attention to comforting and constructive thoughts through prayer, devotional books and friendly advice. It would do the church serious injustice not to recognize that much good sense has been brought to bear by individual workers and that rather generally a great deal of stress has been placed upon facing the facts, squaring accounts and correcting misunderstandings. It remains true however that among religious workers anything in the nature of a co-operative attempt to organize and test their insights and techniques of treatment has been practically absent. In such forms as Christian Science* suggestion is even carried to the point of denying the reality of evil and pain and asserting the absolute omnipotence of Mind and Love and Truth. The results secured at religious revivals in the years gone by have been due very largely to the influence of suggestion, so also the cures effected at such shrines as Lourdes and Ste. Anne de Beaupré.

Among medical men faith-healing has been represented in its more dramatic form by the use of hypnosis. Among the great pioneers in the therapeutic use of hypnosis was the French physician, Charcot, the teacher of Freud* and of Janet. Of recent years the use of deep hypnosis has been limited. The tendency among those who use hypnosis at all is merely to give suggestions while the patient is in a relaxed condition, or under light hypnosis. It is also used sparingly for exploratory purposes. The disfavor into which hypnotic therapy has now fallen is due to the view that results secured with its help, while often striking, are not permanent. They are suggestions imposed from without and tend therefore to weaken the patient's will.

An interesting method which lies half way between the faith-healing type and the exploratory type is that of moral re-education as practiced by the Swiss physician, Dr. Dubois at the beginning of the present century. In this country the re-education plan has been associated chiefly with the name of Dr. Riggs of Stockbridge, Mass.

The form of psychotherapy now most in the public eye is psychoanalysis. This in its aims is the antithesis of faith-healing. It has often been compared by its proponents to surgery, and major surgery at that. It is the attempt to lay bare and bring into clear consciousness the disowned instinctual desires which, it assumes, have become detached from the conscious self and are responsible for the neurotic symptoms. Its aim is to make over the harsh conscience and the rigid standards which constitute one of the factors in the inner conflict.

Great stress was at the beginning laid upon "catharsis." Cure was effected, so it was thought, by getting the poisons out of the system and bringing the difficulty into clear awareness. It is now recognized that socialization is the important factor. Cure is only effected in so far as the sufferer tells his real difficulties to some one whom he trusts, some one who stands for him as the prototype of the father and the representative of authority, and who is yet able to hear the worst without condemning him. He thus gets rid of the "sense of guilt" which is the primary evil in all mental illness.

Psycho-analysis has had a profound influence not only in the field of psychiatry but also in psychiatry and sociology* and that influence has extended into literature and into popular thought. It has not been without its effects upon religious thinking, especially in the field of the psychology of religion*.

Psychoanalysis is represented today by a number of variant schools. In addition to orthodox psychoanalysis as taught and practiced by Sigmund Freud, the great Viennese physician, we have the followers of Jung, of Adler and of Rank, all of them heretical students of Freud.

Mention should be made of "psychobiology", a school of psychiatry developed in this country under the leadership of Adolf Meyer. This school explains mental illness in terms of the total organism reacting to a difficult environmental situation and it seeks to effect cure by making all necessary inner and outer adjustments.

See mental hygiene, psychologists, English school of.

S. Freud, General Introduction to Psychoanalysis (1920); also An Autobiographical Study, (1927); C. G. Jung, Two Essays on Analytical Psychology (1928), Otto Rank, Will Therapy (1936); Pierre Janet, Principles of Psychotherapy (1924); Paul Dubois, The Psychic Treatment of Nervous Disorders (1909). A.T.B.

Ptah: The Egyptian creator; worshiped at Memphis as far back as Manetho's first dynasty. His statue is in the form of a mummy, but he was not primarily a god of the underworld. P.G.M.

Ptolemaic astronomy: For fourteen centuries the leading theory of the movements of heavenly bodies, until Copernicus, Kepler, and Newton constructed a superior one. Claudius Ptolemaeus (fl. in Alexandria, 127-151) held that each of the bodies, other than the earth, in the solar system moved in a small circle or "epicycle" whose center moved in a large circle around the earth. The theory was fitted to the new facts which became known during the Middle Ages by complicated additions of epicycles—or epi-epicycles. Thus the axioms, the earth does not move, and the heavenly motions are circular (this being the most perfect form of curve), could nominally be retained. Ptolemy had the merit of attempting to find mathematical order in nature, and thus he carried out the first part of the Whiteheadian injunction, "Seek simplicity, and then mistrust it," the Arabians accumulated facts which showed that the simplicity was deceptive; and Copernicus achieved a new simplicity which, having been distrusted by Kepler, gave way to still a newer and subtler one —and so on.

C. Ptolemaeus, Syntaxis (Heiberg's ed. of the astronomical works of Ptolemy, 1899-1907); A. Berry, Short History of Astronomy (1898); Sir Wm. Smith's Dictionary of Gk. and Rom. Biog. (1849). C.H.

public honesty, marital impediment of: See marital impediments.

public law: See law.

publican: A tax farmer. In the ancient world taxes were collected not by state officials but by private individuals employed for the purpose, who profited by any excess they could extract from the people. That a publican could be honest was regarded as impossible. B.S.E.

publication, early Christian: The multiplication of copies of works of literature for sale was a familiar feature of life in the Graeco-Roman world in the first century. They were not of course printed, but they were published and sold through numerous book sellers, in all the great cities of the empire. Martial, a contemporary of Luke, gives us vivid pictures of authors, publishers and bookstores in Rome The great libraries, especially that of Alexandria*, numbered their books, that is, papyrus rolls, by the hundreds of thousands Every large house in those times had its library, and in one of these, destroyed in the eruption of Vesuvius in A D. 79, were found the remains of eight hundred books.

Christianity very soon began to express itself in writing, in Greek, at first in the letters of Paul, not meant for publication and for a generation left unpublished. The Gospel of Mark* was the first Christian book of which we have any knowledge, and it was soon followed by the Gospel of Matthew*, a carefully organized and edited expansion of it. A decade later, Luke's* work on Christian Beginnings in two volumes, with a preface and dedication, and some account of its sources and the occasion of its composition, carried Christian publication a definite stage further. It was probably its picture of Paul, the most vivid and graphic ever produced, that stimulated some Pauline Christian to search out and collect such letters of Paul as could be found, and publish them, prefacing them with a general letter to all believers, which has come down to us as Ephesians*. The Pauline letters* would form two ordinary Greek rolls, as Luke's work had done. It was reflected almost immediately in the letter corpus that begins the book of Revelation*, a book addressed to the churches of Asia, and carefully safeguarded against alteration by the most solemn warnings, 22·18, 19. The writer evidently expected the book to be copied and circulated. I Peter*, an encyclical from the Roman church to the Christians of all Asia Minor, followed almost immediately, aiming to correct some attitudes taken in the Revelation not only in Asia but all through the adjacent provinces which the Revelation would naturally reach. Its address "to those who are scattered as foreigners over Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia" obviously implies publication, how else could they be reached? Hebrews and I Clement are other examples of Christian literary activity and publication from this fruitful time. All these books after Luke-Acts, show the stimulating influence of the collected Pauline letters upon Christian publication.

Early in the second century the Gospel of John* presented the Christian gospel in a form more acceptable to Greek minds, and showed the influence of Paul's letters and of the earlier gospels. Half dialogue in form, it was unmistakably meant for publication and was very soon republished together with the earlier local gospels in a great quartette, the twenty-first chapter being added. This second great collection of Christian writings, reflected in the Gospel of Peter, Papias, the British Museum Gospel, the Letter of the Apostles, Justin, and II Peter, was a great achievement of publication, and may have necessitated the adoption of the leaf book in place of the ancient and usual roll form, certainly the leaf book was in use among Christian publishers by the middle of the second century (the Rylands John fragment) and was preferred by Christians from that time on, though pagan publishers came to it more slowly.

The fourfold gospel was not only the climax of Christian publication, but has never been surpassed, and still remains the most popular and influential published unit in the world. Just as the N.T. is the cutting edge of the Bible, the Four Gospels are the cutting edge of the N.T. A score of private gospels followed, and Christian publication was on its fruitful way. Letters, revelations, acts (Christian novels), apologies, dialogues, hymns, homilies, memoirs, polemics, fill the second century. Christianity swiftly adopted virtually all the contemporary techniques of Greek literature and developed others of its own. Its swift and complete adoption of the art of publication was not the least of the factors in its extraordinary progress.

See E. J. Goodspeed, Christianity Goes to Press (1940); A History of Early Christian Literature (1942).   E.J.G.

pūjā: Worship, cult, in India. Puja is performed daily in every devout Hindu home sometimes by a priest, most frequently by the householder, but in the temples it is the Brahmin* priests who perform it. It takes many different forms according to the sect of the worshiper and the occasion.   C.S.B.

Pullus, Robert: (died 1150) Although not an original mind, he was particularly instrumental in the development of the doctrine of repentance.* He stressed the significance of the inner processes preceding full contrition and made liberation from sin dependent upon a sacramental process.

Migne 186: Sententiarum libri octo; P. Schmoll, Die Busslehre der Frühscholastik (München, 1909).   H.H.

pulpit: (Lat., pulpitum, staging or platform) An elevated preaching stand, usually on the Gospel side of the chancel*. In Protestant churches, till recent times, usually in the center of the chancel. In these churches often a desk on a platform, from which the service is conducted and the sermon preached. See mimbar.   F.T.P.

punishment: See rewards and punishments; penology.

Purānas: A collection of 18 books of religious poems which constitute the real scriptures of Hindu popular religion. They are the sources of popular belief concerning the origin of things, the world, time, the gods, the Vedas. They contain some ancient material, but in their present form come from probably later than the fourth century of the Christian era. They are the bases of sectarian teaching, each of them being made use of by some one or more of the sects as its book of origins, thus the Vishnu Purāna is a Vishnavite document.

J N. Farquhar, Outline of the Religious Literature of India (1920).   C.S.B.

Pure Land School: See Buddhist Terminology.

purgation: See purification.

Purgatorial Societies: Confraternities* of the Church having for their main purpose to assist in every possible way the poor souls in purgatory*. The historical origin of these societies can be found in the prayers for the dead* in the most ancient liturgy of the Church, their radical cause is Christian charity for one's neighbor which extends even beyond the grave; and their basis is found in the doctrine concerning purgatory, the condition of the poor souls after death, the communion of saints, and the satisfactory value of good works. The best known of these societies in modern times is the Archconfraternity of Prayer for the Poor Souls of Purgatory which was founded by the Brief of May 25, 1898 of Pope Leo XIII*.   T.T.M.

purgatory: In Catholic teaching, purgatory is a condition of temporal punishment after death for venial sins* and as satisfaction for sins. Definitions of faith at the Councils of Florence and Trent*, received by the Roman Catholic Church, say that there is a purgatory and that the offerings of prayer and especially of the Mass* aid souls there. Aquinas and Bonaventure, following S. Gregory, hold the punishment to be both absence from God and burning by fire (poena damni and poena sensus), although the description was not upheld at Florence against the Greeks. Temporal periods are of a duration different from earthly time, thus, the times mentioned in indulgences* are the heavenly equivalent of what would have been a suitable earthly penance (cf. penance) that was commuted into prayer. The protest of Luther and others against materialistic forms of this teaching has resulted in little teaching on the intermediate state* in Protestantism, and in the cautions of Trent against speculative curiosities.

The Orthodox Church, although it does not use the word, and the Anglican Church, which has recently paid more attention to the belief, both hold doctrines that involve the purification of souls in their progress to final bliss and the efficacy of prayers for the departed. See prayers for the dead, Sabbatine privilege.   T.J.B.

purification (Lat., purificatio) In general, beginning at the primitive level, any process designed to remove the uncleanness resulting from the violation of a tabu* or from the failure properly to care for such critical events as death, childbirth, puberty, marriage, or illness. The demand for such ceremonial cleansing of the affected person or persons rises out of the solidarity of the group and is rooted in the belief that individual impurity may have dreadful and far-reaching social consequences, such as, bad luck, crop failure, widespread death or illness. The forms of purification vary greatly in different societies but commonly involve some medium of cleansing, such as water, blood, change of garments, etc., and some ceremonial rite. At the higher religious levels, the term purification is used to denote any of various disciplines or rituals for the moral or spiritual cleansing of the inner life from sin. See blood, death and burial practices, Lupercalia.   E.T.R.

Purim: The name (explained in Esth. 9.24 f. as "lots") of a Jewish festival celebrated on Adar 14-15 traditionally as a memorial of the escape of the Jews of Persia from the machinations of Haman. The ritual of the festival includes the reading of the scroll of Esther*.   S.H.B.

Puritan ethics: Essentially a religion of action, rather than of contemplation, Puritanism* stressed the virtues of sobriety, honesty, and thrift. An outstanding element was moral fervor, which is shown in Edward Dering's rebuking Queen Elizabeth and in William Prynne's attacks on bishops and theatres, and which gave to Puritanism a dogged strength and vigor. Otherworldly as it was, its emphasis upon the practical virtues, according to such writers as Max Weber, fostered the rise of capitalism*, although later writers, such as R. H. Tawney, declare this view is an over-simplification. Richard's Baxter's* A Christian Directory contains the best summary of Puritan ethics.

N. M Knappen, Tudor Puritanism (1939); William Haller, The Rise of Puritanism (1938).   E.W.K.

Puritanism: The doctrine of the Puritans, a sect originally so-called because 1) they wished to purify English protestantism by removing all traces of Roman Catholic forms and ceremonies. Puritan thinking was largely dependent upon Continental Protestant predecessors. It emphasized 2) the Bible instead of tradition or reason as the chief source of authority. Though its early leaders were influenced by Lutheran ideas these were thrown off by 1550 and eventually 3) Puritan theology became almost purely Calvinist. Puritanism also represented 4) a protest against the Erastianism* of the established church and an unwillingness to see the reform program limited by royal opposition or indifference. In this form it can be traced back as far as the time of Tyndale*, who in 1524 went to Germany, in defiance of a royal statute, to translate the Bible into English. To the extent that it championed the rights of the church as against the secular authority state and believed in the doctrine of the two swords* Puritanism was in substantial agreement with the medieval Catholic tradition, and from the same source it drew its well-known 5) emphasis on strict morality. The Puritan protest against the theatre, card-playing, and dancing may be traced back to medieval monasticism, and Puritan Sabbatarianism has a similar medieval origin.

The first generation of Puritan leaders espoused no particular form of 6) church government, and throughout the history of the movement some Puritans continued to accept the established church with its episcopalianism. After the Anglican bishops under Elizabeth began to enforce the conservative vestiarian rules of the establishment, however, the majority of the Puritans became critical of government by bishops and began to champion presbyterianism*. Since presbyterianism involved regional and national assemblies which could not operate effectively without a change of national policy, in the 1580's a minority of the Puritans who had abandoned episcopalianism* began to agitate for reform "without tarrying for any" and so came to advocate independency or congregationalism. This permitted of a fully reformed church establishment as soon as a small group of Puritans could be gathered together. Since these extremists thus organized their own bodies and left the established they were also known as Separatists*, though at a later time some Independents recognized the Anglican communion as genuinely Christian and thus came to be known as non-Separatist Independents. John Smith*, leader of a Separatist congregation which went to Holland in 1608, there adopted the practice of adult baptism Some of his followers returned to England and organized the first Baptist church there Perhaps because the Baptists* were distinctly a minority sect they were pioneers in developing the idea of genuine religious toleration and the complete separation of church and state.

The Puritan movement naturally allied itself with the opposition to the Stuart kings and with the meeting of the Long Parliament (1640) and the outbreak of the Civil War (1642) it became a powerful political force. After a period of enforced cooperation the cleavage between Presbyterian and Independent Puritans became pronounced. From 1643 to 1648 the Presbyterians predominated and during this period the Westminster Assembly held its sessions and produced the Confession of Faith and the Larger and Shorter Catechisms. Cromwell* was an Independent, however, and after his rise to power Presbyterianism, though tolerated, was forced to yield precedence to its younger rival. After the Restoration of the Stuarts and the adoption of the so-called Clarendon code both types of Puritanism became illegal and thereafter Puritanism was generally known as Dissent and Puritans as Dissenters* because of their refusal to conform to the rites of the officially established church

New England was largely settled by Independent Puritans. Those who came to Plymouth Bay in 1620 were moderate Separatists, sometimes called semi-Separatists, while Massachusetts Bay and Connecticut—the major New England colonies—were founded by non-Separatists. In the settlement of Rhode Island, however, the Baptists played a prominent part. See American theology, early, Bible, English; Puritan ethics, Sabbatarianism, Puritan. Cf. covenant (or federal) theology; Marprelate Tracts.

M. M Knappen, Tudor Puritanism (1939); William Haller, The Rise of Puritanism (1938); Perry Miller, The New England Mind (1939).   M.M.K.

purohita: The domestic priest of a king or noble in Vedic times. Often served as adviser not alone on spiritual matters, but on temporal affairs as well. In later times only the purohita could officiate at a sacrifice for the king.   C.S.B.

purpose, divine: See analogy, cause, God, teleology, teleological argument for God.

purposive behaviorism: See psychology, schools of.

purusha: Rig Veda X, 90, the hymn to Purusha is said to be the "starting point of the pantheistic philosophy of India". Purusha, or Cosmic Man, sacrificed by the gods becomes the origin of all things Thus all that is constitutes a unity. There is but one basic world-ground. This tendency ultimately triumphed over the trend toward monotheism represented in Prajapati*. In the Sankhya* system purusha means the individual soul, an infinite number of which exist entirely distinct from matter, *prakriti and act upon it.
   C.S.B.

Pusan, Pushan: One of the lesser sun gods of Vedic Hinduism, probably introduced by some pastoral tribe. His car is drawn by goats. He is a shepherd and the protector of flocks. Also he is the lord of paths or the pathfinder. His aid is sought in the search for lost objects.   C.S.B.

Pusey, Edward Bouverie: (1800-1882) Professor of Hebrew at Oxford from 1828 and a leader in the Oxford Movement* from 1836; his prominence as Anglo-Catholic* scholar and controversialist led to the popular terms Puseyite and Puseyism.   E.R.H.

Pyrrhonism: Extreme skepticism*. Named from Pyrrho of Elis (fl. 300 B.C.), who believed that one should refrain from all dogmatic assertions since perceptions often mislead and much may be said for each side in any argument. No value judgments are necessary. Hence, suspension of judgment (epoche) is indicated on every matter of belief; apathy or peace of mind (ataraxia) was the goal of life for him, as for certain Stoics.
   J.E.N.

Pythagoreanism: Reputed founder, Pythagoras of Samos, c. 6th century B.C., headed a school and brotherhood in Southern Italy, both vegetarian and esoteric. Traveled widely, collected learning and was revered by disciples who tended to immortalize him From him comes the famous dictum ipse dixit.

Pythagoreanism held that the soul* was timeless, changeless, self-existing and at intervals found itself imprisoned within successive bodies without being any part of them. Through life and death it retained full memory of experience of earthly incarnations. If he did not think of it in a tripartite relation as some claim, soul was quite certainly regarded as a double principle—hot and cold. Also, this school of thought advocated the eternal repetition of everything, and there is a report that the cycle was ended sometimes by fire and sometimes by water. Another basic principle of Pythagoreanism was that numbers are things. That is to say that the nature of reality is number. This, of course, shoul not be understood to mean Arabic or Roman numbers, but gnomic or forms. The tetraktys of the dekad seems to have been the integral notion of the Pythagorean theory of number. The tetraktys was considered sacred and divine, the influence of which idea has come down to us in manifold forms of numerology. Pythagoreans were supposed to have prayed to the holy tetraktys, possibly representative of the four elements, earth, air, fire and water. The principle of number was applied to music. By experimenting with an instrument with a string and moveable bridge, Pythagoras discovered the relationship of the tones in the tetrachord to certain definite proportions, thus laying the numerical foundations of musical harmony, which continued as a subject of study in Oxford University down into the 18th century. In medicine also the number principle was employed. The body, like the string of a musical instrument, is tuned to a certain pitch and proper atunement is health.

Pythagoras' conception of number, form, was influential on Plato's thinking. It was more abstract than Milesian thought, more imaginative than that of the Eleatics and more distinct than that held by the Heraclitans. See neo-Pythagoreanism, transmigration.   P.R.H.

pyx: (Gr. puxis, a box) The box or case or tabernacle in which the Host* is reserved.   F.T.P.

Q

Q: Abbreviation for Quelle, "source", symbol used for a supposed source of the Synoptic Gospels*, postulated by many scholars to explain the presence in Matthew and Luke of common material not contained in Mark. Some would assign to it the peculiar material of Matthew and Luke as well. It is an adjunct of the two-document hypothesis, which formerly explained the resemblances of Matthew and Luke by the use of Mark and the Logia of Matthew, but now explains them by the use of Mark and Q. See logia. E.J.G.

Qadarites: (From Arabic qadar, power) The Moslem name for those who believe that man has freedom and power to act independently, not subject in all things to the absolute predestination of God. This view was also held by the Mutazilites. P.E.J.

qadi: A Moslem official appointed to decide religious duties and interpret laws such as inheritance and marriage. P.E.J.

Qarmatians: See Ismailis. P.E.J.

Quadragesima: (Lat., fortieth. Cf. Fr. carême) The official Roman Catholic term for the Lenten season of forty days from Ash Wednesday* to the eve of Easter. See church year cycle; Lent P.V.N.

Quadratus: A Christian apologist* of the early 2nd century whose "Apology," now lost, was presented to Hadrian at Athens in A.D. 125 or 129. S.M.G.

Quakers: According to the Journal of George Fox* (Cent. Ed., I 4) it "was Justice Gervase Bennett of Derby that first called us Quakers because we bid him tremble at the word of God, and this was in the year 1650." The name, first used in scorn, at once became popular. The proper name of Quakers is the Religious Society of Friends. See Society of Friends. Also see Lee, Mother Ann. W.W.C.

Quartodecimans: (Lat., adherents of the fourteenth) A name given by the later Church to Christians in the 2nd century, chiefly in Asia Minor, who held that Easter* should be observed on the day of the Jewish Passover* celebration, the 14th day of the moon following the vernal equinox, whatever day of the week that might be. S.M.G.

Quesnel, Pasquier : (1634-1719) French religious writer, b Paris, d. Amsterdam. After joining the Congregation of the Oratory*, his writings fell under the condemnation of Clement XI because of their strong impregnation with the doctrines of Baius and the Jansenists. Expelled from the Congregation of the Oratory in 1864, Quesnel published numerous works in Belgium under assumed names. Arrested in 1703, he fled to Holland where he continued his work. He sought and received reconciliation with the Roman Catholic Church before his death. See Unigenitus (Bull of 1713). J.F.T

Quetzalcoatl: (Aztec) Wind god, creator o men, god of the waning moon, 'feathered snake god, counterpart of the god Tezcatlipoca*. F.L.F

Quicun(m)que: (Athanasian Creed*) A cree which contains in short definite affirmations an negations the Catholic teaching on the Trinity an the Incarnation. Erroneously attributed to S Athanasius* of Alexandria, the creed was con posed at a later period and originally in Lati Various authors have been suggested. It w first cited by Caesarius of Arles*. See creeds Christendom. E.A.

quidditas: Scholastic term, synonymous with t word "essence". Quidditas is derived from t Latin form of the Aristotelian definition of (sence "To ti en einai", "quod quid est". Qu dity is that by which a thing is what it is, bc logically and ontologically. In the first ca quiddity gives us the logical definition of a thin in the second, its physical essence. S.C

Quietism: A 17th century group of mystics wh held to a pessimistic doctrine of human nat and the correlative doctrine of the need for ι the fact of divine initiative in man's salvati God may act on man only as he surrenders h self utterly. Pure faith is beyond ideas and liefs; pure love is without a love of any part lar thing but a love for love's sake. Abso calm unmixed with self ambition is the true receptive mind for divine grace   Rufus Jones calls this movement "the most acute stage of European mysticism"   Among the conspicuous representatives were· Molinos, Michel, Guyon, Madame, Fénelon, and Bourignon, Mme. Antoinette.   V F

Quillian Lectureship, The: Established at Emory University, Georgia, in 1897 by the Rev. W F. Quillian. The capital sum is about $7,500. The lecturers are free to choose their topics "within the range of apologetical, doctrinal, exegetical, pastoral, or historical theological subjects." The course is given annually. A few of the lecturers: Bishop Charles B. Galloway, Dr. H. F. Rall, Dr. Ralph W. Sockman, Dr. Edwin Lewis and Dr. Y. C. Yang.

(Data from the office of the Dean of Candler School of Theology.)   V.F.

Quimby, Phineas P.: See New Thought movement. Also see Christian Science.

Quinisext Council: See Constantinople, Councils of.

Quinquagesima: The first Sunday before Lent or the seventh before Easter.   See church-year cycle.   E.R.H.

Quran: See Koran.   P.E.J.

Qutb: (Arabic) In Islam, leading saint; prominent spiritual being with a special abode or abodes and special activities among men on earth, has ability, under Allah, to do unusual things.
      F.L.P

R

R: See redaction.

rabbi: The Hebrew for master which became a title of ordination for authoritative teachers of Judaism in the period after the destruction of the Temple in 70 C.E.   B.Z.B.

rabbinism: (Rabbinic Judaism) (Hebrew rab, or rabbi -master) The religious discipline by which the teachers of post-Biblical (O.T.) Judaism implemented Biblical (O.T.) religion to the needs of their day. Cf. Akiba, Hillel; midrash, Mishnah, Talmud.   B.Z.B.

racial psychology: See anthropology; culture epochs.

Radbertus, Paschasius: (?-died after 856) Abbot of Corbie, 842-852. The most learned Frankish theologian of the century. His famous work, De corpore et sanguine Domini, the first devoted exclusively to that subject, clarified the doctrine of transubstantiation* as a miracle produced by the words of consecration. His formulation eventually became the dogma of the church, though meeting with the instant protest of contemporaries, Rabanus Maurus, John Scotus Eriugena, and especially a fellow monk, Ratramnus.   A.C.

ragnarok: (Teut.) In the Teutonic cosmogony, the end of the present condition of the world, marked by a struggle between the gods and the giants, and the overthrow of evil, to be followed by a new age of righteousness in a new earth.   F L.P.

Raikes Sunday School in America: See Sunday School movement in the United States.

Rainy, Robert: (1826-1906) Ordained minister in the Free Church of Scotland, 1851; became Professor of Church History in the New College, Edinburgh, 1863, and Principal in 1874. He was the outstanding churchman in his denomination, swaying its General Assemblies by his superb oratory, and leading it by word and pen toward greater openness of mind and to union with as United Presbyterian Church*. His best books were The Delivery and Devel... Christian Doctrine (1874) and The ...was the most olic Church (1902). See Carnegie philosophy and Life of Rainy.   A.C.   the last quarter of rākshas: Demons in Hinduism*. In Rigved: VII, 104, Indra is besought to destroy the rakshat or demons "that flourish in the dark". It i: Ravana the Raksha who in the Ramayana* ab ducts Sita and carries her away to his capital.

                    C.S.B

Ram Mohan Roy: (1772-1833) Best known a the founder of the Brahma Samaj* Ram Moha Roy is frequently called the father of New Indi and is sometimes credited with being the founde of the study of comparative religions Certain is that he was one of the earliest students of com parative religion having studied Islam, Hindt ism, and Christianity, all in the original lar guages. He was greatly influenced by Islat toward monotheism, and became a staunch theis His first book, written in Persian was definite deistic in tone. He thought that he found a bat for his theism in the Upanishads which he tran lated from the Sanskrit and published. Studyii the Bible he was greatly attracted by Jesus. F wrote in 1817 that he had "found the doctrines Christ more conducive to moral principles, a more adapted for the use of rational beings th any other which have come to my knowledge He recommended a book which he published, T Precepts of Jesus as "the guide to peace and h piness". He undertook to translate the gosp into Bengali, but this apparently was not co pleted He aided in the establishing of a Unitar mission in Calcutta, and at one time declared own religious position to be that of Unitar Christianity. In the Brahma Samaj which founded in 1828 he ma ...ous ...-id trous worship of ...ic (Braunsweig, 1894) liturgy from ...erer, "Die religionsphilosophische the ...ng von Rauwenhoff und Martineau", ...er f. protestantische Theologie (Braunsch 1890) vol XVI, R. Schultze, Kritik der Relig theorie Rauwenhoffs (Erlangen, 1898)

Re: (Egyptian) Sun god in the religion of priests of Heliopolis, in the Empire, there v fusion of Re with Amon, god of Thebe Amon-Re, a more powerful Amon which Egyptians against the foreigners.

real presence: The doctrine that Jesus Chr truly present in the Holy Eucharist*, unde Rāma, Ram: Hero of the Indian epic, the Rāmayana*. He became one of the chief avatars of Vishnu* and next to Krishna is the most popularly worshiped deity of the Vishnuite* sect. Like Krishna* he is a gracious savior deity to those who in loving trust (bhakti) yield themselves to him. See salvation, Hindu.   C.S B.

Ramadan: The ninth month of the year in the Moslem lunar calendar, during which the faithful keep a strict fast in the daylight hours. Only the sick and soldiers are exempt. By this observance the first revelation of the Koran* is commemorated. It has value only to those who perform it willingly, seeking reward from God alone. See fasting.   P.E.J.

Rāmakrishna: (1836-1886) A remarkable Indian mystic, who in the latter half of the 19th century attracted many disciples from all ranks of Hindu society and became the founder of the Ramakrishna mission, or as known in the west the Vedanta* Society. He is regarded as an incarnation of divinity and worshiped by his followers. He was a Hindu, but eclectic in his thought. He experimented with various faiths including Islam and Christianity and professed to arrive by all of them at Samadhi, the goal of God-consciousness. As a result, he taught as do his followers that all paths lead to God. It was Vivekānanda, a brilliant, highly educated, high caste follower who was the organizer of the movement and founder of the Vedanta societies in the western world

The Memoirs of Ramakrishna (Calcutta, 1939, Revision of the older Gospel of Ramakrishna, N Y., 1907) ; Max Muller, Ramakrishna, His Life and Sayings (1898) ; Romain Rolland, Prophets of the New India (1930)   C.S.B.

Rāmānanda: (b. 1299) Originally a Vishnuite of the same school of Ramanuja* with whose philosophy he was in agreement, he founded a new sect now called the Ramanandis, and indirectly exercised a profound influence over the whole subsequent religious life of Northern India. Both Kabir and Nanak, and much later the poet Tulasi Dasa, were deeply influenced by his spirit and teaching. His major emphases were upon bhakti or devotion to God (Rama*) and the brotherhood of the servants of God without respect to caste.   C.S.B.

like Shan-Sutras,

the presence of the Lord (Vishnu) when the bonds of rebirth are broken.   C.S.B.

Rāmāyana: The shorter of the two great epics of India. It tells the story of prince Rama* who, because of the intrigue of the jealous mother of a rival half-brother was exiled for fourteen years in the forest. Here Sita, his ever faithful wife was abducted by a wicked demon and carried away to Ceylon. Unable himself to find her he was aided in his search by his friend Hanuman, the monkey, who was successful in his search and after an epic struggle restored her to her husband. To prove her faithfulness she submitted to an ordeal, but refusing his later demand for a second test she disappeared into the earth in a furrow. Reputedly the epic is the work of the poet Valmiki, but to critical scholarship it shows the marks of multiple authorship. It has exerted an enormous influence on Indian life. Rama, Sita and Hanuman have long since become deified, Rama being one of the chief avatars of Vishnu* is an exceedingly popular object of devotion and worship.

Translated in part by Romesh Dutt, The Rāmāyana and Mahābharata (London, 1926). The entire poem is translated by Ralph T. H. Griffith, The Rāmāyana of Valmiki (London, 1870-1874), 5 volumes.   C.S.B.

Ramman: See Adad.

ransom theory: See atonement in Christianity; redemption, satisfaction.

Ranters, the: A nickname given to a rather chaotic and ill-defined seventeenth-century movement, antinomian*, spiritualistic, and individualistic, which sought to reproduce in England the principles and practices (especially the psychic phenomena) of the primitive church.   F.G.E.

Rappites: (Harmonists) See communistic settlements, religious.

Ras Shamra: See Ugaritic tablets.

Rashdall, Hastings: (1858-1924) British philosopher and theologian, best known for his Theory of Good and Evil (1907), in which in a position he named "Ideal Utilitarianism", he reconciled features taken from the Idealism of T. H. Green* with others taken from the Utilitarianism* of Henry Sidgwick*; e.g., he affirmed with the former the intrinsic value of character as an end in itself, and with the latter the evaluation of actions by their consequences. In metaphysics Rashdall was a Personal Idealist, and in theology he believed in a limited God.   W.K.W.

Rashi: Abbreviation of Rabbi Solomon Itzhaki (1040-1105), of Troyes, France, leading rabbinic* commentator of the Bible and most of the tractates of the Babylonian Talmud*.   S.S.C.

Rashnu: The Zoroastrian* spirit of truth (hence Razista, "truest"), who with Mithra and judges the departed, he weighs their balance; he is invoked at the per- ordeal; criminals cannot escape in his honor.   R.H.P.

Ratio Studiorum: (Ratio atque Institutio Studiorum Societatis Iesu, 1599) The educational code of the early Jesuits*. Based on a half century of experience, it also reflects some of the ideals and practices of the Dutch humanistic schools and of the University of Paris, and remained in force until 1773.   E.A.R.

rational psychology: See psychology, schools of.

rationalism: (Lat., ratio, reason) The doctrine of the supremacy of reason.

In philosophy, it means 1) the deductive (Cartesian, mathematical) method of drawing logical inferences from elementary concepts (intuitions, axioms, innate or apriori truths), as opposed to the empirical method, or 2) the doctrine (opposed to sensationalism) that reason is a higher source of knowledge, independent of sense (when Locke* said that "there is nothing in the intellect that was not first in sense," Leibniz* added "except the intellect itself"), or 3) the appeal to coherent thought (as opposed to irrationalism) as criterion of truth. Rationalism in all three senses has often been friendly to a spiritual and religious view of life, for example, Descartes, Leibniz, Hegel.

In theology, it means the theory that reason is the judge of all supposed revelations. It subordinates "dogmatic theology to the dictates of reason and conscience" (Lecky, History of Rationalism, I, 16). It assumes two forms, the first primarily anti-authoritarian, and often called liberalism or modernism (see liberal theology), the second, primarily anti-supernaturalistic, and tending toward humanism, free-thinking, and agnosticism. Failure to specify the exact meaning intended has led to many misunderstandings. See reason in religion.   E.S.B.

rationalism, ethical: 1) Moral principles can be apprehended by intuition and rational deduction, without need of empirical confirmation, or appeal to theological authority. In this sense, Spinoza, Kant, and Hegel are rationalists. 2) All systems, whether emphasizing reason or experience, which regard ethics as a science in its own right, independent of revelation and theology. In this sense, most non-Catholic moral philosophers since Shaftesbury have been rationalists. Catholic writers believe that a large portion of morality can thus be treated and so come under Moral Philosophy, but that this subject must be subordinated to Moral Theology.   W.K.W.

Ratramnus: (fl. ca. 850) Gottschalk's* friend. Charles the Bald, to whom Radbertus* dedicated his work, requested Ratramnus' opinion. Rejecting Radbertus' literalistic interpretation, Ratramnus explained the Eucharist as a mystery, with a great difference between Christ's body and the Host, which was a figure of believers as well as of Christ.   A.C.

Rauh, Frederic: (1861-1909) He was the most interesting representative of moral philosophy and psychology in France during the last quarter of the 19th century. Having radically broken with the metaphysical and religious enthusiasm of his earlier years, the experimental science of the laboratory was for him the model of the moralist. He defended with great energy the rights of the individual against society, the rights of personal character and of the creator of morality.

Essai sur le fondement métaphysique de la morale (Paris, 1890), De la méthode dans la psychologie de sentiments (Paris, 1899), Psychologie appliquée a la morale et l'éducation (Paris, 1900); De l'experience morale (Paris, 1903).   H.H.

Rauschenbusch, Walter: (1861-1918) Studied in Germany, at University of Rochester and Rochester Theological Seminary. Pastor Second German Baptist Church, New York City, 1886-1897. Editor Jugend Herold, 1892-1896. Translator of Gospel Hymns into German. Author of Leben Jesu (1895) and three other books in German. Taught at German Baptist Theological Seminary, 1897-1902. Professor Church History at Rochester Theological Seminary, 1903-1918. Lecturer on various American foundations. Author of Christianity and the Social Crisis (1907); Christianizing the Social Order (1912), and a Theology for the Social Gospel (1917). See social gospel.   C.H.M.

Rauschenbusch Memorial Lectureship, The: Founded in memory of Walter Rauschenbusch* in 1929 through an initial gift of $10,000 by Mrs. Edmund Lyon of Rochester, N. Y. and subsequent gifts by Alumni and friends of the Colgate-Rochester Divinity School. The general field of the lectureship is Christianity in its social expression and application. Four lectures are given each year under the auspices of the Colgate-Rochester Divinity School and are subsequently published in enlarged form. The Revd Justin Wroe Nixon of the Brick Presbyterian Church, Rochester, N. Y. inaugurated the series in 1931, speaking upon, The Moral Crisis in Christianity.   C H.M.

Rauwenhoff, Ludwig Wilhelm Ernst: (1828-1889) Professor at the University of Leyden. The supersensible is not a subject of science; but faith in it is a postulate of the practical law in us. Religion does not consist in the mere conviction of the existence of a higher power, but is the consciousness of a personal relation to this power. The essence of religion is the feeling of respect or esteem. The religious ideas about God are inventions or fabrications of creative phantasy.

Religionsphilosophie (Braunschweig, 1894) 2nd ed, O Pfleiderer, "Die religionsphilosophische Weltanschauung von Rauwenhoff und Martineau", Jahrbücher f. protestantische Theologie (Braunschweig, 1890) vol XVI, R Schultze, Kritik der Religionstheorie Rauwenhoffs (Erlangen, 1898).   H.H.

Re: (Egyptian) Sun god in the religion of the priests of Heliopolis, in the Empire, there was a fusion of Re with Amon, god of Thebes, as Amon-Re, a more powerful Amon which led Egyptians against the foreigners.   F.L.P.

real presence: The doctrine that Jesus Christ is truly present in the Holy Eucharist*, under the sacramental species of bread and wine. The view is held with certain differences by Eastern Orthodox, Roman Catholic, Anglican and Lutheran communions.

The Eastern Churches do not closely define the mode of the presence, but speak of it as real, and secured by "metabolism" of some type In the Roman Church, the doctrine of transubstantiation" is held; in Lutheran circles, consubstantiation* is held (see Lutheran doctrine of the Lord's Supper). The Anglican Church like the Eastern does not define the method of presence, but asserts it to be "spiritual" but real.

In classical Catholic theology, the term is used with two significations. praesentia realis and praesentia rei. The former indicates a true or genuine presence of Jesus Christ, body and soul, God and man, in the elements, the latter, that the presence is of the thing (namely, the body and blood of Christ), thereby distinguishing the Eucharistic sacrament from other sacraments which possess matter, form, intention, minister and benefit, but not the res sacramenti (which is the body and blood of Christ).

In recent years, Anglican theologians particularly have endeavoured to re-state the doctrine of the real presence, typical examples are W. Spens and A. E. Taylor in The Eucharist (London, 1930); and O. C. Quick, The Christian Sacraments (London, 1934). See impanation, Lord's supper, remanence. Cf. Corpus Christi.   w.n.p.

realism: (Lat., res, thing, realis, real) 1) In epistemology*, the theory that the objects of knowledge exist outside the mind and independently of it. Realism is thus opposed to and by modern, subjective idealism, solipsism, etc. However the ultra-realism or extreme realism of Plato* and his followers is similar to objective idealism or absolutism.   For such ultra-realists, universals, i.e., abstract ideas or concepts have an existence outside the mind, as universals. (See universals, battle over.) The first definition above describes the position of Aristotle, Aquinas and perhaps the majority of the philosophers. It is sometimes designated moderate realism.

A distinction is made between direct or presentative realism and indirect or representative realism.   According to the latter, the mind knows objective reality or things only through the intermediacy or agency of some representation, picture or symbol.   This view requires the invocation of the principle of causality to escape subjectivism or idealism.

Two American schools of realism appeared in the twentieth century with the labels Neo-realism* and Critical Realism*.

2) In social philosophy, realism signifies a practical point of view in contradistinction to a visionary, utopian outlook.

Realism is frequently though not necessarily associated with a materialistic metaphysic and with a scientific or empiricistic attitude. See nominalism; conceptualism.   d.c.o'g.

realism, epistemological: See epistemology.

realism, moral: The view that at least the highest moral standards, ideals, or values, like love and justice, are objectively valid and independent of human knowledge or realization, though man has an affinity for them. The moral standard is nowhere to be found in natural processes and cannot be derived by empirical generalization from human experience   Such realism is the nerve of the moral argument for God as found in thinkers like J. Martineau, A. S. Pringle-Pattison, H. Rashdall, A. E. Taylor, and W. R. Sorley.

Moral realism in essence simply asserts a transcendental realm of values complementary to and worthy of existential realization. The exact status of the real (e.g., subsistence, or existence in God) is an additional problem. Moral realism is usually accompanied by epistemological realism which claims direct, unmediated knowledge of moral values independent of the knower. See God (moral argument).   p.a.b.

reality: (Med. Lat., realitas, thinghood, from Lat. res, thing) 1) Thinghood, the essence of a thing or an existent, as such. 2) Empirical reality, any item or organization of experience, usually referred to organized sense experience (it is a Kantian category), but often applied to other experiences, such as the moral and religious. 3) Metaphysical (or ontological) reality the permanent, ultimate, objective source of experience, whether conceived as first cause (scholasticism), or productive activity (Berkeley, Leibniz, Lotze, Bowne, Bergson), or any set of entities and principles which explain the ongoing of the universe (Whitehead) 4) As viewed by Hegel* and many other idealists, reality is the total object to which thought refers; in this sense, reality is what we think about when we think adequately (coherently).   e.s.b.

reason in religion: There have been three main views among Christians regarding the relations of reason and religion. 1) They are in complete harmony, their content is identical. Reason sets forth logically what religion feels and practices, Justin Martyr, John Scotus Eriugena, and Hegel defend this position from different points of view. 2) They are consistent, but religion (faith, Biblical revelation) transcends reason without contradicting it.   This is the view of St. Thomas Aquinas, John Locke, and most moderate conservatives. 3) They are, at least partially, in conflict. The so-called doctrine of the double truth* (the acceptance of which by anyone is questioned by Gilson) arises from this conflict. Those who hold this view declare that every proposition of reason and of faith must be accepted as true, each in its own realm, regardless of contradictions between them. Tertullian (credo quia absurdum, I believe because it is absurd), Averroës, Duns Scotus, William of Occam (what is philosophically true may be theologically false), Martin Luther, and Thomas Hobbes, all inclined to this view. It was often sustained sincerely in order to exalt the transcendent otherness of God (totaliter aliter, totally other); sometimes cynically, as by P.

Bayle*, who, tongue in cheek, wrote in his Dictionary that the more irrational the truths of faith, the more meritorious it is to believe them.

The conflict between reason and religion, fateful as its consequences have been, is far from being settled. In the gospels there is hardly any trace of it. Jesus make his appeal to experience, both inner (the Beatitudes) and outer ("by their fruits"), and also to reason in the sense of logical thought ("Why even of yourselves judge ye not what is right?" Lk. 12 57). Nowhere does he suggest that his gospel conflicts with reason. Paul*, after his great psalm on love (I Cor. 13), writes a psalm on reason (I Cor. 14) "I will pray with the spirit, and I will pray with the understanding also . . . I had rather speak five words with my understanding . . . than ten thousand words in an unknown tongue" When in Col. 2 8 Paul coupled philosophy with vain deceit, he does not repudiate reason but simply attacks the esoteric "philosophy" of the Essenes*. Nevertheless, this passage, with I Cor. 1 22-23, encouraged Tertullian and others to stigmatize all philosophy as a source of heresy, although the Alexandrians (Clement, Origen) viewed Greek philosophy as a preparation for the gospel. St. Thomas accepted Aristotle as "the philosopher" and supplemented reason (Aristotle) with revelation (Scripture), which added to reason without contradicting it

During the Enlightenment*, abstract reason crowded out revelation and vital religion, until the revivals of J. Wesley and J. Edwards. In the nineteenth century, Hegel held that religion and philosophy set forth the same truth from different points of view. Kierkegaard* protested against reason and systematization in religion in favor of the subjective, the individual, and the "existential." The rise of romanticism, Nietzsche's irrationalism, and recent neosupernaturalism among men like Karl Barth, Emil Brunner, and Reinhold Niebuhr, have challenged the rights of reason in religion. The cause of reason has been defended in various ways by philosophers of religion and theologians like H. Rashdall, W. R. Sorley, A S Pringle-Pattison, and F. R Tennant in Great Britain, and by W. E Hocking, A. C. Knudson, J. S. Bixler, W. M. Urban, H. N. Wieman, E W Lyman, John Bennett, and others in America. The philosophy of instrumentalism (John Dewey) rejects both the claims of revelation and the usual conception of reason.

Grounds for disparagement of reason in religion are: 1) the need for simplicity and universal appeal (to "the serving-maids of Ephesus," Harnack*), as against the technical and aristocratic nature of philosophy, 2) the need for fixed authority in the church for disciplinary purposes; 3) the need for Christian unity as against the diversity of philosophies; 4) the claims of divine revelation as against the supposed pride of reason (R. Niebuhr), 5) the impossibility of attaining complete rationality (rational investigation an "infinite task", Kant), 6) the conviction that mystery and irrationality (the "numinous,"* R. Otto*) are marks of the divine.

In support of the place of reason in religion are the following considerations. 1) God is truth, and reason is unbiassed search for truth, 2) truth cannot be self-contradictory or incoherent, 3) there is no way to test rival revelation-claims, within or without the Bible, other than appeal to reason, 4) blind, unreasoning faith is a violation of the integrity of personality, 5) reason and faith need each other ("there is no knowledge without faith nor faith without knowledge," Clem. Alex., Strom., II, 373), 6) reason is a humble search for truth, not proud self-assertion, 7) reason always deals with experienced revelations of reality which reason alone could not create; 8) the inexhaustibility of the task of reason is in harmony with faith in immortality and with the kinship of the soul with God, 9) it is not reasonable for God or man to expect any individual to penetrate further into philosophy than he is able—but reason should be followed to the extent of one's ability, 10) without some true ideas, there can be neither ethics nor religion.

See faith, liberal theology; philosophy of religion, rationalism, revelation recapitulation: 1) (In theology) The doctrine of Irenaeus*, a second-century churchman, that Christ went through (recapitulated) the successive stages of human life, from infancy onwards, becoming what we are "that He might make us completely what He is."

See E Gilson, Reason and Revelation in the Middle Ages (1938), J S Bixler, Religion for Free Minds (1939), H R Mackintosh, Types of Modern Theology (1937), A C Knudson, The Validity of Religious Experience (1937), E. S Brightman, A Philosophy of Religion (1940) Art, "Philosophy" in Smith's Dictionary of the Bible   E.S B.

2) (In education) The theory that the individual human organism repeats in its own growth the successive stages of the race's development. See culture epochs, psychology of religion.   F.G.E.

receptionism: See Lord's supper.

Rechabites: An ascetic group in Judaism, traditionally regarded as descendants of Jonadab, son of Rechab, they abstained from the use of wine, from building or living in permanent houses, and from cultivating the ground—apparently as a protest against the settled life of Israel after the conquest of Canaan. They are described in Jer 35. 1-19. See asceticism, temperance movement.   M.S.E.

recluse: A popular term for one withdrawing from the world, especially for the purpose of more complete, religious dedication. It is correctly used in the technical sense when applied to hermits*, particularly monks and nuns who are privileged by their bishops to undertake permanent seclusion in their cells. See anchorite; asceticism; monasticism.   R.C.P.

reconciliation: (katallasso, to reconcile, Rom. 5· 10, I Cor 7 11, 2 Cor. 5: 18, 19, 20, katallage, reconciliation, Rom. 5 11; 11· 15, 2 Cor. 5 18, 19) Reconciliation in its general meaning is the effecting or restoration of unity or harmony where harmony ought to be, but where estrangement or conflict is the present fact. The connection in Christian theology is with the inner estrangement depicted in Rom. 7 14-25, or the separation of men from God on account of sin. Reconciliation is the abolishing of this separation. A major issue is that of the relation of reconciliation to the work of Christ. It can be held that as man by his sinful disobedience severed himself from God, so Christ by His sinless life and perfect obedience unto death healed the breach or paved the way for man's restoration. Or it is nearer to the Church's general belief to say that on the Cross Christ met the full onset of God's reaction against sin and broke the entail of sin in the life of man. For those who accept the deliverance thus wrought, the barrier between man and God is removed. The question comes whether reconciliation is from man's side only; our fathers used to sing, My God is reconciled. The more modern view is thought to have sanction in Paul's words in 2 Cor. 5 19; the reconciling work of Christ was equally the work of God. Yet the revival by Aulen and others of the Patristic or "Classical" doctrine of the Atonement*, and deeper reflection on what sin means to God and His judgment upon it, are today making us ask again if it is not necessary for the full meaning of Redemption* that God be both Reconciler and Reconciled. Reconciliation is variously related to Forgiveness and Regeneration, perhaps it is conceived most simply as the relationship to God with resultant inner peace which these others create and establish. Many theologians distinguish Reconciliation from Redemption, as the condition we may enter upon here from that the fulness of which we can only hope for and await while in the present life. See salvation; wrath of God.

J. Denney, The Christian Doctrine of Reconciliation (1917); G Aulen, Chrsstus Victor (1937); Vincent Taylor, Forgiveness and Reconciliation (1941).   J.L. reconciliation: (cancellation of interdict, etc.) 1) An episcopal act by which the ecclesiastical censure of interdict is removed from one or more members of the Roman Catholic Church, permitting them to participate in certain liturgical functions, and to receive or administer certain of the sacraments previously denied them because of violations of church law.

2) Reconciliation of penitents: A Roman Catholic practice in usage up to the thirteenth century by which public sinners who had been expelled from the church on Ash Wednesday were reinstated on Maundy Thursday.

3) Reconciliation of a church: The blessing by which a Roman Catholic church that has undergone violation (e.g., impious or sordid uses, homicide in the body of the building) is restored as a sanctified place of worship. If the church was consecrated it must be reconciled by a bishop or his deputy; if blessed only, by a priest.   J.F.T.

rector: The incumbent of the benefice of the parish, possessing all the original rights and endowments, he is, as the parson (persona ecclesiae), a 'corporation sole' inasmuch as he represents in his own person the invisible Church in the parish. The vicar* is, theoretically his deputy and locum tenens. The origin of the distinction goes back to the time when monasteries took over the tithes of the parish and put in a monk as vicarius. At the Reformation, monastic lands given to laymen carried with them the rector's rights, hence the 'lay rector' of a parish governed by a vicar.

                                      F.W.B.

recusant: One who from his allegiance to the Pope refuses (Lat. recusat) to submit to the Act of Uniformity* (under Edward VI and Elizabeth) and to take the oath of allegiance to the monarch as supreme head (or governor) of the Church of England; or to attend the services at his parish church.   F.W.B.

Red Cross: A national and international social service agency originally organized to care for the sick and wounded in the armies in time of war. But as the military forces developed adequate medical corps and the character of warfare changed, the Red Cross extended its activities to assistance to the families of soldiers at home, to services for prisoners of war, to the establishment of bureaus of information, and to relief to bombed out and evacuated populations. Since 1919 it has shown a world-wide tendency to regard the alleviation of human suffering, especially when it assumes a wide-spread, sudden, epidemic, or catastrophic form as within its field. It has thus become the most extensive and popular of all voluntary social service agencies. In 1940 there were 63 officially recognized national societies with over 20,000,000 members. In Mohammedan lands, Turkey, Egypt, and parts of Russia the Red Crescent has been substituted for the Red Cross, while in Persia it operates under the symbol of the Red Lion and Sun.

Meager medical and sanitary services had long been provided by the military authorities but for the most part these provisions were regarded as a part of the military establishment and the legitimate target of the enemy. Public opinion had been awakened to these conditions by the work of Florence Nightingale (1820-1910) in the Crimean War in 1854, and Clara Barton (1821-1912) in the American Civil War, but the movement took organized form as the result of the agitation begun by the Swiss philanthropist, Jean Henri Dunant.

Dunant had been present at the battle of Solferino on June 24, 1859, and had witnessed the unnecessary suffering due to the inability of the regular surgical staff to care for the thousands of wounded upon the field. Three years later he published a widely read book, Un souvenir de Solferino in which he proposed the organization of societies in each country which should train nurses and collect supplies in times of peace which might supplement the regular military medical corps in case of war. A conference of representatives of 16 European states, held at Geneva in 1863, led in the following year to the convocation by the Swiss government of a diplomatic conference which signed the Geneva Convention by which the participating states agreed to sanction the formation of relief societies, to recognize the neutrality of wounded men and of all personnel and equipment employed in their relief, and to respect the red cross on a white ground as the emblem officially designating such services. The Hague conferences in 1899 and 1907 extended to naval warfare the Geneva Convention of 1864 and the revised convention of 1906.

The organization of the international movement is highly decentralized. The International Red Cross Committee, a self-perpetuating group of 25 members, all Swiss citizens, assisted by a secretarial and special delegations, sits at Geneva, but has no governing functions. Its objects are to extend the Red Cross movement, to act as guardian of its basic principles, to maintain contact between the national societies and to assist them in coordinating their activities, to secure the observance by all nations of the Geneva Convention, and to denounce such violations as may occur, and in time of war, to create international agencies for the assistance of prisoners and other war victims, to visit prisoners' camps, and to better their situation by the use of all available influence.

Each national society is completely autonomous. It must, however, have a central committee which represents it in all international relations, and it must have been recognized as an auxiliary to the army medical services by a government adhering to the Geneva Convention. Membership must be open to all nationals irrespective of sex, religion, or political opinion. It must serve the entire national area and embrace all appropriate aspects of the medical military services. Funds for their support are in most countries derived from membership fees supplemented by special drives for private subscriptions in times of emergency.

After World War I a need was felt for a representative and effective medium through which to develop and intensify the humanitarian activities of the Red Cross in peace time. The result was the organization of the League of Red Cross Societies in 1919. It is administered by an international secretariat under the supervision of the chairman of a board of governors composed of one representative of each member society. In addition to the general branches of the office of the secretary-general, it comprises technical divisions on disaster relief, health (with special emphasis on educational and preventive activities), nursing, Junior Red Cross, and emigration.

The Junior Red Cross is a relatively new department of work. It was the outgrowth of the participation of children in work for wounded soldiers during World War I, which was later developed on a gigantic scale by the American Red Cross after the United States became a belligerent power. Its unique possibilities for self-education of children in health and civic ideals was recognized by educators. After preliminary experimentation, it was adopted as an integral part of the League's program in 1922, when its purposes were defined as "to inculcate in children the ideal of peace and the practice of service, especially in relation to the care of their own health and that of others, the understanding and acceptance of civic responsibility, and the cultivation and maintenance of a spirit of friendly helpfulness towards other children in all countries." Most of the national societies now have regular provisions for children's membership.

America, preoccupied with the Civil War and Reconstruction and impeded by official apathy, did not adhere to the Geneva Convention until 1882, becoming the thirty-second nation to ratify In 1905 the Red Cross was organized as a quasi-governmental body, with the President of the United States as president and the War Department as auditor. The government of the agency was vested in a central committee of 18 members, six of whom are appointed by the President Its greatest period of expansion came during 1914-18, when nearly $400,000,000 were expended in various war activities. At the close of the war it continued its relief work in destitute countries abroad, and provided for disabled veterans and ex-servicemen and enlarged the scope of its civilian services at home. It now provides for the following divisions of service Civilian Relief, Disaster Relief, First Aid and Life Saving, Home and Farm Accident Prevention, Home Hygiene and Care of the Sick, Junior Red Cross, Nursing, Nutrition, Public Health Nursing, Volunteer, and War.

James Magill, The Red Cross the Idea and Its Development (London, 1926); Martin Gumpert, Dunant The Story of the Red Cross (1938), W. E Barton, The Life of Clara Barton (1922).

H.E.J.

redaction: O.T. books show a great deal of editorial activity, called redaction (esp. in the case of the fusion of the originally separate pentateuchal sources). The Redactor (often abbreviated to R) is a hypothetical but necessary factor of O.T. criticism. Most of the redactional activity took place in post exilic* times.   E G.K.

redemption: (Gr., agorazō; lutroō to redeem) Redemption as a religious principle belongs to religion in its highest forms. Religions have been classified as religions of nature, religions of law, religions of redemption. Religions of the third category as against the second regard man as needing something more than to be enlightened as to the divine requirement by some law or code; he is already enmeshed in evil or spiritual ruin and needs to be extricated or delivered. Buddhism* is a religion of redemption. It sees man tied to the wheel of karma* and sequent re-births, a condition that through his insatiable cravings can only mean recurrent evil and misery. The cause of the cycle of re-births is the good or evil activity which, occurring in one existence, can have its merited requital only in another. Redemption or salvation* lies in subjugating the desire that leads to this activity. It is from personal existence and its pain that the Buddhist is redeemed.

The religion of redemption par excellence is Christianity*. Its ideal of redemption is not that of Buddhism, but bears the marks of Christianity's Hebraic origin and background. There is much about redeeming in the O.T.: the word is used of money payments for the recovery of property (Lev. 25 25ff); for the redemption of the firstborn (Num. 3 44-51); for the release of persons from slavery (Ex. 21· 7, 8; Lev. 25: 47ff). The idea of buying back with money passes into the general meaning of to reclaim or save from evil or calamity, whatever means be used. Redemption is especially associated with great national deliverances, such as from Egypt (Deut. 7 8); and from Babylon (Isa. 62 12, 63: 4). God is the 'Redeemer' of His people, especially in Second Isaiah (e.g, 41. 14). The idea of redemption from sin occurs specifically in Ps. 130, 8. The word 'redeemer' (goel) has the force of vindicator in some passages, notably Job. 19. 25.

In the N.T., redemption (lutrosis, apolutrosis, derivatives of agorazō also used) fills a large place, the teaching concerning it is a rich, deep vein of N.T. truth. It sums up God's work in Christ in behalf of men. The figure of buying back re-appears, Christ's life being the ransom price (lutron. Mk. 10 45); His blood that with which we have been bought (1 Pet 1: 18, 19, cf. I Cor. 6. 20), the believer's final portion a "purchased possession" (Eph. 1: 14). But the idea broadens again to that of full deliverance as a gift of grace*. Redemption is especially through Christ's sacrificial* death, as above and further in Heb. 9: 15; Eph.. 1: 7, Rom. 3· 24, 25). It is redemption from sin emphatically and is associated with forgiveness* (Eph. 1 7, Col. 1: 14, Tit. 2: 14). But there is a wider connotation recalling Israel's Messianic* redemption which would be communal and bring emancipation from evil in all forms (Lk. 1. 68ff; 2: 38). So the Church looks for the 'Day of Redemption' (Eph. 4· 30), when God will gather His redeemed people (Lk. 21 28) and His whole creation will be purged and healed (Rom. 8 19-23, Rev. 21. 1-4, 22· 1-3), to the Parousia* and final consummation when God, having vanquished all His and man's enemies, will resume full dominion and be all in all (I Cor. 15: 24-28).

The doctrine of redemption is a prime ingredient in the theology of the Church. It is found at all periods both in its cruder and profounder forms; the former when the 'ransom' is taken literally and the question becomes, To whom was the price paid? Patristic theology regarded it as paid to the devil who held man captive, later 'commercial' and other views saw it as compensatory payment to God whom man's sin had robbed of His just due. But with such notions there has always gone higher teaching; all theories, commercial, satisfaction, governmental et al, have enshrined some truth which, rather than their crudities, explains their hold on the Church. This truth—the true meaning of redemption—is that Christianity is not a legal cult or a goal set before man with promise of highest rewards to him who achieves it. Rather it reveals man's good as something beyond his power to attain, but secured for him, purchased at uttermost cost, and now freely offered. Man is not called to earn salvation by arduous duty, all things are his through what God has done and given. It is for man in penitence to turn to God and receive His gift, then follows duty, service to God and man, not as condition of the gift, but as glad response for God's bestowal of it.

The N.T. redemption is the hope of the world. It is the assurance* that God decrees the total destruction of evil and man's freedom from it, not least in those forms of tyranny and injustice, inner and outer spiritual bondage, against which man today rebels. It is an assurance most precious as man discovers how little he can do of himself, and it cannot fail for those who in faith and life are joined to the purpose of God. See atonement, satisfaction.

A G Hogg, Redemption from this World (1922), A C Knudson, The Doctrine of Redemption (1933); H W. Robinson, Redemption and Revelation (1942), R Niebuhr, The Nature and Destiny of Man, II Human Destiny (1943).   J.L.

Redemptoristines: A Roman Catholic Congregation of contemplative nuns founded in 1731 with the aid of St Alphonsus Liguori*. It had in 1936 about 800 members in twenty-seven convents.   E.A.R.

Redemptorists: The Roman Catholic Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer was founded in 1732 by St. Alphonsus Liguori* at Scala near Amalfi in Italy. Its primary object is the sanctification of its members by the imitation of Jesus Christ. The secondary purpose is the preaching of the word of God to the people, and especially to the poor and abandoned. The Congregation has spread throughout the world and numbered 6,663 members in 1936.   E.A.R.

reductions: (In Spanish reducciónes, after 1654 doctrinas) Theocratic, communal mission villages of converted Indians under the direction of missionaries in the Spanish American colonies. The suppression of the Society of Jesus* (1773) and the development of the South American states led to their destruction.   E.A.R.

Reform Judaism: See Judaism, Reform.

Reformation: The movement which was initiated by Martin Luther* in 1517 and resulted in the rise and establishment of Protestant churches apart from Roman Catholicism is generally called the Reformation. The term "reformation" was frequently used in the later Middle Ages by individuals and groups who demanded a reform of the church "in head and members" as a protest against the secularization of Christianity and the abuses of power and privilege which had grown general especially among the clergy, from the popes down to the common priests. The "Reformation" allied itself with these tendencies of reform, but it did not spring from them.

The origins of the Reformation lie primarily in the religion of Luther. In the course of his inner development he was led to rediscover the N.T. faith of salvation* by grace*. Henceforth, the meaning of the Christian gospel was for him identical with the teaching implied in the Pauline teaching of the justification* by faith and not by works. He was convinced that his religion was in agreement with the teaching of the Bible which he read in the light of Paulinism and that it was confirmed by the central doctrines of the Fathers, especially Augustine*, and by the writings of some medieval thinkers, particularly Bernard of Clairvaux* and the German mystics such as Tauler* and the author of the "German Theology". His thinking was determined by the monastic discipline which he received among the Augustinian Friars, the Occamist theology which he learned among them, and his appointment to the chair of Biblical Theology at the University of Wittenberg. When he posted 95 theses against the prevailing practice of selling indulgences on the door of the castle church of Wittenberg on October 31, 1517, he did not intend to inaugurate a reformation, but merely to effect a clarification of the church's teaching. However, the theses were received with unexpected acclaim because they were read as an expression of a fresh Christian voice speaking for the renewal of Christianity. When spokesmen of the Roman church accused Luther of heresy and when the papal Curia opened an ecclesiastical trial against him, he refused to recant his convictions. Believing that they rested on the authority of the Word of God*, he defended himself in writings which, as the years went on, became more and more saturated with criticisms of the Roman church as they had been voiced in the past and as they were current among the people of his own time. Then it became evident that Luther's creative religious genius was to be the exponent and perfecter of the long latent desire for a reformation of the church. Supported by an ever increasing following recruited from the ranks of princes and patricians, noblemen, towns-people and peasants, churchmen and monks, humanistic scholars and patriots, he brought to a fruition their hopes for a break-up of the power which Roman Catholic institutionalism held over them. Thus Luther's cause became that of a popular movement which spread rapidly throughout Germany and soon all over Europe.

While he never surrendered the conviction that he had been divinely called to make room in the world for the saving gospel of Christ and refused to become a political and social reformer, he was regarded by the Germans as a national hero and as such a leader of a movement much broader than that of a merely religious and ecclesiastical reform. He and his followers availed themselves of the new means of communication which the recent invention of the printing press had made possible. Their books and pamphlets spread rapidly all over the European world. They used the historical criticism and understanding of Christian history and institutions which the scholars of Humanism*, especially Erasmus* of Rotterdam, had accomplished. They availed themselves of the teachings of the so-called pre-reformers, particularly of Huss, Wyclif and the Brethren of the Common Life. They adopted as their own many of the attacks against the papacy and the higher clergy, against the political and social-economic practices of the Roman church that had been the subject of many complaints (gravamina), particularly on the part of the German nation. In part consciously but mostly unconsciously they employed for themselves the sentiments of a growing nationalism and the spirit of a new civilization which, since the beginnings of the Renaissance*, had made themselves felt all over the European world They themselves tremendously furthered these new cultural trends when, under the leadership of Luther, they rejected the medieval principle of the domination of the state by the church, declared asceticism and the distinction between the "religious" and the "secular" as invalid, and broke up the separation between the clergy and laity by claiming the universal priesthood of all believers. In accordance with these convictions, they accepted the protection which princes and magistrates extended to them. They even made the political leaders responsible for the reformation itself, declaring that upon the refusal of the regular bishops to effect a change they had to act as "emergency-bishops" and that as divinely instituted authorities they had to maintain law and order as the basis of the Christian life.

The development of the Reformation was decisively determined by political conditions as they prevailed not only in Germany, but also in Europe as a whole. Germany was divided in numerous large and small territories, which since the days of the Hohenstaufen had no longer been unified under a strong central imperial authority. When several of these territories under the leadership of the Elector of Saxony, Luther's prince, and the Margrave of Hesse effected an evangelical reformation of their churches, thereby establishing territorial churches the possibility for which had been formed in the 14th and 15th centuries by virtue of the decline of papal authority, no higher political or ecclesiastical power proved able to prevent such a development. Nor was it possible to prevent the politically autonomous cities, especially of Southern Germany, from effecting an ecclesiastical reformation.

The Emperor Charles V*, who had been elected in 1519, was a declared enemy of the Reformation. But as the head of the House of Habsburg, he was ruler not only of Germany but also of Spain and her newly won American colonies, of the Netherlands and Burgundy. He had claims upon Northern and Southern Italy——and by the marriage policy of his house, he was drawn into the affairs of practically every European state. Shortly after his assumption of the German throne, he was drawn into a war with his archenemy and rival, Francis I of France, about the issue of the control of Italy. The war kept him occupied almost throughout his reign. When the defense of Italy against France did not keep him busy, the affairs of his Spanish Kingdom and the necessity of protecting Europe from the rapidly rising power of the Turks demanded his attention. He was not only absent from Germany for long periods of time, but by his political entanglements he was unable to effect an execution of the Edict of Worms*, by which in 1520 he had outlawed the movement of Luther. He could thus not prevent the establishment of the Reformation churches in German territories. Nor could he hinder the expansion of the Reformation into Switzerland, East Prussia, Denmark, Sweden, England, all of whom separated from Rome in the twenties and thirties, or stop its appeal to Europeans everywhere. When, after many time-saving compromises with the German Reformation, he was finally, in 1546, ready to launch a war of annihilation against the "heretics", he succeeded in defeating them (1547) but was unable to crush them or to reap the fruits of his victory. He left the settlement of the religious controversy to his successor, his brother Ferdinand, in whose favor he abdicated as Emperor in order to retire to Spain. The peace of Augsburg* (1555) recognized the established evangelical territorial churches.

On account of the fact that the immediate object of Charles' dynastic imperialism was the control of Northern Italy, the popes were politically suspicious of him. Occasionally, they even favored his enemies, hoping thereby to protect the autonomy of the papal state as well as to preserve a balance of power within the European system of states. By these policies which prevented Charles from taking decisive steps against the Protestants* (this name was given to the German Lutherans at the diet of Spires* in 1529 after they had issued a "Protestation" in reaction against a vote of the diet's majority which had repealed the limited provisional liberties granted them in 1526) the popes themselves made the expansion of the Reformation possible and became its indirect allies.

The effects of the Reformation were determinative of the future of all Western. civilization. The movement which Luther had begun destroyed the universalism of the control of the Roman church over all spheres of life. This breakup of the unity of Christendom inaugurated a new cultural period. One is therefore justified to mark the beginning of modern civilization with the Protestant Reformation. While the reformers themselves continued to adhere to the medieval sociological principle of the corpus Christianum, according to which all life was to be regulated by the spirit of the Christian religion, their teaching on the distinction of the Church and the State and their frank anti-ascetic recognition of secular life as the place where every Christian is to realize the will of God laid the groundwork for the development of an autonomous secular civilization.

It was also significant for the future that the new churches of the Reformation were unable to achieve doctrinal or ecclesiastical unity. The Reformation produced not only several national and territorial churches, but also several types of Protestant Christianity. Lutheranism, Zwinglianism, Calvinism, Anglicanism, Socinianism, Anabaptist and Spiritualist Christianity represent the various types of Christianity which were the immediate result of Luther's attack against Roman Catholic sacramentalism and hierarchalism. See Augsburg Confession; Reformed Churches; religious liberty; Theses, Ninety-Five, of Luther.

Preserved Smith, The Age of the Reformation (1920), T. M. Lindsay, The Reformation (1917), 2 vols   W.P.

Reformation, Catholic: See Catholic Reformation, The.

Reformed Church in the United States, the: Formerly called the German Reformed Church, adopted the official title, The Reformed Church in the United States in 1869, in 1942, at the General Synod, in Lancaster, Pennsylvania, a merger became effective between the Reformed Church in the United States and the Evangelical Synod of North America, officially named, The Evangelical and Reformed Church.

The Reformed Church in the United States, as one branch of this merger, represents a national type of the Church founded by Huldreich Zwingli and John Calvin in Switzerland, during the Reformation* in the 16th century. It dates its origin in America from the first quarter of the 18th century (ca. 1725), when German, Swiss, French, and Dutch emigrants settled along the Atlantic seaboard, and organized scattered congregations.

Fostered and supported by the Reformed Church of Holland, this American branch of the Reformed Church organized an ecclesiastical body known as the Coetus. In 1793, it declared its independence of the mother-church in Holland, and established the Synod of the Reformed Church in the United States.

At the time of its merger with the Evangelical Synod of North America, the Reformed Church in the United States had a membership of about 350,000, with 1757 congregations and 1317 ministers, raising, annually, over five millions for congregational and benevolent purposes. Its organization consisted of 58 Classes, 7 Synods, and a General Synod, meeting triennially. It had established 5 Boards, and maintained flourishing missions and educational institutions in Japan and China. It had founded and fostered 3 theological seminaries, 11 colleges and academies, besides various hospitals and homes for orphans and old folks. The doctrinal standard of the Reformed Church in the United States, until its recent merger, was the Heidelberg Catechism*, and in its polity it adhered to the Presbyterian System established by John Calvin.

J. H. Dubbs, American Church History Series, vol. 8 (1895); idem, The Reformed Church in Pennsylvania (1902); T. Appel, The Beginnings of the Theological Seminary (1886); William J. Hinke, Minutes and Letters of the Coetus of Pennsylvania 1734-1792, Reformed Church Publication Board (Philadelphia, 1903); Life and Letters of the Reverend John Philip Boehm (1916).   T.F.H.

Reformed Churches: The Reformed Church represents one of the two major branches of the Reformation*. It arose in Switzerland, simultaneously with the movement in Germany headed by Martin Luther*. Its founders were Huldreich Zwingli (1484-1531), and John Calvin (1509-1564). In 1529, at the famous colloquy held at Marburg, Zwingli and Luther met, and, finally, failed to agree on the doctrine of Sacraments.

The Reformed Church owes its distinctive genius, both in theology and polity, mainly to Calvin*. Under his leadership, Geneva became an asylum for persecuted refugees from other lands, and his epochal treatise, "The Institutes of the Christian Religion", was widely accepted and adopted as the authoritative doctrinal confession of faith.

From its cradle in Switzerland, the Reformed Church spread far and wide into the countries of Europe, and, beyond the seas into other continents. Generally, it retained the simple name "Reformed," and then added to that old appellation by its founders the name of the country in which it was being established. Thus came into existence the Reformed Church in Holland, in Germany, in France, in Hungary, etc. In Scotland, under the leadership of John Knox*, the Reformed Church was named "The Presbyterian Church," after its form of government.

Through immigration, these various national types of the Reformed Church were transplanted during the colonial era to our soil, where each branch maintained its separate existence. The Dutch Reformed Church was established in New Amsterdam (New York) by settlers from Holland. Immigrants from Germany and Switzerland founded German Reformed Churches in the eastern Atlantic Region, and absorbed many French Huguenots of the Reformed Faith. The Presbyterian Church, originating in Scotland, founded and formed several separate branches throughout the United States of America.

These American branches of the Reformed Church bore the imprint of the theological and administrative genius of John Calvin. In their theology and polity, they remained Calvinistic Churches, as contrasted with denominational bodies that adhered to Arminian* types of theology and to congregational or episcopal systems of polity. But under new cultural and political conditions, the Reformed Churches on American soil were bound to create variations of their common prototype, and produce a distinctively American Christianity that is lending its sanction and support to the ecumenical movement.

The Reformed Churches belong to The Alliance of the Reformed Churches* throughout the World holding the Presbyterian System. This body, formed in London in 1875, exercises no legislative authority over its constituent groups, but it is the rallying point of all the Reformed and Presbyterian Churches. The Alliance, as a delegate body, meets quadrennially, and alternately in England and in America. During the interim, it functions through its Executive Commission, divided into an Eastern Section in Great Britain, and a Western Section located in America. These two sections meet biennially. The Alliance represents about thirty million souls, holding a common system of doctrine, and adhering to a common polity. It forms a closely integrated and influential family of Churches throughout the entire world. See classis; colloquy, common grace, consistory, elder, Confessions, Formal of the Christian Church, Gallican Confession; Heidelberg Catechism, Helvetic Confessions; Mercersburg theology; Schweitzer, Alexander; Tetrapolitan Confession.

On Reformed Churches, as one of the two main branches of the Reformation, consult standard Church Histories, especially the histories of the Reformation. On individual or national types of the family of Reformed Churches, consult particular references. On the Alliance of the Reformed Churches, consult the Quarterly Register of the Alliance, 1886 to date, published in Edinburgh, 44 Queen Street, and the Proceedings of the meetings of the Alliance, edited by W H Hamilton, Edinburgh, 44 Queen Street.

T.F.H.

Reformed Episcopal Church: A denomination formed in 1873, when a group of clergy and laymen withdrew from the Protestant Episcopal Church because of dissatisfaction with "ritualistic"* and Catholic tendencies. In theology, the denomination claims to follow the Book of Common Prayer*, but takes a rather Calvinistic interpretation of that book; it is opposed to sacerdotalism and prelacy, and refuses its bishops a separate house in its governing body. A theological seminary was maintained for some years in Philadelphia. Recently relations with Protestant bodies have become much closer than previously. There are about 80 parishes, with some 25,000 members. See Book of Common Prayer of the Reformed Episcopal Church, for statement of theological position. For account of origin of the denomination, see W. W Manross, History of the Episcopal Church (1938). W.N.P.

Reformed Mennonites: See Mennonites.

Reformed Methodist Church: See holiness churches. Also see anti-missionary movement in the U. S.

Reformed New Congregational Methodist Church: See holiness churches.

Reformed Presbyterian Church in North America, and Reformed Presbyterian Church of North America: Covenanters* from Scotland and the north of Ireland, members of the connection which organized in Scotland in 1743 as the Reformed Presbytery, formed the Reformed Presbytery of America in 1774 near Harrisburg, Pennsylvania. In 1782 this joined with two Associate presbyteries to form the Associate Reformed* Synod. But dissenters caused the constitution of the Reformed Presbytery of North America in 1798. This grew, especially in western Pennsylvania, to be a synod in 1809 and a general synod in 1823. The Reformed Presbyterians in the 1810's required members to free slaves, thus being in advance of most churches. In 1833 they divided over the question of whether the prohibition of voting and holding civil office because the Federal Constitution does not recognize God and the supremacy of Christ should continue to be the church's witness. The result was the Reformed Presbyterian Church in North America, General Synod, which rejected "political dissent" and the Reformed Presbyterian Church of North America, Old School These churches are better known as "Covenanter" than by their official titles. They have not their earlier strength, the former having in 1943 about 1,600 communicants, the latter about 6,000.   R.H.N.

Reformed Presbyterians: See Cameronians.

refuge: See asylum.

regale: (Lat., jus regale, royal prerogative) A term denoting the sovereign rights of a king. Specifically it refers to a right, assumed by medieval and later kings, of appropriating the revenues of vacant sees or imperial abbeys during the time of vacancy. The right was often extended to cover the period of a full year following the death of a bishop or abbot, and to include the collation of all dependent benefices* vacated during the time of the vacancy in the diocese, excepting those involving the care of souls. The law of regale did not apply to all dioceses or abbeys and was not assumed by kings alone, but in France by certain powerful nobles as well. Its origins can be traced to the system of patronage* but more particularly to the feudal conception that the estates held by the bishops and abbots were royal properties granted as fiefs by the crown. It was often the cause of conflict between kings and popes particularly in the 12th and 13th centuries.   F.W.N.

regeneration: Being re-born. Greek, gennao, to beget, with anothen, again or from above, in John 3 4, 7, anagennao, to beget again, in I Pet. 1. 3, 23, cf. 2. 2. Paul has kindred ideas. new creation (2 Cor. 5 17; Gal. 6· 15), renewal of nature or mind (Rom. 12: 2; 2 Cor. 3: 18; 4: 16; Eph. 4: 23); the new man (Eph. 4: 22-24, Col. 3 9, 10). Of the same order is the doctrine of resurrection* life. believers have passed from death to life (John 5 24, 11 25, 26); have died and risen with Christ (Rom. 6. 3-6, I Cor. 15: 20-23, Col. 3 1), are new-begotten by the resurrection (I Pet. 1. 3).

Regeneration is complementary to justification*, there is no establishing of the believer in a right relation unaccompanied by divine work within. Justifying faith is itself such work and opens the inner life to the agency of the Spirit. Pauline and Johannine ideas of renewal of nature are thought by some to reflect Greek dualism (transformation is from flesh to spirit· Rom. 8: 9, Gal. 5: 16-26, John 3: 6, 7), but the spiritual factor that forbids regarding salvation* as merely external lies equally against viewing it as quasiphysical. "God is conceived, not only as revealing His will, but as imparting the life which makes conformity to that will possible. This consciousness of new power and ideals—fruit and evidence of God's activity in the soul of man— finds expression in the doctrine of regeneration" (W. Adams Brown).

A theological issue is the connection of regeneration with baptism*. The belief that in baptism sin is washed away and the new nature born (baptismal regeneration) is traceable at· least to the second century (cf. 'laver of regeneration' Tit. 3 5). The influence of the mysteries (see mystery religions) on Christian Sacramentalism* still divides scholarly opinion, it has, perhaps, been over-stressed to the obscuring of apparent N.T. support of baptismal regeneration (Rom. 6 3, 4, Gal. 3 27, Col. 2 12, John 3 5). In these and other texts, baptism does seem the medium of special participation in the death, burial and resurrection of Christ; just as by it the Spirit is bestowed, as not by John's baptism (Mtt. 3 11, Mk. 1· 8; Lk. 3. 16, John 1. 26, Acts 19: 2-6). But on baptism, doctrines of regeneration differ, they unite on the fundamental that, whatever the means, the Agent of regeneration is the Holy Spirit*. The doctrine is the testimony to the work of the Spirit and the assurance that through Him men do know renewal of life and divine peace and power. See conversion.

W. James, The Varieties of Religious Experience (1902), H Begbie, Twice-Born Men: A Clinic in Regeneration (1909), W. L Jones, A Psychological Study of Religious Conversion (1937).   J.L.

Regensburg, Conference of: Hard pressed politically in 1540, Charles V* was desirous of pacifying Germany and attempted to iron out religious differences in a series of conferences, of which that at Regensburg was last. Interlocutors on the one side were Butzer, Pistorius, and Melanchthon*, on the other, Gropper, Pflug, and Eck.* Up for discussion was the so-called Regensburg Book, 23 ambiguously worded articles, previously prepared Though several compromises were effected at the beginning, the conference ended in failure. Both parties were suspicious of the Emperor, but he in the meanwhile had made a few advantageous political alliances with Protestants at the diet, which sat simultaneously with the conference at Regensburg.   E.C.K.

registers, parochial: Written records of baptisms, marriages, and deaths, became customary about 1550 (required by Council of Trent*, and about the same time in England and Protestant countries), in the absence of complete civil records, they often serve historical and statistical purposes as well as ecclesiastical.   E.R.H.

regula fidei: See rule of faith.

Regular Baptists: A group of conservative Baptist churches which claim to represent the original strain of English Baptists before differences developed over the Arminian and Calvinist theologies. Most of them are in the South. Each association has its own confession of faith, and there are differences among them, but in general they are Calvinistic. They practice "close communion*," excluding outsiders from the communion, and feet washing. There are 266 churches and approximately 17,000 members.
                                                E.T.C.

regular clergy: The professed members of the Roman Catholic clergy* who live under the rule (regula, hence regulares) of one of the religious Orders or Congregations of the Church. Though the "rules" of the various religious groups are of varying degrees of strictness and complexity, the taking of the vows of poverty, obedience and chastity is a common feature. In contrast to the "Seculars", the regular clergy devote themselves primarily to religious work other than the care of parishes (contemplation, special preaching, missions, teaching and the care of the poor and sick). See Jesuits, monasticism, secular clergy.

V.J.B.

Rehmcke, Johannes: (1848-1930) As a pupil of A. E. Biedermann*, the Swiss liberal theologian, he first taught religion and philosophy at the gymnasium of St. Gall, Switzerland. He next taught philosophy in succession at the universities of Berlin and Greifswald. Dissatisfied with the fundamental philosophical problems, he sought to redeem philosophy by a theory of knowledge. He developed the view that knowledge was a relationless having He rejected thinking as activity and regarded will not a fundamental element of consciousness. His philosophy has been unjustly grouped with the immanentist philosophy of Avenarius and Schuppe He rejected phenomenalism and theoretical idealism for their overt or concealed materialism, as they reduce the world to appearance. He strove to surmount the antithesis of materialism-idealism To surpass idealism meant the destruction of materialism in its ultimate secret recess He was primarily concerned in gaining clarity about the essence of consciousness or spirit.

God was for him the all-comprehensive psychic and spiritual individuality, the subject of the whole of the given. Opposed to pantheism, God was the real as such, but there is also something real outside of God. As God and man influence each other, divine and human communion is real. Only that philosophy which in its epistemology determines the spirit or consciousness as something ontological and that explains its essence as something explicable is fit as a basis of theology. Philosophy with its concept of God must place theology upon the sure ground of being. Rehmcke exerted a special influence upon theology through his pupil Friedrich Karl Schumann (1886-) who is professor of theology at the University of Halle and who published Religion und Wirklichkeit (Leipzig, 1913).

Die Welt als Wahrnehmung und Begriff (Berlin, 1880) ; Philosophie als Grundwissenschaft (Frankfurt a. M., 1910) ; Das Bewusstsein (Heidelberg, 1910) ; Die Lehre vom Gemüt (2nd ed , Leipzig, 1911) , Die Willensfreiheit (Leipzig, 1911) , Grundriss der Geschichte der Philosophie (3rd ed , Leipzig, 1912) ; Die Seele des Menschen (5th ed , Leipzig, 1920) , Logik oder Philosophie als Wissenschaft (2nd ed., Leipzig, 1923) , Grundlegung der Ethik als Wissenschaft (Leipzig, 1925) , Anmerkungen zur Grundwissenschaft (2nd ed , Leipzig, 1925) ; Lehrbuch der Allgemeinen Psychologie (3rd ed , Leipzig, 1926) ; Gesammelte philosophische Aufsätze (ed. by K. Gassen (Erfurt, 1928) , S. Hochfeld, Johannes Rehmcke (Munchen, 1923) , H. Sacher, Vergleich zwischen Rehmckes und Drieschs Philosophie (Dresden, 1933) ; J. E. Heyde, Johannes Rehmcke und unsere Zeit (Berlin, 1935) .

H.H.

Reimarus, Hermann Samuel: (1694-1768) Professor of Hebrew and Oriental languages a the Gymnasium in Hamburg (1727-1768). In ad dition to his edition of Dio Cassius (1750-1752) he published several philosophical works. His most important work, Apologie oder Schutzschrift für die vernunftigen Verehrer Gottes, published posthumously and anonymously by Lessing* (1774-1778) under the title Wolfenbuttel Fragments,* reveals a vigorous and independent thinker, far superior to most of the English deists* with whom he has often been compared. See Lives of Jesus.

M.S.E.

reincarnation: See Hinduism; transmigration.

Reischle, Max Wilhelm Theodor: (1858-1905) He was professor at the universities of Giessen, Gottingen and Halle. His chief contribution was in the profound Ritschlian transformation of German theology prior to 1914.
Ein Wort zur Kontroverse über die Mystik in der Theologie (Freiburg, 1886) , Christentum und Entwicklungsgedanke (Leipzig, 1898) , Werturteile und Glaubensurteile (Halle, 1900) ; Christliche Glaubenslehre (Halle, 1902) , Theologie und Religionsgeschichte (Tubingen, 1904) , Aufsätze und Vorträge, ed. by Th. Haring and Friedrich Loofs (Tubingen, 1906) relationships, spiritual: A kinship arising between the principals in the administration of baptism and confirmation. Since baptism is considered a spiritual rebirth, those who concur in it are considered spiritual (god-) parents of the baptized person. In the Roman Catholic Church it is an impediment to marriage between a) the minister and the baptized, b) the sponsors and the baptized. The spiritual relationship contracted in confirmation is not a marriage impediment * relativism, ethical: The view that since moral values vary between individuals and groups according to cultural conditions and other circumstances, there are no absolute criteria that ought to hold universally Edward Westermarck, Origin and Development of the Moral Ideals (1906), Ethical Relativity (1932), defends this standpoint, although he affirms an evolution of the altruistic sentiment. John Dewey and his school are accused by their critics of being ethical relativists; however, they seem to believe in the absolute value of democracy, and in the complete co-ordination of all elements in any given moral situation.

H.H.

J.F.T.

W.K.W.

relic: (Lat., reliquiae, remains) An object venerated because of its association with a martyr or saint. Relics are of three classes: first, the body of a saint or any part thereof, second, any part of his clothing; third, any thing intimately connected with him, e.g., a prayerbook. In the Roman Catholic Church a document, certifying to its authenticity, accompanies every important relic, but this does not guarantee the genuineness of a single specific relic. Such a document only implies that the relic is not manifestly spurious and that there is no compelling evidence known to the competent authenticator—a cardinal, bishop, or other dignitary to whom the faculty of authenticating relics has been granted by the papacy—which militates against its lawful veneration. This veneration is held to be legitimate but not compulsory. An authenticated relic is required to be placed within the altar-stone of every altar for the licit celebration of Mass*. Purchase, sale, or simulation of relics is unlawful, and those who knowingly sell or display false relics for veneration incur excommunication* ipso facto. The primary purpose of the veneration of relics is to increase the sanctity of the faithful by encouraging imitation of the heroic virtues of God's most faithful servants. This honor is purely relative, insofar as it is basically rendered to the saint or martyr with whom the relics are associated, in nowise is it to be confused with the worship rendered to God. The veneration of relics was admitted by the Iconoclasts (heretics of VIII and IX centuries) and was not repudiated by the Protestants at first. See charms and amulets, images. Cf. saints, veneration of.   J.F.T.

Relief Act of 1791: This Act for Catholic Relief (31 George III, c. 32), passed by the English Parliament, was the second of four major measures which eliminated some of the disabilities under which the Roman Catholics labored in England since the time of Queen Elizabeth. Like the first Act of 1778, it imposed an oath on all Catholics but the consequences were much more favorable: those who took the oath were freed from persecution for celebrating or hearing Mass, for being in the clerical state, or for otherwise exercising their religion; Catholic schools were legalized, the legal and military professions were open to Catholics, but they could not be officers, judges, or king's counsel. Further emancipation was delayed, despite the support of Pitt and Fox, by the obduracy of George III and dissension among the Catholics themselves.   J.F.T.

Relief Church: A small denomination of little more than a hundred congregations, which separated from the Church of Scotland*, in 1762, on the question of patronage*, under the leadership of Thomas Gillespie. Desiring to serve as a "relief" to all who felt the establishment undesirable, it maintained a spirit of charity towards all. In May, 1847, it united with the Secession Church to form the United Presbyterian Church*.   A.K.R.

relief organization: See charity organization.

religion, comparative: See comparative religion.

religion, philosophy of: See philosophy of religion.

religion, practical: See practical religion.

religion, primitive: See primitive religion.

religion, the problem of definition: The term religion belongs to that large class of popular words which seems acceptable as common coin of communicative exchange but which on closer examination fails to carry the imprint of exact meaning. A valid definition must avoid 1) the first major mistake of vagueness if it is to be useful as a definition. 2) It is common practice to turn to etymology when one defines. In many cases this is helpful, but in this case of little use. The appeal to the Latin source religare (meaning "being bound") or relegere (meaning "gather together") may, by the process of ingenious Origenistic allegory, throw light upon the word in some homiletical sense, but it suffers as a second major mistake of inadequacy. A worship at the shrine of origins is precarious. 3) A third mistake is the indiscriminate use of the word where the same word carries different meanings. For example, to say that a person is religious may mean that he performs a religious act without being religious or that he is religious without performing an act considered as religious. An object may be a religious object but not in the same sense as a person who is said to be religious. One word thus covers two different meanings. 4) Classical definitions fall into a fourth general mistake, viz., the psychological error of defining in terms of one phase of mental life. For example, to say that one is religious when one believes in or affirms a god is to commit the error of confining the meaning to intellectual activity; to say that one is religious when one feels (e.g., the feeling of absolute dependence—Schleiermacher) is to confine the meaning to emotional experience; to say that one is religious when one performs or behaves in a given way may well confine the meaning to activity. Man is ever more than a mere thinking, feeling and active creature. He is a whole person with intermingled inner and outer responses and activities. Classical definitions have tended to follow the error of the old faculty psychology. 5) A fifth mistake has been to relegate the term to an indefinable instinct, experience or a priori (specific or otherwise) and thus invite the charge of violating a fundamental principle of careful thinking, viz., the law of parsimony.* If the religious response merits, by definition, a place in the mysteries of some special and hidden recess of the mind,—what prevents the addition of countless other special subterranean compartments of mind, e.g., a philosophical instinct, a musical a priori or a tennis experience? 6) A sixth major mistake is to define too narrowly: religion is going to church or being a Christian. Such a definition outlaws those who well may be religious, who never have had such social expressions as well as those outside the one faith. 7) A seventh mistake is to make the meaning so broad as to lose all significance. To say that religion is wonder or love is a case in point. May one not wonder or love and not be religious? 8) An eighth mistake is to confuse the term with ethics. The difficulty here is that one may be ethical and not necessarily be religious. One may be non-moral (e.g., Otto's conception of the essential religious spirit as numinous) or even immoral and still be religious. Religious people have often committed immoral acts as page upon page of human history reveal.

9) A common error (the ninth) is the normative, viz., of defining the ought rather than the is. What a religion ought to be and what it is are two separate inquiries. 10) A tenth mistake is to define the term in connection with a god concept. Two considerations appear here how are those persons to be classified who behave in ways very much like conventional religious theists but who do not believe in god (in any conventional sense)? The term God indeed may need definition! Furthermore, a person may well assert his belief in a deity without his being religious. A definition may well need to include extreme humanists, extreme mystics, extreme pantheists, devotees of nature, Utopian enthusiasts, agnostics and avowed atheists (whose atheism* may well mean non-theism).

In the light of the above, although it is precarious to offer a constructive statement, a sincere attempt is here offered which, it is believed, does no violence to the above mistakes and sets forth a valid descriptive series of definitions. One is faced with the dilemma, on the one hand, of not defining, possessing a, vague concept or holding inadequate or mistaken notions, and, on the other, of setting forth a position at the risk of severe criticism. The following statements seem wholly justifiable: "To be religious is to effect in some way and in some measure a vital adjustment (however tentative and incomplete) to whatever is reacted to or regarded implicitly or explicitly as worthy of serious and ulterior concern." Again, "a religion is a set of meanings and behaviors having reference to individuals who are or were or could be religious." "Again, religion is a generic term referring to all conceivable religions, formal or informal."

An elaboration of the problem of definition as above set forth is found in this writer's First Chapters in Religious Philosophy (1937), Part I, "What is Religion?" A list of definitions is found in James H. Leuba, Appendix to A Psychological Study of Religion (1912) See the discussion in E. S Brightman, A Philosophy of Religion (1940).

V.F.

religion, psychology of: See psychology of religion.

religion, reason in: See reason in religion.

religion, sociology of: See sociology of religion.

religions, historical: Divisions and classes: See one-factor religions, and two-factor religions. Criterion of classification See religious factor. 'Powers' in historical religions: See religious 'powers'.

F.L.P.

religious authority: See authority.

religious census: See federal census of religious bodies.

religious certainty: See certainty, religious.

religious communistic settlements: See communistic settlements, religious.

religious datum: The unique, irreducible object of conscious experience, whose quality is said to reveal God's being and nature at least partially, involving as it does the direct presence of the divine being as the basis for inference and reason. Those who assert such a datum* claim that its essential quality is non-sensory, and non-natural, though accompanied by emotional, sensory and ideational responses. The datum is also said to be non-rational, ineffable, and primordial. The knowledge it provides is said to be prior to and more ultimate than mediate or conceptual moral knowledge. The faculty of knowledge seems on the whole to be a cognitive "feeling" of objective presence (W. James, Schleiermacher, and R. Otto). The object of the numinous "creature-feeling" is, for Otto, mysterium tremendum, et fascinans, or it may be a sense of absolute, sacred value (J. Oman* and D. C. Macintosh).

F. R. Tennant* has been one of the strongest critics of the view that there is a unique religious datum analogous to the sensory given. He suggests that psychological immediacy* is confused with epistemological immediacy in analyzing the numinous object, which, far from being determinate or having a specific quale is more like a "vague generic idea" and "indeterminate enough to enter equally well into a multitude of diverse theologies and religions." (See Philosophical Theology, vol. 1, p. 309). See empirical theology. D C Macintosh, The Problem of Religious Knowledge (1940) ; R Otto, The Idea of the Holy (tr , 1923), John Oman, The Natural and the Supernatural (1931).

P.A.B.

religious drama: The word 'drama' comes directly from the Greek and means 'deed' or 'action.' Strictly speaking, religious drama might be defined as religion shown in deeds as distinguished from abstractions. Thus, "The Word became flesh and dwelt among us" is a graphic way of saying that God dramatized his word for us in the life of Jesus. That is still Christianity's supreme drama. The term 'religious drama' has always had something of this connotation. In practice, however, the more conventional use of the word 'drama' has designated a story acted out upon a stage by a group of players in such a way as to arouse emotion in an audience. Such a drama becomes religious when it has a religious effect; that is, when it sends the audience away exalted in spirit and with a deepened sense of fellowship with God and man. This is admittedly a modern definition, growing out of the experience of twentieth century churches which have been using drama in their services of worship and religious education. Back of it lies a long history which can be only briefly summarized here.

1) Primitive Religious Drama. In practically every culture of the world, religion and drama were closely associated in their beginnings. Primitive man dramatized his prayers to his gods—danced and sang before his altars to let the gods know his need of rain for his crops or food for his children. As he climbed higher in the scale of civilization he used drama to honor the gods and to thank them for their blessings, and to ask for more

2) Greek Religious Drama. Among the Greeks of the fifth century B.C. drama emerged from this embryonic phase and within the short space of a single century, under the genius of Aeschylus, Sophocles and Euripides, developed into a major art with a clearly defined form. The great tragedies (Agamemnon, Antigone, Oedipus, etc.), of these poets were all written to be acted in the most sacred spot in Athens—the Temple of Dionysus, god of fertility—and at the most sacred season of the year—Spring, or the resurrection of Nature. Not only the poets, but the actors and directors, were considered ministers of religion during the drama festivals. The organized religion sponsored the plays, and the State financed them. Audiences reached twenty thousand or more. The plays sought to interpret life, not to escape from it. They dealt with the livest religious and social issues of the day with such timeless insight and depth of spirituality that they have survived twenty-four centuries and are probably still unsurpassed in beauty and dramatic power.

3) Medieval Religious Drama. When Rome conquered Greece the drama quickly declined. Rome was interested more in drama of escape than of interpretation. Under Roman influence the drama not only lost its religious significance but became bloody and obscene. When the Christian Church came into power, one of its first official acts was to put its foot on the Roman theater and crush it. For nearly a thousand years it remained crushed—with only minor and vestigial survivals—until it had a rebirth in the ninth and tenth centuries in Europe and especially in England. It was the church that revived it—not on the grand scale of Ancient Greece, but as a practical method of telling the Gospel story to the illiterate masses. The first experiments were simple indeed· lowering the cross on Good Friday while the choir sang Misereres, then raising it again on Easter morning while the choir sang Alleluias, or a visit by the three Marys to the tomb, and their discovery that their Lord had risen. These first experiments, coming as embellishments of the service of the mass itself, were performed by clerics, and restricted to the chancel. They were called Passion Plays or Chancel Plays. Next came Saints' Plays, developing out of the processions in honor of the saints. These were held in the nave of the church where both clerics and laymen re-enacted incidents, usually miracles, from the lives of the saints. One of the Passion Plays and Saints' Plays grew, in time, the Mystery or Miracle Plays, dramatizing the whole series of events of sacred history from the creation of the world to the final judgment. (At first, 'Mystery' seems to have designated a cycle of plays on the life and passion of Christ, while 'Miracle' was used for the longer cycles—twenty to fifty-two plays—that included Old Testament, New Testament, and saints' lives as well. But ultimately the terms 'mystery' and 'miracle' came to be used interchangeably.) These Miracle Plays were performed by guilds of laymen on double or triple decked platforms just outside the doors of the great cathedrals. The various guilds enacted the episodes most closely associated with their own craft, thus, the shipwrights' guild came to be responsible for the story of the building of the ark, the goldsmiths for the story of the Magi, etc. As the popularity of these cycles of religious dramas increased someone thought of the idea of putting wheels under the platform and rolling it out from the church yard to the street corner or the marketplace. This led to the plays being called pageants. ('Pageant' is a French word meaning 'rolling platform.') From this time on the Miracle Plays gradually lost their religious quality, becoming more and more secular with increasing elements of comedy and buffoonery until, in 1603, the ecclesiastical authorities forbade them in the churches. By this time the secular theater had developed from them. A few years more, and the Reformation swept away the last remnants of religious drama. However, meanwhile an offshoot of the earlier church plays took the form of Moralities, didactic allegories in dramatic form in which the various virtues and vices were personified. Best known of these was Everyman, translated from the Dutch into English about 1500, picturing the relative abiding values of certain virtues in the face of death.

4) The Passion Play of Oberammergau. This is not to be confused either with the medieval mysteries or with modern religious dramas. It is in a class by itself. It had its origin in 1633 when the citizens of Oberammergau (in the Bavarian Alps, sixty-four miles southwest of Munich) made a vow to perform such a play in gratitude for their deliverance from a plague. Since then this drama of the Passion of Christ has been performed as a religious service by the villagers every tenth year. It has developed in scope and effectiveness through the centuries until it is now a dramatic work staged in a large open-air theater and requiring nine hours for production. Each episode in the Passion story is prefaced by an appropriate tableau from the Old Testament. Music to accompany the production was added in 1814 by Rochus Dedler, a local schoolmaster. Some seven hundred persons—about half the village population—are required for the production. These devout people, who earn their living for the most part by carving rosaries, crucifixes, scenes from the lives of the saints, and children's toys, perform with great reverence. The parts for the major characters have become hereditary in certain families, who regard the characterizations as acts of devotion.

5) Modern Religious Drama. About the beginning of the twentieth century, religious drama again came into use, particularly in America and England. As in Medieval times, it began as a teaching device. Church schools presented crudely written pageants, making graphic certain great religious ideas. These were followed by dramatized Bible stories in the effort to help young people recover the life-experience of Bible characters. From Bible plays the liturgical churches went on to a revival of the Medieval miracle plays adapted for modern use, while non-liturgical churches, for the most part, went directly to modern formal dramas, centering around present-day characters in the midst of spiritual struggles. Surveys have revealed that many thousands of churches now use drama, either ancient or modern, formal or informal, not only as a teaching instrument to show religion in terms of deeds, but as a means of inspiring congregations, purging their emotions, and deepening their sense of fellowship with God and man.

Eastman and Wilson, Drama in the Church (1942), N B Miller, The Living Drama (1924), A E Haigh, The Tragic Drama of the Greeks (1896), Gilbert Murray, Ten Greek Plays (1929); K L Bates, The English Religious Drama (1926), P. E. Osgood, Old-time Church Drama Adapted (1928), E W Bates, The Church Play and Its Production (1938)   F.E.

religious education: The term "religious education" stands for two processes which are necessarily related, but may be distinguished. One is the process of education, when this is undergirded and inspired by religious faith, the other is the gaining of personal religious faith, when this is nurtured, informed and sustained by educational methods. The first is the function of the school, the college, the university, and the community, the second is the function of the church, the Sunday school, and other religious associations. Both are functions of the family and the home.

Historically, the relation of religion and education has been intimate. Jesus Christ chose the methods of the teacher rather than those of propaganda, politics, or violence. Candidates for membership in the early church were carefully instructed as catechumens. Preaching was not merely to proclaim the gospel, but for instruction in the Christian faith and for the edification of believers and the building up of the church. Christians kept alive the light of learning in the Middle Ages; and the Christian church was largely responsible for the founding of the schools and universities of Europe. The Protestant Reformation, wth its emphasis upon the authority of the Word of God as recorded in the Scriptures and upon the right and responsibility of the individual to read and understand and accept this Word for himself, gave great impetus to the educational interest inherent in the Christian faith.

The beginnings of public education in America are directly attributable to the spirit of the Protestant Reformation. Throughout our early history the public schools, as well as private and parochial schools, gave full place to religious faith.

In the nineteenth century, a gradual secularization of education began to take place. This was not purposed, but incidental; it was not founded in principle, but occasioned by circumstances. It was largely due to the sectarianism of religious organizations. Not infidels or atheists or free thinkers have done most to take religion out of the public schools, but people who spoke in the name of religion. Whenever a group, or even an individual, has chosen to object to some religious element in the program or curriculum of the public schools, that element has forthwith been eliminated, and no other religious element has taken its place. The movement has been almost wholly negative; there has been no coming together of the different religious groups for a positive reconsideration of its total trend and inevitable results. Adherents of all faiths in America have been more concerned that the public schools should not contain any element to which they could object, than they have been to conserve in these schools the great principles of morals and religion upon which they agree. Protestant, Catholic, and Jew have shared in this movement. All must shoulder some of the responsibility for the situation into which we have drifted.

In the twentieth century, there has been a disposition to accept the exclusion of religion from the public schools as a matter of course, something closed and done, inevitable and irrevocable. Discussion of the problem has usually been more concerned with a rationalization of the present situation than with its serious reconsideration. This somewhat surprising readiness to be content with the omission from public education of religious elements has been due, not so much to the sectarianism of religion, though that has remained, as to other factors which bear more directly and purposively upon the secularization of public education. Among these may be named 1) the general secularization of life and cheapening of human interests which have characterized the twentieth century thus far, 2) the prevalence in theology until very recently of a one-sided emphasis upon the immanence of God to the neglect or denial of His transcendence; 3) the popular vogue of pragmatism, instrumentalism and experimentalism—to use the successive names which the movement has borne—and the tremendous influence of this pragmatic point of view in education; 4) the resulting confusion with respect to the aims of education, and the disregard of problems of ultimate value or relation to God.

Yet America has a common religious faith—common not in the sense that everybody shares it, for there are some among us who deny or ignore God; but in the sense that it is common to the three great religious groups—Protestant, Catholic, and Jewish—to which the great majority of American citizens profess to belong. These citizens—Protestant, Catholic, and Jew—worship the one God, Creator of all things and Father of men. They believe that His will has been revealed in the life and literature of the Hebrew people, as this is recorded in the Bible, and that it is discernible in nature about us and in conscience within. They acknowledge the principles of human duty set forth in the Ten Commandments, in the teachings of the Hebrew prophets, in the Golden Rule, and in the law of love to God and to fellow-men.

The religious faith of America has inspired our history as a people and is embodied in our most characteristic institutions. There is nothing in the status of the public school as an institution of the state to render it godless. There is nothing in the principle of religious freedom or the separation of church and state to hinder the school's acknowledgment of the power and goodness of God. The common religious faith of the American people, as distinguished from the sectarian forms in which it is organized, may rightfully be assumed and find appropriate expression in the life and work of the public schools.

A significant change is taking place in the attitude of progressive educators toward what in the first hey-day of the movement was given the bad name "indoctrination." Their view then was that at all points where decision may be involved and attitudes are being formed, the teacher must not intrude and the school must be neutral. For the teacher or even the parent to share his faith with the children and to hope to win them to a like faith, was regarded as an unwarranted imposition, a sin against the child's individuality. This view is now sharply criticized, and most educational leaders oppose what they now call "the myth of neutrality" in education.

The Sunday school movement came to America in the early years of the nineteenth century, and has grown until one-half of the Sunday school enrollment of the world is in the United States and Canada. The International Council of Religious Education is the cooperative agency of forty-four Protestant denominations, and under its leadership great advances have been made in curriculum-making, teacher-training, and the organization and administration of the religious educational work of the churches.

In the field of religion, as in education generally, the movement now is away from exclusive pre-occupation with educational method, and toward new interest in the content of teaching. Psychology is an indispensable aide to education, but it cannot determine the ends or final values of life, or spin out of itself the web of knowledge. It cannot take the place of history or literature or the physical sciences or ethics or philosophy or theology or the Word of God. The experimental method is fruitful, not when it is used without presupposition or content, but when it is applied to new material in the full light of what we already know and believe. Genuinely creative teaching takes place, not in the absence of transmission of a heritage, but where transmission is so adequate that it serves as a base for further action and inquiry.

The new community of old and young in interests, in dangers, in sacrifices, and in service, makes obsolete and worse than useless many of our old neat schemes of classification and partition. Young and old are being educated together by the impact of life. The community itself is educating the young as really as do the schools. The better education of adults is now seen to be of vital importance to the education of the young. More things can be done and learned by old and young together than we had formerly thought. Stanley Hall's idea that children should be taught what their elders do not believe, in the interest of their recapitulation of race experiences, has disappeared, and with it should go into oblivion the new psychological· dogma that children are incapable of learning anything articulate about God. We must share with our children, honestly, freely, intelligently, what we ourselves know and believe, in matters of religious faith and moral principle, as well as of loyalty to our country.

There is a new emphasis upon commitment. The world is no place, in these days of sore trial, for half-way, hesitant, tentative people who do not know what they believe or in whom they trust or to what they are loyal. We may well hope that "the myth of neutrality" is gone from education forever. Certainly Christian education fails if it does not beget faith in God in response to His supreme revelation of Himself in Jesus Christ—the faith that saves from futility and sin, and issues in Christian character and service. See Bible Societies; Biblical history in Christian instruction, catechetics, catechism, catechumenate, parochial schools, parochial schools, Catholic, Sunday school movement in U. S. A., Young People's Societies, Christian. See also anti-Sunday School movement in the U. S.

W. C Bower, Christ and Christian Education (1943), G A Coe, What is Christian Education? (1929), John Dewey, A Common Faith (1934), H. S Elliott, Can Religious Education be Christian? (1940), C M Hill, ed, Educational Progress and School Administration (1936), chaps. 19, 20, 21, W E Hocking, Human Nature and Its Remaking (1918), International Council of Religious Education, Christian Education Today (1940), M. L. Jacks, God and Education (1939), Jerusalem Conference, I M C, vol. II, Religious Education (1928); Mary A Jones, The Faith of Our Children (1943); J H Newlon, Education for Democracy in Our Time (1939), Oxford Conference, The Christian Understanding of Man (1938), Oxford Conference, Church, Community and State in Relation to Education (1938), W. E. Powell, Education for Life with God (1934), P H Vieth, Objectives of Religious Education (1930), L. A Weigle, Jesus and the Educational Method (1939)   L.A.W.

religious experience: See s.v. empirical theology, mysticism, Schleiermacher.

religious factor: The destiny-determining property of objects, forces, 'powers', etc., which comprise the world of human experience, any kind of power in the world when construed as operating in a capacity affecting the life's span, course of life, fortune, or destiny of man and other 'objects' in nature, a natural, universal, determining, and operative power or influence, which, in its differentiation in man, is identified wth the soul, or the destiny-determining property or power of the soul, the criterion by which historical religions as historical wholes may be classified without impairing their wholeness. See one factor religions; two factor religions.   F.L.P.

religious humanism: See humanism, religious.

religious journalism in the United States: Applied to religious press activity the term "journalism" loses its popularly restricted association with newspaper production and takes on its broader professional significance of reference to all manner of publications "issued at stated or regular intervals". The history of religious journalism, therefore, extends beyond the realm of the religious newspaper to include that heterogeneous body of publications collectively designated "religious periodicals". Although "religious newspaper" and "periodical" thus become but types of "religious journal", the need for distinction between the two is not obviated. Essential differences exist in format, periodicity and content.

Differentiation is simplified if the sharpest distinction is drawn in the area of format. This is done by nodding assent to the widely accepted definition of the "proper newspaper" as being a folded sheet of folio size without stapling, stitching or cover. Applied literally to the output of the religious press, this makes all journals of folio size religious newspapers, all of smaller size religious periodicals.

This sharp distinction of format, although not universally accepted, has decided advantages in designation of periodicity and content. Strict association of the religious newspaper with the folio sheet automatically bestows upon it the additional characteristics of 1) Publication at the highest frequency common to the field of religious journalism—the weekly interval (semi-weekly and daily religious papers having always been oddities). 2) Content consisting of a minimum of essay matter and a maximum of current summary. Similarly strict association of the religious periodical with the smaller than folio size automatically bequeaths upon it the additional characteristics of 1). Publication, in the main, less often than at the weekly interval (though by definition never less frequently than at the semi-annual interval). 3) Content consisting of maximum of essay matter and a minimum of current summary.

A further word concerning periodicity and content will add definiteness to the distinctions drawn. At the outset largely a depository of cumbersome essay matter published at infrequent intervals, the religious journal progressed rapidly to a point where it became a weekly vehicle of lighter reading matter, especially of religious news. Waiving strict chronology, this evolutionary development may be said to have been by way of four stages designable as those of 1. Review 2 Magazine 3. News-Magazine 4. Newspaper. The first three stages represent the evolutionary growth of the "periodical" or non-folio format, while the last is obviously the province of the folio religious sheet. The "religious review" being restricted to scholarly theological articles and criticisms of recent books has been most exclusively essay in content. Its other characteristics have been publication in octavo form and at quarterly intervals. The "religious magazine" has been less a repository of critical articles and reviews, more a "storehouse" of lighter types of essay matter such as brief extracts from authors, biographical sketches, moral stories, anecdotes, poetry, etc., but to the exclusion of notices of current religious events. Its other characteristics have been publication in octavo or smaller form and at monthly or bi-monthly intervals. The "news-magazine" was the natural transition medium from religious magazine to religious newspaper and has remained to this day a hybrid product, hardly to be placed in either category. Though admitting a certain amount of essay matter of the magazine type, it has tended to allot a third or half of its space to current "religious news" consisting of reports of missionary activity, the proceedings of religious societies, accounts of revivals, correspondence, lists of new religious publications, notices of ordinations and installations, church dedications, obituary, etc. But for the general practice of excluding secular summary and advertisements, there is many times no distinction to be made between "news-magazine" and "newspaper". Similarity to the newspaper extends itself into the areas of format and periodicity. Though not a folio, the "news-magazine" has tended to larger size, appearing as often in quarto as octavo form. Though not exclusively a weekly, it has tended in that direction, being more likely to appear as such than at less frequent intervals. Turning from this last of the periodical types to the weekly folio religious newspaper, its content proportions may be estimated as one fourth light religious essay matter, one-half religious news as designated above, and one-fourth secular summary and advertisements.

Terminology explained, the sketching of the rise of religious journalism in the United States becomes a relatively simple task. Three periods of development stand out.

I. Establishment, 1743-1830. The first exclusively religious journal in America was the weekly Christian History, Boston, 1743-1745, an octavo news-magazine devoted to the promotion of the Great Revival. Its short life indicates its precocious nature. Half a century was yet to elapse before religious journalism was to experience even initial success. From 1745 to 1772 three religious papers were attempted at New York, two magazines in the environs of Philadelphia, but one of the five outlasting its first year. Thereupon, the exigencies of war enforced a total blackout until 1789. Then came the phenomenal burst of activity that established religious journalism as a national institution by 1830. From 1789 through 1830 over 500 religious journals were founded of which 175 survived to enjoy simultaneous publication in the latter year. Life expectancy so increased that approximately a fourth of the journals founded were now assured an existence ranging from ten to over one hundred years. Centers of publication were to be found as far westward as the Mississippi, as far south as Georgia and Alabama. Circulation figures of 5,000 to 10,000 were common, while the Methodist Christian Advocate's subscription list of 25,000 in 1829 was hailed as the world's largest, London Times not excepted. With respect to journalistic type, the newspaper and news-magazine quite surpassed magazine and review in popularity. Functional characteristics also became evident. As so capably suggested by Jensen, these were 1. Socialization and 2. Propaganda. Widely separated groups of common belief along the coast and on the frontier were bound together into a working social unit through this medium of communication. At the same time, new converts were constantly sought by the spreading of journalistic propaganda in parts both near and far. Already by 1830 upwards of sixty religious groups were availing themselves of these functional advantages, being essentially 1. Denominational bodies 2. Schismatical sects, and 3. Special Interest groups such as Missionary, Sunday School, Tract, Peace, Temperance, etc., societies. Each group had its official organ and frequently a number of non-official ones. Unquestionably, religious journalism had established itself in America by 1830.

II. Marked Growth, 1830-1880. The next half century was to be the golden age. The yearly output of religious journals increased steadily until by 1880 the number was upwards of 550. Average length of life increased apace. Centers of publication pressed steadily westward to the Pacific Coast. Circulation figures rose until it has been estimated that three copies of religious journals were being issued per inhabitant. The religious newspaper became by far the favored journalistic type. Numerous cult, slavery and sectional religious journals cropped up to increase greatly the diversity of interests represented. Scarcely any religious group claiming adherents beyond the local scene was without some type of journalistic voice.

III. Difficulties and Adjustments, 1880, to date. Although the number of religious journals published yearly has increased steadily since 1880 until today some 1,200 are being issued, the period has been characterized by two restricting factors. 1. Waning denomination interest. 2. Increasing financial distress. The first was a natural aftermath of the Civil War which served as a ghastly reminder of the results of untempered inter-group strife. Circulation figures of religious journals of restricted interest began to drop, those of broader interest to rise. Whereas the religious Independent founded in 1848 was a pioneer, by the close of the nineteenth century its cause was being bolstered by such influential organs as the Christian Union, Christian Herald and Christian Century. The trend has continued into the twentieth century in the founding of numerous non-sectarian journals designed to instruct in specialized fields such as the Journal of Religion for scholars, Church Management for ministers, the International Journal of Religious Education for teachers, etc. Financial difficulties have accelerated the trend. Sensitiveness to the type of advertising suitable for inclusion has in itself steadily decreased extra-circulation income since 1880. The falling circulation of the average denominational journal has aggravated the situation by causing advertisers to withdraw copy to concentrate it in papers of wider circulation. The result has been fewer copies of religious journals published per inhabitant, but an increase in quality of religious journalism. Items of purely regional interest are now placed in the "church page" of the local secular paper. Matters of broader and more lasting significance are saved for the official group journals which are now tending to be of news-magazine and review type and more appreciative of opposition views.

IV Coming Recognition of Value of Religious Journal as Historical Source Combined knowledge of types and production should at once create an awareness of the unparalleled value of the religious journal as a source of historical information. Three invaluable qualities characterize the content of its pages to a greater degree than other sources 1. Contemporaneity, 2. Continuity, 3. Variety.

By virtue of its frequency of publication the religious journal assumes the role of "on-the-spot" reporter, impulsive and opinionative to be sure, because of the haste of composition, but on account of its prejudices and exaggerations all the more faithful a reflector of the mood of the day. Continuity of record is also a quality derived from frequency of publication Following the content of the religious journal month by month or week by week or at other intervals as the case may be over a period of years, one witnesses a moving picture of "religion in the making" as contrasted to random snapshots derived from miscellaneous pamphlets, manuscripts and books Add the quality of variety of content extending from learned theological essays to local bits of personal interest and the worth of the religious journal appears in full perspective. Until now largely overlooked as a historical source, its pages contain a mine of information for the re-evaluation of American religious history. The new data disclosed in the article on the "anti-missionary movement"* is but a sample of discoveries awaiting use of this fertile source. See Catholic Journalism, religious tract movement in the U. S.

A history of religious journalism in the United States has not yet been published The following will provide leads for those primarily interested in the interpretative aspects of the subject W. C. Bower, Church at Work in the Modern Field (1935), pp. 236-64; C L Cannon, Journalism· A Bibliography (1924), pp. 273-276, H. E. Jensen, "The Rise of Religious Journalism in the United States to 1845" (Doctoral Dissertation, University of Chicago, 1920), F. L Mott, History of American Magazines (1938). Those interested in religious journals for historical purposes should proceed as follows Consultation of G. P. Albaugh, An Annotated Bibliography of Religious Periodicals and Newspapers in What is now the United States, 1730-1830 (1943) will reveal titles and locations of all religious journals known to have been published through 1830. Subsequent to 1830, examination of the following sources arranged chronologically will reveal significant titles and denominational affiliations· Jensen, supra, for years 1831-1845; I Garwood, American Periodicals From 1850-1860 (1931); G. P. Rowell, American Newspaper Directory (1869 ff.); N. W Ayer and Sons, American Newspaper Annual and Directory (1880 to date title varies slightly), S. N D. North, History and Present Condition of the Newspaper and Periodical Press (Tenth Census Report, 1884); Batten and Co., Directory of the Religious Press (1897); A. W. Faxon, Checklist of American and English Periodicals (1908 to date); H. O. Severance, A Guide to Current Periodicals and Serials of the United States and Canada (five editions, 1906-1931), J. H. Meier, Catholic Press Directory (1928 and 1932), Yearbook of the American Churches (biennially 1933-1941 +). Titles ascertained from these sources, the library locations of many can be found by consultation of the Union List of Serials in the Libraries of United States and Canada (1943). Correspondence with religious libraries and state historical societies will produce other locations.   G.P.A.

religious journals: See Journals of religion and theology   Also   Catholic Journalism religious liberty: The struggle for religious liberty in Christendom may conveniently be reckoned as commencing with the Protestant Reformation,* despite the many ideas favoring liberty which emerged in the late Middle Ages, when mysticism portrayed religion as too inward to be cut by the sword of the magistrate and humanism fought for freedom of historical investigation. Yet the Protestant Reformation, though intensifying religious fanaticism, at the same time wrecked the unity of the medieval ecclesiastical structure and thus opened a chapter which could end only in mutual extermination or religious liberty. Many factors, some religious and some secular, made for the second alternative. The three presuppositions requisite for religious persecution*, namely that the truth can be known, that the point denied by the heretic is important and that coercion is effective were all subjected to attack by men who were concerned for religion itself   At the same time attention was diverted from religion by a growing secularism in economics, politics and general outlook.

Modern states have dealt with the problem of diverse religions in three ways territorialism, comprehension and complete toleration. The first two were tried when the sects were intolerant of each other. The third requires a tolerant temper.

Territorialism* permits only one religion in one territory, but permits subjects to emigrate, so that in the case of neighboring states with differing religions the problem is solved by an exchange of populations. This system is called cuius regio eius religio (Whose region his religion), and was adopted at the Peace of Augsburg in 1555, the Peace of Westphalia in 1648 and by the American Constitution in 1787, for although no religion was established by our national government, each state was left free to establish whatever religion it might choose, and state churches actually survived in the United States throughout the first third of the nineteenth century.

The second system of comprehension establishes one religion in a given area and, in order to win the allegiance of the entire populace without emigration, makes the doctrinal and other demands very few. Such latitudinarianism characterized the Anglican settlement.

The third system of complete religious liberty has been called the pax dissidentium, where divergent groups agree to live together with no weakening of affirmation and no intimidating of persons. The first experiment along this line was made in Poland in 1783. The next great attempt was made by Oliver Cromwell.* In both of these instances the groups agreeing to respect each other were limited. Cromwell excluded Catholics and Socinians. This system without restriction has come to prevail in the United States, and, despite the establishment, in England also. Prevailingly, too, religious liberty had been achieved on the continent prior to the flare up of persecution by totalitarian states.

The best factual survey of the whole field is that of Francesco Ruffini, Religious Liberty (1912), for England a great wealth of material has been gathered by Wilbur K Jordan, The Development of Religious Toleration in England (1932-40) 4 vols., a briefer treatment of the theory is given by Thomas Lyon, The Theory of Religious Liberty in England, 1603-39 (1937), for the United States there is but one general work, that of Sanford H Cobb, The Rise of Religious Liberty in America (1902), a full outline of the whole subject with bibliography is given by Roland H Banton, "The Struggle for Religious Liberty," Church History X (1941), pp 95-124.

R.H B.

religious magazines in U. S.: See religious journalism in the U. S, religious journals.

religious newspapers in U. S.: See religious journalism in the U. S.

religious orders: See orders, religious.

religious organizations: See anti-national religious organization agitation in the U. S.

religious periodicals in U. S.: See religious journalism in the U S., religious journals.

religious 'powers': (historically considered) In two-factor religions* the following terms or words most properly apply· god, goddess, (more or less personalized and moralized non-human nature forces or powers) shade, hero, ghost, 'dead', soul of the underworld, living soul (human religious forces or 'powers').

In one-factor religions* the following terms or words apply deity, divinity, saint, angel, devil, ancestors, worthies, human soul (living or deceased). Deity stands at the top or center of a vast hierarchy of 'powers' which extends out or down to human souls and beyond, in religions where there is no Deity, the general pattern of entities is in all other respects quite similar to those with a Deity. The general ideology of 'government', inclusive of man and his environment, holds all religious entities in a frame of reference of some kind, intelligible to the adherents, whether they be primitives or members of a complex human society. See classification of religions.

F.L.P.

religious press in the U. S.: See religious journalism in the U. S.

religious societies: See evangelicalism and evangelical revival; Wesley, Charles and John.

Religious Society of Friends: See Quakers.

religious tract movement in the United States: Basically, an organized Protestant attempt to reach the unchurched by means of gratuitous or pittance distribution of low-cost evangelistic leaflets or "tracts" within destitute areas. With the passing of the years, however, increasing attention has been given to the distribution of other types of low-cost evangelistic literature than "tracts".

The founding of the Methodist Book Concern at Philadelphia in 1789 marks the planting of the tract idea in America. Jointly a means of eliminating the middlemen's profit in publication and of authorizing large editions to meet the needs of all representatives of the denomination, this Concern produced religious literature so cheaply and on so large a scale as to make wholesale distribution for the first time practicable in the new country. The Methodist circuit rider with bulging pouch of low-cost evangelistic literature became a familiar figure in unchurched areas. At the most he asked only a pittance for his wares. Frequently, aided by financial grants of interested friends, he distributed copies gratuitously. The results in terms of conversions were impressive.

Conditions at the opening of the nineteenth century were ripe for growth of the idea. Ignorance and indifference to religion among the indigent poor in the populated areas along the seacoast had for some time been a concern. Religious destitution along the rapidly expanding frontier was a newer, but equally provocative source of anxiety. An alarming dearth of ministers to supply a corrective in either instance made the situation acute. English Deism and French Illuminatism were spreading unchallenged in destitute areas. Free-lance evangelists were arousing the people to emotional excesses, creating numerous sectarian apostacies. Religion was obviously in a state of confusion. Unless some means could be found to bridge the yawning gap between need and lagging leadership, it would remain in such a state for some time to come.

Quite logically the Methodist precedent of promoting religion in destitute areas through the printed word was seized upon as general remedy. One after another local religious group of varied description organized for the express purpose of printing or purchasing and distributing low-cost religious literature. Whereas the Methodists made considerable use of books, these newly formed groups favored the unbound leaflet of "tract", thereby coming to be called "tract societies". Organization was simple One became a member by contributing a sum suited to his means. In return he received a certain number of cheap tracts of his choice. These were then distributed, usually gratuitously, in destitute areas. Over 450 local societies so organized are known to have been founded 1800-1825, mostly in the East. None distributed less than a few thousand tracts; one, the New England Tract Society of Boston, over 4,000,000.

The year 1825 brought an important change in emphasis. Through the formation of the American Tract Society, in New York, the various local groups were knit together into a working national unit, greatly increasing their effectiveness. Sponsored by an interdenominational board of directors, the Society besought all regional organizations interested in propagation of the "essential truths" of the faith to become auxiliaries in a master attempt at evangelization through the printed page. The plan was essentially a division of labor. The Society with its unexcelled stereotyping equipment would concentrate upon the mass production of approved tracts to make them available at a fraction of previous cost. Auxiliaries relieved of printing and purchasing problems would spend full time in distribution. Response was immediate. Evangelical groups with few exceptions fell in with the plan. Only minority groups objecting to the "essential truths" withheld support—such as the Unitarians, Universalists, etc., and, of course, the Catholics. Denominational publication societies for the most part turned their attention to specific interests, leaving the production of tracts for general evangelization purposes largely to the interdenominational American Tract Society which has to date printed over 525,000,000 copies of tracts, several thousand distinct tracts being involved.

Simultaneous with national organizations periodical publication was undertaken. The American Tract Society has successively sponsored in the English language the· American Tract Magazine (N. Y., 1825-42); American Messenger (N. Y., 1843-1923); and Truth (N. Y., 1941 to date). Auxiliary societies have upon occasion become active in this area. The Evangelical Tract Society at Newburgh, N. Y., issued the Christian Witness (1822-1826). The New York State Tract Society supported the New York Tract Magazine (1824-1827). The Pennsylvania and Delaware Tract Magazine (Phila., 1828-1831) represented the societies of the respective states. During Civil War years the branch society at Boston was particularly active, supporting in turn the: Christian Banner and Tract Journal (Boston and N. Y., 1859-72), Child at Home (Boston, 1860-73); Freedman's Journal (Boston, 1864-69?), and Freedman (Boston, 1865-1866). Future research will undoubtedly reveal other titles. Meantime, the "American" Society's singular achievement of circulating since 1825 over 336,000,000 periodical issues speaks in itself of the influence exerted.

A further undertaking termed the "Volume Enterprise" was entered upon in 1828. At that time, in consultation with auxiliaries, the American Tract Society projected publication of a series of fifteen books, quality reflected by the inclusion of such works as Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress, Baxter's Saints Everlasting Rest and Dodderidge's, Rise and Progress of Religion in the Soul. Solid worth, attractive make-up and low cost worked together to make the project a marked success. Ministers and Christian workers in their enthusiastic distribution quickly exhausted the initial supply and entered a plea for larger editions and a wider selection of titles. The evangelical slogan came to be "at least one such volume in every home in the Union". Formidable as the undertaking was, it did not miss its mark far. Other series of books followed, including a library for children. Some 36,000,000 volumes have been published to date, representing several hundred distinct works.

The institution of "colporteur service" about 1840 added appreciably to the success of the movement. Home missionaries of humble gift but deep devotion, colporteurs have carried the Christian message in evangelical leaflet and volume to the neglected extremes of the country, viz., the congested districts of the city and the lonely frontier farm. At one time more than five hundred such workers were employed by central society and auxiliaries with instructions to sell or give away literature as seemed best to the furtherance of evangelistic effort.

Several more specialized features of the movement remain to be mentioned. Since the Mexican War (1846-48) the "American" Society has served as coordinator in a persistent tract ministry to the soldier and sailor. Chaplains have been supplied with an enormous amount of literature, much of it free. To be closely associated with this ministry is the Society's seventy-year-old custom of presenting Scriptures to West Point graduates. Of different aspect, but quite as established as a custom, is organized work among immigrants. Through library and workers based on Ellis Island the Society has long met the immigrant with citizenship manual in one hand, gospel leaflet in the other. This has required the printing of literature in many foreign languages. So it has been that nearly a fifth of all publications printed by the Society—some 150,000,000 copies including tracts, periodicals and volumes—have been issued in foreign language. Only a portion have been distributed on the Island proper. The rest have followed the immigrant inland.

Were it possible to add figures respecting independent tract activity carried on by non-cooperating groups within the evangelical fold, by non-evangelical connections like the Unitarians and by the Catholics, the powerful influence wielded by quantity distribution of low-cost religious literature would become even more impressive. The citation of such figures, however, lies within the province of denominational history, having no relevance to the "Tract Movement" proper which has been cooperative and non-controversial in spirit. See anti-Tract movement in the U. S.

For comprehensive treatment to 1825 see M. V. Mussina, "The Backgrounds and Origins of the American Religious Tract Movement" (Unpublished Doctoral Dissertation, Drew University, 1936). For data since 1825 see E N. Hardy, Century of Revivals (forthcoming 1943) which is a history of the operations of the American Tract Society (N. Y.). The pamphlet A Brief History of the American Tract Society, Boston (1855, by said Society) is an informing sketch of the activities of the important branch society at Boston which began in 1814 as the New England Tract Society, changed its name to American Tract Society in 1823 and has retained such since déspite appropriation of the name by the central society at New York in 1825. For further reliable information, original sources must be consulted. Best-balanced of these are the various periodicals mentioned supra. For summary listings of titles and volumes published, circulation statistics and other concise data the Annual Report of the American Tract Society (1825 to date) is superior. The Society has carefully preserved copies of its various publications along with other material relevant to the Tract Movement and is eager to grant the research student access to its collection. Dr H. R Monro, present president, has furnished the basic information for this article, and Dr. W. H. Matthews, secretary, has offered valuable assistance.   G.P.A.

remanence: (Lat., remanere, to remain) A term denoting a view of the Lord's Supper which upholds the belief that the material elements of bread and wine remain (remanent) in the sacrament after consecration coexistent with the body and blood of Christ, in contradistinction to the Roman Catholic view of transubstantiation in which, at the time of consecration, only the external form (accidents) of the bread and wine is believed to remain while the substance of both elements is changed into the true body and blood of Christ. The doctrine is most closely associated with the 'teaching of John Wyclif* on the Lord's Supper (Cf. his De Eucharistia). Cf. consubstantiation, impanation, Lutheran doctrine of the Lord's supper, transubstantiation.   F.W.N.

Remonstrants, the: The forty-five ministers, defenders of Arminian* views, who signed the Remonstrance in 1610 were called the Remonstrants. In 1619, at the Synod of Dort*, the Remonstrants were deposed from their ministry. Later, they were sentenced to banishment. In 1630, they were granted complete freedom to live and work anywhere in Holland. See five points of Arminianism.   W.E.R.

Renaissance: A wave of intellectual and esthetic awakening and of secular culture which may be thought of as originating in Italy in the fourteenth century and having its Italian culmination at the end of the fifteenth and early in the sixteenth, and rising and falling at correspondingly later dates in France, Germany, the Low Countries, England and Spain. The word means "rebirth." The figure of a re-birth is ancient and common, especially in connection with religion. In its secular application, the phrase, "Roma renascitur," was used in the ninth century in connection with the Carlovingian schools. In the fifteenth century the great Florentine Platonist, Ficino*, declared, "Plato renascitur." Macchiavelli* spoke (1527) of "Roma renata " In his Lives of the Painters (1550), Vasari mentioned "la rinascita di questi arti"—meaning the fine arts. In French (about 1700) there is reference to "la renaissance de lettres . . . des arts." The use of the term, "La Renaissance" to designate a particular period is first found in French early in the nineteenth century, and about 1840 the French word began to be adopted in English with the same meaning. Matthew Arnold (1869) substituted the form derived directly from the Latin, "Renascence," but this never gained wide currency.

The most brilliant definitions of the renaissance have generally been interpretations or evaluative judgments rather than factual descriptions. Michelet "The discovery of the world and of man." Walter Pater "A general excitement and enlightening of the human mind." Symonds: "The attainment of self-conscious freedom to the human spirit." On the other hand, modern Roman Catholic writers and neo-medievalists generally, since they find the climax of culture in the thirteenth century solidarity of European thought and society under ecclesiastical authority at its apogee, view the Renaissance as no "re-birth" at all but a period of disintegration and decadence, much as a French monarchist with a firm attachment to Bourbon ideals would view the French Revolution.

Whether for better or for worse, the Renaissance certainly had the character of a revolution. Its keynote was a secular humanism implying recognition of human and mundane values as having validity unconditioned by theological considerations or ecclesiastical approval Ignoring, without troubling to dispute, the Augustinian view of man as a victim of original sin and as wholly dependent upon a hierarchically controlled church for the means of grace by which he might enjoy status in the present world and the hope of future felicity, the men of the Renaissance found that the natural man, in his own right and by his own powers, has resources of knowledge and satisfying experience. For this conscious and unashamed delight in life, they found their models and their "Scriptures" in the literature of classical antiquity. The "revival of learning," generally associated and sometimes erroneously identified with Renaissance humanism, was therefore more than a series of antiquarian discoveries and linguistic exercises. It was the apparatus by which men could be put into possession of patterns of life and thought which had prevailed before humanity had lost the title-deeds to joy and freedom. This secular humanistic delight in the life that now is and the classicism which gave it an honored tradition and an intellectual formulation were the primary characteristics of the Renaissance.

Secondary characteristics which naturally followed from these included a general exaltation of the ideal of liberty, a high degree of individualism both in thought and in the conduct of life; a free exercise of criticism in regard to accepted ideas and existing institutions, a development of the spirit of experiment and exploration, the stimulation of creativity, love of sensuous beauty for its own sake and for the joy it gives, a realistic attitude toward human and natural phenomena, sensuality, in those who found the pagan freedom going to their heads and for whom the restraints of the Christian code of morals ceased to be (or had never been) effective; and, especially for men of exceptional powers, the ideal of versatility as more admirable than concentrated attention to a single field of endeavor.

While the rise of the Renaissance in Italy has been dated, roughly, in the mid-fourteenth century —say, with Petrarch and Boccaccio—it must be noted that its roots run farther back. The rise of the vernacular literatures, especially in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, the widening of horizons due to the Crusades*, the economic changes which these stimulated, and the indirect influence of Arabian and Jewish scholarship—all tended to disturb that "integrated society" which was the ideal, if never the perfect achievement, of the high Middle Ages. The forces of revolt and dissent were, indeed, at work long before the forces of institutional solidarity and integration had reached their peak.

It is unnecessary here to trace the historical events in which the spirit of the Renaissance found expression Its immediate effects on the Roman Catholic Church were a) some loss of prestige and control over the masses, and especially over the intellectuals, even where its authority was not directly challenged, b) the corruption of much of the personnel of the hierarchy, who adopted the pagan morals and sensuality of the Renaissance without adopting its liberating intellectual processes (since free-living was easier and, with their resources of wealth and luxury, more tempting than. free-thinking), c) the development of techniques of thought and criticism which, in the hands of serious reformers, became effective instruments for combatting not only the abuses of the church but the whole theory and structure of its claim to world-dominion, d) the Counter-reformation*, which was not only a housecleaning to get rid of the abuses which had marred the church, and a marshalling of its forces to repell the inroads of Protestantism, but also a Counter-Renaissance. The Protestant Reformation*, both Lutheran and Calvinistic, was also, to a very considerable extent, a reaction against the central concepts of the Renaissance, though it made effective use, especially in its early phases, of impulses and resources which the Renaissance had supplied. The more direct heritage of Renaissance thought—or of the individualistic, empirical and rationalistic methods which it employed—are found in the developments of modern science, in the application of scientific and critical methods to the study of religion, in philosophies of Locke, Hume and the Enlightenment, and in all phases of liberalism. Cf. Pico della Mirandola, Pletho, Pomponazzi; progress; universals, battle over, Vittorino da Feltre.

J A. Symonds, The Renaissance in Italy (London, 1886) , E M Hulme, The Renaissance, The Protestant Reformation and the Catholic Reformation. (1914) ; J. B. Fletcher, Literature of the Italian Renaissance (1934).   W.E.G.

Renaissance style: See art, Christian, ecclesiastical.

Renan, Joseph Ernest: (1823-92) French orientalist, historian, theologian and philosopher. For a time Professor of Hebrew in Collège de France. Was sent to Phoenicia by the government in 1860, where he laid the basis for the Corpus Inscriptionum Semiticarum, 1881-1892. Jumped to fame in 1863 through his Vie de Jésus, later expanded to an eight volume Histoire des Origines du Christianisme (1886). Also wrote 5 volumes on Histoire du peuple d'Israel (1887-1891) and many works in the field of philosophy. See Lives of Jesus.   C.T.C.

Rendtorff, Franz: (1860-1937) German Protestant theologian. He was born in Gütergotz near Potsdam. From 1902-1910 he was professor of Practical Theology, Kiel and from 1910-1930 in Leipzig. His main academic interest was in the historical roots of Protestant public worship and of religious education. As president of the Gus- tav-Adolf-Verein, an organization for the support of Protestant minorities in Roman Catholic countries, he took a very active part in the efforts to strengthen their national selfconsciousness as Germans.

Principal books
Die Taufe im Urchristentum (1905), Das Problem der Konfirmation und der Religionsunterricht in der Volksschule (1910), Die Geschichte des christlichen Gottesdienstes unter dem Gesichtspunkte der liturgischen Erbfolge (1914).   O.A.P.

Renouvier, Charles: (1818-1903) French philosopher, held that reality consists of phenomena, experiences of subjects. Influenced by Kant and Leibniz, he rejected the thing-in-itself of the first and the causal determinism of both earlier thinkers. Probably the first modern to do justice to the aspect of contingency in experience (followed in this by Wm. James*), and one of the first to break with the absolutistic conception of God, who was, he held, perfect in goodness and intelligence, but not in every respect unlimited. A radical finitist, he affirmed a first moment of time—an actually infinite series being logically impossible. See finite God, infinite.

C Renouvier, Essais de critique générale (1851-64), Le Personnalisme (1903), Uchronie (European history as it might have happened, had human freedom chosen another alternative) (1857).   C.H.

reordination: a) Catholic theology excludes reordination as Bishop, priest, or deacon, but ordination* may be repeated if previous orders are not recognized or (conditionally) if previous ordination is doubtful, b) some Protestant views (especially early American Congregationalist) considered ordination as admission to a particular pastoral charge, and therefore repeated the ceremony on occasion.   E R.H.

Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ: See Latter Day Saints.

repentance: (Gr. metanoia) Literally, change of mind. Turning from courses or ends hitherto preferred, to seek other ends or try other ways. So in O.T., God is represented as repenting, changing His intention (Amos 7. 1-6), or undoing His own work through disappointment with the result (Gen. 6 5, 6). More generally, repentance is on man's part Godward; it is turning from the evil life of disobedience to God to the path His will ordains. So Jesus (Mt. 4 17, Mk. 1 14, 15) calls men to repent, to change their mind, purpose and expectation concerning God. In evangelical Christianity, following Apostolic and Pauline teaching, repentance is not merely an act but a full experience, including abhorrence of the sin from which one turns and a constant disposition toward complete amendment of life (2 Cor. 7. 9, 10, Acts 26 20). The depth of the experience is sometimes seen in portrayals where the word 'repentance' is not used, as when Paul speaks of the believer as being buried with Christ and raised to total newness of life (Rom. 6: 3-5; Col. 2· 12). In John, the word 'repent' does not occur; but there is the same idea of change or renewal under the figure of the New Birth, which parallels repentance as the condition of entrance to the Kingdom (cf. Mk. 1. 15 and John 3 3). Repentance is not produced by man's unaided resolve, but is God's gift or 'operation' (Col. 2 12, cf. Acts 3 26). Repentance as act, turning, has its completion in Faith*, its fruit or reward in Forgiveness* (Acts, 2 38, 3 19, 26 18), or in Repentance as experience as indicated above. See conviction of sin, Pullus, Robert, salvation, terminism.

C Ryder Smith, The Bible Doctrine of Salvation (1941), L Arpee, The Atonement in Experience (1932), V Taylor, Forgiveness and Reconciliation (1941).   J.L.

rephaim: Race of legendary giants mentioned in the O T. (Gen. xiv, 5, xv, 20, Deut. iii, 11, II Sam xxi. 16-22, etc.).   S L.T.

reprobation: Final apostasy* from God. A part of the doctrine of election* whose classicus locus is Calvin, Institutes, III. xxi ("God determined . . . every individual, . . . eternal life foreordained for some, eternal damnation for others"). Outstanding precursors of Calvin* Paul (Rom 1 28, 9 18) and Augustine. Premise of reprobation Divine Sovereignty and Foreknowledge*, that God's will prevails, He foreknows all and purposes as He foreknows, applicable to fact of the unsaved. Many hold premise without the consequence, 'reprobation not necessary inference of doctrine of election' (Denney).

S A McDowall, Is Sin Our Fault? (1932), Westminster Books, C H Valentine, Moral Freedom and the Christian Faith (1932).   J.L.

requiem: A mass* for the dead sung at funerals and on All Souls' Day*. The sections differ from the regular form of the mass, the joyful gloria and the credo being omitted and other sections added. The usual arrangement is introit, kyrie, gradual and tract, sequence, offertory, sanctus et benedictus, agnus Dei, and communio. Outstanding composers are Palestrina, Vittoria, Cherubini, Fauré, and Dvorák. The German Requiem of Brahms may not be properly called a requiem for it is a setting of seven unliturgical texts from the German Bible. See prayers for the dead.   E.H.B.

requiescat: The first word of the Latin formula requiescat in pace, "May he (or she) rest in peace", generalized to cover any prayer for the repose of the dead. See prayers for the dead   B S.E.

reredos: (Rear—Fr. dos, back, from Lat., dorsum) The screen back of an altar*, often rich with ornament and religious symbolism.   F.T.P.

rescript: In Roman law, an answer on a question of law given by the Emperor in writing, either by a subscriptio on the original petition or by an independent epistola, at the request of a petitioner. Strictly speaking, it was personal in character and was not intended to constitute a precedent. In canon law* (Codex Iuris Canonici, 36-62), a reply in writing, given by the Holy See* or an Ordinary, concerning matters relating to judicial controversies (r. justitiae) or granting favors (r. grattae). Rescripts may be in the form of Bulls, Briefs, Apostolic Letters, or (most commonly) simple rescripts. Like a particular precept, a rescript affects only the person or persons for whom given. Cf. bull, papal; motu proprio.   J.C.M. reservation of the sacrament: In the Roman Catholic and the Eastern churches, after administration of the Holy Communion a portion of the consecrated species is reserved to communicate those unable to be present, especially the sick and, above all, those at the point of death. The custom has been revived in many Anglican churches but is virtually absent from Protestantism.   B.S.E.

response: The liturgical answer of the people to a declaration or invitation uttered by the officiant at a service. A fixed group of such declarations with the responses is a "Responsary" (Lat.. responsorium), often very elaborate in form.   B.S.E.

restitution: Ordinary meaning, return of what has been misappropriated to rightful possessor, or reparation for injury done. This is a Christian obligation, prerequisite of acceptable approach to God (Math. 5: 23, 24). Special theological meaning: restoration (Gr., apokatastasis: Acts 3: 21), through God's triumph over all that has marred His work, of man's life and the entire creation to His original design.   J.L.

restorationism: The belief that God's purpose, interpreted as the ultimate restoration of all things including therefore the final salvation of all men, cannot be forever frustrated but must be completely accomplished. This belief which was advocated by Origen* and which has appeared in subsequent Christian thought, is definitely affirmed by the Universalists*. However the doctrine of restorationism is regarded as heretical by the R. C. Church and by the Protestant Churches generally. The advocates of this belief protest against any tendency in religious thought to isolate God's act of judging from His eternal nature as Sovereign Love. Since God's holiness is the holiness of Sovereign Love the reality of that divine holiness* is redemptive and sanctifying rather than punitive in its ultimate effect upon sinners. This doctrine does not deny that so long as the rebellious soul remains impenitent it will experience the fierce intensity of God's reaction against evil as a punishment or torment. Nevertheless, the doctrine of restorationism affirms that it would be an unworthy representation of God, who would have all men to be saved, to hold that He is not able to accomplish that which he purposes. It must be believed therefore that the infinitely resourceful and Sovereign Love of God will overcome all evil with the Divine Goodness so that all beings will finally live a blessed life with God "that God may be all in all." (I Cor. 15.28).   H.W.J.

resurrection: (Lat., re-, again; surgere, rise)

Restoration of the dead to life, especially the re-animation of the bodies of the dead. The historic Christian doctrine is based on the accounts of the resurrection of Jesus* and other passages of the N.T., and was affirmed by the Fourth Lateran Council (1215), which stated that all men,·saved and reprobate alike, "will rise again with their own bodies which they now bear about with them." (See resurrection of the dead—for Jewish and Christian views.) A vague notion that the dead body will rise is widely prevalent among primitive animists. This must be the explanation of many wide-spread burial customs, such as the burial of tools and food with the dead. The antiquity of such customs is well attested by paleolithic remains. However, primitive men do not distinguish sharply between material and spiritual realities, nor, as a rule, define their views consistently. It is therefore impossible to determine, even in some existing tribes, whether it is believed that the body will rise again, or, rather, that a quasi-material soul, of similar form, leaves the body and engages in activities analogous to those of the present life. Likewise, the Greek and Roman doctrine of the soul's sojourn in Hades* was of a finely attenuated, yet material being, recognizably similar to the earthly body, and deeply affected by the treatment accorded the body, yet not identical with it. Zoroastrianism* presents a doctrine of the life hereafter which is much more vividly materialistic in conception, but even Zoroastrians do not clearly affirm the resurrection of the body. The clearest assertion of belief in bodily resurrection, outside of Jewish and Christian thought, is to be found in the Mohammedan *Koran, which is, of course, deeply influenced by the Christian teaching. According to the Koran, God will call the angels* to bring out the dead and raise them up as living bodies of flesh. They will occur the judgment. Thereafter the elect will live in sensuous enjoyment of abounding food, dazzling gems, and "large-eyed damsels," while the wicked will be cast into everlasting and equally physical torment. Some Mohammedans have interpreted such descriptions as figurative representations of spiritual pleasure and pain, but these interpretations have been vigorously rejected by the orthodox. See descent into hades; final judgment, immortality, kinds of; primitive religion; soul.

   See J. Hastings, Encyclopedia of Religion and Ethics, "State of the Dead."   L.H.DEW.

resurrection of Jesus: Of this event there are seven, or perhaps eight, different accounts in the N.T. (Mt. 28, Mk. 16, Jn. 20, Jn. 21, I Cor. 15: 3-8, Ac. 1. 2, 3, Lk. 24: 13-32) and allusions to it are constant. This abundance of evidence is, however, a source of difficulty, since the accounts are often in conflict with one another. Undoubtedly the primary one is that of Paul in I Cor. 15. It is the earliest in date, and Paul expressly states that he repeats the testimony of all the Apostles. At several points he is in agreement with the Gospel narratives. 1) Christ arose on the third day. 2) He appeared first to Peter (cf. Lk. 24 34). 3) From the mention of James and the "500 at once" it may be inferred that most or all of the visions took place in Galilee. But in Paul's account there are significant differences. 1) The whole stress is laid on the visions, and no mention is made of the empty tomb 2) The visions continued through a considerable period, as we also learn from the notice in Ac: 1 3. 3) The appearance to Paul himself is placed on the same footing as the earlier ones. What Paul saw on the way to Damascus was Christ in his glorified body, and it would follow that the visions of Peter and the others were of the same character. Of the Gospel accounts that of Mark is the earliest, and is much simpler than those in the other Gospels, although it centers like them on the empty tomb. From a comparison of the various narratives it may be gathered that a tendency was at work to make a mysterious event ever more mysterious. It may be gathered, too, that the story of the tomb was originally a confirmation of the visions. The disciples had seen the Lord in Galilee, returning to Jerusalem they met the women, who reported that they had found the tomb empty. This in itself was obviously no evidence that the Lord had risen, but in course of time the whole emphasis came to be laid on it.

There can be no question that the faith in the resurrection was grounded on some fact. In the narrative of Paul we have evidence which came directly from eye-witnesses, who were fully convinced that they had seen the risen Lord. To explain the nature of their experience will always be impossible, and it must have been inexplicable to themselves. They were in a mood of ecstasy, in which they were conscious only of the momentary impression. Attempts were made later to reflect on it, and to these we owe the narrative in the Gospels; but Paul wisely confines himself to the bare fact, "the Lord was seen". The difficulties which have always been felt are much more concerned with the mode of the resurrection than with the fact,—that the disciples were in some way brought into living contact with Christ after his death. Modern psychology has sought, in its own manner, to explain their experience, or explain it away, but the theories offered deal only with the mechanism and not with the fact. To say that the resurrection visions were subjective means nothing, for a knowledge given subjectively may still be real. The problem is insoluble, not because of the inadequacy of our information, but because of our ignorance of the unseen world and its relations to this one.

M Goguel, La foi a la résurrection (1933) ; K. Lake, The Resurrection of Jesus (1907) , C. Bowen, The Resurrection of Jesus (1911).   E.F.S.

resurrection of the dead: A term which is often loosely employed to denote the future life. It applies, however, not to immortality in the large sense, but to that conception of it which was peculiar to the Hebrew mind. For Greek thought the body was nothing but a prison in which the higher rational principle was confined, and from which it must be released before it could attain to its true being. For the Hebrews the body was essential to full life. The soul in itself had no force or substance, and must be re-united with the body if the actual man was to exist after death. In the O.T. this idea of resurrection is never definitely set forth, though in several passages it is at least suggested. According to Daniel (12·2, 13) those who have remained faithful through persecution will be raised up hereafter. Job declares his conviction (19 25) that although he dies and is buried he will appear in his flesh before God, who will vindicate him. For the most part, however, the O.T. accepts the primitive view that after death the soul* survives only as a ghost in Sheol*, the world of shadows underneath the earth. The idea of immortality* is by no means absent from the O.T., but it expresses itself in the purely religious faith that fellowship with God must needs be for ever. This belief finds its grandest utterance in Ps. 73. 23ff, but underlies all the religion of the Psalms and Prophets The doctrine of resurrection first becomes prominent in the apocalyptic* books, which take their departure from the O.T. idea of the "day of Jahveh", when the new age will be ushered in by a general Judgment. On this day, according to the apocalyptists, the dead of past ages will be raised up to receive sentence of acquittal or of condemnation. Much of the detail in this conception can be traced to Persian sources. In some of the books it is assumed that all men will be restored to their bodies and judged, in others, God will concern himself only with Israel. Some of the writers think only of a "resurrection of the just", the mass of men will pass out of being, or remain forever as ghosts in Sheol. In the time of Christ the belief in a resurrection had become general, but was not obligatory. It was rejected by the Sadducees as a later accretion which had no place in genuine O.T. teaching. There was doubt also as to whether all men would be raised up or only the righteous. Jesus himself takes the fact of a future life for granted, and no doubt relates it to the Jewish conception of a resurrection. But he nowhere lays any stress of the re-union of soul and body. What he believes in is simply an eternal life, assured to those who by faith and obedience have part in the Kingdom of God. The one passage in which he deals explicitly with the subject is in his answer to the question of the Sadducees*, (Mk. 12 18ff.) where he bases the fact of immortality on the eternity of God. In this passage, and elsewhere in his teaching, Jesus disclaims all knowledge of the nature of the resurrection and the life which follows it. Such details as may be found in his parables (e.g., the Rich Man and Lazarus, the Last Judgment*) are mere imagery, taken over from popular belief. In later N.T. thought the idea of resurrection assumes a new importance in view of the assurance that Christ himself had risen. Paul devotes his longest chapter (I Cor. 15) to a refutation of the doctrine, held apparently by Greek Christians at Corinth, that the soul, in the future life, is no longer clothed with a body At the same time he admits that the immortal body is not the earthly one restored, but a new body, woven of heavenly substance. His chief interest is to maintain the continuance of personal identity, and he cannot conceive of it without some kind of body. In I Cor. 15 he holds to the apocalyptic idea of a general resurrection, but in 2 Cor. 5 1-8 he thinks of each believer as passing immediately after death into the new "tabernacle" awaiting him in Heaven. The Fourth Evangelist formally accepts the belief in a rising again at the last day (Jn. 6. 30) but in his own thinking he has broken with apocalyptic ideas. The resurrection, as he conceives it, takes place here and now in the act of faith in Christ (Jn. 11. 25, 26). In the period following the N.T. the doctrine of a resurrection of the body became a fixed element of the creed, and was often construed in the crudest and most literal way. At the same time the hope of immortality was independent of it. Christians have always believed, however inconsistently, that in death they are released from this bodily life, and enter at once into another. See Israel, religion and theology.

M Goguel, La foi a la résurrection (1933), W. Morgan, Religion and Theology of Paul (1917), J. Baillie, And the Life Everlasting (1933).   E.F.S.

retention of sins: In the Sacrament of Penance* as existent in the Roman Catholic Church, the exercise in a negative sense of the power of the keys* (John 20 23, Matt. 16 19, 18 18). In popular language the act of retaining sins is called the "denial of absolution*." In itself, however, it is not a simply refusal to absolve, as one might refuse to baptize, but a positive juridical act, which effects in the subject of the Church an obligation again to submit his case to her sacramental judgment, in consequence of the fact that his guilt has been authoritatively affirmed to be as yet unforgiven by her. This obligation remains even though the guilt of the retained sin may be subsequently forgiven in virtue of an act of perfect contrition*. The existence of the power of retention is intrinsically related to the doctrine that Christ instituted the Sacrament of Penance in the form of a judicial procedure, and as an obligatory means for the remission of postbaptismal mortal sin* (Council of Trent, sess. 14). The priest may legitimately use the power only when he is certain from positive evidence that the subject is indisposed for absolution, which would therefore be of no avail to him, in defect of true sorrow for his sins or of a sincere present will to forsake them. See sacraments.   J.C.M.

retreat: A period of withdrawal for special devotions, usually by a group led by a conductor.
B.S.E.

Reuchlin, Johann von: (1455-1522) German humanist and student of Hebrew and Cabala*. He became involved in a dispute with a Dominican Friar, Pfefferkorn, who had inspired an imperial edict, issued in 1509, to destroy the Talmud* and other Hebrew writings. Through Reuchlin's efforts the edict was finally rescinded.

Reuchlin's writings include the first Hebrew grammar and dictionary written by a Christian L Geiger, Johann Reuchlin, sein Leben und seine Werke (Leipzig, 1871)   B Z.B.

Reuss, Eduard G. E.: (1804-91) French Protestant theologian who taught at the University of Strasbourg from 1834-88. A leader in the development of the application of historical method to scripture, mediating German scholarship to French protestantism In addition to his biblical studies he collaborated in a complete edition of the works of Calvin. Among his writings were Histoire de la théologie chrétienne au siècle apostolique (1852) and La Bible, traduction nouvelle avec introductions et commentaires (16 bde. 1874-81).   C T.C.

Reuter, Hermann: (1817-1889) Professor in Breslau, Greifswald and Göttingen, he was the most notable representative of the monographic study of church history.
Alexander III. und die Kirche seiner Zeit, vol I (Leipzig, 1845), vols. II and III (Leipzig, 1860-64), Geschichte der religiösen Aufklärung im Mittelalter (Berlin, 1875-77), Augustin (Gotha, 1887) revelation: The general notion which the word and its equivalents (Gr, apokalypsis, Lat., revelatio, Ger., Offenbarung) represent is that of the uncovering of the previously hidden. It receives its special meanings in Jewish and Christian theology from its use in connection with ideas of a personal or, at least, dynamic Godhead, with specific historical events and persons, and with the sacred writings. Thus the term is significantly used in three types of statements. 1) those which assert that God as personal makes his reality, nature and presence known to men by his own action; 2) those which affirm that such self-manifestations of God or disclosures of his plan or demands have been made in certain events, such as the history of the Hebrews, the birth, life, death and resurrection of Jesus Christ, 3) those which assert that the Scriptures or some part of them publish the content of the divine will or the knowledge necessary to salvation. In statements of the first type revelation is contrasted with discovery in which the human mind takes the initiative and employs previously held categories for the understanding of the divine. In such statements attention is directed to divine initiative as characteristic of present-day as well as of past experience of God or of faith in him. In the second type of statement revelation is contrasted with non-historical, conceptual thought and attention is directed to the concreteness, the "once-for-all", unrepetitive character of divine self-manifestation. The third type of statement sets up a claim for the authority of Scriptures which must, however, be validated by reference to inspiration*. While the three types of statements—that God manifests himself, making his goodness and power known by his own action, that he does so through certain events and their recollection, that the Bible contains his statements about truth and right—are not exclusive of each other neither do they necessarily imply each other and great variations occur in the theology of revelation according to the point of departure which is taken. Recent theological discussion, in distinction from the empiricism which began with man's search for God and from popular orthodoxy which at all times begins with the claim to Biblical authority, has tended to emphasize revelation in the first and second senses, dealing with Scriptures as record and means of revelation rather than revelation proper. Its problems are mainly those of the relation of personal faith to historical events
H H.

Apart from this question the major problems theology has sought to solve with the aid of revelation concepts are those of the relative values of divine and human action in the achievement or gift of faith in God, and of the relation of general moral and metaphysical principles to historically conditioned faith. These and some subordinate problems have been dealt with traditionally, not without confusion of issues, in efforts to answer the question about the relative functions of reason and revelation. Gilson's classification of the four main positions taken in Christian thought in answering this question seems definitive. They are: 1) "Tertullianism" which contends for the complete self-sufficiency of revelation, decrying reason as a means to true faith or knowledge; 2) "Averroism", which regards revelation as a psychologically and sociologically desirable but logically unnecessary republication of the "truths of reason", 3) "Thomism", which values reason as preparatory to the reception of revelation; 4) "Augustinianism" which regards reason as dependent on faith, true faith and hence true reasoning as dependent on revelation. While these positions are all represented in modern theology more precise definition of meanings and of issues as well as the prevalence of the historical and sociological approach to both philosophy and Scriptures have led to a restatement of the problems of revelation and to efforts at more comprehensive solutions. See sacred literatures, Word of God.

K. Barth, Kirchliche Dogmatik, Vol I, Die Lehre vom Wort Gottes, Pt. I (Munich, 1932); Pt. II (Zollikon, 1938); E Brunner, Philosophy of Religion (London, 1937); E. Gilson, Reason and Revelation in the Middle Ages (1938); J Baillie, (ed.) Revelation (London, 1937); H. R. Niebuhr, The Meaning of Revelation (1940), A. E. Taylor, The Faith of a Moralist, Vol. II (London, 1930).

                                                                    H.R.N.

Revelation of John: The Roman demand of emperor worship* as a token of loyalty to the empire, in the latter part of the reign of Domitian* threatened the church with destruction and must have tempted many to compromise. The Revelacion is written to the seven churches of the Roman province of Asia, to warn them against such a step and to revive their faith in the final triumph of the Kingdom of God. Strongly influenced by the recently published collection of Paul's letters, it opens with a similar corpus of letters to seven churches, preceded by a general letter to all seven. They must be victorious over the temptation that threatens them. Then in three great visions, John*, the prophet of Ephesus declares the certainty of the future triumph of Christ over the empire, and portrays the heavenly city that is to be the home of the redeemed. The book is strongly colored by the vocabulary and imagery of Jewish apocalyptic*, but it is also influenced by Greek drama, dawning Christian liturgy, and the collected Pauline letters. It predicts the fall of the persecuting empire and the destruction of Rome, which John with the other apocalyptists of his day viewed as a modern Babylon. In perhaps the darkest hour of early Christian history, the Revelation proclaimed the Christian's indomitable faith in God and in the triumph of his cause. Probable date c. 93 A.D. See beast; canons of various churches, final judgment.

S. J Case, The Revelation of John (1919), R H. Charles, The Revelation of St. John (1920), 2 vols reverend: The accepted title in English for any clergyman, it should be preceded by the definite article and should never be used with the surname alone. For the higher clergy according to English usage a dean is entitled "Very Reverend," a bishop "Right Reverend," an archbishop "Most Reverend." But in very recent Roman Catholic practice bishops and archbishops alike are styled "Most Reverend," while priests granted the rank of "Monsignor"* are addressed as "Right Reverend." The title "Father" historically applied only to members of religious orders ("choir fathers" as distinguished from "lay brothers"); its use in English for any Roman Catholic priest appears to have originated in Ireland, a practice followed in America. In England, however, the usage did not appear until about 1865 and is said to be decreasing today For Anglican clergy the title "Father" is a matter of individual preference.
                                                                    E.J.G.

                                                                    B.S E.

revers: (Lat., reversus, return) This word, referring originally in German usage to any written acknowledgment of obligation, came to be used by the Lutherans to signify a solemn written acceptance of doctrine and polity on the part of pastors, candidates for ordination, and congregations. The requirement of signing a revers in the presence of witnesses was prevalent in Germany during the eighteenth century and was imported thence to America.   T.A.K.

Revised versions: (1881 and 1901) See Bible, English.

revivals: See Awakening, the Great; evangelicalism and evangelical revival; Finney, C. G.; holiness churches; Moody, D. L.; New Measures; pietism, pietistic sects in America.

rewards and punishments: Pleasant and painful experiences distributed according to merit. More specifically, such experiences in a life after death.

Among most primitive peoples there is a prevalent belief in the soul's survival of death, but the conception of it is often too vague to permit any clear idea of rewards or punishments. Even when vivid and detailed descriptions of the future life are given, the dead are pictured as continuing according to their status in this world, though the entire realm of the dead is usually regarded as inferior to the land of the living. The doctrines of the ancient Babylonians also were of this type. Greek mythology presented a similar view, but the Orphic and Pythagorean mysteries introduced notions of a last judgment, and this notion appears in Plato's Phaedrus, Republic, and Gorgias. The Egyptians taught, two thousand years before Plato's time, that all men would be judged by Osiris, the ones who were found worthy being resurrected to enter upon an everlasting life of blessedness similar to earth's more prosperous and happy hours. Those failing to pass the test were to remain in the dark, subterranean region of the hopeless dead, or, according to other accounts, to be vengefully tortured by burning, drowning, or dissection. According to the Hindu Rigveda, the warrior-dead, sages, priests, and wealthy patrons of the priesthood would enjoy the bliss of heaven, where music, flowers, and many other pleasures of mind and body abound. For the wicked a terrible dark abyss was waiting. The fate of others was not made clear. Later Hindu* teachings have differed. (See transmigration and immortality, kinds of: Spiritual Monism.) Buddhist* teaching provides an enormous variety of destinies, all dependent upon moral and religious merit, but, according to Mahayana doctrine, affected also by the saving power of the Bodhisattvas. There are eight or more hot hells, sixteen or more minor hells, and, according to some writers, eight cold hells. A vast period of torture in a specific one of the hells is the prescribed punishment to be suffered for each of many designated sins. There are also six sensual heavens, thirteen or more heavens of form (Rupaloka), and four where the bounds of human understanding are completely transcended. At death, a human being may be born into one of the hells or heavens or reborn in some human or animal form of this world. (See transmigration.) Zoroastrian* teachings depict a judgment at the Chinvad Bridge, from which the evil fall into hell, but over which the righteous pass to enter the appropriate one of the seven heavens. In hell there is the most precise fitting of punishments to the wrongs committed, but all are terrible to contemplate. The Mohammedan *Koran describes physical torments and both physical and spiritual delights which are to follow the resurrection, all according to the merit of the individual, especially his religious fidelity or infidelity. (See resurrection.) The ancient Hebrews thought of divine retribution as falling on the nation as a whole, in this world, long before there emerged a belief in the future judgment of individuals for reward or punishment. But by the beginning of the Christian era there was a highly developed individual, as well as national, eschatology among the Jews. See death and burial practices; eschatology; final judgment; heaven and hell; immortality, conditional; immortality, arguments for and against; immortality, kinds of; penology.

See K. Kohler, Heaven and Hell in Comparative Religion (1923), J Hastings (ed), Encyclopedia of Religion and Ethics (1921), "State of the Dead."
L.H.Dew.

Rheims New Testament: See Bible, English. Cf. Douai Bible.

rhetorici: Known as sophists in Plato's time, who used rhetoric for display of virtuosity and glory of the speaker. Plato's ultimate objection to them is moral. Aristotle* insists that rhetoricians use their art to "energize knowledge" and must never divorce speech from significant subject matter. Classical oratory marks three stages of deliberative, forensic, and occasional, and tends with the last to jejuneness. Christian preaching* initiates a return to the Platonic and Aristotelian moral emphasis. St. Augustine's* De Doctrina Christiana, Book IV is the classic of Christian rhetoric. Using Cicero's canons of "instruct, win, move" and "subdued, moderate, and grand style", Augustine illustrates them with materials from Scripture and patristics*. Rhetoric has become homiletics*.
C B Baldwin, Ancient Rhetoric and Poetic (1924); Medieval Rhetoric and Poetic (1928); Sister Thérèse Sullivan, De Doctrina Christiana Liber IV, A Commentary, with a Revised Text, Introduction and Translation, The Catholic University of American Patristic Series, vol. XXIII (1930).
Q.B.

rhythm, musical: A pulsating, flowing, ordered movement of tones. Metrical rhythm is a regular occurrence of accented and unaccented beats in a time pattern. Free rhythm is an irregular occurrence of strong and weak beats such as one finds in plainsong*.
E.H.B.

Ricci, Matteo: (1552-1610) Italian Jesuit and pioneer Christian missionary to China in modern times. Through his scientific attainments, especially in mathematics, and his skill in making maps, clocks, and other instruments, he won the respect of the Chinese. After a thorough study of their language, literature, and customs, Ricci adopted toward the culture of the Chinese a favorable attitude which caused protracted controversy after his death.
E.A.R.

Rice, Luther: (1783-1836) Pioneer Baptist missionary and educational organizer (Columbian College, Washington). Responsible for Triennial Convention, 1814. "Coming of Luther Rice, the most important event in Baptist history in nineteenth century."
C.H.M.

Richard Lectureship in the Christian Religion, The James W.: Established in 1920 by Miss Este Coffinberry at the University of Virginia, Charlottesville, Virginia. The capital sum is now about $24,000. The purpose of the lectureship is the "advancement and application of the principles of the Gospels." The lectures have been given biennially since 1931. The following is the list of lectures and subjects· W. F. Albright, "Archaeology of Palestine and the Bible" (1931); J. Moffatt, "The Epi-Christian Age" (1933); W. E. Hocking, "The Idea of God and the Unity of the World" (1935), E. H. Gilson, "Reason and Revelation in the Middle Ages" (1937), E. J. Goodspeed, "Christianity Goes to Press" (1939); and R. L. Calhoun, "The Law of God and the Will of Man" (1941).

(Data furnished by the Office of the President of the University.)   v.f.

Richard of St. Victor: (?-1173) Eminent Scottish monk and theologian. A follower of the mystic, Hugo, he viewed profane knowledge as worthless unless linked in some way with divine knowledge. Well known for his mystical theology and for his works on the Trinity. See mystics of Saint-Victor See s.v. penance.

Rickel, Dionysius: See Carthusians.

Ridley, Nicholas: (1500-1555) English Protestant martyr. Bishop of Rochester and later of London. Influential under Edward VI, he died at the stake with Latimer* at Oxford under Queen Mary.   e.c.k.

Riehl, Alois: Representative of the Neo-Kantian* school in Germany during the last third of the 19th century. He stressed the empirical element in Kant's theory of knowledge and held that this theory was the legitimate heir and successor of English thought from Locke to Hume. The Philosophical Criticism (1876 ff)   r.k.

right: In ethical theory the term may refer to the moral law or standard of conduct, however its source· and nature are conceived, or it may refer to action or choice which conforms to that law or standard. These are its substantive and adjectival uses respectively Duty is always a correlative of Right inasmuch as the moral law always involves the obligation of obedience. Right is the basic conception in those ethical theories which regard morality as conformity to some standard. Good is the basic conception in those which regard morality as the pursuit of some end. The relation of the right to the good is variously conceived by the different schools of ethical theory.

In social ethics a right is a justifiable moral claim upon others that implies a duty or duties on the part of others. A legal right is a claim that is recognized and supported by law. A political right is a capacity or function granted to a citizen and guaranteed by the State. A natural right is a claim or liberty that belongs to man as man. It is one that is not derived primarily from the state or positive law but is conceived as having its source in the law of nature and therefore as something more basic and inviolable than a right granted and guaranteed by positive law. See natural rights.   r.w.f.

right of asylum: See asylum.

Rig-Veda: The chief of the four Vedas of ancient India, the others being the Sama-Veda, the Yajur-Veda, and the Atharva-Veda. Consists of hymns and prayers of the Ancient Aryans, many of them doubtless old before the migrants reached India. They were used in the worship of the various Vedic gods. There are ten books, obviously of composite authorship, produced over a long period of time. The tenth book gives evidence of relatively later composition, but probably was completed before 800 B.C. Held in Hinduism to be sruti, i.e., the very inspired word of God.   c.s.b.

righteous anger: See wrath of God.

righteousness, New Testament conception of: Apart from the particular connotation of the term given to it by St. Paul*, righteousness in the N.T. means that behaviour upon the part of man that is well-pleasing to God and in obedience to His will. It has a forensic content in the thought of St. Paul. Paul started with the familiar Pharisaic idea that God would accept only the righteous man at the day of judgment. He denied that man could obtain righteousness by striving to fulfil the regulations of the Torah. He can be "declared just" only by the "righteousness of God," which he appropriates by an attitude of humble and thankful receptivity that Paul calls "faith." The believer is not "justified" by any personal achievement but only because he is allowed by an act of grace to share in the righteousness of God. At the same time he participates in the gift of the Spirit, which makes him righteous in fact as well as by imputation. The righteousness of God enables him to be declared just before the bar of judgment and at the same time provides him with a new dynamic by which his life is henceforth governed.
s.m.g.

righteousness, Old Testament conception of: The conception of justice and righteousness in the O.T. is contained in the Hebrew words 1) sedek and its cognates (most frequently translated "righteousness"), 2) mishpat (usually translated "judgment", or occasionally "justice"), and 3) yashar (primarily meaning "to be straight", "upright")

Righteousness in the O.T. is no abstract or formal principle, but has its basis in the conception of the community as grounded in a covenant relation between God and man, and man and man (see covenant). It is primarily an inward quality, the presupposition of right action, which makes healthful, wholesome, and harmonious personal and community life possible. It outwardly manifests itself in that which permits the maintenance of the covenant, while unrighteousness, sin, is a breach of the community obligations (see lovingkindness).

The immediate background of the terms sedek and mishpat seems to have been in legal practice. Sedek is primarily the "right" to which one is legally entitled. God is righteous, therefore, because he helps his people to their "right": that is, he "saves" them (cf. Isa. 45·21, Zech. 9 9, etc.). Mishpat refers primarily to the custom or law regulating the office or position of each member of the covenant (thus the king's mishpat, I Sam. 8:9; the first-born's mishpat, Deut. 21:17, etc.). Since such customs or laws are frequently established by kings or law courts, the word may refer also to a statute or judicial decision (thus the AV and RV translation "judgment").

In religious usage the terms are charged with ethical and theological meaning. Thus to the prophets the "right" and mishpat of man are moral hating evil and loving good (Amos 5 15, Micah 3 2), and this in turn is identified with the will of God, for it is what God requires of man (Micah 6 8, etc.). God, therefore, is the source of righteousness. The content of the term might vary with different times and minds. Yet, fundamentally, the conception was not that of a formal, ethical postulate, or ideal based on a categorical imperative, but that of a definite quality of personality, standing over all norms and laws as well as in them. Violating God's righteousness means breaking up the divine world order or covenant community, yet the positive, personal quality involved created the possibility of healing or reconstructing the broken bond.

The O.T. idea of righteousness, therefore, remained a living, religious conception, rooted in the belief in God, the Creator and Ruler, whose will and revelation was the source of ethics. It is to be seen in the movement between two parties in the realm of volition man is righteous when, and only when, he is obedient to the will of God (i.e., keeping the law, being just to the poor and sojourner, having proper reverence for God, etc.), and God is righteous because he is ever faithful to the promises made to his covenanted people.   G.E.W.

rishi: An inspired seer, sage or poet. The most famous rishis are those to whom the sacred Vedas* were revealed. There are priestly rishis, and divine or deva rishis. In more recent Hinduism* they are sometimes great ascetics or yogins.
                                                        C.S.B.

rita: The concept of Order, cosmic and ethical, found in Vedic Hinduism and almost certainly reaching back into ancient Indo-European culture. From rita comes the word "right". Varuna is par excellence the guardian of rita in the Rig-Veda.   C.S.B.

Ritschl, Albrecht: (1822-1889) Leading German theologian, latter half of nineteenth century. Born in Berlin (1822), son of a preacher who became a bishop, he studied theology in Bonn (1839-1841) and Halle (1841-1843). His doctoral dissertation was "An exposition of Augustine's doctrine of the creation of the world, sin, and grace." He became Privatdozent in Bonn in 1846, where he taught until 1864. The remainder of his life was spent as professor of theology in Göttingen (1864-1889). Early in his career, somewhat under the influence of Hegel and Baur, he wrote Das Evangelium Marcions und das kanonische Evangelium des Lucas (1846). Die Entstehung der altkatholischen Kirche (2nd. ed., 1857) marked his break with the Hegelian school. His greatest work, Die christliche Lehre von der Rechtfertigung und Versohnung (1st ed., 1870-1874, 2nd ed., 1882, 3rd ed., 1888), presented his characteristic views. His Geschichte des Pietismus (1880-1886), 3 vols., expressed hostility to mysticism

See Otto Ritschl. Albrecht Ritschls Leben (1892-1896), 2 vols   E.S.B

Ritschl, Otto Karl Albrecht: (1860-   ) He taught at the universities of Kiel and Bonn. As son of A. Ritschl he realized on a grand scale the further comprehension of the conception of the history of dogmas. He is one of the investigators who developed the history of dogma to the discipline in which historical theology improved its methodology most independently and attained its most mature results.
  Schleiermachers Stellung zum Christentum in seinen Reden über die Religion (Gotha, 1888), Uber Werturteile (Freiburg, 1895), A. Ritschls Leben, 2 vols (Freiburg, 1892-1896), System und systematische Methode in der Geschichte des wissenschaftlichen Sprachgebrauchs und der philosophischen Methode (Bonn, 1906), Dogmentgeschichte des Protestantismus, 4 vols (Leipzig, 1908-27).   H.H.

Ritschlianism: The ideas of A. Ritschl* and of theologians influenced by him. From about 1875 to the World War of 1914, Ritschlianism was the dominant influence in German and Anglo-American liberal Protestant theology. Building on Luther (faith), Kant (primacy of the practical reason, man a citizen of two worlds), Hegel (historical and social emphasis), Schleiermacher (whose feeling of dependence he criticized in favor of an assertion of personality against nature), and Lotze (personalistic theism, value judgments), Ritschl emphasized the following ideas

1) The Kingdom of God and Redemption are the two foci of Christianity. Jesus Christ is founder of the Kingdom.

2) The Community is the religious unit. Despite this strongly social and institutional emphasis, Ritschl rejected the authority of dogmatic tradition on ethical, social and rational grounds.

3) Value judgments are the source of religious knowledge. Ritschl's theory of faith-knowledge based on value judgments (a kind of religious quasi-pragmatism) is commonly, but falsely, said to have been derived from J. Kaftan. W. Herrmann declares that it was suggested by Lotze, whose Mikrokosmus Ritschl read in 1864 and with whom he was associated at Göttingen. Much of the modern philosophical interest in value* and axiology* is thus derived from Lotze and Ritschl.

4) Religious experience is more fundamental than doctrine (religious empiricism). Ritschl, however, stressed the historical, ethical, and social aspects of Christian experience to the disparagement of the mystical (see his Geschichte des Pietismus). The "social gospel," at least in part influenced by Ritschl, has shared his suspicion of mysticism with its subjectivism and individualism.

5) Theology should not be based on metaphysics. By this Ritschl meant to make clear his belief that religion is not derived from any knowledge of nature (but rather from value judgments), nor from theoretical reason (but from the moral); and also his opinion that the Pure Form of Aristotle and the Absolute of Hegel are too remote to serve as objects of religious worship. In his earlier writing he was so strongly anti-metaphysical as to incline toward positivism*. Later he made clear his hitherto latent theistic metaphysics, grounded in value-theory, and akin to Lotze's personalism*.

In 1875 W. Herrmann* came under Ritschl's influence. In 1876 A. Harnack* became a Ritschlian, in the same year Schürer founded the Theologische Literatur-Zeitung, which was to be a great Ritschlian organ. The Christliche Welt (1887-1941) continued the Ritschlian school, of which men like J. Kaftan, F. A. Loofs, M. Rade, and J. Weiss were prominent representatives. Ritschl influenced British theology without gaining close adherents, in America, there have been several Ritschlians, notably G. B. Smith* of Chicago.

C Fabricius, Die Entwicklung in Albrecht Ritschls Theologie (1909), A E Garvie, The Ritschlian Theology (1899, 1902); A T. Swing, The Theology of Albrecht Ritschl (1901); R Mackintosh, Albrecht Ritschl and his School (1915), E S. Brightman, 'Ritschl's Criterion of Religious Truth,' in Am. Jour. Theol., 21 (1917), 212-224), Garvie, Art. 'Ritschlianism,'' in ERE (1919), S. L. Akers, Some British Reactions to Ritschlianism (1934). E.S.B.

ritual: (Lat, ritualis, fr. ritus, rite) A prescribed form of activity, determined by considerations of tradition and symbolism*. Originally the word designated such activity when governed by religious purpose, and it is still most often, though not always, used in that restricted sense.

At an early age most children show a liking for ceremonial behavior, and often they protest against deviations, however minute, in the forms of familial observances. The less the activity is controlled by practical considerations of efficiency and the more it calls imagination into play, the more children tend to insist on such exact uniformity. Probably from similar causes, all communities, primitive or civilized, deeply religious or avowedly anti-religious, have rituals which serve as bonds of social unity and symbolic reminders of common ideals.

In religion, ritual has the value of increasing the worshiper's sense of the ancient origins, dignity, and mysterious suggestiveness of the beliefs and aspirations expressed, as well as serving to foster institutional unity and loyalty. It is also fraught with peril, however, as the history of the most diverse religions indicates. When ritualistic precision is emphasized, as it must be if elaborate rituals are to be made effective, thought of the ritual often tends to crowd out thought of God and of the needs and ideals which originally provided the very purpose of the observance. Then, too, ritualistic activity may satisfy the religious aspirations of the worshiper, so that he is not driven by his sense of the divine to such good works as would more significantly advance the Kingdom of Righteousness. The frequent conflicts between the ancient Hebrew priests and prophets, and the remarkable moral leadership of the modern nonritualistic Quakers, afford significant evidence. On the other hand, those who favor ritual argue that ritualistic forms have been authoritatively commanded, that the more ritualistic institutions have shown the greater stability, that the discarding of old forms is usually followed by the eventual adoption of new, less significant ones, and that even the prophetic exhortations of nonritualistic reformers would have little effect were they not able to appeal to sentiments firmly established by centuries of ritualistic practice. See culture, liturgy, magic, ritualism, Roman religions. L.H.DEW.

ritualism: (Lat., ritus) Should properly mean interest in or study of sacred rites, but is commonly used for attachment to the accompanying ceremonies. In England the term was applied in a hostile sense to those Anglo-Catholics* who after 1845 revived mediaeval vestments* and ceremonies, on the legal basis of the Ornaments Rubric, which directs the use of the ornaments of the 2nd year of Edward VI (1548-9). What mattered more for the ritualists was the exhibition of the continuity of the Church and the dignity of the Eucharist, a determined effort was made to suppress them in a series of court decisions, followed by the Public Worship Regulation Act (1874). This collapsed owing to the refusal of the clergy involved to recognize the authority of civil courts in church matters. In the disestablished Anglican Churches anti-ritualist legislation was attempted, which failed in the United States (1871-4), but succeeded in Ireland (1871-7). In 1890 Archbishop Benson in the case of the Bishop of Lincoln declared several of the contested ceremonies lawful, after which decision of church authority the agitation died down. Much of what was once "ritualistic" is now customary in Protestant as well as Anglican churches, though the principles involved continue to be disputed

C P S. Clarke, The Oxford Movement and After (1932), G. W. E. Russell, Saint Alban the Martyr (Holborn, 1915). E.R.H.

River Brethren: A group of three conservative sects similar to the Dunkers* and Mennonites* which originated in a revival among the German people in Lancaster County, Penna., about 1770. One of the first group was in the southern part of the country "down by the river" and baptized in the river, hence the name. They practice trine forward immersion, anoint the sick with oil, dress in the plainest manner, wash feet, cover the heads of the women with a veil or cloth, have few or no salaried ministers, and forbid organs in worship, fairs, lightning rods, life insurance, lodges, worldly amusements, participation in war, and indulgence in tobacco or liquor.

The misunderstandings which split the River Brethren into three sects concerned the washing of feet and the sacramental meal. The "one made" school held that both washing and drying of feet should be performed by the same person, while the "two made" insisted on different individuals for the two acts. There was a controversy as to whether the bread and wine should be on the table with the general communion meal or brought forward after the meal. One group organized to secure legal recognition of the pacifist position. There are no important differences between them, although the Old Order or Yorker Brethren (1843) are more conservative, these have no church buildings but worship in barns. The sects are

Group	Churches	Members
Brethren in Christ (f. 1862)	90	5,500
Older Order or Yorker Brethren	7	300
United Zion's Children
(Brinsers, f. 1853)	24	1,250

E.T.C.

Robert of Melun: (died 1167) A sentence writer of the school of St. Victor*, surpassing his master Hugh in rigor and precision of presentation of ideas.

M. Grabmann, Geschichte der scholastischen Methode (Freiburg im Breisgau, 1911), vol. II.

H.H.

Robertson, Frederick William: (1816-1853) Famous English preacher of the nineteenth century. Best known as "Robertson of Brighton", because of his pastoral connection with that city, he exercised a wide influence through his sermons on "The Kingdom of God." With Maurice*, he is often said to have been one of the most influential men in returning the English Church to realistic preaching about the Church in the world.

W.N.P.

Robertson Memorial Lectureship, The James: Established in 1913 by the Presbyterian Church in Canada with a capital sum of $20,000, these lectures are given annually at the eight theological colleges of the United Church. The lectures deal with the following topics· the obligation and principles of missions and the history of missions in the Canadian Church, both home and abroad, the lives of great missionary pioneers; the Christianization of the Indian tribes and the evangelization of foreigners in Canada, district history of the several branches now making up the Presbyterian Church in Canada and the history of the influence of Presbyterianism on the educational, political or social life of Canada and cognate subjects. One of the lectures is designated to deal with some phase of Dr. Robertson's life or of the field of labor in which he served. James Robertson was for 25 years—1880-1905—superintendent of Presbyterian Home Missions in Western Canada. The following have appeared as lecturers. J. A. Falconer, J. McLean, J. U. Tanner, J. A. Cormie, J. M. Shaver, G. A. Wilson, W. H. Sedgewick and J. Endicott.

(Data from the Office of the Secretary of the Board of Home Missions, The United Church of Canada.)

V.F.

Robinson, Ezekiel Gilman: (1815-1894) Baptist educator. Professor or president of Rochester Theological Seminary, 1853-1872. President Brown University, 1872-1889. Translator of Neander's Planting and Training of the Christian Church (1865).

C.H.M.

Robinson, John: (c. 1576-1625) Pastor of the Pilgrim Fathers, was probably born in Gains-borough, England. He was educated at Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, took orders in the Church of England, had a parish near Norwich and was suspended for non-conformity about 1603. He emigrated to Amsterdam with the church at Scrooby in 1608. He was chosen pastor and removed to Leyden in 1609. He organized the movement to emigrate in 1617, but remained in Holland with the older and more infirm members. He died in Leyden in March, 1625. His most important works are. A Justification for separation from the Church of England (1610), Of Religious Communion (1614), Essays and Observations Divine and Moral (1625). See Congregationalism, Separatists, Protestant.

W Walker, A History of the Congregational Churches in the U. S. (1894), G. G. Atkins & F L Fagley, History of American Congregationalism (1942), Schaff-Herzog, Encyclopedia of Religious Knowledge, vol. 10, p. 60.

F.T.P.

rochet: A vestment, usually of linen, similar to a surplice*, but with close-fitting sleeves. It is not strictly a liturgical vestment. Worn only by prelates or those having a special privilege.

C.R.

Rockwell Lectureship, The: Provided on a year-to-year basis by Mr. James W. Rockwell of Houston and given at The Rice Institute, Houston, Texas each year on religious subjects. This lectureship was inaugurated in 1938 and the following have served. Sir Robert Falconer, Dr. H. E. Kirk, Dean R. Pound, Dr. J. R, Sizoo, Dr. W. E. Hocking and Dean R. R. Wicks.

(Data furnished by the office of the president of the Institute.)

V.F.

Rogation Days: (Lat., rogatio, petition) The three days before Ascension Day, observed as days of prayer, especially for agriculture—custom organized by Bishop Mamertus of Vienne c. 470, general in Middle Ages, survived Reformation in England.

E.R.H.

Rogation Sunday: In modern Anglican usage, the Sunday before the Rogation Days.

E.R.H.

Rohmer, Friedrich: (1814-1856) As a thinker he sought to balance theism with pantheism. The world consists of a God and creatures of God. The universe, as a macrocosmic nature, is the body of God. Space and time are component parts of God, who is eternal becoming. Every man is a different person because he is a peculiar idea of God. At death the body with its soul enters into the macrocosmic matter, whence they arose. Rohmer was greatly admired by the noted Swiss political scientist, J. C. Bluntschli.

Kritik des Gottesbegriffes in den gegenwärtigen Weltansichten (Nördlingen, 1856); Gott und seine Schöpfung (Nordlingen, 1857); Der natürliche Weg des Menschen zu Gott (Nordlingen, 1858); H. Staeps, Ueber Friedrich Rohmers "Wissenschaft von Gott" (Erlangen, 1897).

H.H.

Roman Catechism, the: See Confessions, Formal of the Christian Church; Pius V.

Roman Catholic: See Catholic.

Roman Catholic burial practice: See burial practice, Roman Catholic.

Roman Catholic Catechisms: See catechism; Confessions, Formal, of the Christian church.

Roman Catholic Church: Origin· Roman Catholic historical thought considers legitimate the development of the world-Church, as it emerges into secular history at about 180, from Jesus and His Apostles as portrayed in the N.T. Peter, leader of the Apostles, had fixed his see at Rome, and the primacy which Jesus had given him (Matthew 16 16-20, John 21· 15-23) passed to his successors in that see. Paul had broken the grip of Judaism, and John by his doctrine of the Logos had pointed out the way theology was to take. Eventual Hellenization and Romanization of the Gospel are admitted, but without conceding that Christianity was denatured in the process.

Although the ancient Catholic Church did not know a centralization at all comparable to that of later centuries, the preëminence of the Bishop of Rome is expressed in the writings of Clemens Romanus, Ignatius of Antioch, Tertullian and Irenaeus as well as in the controversy on the celebration of Easter* under Victor I (189-198). After the persecutions the centrifugal tendencies of the great ecclesiastical capitals, the caesaropapism of the Eastern emperors, and the lack of a common language tended to weaken the external cohesion of the Church although the Roman primacy was maintained. In the West the Vandal persecution of the African Church and the transfer of the capital from Milan to Ravenna put an end to centrifugal movements, while the conversion of Anglo-Saxons by missionaries sent by Gregory the Great (590-604) and the work of Boniface* in Germany and Frankland contributed greatly to Western unity. But relations between the West and the East, where the theory of the five patriarchates was popular, grew rarer as the centuries passed. The rise of Islam by breaking Mediterranean unity accentuated the opposition to Rome which the rise of Constantinople had created. Since the Monophysite* heresy had almost completely destroyed the influence of orthodox Christianity in Syria and Egypt and since the patriarchate of Jerusalem was hampered by Mohammedan rule, Constantinople was left as Rome's rival in the East. It is the contention of Roman Catholics that, however much the Greeks may have thought themselves justified in the rupture with Rome which was consummated in 1054, they were objectively unjustified, and so remained separate from the Church Catholic, which persisted in the West.

Owing particularly to the crippling influence of the civil power, the Church in the West had at the beginning of the eleventh century long been in need of reform. The Byzantine emperors during the sixth, seventh and early eighth centuries had claimed the right of ratifying papal elections. The Franks also exercised a similar power. But neither of these temporal overlords was near enough to Rome to dominate it. The case was different when during the feudal anarchy the house of Theophylactus and the Crescentii secured a hold on the papacy. This hold was broken by the German emperors for their own profit. It was against this oppression that the popes struggled in the conflict over investiture*. St. Gregory VII (1073-1085)* and his immediate successors freed the Church from the domination of civil rulers. They also originated the Crusades*, and it can be said that the specifically mediaeval papacy dates from this time.

During the twelfth century the centralization of the Church, which made the popes master of the whole ecclesiastical organism, was pushed steadily forward, culminating in the reigns of Alexander III (1159-1181) and Innocent III (1198-1216). At the same time the supremacy of the Church in practically all fields of culture was established. This is not to be attributed to Roman thirst for power but rather to the fact that the Latin-Christian element in mediaeval civilization represented by the Church, possessed a de facto superiority over the younger Germanic element, represented by the Empire. Ecclesiastical supremacy even in non-religious spheres was a condition for the flowering of the Middle Ages, although it did not express the permanent relationship between the two elements.

Papal supremacy outside the religious sphere did not last. Gradually the differentiation between Germanic and Romance Europe increased. France attained to great power and the struggle between Philip the Fair and Boniface VIII (1294-1303), which ended with the humiliation of Boniface and the Avignon papacy, marked the end of the specifically mediaeval papacy. The European nations emerged and, despite the idea of Christendom's universality, maintained themselves. The Great Western Schism and the Conciliar Movement show that an analogous tendency existed in the Church. Meanwhile the revival of classical culture led to a resurgence of ancient absolutism and ancient philosophical outlook. The humanists created historical science, and later in their hands natural science took on a new form. The Protestant revolt of the sixteenth century was tributary to these changing currents. Catholics maintain that the existence of abuses and survivals in the Catholic Church did not warrant an overthrow of the Church's constitution. In spite of the good faith of many, the rejection of Rome by so much of Northern Europe was unjustified, and by it Protestant Europe cut itself off from the unity of the Church Catholic, which survived in Roman Catholicism.

The modern period of the Catholic Church begins with the Catholic Reformation*, the greatest revival the Church has known. The Council of Trent* answered the Protestant reformers and inaugurated a Catholic reform. Catholic missionaries carried the Gospel to the ends of the earth while Catholic thinkers produced an unrivalled theology. The period of the Enlightenment* marked a sharp decline and this was hastened by Jansenism* and disputes on moral questions within the Church. But the nineteenth century saw another resurgence and the consecration of the papal religious monarchy by the Infallibility Decree of the Vatican Council (1869-1870)*.

Theology Roman Catholic theology builds not only on the Sacred Scriptures and the decisions of the teaching Church but also on the great theologians of the past, on the Fathers of the East as well as of the West, on thirteenth century Scholasticism and on the theologians of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. It recognizes the debt of patristic thought to the Platonism of the time, of mediaeval thought to mediaeval Aristotelianism, and of sixteenth and seventeenth century theologians to the Renaissance * Moreover the teaching Church is ever the final authority and the thought of no period is absolutized. Even the Fathers must be shown to have taught a doctrine unanimously in order to compel assent. The criticism of the Scholastic synthesis which appeared in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries has not been forgotten. The seventeenth century saw the rise of historical theology among Catholics. The great extension of historical studies in the last century has been parallelled by an increase of historicization in Catholic theological schools. But this movement has been accompanied by an even more powerful revival of Scholasticism, particularly of Thomism, which has served as a corrective. Biblical theology is likewise beginning to enjoy a renascence.

Polity: According to Roman Catholic teaching the Church is by the will of Christ not only a supernatural but also an independent society. Christ gave the power of teaching, sanctifying and ruling not to the community but to the Apostles. This power passed to the bishops, successors of the Apostles. The Roman Pontiff has supreme and full jurisdiction over the universal Church in all that pertains to discipline and government of the Church as well as in matters of faith and morals. This power is episcopal, ordinary and immediate. There can be no General Council unless convoked by the Roman Pontiff. The bishops are placed by divine law over the. individual churches, which they govern with ordinary authority under the authority of the Roman Pontiff. The Cardinals are the principal counselors and assistants of the Pontiff in the ruling of the Church. Church polity is determined in detail in the Codex juris canonici (1917)*.

Creeds: The principal creeds of the Roman Catholic Church are the Apostles', the Nicene, the Quicumque, the Creed of Toledo (675), the Creed of Leo IX (1053), the profession of faith prescribed for the Waldenses (1208), the chapter Firmiter of the IV Lateran Council (1215), (See Lateran Councils), the profession of faith prescribed for Michael Palaeologus (1274), the decree for the Greeks (1439), the decree for the Jacobites (1442), the Tridentine profession of faith (1564), the profession of faith prescribed for the Greeks by Gregory XIII (1575), the profession of faith prescribed for the Orientals (Maronites), by Benedict XIV* (1743). (See creeds of Christendom; ecumenical councils.) To these should be added the solemn definitions of the popes and of ecumenical councils The councils recognized as ecumenical in whole or in part by the Roman Church are twenty Nicaea (325), Constantinople (381), Ephesus (431), Chalcedon (451), Constantinople (553), Constantinople (680-681), Nicaea (787), Constantinople (869-870), Lateran (1123), Lateran (1139), Lateran (1179), Lateran (1215), Lyons (1245), Lyons (1274), Vienne (1311-1312), Constance (1414-1418), Florence (1438-1445), Lateran (1512-1517), Trent (1545-1563), and Vatican (1869-1870). Among the solemn definitions of the popes the condemnation of the Jansenists (1653) by Innocent X and the anti-Modernist oath (1910) of Pius X* are of special importance.

Divisions. The pope* is Bishop of Rome, vicar of Jesus Christ, successor of St. Peter, supreme pontiff of the universal Church, patriarch of the West, primate of Italy and archbishop and metropolitan of the Roman province. The College of Cardinals*, which is the senate of the Church and numbers about seventy members, consists of cardinal-bishops, cardinal-priests and cardinal-deacons. The six cardinal-bishops are occupants of the suburbicarian sees. Historically the fifty cardinal-priests were the parish priests of Rome, but actually many of them are chosen from among the bishops and archbishops of the Catholic world. The fourteen cardinal-deacons are priests and members of the papal curia.

The Church embraces the Western Church and Eastern Churches. In addition to the pope there were in 1940 in the Western Church four major patriarchs, viz., the Latin patriarchs of Constantinople, Alexandria, Antioch and Jerusalem of whom only the last named had jurisdiction, and four minor patriarchates Venice, Lisbon, East Indies and West Indies.

In the Western Church a country normally comprises one or several ecclesiastical provinces. An ecclesiastical province consists of an archdiocese and usually one or more dioceses. An archbishop or metropolitan is head of an archdiocese, and besides ordinary jurisdiction in his own territory has certain limited powers over the bishops of his province, called his suffragans.

In the United States, excluding Alaska and other possessions, there were at the beginning of 1942 twenty archdioceses and ninety-three dioceses in addition to two dioceses for Oriental Catholics, the Military Ordinariate, and an abbatia nullius, Belmont Abbey; the archbishops of Boston and Philadelphia were cardinals.

The Eastern Churches in union with Rome in 1932 (Statistica con cenni storici della gerarchia e dei fedeli di rito orientale) numbered seventeen. Nine of them use the Byzantine rite* or variants of it. They are the Albanian, the Bulgarian, the Greek, the Italio-Albanian, the Yugoslavian, the Melchite, the Rumanian, the Ruthenian and the Hungarian Churches. The Melchites* have a patriarch. Three Churches use the Antiochene rite* or derivatives. They are the Syrian, the Maronite and the Malankarese Churches. The Syrian patriarch, Cardinal Tappouni, resides in Beirut. The Maronites likewise have a patriarch. Two Churches follow the Alexandrian rite* the Coptic and the Ethiopian. The Copts have a patriarch. Two Churches follow the Chaldean rite* the Chaldean and the Malabarese. The Chaldeans have a patriarch. The Armenians also have a patriarch.

Statistics· Roman Catholics number 382,190,000 or 18.71% of mankind. Europe has 211,734,-000, Asia 19,450,000, the Americas 141,528,000, Africa 7,595,000, Australia and Oceania 1,883,-000 [H. A. Krose in Lexikon fur Theologie und Kirche, VIII, 791 (1936)] 8,200,000 belong to the Eastern Churches in union with Rome. (D. Attwater, The Catholic Eastern Churches, 1935). On Roman Catholic canon, see apocrypha, Old Testament.

The Catholic Encyclopedia (1907-1914), 16 vols, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique (1903-1939), 14 vols , not complete, Dictionnaire apologétique de la foi catholique (1911-1929), 4 vols , Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche (1930-1938), 10 vols.

E.A.R.

Roman Catholic journalism: See Catholic journalism.

Roman Catholic, major seminaries: See seminaries, major Roman Catholic.

Roman Catholic parochial schools: See parochial schools, Catholic.

Roman Catholic religious orders, abbreviations of names of: See Catholic religious orders, abbreviations of names of.

Roman Catholic societies: See Catholic societies.

Roman Curia: See Curia Romana Cf. Pius V, Pius X, Sixtus V.

Roman mass: See mass, Roman Catholic.

Roman Missal: See Missal, Roman.

Roman pontiffs: See popes.

Roman Question, the: See Papal States; Pius IX; Pius XI.

Roman religions: The word religion itself (Lat. religio, etym. obscure) probably originally meant for the Roman the sense of awe felt in the abode of a *numen, or spirit, which was therefore a holy place. The primitive religion of the Romans was animistic, recognizing the existence of spirits (numina) dwelling in natural objects, such as trees, springs, rivers, sky, which could be propitiated by offerings, presented with due ritual. Likewise there were spirits in the house and on the farm. Each Roman home had its own Lares (spirits of the fields) and Penates* (spirits of the pantry). As the city-state developed, the old numina took on new functions· e.g., Jupiter, god of the open sky, became the god of justice; Mars, protector of the fields, became the god of war, protecting the state. Under Etruscan* and Greek influence came the anthropomorphic conception of the gods. The old Roman city-gods were transformed and new ones added, such as Minerva, Hercules, Castor, and Pollux Jupiter, Minerva, and Juno, the Etruscan triad, were established in their temple on the Capitol. The old gods were in many cases identified with Greek gods, endowed with their attributes and even their myths, Jupiter with Zeus, Mars with Ares, etc. The introduction of the cult of Apollo brought the Sibylline* Books to Rome, thus paving the way for other Greek divinities By the Second Punic War (201 B.C.) the amalgamation was practically complete. Roman religion was highly ritualistic, putting great stress upon the minutiae of ritual*; any departure from the set form might vitiate the whole rite The bargaining nature of Roman religion is seen in the frequent use of the votum (vow), a solemn promise to make a specific sacrifice or offering if a specified success were gained or peril averted. Hence Roman religion became largely a formal thing. As time went on and the civil wars came, the shrines of the old gods were deserted, their rites neglected. Emerging as princeps, Augustus did what he could to restore the old religion, but against it two forces had long been operating, Greek philosophy among the educated classes and the Eastern mystery religions* among the common people.

The embassy of Greek philosophers in 155 B.C. seems to have created much interest in philosophy in Rome, and a few years later the Stoic Panaetius of Rhodes joined the Scipionic circle. Stoicism*, with its noble emphasis upon endurance and its developing realization of the brotherhood of man, found a ready welcome in Rome. It reaches its climax in the writings of the slave Epictetus and the emperor Marcus Aurelius. The coldly intellectual Epicureanism, though eloquently set forth by Lucretius, made little headway, except in its later degraded form of personal indulgence, which can hardly be classed as religion.

The mystery religions of the east were a much more potent force, with their appeal to the emotions rather than to the intellect. Through initiatory rites they brought the promise of happiness after the troubles of this world, and for the present they gave the comforting sense of personal relationship with the Divine. In an effort to end the Second Punic War, the Romans imported the cult of the Magna Mater, Cybele, from Pessinus in Asia Minor. Shortly after, the orgiastic worship of Dionysus spread over Italy, to be suppressed temporarily in 186 B.C. With the Mithradatic Wars came Mā, sanguinary goddess of Comana in Cappadocia. Later, contact with Egypt brought Isis and Osiris, most popular of them all among the common people of Rome. Under the Empire, the army was the great disseminating agency. The soldiers worshiped not only the old Roman gods but also the local deities. The popularity of the Persian Mithras, the Syrian Heliopolitanus, and the Anatolian Sabazius is easily understood, gods of strife and conquest, they promised the soldier present power and victory, and eternal happiness beyond the grave.

The imperial cult of Rome and Augustus, developing during the principate of Augustus outside of Italy, was symbolic of the unity of the Empire and of the loyalty of the provincials. It was a political gesture with little religious significance. The deification of the Emperors doubtless was suggested by eastern customs, but found ready acceptance among the people of imperial Rome.

The need for reconciling the various religious and philosophical cults led to Plotinus' Neo-Platonism*, in which monotheism is the central theme. But Christianity was already at work, with a solution diametrically the opposite, it would brook no compromise with other faiths, it would not bow to a deified Emperor. And in the end it triumphed. Constantine recognized it as a state religion in 313 A.D. Neither the old Roman religion nor the eastern cults disappeared at once, but they had lost the initiative. Curiously enough, the last great fight of Christianity was against the pagans (country people) still clinging to their ancestral numina. See emperor worship, mother goddesses, temples, Greek and Roman. Cf. Greek religion.

Franz Altheim, A History of Roman Religion, trans by Harold Mattingly (1937), Cyril Bailey, Phases in the Religion of Ancient Rome (1932), William Warde Fowler, The Religious Experience of the Roman People (London, 1911), Terrot R. Glover, The Conflict of Religions in the Early Roman Empire (11th ed, London, 1927)   E M.N.

Roman rite: See liturgy, mass, Roman Catholic.

Roman Symbol, Old: See Old Roman Symbol.

Romanesque style: See art, ecclesiastical, Christian, church building.

Romans, Letter to the: What has long been called Paul's third missionary journey culminated at Corinth, where Paul had hoped to turn westward to visit Rome and then proceed to a missionary campaign in Spain. But the collection for the Christian poor of Jerusalem had to be carried to Jerusalem, and this Paul felt obliged to do in person. He therefore wrote a letter to Rome, telling of his plan of visiting them and why it had now to be deferred. He took the opportunity to set forth to them his great idea of righteousness through faith, instead of through law, chs. 1-5, following it with an account of the effects of this experience upon the believer, chs. 6-8. He followed this with an appendix on the failure of the Jews to accept their Messiah and his gospel, chs. 9-11. Chs. 12:1-15.13 present a practical summary of the Christian's duties in the world, the state and the church. Ch. 16 is a letter of introduction for a Christian woman named Phoebe, who was leaving Cenchreae, one of the ports of Corinth, either for Rome or Ephesus. Romans is the most systematic presentation of Paul's view of faith that we possess; elsewhere it is incidentally presented; here it is the main theme. Ch. 14 is a great plea for Christian tolerance. The letter shows Paul in his greatest stature, seeking with the collection to bind Greek and Jew together in the Christian fellowship, a great missionary statesman, reaching out to Rome with this great letter, while he himself turns back to Jerusalem, to make sure Jewish Christianity understands and accepts the gift of their Greek brethren. The letter was written probably in A.D. 56 or 57.

W Sanday and A C Headlam, St. Paul's Epistle to the Romans (1895, 11th ed 1906)   E J.G.

romanticism: A term used, often without precise signification, to designate (1) an attitude of mind and (2) an historical movement. The romantic attitude may be distinguished from the classical and the realistic by its emphasis upon imagination rather than reason or a sense of literal fact. It is individualistic, introspective, tending to give personal sentiments and intuitions precedence over objective standards Historically this attitude became dominant in the late 18th and early 19th centuries, manifesting itself in parallel political, religious, philosophical, and literary movements. Despite the diversity of tendencies comprehended, there is a common denominator in the reaction against established traditions and the search for more liberal grounds of thought and action.

L.W.C.

rood: (A.S. rod, a cross) A cross or crucifix. Used especially of the cross on the screen at the entrance of the chancel*or choir.   F.T.P.

rood screen: A device used in many ancient and Mediaeval church buildings* in order to mark the transition from the nave to the chancel. In some churches a chancel arch served this purpose, but where this arch was lacking, as in many churches in the southwestern part of England, a rood screen was used.

A rood screen is composed of a paneled parapet below, vertical mullions, groining, a richly carved cornice and often a rood loft. At the head of the center passage aisle was a wide opening, fitted with double doors of open construction. There were similar openings at each side aisle. The framing of such screens generally was of fairly heavy oak timbers, with rich mouldings and leaf ornament carved out of the solid, or sometimes, in later years, merely attached to the timbers. The groinings formed a rich canopy on both sides of the screen. The cornice, which projected two feet or so on either side of the screen, was enriched with two, three or more bands of extremely rich carving in the form of conventionalized leaves, the grape, the hawthorn and even sea weeds forming the motif. Between the vertical mullions was open tracery, usually rich and intricate in design. The rood loft overhead was a platform five feet or so in width, and extending from wall to wall of the church. It had richly paneled parapets on either side, and narrow circular stairways led up to it. Its use is not fully known today, but it is supposed that the Epistle and Gospel may have been read from this rood loft, and that it may have been used by the singers. In Exeter and Lincoln cathedrals, and elsewhere, large organs still stand on the rood loft, and these extend forward and to the rear and rest on ornate brackets.

A large number of rood screens still exist, particularly in England. Perhaps 140 screens, or portions of screens still exist in Devon alone. Somerset has a number of rich screens, but in Cornwall and Wales not many remain. Scores of screens disappeared within comparatively recent times, during periods when a bare church interior was the fashion. Many old screens which had become damaged or mutilated have been restored by such men as the late Mr. Harry Hems, and especially by Herbert Read, Esq. In England a number of new screens, following closely the best early 15th century models, have been erected in recent years, and some of these are fully equal in design and honesty of craftsmanship with Mediaeval work. A few simple screens exist in America, such as Calvary in Pittsburgh, St. Mark's at Mt. Kisco, N. Y., at Great Neck, L. I., and until recently in Worcester, Mass.

A full account of rood screens and their construction is found in F. B. Bond and B. Camm, Rood Screens and Rood Lofts (London, 1909).

F.R.W.

Roothaan, John Philip: (1785-1853) Dutch priest, General (1829-1853) of the restored Society of Jesus*, which again spread through the world under his wise government.   E.A.R.

rosary: A form of prayer consisting of 15 decades of Hail Marys*, each decade preceded by an Our Father and followed by a Gloria. While reciting the prayers on beads, the joyful or sorrowful or glorious mysteries of Christ's life make up the meditation. Five decades are usually said at a time.

Also any chaplet* composed of beads and on which prayers are recited.

Cf. Catholic Encyclopedia, vol. XIII, p. 184.

S.C.

Roscelin of Compiègne: (ca. 1050-ca. 1120) A monk who in his prime was the most influential propounder of nominalism* and demolisher of realism*. Insisting emphatically on the reality of the individual, he repudiated the charge of tritheism* imputed to him. His views are known only through the accounts of others. See Scholasticism; William of Champeaux.

M. Grabmann, Geschichte der scholastischen Methode (Freiburg im Breisgau, 1909), vol I, F. J. Picavet, Roscelin philosophe et theologien (Paris, 1896).   H.H.

Rosenius, Carl Olof: (1816-1868) Rosenius studied for the ministry but was never ordained. As lay preacher in Stockholm associated at first with George Scott of the Methodist congregation, he became the central figure in revival movements in the Church, preaching after 1857 in the Bethlehem Church. His greatest influence lay in devotional writings which, through the periodical Pietisten, reached multitudes in the Scandinavian countries and Swedish immigrants in America. He sought to contain a revived Christianity within the established church.   C.J.B.

Rosetta Stone: See hieroglyphic writing.

Rosicrucians: The history of the movement, which is found in Europe, England, Scotland, South Africa, Australia, New Zealand, South America, India and elsewhere, is obscure, possibly due to the fact that it discloses its secrets only to the initiated and these seem to have kept the secrets well. It is said to have been founded by Christian Rosencranz about 1420, though by some authorities he is considered as but a legendary figure. He is supposed to have gotten his wisdom and philosophy from ancient sources in various places he visited, Palestine, Damascus, Egypt and Spain.

The movement attracted those of kabbalistic* tendencies, and concerned itself with astrology, alchemy, and to some extent with the principles of Free Masonry.*

One branch of the movement in America, The Rosicrucian Fellowship, with headquarters at Oceanside, California, describes the Rosicrucian Philosophy as "a mystical philosophy, founded upon Christian principles and based upon the reality of Christ and the work he came to earth to do". It believes in a sixth sense latent in man which, when developed, enables one to investigate the realm of the super-physical where dwell the dead. They do not, however, approve of spiritualistic methods of making contact with the dead. They make much use of astrology, and believe in the principle of re-birth.   C S B.

Rothe, Richard: (1799-1867) He taught at the Wittenberg Theological Seminary and at the universities of Heidelberg and Bonn. Working with speculative ideas as a historian, he preferred to search for the traces of divine Providence in seemingly profane connections. His church history was in fact a history of culture of Christian mankind. His theology was an ingenious work of art of biblical realism and philosophical idealism, theosophical mysticism and modern ideas. Protestantism was for him the gradual transition of Christianity from the ecclesiastical form into the ethical-humane form, both in dogma and cult. Its task was to help to emancipate Christianity from the church, from its institutional impulse.

Die Anfänge der christlichen Kirche und ihrer Verfassung (Wittenberg, 1837); Theologische Ethik, 3 vols (Wittenberg, 1845-48), 2nd ed 5 vols (Wittenberg, 1869-71); Die Dogmatik (Heidelberg, 1870), Kirchengeschichte (Heidelberg, 1875); Geschichte der Predigt (Bremen, 1881).   H.H.

Rousseau, Jean Jacques: (1712-1778) By his search for liberty and equality he laid the basis for a new tyranny. He presents an astounding theory of religion and of the position of the church in the scheme of temporal government in his famous Social Contract. Contrary to his views on religious teaching contained in his educational utopia, Emile, and to his sympathetic and instinctive piety magnificently portrayed in his La Nouvelle Héloïse, in which he returned to the very basis of Protestantism, of individual faith and of personal intimation of divine goodness, in his Social Contract, religion is outward, secular and rigidly organized. He returns to an inflexible authoritarian view of religion. Religion exists for state purposes. A secular religion is devised for the advantage of the government. He sketches the minimal and necessary dogmas of a state religion as being the belief in the existence of a powerful and rational God, the belief in a life of rewards and punishments to come, the belief in the sacred character of the social contract and the laws made thereunder. He distinguishes between religion per se and the political implications of religion. Belief should be free, but in so far as it involves political behavior, it has to be controlled. He outlines in detail the punishment for heretics and unbelievers for their failure to believe in the doctrines of his secular church.

J. Morley, Rousseau (London, 1883), 2nd ed. 2 vols. ; B Bosanquet, The Philosophical Theory of the State (London, 1899) , E. Faguet, La politique comparée de Montesquieu, Rousseau et Voltaire (Paris, 1902) , C. E. Vaughan, The Political Writings of Jean Jacques Rousseau (Cambridge, 1915), 2 vols., I. Babbit, Rousseau and Romanticism (Boston, 1919) , A Schinz, La pensée de Jean Jacques Rousseau (Paris, 1929) , E H Wright, The Meaning of Rousseau (Oxford, 1929) , F J C. Hearnshaw, ed., The Social and Political Ideas of some Great French Thinkers of the Age of Reason (London, 1930) , C. W. Hendel, Jean Jacques Rousseau, Moralist (London, 1934), 2 vols   H.H.

Royce, Josiah: (1855-1916) The most prominent American representative of absolute idealism. The heart of his idealistic argument is found in chapter XI of his earliest book, The Religious Aspect of Philosophy where he claims that both error and truth are possible only if an idea can aim at its special object and that an Absolute Mind is needed to bring the aiming relation about. In his magnum opus, The World and the Individual Royce goes on to argue that since realism, mysticism, and "critical rationalism" are all defective, idealism must be accepted. The world is mind, which means that it is a community of selves included in a larger Self. From the beginning Royce stressed the element of will and, partly under the influence of James, continued to formulate his idealism in such a way as to give it a voluntaristic and empirical flavor. Ideas are wills and purposes, reality must be what fulfills them; to be is to be the fulfilment of a purpose. But he remains an absolutist by insisting that the conditions of truth are absolute in the sense that the attempt to get rid of them implies their presence. Royce had great influence during his lifetime, less after his death. Prominent among those who drew from him are Miss Mary W. Calkins and W. E. Hocking. He taught philosophy at Harvard from 1882 to 1916. See idealism, metaphysical; neo-Hegelianism.

Works: The Religious Aspect of Philosophy (1885) ; The Spirit of Modern Philosophy (1892) ; The Conception of God (1897) ; Studies of Good and Evil (1898) ; The Conception of Immortality (1899) ; The World and the Individual (1900, 1901), 2 vols.; Outlines of Psychology (1902) ; The Philosophy of Loyalty (1908) ; Wm. James and Other Essays (1911) ; The Sources of Religious Insight (1912) ; The Problem of Christianity (1913), 2 vols.; Lectures on Modern Idealism (1919) ; Fugitive Essays (1925).   J.S.B.

ruah: (Heb., ruah; Arab., ruh) Hebrew: 1) Pre Exilic Kingdom Period: the religious factor in non-human natural forces, spirits and gods, including Yahweh, are ruah in nature, and unlike man who is nephesh, a different kind of religious factor, 2) After the Exile a universal religious factor, common to the natures of all things human and non-human, religious factor shared by Yahweh and man. Arab. ruh. From the Seventh Century A.D. onward the religious factor common to all things, shared by Allah and all spiritual agents or powers, including man. (See nephesh, nafs). Ruh remains to this day the potent concept among Moslems, but due to cross fertilization of Hebraic with Hellenic cultures, ruah has been displaced from its old basal position by Hellenic concepts, both for Christians and Jews.   F.L.P.

rubric: (Lat , rubrica—red earth) Directions in a liturgical* book concerning rite or ceremony, or collectively all such regulations, so called because formerly printed in red, now usually in italics.   T.J.B.

Rückert, Leopold Immanuel: (1797-1871) He taught at the University of Jena. He wrote several commentaries on the Epistles of St. Paul. He was strongly ethically oriented in his works against his external theological enemies.

Christliche Philosophie oder Philosophische Geschichte und Bibel nach ihren wahren Beziehungen zueinander, 2 vols (Leipzig, 1825) , Das Abendmahl, sein Wesen und seine Geschichte in der alten Kirche (Leipzig, 1856) ; Der Rationalismus (Leipzig, 1859).   H.H.

Rudra: A storm god of Vedic Hinduism* but of relatively minor importance, celebrated in but three entire hymns in the Rig Veda*. In contrast to Indra* who is beneficent, Rudra represents the destructive maleficent aspects of the storm. It was long thought that the great god Shiva*, the destroyer of the Hindu Trimurti* had his origin in Rudra. See art. Shiva. At any rate they must early have been identified.   C.S.B.

Rufinus Tyrranius: (ca. 345-410; also called Rufinus of Aquileia) Born at Concordia in Italy and died in Sicily. Spent much of his life in a monastery near Jerusalem where he translated many of Origen's* works into Latin. A friend of Jerome but later estranged by the Origenist controversy.   S.M.G.

rule of faith: (Regula Fidei) This is a standard or norm for testing Divine Truths. The true Rule of Faith is the ecclesiastical magisterium, that is, the teaching Church. Its living voice can pronounce infallible judgment on Divine Truths. The Church exercises Her office as Teacher when the bishops of the world convene in a General Council under the supervision of the Supreme Pontiff; when a bishop issues a pastoral letter to the people of his diocese; when any priest explains the word of God to the faithful; and even when the child is taught his catechism or instructed by his parents.

See Herve, Manuale Theologiae Dogmaticae (Paris, 1929), vol. I, n. 568; S. J. Hunter, Outlines of Dogmatic Theology (1894), vol. I, nn. 78, 87, 89,

290, Wilhelm and Scannell, A Manual of Catholic Theology (London, 1908), vol I, n 85   W.H

Rumanian Church: See Eastern Orthodox Churches.

Russell, Charles Taze: (Pastor) (1852-1916) Born of Scotch-Irish descent in Allegheny, Pa., on Feb. 16, 1852, where he received his education in the common schools. A Congregationalist, he revolted against the doctrine of eternal punishment. In a pamphlet, Object and Manner of our Lord's Return, he held that an invisible second coming of Christ had occurred in the Autumn of 1874. Since 1874 is the Millenial Age, or "Day of Jehovah", marked by an international revolution of the working classes, bringing the world to chaos. After this would occur the resurrection of the dead, a last judgment taking 1000 years, and the final establishment of the Messianic Kingdom on earth.

His following rapidly increased. By 1878, his periodical The Watch Tower, had a circulation of 45,000 copies monthly, and, through the influence of his organization, the International Bible Students Association, his six-volume Studies in the Scriptures sold millions of copies The Jehovah's Witnesses, as they are commonly known, numbered 1200 congregations by 1909. Unfavorable publicity concerning his private life, and his "miracle wheat sales" in 1911, in addition to the general disillusionment after 1914, tended to weaken the society. Russell died on October 31, 1916. See Millenial Dawn, Russellism.

M S. Czatt, International Bible Students, Jehovah's Witnesses (1933) ; Charles T Cook, All about One Russell (n date) , J F Rutherford, A Great Battle in the Ecclesiastical Heavens (1915) , Watch Tower, June 1, 1916, Dec 1, 1916; C. T Russell, Plan of the Ages (1924 ed pref) , New York Times, Nov 1, 1916 , New York Herald-Tribune, Nov 1, 1916 , Brooklyn Daily Eagle, Sept 23 and Oct 19, 1911
M.G.R.—W.W.S.

Russell Lectureship, The: Founded in 1918 by Mrs. Susan M Russell of Syracuse in honor of her husband, Archimedes Russell, architect and citizen of Syracuse, and presented as a foundation to the Auburn Theological Seminary, formerly at Auburn, New York and now associated with Union Theological Seminary, New York City. The principal amounts to $10,000 Lecturers and subjects are selected by the faculty. Among the more than twenty distinguished lecturers are Hugh R Mackintosh, David S. Cairns, James Moffatt, Kirtley Mather, Ernest F Tittle, John T. McNeill and John S. Whale.

(Data furnished by W. S. Davison, Executive Director of Auburn Theological Seminary)
V.F.

Russellism: The religious movement which grew out of the teachings of Charles T. Russell (1852-1916)*. Known first as Russellites, the movement later took the name "International Bible Students Ass'n", better known as "Jehovah's Witnesses " Using a literal interpretation of the Scriptures, the members believe that Christ returned invisibly in 1874. All but the "little flock" who are living a spiritual life with Jesus, have been put beyond the reach of divine Justice by Christ's atonement, and are now sleeping until the second resurrection. Return to physical life will give man a second probationary period. His actions, decided by his own free will, will determine his fate. Those willfully rebellious will be cut off after 100 years through death by electric shock. Those making wrong choices will not survive the Millennium Thus by the end of the thousand-year period, the earth will be cleared of wickedness and will ever contine an Eden for the "little flock."

The Association stresses systematic sale of literature, nearly all of which is produced by its leaders, and uses such modern techniques as radio speaking, recordings for door-step sales, and sales supervisors, to propagate its ideas In 1932, the depression peak, the Witnesses distributed 14,405,072 books and booklets.

Because of their aggressive methods and their refusal to take part in temporal affairs, the Jehovah's Witnesses have been subjected to frequent arrests and court actions This litigation has covered selling without licenses, refusal to recognize draft summons, refusal to permit vaccination, and failure to salute the flag. Actual statistics are difficult to obtain, the only report, listing approximately ninety thousand members, was made in the Watch Tower in 1925-27.

See Millenial Dawn, Charles T Russell, J. F. Rutherford. See anti-missionary movement in the U. S.

Milton S Czatt, The International Bible Students Jehovah's Witnesses (1933) , C T Russell, Millenial Dawn (1881) , C T Russell, Studies in the Scripture (1886)   M G.R.—W.W.S.

Russian Churches, the: See Eastern Orthodox Churches, Holy Synod, Russian sectarianism.

Russian sectarianism: Beside the Russian Orthodox and the Old Ritualist, the Russian Christian churches comprise numerous groups of sectarians. Of the modern groups, Khlysty are the oldest. They originated some time in the seventeenth century, and the chief characteristic tenet of the group is the continuous incarnation of Christ in the line of Khlyst leaders. Hence the name, which is a corruption of "Christs." The movement developed antinomian, orgiastic tendencies.

As an ascetic reaction from these immoral elements there arose, in the sixties of the eighteenth century, a sect which saw in procreation the root of all evil, and therefore practiced emasculation (hence their name, Skoptsy or Eunochs). Contemporaneously with them arose a group which assumed the name of Dukhobortsy, the Spirit-Wrestlers. Their doctrine had certain mystical, Quaker characteristics, and they stressed "spiritual understanding." The teachings of the Ukrainian philosopher and mystic, Gregory S. Skovoroda, greatly influenced this group. In the second half of the nineteenth century they adopted Tolstoyan* doctrines, pacifism*, and many migrated to Canada.

But the uncontrolled mysticism of the Dukhobors produced dissatisfaction among some of their members. Even the son-in-law of the leader, Simeon Ukleyin, revolted, and elevated the Scriptures to the place of the norm of life and teaching. Thus arose the evangelical sect of the Molokans (Milk Drinkers), who however, prefer to call themselves Spiritual Christians.

There were many other minor sects of native Russian origin, such as the Beguni (Runners), the New Israel, and others. But besides these, some sects were of foreign origin. Among these the Stundists and the Baptists are the most important. The latter arose in the middle of the nineteenth century among the German peasants of Bessarabia and southern Russia. They were pietistic in character. In the seventies, they were strongly influenced by a Baptist missionary, Popov, so that in the end they adopted the tenet of believers' baptism. Thus the movement became Stundobaptist. In the nineties, this group united with a Baptist group organized in the north of Russia. Since then, it is among the largest of the sectarians.

Frederick C. Conybeare, Russian Dissenters (1921) ; Matthew Spinka, "Molokane, the Russian 'Spiritual Christians'" in The Congregational Quarterly (London, 1929), p 10 ff., Z F C Wright, Slava Bohu, The Story of the Dukhobors (1940).   M.S.

Ruth: A book of the O.T. which has become classic as a Hebrew idyl or short story. While included among the historical books and placed after Judges* in English Bibles, following the Septuagint and Vulgate, it is found in the Hebrew canon in the division called "Writings" or Hagiographa*, and is one of the five Megilloth ("Scrolls") in that division. In Jewish usage the Book of Ruth is read at the Feast of Weeks (Pentecost). It tells the story of the fidelity of the Moabitess Ruth to her Hebrew mother-in-law and her subsequent marriage to Boaz, whereby she became great-grandmother of King David. The book has usually been interpreted by modern scholars as a work of the Persian period designed to protest against the strict views in this age (e.g., of Ezra and Nehemiah) regarding intermarriage with foreigners. This date has recently been doubted, the language of the book and its socio-legal background (if real rather than purely fictional) suggest a late pre-exilic date. It is possible that it was intended as a protest against the antipathy expressed in Deuteronomy* towards Moabites* and other foreigners (see Deut. 23·3ff.). The view advanced by Staples and Haller that the story is based upon an ancient myth of the Bethlehem fertility cult is far-fetched. See levirate marriage.

See M Haller and K Galling, Die fünf Megilloth (Handbuch z. Alten Testament), (1940) , M. Burrows, "The Marriage of Boaz and Ruth," Journal of Biblical Literature LIX (1940), pp 445-454
                                                J.P.H.

Ruthenian Rite: The Byzantine Rite* as used in the Galician Church in union with Rome (since 1595)—the variations are minor, partly local customs, partly Latin influences.   E.R.H.

Ruthenians: A Slavic people who live for the most part in the Ukraine, Southeastern Poland, Czecho-Slovakia, and Roumania, also called Little Russians and Ukrainians.   E.A.R.

Rutherford, J. F.: (Judge) 1869-1942) Successor to Charles T. Russell* as leader of the International Bible Students' Association, was born in Booneville, Missouri. After an academy education, he read law, and later was made Special Judge in the 14th Judicial District of Missouri. Following the death of Pastor Russell*, he was made president of the I. B. S. A. (Jehovah's Witnesses). His aggressiveness and managerial ability centralized the organization, and turned the emphasis from Russell's books to new ones which he wrote. New methods, such as radio preaching and recorded doorstep salestalks were introduced in the book-selling activities of the Witnesses.

M. S Czatt, International Bible Students: Jehovah's Witnesses (1933).   M.G.R.—W.W.S.

Ruysbroeck, John: (1293-1381) A Flemish mystic who after a career as a parish priest in Brussels, at the age of 50, accompanied by several companions, retired to a hermitage in the forest of Soignes and there founded a religious community His Adornment of the Spiritual Marriage (London, 1916), edited by Evelyn Underhill, is a classic of mysticism*.   D.V.S.

S

S: Symbol used by R. H Pfeiffer for one of the component narratives of the Book of Genesis*. The symbol is derived from South or Seir,—that is, Edom, which Pfeiffer considers as the place of its origin, probably in the tenth century B.C. It consists of the account of the origin and early history of mankind in Gen. 1-11 which is not P*, and the account of the origin of the peoples in Southern Palestine and Transjordania, concluding with a summary history of Edom before David (parts of Gen. 14-38).

See R. H Pfeiffer, Introduction to the Old Testament (1941), pp 159-167   J.P.H.

Saadia ben Joseph: Saadia ben Joseph (usually referred to as Saadia Gaon), born in Fayyum, Upper Egypt, in 882, was one of the most brilliant Jewish personalities of the Middle Ages. He was the first who, having mastered Arabic literature and thought as well as the Bible and Talmud*, attempted to synthesize the two cultures. The great philosophical work "Emunot Ve Deot" (Faith and Reason) which resulted from this attempt has become one of the classics of Jewish religious philosophy. Saadia also translated the Bible into Arabic in order to bring its treasures to the attention of Arabic speaking Jews and Mohammedans. Aside from these two great contributions to Judaism, Saadia's versatile genius made itself felt in the fields of Rabbinic law, astronomy, liturgy, grammar, lexicography, and apologetics. Indeed, in the words of Abraham ibn Ezra, he was "the foremost authority in every field." See Israel, religion and theology.

E.B.—L.F.

Sabaism: The beliefs of a semi-Christian sect of Babylonia, mentioned in the Koran (2:59, 5 73; 22·17), as Sabestes. They are also called Sabians or Mandeans, and survive as a small sect of 2000, holding John the Baptist as the true prophet, observing baptism, a eucharistic meal, and several feasts. Their teachings reveal a syncretism of many faiths.   P.E.J.

Sabatier, Auguste: (1839-1901) French theologian, dean of the Protestant theological faculty at Paris. Best known for his theory of religious knowledge, "critical symbolism," according to which theological dogmas are transient symbolic expressions of abiding religious experiences. This theory, borrowed in part from Schleiermacher and Ritschl, was so powerfully stated in Sabatier's Philosophy of Religion (1901) and Religions of Authority and the Religion of the Spirit (1903) that it dominated Liberal Protestant and Catholic Modernist thought for over a generation. Auguste Sabatier must not be confused with his younger relative Paul Sabatier (1858-1928), author of the Life of St. Francis of Assisi (1894) and many other Franciscan studies.   W.M H.

Sabatier, Paul: See Sabatier, Auguste.

Sabbatarianism: The identification of the Lord's Day with the Jewish Sabbath* and the consequent application of the fourth commandment to its observance. It was a medieval doctrine, rejected by the reformers, but revived by English Puritans during the reign of Queen Elizabeth and officially adopted by the Westminster Assembly.   W.S.H.

Sabbatarianism, Puritan: The Puritan* idea of Sunday as a day of sermons, meditation, and sobriety was founded 1) ideologically upon the Mosaic code governing the observance of the Sabbath* and 2) historically upon a reaction against the lax ideas of the pre-reformation era. A factor in the seventeenth century was the hostility of Puritan clergy to the Book of Sports, which was issued by James I (1618) ostensibly to check the anti-sabbatarianism of recusants in Lancashire, but which led to the identification of prelacy and anti-sabbatarianism by the Puritans. The repressive legislation of 1640-1660 banned both manual labor and games on Sunday*.

W B Whitaker, Sunday in Tudor and Stuart Times (London, 1933).   E.W.K.

sabbath: The seventh day of the week which was ordained as a day of rest (Sabbath in Hebrew) to commemorate creation and Israel's redemption from Egypt (Exodus 20 8, 11; Deut. 5:15). The link of the sabbath with the deliverance from Egypt emphasizes its humanitarian character as a day of universal release from physical labor, even for the slave and the animal.

The sabbath was to be observed, according to Jewish tradition, by abstaining from physical labor and, positively, by cultivating the spiritual life through worship, study, and reading of the religious classics. Of course, when the necessities of preserving life were involved, all observance of the sabbath was to be suspended, for the Sabbath was made for man and not man for the Sabbath (Talmud, Yoma, 85b). The synagogue developed its most important worship service on the sabbath. This consists of the service Friday at sundown and Saturday morning, when the weekly Scriptural lesson is read to the congregation. In modern times many synagogues, particularly, in America, have instituted a late Friday evening service, to accommodate those who return at a late hour from business.

Morris Joseph, Judaism as Creed and Life (1919), pp 200-212, H Schauss, The Jewish Festivals (1938), pp. 3-37.   B.Z B.

sabbath, Christian: (Hebr. shabbath) The Sabbath, as a Jewish institution (the seventh day of the week, prescribed in the Decalogue* as a day of rest), though observed by Jewish-Christians in the early Church, was not recognized by Gentile* Christianity. The holy day for Christians was the first day of the week (Sunday*) and called the Lord's Day, commemorating his resurrection. Nevertheless, in actual practice, the Lord's Day* came early to assume certain characteristics of the Jewish Sabbath. Not only did it become a day of worship, but, by decree of Constantine in 321, Sunday was set aside as a legal day of rest from general labor. The idea that Sunday is indeed the Christian Sabbath, carrying with it the obligation imposed by the Decalogue, was developed chiefly in Seventeenth Century English Protestantism, from which it has come into popular Protestant acceptance in both Britain (particularly Scotland) and America.
                                                        E.T.R.

sabbatical year: Every seventh year when the Bible (O.T.) (Lev. 25:1-25, Deut. 15 2) ordained that loans be cancelled, pledged property restored, and land remain fallow, with all uncultivated growth left to the poor and the stranger. The cancellation of debts was subsequently circumvented through a legal reform instituted by the famous Pharisee, Hillel*.   B.Z.B.

Sabbatine privilege: A belief among members of the R. C. Church that Mary, the Mother of Christ, will secure the release from purgatory of the souls of those who have been especially devoted to her. The name came from the fact that Saturday (the Sabbath) is considered Mary's Day. A 14th century document, attributed to Pope John XXII*, declared that the Blessed Virgin would rescue from purgatory*, on the Saturday following their death, the souls of those who had satisfied certain devotional conditions. Though scholars regard this document as apocryphal, the belief in the extraordinary intercessive powers of Mary is universally held by Catholics.   V.J.B.

Sabellianism: A theory of the Godhead named after its first advocate, Sabellius, a third-century churchman, who affirmed that there is but one divine essence which became operative in three temporally successive manifestations. as Creator and Lawgiver in the Father, as Redeemer in the Son, and as Life-Giver in the Holy Ghost See modalism, monarchianism, patripassianism, Trinity.   F.G E.

sacerdotalism: Strictly, a religious system in which a priesthood occupies an essential place as mediator between men and God, the spirit, methods, or character of such a system. Often used in a hostile sense to denote the exaltation of a priestly class at the expense of the laity and spiritual values.   F.G.E.

Sack, Karl Heinrich: (1789-1875) He taught first in the University of Bonn He later was consistorial councilor in Magdeburg. He sought to realize Schleiermacher's demand for a philosophical theology. In the attempt he changed its type from the formal to the inner content.

Die christliche Apologetik (Hamburg, 1829, 2nd ed, Hamburg, 1841); Die christliche Polemik (Hamburg, 1838).   H.H.

sacra romana rota: See ecclesiastical courts.

sacramental intention: See intention, sacramental.

sacramental meal: A familiar feature of many ancient religions. The idea attaching to the religious feast was either that of table fellowship with the deity or else an actual absorption of the god by the worshiper as he partook of the sacred food in which the deity was thought to be present. The principal religious meal in Judaism was the Passover* feast celebrated in the springtime to commemorate the deliverance of the Hebrews from bondage in Egypt. At the opening of the Christian era this feast had taken on chiefly a memorial and grateful significance in appreciation of the new covenant that had been established between the Hebrews and their God. Thus it furnished the prototype for Christianity's distinctive religious meal, the Lord's Supper, or Eucharist as it was called from the prayer of thanksgiving (eucharistia) offered at the celebration. The earliest literary attestation to the Lord's Supper (I Cor. 11:23-26) shows it to have been a memorial of Jesus' death by which a new covenant had been established, and also an anticipatory act looking toward the return of Jesus. But in this same connection Paul introduces a third idea implying that the Lord's Supper meant actual participation of the body and blood of Christ as sacramental food. The table of the Lord* is compared to the table of demons who were "eaten" by their communicants and Christians who thus partake of demons must not assume that Christ will share the same human dwelling (I Cor. 10:14-22; 11 27). In the Gospel of John the sacramental significance of the Christian religious meal is explicitly indicated (6:52-58). By a gradual process of development the meal came to be a strictly sacramental act, *ex opere operato, in Roman Catholicism, while the Protestant communions vacillate between a rigid sacramentalism and an edifying memorial or dedicatory significance. See agape; food, love feast; mystery religions; theophagy.

M Goguel, L'Eucharistie des Origines a Justin Martyr (1910), W M Groton, The Christian Eucharist and the Pagan Cults (1914), G H C Mac-Gregor, Eucharistic Origins (1928)   s j c.

sacramentalism: Broadly, the doctrine and use of sacraments, narrowly, the ascribing of inherent saving power to sacraments, or their power to impart grace even, if need be, without the operation of active faith.   F.G.E.

sacramentarian: Originally, a Zwinglian or Calvinist who held the sacraments* to be merely visible symbols and denied the Lutheran doctrine of consubstantiation* (cf. Lutheran doctrine of the Lord's Supper), as well as Roman Catholic transubstantiation*. By a curious inversion the term has come in recent years to mean a sacramentalist, one who holds to the saving efficacy of the sacraments.   F G.E.

sacramentary: A book containing many prayers, such as those used by priest or bishop at certain parts of the Mass* and at ordinations.   L.R.W.

sacraments: The essential background for consideration of sacraments includes the truth that man is a mind-body or sense-spirit organism, and that the world is a two-level reality in which matter and purpose are related and interpenetrating. The realm of space-time, therefore, is regarded by Christian theologians as expressing God's will and assisting man to cooperate therewith, while man himself, as also a two-level being, is touched by God and helped by him, primarily, through material and visible "signs" or means Against this background is set the fact of the Incarnation, in which Reality (ultimate being, or God) penetrates and employs human nature to express himself to men and to aid them. Jesus Christ, so understood, is also believed by Christian theologians to have ordained either by implicit word or deed, or explicitly during his earthly life, certain continuing means by which he may still energize through the church in the world.

Various theories have been entertained as to the dominical institution of the sacraments. Of the seven traditionally called sacraments, Baptism and the Lord's Supper are more directly dominical, the others have often been said to be "mediately", implicitly, or in genere instituted by Christ. these others include confirmation, marriage, penance, holy orders, and unction. The number of sacraments had been established as seven, by medieval tradition; although Protestant theologians generally took only "the sacraments of the gospel" and retained the major two.

The normal definition of a sacrament is found in Hugh of S. Victor*: sacramentum est corporale vel materiale elementum foris sensibiliter propositum, ex similitudine repraesentans, et ex institutione significans, et ex sanctificatione continens, aliquam invisibilem et spiritualem gratiam. The Anglican Catechism, which more briefly speaks of "an outward and visible sign of an inward and spiritual grace given unto us, ordained by Christ himself; as a means whereby we receive this grace, and a pledge to assure us thereof", expresses the same ideas. Roughly these include a sign, grace, dominical establishment in some form, and efficacy for the recipient. In traditional Catholic theology, from which various Protestant theologians have departed in one respect or another, a sacrament has its efficacy through the divine will, the part of the recipient being to accept with faith and in penitence for sin the benefits which are given. Those sacraments are valid in which the proper form (words said) and matter (physical or material sign employed) are found, and the intention is to perform the Church's rites. Hence, in regular Catholic theology, a sacrament is performed ex opere operato, which signifies not mechanical operation but the divine reliability in carrying out the purpose of a sacrament despite the possible "unworthiness of the minister."

In each sacrament there are certain constant elements, including the matter and form, regularly known as sacramentum, the grace or benefit of the sacrament, objectively given but subjectively apprehended by faith, called the virtus, the minister, who acts always as the Church's functional organ in celebrating the sacrament; and, in the case of the Eucharist, the res sacramenti, or thing of the sacrament, the body and blood of Christ.

The several rites traditionally listed as sacraments are analyzed below under those elements Baptism—water is the matter, a formula stating the baptism in the triune name is the form, the minister is normally a priest, although in emergency a layman may act, the benefit is the washing away of "original sin" (concupiscence is not removed), and incorporation into the Church. Catholic theologians insist upon "baptismal regeneration"*, with "character" given by the act, Protestants have normally held to a more "declaratory" conception of the sacrament.

Confirmation—the completion of baptism by "ordination" to full lay responsibility; the matter is laying-on of hands, chrism, or both; the form is some reference to conferring of the Holy Spirit, the minister is normally a bishop, although (in Eastern Orthodox Churches) a priest may act as deputy, the benefit is empowering by the Holy Spirit for lay responsibility, for one who is baptized.

Penance—by confession of sins in the presence of a priest, and the statement by the priest of God's forgiveness, absolution is conveyed in God's name by the Church, the matter is some outward act to express reconciliation with the Church after worthy confession (in contrition and faith) by the penitent, the form includes some words of absolution*, the minister is always a priest; the benefit, conferred upon a baptized person, is remission of sins after baptism and welcome into the Church's fellowship which has in part been broken by sin.

Holy Eucharist—the matter is bread and wine; the form is a consecrating prayer including "words of institution" set in a formula of thanksgiving to God for the work of Christ; the benefit is "strengthening and refreshing" of soul, and union with God by assimilation of Christ as present in both humanity and deity, the minister is a priest, the recipient is a baptized, and normally (in Catholic communions) a confirmed person, the res sacramenti is the true but spiritual body and blood of Christ present. For further discussion of varying theologies of the Eucharist, cf. Lord's Supper.

Holy Orders—the conferring of power and privilege to a ministry, by a rite whose material means is imposition of hands, whose form is some ordination formula defining the intention, the minister, normally a bishop (one ordained to ordain), the recipient a baptized man, and the benefit the grace for ministering. For varying views of the ministry, cf. articles on that subject.

Holy Matrimony—an outward rite by which a life-long monogamous union is entered upon by a man and woman; the Church's function is to bless this marriage. The matter is a lawful contract of marriage, the form is the words used to indicate this contract, the minister is the two parties who marry (in the west, although in the east the priest is the minister), the benefit is grace to fulfil marriage's purposes (union and mutual help, procreation of children, preservation of chastity, etc.), the recipients are baptized persons not barred by impediments* to marriage*.

Unction—anointing of a sick (or in Roman practice, a dying) person, to confer grace in serious illness. The matter is anointing with oil, the form, a prayer for grace; the minister a priest, the recipient, a baptized person who is ill; the benefit, grace to assist in bodily illness, and remission of sins in special cases, but not supplanting normal penance.

The outline given above is on the basis of normal western Catholic theology, departures from this are made by various theologians, and Reformation and Protestant theology disregards all but Baptism and the Lord's Supper. For discussion of these views, cf. articles on the particular faith of the several denominations. See grace, intention, sacramental; opus operatum; Peter Lombard.

A L Lilley, Sacraments (1929), Pohle-Preuss, Dogmatic Theology (1911-1917), F J Hall, Dogmatic Theology (1909-1920) or Hall (and Hallock), Outlines of Dogmatic Theology (1933). For historical development, Pourrat, Theology of the Sacraments (1910), Lowther-Clarke and Harris (eds), Liturgy and Worship (1932).   w.n.p.

Sacred Heart of Jesus: The name of many religious congregations, and also the object of many devotions, each of them being but a special form of devotion to Jesus.   l.r.w.

sacred literatures: Since prehistoric time the peoples of the earth have transmitted from generation to generation the growing heritage of wisdom learned by hard experience in their struggle for the material and social goods of life. The custodians of the lore were the old men, the priests and seers. The wisdom consisted of the legends of the past, heroic tales, origin myths, ceremonials, spells and incantations, hymns to the gods, moral codes and practical techniques. This heritage was taught to the young only after solemn initiation*. It was the sacred treasure-store of tribal wisdom. As the tradition grew it required a specialized class to keep it in memory and transmit it orally. Even after the coming of writing, the Hindus for many centuries preferred to preserve their sacred learning by oral transmission. Early or late, however, all peoples of high culture recorded the sacred lore in a book, the book par excellence, nucleus and fountain-head of their religious literatures.

The sacred heritage is always deeply revered. Initiation ceremonies at adolescence* in preliterate cultures and for novices in preparation for the priesthood at all times are intended to instill an awed reverence for the ancient lore. Attitudes toward Scriptures vary from a deep respect for the treasured wisdom of the past to bibliolatry*. The sacred books have been treated as divine revelation*, as teaching that saves, as a heritage of social wisdom or as records of the divine age which justify a racial hope. Direct divine revelation has been claimed for the Zoroastrian, Jewish-Christian and Moslem Scriptures. The Hindu sacred books are also revelation, embodying the truth "seen" in ancient time by the *rishis and handed down word by word, syllable by syllable through a long line of teachers. The divine light which inspired the teachings of the Sikh gurus remains enshrined in their idolized holy bible. The Buddhist and Jain Scriptures record the gospels of the great teachers who pointed the way to salvation. The idea of divine revelation would be meaningless for them since these great sages were teachers of both gods and men. China's sacred books embody a heritage of social and philosophic wisdom and make no claim to divine inspiration. The Japanese books are presented as history reaching back to the age of the gods. Their divine authority supports the philosophy of the throne, race and empire.

Sacred literatures are usually divided into two classes, (1) the canon of revealed truth or the teachings of the masters and their immediate disciples and (2) the tradition, commentaries and development of the teaching by later thinkers, which has a lesser degree of sanctity.

The writings that have come down to us from Egypt and Babylonia are heavily weighted with ritual magic They consist of variants of old myths, spells and incantations, prayers, hymns to the gods, ritual on behalf of the dead, festival songs, lamentations, moral tales and proverbial wisdom.

The earliest sacred books of India were the Rik, Yajur, and Sāma Vedas, "the Triple Veda". The ten books of the Rigveda contain more than a thousand hymns used in connection with the sacrifices. The Sāmaveda is a collection of the many melodies to which the hymns were chanted. The Yajurveda consists of sacrificial formulae with instructions as to how the words and gestures fall into their proper places in the rhythm of the sacrifice. Each of these Vedas had its own class of priestly specialists. A fourth Veda, the Atharva, was added later. Into it are gathered 730 magic spells for the fulfilment of all kinds of desires. To each of the four Vedas were added Brāhmanas, Aranyakas and Upanishads. The Brāhmanas are massive texts for the specialists in the sacrificial techniques giving directions and explanations of the ceremonies mixed with theorizing, speculation and philosophizing on their significance. The Aranyakas, called the Forest Books because they were taught in the secrecy of the forest, are fanciful and mystical meditations on the meaning of the ritual lore. The Upanishads are philosophic texts in which the idea of a spiritual absolute comes to full flower and realization of the unity of the soul and this timeless being is proclaimed as the way of salvation. All the foregoing works are śruti (srti), sacred in the highest sense. They embody the revelation "seen" by the rshis.

Tradition, smrti, begins with the three Kalpasūtras, the Śrauta, Grhya and Dharma, attached to each of the Vedas and considered compulsory sacred learning. The Śrauta-sūtras are very condensed handbooks for specialized priests giving instructions in the conduct of the sacrifices. The Grhya-sūtras, "House Books", deal with the rites for the crisis points of life from birth to death and the family sacrifices. The Dharma-sūtras are law books, laying down the rules of conduct for the four stages of life, the duties of the king and the codes of the four main classes of society.

For the last two thousand years the real bible of popular Hinduism has been the two great epics, the Mahābhārata and the Ramayana, and the Purānas. The epics were originally heroic ballads later transformed by priests into poems preaching salvation by faith through the earthly incarnation of the high god. In their early form the Purānas dealt with origins, cosmogony and genealogies, but they also became sectarian works celebrating the saving power of the popular gods, especially Visnu and Śiva. The later Tantric literature is the religious expression of the resurgent pre-Aryan culture centering in the mother goddesses. In addition to philosophic teaching, instruction in conduct and ceremonials, the Tantras are much concerned with magic techniques and yoga.

The Jain canon of scriptures, the Āgamas, was fixed, according to tradition, in 300 B.C. After a final revision it was put into written form about 454 A.D. It consists of eleven Angas (the twelfth is lost), twelve Upāngas, ten Painnas, six Chheda-sūtras and four Mula-sutras. The various sections are not restricted to specific topics. The worldview, doctrine of salvation, monastic rules and discipline, the moral code and the rules for ascetics are presented in the Angas. Most of these themes recur in the Mula-sutras. The Chheda-sutras emphasize especially the monastic rules. In addition to doctrine and discipline, the Upāngas and Painnas teach astronomy, astrology, physiology and geography.

Like all the other sacred books of India, the Buddhist teachings were transmitted orally for many centuries and reduced to writing only toward the close of the first century B.C. The canon of early Buddhism in its final revision of 247 B.C. is made up of three baskets, Tripitaka (Sk. Tripitaka). The sermon basket, Suttapitaka, in five divisions, includes many hundreds of longer and shorter discourses on the doctrine, in which Gotama or his immediate disciples expound the teaching. The Vinaya-Pitaka expounds and explains the discipline for monks. The Abidhamma-pitaka, a later addition, is composed of discussions of doctrinal, philosophical and psychological themes. With the development of different schools of thought, the contents of this section of the scriptures varied according to the peculiar emphases of the sects.

As the early Hinayāna Buddhism gradually changed to the Mahāyāna, a new sacred literature appeared to embody the new gospel. Three lives of Buddha mark the progressive transition from the early to the later interpretation of the Master —the Mahā-vastu, the Buddha-charita and the Lalita Vistara. Of the many sūtras of Mahāyāna Buddhism the most important are the Saddharmapundarīka, "the Lotus of the Good Law", in which the Buddha preaches the gospel surrounded by an innumerable host of super-human beings, the Prajnaparamita, philosophic texts, expounding the doctrine of the void, the Daśabhūmīsvara, explaining the ten stages on the way to Buddahood, the Samādhi-rāja, on the stages of meditation leading to highest enlightenment, the Kāraṇḍavyūha, glorifying Avalokiteśvara the bodhisattva of providence and mercy, the Gandavyūha, celebrating Manjusrī, bodhisattva of wisdom, the Lankāvatāra, an exposition of the teaching with an eye on rival Hindu schools, the Suvarṇaprabhāsa, on philosophy and ritual, the Sukhāvatīvyūha, praise of Amitābha, Buddha of saving grace, and the glories of his Western Paradise. The Tathāgata guhyaka is a Buddhist Tantra, very similar to the Tantric texts of Hinduism.

The sacred book of the Sikhs, the Ādi-Granth, is a collection of the writings of the first five gurus beginning with Nanak (b. 1469) It includes hymns, prayers, theology and religious teaching. Since the close of the 17th century the book has taken the place of the living gurus and receives divine honors

The sacred literature of Zoroastrianism fared badly during its first thousand years. The canon, fixed in the 4th century A D. is only a fragmentary reconstruction of the original Avesta. It includes the Yasna, records relating to morality, theology and ceremony (the Gāthās, attributed to Zoroaster himself, belong in this section), the Visparad, invocations, the Yashts, hymns of praise of the divine company surrounding Ahura Mazda, Nyaishes and Gāhs, litanies, and the Vendīdād, a priestly code giving detailed instruction regarding purification, punishments and techniques of expiation. Religious texts of later origin, with the sacredness of tradition, are the Dīnkart, legendary materials and philosophic thinking of an age a thousand years later than the prophet, the Būndahishn and the Arda Viraf Nameh, dealing with eschatology, cosmogony and cosmology, Śāyast lā-Śāyast, on the proper and improper, Dātistān-i-Dinik, religious opinions, and Shikand Gūmānīk

Vigar, "the Doubt-dispelling 'Explanation' ", a product of the age of rivalry between Zoroastrianism and Islam and Christianity.

The Chinese sacred books draw their authority from the wisdom of the great sages and the treasure-trove of social experience associated with their names As the basis of the education and training of officials they have had a far-reaching influence in the shaping of Chinese culture, especially during the last two thousand years. The texts fall into two groups, the Five Classics and the Four Books. The Classics include the Shu-Ching, the book of history; the Shih-Ching, a book of 305 odes, some of them poetry collected from the various states and some odes used on ceremonial occasions; the I Ching, or Book of Changes, developed from the ancient technique of divination into moral and political essays, the Li Chi, a compendium of ceremonial usages and rules of propriety, the Ch'un Ch'iu, annals of the state of Lu from 722-484 B.C. The Four Books are the Lun-Yu, Analects, conversations of Confucius and his disciples, the Ta Hsueh, the Great Learning (its teaching is intended to lead one "to exemplify illustrious virtue, to love the people and to rest in the highest good"), the Chung Yung, the Doctrine of the Mean, expounding the virtues of the superior man, the five relationships of a harmonious society and the relation of human nature to the cosmic order. These last two texts are included in the Li Chi. Last of the Four Books is a collection of the political, moral and philosophical discussions of Mencius.

The classic of the early Taoist school in China is the Tao Te Ching, a collection of aphorisms on the nature of the Tao, the cosmic ultimate and Te, its manifestation through human nature.

The revelations given by Allah to Mohammed during the years of his service as warrior in Mecca and Apostle of God at Medina were collected after his death into the 114 Surahs of the Koran. Mohammed thought his messages came through the angel Gabriel from the same divine book from which Jews and Christians before him received their revelations. Moslem dogma claims that the book is uncreated and has existed eternally with God. After the death of the prophet, it became the primary authority for the law codes which developed in the various areas of the Moslem world. Both education and worship depend for their materials upon the Koran.

The Kojiki (712 A.D.) and the Nihongi (720 A.D.) are the two chief texts of the sacred literature of Japanese Shinto. Both of them are chronicles of ancient times. They deal with the origins of the islands and of the gods, myths of the divine age, the establishment of the imperial dynasty by the Sun Goddess, Amaterasu, and histories of the emperors. A third book, the Kujiki, was lost by fire but its material is probably embodied in the Nihongi. A tenth century work, the Engishiki, describes the official Shinto ceremonies and includes a collection of Norito, ritual spells. Japanese ideas of a divine emperor, of their peculiar advantages and obligations as a people and of their national destiny are rooted in the teaching of the Kojiki and Nihongi. See Bible, Egypt, religions of, Judaism, New Testament, Old Testament, Zohar. See also various religions and books mentioned in this article

The Sacred Books of the East, ed by F. Max Muller, 50 vols (1879-1910), The Bible of the World, ed. by R O. Ballou (1939), M Winternitz, A History of Indian Literature, trans. Mrs S Ketkar & H. Kohn (1927-33), The Hymns of the Rigveda, trans R. T H. Griffith, 3rd ed. (1920-26), Mahābhārata, trans M. N Dutt (1895-1905), Rāmāyana, trans M N Dutt (1891-93), A Guérinot, La Religion Djaina, pt 1, chap 9 (1926), Sacred Books of the Buddhists, trans by various Oriental scholars (1895-   ), The Adi Granth or Holy Scriptures of the Sikhs, trans. Ernest Trumpp (1877), H. A. Giles, A History of Chinese Literature (1901), J. Legge, The Chinese Classics (1861-72), The Koran, trans J M Rodwell (1909), "Kojiki", trans B H. Chamberlain, Transactions of the Asiatic Society of Japan, Suppl. to vol 10, Nihongi, trans. W. G Aston (1924).   A.E.H.

sacred thread: A thread worn from the time of initiation by members of the three higher or twice-born castes in India.   C.S.B.

sacred vessels: Utensils used in Temple* service. In the Jerusalem Temple there was a special Vessel Chamber into which priests entered only after sanctifying themselves, by ceremoniously washing their hands and feet. For the Temple sacrifices, the vessels used included· dishes, baskets, pitchers, ladles, spoons, basins and covers. In the incense service there were various snuff dishes, tongs and candlesticks. In all, the Temple had 93˙ vessels which were made of silver, gold, copper and brass. The sacred vessels of the modern synagogue* include: the "eternal light", candelabra, a wine goblet, an incense box and various adornments on the Pentateuchal* scroll.   B.Z.B.

sacredness: That quality which belongs to persons or things by virtue of their being dedicated to deity or consecrated to religious uses. Contrasted with profane. According to E. Durkheim* whatever society sanctifies is sacred According to R Otto* the sacred or holy is the unique and distinctive nature of deity and the experience of it is sui generis, the original and irreducible root of religion.   R.W.F.

sacrifice, Christian: (For background, see sacrifice, Hebrew and Jewish) Sacrifice may have originated in common feasting and other sharing of group life. With monarchic government, bringing cattle and fruits to the king to enable his hospitality may have incited like offerings to God—meal-and drink-offerings. The ethicizing of God's requirements gave disobedience the character of sin; hence sin- or guilt-offering; sacrifice becomes piacular, expiatory. But perfecting of conception of God's holiness makes such recompense unavailing; what is demanded is beyond man. Whence the thought of divine remedy for sin; sacrifice, expiation, no longer man's offering but provision of redemptive* grace*: God's Righteous Servant is led to the slaughter, justifies many by bearing their iniquities (Isa. 53: 7, 11).

Christian sacrifice embodies all values of this great tradition, that of Christ is the perfect sin-offering, providing full atonement* (Heb. 9. 24—10 18). Jesus views His own sacrifice under highest of O T. prototypes the divine Servant in whom God's gracious energies flow redemptively to man (Lk. 4 17ff; Mtt. 12: 14-21, Mk. 10 42-45).

The sufficiency of Christ's sacrifice is the Church's common faith. Catholics so confess as well as Evangelicals, their claim that 'the Sacrament of the Eucharist* is a propitiatory and impetratory sacrifice' (Thorndike) is on the ground, not of need of other sacrifice, but that Christ's own is, by Himself within the veil, continually offered (Heb 9 24, 10 19-21). This to Protestants is medieval accretion to Sacrament (9th century to Innocent III), Christ's expiation is once for all, there needs no more sin-offering but only thank-offering for reconciliation Christ has effected. As the early fathers: 'our sacrifice is the offering of prayer and praise and a humble heart' Yet essentially, for Catholics and Protestants, there is One Sacrifice. All look finally to Christ's self-offering wherein God laid the entail of sin and opened from the heart of the human jungle the way to Himself, all own the call, not to repeat the Sacrifice, but to sacrificial devotion to Him whose it was, to them for whom it was, in grateful remembrance thereof. See mass, Roman Catholic, propitiation; redemption.

F. C. N. Hicks, The Fullness of Sacrifice (1930) ; V. Taylor, Jesus and His Sacrifice (1937).   J.L.

sacrifice, eucharistic: See mass, Roman Catholic.

sacrifice, Hebrew and Jewish: The principle medium of worship of the Deity, both in the ancient religion of Israel and in the earliest stages of evolving Judaism. The principles and rules of this sacrifice are formulated in detail in the books of Leviticus, Numbers and Deuteronomy. Primarily sacrifices seem to represent either the food* given to the Deity or a gift tendered to Him. Ancient Israelite sacrifices fell into two broad classifications, a) the covenant-sacrifice, wherein the sacrifice constituted a sacrament or sacred meal, at which the Deity was regarded as host and the sacrificer and his family and friends as guests, the latter consuming the major portion of the sacrifice, but leaving the choice portions for the Deity, and thus, through this process of eating together, establishing a covenant* and bond of relationship between Deity and worshipers, and b) the taboo-sacrifice, which assumed basically that all the products of nature, such as grain, fruits, domestic animals and even human beings, were created by the Deity, and so in principle belonged to Him. Therefore a taboo was inherent in them and forbade their use for the ordinary purposes of daily existence, until they were redeemed. The underlying principle of redemption was that the sacrifice to the Deity of a part of the object removed the taboo, redeemed the remainder and rendered it fit for profane use. This taboo-sacrifice consisted usually of the first, and presumably the best, part of the tabooed object; i.e., first-fruit* and firstling sacrifices. In contradistinction to the covenant-sacrifice, under no condition might the sacrificer partake of or derive benefit from his taboo-sacrifice. This had either to be burned completely upon the altar, or else a small, symbolic portion thereof was burned, and the remainder was given to the priests or to the poor, regarded as the clients of the Deity.

Sacrifices consisted of only domestic animals, grain and the first-fruits of trees, vineyards and gardens. Under no condition might wild animals be sacrificed In addition to offering the entire animal, or at least a portion thereof, to the Deity, the blood had either to be sprinkled upon the altar or else be allowed to soak into the ground. Accordingly sacrifices could be offered only at a sanctuary. Originally every domestic animal slain for food as well as for specific worship was regarded as a sacrifice, of which the prescribed portions had to be given to the Deity. The Deuteronomic Reformation, in 621 B.C, legislated that sacrifices might be offered at only the one, single sanctuary in the entire land, the Temple at Jerusalem (Deut. 12), with this, of necessity, it abolished the ancient practice and permitted the slaughter of animals for food purposes alone, but it reaffirmed the principle that the blood might never be eaten.

In the post-exilic* period (i.e., after 539 B.C.) Jewish sacrificial practice was systematized. The ancient covenant-sacrifice was now designated as the "peace-offering", while the taboo-sacrifice was divided into several classifications, the "burnt-offering"*, the "meal-offering", the "sin-offering", with its subordinate classification, the "guilt-offering", both working atonement for sins. The destruction of the Temple at Jerusalem by the Romans in 70 A.D. brought the entire Jewish sacrificial system to a sudden and permanent end. According to the dictum of the Rabbis of that period, prayer and service in the synagogue superseded sacrifice as the basic medium of divine worship.

See altar; blood, feasting; holocaust.

W Robertson Smith, The Religion of the Semites (London, 1927), 3rd ed.; G. B. Gray, Sacrifice in the Old Testament (Oxford, 1925).   J.M.

sacrifice, human: See human sacrifice.

sacrifice in primitive religion: See primitive religion.

sacrilege: The desecration or profanation of sacred things. Sacrilege was a violation of tabu, the primitive defense against it, and was believed to be fraught with mystic danger. The O.T. contains many examples of the offense and its punishment. See Judges vii. 20-25 for the graphic story of Achan. In classical Greek and Roman usage the term referred to theft of property dedicated to sacred uses but it has been stretched far beyond these limits. In English law it is breaking into a place of worship with intent to steal therefrom. The term has gradually lost its magical import and punishment for the offense has been greatly mitigated.   R.W F.

sacristan: (Fr. from Latin sacer) A church officer, sometimes in orders, who cares for sacred vessels, vestments*, etc. Formerly, a sexton*.
                                                             T.J.B.

sacristy: (Latin, sacer, sacred) A room in a church near the high altar, used as a vestry, the storage of vestments and where much of the business of the church is transacted.   F.T.P.

Sadducees, the: The Sadducees—the name of the party that opposed the teachings and doctrines of the Pharisees* during the latter half of the Second Commonwealth.

The name "Sadducee" may best be taken to mean anyone who is a sympathizer with the Zadokites, the priestly descendants of Zadok, the high priest in the days of David and Solomon. The party was composed largely of the wealthier elements of the population—the powerful priests, the prosperous merchants and the worldly aristocracy—and represented a more conservative point of view. The major difference between them and the Pharisees lay in their attitudes toward the Oral Law. The Sadducees refused to accept any of the oral traditions with which the Pharisees supplemented the Written Law. The Sadducees denied the idea of the resurrection of the body. Aside from these broad disputes, there were a great many legal ritualistic details, especially those connected with the Temple*, upon which these two parties differed.

For a bibliography, see Pharisees, the.
                                                       E.B.—L.F.

sadhana: In Tantric Buddhism* it means a ceremony by the performance of which the worshiper renders visible any god he desires and is enabled to get control of the deity. It is also used in Hinduism to denote the means through which the Hindu mystic attains to *samadhi.   C.S.B.

Saint Simon, Claude Henri de Rouvroy, Comte de: (1760-1825) As a social reformer he made central the seminal ideas of the increasing use of positive science, free from a purely conjectural basis, as a foundation for a new and better social order. In achieving the new order the external form of government was to him a matter of indifference. The insight into the harmony of interests was his life-long guiding principle as a social reformer. There must be a new Christianity concerned not as of old with preparation for a future life, but with the physical and moral betterment of the humbler classes in this life. Though he had lost his fortune, he continued to have faith in the advent of a better social order. He advocated a new science of society to do away with the inequalities in the distribution of property, power and happiness. He suggested in an undeveloped form most of the ideas of August Comte*. His numerous disciples extended and transformed his social views to extravagant dimensions, changing them from a movement into a social cult of degenerate form. See communistic settlements, secular, social gospel.

Oeuvres de Saint Simon (Paris, 1865-1877), vols 46, G Brunet, Le mysticisme de Saint-Simon (Paris, 1925), E M Butler, The Saint-Simonian religion in Germany, a study of the Young German movement (Cambridge, 1926), S Charléty, Histoire du saint-simonisme (1825-1864) (Paris, 1931), H Shine, Carlyle and the Saint-Simonians, the concept of historical periodicity (1941)   H.H.

saints, canonization of: See canonization.

saints, communion of: See communion of saints.

saints' plays: See religious drama.

saints, veneration: The honor or homage, called "dulia", paid by the Christian to saints because of their worthiness, an honor expressed in his imitating them and asking their intercession before God. See beatification, canonization; festivals and holy days; patron saints. Cf. Mary, cult of.   L.R.W.

Saivism, Shivism, Shivaism: One of the two major theistic sects of Hinduism which centers its worship about the great personal god, Shiva, or his wives. Like Vishnuism* it attracts people of all kinds. Within it may be found the most elevated and sophisticated beliefs and practices as well as some that are naive, and even debasing. Various sub-sects emphasize each some special aspect of the god, thus to some he is the supreme ascetic, to others it is his destructive and creative power that is important, to others still he is the ultimate reality behind all that exists. He is the object of contemplation of the philosopher but also the object of bhakti or devotion to countless worshipers. The Shaktas (See Shaktism) worship his shakti, Kali or Durga, while many worship him in his elephant headed son Ganesha and other local deities. See Hinduism.   C.S.B.

salamander: (Greek, salamandra) An amphibian once believed by many people to be able to live unharmed in fire, an elemental spirit living in fire, according to the theory of Paracelsus, a nymph in water, sylph in air, and gnome in earth.
                                                             F.L.P.

Salmeron, Alphonsus: (1515-1585) Spanish Jesuit, theologian and exegete. He was influential at the Council of Trent*, and published commentaries on the Gospels, Acts of the Apostles, and the Epistles of St. Paul.   E.A.R.

salvation: The term used in Christianity to express the supreme benefit which is afforded mankind through the life and death of Jesus Christ the savior, sent of God expressly to redeem man and restore the broken fellowship which evil had wrought between God and man. The word was used in the O.T., though not with identical meaning. There is an equivalent term used in Hinduism, moksha or release. Other religions lack a specific word, but each one does hold out a supreme good to men who fulfill the conditions, just as Christianity does. It might therefore be convenient for the purposes of comparative religion to define salvation as the goal of religion, that highest good which any faith offers to its followers.

Just as within Christianity all do not conceive of salvation in the same way, so in other faiths the ideal and the method of its attainment may vary considerably. Some general types of idea may be noted. Thus, salvation may be this-worldly or other-worldly, it may be individual or social, it may be attained once and for all, or it may be conceived of as a process of growth; it may be dominantly an escape, salvation from something, sin, fear, danger, death, or it may be conceived of as chiefly positive, saved to or for something; it may be conditioned or it may be absolute and eternal. Salvation may be won by self-effort or by the aid of a savior. It may be attained through works, something one does, asceticism, performance of ceremonies, moral effort, self surrender, it may be won through faith in a savior, sometimes vicariously, or it may be won through some kind of saving knowledge. A brief characterization of the ideal and method in the great living religions follows. Obviously in so brief a sketch, only dominant concepts can be indicated.

Buddhism: Primitive Buddhism (Hinayana) held out as the ideal the attainment of Nirvana, or the cessation of the round of rebirth, a state of "passionless peace", possibly even annihilation. It was to be attained strictly by self-effort, the belief in the four Noble Truths and the following of the Eight-fold Path. Mahayana or Northern Buddhism conceived the ideal as that of attaining Buddhahood. This could be done by passing through ten stages in the latter of which the aspirant after Buddhahood, a Boddhisattva, became himself a cosmic helper, or savior to others. Popular northern sects hold out salvation in the western Paradise to those who exercise faith, devotion, love, toward some one of the great savior Buddhas, of whom Amitabha Omito-fu in China, Amida in Japan, is chief. (See Buddhist Terminology.)

Chinese religions: Confucianism has been dominantly this-worldly in character, and reliance has been mainly upon the performance of works, defined chiefly in terms of moral effort. Taoism as a religion has been distinctly more other-worldly, borrowing heavily from Buddhism's heavens and hells, and appealing to the gods for help. In its philosophical form salvation was to be won chiefly through non-action. (See Chinese Terminology.)

Christianity: Salvation within Christianity is variously conceived. All groups agree that in some manner it is mediated to man through Jesus, though Jesus' part in the process differs widely according to the group. In the Unitarian type of Christianity, and in Liberal Christianity generally, the work of Christ is that of reconciling man to God, and salvation is achieved through the faithful embodiment in life and character of the spirit and ideals of Jesus. In Conservative Christianity, including both Protestants and Catholics of all varieties, salvation is vicariously won for humanity by the suffering, death, and resurrection of Jesus. In the beginning man had been sinless but Adam's fall brought upon humanity an entail of guilt which must be removed in some way before God could forgive man and restore him to the fellowship which had been broken by sin. In some manner, variously conceived by different groups, the suffering and death of Christ were the sufficient means of offsetting man's guilt, so that if appropriated by faith or through the sacraments or by some other method, man could feel himself forgiven and restored to divine sonship. The Roman Catholic has held that only through the sacraments can the grace of Christ be made available to man and the sacraments are alone to be administered by the church which Christ founded. This seemed to Martin Luther to be a reassertion of the ancient Hebrew emphasis upon salvation by works or the fulfillment of the law. He reacted strongly against this to the Pauline basis of salvation by faith, and most of Protestantism has maintained this faith emphasis.

The ideal has been for the most part, other-worldly in character, though always with some regard for the present life. Roman Catholicism introduced into the thought an intermediate stage of purgatory* through which all save the most worthy must pass before the attainment of full salvation. From the time of Augustine, there has existed the belief among some churches that salvation is only for the elect, that God chooses whom he will for salvation. Within Protestantism, Calvinism has upheld this view. Liberal Christianity whether Socinian, Pelagian or the Unitarian type as well as the Liberal Protestant type has generally emphasized the this-worldly aspects of salvation, though at the same time looking toward a full realization of the good life in a life to come. Universalism, a comparatively modern movement within Christianity, has stressed the belief in the ultimate salvation of all men, thus denying a widespread orthodox insistence upon the everlasting punishment of the wicked.

In general, the emphasis has been upon individual salvation, but in recent times there has appeared a strongly social emphasis. Not only individual men but society itself must be redeemed. See assurance of salvation; atonement; conversion; Gnosticism; mystery religions; order of salvation, redemption, regeneration; soteriology; terminism

*Hinduism: The salvation ideal and method in Hinduism varies from period to period. In Vedic Hinduism the ideal was distinctly this-worldly and was mainly concerned with an abundant physical and social life, though there was the beginning of an interest in an other-worldly existence. The method of attainment of salvation was chiefly through sacrifice. Most of the hymns of the Rig-Veda which accompanied the sacrifice are expressive of the desire for a full and abundant physical life. The ideal in the Brahmanic period becomes increasingly other-worldly in character, and the concepts of Karma and reincarnation begin to emerge.

Moksha is attained primarily still, through the faithful performance of the cult, which has now grown enormously complex and exacting.

In Philosophic Hinduism the ideal has become distinctly that of escape from the round of re-birth. Inasmuch as this ultimate release removed one from the earthly plane it is other-worldly, or at least, not this-worldly in character. The means to salvation is predominantly that of knowledge. Distinct Indian schools define the necessary knowledge in different ways, for the Vedanta in its final development it was knowl-edge of the alone reality of Brahman-Atman and the identification of the self with God. For the Sankhya school, it was the knowledge of the complete separateness of matter and spirit, and other schools had slightly differing views. The method of attaining knowledge was through medi-tation or Yoga. It was possible only through abandonment of the normal, work-a-day life of the world.

Devotional Hinduism, or Theistic Hinduism conceived of salvation as the attainment of Heaven or as eternal existence in the presence of god, and so is also other-worldly. A great variety of heavens and hells are thought of through which one may pass before attaining the highest heaven. This ideal is generally consid-ered by the Philosophic Hindus as only a lesser and incomplete salvation, but for the followers of the great theistic cults, it furnished an adequate ideal. The goal was to be attained mainly through *bhakti-marga, i.e., faith, devotion, love, or service to one of the great personal deities, Vishnu, Krishna, Rama, Shiva, Kali or others de-pending on the particular sect to which one be-longed.

Sikh*: The Sikh ideal of salvation is essen-tially that of the devotional sects and the method is Bhakti-Marga.

Jain*: The Jain religion founded by Mahavira in the 6th century B.C. as a protestant movement in Hinduism, holds as its ideal escape from re-birth, just as most of the Hindus do. It is there-fore other-worldly, or at least not this-worldly in character. Its hells and heavens are likewise im-permanent. Unlike most schools of Hinduism and like Buddhism, the attainment of salvation is wholly by self-effort, for the gods, if any exist, can afford no help to man. The method of sal-vation is that of Karma-Marga, or works. Em-phasis is placed upon the three jewels, right faith, right knowledge, right conduct, but it is upon as-cetic practices and the observance of non-injury or ahimsha that greatest stress is placed.

Jewish*: The earliest Hebrew concept of salva-tion was distinctly this-worldly and social in na-ture. The development of a concept of the after-life as anything beyond a colorless, rather unpleas-ant continued existence came quite late in Hebrew history. Nor did the individual idea emerge un-til near the time of the exile. Later Judaism be-came other-worldly and continued so until now, though the preeminent emphasis, particularly of the reformed groups, is distinctly this-worldly in character. Salvation was and is still thought to be possible through obedience to the will of God. The emphasis has been chiefly upon doing rather than belief or faith. Sometimes ritual works as-sume central importance but, particularly in prophetic religion, the demands have been pri-marily ethical. A trace of the idea of a treasury of merit whereby one is helped by the merit of his ancestors occurs at some periods, but in the main, man has had to win salvation through his own effort and his trust in the goodness and power of God.

Moslem*. The Moslem ideal has from the first been other-worldly and the emphasis seems to be strongly upon the idea of escape from the judg-ment of Allah. The method of salvation is pre-dominantly that of doing, that is, works, the performance of the five or six obligations that rest upon all Moslems, repeating the creed, re-peating the five daily prayers, fasting, alms giv-ing, making the holy pilgrimage, and heeding the call to the holy war, though the two latter seem not to be universally demanded. Belief is also requisite, that is, belief in the oneness of God, that Mohammed is his prophet, the belief in the Holy Book, the Koran, the belief in judgment and in angels. All this is however complicated by the fact that ultimate salvation depends upon election to salvation by Allah himself. Only those whom he elects, whatever they may do or believe, are finally saved. In the Shiah sect there are some indications of a salvation by faith con-cept.

Zoroastrianism*. Zoroastrianism was from the first other-worldly in character, though the other-worldly element became much more marked in its later development. God is righteous and con-demns evil men to destruction but the good to eternal life. The method of salvation seems clearly to be that of works. The emphasis is upon good thoughts, good words, good deeds, and man largely earns what he gets in an after life by his thoughts, words, and deeds. Later Zoroas-trianism has an elaborate eschatology in which a savior, Saoshyant, appears as a help toward sal-vation.

GENERAL Charles S. Braden, Man's Quest for Salvation (1941). J. W. Parker, The Idea of Salva-tion in the World's Religions (London, 1935). HIN-DUISM: Rudolph Otto, India's Religion of Grace (London, 1930), Sidney Cave, Redemption, Hindu and Christian (London, 1919). CHRISTIANITY AND JUDAISM: George B Stevens, The Christian Doctrine of Salvation (1917); George W. Richards, Christian Ways of Salvation (1923); Albert C. Knudson, The Doctrine of Redemption (1933); George Cross, Christian Salvation, A Modern Interpretation of Sal-vation (1923); Charles S. Braden, Varieties of Amer-ican Religion (1936); John C. Bennett, Social Sal-vation (1935).   C.S.B.

Salvation Army: An international religious and philanthropic organization founded by William Booth (1829-1912), an English evangelist who began his religious career in boyhood as a local preacher of the Wesleyan Methodists at Notting-ham, England. In 1849 he came to London, where his sensational methods of slum street corner preaching often provoked disorder. The criticism of his co-religionists caused his severance from the Wesleyans and led to his ordination as a minister of the Methodist New Connection He left that body in 1861 to engage in "travelling evangelization" in Cornwall, Cardiff, and Walsall. In 1865 he returned to London and founded a body successively known as the East London Revival Society, the East London Christian Mission, and the Christian Mission. He continued to develop his characteristic methods of evangelism 1) by outdoor meetings and processions, 2) by the use of music, especially brass bands, tambourines and cymbals to attract crowds from beyond the range of the human voice, 3) by meetings and personal contacts in private homes, prisons, public houses, theatres, factories, and other unusual places, 4) by adapting popular song tunes to religious themes, 5) by abandoning the formal sermon and cultivating an informal and colloquial type of preaching, and 6) by making of every convert a witness for Christ by both private life and public testimony.

This militant evangelism culminated in the adoption of the title "Salvation Army" and the re-organization of the movement along quasi-military lines between 1878 and 1880. Its "Orders and Regulations" were patterned after those of the British Army, its workers assumed military titles, its trainees became "cadets", its local units were designated as "corps", their headquarters or places of worship as "citadels" or "outposts", and their evangelistic undertakings as "campaigns"

The Army is divided into "Territories", each under a "Commissioner". The territories usually conform to national boundaries, although the United States comprises four and Canada two such units These "Territories" are usually further sub-divided into "Provinces" and "Divisions"

At first bitterly opposed by both conventional churchmen and their secular opponents, notably T H. Huxley, the Army finally acquired enormous popularity. No small credit for this gain in prestige is due to Booth's wife, Catherine Mumford Booth (1829-1890), a woman of charm and ability, who won the sympathy of many of the upper classes for the new movement. The Prince of Wales became its most prominent patron, and at his instance Booth was officially invited to his coronation as Edward VII in 1902. To "Mother Catherine" is also due the development of the "Female Ministry", and the establishment of the principle that women have absolute parity with men in privilege, position, and dignity within the Army.

In the meantime, the movement had become international in scope. It was extended to the United States in 1880, to Australia in 1881, then to the European continent and finally to most Christian lands and many mission fields.

Booth early realized that the physical and social environment of the submerged masses, especially in the great cities, made it difficult for them to appreciate the Army's message. He accordingly embarked upon social work to clear the way for evangelism. These services ranged from night shelters and free breakfasts to the selection and training of prospective emigrants and their settlement overseas. Booth's experiences in this field led to the publication in 1890 of his In Darkest England, and the Way Out, in which he proposed the concentration of the nation's philanthropic funds upon the slums, hitherto largely left to the care of the local parish churches, and suggested a list of practical expedients to this end. The Army now maintains an extensive system of summer camps, nurseries, children's and old people's homes, hostels, settlements, men's social service centers, employment offices and missing persons bureaus, provides Thanksgiving and Christmas dinners, and carries on Americanization, family service, transient and emergency relief, and other case work services for individuals and families.

Theologically the Army is conservative and fundamentalist Its preaching stresses the reality of sin, a future life of rewards and punishments, the necessity of the work of redemption, the individual's need of conversion, preceded by penitence, and followed by growth in holiness. Officers wear a regulation uniform as a symbol of their consecration and separation from the world.

In government, the Salvation Army is highly centralized and autocratic, unquestioning obedience being required of all ranks. It is directed from "International Headquarters" in London, under the control of a "General", who issues all orders and regulations, assisted by a "Chief of Staff", a "Foreign Secretary", a "Chancellor", and other officials who also possess large powers. By a deed poll of 1878, each General was empowered to appoint his successor under seal, but the name of the person designated was not divulged until the time for succession. A second deed poll executed in 1904 provided for the removal of a General and the election of his successor by a High Council in the event of mental incapacity or other unfitness. The announcement of Booth's death in 1912 was accompanied by the statement that his eldest son, William Bramwell Booth (1856-1929), had become the new General Bramwell Booth had become his father's "Chief of Staff" in 1878, at the age of twenty-two, and had long been the organizing genius of the movement. He continued to direct its affairs until he was removed by the High Council in February, 1929, on the ground of senility, and for the first time the self-perpetuating leadership was broken, though not without a bitter fight within the Army The Generalship has since been elective

But the autocracy had not been heretofore unquestioned, even within the Booth family itself. William Booth's second son, Ballington (1859-1940), and his wife had come to America in 1886 in full charge of the Army. But ten years later they resigned because of differences with the founder, and established a rival organization, the Volunteers of America*. Leadership of the American Salvation Army then passed to William Booth's son-in-law, Commander Frederic de L. Booth-Tucker (1853-1929), who was in turn succeeded by Booth's daughter, Evangeline (1865-   ). On her retirement in 1939, she was succeeded by the present Commander, Edward J. Parker.

During the First World War, the Salvation Army gained wide-spread recognition for its work for the armed forces, especially in the Allied countries. In the United States, Commander Evangeline Booth placed the entire resources of her organization at the disposal of the Government. Extensive welfare work was carried on for the families of service men at home and Salvationist men and women ministered to the comfort of soldiers right up to the front line trenches. With the outbreak of the Second World War, the Army suffered eclipse in Axis countries and in territories subject to their jurisdiction, the Italian government having banned the Salvation Army uniform and forbidden both outdoor and indoor meetings Direct communications between International Headquarters in London and the Army in Axis territory ceased, but private sources indicated that a greatly curtailed program was still in existence. Among the United Nations, however, the Salvation Army found new opportunities for service. It became one of the six United Service Organizations in the United States to provide recreational, spiritual, and welfare services to members of the armed forces outside of military reservations, and to workers in war production centers. The war also imposed heavy demands upon the family welfare, juvenile delinquency, and unmarried mother services of the Army. Cf. Church Army.

Bramwell Booth, These Fifty Years (London) , St John Ervine, God's Soldier. General William Booth (1935)   H.E.J.

samādhi: The final stage reached by the Indian mystic, a superconscious state in which all distinction between subject and object is lost and the One Self is realized A foretaste of the final state of emancipation or *moksha.   C.S.B

Samaria: City built by Omri, king of Israel, during the ninth century B.C. (I. Kgs. xvi, 24), destroyed by the Assyrians in 722 B.C. Rebuilt several times, especially by Herod the Great who named it Sebaste.

See G A Reisner, Harvard Excavations at Samaria (1924) 2 vols.; J. W Jack, Samaria in Ahab's time (1929) , F. M. Abel, Géographie de la Palestine (1938), vol. II, pp 443-446.   S.L.T.

Samaritan Pentateuch: The version of the first five books of the Bible current among the Samaritans, and employed by them in religious exercises since the Samaritan Schism, shortly after 432 B.C., when the Samaritans separated themselves from the Jewish people and established themselves as an independent religious community. It too is written in Hebrew, and only in scroll form; but unlike the Jewish Torah scrolls, it employs only the ancient Hebrew system of writing. It differs in approximately six thousand passages from the traditional version of the Pentateuch*. Occasionally these divergent readings make possible a restoration of the original text.   J.M.

Sama-Veda: Literally the "chant" Veda, or Veda of music. One of the four Vedas of early Hinduism. There is little original material in it, all but 75 of the 1225 stanzas being taken from the Rig-Veda*. It was used by the Udgatri, the priest who sang the strophes at the Soma sacrifice.   C.S.B

Samhain: (Celt) New Year's harvest festival on October 31, or November 1 and lasting about a week. Celebration includes the three days before and three days after the day. The feast was linked not only with the departure of the sun and summer, but also with rites that concerned the use of weapons, and the worship of ghosts of the dead.   F.L.P.

Samhita: The name of the text of the Vedas, fixed about 600 B.C. according to the rules of sandhi which control the classical Sanskrit. The word which means "collection" is often used to describe the Vedas. Thus, Dasgupta writes of the four Samhitas, meaning the four Vedas.   C.S.B.

samsara: The Hindu wheel of life. The endless round of birth and rebirth, or transmigration*, the cessation of which for the Hindu meant moksha or salvation.   C.S.B.

Samson: Hero of the ancient Hebrew story cycle found in Judges* 14-16 preceded by an introductory chapter 13 dealing with his parents and birth. Some scholars doubt his historicity and explain him as a solar mythological hero (Samson, Heb. Sun-man). In any case the question is of little importance since Samson is not the initiator or furtherer of any movement political or religious in Israel which would give him special historical significance. The real value of the story lies in its genuine local setting. It seems, unlike other hero-tales of the O.T. to emanate not from prophetic literary circles, but from popular traditions of country folk.   H.K.—L.F.

Samuel, I and II: Historical books of the O.T., included among the "Former Prophets"* in the Hebrew canon. In the Hebrew text they originally formed a single book. The division was first made in the Septuagint*, in which the two rolls are called The First and Second Books of the Kingdoms. They cover the history of Israel for approximately a century, during the lives of Samuel and Saul and almost the whole of the life of David. Because of the presence of duplicate, or even triplicate, narratives of the same events, and pronounced differences in literary style and religious points of view, it is certain that these books contain at least two sources. They may be continuations of the J and E narratives of the hexateuch*, but this view has not been proved in detail. The early source was apparently written in the reign of Solomon*, and represented the establishment of the Israelite kingdom as having Yahweh's approval; it is a highly authentic and objective narrative in classical Hebrew prose. Its account of the life and reign of David* is especially valuable. The later source (or sources) represented the establishment of the kingdom as apostasy from Yahweh, magnifies Samuel, and is generally homiletical in tone. It was written before Deuteronomy*, but its exact date is difficult to establish. The Books of Samuel received only slight editing by the Deuteronomists (See D) and later writers.

See H P Smith, The Books of Samuel (International Critical Commentary, 1899), O. Eissfeldt, Die Komposition der Samuelisbücher (1931)   J.P.H.

samurai: (From samurau meaning "to guard") The name applied to members of the Japanese warrior caste in feudal times.   D.C.H.

sanctification: This term generally refers to the process or experience by which a person (in primitive religions also things) are rendered holy.

Theologically, the term means the divine process by which the Christian life of faith and love is fulfilled. According to a very old tradition, the Holy Spirit is the source and agent of sanctification. This means that whosoever has the Holy Spirit* (or is "in Christ") is truly in God, sharing in his life of love as one who is redeemed and as such wholly acceptable to God's sight.

In Roman Catholic thought, sanctification is conceived of as taking place by the infusion of justifying sacramental grace. The doctrine of sanctification became of particular importance in Protestantism. Under the leadership of Luther, the reformers distinguished justification* from sanctification in such a way that sanctification was understood as the process begun and assured of fulfillment by the divine justification. (A Christian, taught Luther, is one who under the Holy Spirit is continually becoming a Christian). Under the influence of the exclusively forensic interpretation of justification by the later Protestants, sanctification became more and more separated from justification (as was also repentance, which in the original Reformation teaching was, like sanctification, an essential part of the experience or act of justification). The effects of such teaching was that the Orthodox Protestants overemphasized justification neglecting the concern for the renewal of life expressed in the doctrine of sanctification; that the Pietists*, reacting against the one-sidedness of the Orthodox, so stressed sanctification that they failed fully to recognize justification as its ground, and that the Rationalists, unable to agree either with the Orthodox or the Pietists, rejected both doctrines altogether. A re-construction of them in terms of Christian experience was begun by Schleiermacher and Ritschl. Under the impact of the recent rediscovery of the faith of the Reformation, this re-construction is now in full swing. See perfection; psychology of religion; seven gifts of the Holy Spirit.   W.P.

sanctity: Holiness of life, saintliness. The religious ideal for the individual—in all religions that call for transformation of life. Conceived mystically, as ever closer union with God; or more ethically, as the attainment of the true disposition and character—in Christianity, the Christlike spirit. May pertain to institutions, as being hallowed, worthy of reverence (e.g., the 'sanctities of the home'). See perfection, sanctification.

R N Flew, The Idea of Perfection in Christian Theology (1934)   J.L.

sanctorum communis: See communion of saints.

sanctuary: (Lat., sanctus, holy) The most sacred part of a religious building. The place of the altar* in a Christian church. See chancel.   F.T.P.

Sanctus: (Lat, holy) The last part of the preface, just before the Canon, of the Mass*, the words, beginning "Sanctus, sanctus, sanctus," are from Isaiah, vi, 3, and were in use as early as Clement of Rome (d. 104).   L.R.W.

Sanday, William: (1843-1920) N.T. scholar, Professor of Divinity and Canon of Christ Church Oxford from 1895. With A. C. Headlam, he wrote the I C C. on Romans (1895), also Outlines of the Life of Christ (1905). In many ways his most important work lay in mediating continental research to English scholarship, as in The Criticism of the Fourth Gospel (1906) and The Life of Christ in Recent Research (1907).   C T C.

Sandemanians: See Glassites.

sanhedrin: The supreme judicial body in the Jewish state from some time in the third century B.C, or even earlier, and until its destruction by the Romans in 70 A.D. Actually there seem to have been two Sanhedrins, one dealing with the administration of justice in civil and political matters, and presided over by the high-priest, the other concerned only with religious matters. Each Sanhedrin seems to have consisted of from seventy to seventy-two members. Both Sanhedrins sat in the Temple at Jerusalem, but in different chambers. It is the first Sanhedrin to which frequent reference is made in the Gospels. See Gamaliel I; laying on of hands, Nasi.   J.M.

Sankhya: One of the six traditional systems of Indian philosophy, probably the oldest. It was founded by Kapila who lived somewhat earlier than Gautama Buddha*. He repudiated the monism of the Upanishads* represented in the Brahman concept and specifically denied the existence of God. The system is dualistic. It conceives of two utterly distinct substances, uncreated and existing eternally, prakriti, matter and purusha, soul. Matter is real, not illusion, and not one but an infinite number of souls exist. The soul itself is without qualities or parts. It can only be described negatively. By their mere presence and through no conscious will of their own the souls excite matter "as a magnet acts on iron" disturbing the perfect equilibrium which exists between the three constituent *gunas and so the evolution of the physical universe is begun. At the end of a world period there is a return to the original state of balance. The cyclic evolution and devolution of the universe is eternal.

The Sānkhya is a profoundly pessimistic system. All existence is suffering Escape from existence is therefore sought. How is it achieved? The soul and matter are completely separate and distinct, but through lack of discrimination arises the pain of existence The remedy can therefore be only in "discriminating knowledge", by which their utter difference is discerned. Salvation must therefore be by knowledge. Through it comes emancipation. Once emancipated, the soul abides, says Oldenberg, "eternally released from the delusion and suffering of this world, as a seer who no longer sees anything, a glass in which nothing is any longer reflected, as pure untroubled light by which nothing is illuminated". (Quoted by R. Garbe, Encyclopedia of Religion and Ethics, Vol., 11, p. 192a). See cosmogonies.

S Das Gupta, History of Indian Philosophy (1922, 32, 41), 3 vols , S. Radhakrishnan, Indian Philosophy (London, 1923, 1927).   C.S.B.

Sankhya Yoga: See Yoga—as a philosophy.
                                                                                            C.S.B.

sannyāsī: One who has entered upon the fourth of the stages of life through which high caste Hindus were traditionally supposed to pass, student, householder, forest dweller, and homeless mendicant. Holy man,—ascetic, one who has dedicated himself completely to the quest for moksha.*   C.S.B.

Santayana, George: (1863-   ) Litterateur, and Prof. of Phil. at Harvard, 1889-1912. For this critical realist and materialist, the universe consists, at one extreme, of Matter, the ultimate, independent and changing causal agency, purposeless though indefinitely fertile in potentiality. At the other extreme is the realm of Essence, consisting of timeless qualities and relations which are open to "spirit" and bear only relevant witness to physical events. The conscious spirit, an emanation from the bodily psyche, thus guides the body, but it has no causal power. It finds freest expression in the detached contemplation of essence. Religion is a constructive work of imagination: "Religions are the great fairy-tales of the conscience," and as such a joy to an unmoralizing spirit.

The Sense of Beauty (1896); The Life of Reason (2nd ed , 1922), Scepticism and Animal Faith (1923); The Realm of Essences (1927); The Realm of Matter (1930).   P.A.B.

saoshyant: A Zoroastrian term variously used to denote priest or apostle (usually plural), holy men who will at the millenium aid in the renovation of the world; or, particularly in later Zoroastrianism, the last of the miraculously born sons of Zoroaster who will preside over the general resurrection at the end of the age. See salvation—Zoroastrianism.   C.S.B.

Sarasvati: Hindu goddess of learning and wife of Brahma*.

Also it is the name of an order of Hindu ascetics to which the founder of the Arya Samaj* once belonged, and from which he took the name by which he is best known, Dyananda Sarasvati.

                                                                                            C.S.B.

Sartorius, Ernest Wilhelm Christian: (1797-1859) He was professor in Marburg and general church superintendent of Prussia He was a most extreme representative of supernaturalism. As revelation was for him a historical fact, its validity and truth were to be proved by historical means. He was a pioneer of theological repristination.

Die lutherische Lehre vom Unvermoegen des freien Willens zur hoeheren Sittlichkeit, in Briefen, nebst einem Anhange gegen Herr D Schleiermachers Abhandlung ueber die Lehre von der Erwahlung (Gottingen, 1821), Beitrage zur Vertheidigung der evangelischen Rechtglaubigkeit, 2 vols (Heidelberg, 1825-26), Die Lehre von Christi Person und Werk in populären Vorlesungen (Hamburg, 1831, 7th ed., Hamburg, 1860)   H.H.

Sarum Use: Utilized by St. Osmond (d. 1099) in his new diocese of Salisbury (Lat., Sarum), this Use became, by mid-thirteenth century, the prevalent English liturgy*. Embodying local variations within the basic Western Rite, it constituted a unified service of dignity and beauty. Probably comprising a Breviary, Missal, and Manual, the Sarum Use provided the basis for the later Book of Common Prayer*.   R.C.P.

Satan: Mentioned in the O.T. only three times, in Zech. 3 1-2, Job 1-2, and I Chron. 21.1. All three passages are post-exilic*, i.e., later than 539 B.C., and evidence the influence of the Zoroastrian* doctrine of dualism upon the evolving Judaism of this period. In pre-exilic* Jewish thought the figure of Satan was entirely unknown. The absolute monotheism of normative Judaism affirmed that there was only one divine power, one God, and, in purposed refutation of the dominant Persian dualism of the day, that He was the creator of both light and darkness, the source of evil as well as good (Isa. 45, 6-7). But to the popular Jewish mind of that day dualism seemed to solve conveniently one of the baffling problems of existence, the problem of good and evil, and so, contrary to the tenets of official Judaism, evolved the figure of Satan, patterned obviously after the Zoroastrian power of evil, Ahriman. Actually Satan never had any place in the theology of normative Judaism. The name, Satan, in Hebrew means "adversary, accuser", and just this role Satan plays in the O.T. and in subsequent Jewish apocalyptic literature*. He is the adversary of God and man. He seeks to frustrate God's purposes of good and to entice men to defy God and do evil. Then he accuses them before God and brings about their punishment and destruction. However in Jewish thought and legend Satan was never more than a figure of secondary rank and power, always subordinate to God and subject to discipline by Him. Only in Christianity, as it emerged from Judaism, did Satan come to be regarded as a divine being, altogether independent of and hostile to God, the malevolent worker of evil in the world, and thus to be identified with the Devil. See Beelzebub; devil; Iblis. Cf. demons; rakshas.   J.M.

In the Apocrypha, Satan is represented as the author of all evil (Wisdom II, 24) and as the seducer of Eve who was hurled from heaven because of his iniquity (Slavonic Bk. of Enoch xxix). The names, Satanel (ibid, XXXI, 3), Mastema (Jubilees, XVII, 18), Asmodeus (Tobit), and Samael are used as equivalents of "Satan".

In the N.T., Satan and his kingdom are regarded as encompassing the entire world, and of factors of all the events of daily life. Satan is the author of all evil (Luke X, 19) who beguiled Eve (II Cor. XI, 3) and who brought death into the world (Heb. II, 13) being ever the tempter (I Cor. VII, 5). Satan is God's enemy whom he fights and casts from heaven, but not permanently, for after one thousand years, Satan must be fought again (Rev.). Besides the name, "Satan," he is also referred to as "devil,"* (Matt. IV), "adversary" (I Peter), "enemy" (Matt. xiii 39), "accuser" (Rev. xii, 10), "old serpent" (ibid, xx, 2), "great dragon" (ibid, xii, 9), "Beelzebub"* (Matt. x, 25) and "Belial."* See descent into hades   H.K.—L.F.

sati: See suttee.

satisfaction: (Lat., satisfactio, fr. satisfacere, to satisfy) The essential idea in the various uses of the term within the Christian Church has been the rendering to God of a sufficient compensation, or reparation, for sin* as the antecedent condition for forgiveness*. Until the Middle Ages the term had to do solely with repentance. In this sense it was introduced, in the late 2nd Cent., by Tertullian*, who took it from Roman law (see his De poenitentia). God, who as Judge demands justice of his rational creatures, accepts repentance* as satisfaction for sin (i.e., as the price for granting pardon), which, in the case of sin following baptism, must include exomologesis' (i.e., public acts of humiliation). By the Middle Ages repentance, or penance*, had become a sacrament involving three parts (contrition, confession and works of penance) with the term satisfaction referring both to the entire penance and, more specifically, to the third part or works (i.e., almsdeeds, fasting and prayer). Peter Lombard*, in his Liber Sententiarum, fixed this useage for Catholic theology and Aquinas elaborated it (Summa Theolog., III, Suppl, qq. 12-15). To the Protestant Reformers, the notion of God's being satisfied by works of repentance was abhorrent, Luther saying that "it is only by the faith of a contrite heart that He is satisfied" (Babylon. Captiv.) and Calvin calling the whole useage "sophistry" and "falsehood" (Institutes, III, iv. 25). Against these criticisms the Catholic view was reaffirmed, in 1551, in the Decree on Penance (chp. viii) of the Council of Trent*, with the explanation that such penitential satisfaction is "through Jesus Christ" who "satisfied for our sins." In the Church of England, Hooker sought to conform to this Catholic practice of making penitential works of satisfaction subsidiary to the primary satisfaction rendered by Christ (Laws of Eccl. Polity, VI, v, 1-6).

The fundamental use of the term, since the Middle Ages, has been soteriological. N.T. writers had variously agreed that the passion and death of Christ had accomplished our redemption* but provided no unified or consistent explanation of its ground or efficacy. It was Anselm* (11th Cent.) who, in rejecting the ransom theory of Christ's atonement* (Cur Deus Homo, I, vii; II, xix), applied the idea of satisfaction to the soteriological problem (hence satisfaction theory). Agreeing in general with Tertullian's view that Divine Justice requires satisfaction (reparation) for sin, Anselm denied that repentance (or works) per se could render the necessary satisfaction (ib., I, xx), indeed nothing that man could do could repay the debt to God's honor which man had robbed by sinning (I, xi), because man owes every good work to God anyway, apart from sin, because man has lost all ability to repay through the Fall*, and because Divine Justice required either eternal punishment for man's sin (I, xi) or an infinite satisfaction of the Divine Honor (II, vi), hence the necessity of the voluntary death of a God-man. God thus revealed both his justice, in requiring satisfaction (in lieu of punishment), and his love, in providing redemption. Direct forgiveness of sins, without such satisfaction, would have been to let sin go unpunished; to remove the difference between the guilty and the not guilty; and therefore to violate the Divine Justice (I, xii & xxiv). Anselm's theory, as amplified by Aquinas (Summa Theolog., III, qq. 46-50), became normative for Catholic theology and the presupposition of the later Protestant formulations. In the penal theory of the Reformers, Christ's death is still understood as the satisfaction rendered for sin (both original and actual), but whereas Anselm had made sin a violation of the Divine Honor and had distinguished between satisfaction and punishment, the Reformers treated sin as a violation of the Divine Justice and satisfaction as consisting in the actual punishment accepted by Christ (see e.g., Calvin's Institutes II, xii-xvii). Grotius*, in the so-called governmental theory, similarly assumed the necessity of an "antecedent satisfaction" as the condition for the remission of sins, but defined it as the punishment accepted by Christ, not in the interest of retributive justice, but for the purpose of providing a "distinguished example" of the punishment which sin deserves and therefore acting as a deterrent to further sin in the interests of the common good (Satisfaction of Christ, esp. II-VI). Motivating all these substitutionary theories is the desire to conserve the N.T. view that Christ died for us, to discover an adequate theoretical explanation of his death (and in such a way as to conserve both the love and justice of God), and to impel non-believers to faith in Christ through fear of the consequences of the Divine Wrath. It was this appeal to fear and the too rigid restriction of the love of God by his justice, together with major interest in the life, as well as the death, of Christ, that led Abailard* (12th Cent.), and much liberal thought since, to find the significance of Christ's redemptive work in the influence of his love and example (moral influence theory).

In addition to the primary works referred to, the following studies may be mentioned· F Godet and others, The Atonement in Modern Religious Thought (1901); G B. Stevens, The Christian Doctrine of Salvation (1905), J K Mozley, The Doctrine of the Atonement (1915), H Rashdall, The Idea of Atonement in Christian Theology (1919), A. C. Knudson, The Doctrine of Redemption (1933), chap. vii; Shailer Mathews, The Atonement and the Social Process (1930), Emil Brunner, The Mediator, Engl. trans. (1934), chaps xvii-xxi.   E.T.R.

Satyasiddhi School: See Buddhist Terminology.

satyr: One of a class of classical Greek woodland deities in human form with a horse's ears and tail, or, as with the Romans, represented with goat's ears, tail, legs, and budding horns, a lustful or beastly-minded man.   F.L.P.

Saussaye, Daniel Chantepie de la, the elder:
(1818-1874) He was professor at the University of Groningen. He (with J. H. Gunning) was the spiritual progenitor of the ethische richting. Starting from religious experience, not from external authority, they were strongly influenced by Schleiermacher, Ritschl, Herrmann and less strongly by Vinet. Although orthodox in theology, they were both examples of intimate personal piety that bequeathed to their pupils the task of realizing a reconciliation between culture and faith. They both opposed the church legalistic attempt to meet the negative criticism of modern theology. They sought to surmount its negation through preaching, prayer and study, and tried to make clear the significance of Christian truth in the Calvinistic-Reformed sense for the inner man. They termed this the ethical significance of faith, a term which caused much confusion and which really signified nothing moral. On the contrary, they aimed to combat moralism, intellectualism and mysticism, which in reality were derived from the ethos, the deepest essence of man. Faith was the trustful surrender to the person of Christ, who for them was the norm of the good which was discoverable in all parties and groups, even in the moderns. They called their theology ethical-irenic.

La crise religieuse en Hollande (Leyde, 1860); J H. Gunning, Het protestantisch Nederland onzer dagen (Groningen, 1889); A. M. Brouwer, Daniel Chantepie de la Saussaye (Groningen, 1905); J. J. P. Valeton, De Ethische Richting (Baarn, 1909), O. Noordmans, Ontwikkeling en Toekomst van de Ethische Theologie. In Geestelijke Perspektieven (Amsterdam, 1930).   H.H.

Saussaye, Pierre Daniel Chantepie de la, the younger:
(1848-1920) He first was pastor of the Reformed church, then taught in succession at the universities of Amsterdam and Leyden. He was a leader of the left wing of the ethical group whose spiritual progenitors were his father and J. H. Gunning. Through him, H. Th. Obbink and G. van de Leeuw, the ethische richting rendered meritorious service to the history and science of religion. His ideas were akin to those of the religious-historical school with its longing of a universal-human religiosity in which Christ occupies an important but no longer a decisive position

Lehrbuch der Religionsgeschichte, 2 vols (Tubingen, 1887-89), Manual of the Science of Religion (London, 1891), Religion of the Teutons (1902), J' J P Valeton, De Ethische Richting (Baarn, 1909), G van der Leeuw, Ethisch modern of orthodox (Utrecht, 1924), J Lindeboom, Geschiedenis van het vrijzinnig Protestantisme, 2 vols (Huis ter Heide, 1927, Assen, 1933).   H H.

saving faith: In opposition to the Catholic emphasis on faith as being primarily intellectual submission to doctrines whose truth is guaranteed by the infallible authority of the Church, love being the animating principle of faith and the Church being the object to which the fiducia in faith has reference, Protestant theologians have affirmed that there can only be saving faith when notitia (knowledge of the Word of God) and assensus (acknowledgment that the Word of God is true) are followed by fiducia which is personal trust in the saving and unmerited grace of God in Christ. See assurance of salvation.   H.W.J.

Saviour: In its origin this was a pagan term applied to various divinities and occasionally to deified men. Certain kings of Syria and Egypt were invested with the title of "Soter" as part of their proper names It was perhaps because of its pagan associations that the term was at first avoided by Christians. In' the N T. it occurs rarely, and always with a general sense, as a variant of the more usual expression "he who has saved us". It was not until well on in the 2no century that "the Saviour" came to be one of the acknowledged names of Christ From that time on, however, it tended to displace the earlier names of Messiah and Lord, and has continued ever since to be the distinctive title. The adoption of the name has been adduced by some modern scholars as one of the proofs that Christianity borrowed from the mystery cults, and transferred to Jesus the honours hitherto attached to Attis and Serapis. This appears to be contrary to the facts. So long as there was danger of a confusion between Jesus and the gods of the cults the name "Saviour" was not applied to him in any specific sense. It only became usual when Christianity had fully established its claim to be a new and separate religion. The name was adopted for no other reason than that it was inevitable. From the outset it had been the cardinal Christian belief that Christ had brought salvation, and the belief could not but embody itself, sooner or later, in the one word that definitely expressed it. Attempts have been made to trace back the name to some particular theology, but this also is unnecessary. It is indeed significant that the name came into general use during the conflict with Gnosticism* and emphasized the conception of Christ as the sole agent of salvation. This, however, was not a dogma but the fundamental faith of the church. Here we may find the ultimate reason why Christ is known pre-eminently as "the Saviour". While they hold many different theories as to the nature of his salvation, all Christians are agreed on the fact that he has saved. A title is chosen for him which is independent of sect or creed.

W Bousset, Kyrios Christos (1914) ; A Harnack, History of Dogma (1886 'ff.), vols. I and II.
E.F S.

Savitri: 1) A variant spelling of Savitar, the Vedic sun god. 2) The heroine of the poem Savitri and Satyavan, or Love Conquers Death, told to the Pandava brothers while exiled in the forest—one of the episodes of the great Hindu epic, the Mahabharata. 3) It is also used to designate the "most sacred of prayers, the Savitri " 4) Also it is the name of one of the less important Upanishads
C.S.B.

Savonarola, Jerome: (1452-1498) Dominican monk. Italy's greatest preacher. In fiery, popular sermons he castigated the morals of his time and uttered prophecies, one of which, the invasion of Charles VIII of France, made such an impression when fulfilled that he was able to set up a theocratic government in Florence and bring about a spectacular reform in outward morals. A reaction set in. He was excommunicated by the pope, captured by a fanatical mob and condemned to be burned at the stake. Savonarola's ideals were those of monkish asceticism. He did not depart from Catholic dogma, except to deny the pope's infallibility.
E.C K.

Savoy Declaration: A statement agreed upon by Congregationalist leaders at a meeting in the Savoy palace, London, in October 1658. It contains an explanatory preface, and a series of revisions of and additions to the Westminster Confession. These changes were adopted by American Congregationalism*. P. Schaff, Creeds of Christendom, III (1919). See New England theology.
J T.M.

Saybrook Platform, The: Adopted by Connecticut Congregationalists* in 1708. It contained the Savoy Confession, an English Congregational revision of the Westminster Confession, the Heads of Agreement,* an English Presbyterian-Congregational document, and Fifteen Articles for the administration of Church discipline. The latter provided for county associations, called Consociations, which were to have oversight of individual congregations. From that time forward Connecticut Congregationalism tended, in its polity, in the direction of Presbyterianism, so that by the end of the colonial period the names Congregational and Presbyterian were used interchangeably.
W.W.S.

scala sancta: (Lat., scala, stairs, sanctus, holy) Holy Stairs consist of twenty-eight marble steps near the Lateran at Rome. According to tradition these stairs led once to the pretorium of Pilate at Jerusalem, and are the ones up which Christ was led during His Passion. The stairs were brought from Jerusalem to Rome about 326 by St. Helena, the mother of Constantine.

Beringer, Der Ablaesse I, 501.
B.S. scandal: In biblical usage a stumbling block that gives offense to the religious feelings or is the occasion of lapse of faith or of religious disobedience in others. In modern usage an offense or outrage against the moral feelings of a community. It often denotes detraction or defamation of character due to common talk, evil report or malicious gossip.

R.W.F.

scapegoat: One of the two goats which played the central role in the complex ritual of the annual Day of Atonement* (Lev. 16. 8ff.). Upon it the sins of the entire Jewish people, accumulated during the year just ended, were loaded by the high-priest with symbolic ceremony It was then led forth into the wilderness, bearing the sins of the people with it There it was pushed over a steep and high cliff, not far from Jerusalem, and killed. Its death in this strange manner was thought to work atonement for the people and to bring remission of their sins. Because of this unique role, the term, scapegoat, has come to designate any person or people, who is made to suffer, and especially to perish, innocently and unjustly for, and usually through the conscious purpose of, another, more guilty person, who, in turn, escapes the consequences of his evil deeds See human scarifice, laying on of hands.
J.M.

scapular: (Lat., scapula, shoulder) A part of the religious garb of monastic orders, so called because it covers the shoulders, extending almost to the feet in front and in back. The smaller scapular is worn by members of third orders living in the world. See Tertiaries.
W.H.

scepticism: See skepticism.

Schaeder, Erich: (1861-1936) He was professor in Konigsberg, Gottingen, Kiel and Breslau. Rejecting the apologetic wooing of the modern, he developed a biblical theology that seeks advance solely in the deeper disclosure of biblical truth. He saw the harm of almost all conservative, as well as critical theology, in its anthropocentric attitude, which he tried to destroy. In showing a negative attitude towards German idealism he fought the historicism of the religious-historical theology and the tyranny of the Lutheran and pietistic soteriological viewpoints in faith and theology.

Theozentrische Theologie, vol. I (Leipzig, 1825), vol II (Leipzig, 1928), Das Geistes problem der Theologie (Leipzig, 1924).
H.H.

Schaff, Philip: (1819-1893) Biblical scholar, writer, historian, professor and active leader in many lines of church life and thought. A Swiss, trained in Germany, his main contribution was made in the U. S. A. See Mercersburg theology.
K.H.C.

Schartau, Henric: (1757-1825) Early impressed by the intellectual clarity of orthodoxy, and interested in the analysis of religious experience, Schartau was affected by Moravian pietism, but later opposed its subjectivism and sentimentalism. He stressed the ordo salutis, the place of the ministry, and the idea of the call. He wielded a powerful influence through correspondence with spiritual inquirers, a rigid homiletical method, and a deep sense of seriousness, which for a century has characterized West Sweden. His ministry was spent in Lund. Of materials published since his death, the correspondence is remarkable for its psychological study of Christian faith and experience.

Predikningar öfver kyrkoarets gamla högmessotexter (12th ed , 1917) , Undervisning i Christendomskunskapen (13th ed , 1900) , H Hagglund Henric Schartau (1924) ; A. Lindeblad, Henric Schartau's lefnad och lära (2nd ed., 1864, reprinted, 1917)
C.J.B.

Scheel, Otto: (1876-19) German Protestant theologian He was born in Tondern, Sleswig.
In 1900 he was privatdozent Kiel, from 1906-1924 professor of Church History Tübingen, from 1924-1933 professor of German History, Kiel.
Scheel was influential through his studies in the history of the Reformation, and particularly in the early phase of Luther's development, where he successfully combined the psychological and the theological approach. He was Co-editor of Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart (1st ed.).
An active politician, he especially worked for the rights of the German minorities abroad.
Die Kirche im Urchristentum (1912) , Martin Luther, 2 vols. (1915-1917, 3rd ed , 1921-1930)
O A.P.

Scheibe, Max: (1870-) He taught at the University of Halle. Since 1902 he is pastor of the evangelical-reformed community in Leipzig. Being more of a follower of his teacher R. A Lip-sius*, he postulates religious ideas on a basis of need and value.
Die Bedeutung der Werturteile für das religiöse Erkennen (Halle, 1893) , Calvins Pradestinationslehre
(Halle, 1897).
H.H

Scheler, Max Ferdinand: (1874-1928) Influenced by Brentano, Eucken, and Husserl, Scheler applied the phenomenological method especially to the living data of instinct and emotion. In his first (Protestant) period his most systematic work, Der Formalismus in der Ethik und die materiale Wertethik (1913-16) was a defence of the objectivity of value by the use of what he called "ethical absolutism" and "material apriorism" or theory of the a priori nature of content as well as form. In his Catholic period Vom Ewigem im Menschen (1921) analyzed the religious experience as an act of love. Later, outside of the church, Scheler emphasized the distinction between Leben and Geist. Denying life, man, with phenomenological insight, sensitizes himself to spiritual possibilities. Scheler's Wesen und Formen der Sympathie (1926) is often quoted by sociologists. Brief, but important, is Die Stellung des Menschen im Kosmos (1928). Nicolai Hartmann* has been influenced by his value theory.
J.S.B.

Schelling, Friedrich Wilhelm Joseph: (1775-1854) His persistent openmindedness for the problematic of realities enabled Schelling to push ahead again and again to new thought positions ' His eternal beginning and productive scepticism made him a leader of a new philosophical movement within the ranks of idealism. Having revealed the problematic of idealism, his final philosophy centers in the relation of idealism to Christianity.

Christianity and idealism are irreconcilable on idealistic grounds. Schelling rejects the panthe-ism of idealism, its utopianism, its system of necessity and apriorism which suppress the personality and liberty of both God and man, its being merely a science of ideas, not a metaphysic that solves and answers the great problems of man's existence. In his final philosophy Schelling seeks to formulate a speculative theism in which the problems of divine and human sovereign liberty, and the creative personality of God become central in an anti-idealistic philosophy. The reality of the concrete world with all its incompletenesses; the reality of religion, the reality of mythology, the reality of Christianity the acts of the content of which are the acts of God; the reality of the ultimate world and the reality of immortality' are so many boundaries of an a priori rational science, whereas a positive philosophy, as the philosophy of the living God and his creative acts, is a synthesis of faith and knowledge. The elder Schelling offers a union of theology and philosophy in his explanation of a Christian philosophy of existence.
Through his emphasis on man's central categories of his personality decision and responsibility, he came close to Kierkegaard's* Christian philosophy of existence. By intention Schelling's final philosophy touched the fringes of an existential philosophy, in reality, however, he, like Hegel, put his philosophy at the end of a historical process by which an absolute standpoint in which the contradictions of existence have vanished, is achieved.
H Dreyer, Der Begriff Geist in der deutschen Philosophie von Kant bis Hegel (Berlin, 1908) ; P.
Genths, Die Identitätsphilosophie Schellings in ihrem Verhaltnis zur Religion (Würzburg, 1926) ; Th.
Hoppe, Die Philosophie Schellings in ihrem Verhältnis zum Christentum (Rostock, 1875) , O Pla-tinius, Schellings Fortführung der Lehre Kants vom Bösen (Hilchenbach, 1928) ; P. Tillich, Die religionsgeschichtliche Konstruktion in Schellings positiver Philosophie, ihre Voraussetzungen und Prinzipien (Halle, 1910) , Mystik und Schuldbewusstsein in Schellings philosophischer Entwicklung (Gutersloh, 1912) ; A. Weber, Examen critique de la philosophie religieuse de Schelling (Strassburg, 1860) . H.H.

Schenkel, Daniel: (1813-1885) He taught at the University of Heidelberg. As a systematic theologian he was strongly ethically oriented in his apologetic and polemical works Das Wesen des Protestantismus, 3 vols. (Schaffhausen, 1846-51) ; Die christliche Dogmatik vom Standpunkt des Gewissens, 2 vols. (Wiesbaden, 1858) , Charakterbild Jesu (Wiesbaden, 1864, 4th ed , Wiesbaden, 1873) Die Grundlehren des Christentums aus dem Bewusstsein des Glaubens dargestellt (Leipzig, 1877).
H.H.

Schérer, Edmond: (1815-1889) He was for a time professor of exegesis at the University of Geneva, Switzerland. The religious need and inspiration were for him purely inward facts. As theology was for him an empty speculation, positive religion gets its support by the history and psychology of the religious genius. He conceived sin as a necessary part of the divine plan of education Whatever is not pure morality and pure feeling is subject to criticism.

Dogmatique de l'église chrétienne (Paris, 1843), Esquisse d'une théorie de l'église chrétienne (Paris, 1845), La critique et la foi (Paris, 1850), 2 vols, Mélanges de critique religieuse (Paris, 1853).

H H

schism: A word which in its N.T usage signified a rent, a division, or a dissension, acquired in the Roman Catholic Church in course of time a definite technical meaning, that of non-subjection to the authority of the papacy. Accordingly, a church may theoretically be wholly orthodox and yet schismatic, or it may be heretical as well as schismatic But since the article of papal supremacy is of dogmatic character, its rejection necessarily involves the schismatic in heresy. As such, it is ipso facto punishable by excommunication. (See heresy; sect.)

The "Great Schism" of 1054 produced a separation between the four Eastern and the Roman patriarchates which exists to this day. Pope Leo IX* (1049-54), inspired by the ideals of the Cluniac* Reform and under provocation from the aggressive Patriarch of Constantinople, Michael Cerularius* (1043-58), demanded that the latter acknowledge the supreme jurisdiction of the Holy See in the church universal. When after Leo's death Cerularius refused even to acknowledge his legates legal authority to negotiate in the matter, they placed the bull of excommunication on the high altar of St. Sophia But it would be a mistake to think that the immediate occasion of the "Great Schism" was its actual cause the causes were centuries old, and comprised deep-seated political, cultural, as well as religious differences. Cerularius, despite his aggressive manner, defended the historic attitude of the Eastern patriarchates in the matter of papal supremacy: they always conceded the primacy of honor of the Roman among the existing five patriarchates, but repudiated its claim to the primacy of jurisdiction In other words, they held that the Roman patriarchates is primus inter pares See Byzantine empire, creeds of Christendom; placet.

Louis Brehier, Le schisme oriental du XIe siècle (Paris, 1899)

M.S

Schlatter, Adolf: Protestant theologian. Born 1852 in St Gallen, Switzerland, 1880 privatdozent in Bern, 1888. Professor of N.T. in Greifswald, 1893 in Berlin, 1898-1932 in Tuebingen. Died 1938. The leading representative of Biblical realism in modern Protestant theology. He applied his vast knowledge of early Judaism to the study of the N.T. By pointing energetically to the Hebrew-Aramaic background of Jesus and the Primitive Church he opened new ways to the study both of the N.T. age and of N.T. theology. As an exegete of great originality he wrote commentaries on all the N T books. His exegesis is characterized by unbiased search for the historical truth, common sense, a realistic view of the nature of man and simple piety. Protagonist of a modern theology of faith as opposed both to apologetics and to all ancient and modern compromises of theology with philosophy. In his own presentation, dogmatics is stripped of all accretions that are un-Biblical or have no significance for actual faith Open to the truth in science and philosophy Schlatter was, nevertheless, anxious to preserve the originality and uniqueness of the Gospel message. Before the First World War his influence on contemporary theology was relatively small, owing to the almost offensive independence of his mind, but at present a number of leading students of theology is greatly indebted to him, and his amazing scholarship as well as the power and depth of his exegesis are generally recognized. Gerh Kittel's Worterbuch zum Neuen Testament, for instance, would not have been possible without the stimulus given by Schlatter to the study of the history of Biblical ideas.

Principal works (an English translation of which is long overdue)

Der Glaube im Neuen Testament (1885, 4th ed, 1927), Erlauterungen zum Neuen Testament (1887-1904, 6th ed, 1936), 3 vols, Geschichte Israels von Alex. d. Gr. bis Hadrian (1901, 3rd, ed., 1925), Die Theologie des Neuen Testaments (1909-1910, 2nd ed, 1921-22), 2 vols, Das christliche Dogma (1911, 2nd ed, 1923) Founder and co-editor of Beitrage zur Förderung christlicher Theologie. See also Wilh Lutgert, Adolf Schlatter als Theologe (1932)

O.A.P.

Schleiermacher, Friedrich Daniel Ernst: (1768-1834) Protestant theologian, philosopher, and translator of Plato's works, was minister of the Reformed Church, professor at the University of Halle (1804-1806) and of Berlin (1810-1834). He wrote and lectured on a wide variety of subjects, including logic, epistemology, metaphysics, ethics, aesthetics, the history of philosophy, theology, church history, the N.T, and psychology. His most substantial contribution lay in the fields of (a) theory of knowledge, through his influencing German philosophers in the direction of a critical empirical realism, (b) Plato scholarship, and (c) systematic theology, where his idea of an "empirical theology" has exercized a very wide influence. This work in theology constitutes his real claim to a place in the history of thought. Although influenced by Kant and Fichte, he was never a subjective idealist*. In his earlier period (c 1800) he identified God and man, taken as a whole, somewhat like Spinoza*. He believed that the universe as a whole, as it stands, is harmonious and perfect He did not believe in personal immortality. He might be called an idealist in the sense that he believed that dialectical thought will disclose, and hence shows a kinship with, natural processes. Religion, which is a natural activity of man, is at its best a synthetic grasp (intuition) of this system and the relating of events to it, and an emotional response to these insights, which side of religion he particularly emphasized and valued. In his later period (c. 1820), he laid more stress on the distinction between the world and God, whom he now regarded as the "ground" of the agreement between nature and rational processes, the role of which in knowledge (and their connection with the given element in sense experience) he made the subject of a good deal of sound analysis. It is doubtful whether he meant by "ground of the world" an entity different from and sustaining the world; his writings suggest more the relation between genus and species, and he says that the world is necessary to God's being. His "theism" was at least very close to his earlier "pantheism". Religion he regarded as a natural, even necessary, aspect of the developed human personality, essentially feeling (probably better, attitude) which is sympathy or love for the universe, often called a feeling of absolute dependence on God. Sometimes he seems to regard this feeling as partially cognitive awareness of divine reality. Theological doctrines are expressions of this experience, or descriptions of its relations (e.g., to Christ as the cause of Christian religious fulfilment). Thus doctrine is dependent on religious experience, not experience on belief in dogma. This view he thought made theology a special science, in that it has its own data for elaboration, and need not be merely philosophy or an explication of what is implicit in the Bible This general view enabled him to defend the religious attitude while dispensing with the features of orthodoxy most objectionable to modern science and philosophy. He emphasized that religious experience is an unique and autonomous mental activity, which deserves examination separate from, e.g., the psychology of cognition or volition. See empirical theology.

Writings and commentaries· Collected works, 31 volumes, Reimer, Berlin, mostly still in print. Critical editions of the Reden über Religion (by G. C. B. Punjer, 1879), the Monologen (Schiele and H Mulert, 1911), the Ethik (O. Braun, 1927), the Dialektik (I Halpern, 1903), the Aesthetik (R Odebrecht, 1931). English translations of the Reden (J. Oman, 1892), Monologen (H. Friess, 1926, under the title of Soliloquies), the Weihnachtsfeier (W Hastie, 1890), the Kurze Darstellung des theologischen Studiums (W. Farrer, 1850), Der Christliche Glaube (H. R. Mackintosh and J. S. Stewart, 1928, paraphrased in G Cross, The Theology of Schleiermacher, 1911) Four volumes of letters (Aus Schleiermachers Leben in Briefen, edited by W Dilthey, 1858-63), the first two translated by F Rowan (1860) W. Bender, Schleiermachers Theologie (1876), R B Brandt, The Philosophy of Schleiermacher (1941), W Dilthey, Leben Schleiermachers (1870 and 1922), R. Haym, Die Romantische Schule (1870); R. Munro, Schleiermacher Personal and Speculative (1903), W. B Selbie, Schleiermacher (1913), H Suskind, Der Einfluss Schellings auf die Entwicklung von Schleiermachers System (1909), and Christentum und Geschichte bei Schleiermacher (1911); Franz Vorlander, Schleiermachers Sittenlehre (1851); Georg Wehrung, Der geschichtsphilosophische Standpunkt Schleiermachers, etc. (1907), Die Dialektik Schleiermachers (1920); Schleiermacher in der Zeit seines Werdens (1927); Bruno Weiss, Untersuchungen über Schleiermachers Dialektik (1878), Georg Weissenborn, Vorlesungen über Schleiermachers Dialektik (1847).   R.B.B.

Schmalkald Articles: A Lutheran confessional document, written by Luther himself in 1537 in response to a request from Elector John Frederick of Saxony for a summary of all his teaching. In it the mature reformer states concisely the sovereignty of God, the mediatorial work of Christ, justification by faith, and the evangelical view of the church and the ministry. This position is contrasted sharply with Rome, whose mass, penance, saints, relics, etc., are denounced, and whose head, the Pope, is attacked as the Antichrist. The Elector's purpose of laying Luther's articles before a convention of all the Protestant powers at Schmalkald was never realized, but the document gained prestige and was included in the Book of Concord* as an official creed together with an anti-papal appendix by Melanchthon* dating back to the time of the original articles. To this statement of faith, in which Luther shows characteristic depth and vigor, the reformer himself attached great importance. Unlike most confessions, it is a spontaneous outpouring of faith rather than a formal series of articles and did not come by its present title until 1553. See Lutheranism.

                                                                    T.A.K.

Schmalkald League: A coalition of German Protestant powers, five principalities and eleven cities, formed in 1531 for mutual protection against the Emperor Charles V*. Other German potentates and Denmark joined later. The League did more than promote the Protestant interests. It became an important factor in European politics and its co-operation was sought by France and England against the Hapsburgs. The League was dissolved in 1547 when the Schmalkald War of 1546-47 ended in the defeat of the Protestants at Muehlberg and resulted in captivity for both Philip of Hesse* and John Frederick, the Elector of Saxony, the leaders of the League.   T.A.K.

Schmucker, Samuel Simon: (1799-1873) Leading figure in the American Lutheran Church of the early and middle period of the 19th century on the side of liberal Lutheranism and of interdenominational fellowship. American born, raised in the atmosphere of a German pietistic home, touched by the prevailing Puritanism of current American Protestantism, educated under private tutors and at the University of Pennsylvania (grad. 1819) and at Princeton Seminary, early in contact with broad organizational interests of his clergyman father, S carried on a manysided interest into his professional career. He helped to forward the first united Lutheran church in America (the General Synod), to establish the Lutheran Theological Seminary at Gettysburg (its first theological professor), founded the classical school which later ·became Pennsylvania College (now Gettysburg). He framed model constitutions for synods and congregations; published the first English Lutheran work on systematic theology in America (Elements of Popular Theology, 1834); prepared hymnbooks and liturgical forms; edited, with free interpretations Luther's catechism. In 1838 he published his Appeal to the American Churches (a fellowship plan antedating the present Federal Council) and took active part in the organization in 1846 of the Evangelical Alliance. His influence suffered a tragic eclipse following the influx of German and Scandinavian immigrants with their strongly conservative confessional bias. Prophetic of an American Lutheran theology set free from Lutheran scholasticism his full stature remains still officially unrecognized within his denomination. For his part in the Definite Platform Controversy see "American Lutheranism" For a bibliography see Vergilius Ferm, The Crisis in American Lutheran Theology (1927).   v.f.

Schöberlein, Ludwig Friedrich: (1813-1881) He taught in Heidelberg and Göttingen. He developed a Lutheran orthodoxy, widened and softened through mysticism and theosophy.

Die Grundlehre des Heils, entwickelt aus dem Prinzip der Liebe (Stuttgart, 1848), Prinzip und System der Dogmatik, Einleitung in die christliche Glaubenslehre (Heidelberg, 1881).   H H.

schola cantorum: A school for singers of the Papal choir, said to have been established by Pope Gregory the Great*, 590-604. It served to standardize the Gregorian chant* throughout the Western church. A course of study required nine years. Teachers were sent out to establish schools in England, at Metz in Germany, and at St. Gall in Switzerland.   E.H.B.

Scholasticism: (Lat, scholasticus, lecturer; Gr., scholē, school) Historically, it denotes the teachings of the ecclesiastical schools founded by Charlemagne* to reestablish the Christian learning eclipsed by the Frankish invasion of Gaul. By extension, it connotes the long period of Western learning, especially philosophical and theological, originating in the ninth century and terminating in the fifteenth century. Two notable features of this learning are its intimate association with Catholic theology and its rigorous logical formalism. Its progressive elaboration covers four distinct periods.

I. Early Scholasticism (IXth-XIIth century). Principally concerned with the systematic treatment of Catholic dogma and the exposition of the arts which such treatment presupposed. Alcuin of Tours* (730-804) introduced the study of the liberal arts dividing them into the trivium (grammar, rhetoric, and dialectic) and the quadrivium (arithmetic, geometry, astronomy and music). The translation into Latin of the works of the pseudo-Denys, the Areopagite, (see Dionysius, the Areopagite) by John Scotus Eriugena (833-880)* gave to Scholasticism a permanent neo-Platonic character with its hierarchized grades of being emanating from and forever returning to God. The problem of universals* resulting from Roscelin's* (1050-1120) identification of ideas with their verbal signs (nominalism*) found its ablest exponent in Peter Abailard* (1079-1142). Against the exaggerated realism of his neo-Platonic contemporaries, Abailard held with Aristotle that our ideas do not exist as such outside of the mind. Against the nominalists, he maintained that they have a material basis in extra-mental realities from which they are extracted by intellectual abstraction. Anselm* of Canterbury (1033-1109) foreshadowed the formal distinction of philosophy and theology in his attempts to prove the existence of God by reason alone. The whole period is one of agitation and discovery—focused in dogma and the dialectical instruments of its elaboration and systematization. Works of St. Augustine*, the neo-Platonists, and the logic of Aristotle* furnished the materials for these developments

II The XIIIth century—The Golden Age of Scholasticism The translation of hitherto unknown works of Aristotle, the rise of the universities (Paris, Oxford, Bologna); and the foundation of the mendicant orders—especially the Franciscan and Dominican, together furnished the conditions which produced the most fruitful period of Scholasticism. At Paris, the eager study and enthusiastic acceptance or rejection of Aristotle's works both in the original and in the interpretations of the Arabian commentator, Averroes* (1126-1198), issued in violent controversies and the formation of three outstanding schools of thought.

The traditionalists under Bonaventura*, while conveniently adopting some of the basic Aristotelian notions, rejected his teaching as incompatible with Christian dogma and revelation. A unique wisdom achieved through the efforts of faith guided by reason is the end of all human inquiry. Though distinct in method and formal object from theology, philosophy is incomplete and even deceptive when not guided by and directed to theology as Aristotle's teaching on the eternity of matter clearly demonstrated. Not only in things perceived through the senses, but in the soul and God perceived through the divine illumination of the active intelligence does man achieve true understanding. Knowledge for its own sake is a chimera, only as leading to the possession in love of the Absolute Good is it fructified. In man, as in God, the will is superior to the intelligence. For polemical purposes this school called themselves Augustinians.

The Latin Averroists under Siger of Brabant* (1235?-1281-1284) found in Aristotle as interpreted by Averroes, the definitive statement and solution of all speculative problems. Where Aristotle and revelation conflicted, a dual standard of truth, reason and revelation was recognized. The admitted primacy of revelation over reason did not prevent the acceptance of the conclusions of both in their proper order of nature and supernature. The eternity of the world, moral naturalism and the unity of the human intellect negating personal immortality, freedom and responsibility were the principal doctrines of this school.

The Christian Aristotelians under St. Thomas Aquinas* (1224-1274) integrated Aristotelian philosophy into the scholastic tradition by appropriately reinterpreting such principles as issued in the Averroistic extremes. Against both the Augustinians and the Latin Averroists, their most potent weapon was the stagirite's texts. Reason alone can neither prove nor disprove creation in time. Corporeal substances are thrice composed (essence and existence, substance and accident, matter and form) to account for their becoming within the fixed limits of their nature and their transformation into one another Human intelligence is extrinsically dependent on matter for its natural object, material being, but is intrinsically independent of matter in its operations The existence and nature of God as creator and end of all things, from which he is essentially distinct, can be demonstrated inductively by reason alone Philosophy and theology are in method and object formally distinct. Both issue in valid conclusions which are in no wise contradictory.

The characteristic difference of these schools of thought did not exclude a fundamental agreement on the distinction between faith and reason, the essential distinction between God and creatures, and the dependence of creatures in their being and in their action upon the divinity. The genius of Aquinas and Bonaventura produced vast treatises (Summa Theologiae, Summa Theologica)* synthesizing and elaborating the whole philosophical heritage from antiquity to their time, including the important works of the Arabs and Jews Avicenna (980-1037), Avicebron (1045-1070), Maimonides (1135-1204).

III. Later Scholasticism (XIVth-XVth centuries). Characterized by excessive formalism in method and remoteness from living problems, whence the decay of the doctrine. This decay resulted from internal and external causes. The roundness and completeness of the XIII century synthesis appeared to leave small place to further developments. Lesser minds turned to dogmatizing the masters, and quibbled over unimportant matters. Words displaced ideas and argument discussion. Partisanship sponsored artificial differences. Externally, the growing tension between secular and spiritual powers, and the eventual triumph of experimental science effectively completed the internal decay and scholasticism generally was interred in seminary manuals. The outstanding figure of this period was William of Ockham (1270-1347)*. See Scotists, Thomism; universals, battle over.

IV. Modern Scholasticism (XIXth century to the present). See neo-Scholasticism.

S Thomas Aquinas, English Editions: Selected Writings, Rev Martin D'Arcy, S. J. (1939) ; Aquinas Ethics or Moral Teachings of S. Thomas (London, 1896) ; On Being and Essence (Toronto, Canada, St. Michaels College, 1934) ; On the Governance of Rulers, trans. by Gerald B. Phelan (Toronto, Can , St. Michaels College, 1935) , Summa Contra Gentiles, trans. by English Dominican Fathers (London, 1923-29) ; Summa Theologica, trans by English Dominican Fathers (London, 1920-32) ; Summa Theologica, published by Benziger Brothers (1912-25) .

S. Bonaventura, De reductione artium ad theologiam: Commentary, Introduction and translation by Sister Emma Theresa (S. Bonaventure College, 1940) ; Philosophy of S. Bonaventure, Etienne Gilson, trans. by Dom Illtyd Trethowan and F. J. Sheed (1938) ; S. Thomas and the Problem of the Soul in the 13th Century, Anton Charles Pegis (Toronto, Canada, S. Michael's College, 1934) ; "S. Bonaventure, the Seraphic Doctor," Ludger Wegemer, O. F. M., "The Doctrine of S. Bonaventure Concerning our Knowledge of God," Vincent Mayer, O. M. C., in Franciscan Studies, No. 2, July, 1924.

Duns Scotus, Duns Scotus, C. R. S. Harris (Oxford, 1927) ; Origin and Development of the Franciscan School: Duns Scotus and S. Thomas, Bernard Vogt, O. F. M. (1925) .

William Ockham, De Sacramentis Altaris, edited by T. Bruce Birch, Latin text and English translation

(1930) , Logic of William Ockham, Ernst A. Moody (1935) , Ockham Studies and Selections, by Stephen Chak Tournay (1938)   J.J.F.

Scholz, Heinrich: (1884-) First professor of theology in Breslau, now professor of philosophy in Kiel, Germany He distinguishes between ponderable, experienceable religion and imponderable, dead religion Religion is for him an acosmic, unearthly experience of the presence of God. The truth of religion consists in the truth of existential judgments. In religious experience we not only have a subjective value-exaltation of man, but a genuine experience of an objective potency. Though there are no demonstrative proofs of immortality, we have argumentative proofs.

Der Unsterblichkeitsgedanke als philosophisches Problem, 2nd ed (Berlin, 1922) , Die Religionsphilosophie des Als-Ob (Leipzig, 1921) , Die Religionsphilosophie, 2nd rev. ed., (Berlin, 1923).   H.H.

schools: See Chartres, the school of; Palace school, parochial schools, parochial schools, Catholic, religious education; seminaries, Sunday schools; theological schools.

Schopenhauer, Arthur: (1778-1860) Represents a powerful reaction against German idealism, intellectualism and spiritualism. He held that the true nature of the world consists in an unspiritual will to live, a dark urge or impulse. The intellect transforms this intrinsic substance of all things into a world of ideas and concepts. It is the task and the function of philosophy and religion to deliver man from the bondage of the universal power of the world will. The supreme moral principle is compassion, because it overcomes the separation of the individuals and leads them back to the original unity from which they originate. Sch. was one of the best German writers amongst the philosophers in the 19th century. He exercised his greatest influence in the second half of this century. See pessimism.

The World as Will and Idea (1819) ; Kuno Fischer, Schopenhauer (2nd ed., 1898) ; Georg Simmel, Schopenhauer and Nietzsche.   R.K.

Schroeckh, Johann Matthias: (1733-1808) At first he was professor of philosophy in Leipzig. Later he taught poetic art in Wittenberg. Writing the most exhaustive church history, its main disadvantages were tiresome repetitions, a too great epic breadth, an excessive verbosity and an undue emphasis of the biographical. Compared with Semler* he was a wholly uncritical mind, in attitude little aggressive and polemical. His chief merit was the radical break with the centurial division of church history.

Christliche Kirchengeschichte, 35 vols. (Leipzig, 1768-1803).   H.H.

Schürer, Emil: (1844-1910) A famous Protestant theologian who taught at the leading universities of Germany. He wrote the famous classic Geschichte des Jüdischen Volkes in Zeitalter Jesu Christi (1898-1901; 4th ed. 1901-1909). This has been translated into English in six volumes as A History of the Jewish People in the Time of Jesus Christ by J Macpherson (Division I) and S. Taylor and P. Christie (Division II, Edinburgh 1885-1900). Schürer represents an older and more critical view of the Pharisees* which has latterly been corrected by the works of T. Herford and George F. Moore   B.Z B.

Schwabach Articles: A historically important confessional document consisting of 17 articles drawn up in 1529 by Melanchthon and Luther for Elector John of Saxony These articles are the first attempt to create a common confession for Protestantism in Germany and seek to define a basis upon which Saxony, Brandenburg, and the south German cities could unite for political action Doctrinally they lay special stress on Luther's conception of the Eucharist as over against that of Zwingli*. The articles are the principal written source of the first part of the Augsburg Confession*.

For an English translation see H E Jacobs, Book of Concord, II (1883)   T.A.K.

Schweigger, Solomon: (1551-1622) Succeeded Gerlach* as a Chaplain of the German Embassy in Constantinople. He continued the work of his predecessors with more zeal, love and interest He worked with all his energy for the union of the two churches (Greek Orthodox and the Lutheran). He also made many journeys in the Near East collecting valuable information for the Greek Orthodox Church.   G E.Z.

Schweitzer, Albert: (1875-) As music critic, author of the standard life of Bach, editor (with C. M. Widor) of Bach's organ works, and concert organist whose interpretations of Bach are now recorded, Schweitzer has contributed to the understanding of Bach, particularly with reference to the "objectivity" he requires and the tempi his works demand As theologian and student of N.T. literature Schweitzer has laid special emphasis on the apocalyptic element in the teaching of Jesus. As philosopher he has stressed "reverence for life", finding, in contrast to many "vitalists", that it leads not to will to power but will to love As medical missionary in Lambarene, equatorial Africa, he has demonstrated not only his remarkable versatility but a practical synthesis of Leben and Geist,—his thought centering in "life", his practical life receiving its direction from the spiritual ideals of justice and fellow-feeling. See Lives of Jesus.

Chief Works in English. J. S. Bach (2 vols, 1911), Paul and his Interpreters (1912), Civilization and Ethics (1923); Quest of the Historical Jesus (1926); Mysticism of Paul (1931); Out of my Life and Thought (autobiog) (1933), Indian Thought and its Development (1936).   J.S.B.

Schweitzer, Alexander: (1808-1888) Prominent Swiss Reformed theologian, student and follower of Schleiermacher*. As professor in the University of Zurich, and as vicar of the cathedral for over thirty years, he was one of the leading expounders and defenders of the Reformed* type of theology.

Five volumes of sermons, 1834-1862; autobiography, edited by P. Schweizer (Zurich, 1889)   T.F.H.

Schwenkfeldian doctrine: That advanced by Casper Schwenkfeld von Ossig (1490-1562), an early supporter of the German reformation. He held that the Scriptures do not contain everything necessary for salvation, but there must be added the Living Word. The Scriptures, therefore, did not occupy the exalted place as in Luther's thought, nor did he hold that the Sacraments were the vehicles of grace. Accordingly Luther condemned his teaching and considered him a dangerous heretic.   w.w.s.

Science, Philosophy and Religion, The Conference on: The Conference on Science, Philosophy and Religion in Their Relation to the Democratic Way of Life, Inc was organized in 1939 to bring together leaders in various disciplines in order to obtain greater clarity regarding the intellectual and spiritual foundations of democracy. The annual meetings of the Conference held in September, 1940, at the Jewish Theological Seminary of America, in September, 1941, and August, 1942, at Columbia University, have developed a new technique looking toward integration of the experience and learning of the various participants. The papers prepared for each of the meetings have been published in a symposium. A fourth Conference was held in September, 1943 to discuss the relationship of different fields of learning and experience to the creation and maintenance of world peace.

In April, 1943, there were 163 members. The Board of Directors includes William F. Albright, Van Wyck Brooks, Lyman Bryson, Henry S. Dennison, Louis Finkelstein, Lawrence K. Frank, Theodore M Greene, Caryl P. Haskins, Robert J. Havighurst, Charles W. Hendel, F. Ernest Johnson, Harold D. Lasswell, David E. Lilienthal, Alain L. Locke, Robert M MacIver, John U. Nef, Harry A Overstreet, Anton C. Pegis, Gerald B Phelan, Harlow Shapley, George F. Thomas, Harold C. Urey, Gerald G. Walsh, S. J., Luther A. Weigle.

scientific method in theology: See empirical theology.

Scillitan martyrs: Group of 7 men and 5 women of North African Church* put to death in 180 A D. for adherence to Christianity.   K.H C.

Scotists: Followers of John Duns Scotus*. Most Scotists have been of the Franciscan* Order, as was the Subtle Doctor himself. They are noted for keen and independent criticism of other scholastics, especially the Thomists*, and for their devotion to the doctrine of free will, the principle of formal distinction, and the dogma of the immaculate conception*. Despite many sharp attacks from prominent churchmen, no Scotist proposition has ever been the subject of papal censure and Scotist literature in general has received official commendation. Among leading early Scotists were Francis Mayron (d. 1327) and Pope Alexander V. (d. 1410). In the twentieth century Scotism has been defended especially zealously by Deodot-Marie de Basley. See congruism.

See E Longpré, La Philosophie du B. Duns Scot. (Paris, 1924).   L H DEW.

Scotland, Church of: That one of the Presbyterian Churches* in Scotland which has consistently valued, and, throughout most of its existence, maintained an official state connection. It was constituted by action of the Scotch Estates, and the consequent meeting of the First General Assembly, in 1560, and was finally secured against successful attack from Roman Catholic quarters before the death of John Knox*. Almost immediately it had to defend itself against an effort, furthered by the royal power, to impose episcopal forms of government and of worship upon it. The struggle lasted about a century, but ended with the victory of Presbyterianism in 1688. Since then its only challenge has come in the form of schisms, based on opposition to the principle, or to some outcome of, the state connection. They began with the setting up of the Associate Presbytery in 1733, under Ebenezer Erskine*. The last and greatest of them was the Disruption of 1843. Since the middle of the nineteenth century the tendency within Scottish Presbyterism has been towards union, and this culminated in the uniting of the Church of Scotland and the United Free Church* in 1929. The united body retained the name, "The Church of Scotland", and it preserved the state connection, though in a form which provides for the spiritual freedom of the Church. Its present membership, not including "adherents", is about 1,300,000. See action sermon; Cametonians; catechism; Free Church of Scotland.

K. Hewatt, Makers of the Scottish Church at the Reformation (Edinburgh, 1920).   A.K.R.

Scotland, Free Church of: See Free Church of Scotland.

Scotland, United Free Church of: See United Free Church of Scotland.

Scots Confession, The: A Calvinistic, strongly anti-Roman Catholic Confession, drawn up by John Knox* and five other ministers and adopted by the Scottish Estates in 1560. It served as the credal basis of Scottish Presbyterianism* until it was replaced by the Westminster Confession*.

See P. Schaff, Creeds of Christendom (1877), III, pp. 437-479.   A.K.R.

scribe: The term scribe is the translation of the Hebrew sopher, and is used to describe the lay Jewish scholars of the four or five pre-Christian centuries in Palestine. Presumably these scholars were called scribes because, following the analogy of Babylonian custom, the Palestinian scribe was generally also the trained scholar. In an edict issued by Antiochus III, in the year 198 B.C., on his conquest of Palestine, he provides special immunities for the "scribes of the Temple." In various Rabbinic passages Moses* is described as a "scribe", and he may therefore be regarded, from the point of view of the Rabbinic tradition, as the founder of this calling. Ezra* bears the title "a ready scribe in the law of Moses" (Ezra 7 6) and it has been suggested that he was historically the first of the scribes. In the N.T., the term "scribe" is frequently associated with that of Pharisees*, presumably because the scribes were, as lay scholars, the leaders of the Pharisees.

L.F

scriptorium: (Lat., scribere, to write) A room in a monastic building devoted to the writing or copying of manuscripts.   F T P.

Scripture: (Lat., scriptura, writing) In general, the religious literature of any people that is regarded by it as sacred and authoritative. In particular, the Old and New Testaments. See sacred literatures, senses of Scripture.   S M.G.

scruple: Conscientious hesitation, doubt or misgiving about the fitness, moral or religious propriety of a course of action.   R W.F.

scrutiny: (Lat., scrutinium from scrutari to search, examine) 1. An examination of those who were about to receive baptism, regarding their faith and dispositions.

2. Examination of a candidate about to be promoted to Orders.

3. Form of ecclesiastical election and is made either by written ballot or by pronouncing the chosen name before legitimate scrutators alone. The former is the usual form of electing the Pope. Since 1139 the election is by the Cardinals alone, two-thirds majority being needed. To preserve secrecy the ballots must be burned after being counted. See conclave.   B.S.

seal, sacramental: Commonly called "character". A spiritual sign, indelibly impressed on the soul by the sacraments of Baptism, Confirmation, and Holy Orders. By this seal Christians are deputed to certain offices and discerned from those not so deputed. This seal remains on the soul even in the life after death, adding to the glory of the good who go to heaven and to the shame of the wicked who go to hell.

Herve, III, 439 ss.   B S.

seal of confession: The most strict obligation of keeping entirely secret everything said by the penitent in confession for the purpose of obtaining absolution. Without the free consent of the penitent, the priest who heard the penitent's confession may not in any way use this information, not even to save himself from the threat of death.

Genicot II, 379.   B.S.

Seamen's movement in the United States: A form of missionary enterprise which has from the time of its inception in the early nineteenth century stood as one of the finer examples of applied or "social" Christianity.

The years 1812 to 1826 were formative. During this period some eight local societies designed primarily to promote the spiritual welfare of seamen were established in coastal cities extending from Portland, Me., to New Orleans. The distribution of religious tracts among sailors and the holding of services on shore or anchored ships were especially emphasized. With view to exciting the general public to action the American Sailor's Magazine (N. Y., 1824-1825) and the Mariner's Magazine (N. Y., 1825-1826) were circulated.

The latter magazine under the energetic editorship of Rev John Truair ushered the movement into its second phase. His stirring "Call from the Ocean, or an Appeal to the Christian in Behalf of Seamen" issued in 1826 led immediately to organization on a national scale. The various local societies pooled their resources to form in 1828 the American Seamen's Friend Society of New York, the announced purpose of which was. " . . . to improve the social and moral condition of Seamen, by uniting efforts of the wise and good in their behalf, by promoting in every port, Boarding Houses of good character, Savings Banks, Register Offices, Libraries, Reading Rooms and Schools, and also the ministrations of the Gospel, and other religious blessings".

Subsequent history has been essentially the translation of visions into realities. The registered private boarding house of 1828 has grown to be such a magnificent institution as the million dollar Seamen's House of present-day New York which serves at once as hotel, recreation, educational and religious center. The crude Savings Bank of 1829 founded to educate the sailor not to squander his money in disreputable dives has grown into a ten-story New York establishment with branches. Concern for the sailor's reading interests has quickly passed from the stage of shore library at home to concerted effort to place a loan library on every ship leaving port to the care of reading rooms in foreign ports, thereby affording opportunity for self-schooling both on land and sea. More specifically viewed as "ministrations of the gospel" have been the conducting of religious meetings for men at home bases, the sending of chaplains abroad to perform services in foreign ports, the distribution of Bibles and tracts, the publication of à Seaman's Manual of Worship (three basic editions 1830, 1887, 1927), the monthly issuance of the Sailor's Magazine (N. Y, 1828-1933) incorporating devotional helps and religious news, the annual presentation of good books or the Bible to Midshipmen graduating from the Naval Academy, together with a goodly number of other worthy projects. Throughout, the religious emphasis has been evangelical, but non-denominational. Societies in local ports have been under no compulsion to affiliate with the central society in New York but in most cases have willingly cooperated.

The Mariner's Magazine and the Sailor's Magazine (supra) provide a continuous history of the varied aspects, 1825-1933 The Annual Report of the American Seamen's Friend Society, 1833 to date will add official data. G S Webster, The Seamen's Friend (1932), is a centennial history of said society   G.P.A.

Sebastian, Saint: Christian martyr at Rome during Diocletian* persecution. Tradition says he was a soldier and that he was shot to death with arrows. Popular subject in religious art second birth: See baptism, non Christian; initiation rites, new birth, psychology of religion, regeneration, transmigration.

К Ң С.

second blessing: See holiness churches, pentecostal sects.

Second Great Awakening: See American theology, early, Dwight, Timothy.

secondary cause: See cause.

secret societies in China: See Chinese religions.

Secrétan, Charles: (1815-1895) A French Swiss, who was professor of philosophy at the University of Lausanne. He understood the Christian dogmas as being purely ethical and wished them to be translated into a language that did not contradict the critical scientific spirit. Christ was for him only divine in his holiness   Justifying his faith in a revelation, he minimized the miraculous   For him Christ was the ultimate answer of the political and social question

La philosophie de la liberté (Paris, 1849), 2 vols ; La raison et le christianisme (Lausanne, 1863) ; La civilisation et la croyance (Paris, 1887) ; Le principe de la morale, 2nd ed (Paris, 1893)   H.H.

sect: (Lat, secta, fr, sequi, to follow) In classical Latin, any group or movement (philosophical, medical, political or religious) claiming special leadership or teaching. In religion the term has indicated such a group or following within an organized religion (e.g., Pharisees, Sadducees, etc., in Judaism). In Catholic usage, essentially synonymous with heresy*, i e., a religious body which has set itself up independently of the divinely established Church.   For the several established churches of Protestantism, any nonconformist* or dissenting group   Used roughly by other Protestant churches with reference to smaller, more recently organized Christian bodies.   In all these uses within the Christian religion, the term has been derogatory and therefore unacceptable to the groups to which it has been applied, such groups regarding themselves as true churches. The term has now received fairly sharp sociological definition, thanks to E. Troeltsch [The Social Teaching of the Christ   Churches (1931), Engl tr.,] H. Richard Niebuhr [The Social Sources of Denominationalism (1929)] and Liston Pope [Millhands and Preachers (1942)]. So defined, a sect is a schismatic* group springing from, and developing in opposition to, an organized church and becoming independent of it   Finding its authority in what it regards as a truer understanding of the Scriptures or of primitive Christianity, it sustains a critical attitude toward the parent institution and, indeed, toward the patterns of contemporary culture in general, and seeks in its detachment a more positive realization of the Christian life   Developing sects find their fertile soil among the socially and economically insecure and tend to lose their sectarian features as the social and economic status of their membership improves See Adventist sects, communistic settlements, religious, Confessions, Formal of the Christian Church, holiness churches, pentecostal sects, Russian sectarianism   E T.R.

secular clergy: Men who have received Holy Orders in the R. C. Church and who live, not under the rule of a religious congregation but "in the world" (in saecula), devoting themselves chiefly to parochial work. Seculars do not take solemn vows of poverty and obedience but they do live in chastity. Since they are most essential to the ministry of the Church, they take ecclesiastical precedence over regulars. See regular clergy.   V.J B.

secularism: Specifically a variety of utilitarian social ethic (named and formulated by G J. Holyoake, 1817-1906) which seeks human improvement without reference to religion and exclusively by means of human reason, science and social organization In general that movement of protest against the dominance and control of human life by ecclesiastical bodies or by religious faith and dogma which had its new birth at the Renaissance* It has developed into a positive and widely adopted outlook which aims to direct all activities and institutions by a non-religious concern for the goods of the present life and for, social well-being. It is applied derogatively by religionists to that emancipation of all departments of life, science, philosophy, art, economics and politics, from central religious control which results in the fissiparous pursuit of specialized interests without any sense of the unity of life and which has initiated a crisis in the religious and cultural life of modern man.   R.W.F.

secularization: (med, Ref.) The taking over of church property by the state for secular purposes, sometimes for selfish and unworthy ends, sometimes devoted to charitable and educational purposes. After the 4th century church had steadily accumulated property and by Middle Ages was large landowner in many countries. This was temptation to civil rulers with empty treasuries and as early as Charles Martel (8th cent.) confiscations were made. Became an issue in conflict between empire and papacy. Process of secularization was accelerated in areas that became Protestant at time of the Reformation, e.g., in Germany and Sweden and in the suppression of monasteries in England.   K.H.C.

seder: (Heb., order) The order of the home service on the first and second nights of the Passover*. The ritual for the occasion is known as the Seder Haggadah, Order of the Narrative of the Passover, or *Haggadah.   S.S.C.

seduction: Enticement to wrong doing by false promises, specious arts of deceitful charms. Specifically in law the enticement of a woman to illicit sex relations by allurement or promise of marriage.   R.W.F.

see: (Lat., sedes, seat) A particular bishopric, with its rights, traditions, and administration, Holy See or Apostolic See, the See of Rome
                                                                    E R.H

Seeberg, Reinhold: (1859-1935) German Protestant theologian Born at Porrafer, Latvia. In 1884 he was privatdozent at Dorpat, in 1889 professor of Systematic Theology in Erlangen, and from 1898-1928 at Berlin where he died He was the leading representative of the "Modern Positive School", which, with a strongly apologetic leaning, interpreted orthodox Lutheranism in terms of Hegel's and Fichte's ethical idealism. For a long time he was president of the "Evangelisch-Sozialer Kongress" Conservative in politics he had a noticeable influence upon the rising nationalism of the post-1918 generation His lasting significance is to be found mainly in his works on the history of the dogma. See neo-Lutheranism.

Principal works:
Lehrbuch der Dogmengeschichte, 4 vols. (1895-1920, the volume on Luther is a standard work), Die Theologie des Joh Duns Scotus eine dogmengeschichtliche Untersuchung (1900), Die Grundwahrheiten der christlichen Religion (1906, Engl. tr. 1908), Aus Religion und Geschichte (essays) (1908-1909), 2 vols, Offenbarung und Inspiration (1909, Engl tr 1909), System der Ethik (1911, 2nd ed, 1920); Christliche Dogmatik (1924 ff.), 2 vols.; Autobiography in Die Religions-wissenschaft in Selbstdarstellungen (1925), vol I   O.A P.

Seekers: In a religious sense commonly applied to the large number of persons in seventeenth century England not attached to any organized church, but seeking an expression of personal religion which should satisfy their needs. William Penn described them as having left "all visible churches and societies", and says they "wandered up and down as sheep without a shepherd, and as doves without their mates, seeking their beloved but could not find Him (as their souls desired to know Him) whom their souls loved above their chiefest joy." It was from the Seekers in the northern shires that the Society of Friends* recruited many of its early members.
W. C Braithwaite, The Beginnings of Quakerism (1923), chaps. iii-iv, R M. Jones, Spiritual Reformers of the 16th and 17th Centuries (1928).
                                                                    W.W C

seelsorge: See cure of souls.

selah: An obscure Heb. word occurring 71 times in the Psalter and 3 times in the psalm in Habakkuk 3; transliterated in the Eng. versions. Apparently from the stem s-l-l "to lift up" (sc., the voice), a directional rubric marking a liturgical response or refrain.   R.B Y.S.

Selected Scripture Lessons: See Sunday School movement in the United States.

self-defense: The act of defending one's person, property or reputation against destructive attacks. In law it is, under certain circumstances, recognized as a right which constitutes a valid plea against the charge of murder. Ethically the taking of another's life in self-defense may be justified on the ground that the aggressor is making war upon society in a situation where the normal protective machinery of the law cannot work until it is too late. The individual who acts in self-defense is thus willing the will and the good of society. But the exercise of self-defense poses many problems for the moral judgment. There are those who deny the right to employ violence in self-defense on religious or ethical grounds.   R.W F.

self-denial: The subordination or renunciation of one's own appetites, possessions, pleasures or purposes for the sake of realizing some higher end or larger good. It is ethically justifiable and praiseworthy in the promotion of any greater good though to be condemned as pernicious when practiced as an end in itself. While it is fundamental in asceticism, monasticism and Puritanism, in which it has found both high and aberrant expressions, it is an essential condition of daily life, personal development and communal existence, for these all require choices among alternatives, concentration of purpose, subordination of interests and division of labor if there is to be growth, achievement and interdependent living. In Christianity self-denial (taking up one's cross) is enjoined as necessary for discipleship. It involves renunciation of one's sinful self and positive, complete surrender to God's will. Here self-sacrifice is regarded as an act both of the human will and of divine working and is the highest expression of Christian love.   R W.F.

self-limitation: See finite God; infinite, omnipotence.

self-preservation: Biologically it is the instinctive endeavor of every organism to maintain its existence. This instinctive tendency has been made the imputed basis of a political doctrine that there is a natural right to life, even the right to defend one's life against the state that unjustly threatens its existence and well-being. In ethics it may refer 1) to the particular duty of preserving one's physical life in so far as this is in accord with the highest good or 2) to the view that the preservation of the individual in the struggle for existence is the supreme rule of conduct. The ideal here is the strong man for whom might is right.   R.W F.

self-realization: The moral ideal of a teleological, perfectionist theory of ethics which conceives the ethical goal as the fullest development of personality, i.e., as the comprehensive, lasting and harmonious realization of the potentialities of the person. Self-realization is a dynamic process of the actualization and organization of personal capacities, it involves not only the integration of the various levels of personal being but also the integration of the individual with society, and inasmuch as such self-realization is conducive to happiness it may be said to embrace eudaemonism*. Notable recent exponents of this theory are T. H. Green, F. H. Bradley, J. Seth and J. H. Muirhead.   R.W.F.

selfishness: That excessive or exclusive self-love which consists in the determination of one's ambitions, choices and interests solely with reference to one's own advantage. Some ethicists, as T. Hobbes, hold that self-love is both the psychological motive and the ultimate ethical end of all action. Because of its personal and social consequences, selfishness is ethically condemned. There is a legitimate moral self-love, however, approved in both Christian and secular ethics
                                                        R.W F.

Semi-Arianism: Broadly, the doctrines and party in the fourth-century Church which affirmed that the Son is in essence like (homoiousios), not identical with (homoousios), the Father. It was a mediating position between the Arians*, who had held essentially that the Son is different from the Father (heterooúsios) and the Nicene Council, which had proclaimed their identity See homoios; homoiousios, homoousios. Cf. Antioch, Synod of, Hilary of Poitiers   F.G.E.

Semi-Pelagianism: Unfortunately, it has been customary to characterize under the term "semi-pelagianism" a series of theologians in the fifth century A D., who rejected with full conviction the Pelagian doctrine*, and were unable to accept entirely the Augustinian doctrine of grace. While much of Augustine impressed them, the whole appeared to them as containing too many innovations. They preferred the older view to Augustine's bold and extreme speculations about the absolute lack of freedom of the will to do good, the irresistible power of grace and predestination.
P Sublet, Le sémipélagianisme (Namur, 1897), F. Worter, Zur Dogmengeschichte des Semipelagianismus (Paderborn, 1899).   H.H

seminaries: See seminaries, major Roman Catholic; theological schools, Jewish; theological schools, Protestant, United States and Canada.

seminaries, major Roman Catholic: Roman Catholic seminaries are of two kinds, major seminaries and preparatory or minor seminaries. The preparatory seminaries receive aspirants to the priesthood at 12 to 14 years of age, the course embraces the "traditional classical studies" which have long been included in the training of priests, and is roughly equivalent to a four-year high school course followed by the first two years of college. In 1940 there were 83 of these schools in the United States. In the major seminaries the young men receive their immediate preparation for ordination. The Third Plenary Council of Baltimore fixed the curriculum of diocesan seminaries to "embrace not fewer than six years," two of these years being spent in the study of philosophy and four in theology. In 1940 there were 98 major seminaries in the United States. They are divided, according to control, into two classes, the episcopal for the training of secular or diocesan clergy, and the religious for the training of the clergy of the various orders or societies.

MAJOR SEMINARIES

Alabama: St. Bernard Abbey, St Bernard, Ala., Benedictine Fathers.

Arkansas: New Subiaco Abbey and Seminary, Subiaco, Ark , Benedictine Fathers, St John's Home Missions Sem , Little Rock, Ark , Secular Clergy

California Dominguez Seminary, Compton, Calif., Claretian Missionary Fathers, Franciscan Theological Sem , Old Mission, Santa Barbara, Calif, Franciscan Fathers, St Patrick's Seminary, Menlo Park, Calif., Society of St. Sulpice

Colorado The St. Thomas Theological Seminary, Denver, Colo , Vincentian Fathers

Connecticut: St. Mary's Seminary, Ferndale, Norwalk, Conn , Holy Ghost Fathers

District of Columbia Atonement Seminary of the Holy Ghost, Brookland, D C , Franciscan Fathers of the Atonement; Dominican House of Studies, Washington, D C , Dominican Fathers, Holy Cross College, Washington, D C , Congregation of the Holy Cross, The Marist College, Brookland, D C.. Society of Mary, Oblate Scholasticate, Washington. D C , Oblates of Mary Immaculate; St Joseph's Seminary, Brookland, D. C., St Joseph's Society of the Sacred Heart; St. Paul's College, Brookland, D. C , Congregation of St. Paul , Theological College of the Catholic University, Washington, D C , Society of St Sulpice.

Illinois College of St Thomas Aquinas, River Forest, Ill , Dominican Fathers, Marian Hills Seminary, Hinsdale, Ill , Marian Fathers; Mater Dolorosa Seminary, Hillside, Ill , Servite Fathers , St Bede Seminary, Peru, Ill., Benedictine Fathers ; St Joseph's Seminary, Teutopolis, Ill , Order of Friars Minor; St Mary of the Lake Seminary, Mundelein, Ill , Secular Clergy and Society of Jesus; St Mary's Mission House, Techny, Ill , Society of the Divine Word, St Mary's Seminary, Lemont, Ill , Slovene Fathers , St. Procopius Seminary, Lisle, Ill , Benedictine Fathers

Indiana Moreau Seminary, Notre Dame, Ind , Congregation of Holy Cross , Holy Family Theological Seminary, Oldenburg, Ind , Franciscan Fathers , St Meinrad Seminary, St Meinrad, Ind , Benedictine Fathers , West Baden College, West Baden Springs, Ind , Society of Jesus

Kansas St Augustine Mission Seminary, Kansas City, Kans , Augustinian Recollects ; St Benedict's Seminary, Atchison, Kans , Benedictine Fathers , St Fidelis Seminary, Victoria, Kans , Capuchin Order , St Mary's College, St Mary's, Kans , Society of Jesus.

Kentucky Sacred Heart Retreat, Louisville, Ky , Passionist Fathers

Louisiana Notre Dame Seminary, New Orleans, La , Marist Fathers

Maryland Mt St Mary's Seminary, Emmitsburg, Md , Diocesan Clergy; St Joseph Passionist Monastery, Baltimore, Md , Passionist Fathers , St Mary's Seminary, Baltimore, Md , Sulpician Fathers; Woodstock College, Woodstock, Md., Society of Jesus.

Massachusetts Oblate Fathers College, South Natick, Mass , Oblates of Mary Immaculate, St Gabriel's Monastery, Brighton, Mass , Passionist Fathers ; St John's Boston Ecclesiastical, Brighton, Mass , Secular Clergy , Weston College, Weston, Mass , Society of Jesus

Michigan St Paul's Monastery, Brightmoor, Mich , Passionist Fathers; SS Cyril and Methodius Seminary, Orchard Lake, Mich , Secular Clergy.

Minnesota St. John's Seminary, Collegeville, Minn , Benedictine Fathers; St. Paul Seminary, St. Paul, Minn., Diocesan Clergy.

Mississippi St Augustine's Seminary, Bay St. Louis, Miss , Society of the Divine Word.

Missouri Kendrick (St. Louis Roman Catholic Theological) Seminary, St Louis, Mo., Vincentian Fathers; St. Mary's Seminary, Perryville, Mo., Vincentian Fathers

Nebraska. Immaculate Conception Seminary, Hastings, Nebr., Crosier Fathers; St. Columban's Seminary, St. Columbans, Nebr., Society of St. Columban

New Jersey Don Bosco College, Newton, N. J., Salesian Society; Immaculate Conception Seminary, Ramsey, N. J., Diocesan Clergy; St Mary's Monastery, Morristown, N. J., Benedictine Fathers; St. Michael's Passionist Seminary, Union City, N J , Passionist Fathers

New Mexico Seminario Pontifico Central Mexicano de Nuestra Senora de Guadelupe, Montezuma, N. M , Society of Jesus

New York. Immaculate Conception Monastery, Jamaica, N Y , Passionist Fathers, Immaculate Conception Seminary, Huntington, N Y , Secular Clergy; Maryknoll Seminary, Maryknoll P O , N Y , Catholic Foreign Mission Society of America ; Mount St. Alphonsus Seminary, Esopus, N Y , Redemptorist Fathers , Oblate House of Philosophy, Newburgh, N Y , Oblates of Mary Immaculate, Seminary of Our Lady of Angels, Niagara University P. O., N Y , Vincentian Fathers , Seminary of Our Lady of Salette, Altamont, N Y , Missionaries of Our Lady of La Salette, St Anthony on Hudson, Rensellaer, N Y , Order of Friars Minor Conventual, St Bernard's Seminary, Rochester, N Y , Secular Clergy, St Bonaventure's Seminary, St Bonaventure, N Y , Friars Minor, St Joseph's Seminary, Yonkers, N Y , Secular Clergy , St Mary's Monastery, Dunkirk N Y Passionist Fathers, St Stephen's House of Studies, Croghan, N Y , Franciscan Fathers.

Ohio Dominican House of Studies, Somerset, O., Dominican Fathers , Mount St Mary of the West, Norwood, O , Secular Clergy; Our Lady of the Angels Seminary, Cleveland, O., Franciscan Fathers, Our Lady of Carey Seminary, Carey, O , Friars Minor Conventual , Our Lady of the Lake Seminary, Cleveland, O , Secular Clergy; Pontifical College Josephinum, Worthington, O , Secular Clergy, Sacred Heart Seminary, Shelby, O , Missionaries of the Sacred Heart; St. Charles Seminary, Carthagena, O , Society of Precious Blood; St. Joseph's Seminary, Cleveland, O , Fathers of the Blessed Sacrament.

Oregon Mt Angel Seminary, St Benedict, Oreg , Benedictine Fathers

Pennsylvania: St Ann's Monastery, Scranton, Pa , Passionist Fathers , St Charles Seminary, Overbrook, Philadelphia, Pa , Secular Clergy; St Francis Seminary, Lorette, Pa , Third Order Regular of St Francis of Penance , St Mary's Hall, Augustinian Scholasticate, Villanova, Pa , Augustinian Fathers , St Vincent Seminary, Latrobe, Pa , Benedictine Fathers

Texas De Mazenod Scholasticate, Rt 10, San Antonio, Tex , Oblates of Mary Immaculate , St. John's Seminary, San Antonio, Tex , Diocesan Clergy; St Mary's Seminary, La Porte, Tex , Diocesan Clergy; Scotus College, Hebbronville, Tex , Franciscan Fathers

Washington Mt. St. Michael's Scholasticate, Hillyard Station, Spokane, Wash , Society of Jesus , St Edward's Seminary, Seattle, Wash , Sulpician Fathers

Wisconsin Immaculate Conception Seminary, Oconomowoc, Wis , Redemptorist Fathers , St Anthony's Monastery, Marathon, Wis , Capuchin Fathers , St. Francis College, Burlington, Wis , Franciscan Fathers ; St Francis Seminary, St Francis, Wis , Diocesan Clergy; St. Mary of the Angels Theological Seminary, Green Bay, Wis , Franciscan Fathers; St Norbert Seminary, West de Pere, Wis , Premonstratensian Canons   L.J.S.

Semites, religion of: The term "Semites" (first used, by A. L. Schlözer in 1781) was derived from Gen. 10 22, where the sons of Shem are: Elam, Asshur, Arphaxad (i.e., Hebrews and Arabs), Lud (i.e., Lydia), and Aram. The Semites are a group of nations who lived in Western Asia south of the Taurus and Armenia, and west of Iran. They constitute a linguistic unit (like the Indo-Europeans) but by no means a racial unit. The Semitic languages are classified as follows: I) East-Semitic (Akkadian, Babylonian, Assyrian). II) North-Semitic: a) Aramaic group (Eastern: Syriac, Mandaean, the language of the Babylonian Talmud; Western: Aramaic inscriptions, Biblical Aramaic, Palestinian Jewish and Christian Aramaic, Palmyrene, Nabataean); b) Canaanitic or Amoritic group (Phoenician, Ugaritic*' (Ras Shamra), Hebrew, Moabitic, also Punic (Carthage)). III) South-Semitic. a) Arabic (Northern. inscriptions, classical Arabic, modern dialects, Southern. Minaean and Sabaean inscriptions, also Ethiopic). It is generally thought that the Arabian peninsula was the original homeland of the Semites, although Babylonia, North Africa, and Amurru (in the Lebanon region) have also been suggested. It is generally supposed that the Semites poured out of Arabia in great waves about 3000 (Amorites), 2500 (Akkadians), 2000 (Canaanite-Phoenicians), 1500 (Arameans and Hebrews), 500 B C. (Nabataeans), as the Arabian Moslem set forth after the death of Mohammed in 632 Even if such was the case, with the exception of the Bedouin Arabs, none of the "Semitic" nations (Babylonian, Assyrians, Syrians, Phoenicians, Canaanites, Israelites, Moabites, Ammonites, Edomites, etc.,) in historic times exhibits the anthropological characteristics of a supposed "Semitic" racial group, only their languages are closely related. The religions of these nations, like their cultures, vary profoundly and should be studied individually. Since the three great monotheistic religions of salvation (Judaism, Christianity, and Islam) arose on Semitic soil out of the religion of the primitive Semites (directly out of the prophetic reformation of the religion of Israel), it may be said with E. Renan that "the tent of the Semitic patriarch was the starting point of mankind's religious progress."

It has been said that the earliest Semitic religion was monotheism (E. Renan, M. J La-grange), totemism (W. Robertson Smith), ancestor worship (Herbert Spencer), or polydaemonism (J. Wellhausen), the original significance of animal sacrifice would correspond to one of these theories. Although traces of all these notions about the gods may be detected in the polytheistic systems of Semitic nations in historic times, polydaemonism seems to have prevailed among the early Semites. They regarded stones, trees, springs, mountains, and other natural objects as the domiciles of spirits (numina loci), each of which was generically called an il (Arabic ilah, Hebrew el) and resembled the jinn of later Arabs. A few among them, like the el of a spring who saved Hagar and Ishmael from death in the desert (Gen. 16·13-14) and the el of a stone who made Jakob rich (Gen. 31:13; 35 7, 15), through such outstanding acts acquired a personality and a history, were given a personal name (El Roi and El Bethel ["the el of the domicile of the el"], respectively), and received regular worship: thus they emerged from the anonymous class of the els and became gods. Some of the gods remained attached to their domicile, which became the goal of pilgrimages (Arabic khaj, Hebrew khag [festival]), and were worshiped by passing tribes; others were adopted by certain tribes as their gods, and thus moved about with their tribe. Eventually El (or Ilah) was used as a proper name for a particular god, so among the Phoenicians (in the Ras Shamra poems, El, "the father of years," is the supreme god; Philo of Byblos identifies him with Kronos), among the Arameans (Panammu's inscription on a statue of Hadad, found at Zenjirli), among the Arabs (Allah [i.e., al-Ilah, the God] was becoming the supreme god even before Mohammed), and in the Book of Job (El is the one true God) The strong sense of tribal solidarity among the nomadic Semites (manifested in blood revenge, circumcision [an ancient initiation rite], and particularly in war) was based, at least in principle, on ties of blood. Accordingly, the tribal god was regarded as the father (or some other relation) of the tribe. Just as blood sealed the covenant between two parties in Arabia (Herodotus III 8), so Yahweh became the god of Abraham by walking between the two bleeding halves of sacrificial victims '(Gen. 15 9-12, 17-18). The earliest sanctuaries were natural objects (springs, trees, mountains, stones) inhabited by a god. The rites of worship (purifications in approaching a sacred spot, sacrifices, offerings, prayers), the pilgrimages, and the celebration of the festivals (with dancing and feasting), did not at first require a regular priesthood, the earliest Semitic priests were probably diviners. The integrity of the clan was secured by the iron rule of ancestral customs, in which no distinction was made between social, legal, ethical, and religious obligations or tabus. Out of such crude beginnings arose the polytheism of the civilized Semitic kingdoms, and later the great monotheistic religions. See altar, blood.

W W Baudissin, Studien zur semitischen Religionsgeschichte (Leipzig, 1876 and 1878), 2 vols, J Wellhausen, Reste arabischen Heidentums (Berlin, 1887, 2nd ed, 1897), F Baethgen, Beitrage zur semitischen Religionsgeschichte (Berlin, 1888), W. Robertson Smith, Lectures on the Religion of the Semites (London, 1889, 3rd ed (by S A Cook), 1927), S I Curtiss, Primitive Semitic Religion today (London, 1902), M. J. Lagrange, Etudes sur les religions sémitiques (Paris, 1902, 2nd ed, 1905), A Lods, Israel (1932), G A Barton, Semitic and Hamitic Origins (1934), E. Dhorme, La religion des Hébreux nomades (Bruxelles, 1937); F V Winnett, "Primitive Arabian and Semitic Religion" in Review of Religion, 4 [1939], 282-285. R.H.P

Semler, Johann Salomo: (1725-91) Church historian and biblical critic, Professor of Theology in Halle from 1757. In his more than 170 writings he developed the scientific treatment of theology in contrast to pietistic edification. His investigation of the canon challenged the ruling ideas of biblical inspiration, and his rational and historical approach challenged the finality of dogma. C.T.C.

Seneca: (c. 4 B.C -A D. 65) One of the chief representatives of Roman Stoicism*. Born at Corduba, Spain; early entered public life in Rome from which he was banished in 41 A.D., recalled, eight years later, as tutor to the young Nero, honored for a period as a trusted imperial minister, forced finally to retire and to take his own life Like Epictetus and Marcus Aurelius, not philosophically original, but a devoted teacher of Stoic ethical and religious ideas. Wrote extensively on various subjects, but most influentially on practical moral questions. His essays and letters have had wide reading within the Christian Church. E.T.R.

senses of Scripture: Origen* developed the theory that Scripture has a three-fold sense, literal, moral and spiritual. Later his "spiritual" sense was divided into "allegorical" and "anagogical," and these principles of hermeneutics* governed Biblical exegesis* until the time of the Reformation. The Reformers were hard-headed literalists. Luther declared· "The literal sense of Scripture alone is the whole essence of faith and of Christian theology."   S.M.G.

Sentences: The title of Peter Lombard's* (died 1160) famous book Libri Quattuor Sententiarum. This most commented upon book of the Middle Ages is a compilation of statements taken from the works of the Church Fathers, especially from those of Saint Augustine, arranged according to the four topics On God, On the Creatures, On the Incarnation and the virtues and on ˙the Seven Sacraments. The innumerable commentaries written to this book and its central position in the curriculum of theological studies is the best illustration of the spirit of submission to authorities so characteristic for the Middle Ages.   s c.T.

sentimentalism: The view that human nature is inherently good and therefore amenable to the power of sympathy Such a view is implicit in much of the literature of the 18th century, sentimental drama and fiction being then well defined types Mackenzie's Man of Feeling (1771) is an extreme example of a class which includes such familiar works as Richardson's Pamela (1740) and Goldsmith's Vicar of Wakefield (1766).
                                                          L.W.C.

Separate Baptists: A group of Baptist churches which "separated" from the regular group in the "New Light" controversy in connection with the work of Whitefield* and the Tennants in the middle of the eighteenth century. Most of the separating churches rejoined the regular group, but one body in North Carolina developed considerable strength and the movement spread through other states. In theology they are mildly Arminian, and differ little from the larger Baptist groups. They practice immersion and feet washing. There are 69 churches and about 5,000 members.   E.T C.

separatists, German communities: See communistic settlements, religious.

Separatists, Protestant: A term used to designate the English Independents or Congregationalists* who wished to separate from the established church. This involved the loss of government financial support as well as freedom from state control, and it approximates the position later realized by all churches in the United States. Independent is a more inclusive term covering all those who desired each church to be legally independent with no ecclesiastical authority higher than that of the local institution. Consequently the Separatists must be distinguished from the Non-Separatist Independents who wished to remain within the established church and in time achieve a state-supported and state-established Independency It was a group of Separatists who settled Plymouth Colony, while Non-Separatist Independents were responsible for the establishment of Massachusetts Bay Colony. See Brewster, William, independency.

Perry Miller, Orthodoxy in Massachusetts (1933)
                                                          W S H

Sephardim: (Sepharad, Obadiah 20, traditionally translated as Spain) Jews who lived in the Iberian Peninsula until approximately the end of the fifteenth century, and their descendants.   D S P.

seppuku: (Lit., "cut abdomen") Japanese suicide by disembowelment   D C H.

Septuagesima: The third Sunday before Lent or the ninth before Easter. See church year cycle.
                                                          E.R.H

Septuagint: See Alexandrian Library, LXX; Old Testament, targum, versions of the Bible, ancient.

sequence: (Lat, sequentia) A rhythmical hymn, usually in honor of some feast or saint—often used in the Middle Ages following (hence the name) the Gradual* between Epistle and Gospel.
                                                          E.R H.

sequence: (or prose) A particular type of trope* which closes the Alleluia*. The long melisma on the final vowel of the Alleluia was divided into phrases for ease in breathing. To assist in remembering the elaborate series of notes each musical phrase was given words in syllable style. The origin of the sequence has been falsely attributed to Notker Balbulus, a 9th century monk of St. Gall, who called his sequences hymns.
  G Reese, Music in the Middle Ages (1940).
                                                          E.H B.

Seraphim: (Hebrew Saraph) Winged guardians of God's throne (Isa. 6, 2.6)—associated with Cherubim* in Book of Enoch XX, 7; LXI.10, LXXI. 7, — originally identified with "fiery serpent" of Deut. 8, 15 and "winged Saraph" of Isaiah 14, 29, 30, 6.   N.G.

Serapion: A bishop of the Church in Egypt in the 4th century, a friend of Athanasius, and a defender of the Nicene Faith at the Council of Sardica in 343.   s M.G.

Serapis: See mystery religions.

Serbian Orthodox Church: See Eastern Orthodox Churches.

sermon: (from Lat., sermo, talk) A religious discourse delivered in connection with Christian worship, in origin the name marks it as more informal than an oration, though formal rhetoric has often found a place in sermon composition. See homily; preaching.   E.R.H.

(Servatus) Lupus of Ferrières: (ca. 805—ca. 862) Abbot. Friendly to both Gottschalk and Rabanus Maurus, he was a humanistic scholar, more concerned with philology, Boethian prosody, textual criticism, pure Latinity, and collecting manuscripts than the contemporary theological controversies. He carried on vast correspondence regarding learned interests and was employed by many writers to improve their literary style.

A.C.

Servetus, Michael: (1511-1553) Born in Spain and trained in law, Servetus came to public attention through his studies in medicine and theology In the former he is credited with the first modern understanding of the pulmonary circulation of the blood. In the latter he became a strong and argumentative anti-Trinitarian. He wrote De Trinitatis Erroribus, 1531, and Christianismi Restitutio, 1553, sharply attacking the doctrines of the Trinity, the Two-Nature Christ, and Infant Baptism Condemned by the Roman ecclesiastical authorities of Lyons, he escaped and came to Geneva where Calvin* was slowly gaining control. There condemned as a heretic, he was burned at the stake by order of the City of Geneva on October 27, 1553.

E P.B.

Servites: A mendicant order founded near Florence in Italy in the thirteenth century and soon spreading over Europe and into the Orient and in the nineteenth century to England and America. See Annunciation, Orders of Cf. Seven Sorrows of our Lady session: The court in a particular Presbyterian congregation to which is delegated responsibility and powers of general oversight (including supervision of other local courts, such as the board of trustees and the board of deacons), but having special oversight over the spiritual welfare of the congregation. Representatives of sessions constitute the membership of higher courts, such as Presbyteries, Synods, and the General Assembly. The session is made up of the pastor (or pastors) and the active ruling elders.

L R.W.

A.K.R.

Set: (Egyptian) God of kings of Upper Egypt, god of darkness, and enemy of Horus*, the sun or sky god of Lower Egypt, in myth of Osiris*, Set accomplishes the murder of his brother, Osiris, by forcing his body in a chest and throwing the chest into the Nile· came to be regarded as an enemy of Egypt; a temple to him erected by the Hyksos*.

F.L.P.

seven deadly sins: Various lists of capital, principal or deadly sins appear in patristic literature John Cassian* described eight. gluttony, fornication, avarice, anger, dejection (tristitia), sloth (accedia), vainglory and pride. Gregory the Great's* list of seven is in a different order Pride (the source of the others), envy, anger, dejection, avarice, gluttony and lust. Both classifications were widely repeated that of Gregory came to prevail. Each of these capital sins was attended by a number of minor sins The Penitentials and other ascetic books of guidance prescribe treatments for the deadly sins, and the seven penitential psalms were severally matched against them.

J.T.M.

seven gifts of the Holy Spirit: In scholastic theology the sanctifying gifts of the Holy Spirit are wisdom, understanding, counsel, fortitude, knowledge, piety and the fear of the Lord Cf Is. 11 2. These are distinct from the charismatic gifts indicated in the N.T, from the "fruits of the spirit" of which the classical list is in Gal 5 22-23, and from the seven virtues*.

J.T M

seven penitential psalms: Psalms 6, 32, 38, 51, 102, 130, 143 (numbers as in Protestant versions) were so distinguished by St Augustine, it is said, on his deathbed. They were chanted as penitential exercises, and were sometimes set to counteract respectively the seven deadly sins*. To pride was assigned Ps. 32, to wrath, Ps. 6, to envy, Ps 130, to avarice, Ps. 102; to gluttony, Ps. 38, to sloth, Ps. 143, to lust, Ps. 51.

C L Marson, The Psalms at Work (1895), 2nd ed

J T M.

Seven Sorrows of Our Lady: A devotion promoted by the Order of Servants of Mary (Servites*) and celebrated in two feasts—one in Lent dating from the late Middle Ages, the other on September 15 from 1686. See Stabat Mater.

E.R H

seven virtues: The four "cardinal virtues,"* prudence, temperance, fortitude and justice, were distinguished by Plato and the Stoics. To these were added by Christian writers the three "theological virtues," faith, hope and love. Ambrose gives a Christian interpretation of the cardinal virtues thus he makes kindness and altruism essential to justice, patience to fortitude The virtues are variously listed by ecclesiastical writers, often without reference to the number seven. Aristotle's conception of virtues as habits enters into the scholastic teaching. Virtues are distinct from duties.

O Schilling, Lehrbuch des Moraltheologie (1927), vol I

J.T M

seven works of mercy, spiritual and corporal: In scholastic theology (Aquinas, Summa II, ii, 32) the seven spiritual works of mercy are to teach the ignorant, to counsel the doubtful, to console the sad, to reprove the sinner, to forgive the offender, to bear with the oppressive and troublesome (onerosos et graves), and to pray for all. The corporal works of mercy are. to feed the hungry, to give drink to the thirsty, to clothe the naked, to shelter the homeless, to visit the sick and prisoners, to ransom captives and to bury the dead. Cf Matt 25.35-44. The works of mercy are not counsels of perfection but required by natural law They are variously catalogued, explained and illustrated in many popular handbooks of medieval piety.

A Koch, and A Preuss, Moral Theology (1924), vol IV, 2nd ed

J.T.M.

Seventh Day Adventist denomination: See Adventists

Seventh Day Baptists: Baptists who observe the Jewish Sabbath* rather than the first day of the week. The group represents a survival of the Fifth Monarchy* movement in England and adopted their particular emphasis in reaction against the identification of the Lord's Day with the Jewish Sabbath by the Westminster Assembly. Cf Sabbatarianism. See Baptists.   W S.H.

There are now about 66 churches and 6,700 members   E T.C.

Seventh Day Baptists: (German, 1728) A group of three small Baptist churches in Pennsylvania (137 members), survivors of the work of John Conrad Beissel, who in 1732 organized the famous Ephrata Society* as a monastic society on the basis of celibacy and community of goods. The community still survives, but the original principles have long since disappeared. These churches have affinities with the Dunkers*. They observe the seventh day as the Sabbath, bless infants, teach non-resistance, wash feet, anoint the sick, and baptize by trine forward immersion

     E.T.C

Severus, Sulpicius: (ca. 360-425) A Latin Church historian. Author of "The Chronicle," a history of the world to A D. 400, and a "Life of St. Martin"   S.M G.

Sexagesima: The second Sunday before Lent or the eighth before Easter. See church year cycle.
     E.R.H.

sext: The office of the sixth hour. See divine office   E R.H.

sexton: (Middle English from Lat. sacer) A church officer who cares for the fabric of a church, rings the bells, digs graves, etc.   T.J.B.

Seydel, Rudolf: (1835-1892) Was professor of philosophy in Leipzig. He preferred to labor in the history of religion and write about the problem and essence of religion His speculations remind one of Schelling*, whose intellectual intuition he accepted for the apprehension of the absolute.
Das Evangelium von Jesu in seinen Verhältnissen zur Buddha Sage und Buddhalehre mit fortlaufender Rücksicht auf andere Religionskreise untersucht (Leipzig, 1882), Die Buddhalegende und das Leben Jesu (Leipzig, 1884), Religion und Wissenschaft (Breslau, 1887); Religionsphilosophie im Umriss, ed by P. W. Schmiedel (Freiburg and Leipzig, 1893); H. Lischewski, Über R. Seydels Religionsphilosophie (Erlangen, 1902).   H.H.

Shabbethai Zvi Ben Mordecai: Born 1626 at Smyrna, died 1676 in Albania. Jewish mystic and ascetic who lost all mental balance and proclaimed himself a Messiah. The times were indeed ripe for such a claimant. Between 1648 and 1658 at least 100,000 Jews had been massacred in Eastern Europe, and everywhere men awaited the divine emissary who would vindicate Israel. Shabbethai journeyed throughout the Orient and won large numbers of followers, among them the very influential and wealthy Raphael Joseph Chelebi, treasurer of the Court of the Cairo governor, the Amsterdam rabbis Isaac Aboab and Raphael Moses d'Aguilar, and two fellow-students of Spinoza*, Moses Zacuto and Isaac Noar. He proclaimed himself the Messiah in Gaza in 1666 with due solemnity, and large sections of Jewry hailed him as their deliverer. Shabbethai came to Constantinople with the mission of conquering the Sultan by a miracle but he was imprisoned on landing. His followers continued to believe in him and prayed for his release. The sudden appearance of another pseudo-prophet from Galicia who predicted the coming of a different Messiah discredited Shabbethai, and in the end, to save his life, he embraced Mohammedanism. A great dissolutionment followed among those who had believed in him, Shabbethai, meanwhile, trying to retain his hold by playing a double role as a Mohammedan and a Jew. Turkish officials finally grew tired of his plots and banished him to Dulcingo, Albania, where he died. See pseudo-Messiahs.

J Kastein, Messiah of Ismir (1931)   B.Z.B.

Shaffer Foundation, The John C.: Established at Northwestern University, Evanston, Ill. and designed "to promote the appreciation of the life, character, teachings and influence of Jesus."

Lecturers to date have been: Bishop Francis J McConnell, Professor John Adams Scott, Dr. S. Parkes Cadman, Dr. Charles Reynolds Brown, Dr. Ernest F. Tittle, Dr. Albert E. Day, Dr. Paul A. Wolfe, Dr. W. W. Whitehouse and Bishop George Craig Stewart. Publications include: We Would Know Jesus (1936) by John Adams Scott, The Life of Jesus Christ in His Church (1941) by Bishop George Craig Stewart, Christ of God (1929) by S. Parkes Cadman.   C.S.B

Shaffer Lectures: A lectureship at the Yale University Divinity School, established May 16, 1929, in memory of Kent Shaffer, Ph.B., 1907. The lectures are concerned with some phase of the life, character, and teachings of Jesus. Among the courses have been those by Benjamin W. Bacon, Jesus The Son of God, 1930, Toyohiko Kagawa, The Rediscovery of Christ's Life, 1932; Richard Roberts, That Strange Man on His Cross, 1934, C. Harold Dodd, Parables of the Kingdom, 1935, Ralph W. Sockman, Paradoxes of Jesus, 1936, Martin Dibelius, The Sermon on the Mount, 1937; James Moffatt, Jesus Christ the Same, 1940; William Paton, The Gospel and World Issues, 1942.   L.A.W.

Shaik 'Adi: See devil worshipers.

shaikh: A leader in the mystical orders of Islam. The election of such a leader by his own group is democratic and enhances his influence with his followers. He instructs and develops loyalty and upholds moral standards.   P.E.J.

Shaker communities: See communistic settlements, religious.

Shaktaism: See shakti.

shakti, Shaktism, Saktism: The Sanskrit term shakti means energy, power or force. Shaktism then is the worship of power or force in the universe conceived of as a goddess. Every god is thought of as having his shakti and in Shaktism she is worshiped rather than her consort. The major Shakta sects worship the shakti of Shiva as Kali or Durga The Tantras* are their scriptures. The worship of the lefthand shaktas is held in secret and is orgiastic in character.　　C S B shamanism: Narrowly, a phase of the religion of Tunguese people: faith and practices centering in the shaman (priest or medicine-man*), involving priestly, prophetic, and medical functions. Broadly, similar features in the religions of other peoples, such as found among American Indians. Faith and practice based upon the theory of possession, in which a spirit from outside the individual takes possession of the individual and operates through the possessed one.　　F L.P.

Shamash: Ancient Semitic Babylonian sun god, god of divination, Assyrian all-seeing god of right and justice, friendly to hunters, herdsmen, and travelers, judge of the innocent and guilty.
　　　　　　　　　　　　　　　　　　F.L P

Shammai: See Bet Hillel and Bet Shammai

Shang-ti: See Chinese Terminology.

Shankara, Shankaracharya: An Indian philosopher born late in the eighth century. He is best known for his doctrine of absolute or unqualified monism, or absolute nonduality, which, briefly stated, is that Brahman* alone is real, the phenomenal world is unreal, or mere illusion. Individual souls have no reality apart from Brahman, though caught by *maya or illusion they as well as the world around them seem to have a kind of reality. This is due to ignorance of the alone reality of Brahman. This being so, salvation or moksha comes in the knowledge of the identity of the individual soul with the world soul, Brahman. Little is known certainly concerning Shankara's life, but he is said to have travelled widely throughout India, refuting other interpretations of the Vedanta* and establishing his own. He wrote commentaries on the Brahma-Sutras, on ten of the principal Upanishads*, on the Bhagavad-gita* and other important works.
　　　　　　　　　　　　　　　　　　C S B.

Shedd, William Greenough Thayer: (1820-1894) A Calvinist theologian who, after professorial appointments in the University of Vermont, and in Auburn and Andover Seminaries, was successively Professor of Biblical Literature (1863-74) and Professor of Doctrinal Theology (1874-90) in the Union Theological Seminary, New York City.
His best known books were A History of Christian Doctrine (1865), 2 vols ; Dogmatic Theology (1889-94), 3 vols ; Orthodoxy and Heterodoxy (1893), and Calvinism Pure and Mixed (1893).
　　　　　　　　　　　　　　　　　　A.K.R.

shekinah: (Heb., dwelling, presence) Literally, divine presence. As in the Targumim so in Rabbinic writings, its usage is prompted by 1) motives of reverence and 2) need of preserving the sense of Divine nearness. Generally representing the idea of immanence, where it is employed as a mere metonymy for God, it denotes transcendence. The danger of anthropomorphism, which it sought to avert, was increased by its usage, taking on occasionally the character of a quasi-independent being. However, care was taken not to permit it to figure as an intermediary. See memra.

　　　　　　　　　　　　　　　　　　s.s.C.

shema: (Heb. hear) The watchword of Jewish monotheism, taking its name from the first word of Deut. 6 4, "Hear, O Israel, the Lord our God, the Lord is One " It consists of three sections: a) Deut 6 4-9, b) Deut. 11 13-21, c) Num. 15 37-41. (Cf Matt. 19. 16ff). Its use in Jewish worship is preceded and followed by benedictions
　　　　　　　　　　　　　　　　　　s.s.C.

Shemoneh Esreh: (Lit eighteen) The name given to the collection of benedictions (originally 18, now 19) which forms the main section of the morning, afternoon and evening prayers (On festivals and the Sabbath*, the thirteen middle benedictions which are of a petitionary nature are not recited, yet the name Shemoneh Esreh was retained). This section is also known as Tefillah, the prayer par excellence and Amidah (standing) referring to the position of the worshiper during its recitation.　　　　　　　　　　　　E.B —L.F

Shên: See Chinese Terminology.

sheol: (Heb. etymology uncertain) Literally, pit, grave, and nether-world. A dark and dreary subterranean abode of the dead, where the shades are given over to deep sleep, forgetfulness, silence, and destruction. While generally evoking a sense of horror and dismay, some sufferers welcomed it as a place of rest and social equality (Job 3 17-19). The practice of necromancy assumed that a degree of consciousness continued in Sheol, and could be temporarily aroused. Sheol is pictured as a gaping monster and as "the appointed house of all living", whence none return (Isa. 5 14; Job 10 21; 30 23, 7 10) The growing belief in God's sovereignty in death as in life, transformed Sheol into the scene of punishment of the wicked In post-Canonical Jewish literature Sheol merged with Gehinom (Gr. Geena, based on Jer 7 31-32; Isa. 66·24). The Septuagint renders Sheol with Haides, and the Authorized version occasionally with *Hell (e g., Deut. 32 22, Ps. 9 17, 18·5; Isa. 14·9). See eschatology.　　　　　　　　　　　　　　s s C.

Shepherd of Hermas: See Hermas, Shepherd of.

Shih Ching: See Chinese Terminology.

Shi ites: (Arabic, meaning sectarians) One of the two leading divisions of Islam, the other and larger being the *Sunnites. The Shi ites represent the Persian branch of Islam, and resent the passing of the Caliphate to other lands. They regard Ali and his followers as divinely ordained caliphs*, and continue to look for the true leader (imam or *mahdi). They hold many festivals cherish saints, produce more dervishes. Sufism and Bahaism arose from them. See Ismailis, Kharijites, Mohammedanism, mujtahid, Mutazilites, Persia, religions of   P.E.J.

Shin Ritsu: See Buddhist Terminology Disciplinary School.

Shinto religion and theology: Shintō, or Shindō, is the Sino-Japanese reading of two ideograms that are rendered into pure Japanese by the term, Kami-no-Michi, meaning "The Way of the Kami," or "The Way of the Gods." Shintō thus signifies the characteristic cult practices and beliefs, relating for the most part to the worship of the indigeneous Japanese deities, whereby the Japanese people have celebrated, ·dramatized, interpreted, and supported the chief values of their group life

The term Shintō in its proper historical usage does not carry us back to the earliest manifestations of the Japanese national religion The word does not appear in the literature until the latter part of the sixth century of the Western Era. In its more remote stages Shintō as a system appears to have been nameless The designation came into existence after the introduction of Buddhism into Japan and was evidently created in order to distinguish the original Japanese cultus from the Way of the Buddha.

Modern Shintō has two main branches. The one has special relations with the official organization of the national life. The other is dependent entirely on the voluntary support of adherents for institutional maintenance and propaganda. The former is generally called State (Kokka) Shintō, sometimes Shrine (Jinja) Shintō because of having its ritualistic center in the shrines or jinja, the latter is designated Sectarian (Shūha) Shintō. Both branches have received influences from the parent stream of the ancient cultus, the former more directly and, on the whole, in more unmixed character than the latter. Modern exponents of the state system generally insist that the ceremonies and beliefs connected with the shrines represent the true and uncontaminated line of pure Shintō, while the sectarian form has been more or less modified by foreign infiltrations and the contributions of founders and other teachers. On the other hand, adherents of the sects have occasionally declared that they alone preserve the true and original Shintō and that the state cultus may not inexactly be regarded as another sect, officially sponsored and claiming nation-wide allegiance.

The Shintō of the people exists in the form of thirteen officially recognized sects and numerous sub-sects. The thirteen sects are. Shintō Honkyoku ("Main Bureau Shintō," sometimes also called Shintō Kyō or "Shintō Teaching"), Shinri Kyō ("Divine Reason Teaching"), Taisha Kyō ("Great Shrine Teaching," after the great shrine of the sect at Izumo), Shūsei Ha ("Society for Improvement and Consolidation"), Taisei Kyō ("Great Accomplishment Teaching"), Jikkō Kyō ("Practical Conduct Teaching"), Fusō Kyō (from Fusō, a poetical name for Japan), Mitake Kyō ("Great Mountain Teaching," after the sacred peak of Ontake), Shinshū Kyō ("Divine Learning Teaching"), Misogi Kyō ("Purification Teaching"), Kurozumi Kyō (after the name of the founder, Kurozumi Munetāda), Konkō Kyō ("The Teaching of the Glory of the Unifying God"), and Tenri Kyō ("Heavenly Reason Teaching") The statistical totals for all sects combined show 18,000,000 adherents, 121,000 priests and teachers, and 16,000 churches.

The Shintō of the state does not publish statistics of adherents. Theoretically all Japanese subjects are included State Shintō maintains 110,500 shrines, large and small, and 15,800 priests. Features that distinguish Sectarian Shintō from State Shintō should be carefully noted, since the two are often confused Sectarian Shintō is for the most part the result of the labors of historical founders, organizers, and teachers who have systematized special forms of doctrine and ritual and propagated these for the purpose of creating followings and thereby benefiting the individual and the community This statement is not exclusively true, since at least three of the thirteen sects declare that they are without personal founders and that they merely expound the orthodox Shintō inheritance. Most of the sects represent movements that came into existence in the Meiji Era (1868-1912), in certain cases, however, the foundations date from earlier periods of Japanese history

The state cultus opened its modern career in 1868 when the classical revival that had made vigorous progress in the latter part of the Tokugawa Era (1603-1868) came to fruition in the establishment of "Pure Shintō" as the state religion. A definition of relations with popular Shintō movements soon became imperative and, beginning with the opening of the Meiji Era and culminating in the eighties of the last century, the government took steps to make clearly drawn administrative distinctions between the rapidly growing sects and the official system centering in the shrines. Regulations were set up under which all the recognized institutions of the state were to reserve to themselves the title of Jinja or Jinsha ("God House"), while, in contradistinction, the institutions of the sects were to be called Kyōkai ("Churches") and classified as ordinary religion along with Buddhism and Christianity. Since the promulgation of the written constitution in 1889, guaranteeing liberty of religious faith to all subjects, governmental officials, supported by various scholars and writers, have been careful to propagate the idea that State Shintō is not a religion, notwithstanding the fact that another group, including Japanese Shintoists of the first rank, has been equally emphatic in insisting that State Shintō is de facto, if not de jure, a genuine religion. The main cause of difference of opinion at this point lies in the relative weight given to governmental expediency in the matter of classification. The purpose of the authorities in this is to set up an administrative control which makes it impossible for a subject to repudiate State Shintō on religious grounds.

The sects, like all recognized religious bodies, have their own independent organizations, and possess legal properties that are almost exclusively distinct from those of the shrines. In general they are not permitted to make use of the latter as meeting places for sectarian purposes. The state shrines receive supervision and a measure of support from village, district, municipal, prefectural, or national governments, depending on the rank of the shrine concerned. Other and more extensive sources of income for the shrines are revenues from shrine properties, voluntary offerings and subscriptions, earnings from the sale of charms and talismans, and fees for divination and exorcism. The sects carry on voluntary, non-official religious propaganda, employ their own priests and teachers, in addition to a large number of unpaid instructors of various sorts, and maintain churches, schools, kindergartens, social welfare activities, and different kinds of organizations for young people and adults, as well as extensive agencies for literary propaganda.

Over against this, State Shintō finds its major function in the celebration of rites and ceremonies considered appropriate to the deepening of national sentiment. As the central element of these ceremonies, the priests read ritualistic prayers (*norito) before the deities of the shrines, in which supplication is made for good crops, peaceful homes, prosperous occupations, success in war, stability of government, security in the food supply, and long and majestic reign on the part of the emperor. The deities or kami honored in the official cultus are of multiform origin. They include numerous primitive nature forces, interpreted as "ancestors," the spirits of a limited number of emperors, and the spirits of heroes who have given their lives in the service of nation and throne. Taking the sects as a whole, it may be said that they have included in their god-world the entire pantheon of State Shintō and have added certain deifications of their own, notably the spirits of founders. The most noteworthy theological movement in contemporary Shintō, manifested especially in the sects but also appearing in the state religion, is a trend towards integration in terms of either a unitary pantheistic background of all existence or a fundamental monotheism. Both Buddhist and Christian influences are manifest here. The various deities of Shintō polytheism are interpreted as attributes of a monistic absolute that is spiritual in essence.

Finally, the Shintō of the state is managed by a special Bureau of Shrines in the Department of Home Affairs; Sectarian Shintō, along with all other recognized religions, is controlled by a Bureau of Religions in the Department of Education. The new Religious Organizations Law which went into effect April 1, 1940, embodies a recognition of this distinction. Sectarian Shintō is included within the scope of the new enactments, State Shintō is excluded on the grounds that it is not legally classified as a religion. See Japanese religions, Japanese Terminology; sacred literatures; temples, Far Eastern. See Susano-o.

W. G. Aston, Shinto, the Way of the Gods (Lon-don, 1905), Tasuku Harada, The Faith of Japan (1914), D C Holtom, The Political Philosophy of Modern Shinto (Tokyo, 1922), D C Holtom, The Japanese Enthronement Ceremonies (Tokyo, 1928), D C Holtom, The National Faith of Japan (London, 1938), Genchi Kato, A Study of Shinto, the Religion of the Japanese Nation (Tokyo, 1926), Georg Schurhammer, Shin-To, der Weg der Götter in Japan (Bonn, 1923), A C. Underwood, Shintoism, the Indigenous Religion of Japan (London, 1934).   D C.H

Shiva, Siva, Civa: A great Hindu God, the central object of worship of the Shivaite (Saiva*) sect of Hinduism. In the Hindu trimurti he is the destroyer while Brahma is Creator and Vishnu*, Preserver. His universal symbol is the *linga, emblem of the creative energy of the universe. Also Nandi the bull is frequently associated with his worship. He is represented in the more philosophical aspect of his cult as the great ascetic seated eternally in contemplation. In another aspect it is in his dance that the activity of the universe is expressed.

Since the active energy of the universe is regarded as feminine many of his worshipers worship his Shakti or consort under various names, Kali, Durga, Deva, Parvati, Uma.

He was long thought to have evolved from the ancient Vedic* deity Rudra* who was the destructive storm god, and certainly he bears a like character. Comparatively recent archaeological finds in the Indus valley have convinced many scholars that Shiva was known to the pre-Aryan Indus people. If this be true, then it would appear that with the coming of the Aryans he was temporarily submerged, or at least that he was not Aryanized to the point of being mentioned in the Vedic literature. But as the process of racial and cultural amalgamation with the native races went on there came a resurgence of the ancient deity, until he became the supreme God of a large section of the Indian people. Cf Mahadeva.   C.S.B.

shofar: Hebrew name for horn or ram or other clean animal, used in Bible times by the side of the trumpet in processions and in orchestral accompaniment, also to sound the alarm of war, and in the ritual of the New Moon, of solemn feasts and fasts, and particularly on the Day of Atonement* of the Jubilee year. The New Moon of the seventh month (Tishri), being the New Year, was termed "a memorial of blowing" and a "day of blowing" the shofar. It still holds the central place in the Synagogue liturgy of the New Year, calling the worshipers to repentance and reminding them, by means of accompanying Scriptural verses, of God's kingship, Revelation at Sinai, and future Messianic redemption. It is also blown at the end of the Day of Atonement. In Orthodox synagogues it is sounded during the morning service of the entire month of Elul in anticipation of the New Year. See New Year, Jewish.   S S.C.

shohet: (Hebr., butcher) One who slaughters animals for food in a manner prescribed by Jewish dietary laws   S.H B.

shrāddha: Hindu ancestral rite performed by relatives at the death of an individual and periodically thereafter for a time, by which, it is thought, a new body is provided for the ancestral spirit and it is aided in its progress from lower worlds to higher and back to earth. Beginning probably as a simple ceremony of feeding the dead, it has become a highly complex rite in its modern form. Though celebrated differently at different levels of Hinduism, its practice in some form is well-nigh universal in India.   c.s b.

Shrovetide: (From shrive—to hear the confession of) Monday and Tuesday immediately before Ash Wednesday*; carnival; period of festivity before Lent*.   b.r.

Shu Ching: See Chinese Terminology.

shunning, doctrine of: A practice among the Mennonites* of completely shutting out from all intercourse with the faithful of those who have been excommunicated from the congregation. This meant that the faithful were neither to eat, drink, visit, buy or sell with any excommunicated person.   w.w.s.

Sibylline oracles: Oracles* or prophecies issuing from a sibyl, a woman who, in ancient times, acted at various places as a medium or mouthpiece of some god; a collection or collections of prophecies, advice, information, attributed to a sibyl or sibyls. In the days of the old Roman republic, Sibylline Books were often consulted by the magistrates for guidance in state affairs. See pseudepigrapha; Roman religions.   f l.p.

Siddur: (Hebr. arrangement [of prayers]) Jewish book of common prayer arranged for worship throughout the year.   s h.b.

Sidgwick, Henry: (1838-1900) British philosopher, political scientist, and economist, advanced improved versions of the classical British political economy, and fairly liberal individualistic political philosophy. His Methods of Ethics (6th ed. 1901), which ran through many editions and still has influence upon moral philosophers, advocates a modified form of Utilitarianism, with concessions to Intuitionism. He was active in securing the admission of women students to the University of Cambridge, and in promoting investigations in Psychical Research*.   w k.w.

Sifra: Abbreviated from the Aramaic Sifra de-be-Rab, "the book of the school". An anonymous Rabbinic commentary to Leviticus* composed in early Talmudic times. The primary interest of the book is the application of the general principles in the Levitical legislation to new cases.   b.z.b.

Siger of Brabant: (died ca 1282) Being completely earnest with Aristotle's philosophy, he understood him according to the interpretation of Arabic Neo-Platonism, especially of Averroes. See Scholasticism.
Cl. Baumker, Die Impossibilia des Siger von Brabant (Munster, 1888), P. Mandonnet, Siger de Brabant, et l'averroisme latin au XIII siècle (Fribourg, Suisse, 1899).   h.h.

sign of the cross: An ancient devotional practice, in which the cross* is traced over the forehead, breast, and from shoulder to shoulder, as a token of the faith of the believer It is employed at blessings, absolutions, etc., and may also be used over objects (set apart for holy use) as well as over persons.   w n p

Sikh, Sikhism: A faith that arose in India as a result of the coming of Islam It is a good illustration of the tendency to syncretism which inevitably appears when two faiths come into contact. The founder of the movement was Nanak (1469-1538), a follower of the poet Kabir. Born a Hindu, near Lahore which was predominantly Moslem, he reacted strongly against current Hindu teachings and practices. He repudiated caste, he could not accept the authority of the Brahman priesthood, and found little satisfaction in the study of the Hindu scriptures. After a period of wandering as an ascetic he attained release and began to teach the way he had found to others. He was a poet and sang innumerable songs, many of which, together with many from Kabir and others, form the Granth, the sacred book of the Sikhs

Both Kabir and Nanak taught that the way of salvation was through bhakti the way of faith or devotion Both were of the Vishnu sect. They taught the oneness of God, to whom they gave various names, Ram, Brahma, Govind, Hari. The latter, another name of Vishnu, was the preferred name in Nanak's songs. They carried over the Hindu belief in rebirth from which release was sought Release meant the mergence of the individual soul in God. There are passages in the Granth that indicate a belief that salvation is, as in Islam, only for the elect. On the other hand there are numerous passages which seem to assume that salvation is open to all.

After the death of Nanak, the founder and Guru*, successive Gurus modified the faith at various points The fifth Guru, Arjun compiled the Granth. The Sikh community became increasingly militant and ultimately became a nation. They were finally crushed by the Moslem emperors, but they have remained a warlike people until now. They are considered the finest soldiers which India produces. The tenth Guru declared that thenceforth, the Granth should be their Guru. The great temple at Amritsar is the center of the faith. It has with the passing centuries seen the return of some Hindu ideas and practices, but it still maintains its separate identity and claims to be a religion apart from Hinduism, one of the living religions of the world. The last census (1931) gave the number of Sikhs at 4,335,771. See sacred literatures.
See M. A. Macauliffe, The Sikh Religion (1909), 6 vols.; Ernest Trumpp, Adi-Granth (London, 1877). A translation of the sacred book.   c.s.b.

Siloam inscription: Inscription in Old Hebrew characters found on the rock-wall of a water tunnel dug under the reign of Hezekiah from Gihon to the Pool of Siloam in ancient Jerusalem (II Chr. xxxii, 4, 30). See alphabetic writing.   s.l.t.

Simmel, Georg: (1858-1918) Professor at the Universities of Berlin and Strassburg. Noted for his extensive sociological and social-psychological investigations, for his transfer of the predominant psychological interpretation of the a priori into the historical field, a religious mystic vein permeated his metaphysical discussions. The negative theology of mysticism appeared to him as freer and deeper as all earlier and later religious philosophy. Though he rejected the substantiality of the soul, it appeared to him not impossible that life is not the sole form of existence.
Einleitung in die Moralwissenschaft (Stuttgart, 1911), 3rd ed , Die Probleme der Geschichtsphilosophie (Leipzig, 1921), 4th ed , Die Religion (Frankfurt, 1912), 2nd ed , Philosophische Kultur. Gesammelte Essays (Leipzig, 1919), 2nd rev ed ; M Adler, Georg Simmels Bedeutung f die Geistesgeschichte (Wien, 1919) , W. Knevels, Simmels Religionstheorie (Leipzig, 1926) , A Mamelet, La philosophie de Georg Simmel (Paris, 1914) , N J Spykman, The Social Theory of Georg Simmel (1925).
H.H.

Simon Magus: The magician of Samaria who offered money to the Apostles for the gift of the Holy Spirit (Ac. 8 9-24). According to church tradition he was the originator of the Gnostic* heresy.   E F.S.

Simon, Richard: (1638-1712) A French Roman Catholic scholar. A pioneer in textual studies of the Old and New Testaments and a translator of the Bible from the Vulgate*.   S.M.G.

Simon, Saint: See Saint Simon.

Simon Stylites, St.: See anchoret.

Simons, Menno: See Menno Simons.

simony: The purchase or sale of a church office by money payments or other unworthy benefits. The term arises from the story of Simon Magus (Acts 8 18-24).   R.E E.H.

sin: Sin as distinguished from crime (violation of the civil law) and vice (immorality resulting from the disregard of the social and ethical standards of society) is an act or attitude by which the reality of God is denied or violated. The conception of sin is therefore meaningful only in the context of religion. The history of religion shows that at all times sin and sins were understood to be offenses against the divine holiness. Among primitive people the notion of *tabu was closely related to that of sin. Also in the Christian religion, the conception of sin is determined by the knowledge of God. The apostle Paul furnished a definition of it, which is profoundly religious and in harmony with the fundamental character of Christianity. It has been reaffirmed whenever the Christian faith renewed itself by a return to its deepest spiritual resources. He wrote that "what does not come from faith is sin." This interpretation guided men like Augustine, Luther, Kierkegaard in their important reaffirmation of the Christian faith.
The most adequate definitions of sin as developed by Christian theology (in harmony with its identification with unfaith) were those in which it is interpreted as superbia (pride) and concupiscentia (concupiscence*, meaning selfish desire and, in the narrower sense, sensuous lust). Sin as pride is in the last resort the refusal on man's part to acknowledge God as God. It is imbued with the attitude of hybris by which man tries to deify, absolutize himself as if he could be self-sufficient. Sin as concupiscence is every expression of egotism and selfishness in which an utter disregard of both God's sovereignty and love is shown.

The details of the Christian doctrine of sin were developed not only in accordance with these conceptions, but also in connection with standards that evolved within the life of the church These standards were determined both by intra-ecclesiastical practices and by the relations of the church with the world. As the church formed for itself definite religious and moral norms in Scripture, creeds and ecclesiastical statutes of all sorts, violations of these norms came to be regarded as sins. Furthermore, with the church's assumption of responsibility for the character of civilization, there arose necessarily definitions of sin that were determined by the social milieu in which the church lived. Detailed definitions of sin have therefore varied in accordance with the nature of church-groups of different times and places.
In the very beginnings of Christianity it was held possible for a person who had been baptized in the name of Christ to be sinless. But this high standard which reflects the religious enthusiasm of the early Christians could not actually be maintained. One introduced therefore the distinction between mortal* (unforgivable) and venial (forgivable) sins. Mortal sins, by the commission of which a person exposed himself to excommunication* from the Christian community for having defied and offended the majesty of God, were idolatry, murder, and adultery. It is important to note that among these idolatry was regarded as the worst of all sins. Hence it was the last of the mortal sins that were finally declared as forgivable upon proper penance
To this day Roman Catholicism makes the distinction between mortal and venial sins. Mortal sin is regarded as that transgression of God's law which causes the sinner to lose the effect of grace*, thus rendering him subject to eternal punishment in hell. A venial sin is a violation of God's law which does not alienate the sinner from God, entailing no loss of grace, but requiring submission to penitential discipline. A mortal sinner can acquire forgiveness only by fulfilling the requirements of the sacrament of penance* through which grace is restored in him.
The Reformers rejected the Roman Catholic teaching In terms of Pauline faith, they defined sin as any act or attitude by which man estranges himself from God. In later Protestantism this high religious standard was replaced by norms which reflected the moral-social mores of the individual churches and groups. Not without the direct influence of the Reformers, especially Calvin, the injunctions of the Bible, of the O.T. as well as the New, read in the light of contemporary social ideals and practices, came to be regarded as normative of the Christian life, so that by them one could define sin and sins   Modern Protestantism and its theology broke with these traditions and introduced a definition of sin that was determined by the insights of the natural and social sciences in the moral development of mankind and of human groups and individuals.   In certain groups of Protestant Liberals, the term sin came to be regarded as practically meaningless. Recently, however, Protestant thought has re-discovered the Biblical, particularly Pauline, teaching of sin   See conviction of sin, evil; guilt; original sin, seven deadly sins, retention of sins, wrath of God   Cf ethics, satisfaction, temptation.

Julius Muller, The Christian Doctrine of Sin (1868), 2 vols , Reinhold Niebuhr, The Nature and Destiny of Man (1941-43), 2 vols   w.p.

Sin, Nannar: (Semitic Babylonian) Moon-god of the early Akkadians and later Semites*, 'The bright one', his cult appears to have originated in Ur and to have migrated early to Harran, later to Assyria; father of the circling hosts of heaven, overseer of the world at night

His cult appeared early in Palestine and Sinai. Some influences from this cult survived in the Hebrew feasts of new moons and trumpets, and in the fixation of their lunar calendar

Sin's symbol is a crescent, or crescent and disk. He is represented as an old man with beard and cap on which were horns of the moon   The horn came to be regarded as his crown, and a symbol of his power.   Assyrian kings wore a horned crown as a symbol of their kinship to deity sinecure: Properly an ecclesiastical benefice without parochial "cure of souls"* (e.g., in cathedral or university), but often used in common sense for one with no duties; scarcely found today except as honorary.   E.R H sins, retention of: See retention of sins.

F.L.P.

Sirach, wisdom of Jesus, son of: See Jesus, son of Sirach.

sisterhood: Sisters and nuns collectively; women bound by vows, usually living in communities, following a common rule of life and striving for perfection.   In the different communities there are slight variations regarding rules, constitutions, garbs and the like.   Contemplative communities have no contact with the world and aim at personal perfection through a close union with God in prayer.   Partly contemplative and partly active communities devote themselves to religious and charitable works, such as educating youth, caring for the sick, the aged, wayward, orphans, and the mentally deficient.   Some communities take solemn vows, others simple vows, congregations are under pontifical authority, diocesan communities are under the bishop.   B.R.

sisters: See s.v. nun.

Sisters, Black: See Black Fathers and Black Sisters.

Sisters of Charity: The name popularly attributed to the nuns belonging to the Sisters of Charity of St. Vincent de Paul*   The order was founded in 1633 and is devoted to corporal and spiritual works of mercy   Although it first arose as a group of young women who cared for the sick, it was founded as an order of religious by St Vincent de Paul, Venerable Louise de Merilla, and Mlle le Gras   The first house in the United States was founded by Mother Elizabeth Seton in 1809 at Emmitsburg, Maryland.   In the United States there are also several diocesan communities which follow a modified rule of the Sisters of Charity of St. Vincent de Paul.   T T.M.

Sisters of the Good Shepherd: See Pius XII.

Sisters of Mercy: A congregation of women founded in Dublin, 1827, by Catherine McAuley, for the practice of all the works of mercy, spiritual and corporal, e.g., visitation of the sick and imprisoned, management of hospitals, orphanages, homes for the destitute and the aged, etc.   They have more than one hundred establishments in Great Britain, and number above 9,000 members in the U. S.   J.F T

Sisters of St. Joseph's Society for Foreign Missions: A small religious community of women of the Third Order Regular of St. Francis*.   Founded by Cardinal Vaughan and Mother Mary Francis Ingham in 1883 to cooperate with the Mill Hill Fathers.   J F T.

Six Articles, 1539: See Act of Six Articles.

Sixtus IV, Pope: (1471-84) Born in 1414 at Celle near Savona, Francesco delle Rovere became early in life a Conventual Franciscan, of which Order he became in 1464 General.   Created Cardinal in 1467 by Paul II he was elected pope on Sept. 9, 1471 and was immediately acclaimed for his patronage of the arts and sciences. Despite the low state of revenues in the Papal States, he enlarged and made accessible to the public the Vatican Library; beautified Rome; built the Ponte Sisto across the Tiber; brought good water into the city of Rome and erected many churches and hospitals (Santo Spirito still extant and functioning).   His name will ever remain associated with the world-wide known Sistine Chapel, embellished by the famous frescos of the immortal Michelangelo and other artists.   He fostered and promoted the devotion to the (later defined dogma of the) Immaculate Conception (cf. "Pius IX"); favored Religious Communities (Mare Magnum) and celebrated the Jubilee of 1475.   He continued the policy of Paul II regarding the freedom of the Church in France.   His efforts to create interest in a new Crusade against the Turks met with apparent apathy, and had to be relinquished; neither was he successful in effecting a reunion of the Russian Church with Rome or of reaping the fruits of the Pazzi conspiracy led by his nephew Girolomo Riario against Lorenzo da Medici.   He disapproved of the excesses of the Spanish Inquisition*; vigorously opposed the Waldenses* and annulled the decrees of the Council of Constance* that had not been expressly confirmed by any of his predecessors He quelled the attempts of Zomometic to convoke an anti-papal General Council in Bâle in 1482. Although addicted to Nepotism his own life was otherwise blameless. His theological works appeared during his life-time at Rome, 1470-72.

Litt   For his letters written as General of the Franciscan Order and as Cardinal cf Archiv Franc. Histor. (1936), pp 198-234 and 477-91. Platina's Life of Sixtus IV was published by L A Muratori in his Rerum Italicarum Scriptores (Milan, 1723-51), vol XXXIII, L Pastor, The History of the Popes, vols III and IV (1923), Gregorovius, Rome in the Middle Ages (London, 1902)   R M H.

Sixtus V, Pope: (1585-90) Born of a poor family, Dec 12, 1521 at Grottamare, near Montalto, Felice Peretti was received as a boy of nine years by the Friars Minor Conventuals by whom he was educated. He later joined their Order, was ordained priest, 1547, and eventually became a famous Lenten preacher He functioned as Superior successively at Siena, Naples and Venice, became in 1560 Consultor of the Inquisition at Rome and professor at the Roman University. Appointed Vicar General over his Order, he was named by Pius V* Bishop of S. Agata, confessor to the pope and created cardinal in 1570   In 1571-77 he served as Bishop of Fermo and on April 24, 1585 was elected pope. Sixtus V is looked upon as one of the great Roman Pontiffs. He was a commanding and imposing figure, was indefatigable in- work and of inflexible will power. Mercilessly and without regard for consequences he extirpated banditry in the Eternal City and in the Papal States*, set in order the crippled finances of the papacy, and through a canonical visitation of churches and monasteries enforced in their minutest details the regulations and prescriptions of the Council of Trent* (cf. Catholic Reformation) for the reform of clergy and religious. Bishops were ordered to come to Rome at stated times to give an account of their respective dioceses (visitatio ad limina). In virtue of the Bull, Postquam verus, Dec. 3, 1586 he fixed the number of cardinals at 70, four of whom at least were to be Religious, and by the Bull Immensa Aeterni of Jan. 22, 1588 created 15 Roman Congregations (Departments), all properly circumscribed, of which six were intended for the temporal administration and juridical tribunals of the Papal States, the remaining, for the spiritual care of the Church at large. In the question of the succession of Henry IV of Navarre to the throne of France, Sixtus remained neutral and refused to be cajoled by Philip II and the Guises in a move that would destroy the balance of power in Europe by crippling France. He was, however, willing to assist Philip in his war against England, hoping thereby to regain that country for Catholicism; but the defeat of the Armada (1588) put an end to the aspirations of both pope and king. In 1587 Sixtus installed a special printing press in the Vatican for the publication of the Septuagint* text of the Old Testament, but he was less fortunate in the editing of a corrected edition of the Latin Vulgate*, all his personal work, which he published in virtue of the Bull Aeternus Ille as the authentic text of Holy Writ prescribed by the Council of Trent and ordered the same to be adopted by all as the exclusive version. Due to remonstrations and difficulties the sale of copies was checked and the Bull recalled shortly after the pope's death (Aug 27, 1590). Sixtus was a generous patron of the arts, sciences and architecture, in all three of which the religious motif always predominated. Under Sixtus V, Rome became the city of the Baroque style. He provided good drinking water (Aqua Felice) for Rome, connected the principal churches of the city by wide avenues, placed in St. Peter's Square (as in three other piazzas) a huge Egyptian obelisk, constructed the new Vatican Library, erected the pope's quarters in the Vatican and caused the cupola over St. Peter's Basilica to be completed by Michelangelo

Litt   Bullarium Diplomatum et Privilegiorum Summ. Roman Pontiff. Editio Taurinensis (Naples, 1882), vol IX, L Pastor, History of the Popes, vol. XXI (1932), Biographies by Tempesti, Casimir, O M Conv, Storia della Vita e delle Gesta di Sisto Quinto (Rome, Minaldi, 1866), 2 vols, L Wadding, Annales Minorum (Florence, 1934), vol XXII, Count Ugo Balzani, "Rome under Sixtus V" in Cambridge Modern History (1934), vol III, ch. 13, p. 422 ff, Cath Encyc. XIV, 33   R M.H.

Skaneateles (N. Y.) community: See communistic settlements, secular.

Skarga, Peter: (1536-1612) Polish Jesuit. A pulpit orator and apologist, he contributed to the restoration of Catholicism in Poland and to the Union of the Ruthenians* with Rome (1596).
                                                        E.A R.

skepticism: (Gr., skeptein, to reflect or consider) Antonym, dogmatism*. 1) The view that no knowledge (or no certain knowledge) is possible; based on deceptiveness of the senses, fallacies in reasoning, incompleteness of evidence, etc 2) The view that some particular type of knowledge is inherently impossible, e g, metaphysical knowledge of things in themselves as distinguished from experience (Kant*), or of the objects of religious belief such as God and immortality (cf H. Spencer*, "the Unknowable"). 3) The method of complete doubt at the outset of investigation, e.g., Descartes'* methodological skepticism, and F. H. Bradley's* view that skepticism means "to become aware of and to doubt all preconceptions " See agnosticism, Carneades, Pyrrhonism.
                                                        E S B.

skills: See culture.

Skoptsy: See Russian sectarianism.

slander: The malicious utterance or communication of a false report or misrepresentation of another which is expressed in his absence and which tends to injure his reputation. Essentially it consists of calling good evil. "The devil"* in the NT is preeminently a "slanderer." Slander is condemned by most if not all moral and religious codes   R W.F.

slang: See culture.

slavery: A social and industrial system in which the person and labor of one individual may be disposed of as the property of another. The exclusive right of the owner in his slave as property is generally limited by law or custom, but such restrictions are mitigations of slavery, not a part of its essential nature. Slavery has often been confused with 1) the subjection of wives and children in preliterate societies, 2) the subordination of the members to the head of a despotic state, or 3) the status of subjugated tribes, provinces or classes in a highly stratified society. Slavery, however, differs from the first situation in that it is an institution which extends beyond the limits of the family, from the second, in that it implies the existence of a society which recognizes the status of slave in contradiction to the status of freeman, and from the third in that slavery implies the individual, not the collective, subjugation of men and extends to the whole personality of the slave It is also distinguished from serfdom by the fact that in the latter case the master has no property right in the person of the serf, nor can he dispose of all his labor, but only of a specified portion of it As Nieboer says "The slave-owner may do with his slave whatever he is not by special laws forbidden to do, the master of the serf may require from his man such services or tributes only as the law allows him to require."

The earliest slaves were captives in war, since primitive custom everywhere forbids the enslavement of fellow-tribesmen. Only after the institution of extra-tribal slavery has become established is it extended to members of the kinship group, chiefly as a consequence of debt or as a punishment for crime

Slavery does not exist among peoples in the lowest stages of culture. Hobhouse has shown that it is unknown among the lower hunting tribes, and infrequent among higher hunters. Such peoples are relatively peaceful, and lack the economic and moral development necessary to the growth of slavery as an institution Slaves are useful to their masters only when agricultural and industrial techniques have become sufficiently productive to enable the worker to produce a surplus above the necessities of his own existence This condition does not generally prevail, and slavery is not extensively practiced, before the higher stages of agriculture have been reached.

The early Christian church inherited the traditions of slavery from both the Hebrew and the classical civilizations. Christians lived in anticipation of the speedy return of their Lord. Earthly concerns were of secondary importance, and while the Church Fathers generally showed pity for the slave, they did not condemn the institution, but asserted the equality of master and slave before God. St Augustine's time slavery had come to be thought of as a result of sin, and to grapple with sin a more important task than to grapple with its consequent. The net result seems to have been that while the Church made slavery milder, it also perpetuated it by its emphasis on the rights of masters.

After the fall of the Western Roman Empire, the ranks of the slaves were recruited from freemen who sought protection or escape from deprivation, and from captives taken in war by Clovis, Charlemagne, Henry the Fowler, and others. With the gradual amelioration of the condition of the slave and the depression of the lot of the free laborer, the status of both merged into serfdom. The transition in process is reflected in a seventh century decree that slaves of the Church shall work three days a week for themselves and shall spend three days at labor on the desmesne. By the tenth century the change was completed in Southern France, and in the North two centuries later During the twelfth century the Emperors began to grant to imperial towns the privilege of liberating serfs and slaves seeking refuge within them, and by 1300 domestic slavery was extinct. The Domesday Book records 25,000 slaves in England in 1086, but the institution was already merging into villeinage, and but few vestiges survived into the fourteenth century.

The Mediterranean lands present a different situation. Domestic slavery ceased in Bologna in 1283, in Castile before 1300, and in several other Spanish and Italian states before the close of the Middle Ages, but conflict of Christian with Turk and Moor perpetuated the trade in war captives, so that with the exploration of Africa and the settlement of America the adventurers and exploiters found ready to hand a decaying institution which they were able to revive and expand on the largest and most inhumane scale known to history.

Negro slavery was first introduced into Europe and America by the Portuguese. Slave raids upon Africa increased in frequency after the Middle of the fifteenth century, but began in earnest in 1511 when Ferdinand the Catholic granted permission for their importation into Hispaniola. Six years later Charles V urged their substitution for Indians in his New World possessions on account of their greater efficiency, and granted permission to a Flemish trader to transport 4000 Africans a year to the West Indies. The French, Dutch, and Spaniards rapidly expanded the traffic, but Queen Elizabeth bitterly reproached the illicit participation of Sir John Hawkins and her English subjects in the enterprise.

British participation was first officially sanctioned by a charter of Charles I to the African Company in 1631. The royal scruples once overcome, the trade grew apace. By the Asiento contract of 1713, England engaged to furnish Spain 4800 slaves a year for 30 years, each monarch to receive 25 percent of the profits. When the agreement was terminated by George II in 1750, the English were exporting annually 20,000 Negroes from Africa. By this time opposition to the trade was arising from under the leadership of the Quakers, soon to be supported by the bishops of the Established Church, the rising power of Methodism, and the religious and intellectual classes of England generally. It culminated in the Bill for the abolition of the Slave Trade in 1807. Final termination of the trade, to become effective after a term of years, was agreed to by the European Powers at the Congress of Vienna, the last nation to act being Portugal in 1836

England was also the first of the Great Powers to abolish slavery in her overseas possessions By an Act of Parliament of 1833, the 770,280 slaves throughout the Empire became free on August 1, 1834, and the owners granted 20 million pounds sterling in compensation. Slavery was abolished in the French colonies in 1848, and in the Dutch West Indies in 1863. The Spanish government abolished it for Porto Rico in 1873 and for Cuba in 1886 The Brazilian government took similar action in 1888. In the United States of America slavery was more easily abolished in the North, where the slaves were few in number, and where their ownership was confined to a few wealthy owners who could afford to liberate them, or who could find a profitable market for them in the South. But in the Southern States it became an integral part of the socio-economic system after the rise of the cotton industry. As popular sentiment against the slave system became irrepressible in other sections of the country, even Southerners who were aware of its economic fallacies were faced with a dilemma. Since the slaves constituted a majority of the population in two states, South Carolina and Mississippi, and a considerable minority in the rest, such Southerners feared the result if they were to be given full citizen status On the other hand, the creation of a permanent class with limited citizenship rights also presented difficulties, and their colonization in Africa, where the Republic of Liberia had been created for that purpose in 1822, would not only create insuperable difficulties of transportation under conditions then prevailing, but would completely disrupt the economic system of the slave states through the dislocation of their labor supply. Economic factors, however, would doubtless have gradually modified and eliminated slavery in a few decades had not the Proclamation of Emancipation ended it as a war measure, and the full citizenship status of the freedman, in legal theory if not in practice, been guaranteed by the Fourteenth (1868) and Fifteenth (1870) Amendments.

Slavery survived longest in the Portuguese possessions and in Africa, where it still survives as a quasi-legal institution as well as in Arabia, the frontiers of India and Burma, and in China. Harris has recently estimated that 5,000,000 persons still linger in slavery or in a status closely analogous thereto.

As Dunoyer has observed, the economic regime of every sedentary society has been founded on the slavery of at least a portion of the industrial and agricultural classes. It has undoubtedly played an important, though often exaggerated, role in human progress through disciplining man to the monotony of regular toil, and still more as a stimulus to the division of labor and the creation of a leisure class, but it has also retarded 'ethical advance through fostering contempt for manual labor, through its degradation of the human personality to the level of property, and to the inevitable abuses of power inherent in the master-slave relationship See pro-slavery doctrine.

John Hobbis Harris, A Century of Emancipation (London, 1933), Henry Charles Lea, Studies in Church History (1869), Herman Jeremias Nieboer, Slavery as an Industrial System (2nd ed, The Hague, 1910) H.E.J.

Smith, Gerald Birney: (1868-1929) Graduated, Brown University, Union Seminary, studied in Berlin, Marburg and Paris Professor of Theology, University of Chicago 1900-1929. Dr. Smith was one of the leaders of Chicago University Divinity School Faculty in modernizing and socializing Theology See s.v Ritschlianism Author Practical Theology 1903), Social Idealism and the Changing Theology (1913), Principles of Christian Living (1942), 2nd ed Editor American Journal of Theology, Journal of Religion, A Guide to the Study of the Christian Religion (1916), co-editor, A Dictionary of Religion and Ethics (1921). J W B.

Smith, Henry Preserved: (1847-1927) Author of biblical commentaries, O.T. history, Heretic's Defense (1926), autobiographical. Dismissed from Lane Theological Seminary in 1893 (where he had been professor of Old Testament since 1874) for defending historical criticism of the Bible, he became a Congregationalist and taught in succession at Amherst and Meadville becoming librarian at the Union Theological Seminary, New York, in 1913, and professor of Semitic Languages four years later. C.H M.

Smith, John: (d. 1612) The founder of the first English Congregation (1606), Smith sought in Holland religious liberty for his flock and himself. Later he adopted antipaedobaptist views, and through Mennonite* influence was won over to Arminianism* See s.v Puritanism

Walter A Burgess, John Smith the Se-Baptist, Thomas Helwys, and the First Baptist Church in England (London, 1911). E.W.K.

Smith, Joseph, Jr.: Born Sharon, Vermont, 23 Dec. 1805; organized Latter Day Saint Church* 6 April 1830, claimed angel showed him plates, 23 September 1823, and he received 1827, translated and published as Book of Mormon 1830, revelations published in Doctrine and Covenants 1835 (Book of Commandments 1833), prepared MS of Bible corrected by inspiration, preserved by his wife and published 1867; killed by mob, Carthage, Illinois, 27 June 1844. S.A.B.

Smith, William Robertson: (1846-1894) Scottish Biblical critic, philologist, and encyclopedist, born at Keig, Aberdeenshire. He was professor of Oriental languages and Old Testament exegesis in the Free Church College, Aberdeen, 1870-1881, being removed from his chair after a heresy trial which resulted in acquittal but a vote of want of confidence He was soon appointed an editor of the ninth edition of the Encyclopaedia Britannica, in 1883 was made professor of Arabic at Cambridge University, and in 1886 librarian of that university. He was a leader in the introduction to the English-speaking world of scientific Biblical criticism and of comparative method in the study of Semitic religions.   J.P H.

smriti: Revelation of a lower grade than sruti in Hinduism Smriti is regarded as sacred literature, but not on the same level as *sruti. The sutra literature (See Manu, Laws of) for example is smriti, so also the Epics and Puranas.*   C S.B.

Smyth, Egbert Coffin: (1829-1904) Graduated Bowdoin College, 1848, Bangor Theological Seminary, 1854, Professor of Natural Religion and Revelation, Bowdoin College 1856-1863, Ecclesiastical History, Andover Theological Seminary, 1863-1904, president of the Faculty, leading founder and editor of The Andover Review, 1884-1894.

Charged, together with other members of the Faculty, with departure from the Creed of Andover Seminary by the Board of Visitors in 1887, Smyth appealed to the Supreme Court of Massachusetts, and was acquitted in 1901

Author of editorials and articles in The Andover Review, co-author, Progressive Orthodoxy (1885), author, The Andover Defence (1891), defining the principles for the interpretation of Creeds. See biographical sketch in J. W. Buckham's Progressive Religious Trought in America (1919). See Andover Controversy, The

                                                              J W B

Smyth, Newman: (1843-1925) Graduate of Bowdoin College, 1863, served with the 16th Maine Volunteers, 1864, graduated, Andover Theological Seminary, 1867.

Pastor of the historic First Congregational Church, New Haven, Conn., 1882-1907.

One of the leaders of the New Theology* in New England.

His books represent the following advance movements·
(1) Emphasis on the return to Intuition and Progress in Theology· The Religious Feeling (1877); Old Faiths in New Light (1879); (2) The religious interpretation of Science: The Place of Death in Evolution (1897), Through Science to Faith (1902); Constructive Natural Theology (1913), (3) Church Unity Passing Protestantism and Coming Catholicism (1908); (4) Emphasis upon Personality The Meaning of Personal Life (1916). Biographical sketch in J. W. Buckham, Progressive Religious Thought in America (1919).   J.W.B.

social action: See social work of the churches.

social anthropology: See anthropology.

social ethics: The study of the functioning of social institutions in so far as such functioning is regarded as morally good or bad, right or wrong. In its concern for the finding and correlation of facts, it is scientific, in its concern for critical evaluation of the norms appealed to within the social process, it is philosophical; in its concern for particular methods of social improvement, it is practical. Social ethics therefore brings together into one discipline the fields of the social sciences and of theoretical and applied ethics*. Although the term itself is of recent origin, the criticism of existing social institutions or of institutional practices is as old, within western culture, as the 8th and 7th Century Hebrew Prophets More explicitly, its foundations as a theoretical science were laid in Plato's Republic and The Laws and in Aristotle's Politics In the modern period it has had a utopian phase, represented by such works as More's Utopia (1516), Bacon's New Atlantis (1627), and Saint-Simon's The New Christianity (1825), and its present, increasingly solid, scientific phase, rooting in the work of Karl Marx (Das Kapital, 1867). Social ethics is distinguished from Christian Ethics* in its concern with social institutions and conditions qua social, rather than with both social and personal morality, and in its approach to these as secular rather than religious problems. Among the important controversial issues in the field today are the following 1) whether the institution (social environment*) or individual character (heredity* plus personal choices) is the primary determinant in social behavior, 2) whether norms of social morality can, in some sense, be defined objectively and universally, or whether they are exclusively relative to the cultural context in which they emerge, 3) whether such norms, however defined, can be used, through the educational process, in the realization of gradual and deliberate social evolution or whether significant change must necessarily come violently as antagonistic social forces move toward resolution, and 4) whether structural change in institutions can of itself socialize human motivation Cf haustafel social gospel: This term appears in the late nineteenth century being popularized by the Christian Commonwealth Community as the title of its monthly magazine, 1897-1900. But the ancestry of this trend of sincere Christians to make Christian faith and love dynamic in contemporary life and especially in promoting the welfare of workers is reaction to the individualization of the gospel accompanying the rise of the modern age.

F G Peabody, The Approach to the Social Question (1909), L T Hobhouse, The Elements of Social Justice (1922), R Niebuhr, Moral Man and Immoral Society (1932), J H Tufts, America's Social Morality (1933); P A. Sorokin, Man and Society in Calamity (1942).   E T R

Ecclesiastical control of the economic and social life began to decline with the coming of Protestantism*, democracy, economic liberalism and public education By mid-seventeenth century the church was sanctioning the taking of interest and religious toleration and liberty were depriving the churches of earlier exercised social applications of Christian ethics. In Geneva and Massachusetts Calvinism* introduced bibliocracies. Elsewhere it denoted the acceptance of status as willed by God. Long ago it should have been observed that just as the churches lose their socio-economic jurisdiction, the word "gospel" takes on a strange novel meaning. As early as 1652, "gospel" signifies something serving as "guide to human action". Jonathan Edwards* a century later divorces religion from society. This desocialization of Christianity by 1790 turned "gospel" into a "doctrine preached with fervor as a means of social and political action" Thereupon Thomas Carlyle* could refer to a "gospel of economy" and Frederick Denison Maurice* plead for a kingdom of God within a dead church and Charles Kingsley* emphasize freedom, equality and brotherliness as demands of the gospel.

After 1848 in consequence of the February Revolution, Maurice, Kingsley, and Ludlow headed a movement known as Christian Socialists, while Saint Simon twenty-five years earlier defined the core of the gospel to be brotherliness. Meanwhile Marx* had launched his theory of society upon boisterous waves. In 1849, Christians in Germany became interested in socialism*, called attention to the guilt of the churches regarding social issues and demanded Christian love and responsibility in expiation. Some four or five competing social interpretations can be traced in Germany.

Between 1731 and 1830 the only interest in articles in American religious journals concerned with peace, slavery, prison reform, improvement of the lot of seamen, temperance and such like is "the rescue of the individual by an emotional religious experience rather than any definite application of the teachings of Jesus to the social order". Then Channing, Bushnell, and Parker discuss social problems vehemently and the Brook Farm Association, 1841, organizes to "apply principles of justice and love to our social organization in accordance with the laws of Divine Providence" Stephen Colwell and Edward Chapman follow with Gladden, Herron, Henderson, Mathews*, Batten, Rauschenbusch* and a host of others keeping them company.

The fatal error of Rauschenbusch and his group was to identify Jesus' view of the kingdom of God* with the twentieth century evolutionary hypothesis. Jesus ' thought of the kingdom as "principally in the future and wholly in the realm of miracle." In seven items, Rauschenbusch differed from Marx. 1) Positive religious faith; 2) Value of the church; 3) Necessity of regeneration, 4) Reality of spiritual forces, 5) Moral responsibility of the individual, 6) Sanctity of the family, 7) Insistence upon prohibition. After accepting evolution and science, this group refused to be scientific in its view of the kingdom of God and thus lost the war to fundamentalism* and economic reaction. See also Christian Social Union; communistic settlements.

Abraham Cronbach, The Bible and Our Social Outlook (1941) ; C. H. Hopkins, Rise of the Social Gospel in American Protestantism, 1865-1915 (1940) ; C E Hudson, and M. B Reckitt, The Church and the World, II, III (1940) ; F E. Johnson, The Social Gospel Re-examined (1940) , M C Latta, "Background for the Social Gospel in American Protestantism," Church History (1936), p. 256 ff ; Ola E. Winslow, Jonathan Edwards, 1703-1758 (1940).   C.H.M.

social work of the churches: A term designating the agencies and techniques through which the social motive finds expression in religious groups, including the maintenance of hospitals, homes, and settlements, case work with families and individuals, group work, social education, and social action. The social work of Catholic, Protestant (for the modern development of theoretical basis in Protestantism, see article on the Social Gospel), and Jewish communions is based upon the social and ethical teachings of the Old and New Testaments and on the communal traditions of early Christianity. Within Christianity, however, this early communal emphasis was soon obscured as the church became absorbed in defining its doctrine and perfecting its organization. Also, the ascetic* spirit within Christianity, the popular views of poverty as a divinely established condition to be relieved rather than removed and of almsgiving as a penance of value to the donor in the next world rather than to the recipient in this, tended to place the emphasis in practical Christianity upon individual redemption rather than upon the redemption of the social order. Nevertheless, the rise of monasteries and hospitals as institutions for the poor, sick, infirm, aged, and orphans, the emphasis on the ransoming of captives, the ecclesiastical attempts to preserve peace and to regulate industry and commerce in the interest of justice and human welfare, and the rise of parish charity and spontaneous individual almsgiving, bear testimony to the widespread concern of the medieval church with human suffering

However, with the decay of feudalism*, the confiscation of the monasteries and other sources of Catholic charity, and the rise of modern capitalism, industrialism, and urbanization, distress was greatly augmented. The haphazard efforts of parochial and individual charity were no longer adequate, and relief became increasingly a function of the municipalities and later of the national states. During this period the Catholic Church laid the foundations for its modern charitable and institutional enterprises, while the Protestant Reformation and the outbreak of new sects with their interest in the restoration of the primitive church in faith and practice, often including its communistic features, contributed to the development of the social conception of Christianity. During the seventeenth century and later the Quakers* especially became apostles of love and justice among men, crusaders against slavery and war, and on behalf of prison reform, popular education, and the social care of the insane and the defective.

The rise of modern secular social work in England and America since the middle of last century, with its emphasis upon investigation, attention to causes, individualized treatment, self-help, record-keeping, and cooperation of agencies, owes much to the religious motivation of many of its founders. It has also reacted upon the social work of religious groups in certain fundamental ways common to them all. In the first place, they have all adapted the new principles and techniques to their traditional types of service This is seen in the enlarged scope of hospital services, in the gradual substitution of home care of children and the aged for the earlier institutional types, in the adoption of case work techniques in dealing with individuals and families and in the willingness to surrender the functions of purely material relief to governmental agencies. Second, all groups have modernized and enlarged the scope of their services by establishing new agencies under religious auspices paralleling those in the secular field. Here may be mentioned the special schools of social and religious work set up within the Catholic and the Protestant denominational colleges and universities and the recently closed Jewish Graduate School of Social Work in New York. The National Conference of Catholic Charities, the National Conference of Jewish Social Welfare, and the Church Conference of Social Work, recently organized by the Federal Council of Churches*, parallel the secular National Conference of Social Work. Third, all have adapted educational, recreational and other group work programs to the needs of their own constituencies which in the more highly developed parish houses approximate the settlement programs in scope and personnel. Fourth, all have engaged in experimentation with new forms of social service, such as psychiatric clinics, family consultation, and in some cases birth control, which they have often relinquished to secular agencies when firmly established. Finally, all have developed programs of "social action," a series of social pronouncements and reform measures directed toward changes in the economic and social status quo from which many individual social problems arise. The most important of these is the "Social Ideals of the Churches," first formulated by the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1908 and adopted by the First Quadrennial Meeting of the Federal Council of Churches in Philadelphia in the same year. It consists of a declaration of principles with reference to child welfare, labor legislation, the minimum wage, collective bargaining, old age security, social justice, and the application of Christian ethics to the acquisition and use of property. It has frequently been revised and expanded. Similar pronouncements have been made by all the leading denominations. The Bishops' Program for Social Reconstruction, formulated at the National Catholic Welfare Council in 1919, and the Social Justice Program, drawn up by the Central Conference of American Rabbis in 1920, with their more recent emendations, serve a similar function for these groups. Most Protestant denominations have social service commissions under various names which are active in promoting such reforms. The common interests in this field of the 24 Protestant denominations constituting the Federal Council of Churches is expressed through its Commission on Religion and Health, the departments of Race Relations, International Justice and Good Will, Research and Education, and especially through its department of the Church and Social Service. Certain departments of the International Council of Religious Education, especially those dealing with youth and adults, are also active in this field. Similar functions are performed among the Jews by the Social Justice Commission, and among the Catholics by the Social Action Department of the National Catholic Welfare Council.

Despite these similarities, Catholic, Protestant, and Jewish groups have developed clearly differentiated patterns of social work in accordance with their distinctive religious attitudes and forms of organization. The Catholic pattern remains supernatural in outlook. Social work is conceived of as motivated by a love of God above all creatures, and by a love of others for the sake of God. It is thus an essentially religious function, and is organized as an integral part of the work of parish and diocese, with a complete range of services paralleling those of the secular community. Central diocesan organizations, usually called "Catholic Charities," have been formed in 79 dioceses. They serve as the organ through which the bishop directs the social service agencies and charitable institutions under his jurisdiction. Volunteer lay organizations, some of them national and international in scope and often employing professionally trained workers, have also been established. The more important are the Society of St. Vincent de Paul, among men, and among the women, the Ladies of Charity, the Ladies Auxiliary, the Catholic Women's League, and the National Council of Catholic Women. The Catholic Daughters of America, the Knights of Columbus*, the Catholic Order of Foresters, the Christ Child Society, and other organizations, also undertake some social service. The Catholic Youth Organization conducts religious, social, recreational, and culture activities for young people in certain centers, generally under diocesan auspices.

The Jewish pattern is communal rather than specifically religious in character. Although most Jewish communal organizations are of twentieth century origin, they represent the adaptation to current conditions of the Scriptural and Talmudic traditions of communal responsibility of all classes of the needy. This communal pattern was developed through centuries of persecution, and was firmly established in Jewish life and thought on their arrival in America in large numbers from Eastern Europe after 1881. Its perpetuation and development has been facilitated in America by the fact that of the 5,000,000 Jews in the United States, 70 per cent live in the 11 largest cities, with nearly 40 per cent in Greater New York alone. In these cities Jewish philanthropy is comprehensive and highly differentiated, with specialized agencies on every recognized field, while the small communities are served by a single communal agency covering the entire field. All the larger communities are organized in federations of Jewish welfare work. More recently, Jewish social and fraternal as well as welfare activities have been further coordinated by the organization of community councils which provide a medium for joint consideration of communal problems and an instrumentality for joint action with regard to all aspects of Jewish life. Jewish agencies find it necessary to provide relief for large numbers of aged immigrants whose citizenship status excludes them from public relief, and to maintain certain institutions, hospitals and homes for children and the aged, in which a Jewish environment is considered essential. Because of the Talmudic doctrine of self-help as the highest form of charity and because of the large role of small business enterprise in Jewish economy, a distinctive feature of Jewish social work is the Hebrew Free Loan Society, which makes small loans on endorsed notes without interest to meet emergencies and to finance self-employment ventures. Refugee service has recently assumed large proportions. Since the accession of the Nazi regime in Europe some 200,000 Jews have arrived in the United States, usually without funds because of the confiscation of their property. In 1941, $4,500,000 was expended for this purpose. Another important task is the relief and rehabilitation of dislocated Jewish populations overseas through the United Palestine appeal, which purchases land in Palestine and aids in its colonization, and through the Jewish Joint Distribution Committee, which assists Jews overseas, especially in Eastern and Central European countries.

The Protestant pattern is the most heterogeneous of all. Protestant denominations have continued their traditional institutional services such as hospitals, orphanages*, and homes for the aged, but the fact that these denominations generally regard themselves as voluntary associations rather than as organizations representing the entire community has led them to find in community-wide secular organizations the natural channels for the expression of the Christian social motive. Protestantism has diffused its leadership widely through these agencies and contributed its means to their support rather than duplicate their efforts in a parallel set of agencies under denominational auspices. Moreover, the fact that the major denominations share a common religious mood which is more fundamental than their differences has made it comparatively easy for them to support joint socio-religious enterprises such as the Young Men's and Young Women's Christian Associations and the Church Federation Movement In the past persons of Catholic or Jewish affiliation who have been in need of special services, such as persons discharged from hospitals or released from prison, juvenile* delinquents, and the like, have been promptly assisted by the appropriate agency, but Protestants, owing to the lack of denominational organization, have been less fortunate. This need is now being supplied in many urban centers under federated auspices by interdenominational case work organizations or by referral to other social agencies.

On a national scale, the Home Missions Council has been an active force for social betterment, especially in rural areas. Other joint social work agencies developed since the outbreak of the war, many of them administered or fostered by the Federal Council of Churches, include the Christian Commission for Camp and Defense Communities, the Commission on Aliens and Prisoners of War in America, the Committee on Foreign Relief Appeals, the Church Committee for China Relief, the American Committee for Christian Refugees, and the War Prisoners Aid of the Y.M.C.A. The Federal Council's Commission on Army and Naval Chaplains, which assists in the selection of chaplains, has assumed new functions as the chaplains have undertaken social case work functions in relation to personal and family problems.

Much local Protestant effort has been of a pioneering character in areas of special need. The institutional church*, with its elaborate program of social services on a community rather than a parish basis, was formerly a popular form of religious enterprise, but as secular social work has covered urban areas more adequately, they have declined in popularity. A similar pioneering effort is the National Association of Good Will Industries, originally developed under Methodist auspices, but now interdenominational and nonsectarian, which in 1942 provided social services and economic self-support for the handicapped in 82 local centers.

The most recent development in the Protestant field is the incorporation of social work principles and techniques into the regular training of pastors, missionaries, and other church workers. At least eight seminaries now provide clinical training, the students serving as internes in general and mental hospitals and family case working agencies. A unique contribution is being made by the Council for Clinical Training, conducted by the Federal Council of Churches. In 1941 it maintained centers in five federal penal and correctional institutions and provided at least three months training to 65 students. See charity and almsgiving; charity organization; communistic settlements; religious; friendly societies; social gospel.

F. E Johnson, The Social Work of the Churches, The Federal Council of Churches (1930) , M. T. Boylan, Social Welfare in the Catholic Church (1941) , E Fritsch, An Historical Survey of Jewish Philanthropy (1924) , M J. Karpf, Jewish Community Organization in the United States (1938) ; R. Niebuhr, The Contribution of Religion to Social Work (1932). H.E.J.

socialism: I. Socialism means community of ownership, as opposed to private property. It signifies different things in different contexts. The rulers of Plato's republic, the early Christians, the monasteries to this day, practice socialism as an ascetic way to their emancipation from distracting worldly interests and to their concentration on their spiritual responsibility. Modern socialism claims to organize the world for economic prosperity and makes of this claim a philosophy.

II. Socialism is opposed to, but also derived from, liberal capitalism. Liberalism is deistic or materialistic. It says that God or nature have so created man as to make him naturally contribute to universal harmony. Politically this means a rational, individualistic, bourgeois society. man can only be made free, and he also must be made free, if this is the condition of universal harmony. Economically,, the free play of forces is supposed to work harmoniously by way of the price mechanism; upward and downward movements of price, expressive of growing or declining demand for the product, attract or determine profit-seeking producers and thus adjust supply to demand. But further implications were neglected by the liberal doctrine. Unregulated freedom makes the (financially) strong the lord of the weak by ruining the small shops and forcing their owners into "proletarian"† dependent industrial work in the superior large enterprises. At the same time, the growth of the latter, while increasing the productivity of the system, diminishes its adaptability and flexibility (fixed capital) and thus produces or intensifies the economic crisis and its accompaniment, unemployment

Socialism is primarily the critique of these defects of liberalism Since they appear as results of a historical development, socialism becomes a doctrine of historical change through an autonomous economic change (economic interpretation of history). According to Marxism (see Marx, Karl), the most elaborate form of socialism, history is dialectic, it leads from any organization of society through the conflict with its victims to the next higher and more comprehensive stage, in a self-determining progressive movement When all men will be on the same footing of liberty, as equals, in the most comprehensive organization of the classless society, the dialectic of history reaches its end. Capitalism* is the second-to-the-last stage, a system of collective, dependent, propertyless work for the profit of private owners, often interrupted by unemployment The solution of the class struggle in capitalism is the "social revolution", which organizes this collective system of production as the collective property of the workers and unifies its operation under a comprehensive crisis-proof plan This is the logical—dialectically logical—consequence of the contradictory system of capitalism, which combines personal liberty with dependent work and collective production with private appropriation of the product

The workers' state, shaped to achieve that final reorganization, is democratic as the rule of the huge majority, but dictatorial towards the former exploiters and their intellectual and armed lackeys, whose counter-revolutionary aspirations it suppresses. The state will finally "wither away" for lack of a function as soon as all have been re-educated by dictatorial pressure for a free cooperative association—the goal of history.

III. The political problems of socialism rise from its anticipation of a development to a unified proletarian system by way of the universal spread of large-scale mechanical production. This is only partly confirmed by the facts. Labor-saving devices—supplemented by cheap electrical power and co-operatively-owned machines—restore the efficiency of individual farming in the most progressive countries of agriculture. In industry, labor-saving machines dissociate the growth of production and output from any growth of labor proper but require increasing numbers of engineers and accountants, as well as middlemen for the distribution of the growing output,—the new middle classes gain in numbers and functions. The result is a growing diversity in late capitalist society, although all its members suffer from the crisis and inequality has become excessive, as predicted by Marx.

In this situation, socialists decided either to postpone their uniform proletarian program until history would produce its precondition, or to impose it forcibly on a largely non-proletarian society, by way of a minority dictatorship The former was the way of the German socialists—their inaction in a disintegrating bourgeois system paved the way to the action of the National Socialists The latter is the way of Russian communists—their action betrayed democracy and contributed the model of their dictatorship towards the growth of fascism The political problem of socialism is, then, the conflict between its totalitarian proletarian claim and its democratic ideal, which requires diversity and decentralization as the condition of liberty The French socialist Proudhon (1808-1865) has opposed the idea of a balanced pluralistic constitution to the Marxian dictatorship of the proletariat.

IV Philosophically, socialism is, first of all, the punishment inflicted on liberal society for its claim to automatic human perfection This is the starting point of religious socialism—the divine wrath uses the proletarian sufferers as a scourge on a complacent and overbearing bourgeois* world and reveals through their protest the social and economic disintegration of a supposedly harmonious system. But only British socialism drew the positive conclusion to preach socialism as a Christian commandment rather than to teach it as social science. Continental and American socialism is heir to the tradition of materialism and atheism. It relies on the growth of automatic perfection, not indeed by virtue of the given natural faculties of man, but as a product of causally inevitable economic changes. The result is parallel to that of the liberal utopia, a self-contained world of man, individualistic here, collectivist there, and redeemed from evil, once and for all, by the economic process, much as this requires men conscious of their opportunity. This is an overtly anti-Christian doctrine. This can be seen from the theory of the final stage of the development, where the evil has been overcome and the state, the guardian against evil, withers away for lack of a function, but it can also be seen from the preceding, dialectically opposite stage, the proletarian dictatorship, where the dictatorial class or its heads act as the infallible trustees of salvation, immune to the temptation of unchecked power and inspired only by the spirit of their mission. This supposedly scientific, but unverifiable theory rationalizes the unlimited power of a certain group of men as the guarantee of the salvation of mankind, it justifies their every act of violence or trickery as securing that objective. It has become a pseudo-religious dogma, the center and meaning of life for many millions, and has superseded the Christian dogma, which they reject because of its dogmatic, unverifiable nature.

And yet the Christian heritage is unmistakable in communism. All forms of socialism are inspired by the Christian ideas of justice, liberty, and peace. Communism is a Christian heresy. Its heretical character, its reliance on the redeeming force of man, or of certain men, is responsible for the absurdity of its logic and the atrocity of its politics.

But its objective—contrary to any fascist objective, where liberty and peace are ridiculed and justice is only another name for racial supremacy—makes communism a part of the Christian world and permits the hope that some re-Christianization will be forced on the official doctrine by the profoundly Christian Russian peasants, from below, and by the alliance with the West, from without. See anarchism; dialectic, Jewish socialism, labor movements

Karl Marx and Friedrich Engels, The Communist Manifesto (first published in 1849) , Friedrich Engels, The Development of Socialism from Utopia to Science (first published in 1882) , N Lenin, State and Revolution (first published in 1917) , Reinhold Niebuhr, Moral Man and Immoral Society (1933) , Eduard Heimann, Communism, Fascism, Or Democracy? (1938)   E H.

Society of Friends (Quakers):

Quakerism* evolved in the later stages of the Protestant Reformation in England, precipitated by the ministry and personality of George Fox*. His preaching in 1647 and following made converts among Seekers*, Independents, Baptists, and other sectarians, who loosely united as "Children of the Light," "Friends," or "Friends in the Truth." Fox and his converts soon spread the new faith through the British Isles, to the Continent, and to America (1656). Persecution fortified them in their zeal to publish the "Truth" of the "Light of Christ that lighteth the heart of every man." Hangings in Boston and imprisonment in Cromwellian and Restoration England failed to discourage them. Missionaries travelled widely, and settlers migrated to the New World until, when Fox himself visited America in 1671-73 he found Friends in Barbados, and from the Carolinas to New England. Rhode Island was their greatest mainland stronghold, until in 1681 Pennsylvania was granted by Charles II to the distinguished Quaker convert, William Penn*.

Fox's death in 1691 marked the end of the pioneer phase of Quakerism. He witnessed its growth to forty or fifty thousand adherents in Britain and some thirty thousand abroad. He helped perfect an organization of monthly, quarterly, and yearly meetings, with the monthly meeting serving as the local congregational group, the quarterly meeting drawing a number of these units together, and the yearly meeting, semi-representative, semi-popular, exercising final authority in the region under its jurisdiction. Friends eschewed a formal creed, but their code of morals was very strict. Quaker humanitarianism, springing from the doctrine of the Inner Light, began to flower, as Friends pioneered in eighteenth-century social reform   Quaker theology, at least as interpreted by Robert Barclay* in his Apology (1678), was English liberal Protestantism, modified by the emphasis on direct revelation, a lay ministry, and the "spiritualization" of the sacraments.

The eighteenth century was marked by a growing quietism in Quaker religious thought and practice. No longer persecuted, Friends lived as a people apart, refining their discipline in matters of conduct and dress, and extending their humanitarianism which had already renounced war, to Indian relations and Negro slavery   From this age of quietism they were shaken by the new philosophy of the Revolutionary period, by the great westward migrations in the United States after the War, and by the evangelical movement, English and American. The migrations carried Quakerism over the mountains to the Ohio Valley, to Canada, and eventually to the plains states and the Pacific Coast   Liberal, unitarian ideas clashed with a growing evangelicalism to produce a great Separation in America in 1827-28. English Quaker leaders, themselves increasingly evangelical, sided with the "Orthodox" party, although some felt that the theology of the "Hicksites" (so-named because one of their leaders was Elias Hicks, a prominent Long Island minister) more closely approximated that of the "first publishers of Truth "

Further separations followed among the Orthodox. A small, conservative New England group, led by John Wilbur (1845), kept more closely to the mystical faith and quietistic practices of earlier days Others embraced the evangelical theology whole-heartedly, and gradually took on the color of the evangelical churches around them. Hymn singing, paid pastors, and programmed meetings became common among "Friends Churches " Only their peace testimony and their refusal to celebrate the sacraments in the physical form distinguished them from other evangelical Protestants The Orthodox Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, however, where the first great separation had begun, avoided further schisms by ceasing to correspond with other American Yearly Meetings, and refusing to join their evangelical Five Years Meeting (1887)   The Hicksite Yearly Meetings united loosely in a biennial General Conference (1902).

Evangelicalism* brought revivalism, missionary and reform activity to Friends, as it did to all Protestants. Humanitarianism, mystical as well as evangelical in origin, continued to distinguish Friends of all branches   Education, prison reform, temperance, Indian aid, and antislavery were Quaker favorites, although Friends could be found in all kinds of philanthropic organizations from "soup societies" to Bible associations. Officially they shrank from the use of force which they feared some of these reforms, notably abolition, might provoke. But they stood firmly on the ethical principles involved, and some Friends shared in the activities of the Underground Railroad and the radical antislavery groups.

The twentieth century has seen an extension of the opportunities for humanitarian and religious service, and a corresponding growth toward unity among Friends everywhere. The high tide of evangelicalism has receded, and, among "conservative" Friends, the outward distinctions of speech and dress have given way The first World War saw the organization of an American Friends Service Committee, with representatives from all branches in this country. English and American Friends likewise drew more closely together in service and religious fellowship. An All-Friends Conference in London in 1920 was followed by a World Conference in 1937 at Swarthmore and Haverford Colleges, near Philadelphia Out of this has come a World Committee for Consultation which brings together the approximately 163,135 Friends now in the world. Their subdivisions were in 1940 Great Britain and Ireland, 22,124; North America, 116,090, Latin America, 7,172, Europe, 627; Asia, 2,338, Africa, 14,429, Australia and New Zealand, 932. Of these some were obviously mission groups, others varied in theology and practice In the United States, rural meetings, both evangelical and conservative, seemed to be on the decline, while united meetings, or independent meetings, free of any connections with older branches but strongly convinced of the validity of the early Quaker approach to God and man, were springing up in cities and educational centers. A Wider Quaker Fellowship even enabled members of other churches to join with Friends in the task of bringing together man and God and man and man See Gurney, oaths, Pennington, Woolman.

See E. Russell, History of Quakerism (1942)

T.E.D.

Society of Jesus: See Jesuits

Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts (S.P.G.): Founded in 1701, the oldest missionary society of the Church of England".

E.R.H.

Society for Psychical Research (S.P.R.): See psychical research, societies for Society of true inspiration: Amarites. See communistic settlements, religious.

Socinianism: The name (derived from its most influential thinker, Faustus Socinus, 1539-1604) applied to an anti-trinitarian movement developed in Poland in the 16th and 17th centuries, and eventually in England and America transformed into Unitarianism*, in Poland erroneously called Arianism. S. originated about the middle of the 16th century among Humanists in Italy who on scriptural or rational grounds objected to the Catholic doctrines about God and Christ. Forced to flee the Inquisition* they first sought refuge in Switzerland (Gribaldi, Biandrata, Alciati, Gentile, Ochino, Laelius Socinus), where they were much influenced by Servetus's criticisms of the Trinity. Those who survived persecution here took shelter in tolerant Poland. Their views of doctrinal reform found wide acceptance in the Reformed Church of Poland (1565). They had a fellowship, whence they organized as the Minor Reformed Church of Poland (1556). They had a centre at Raków (Racovia) with a notable college and an active press, and they sent books and emissaries hence through western Europe.

Socinus coming to them in 1579 soon gained leadership, brought about agreement on vexed doctrinal and social questions, and left them a body of doctrine in the Racovian Catechism (1605) compiled by his disciples, which was widely circulated for a hundred years, and had no little influence on doctrinal thinking among Protestants.

It based its teachings strictly on Scripture, and adhered to the Apostles' rather than the Nicene and Athanasian Creeds The Socinians maintained rigid moral standards, aiming to revive the simple ways of the primitive Christian communities. They taught non-resistance, steadfastly refused to take part in war, and would not hold serfs. Though widely influential, they were the smallest of the Protestant confessions in Poland, and had perhaps not more than 200 congregations all told, a few in large towns but mostly in the rural villages of the gentry. Unlike the other sects, they welcomed on terms of Christian equality peasants and artizans no less than gentry. Their polity was similar to that of the Reformed, with synods in which the laity took large part, supervision by district Elders, and a general Superintendent over all.

The movement spread steadily for two generations despite bitter opposition and exclusion from fellowship with the other confessions; but the Catholic reaction, led by the Jesuits*, brought about steadily increasing persecution. In 1638 their centre at Raków was broken up by act of the Diet, their school abolished, their press destroyed, and their leaders proscribed. Suppression became steadily harsher until 1658 when the whole sect was banished on pain of death. Many had no choice but to conform to the Catholic Church; but a few score of noble families sacrificing all went into exile some to Transylvania, where they maintained a congregation in fellowship with the Unitarians until late in the 18th century; some into East Prussia, where the last Socinian church in history expired early in the 19th century, and a notable group to Holland, where they made no attempt at separate organization, being hospitably received among Collegiants, Mennonites and Remonstrants. These exercised considerable influence in liberalizing Dutch thought and were influenced by it in turn, but by the middle of the 18th century they had lost their separate identity and become absorbed in the general religious life of the country, though their influence was long felt in the growth of rationalistic views. Through their contact in Holland with Dissenters from England or liberal Anglicans, their views were transplanted into England, where they presently became the most important single source of Unitarianism. See atonement in Christianity.

See F. Trechsel, Protestantische Antitrinitarier vor Faustus Socin (1839-'44); F. S. Bock, Historia Antitrinitariorum (1774-'84), Otto Fock, Socinianismus (1847), E M Wilbur, History of the Socinian-Unitarian Movement (in press), Stanislas Kot, Social and Political Ideals of the Polish Brethren (in press).

E.M.W.

sociology: (Lat, socius, companion; Gr., logos, science) The generic and comparative study of all the interactions and interrelationships which exist among human beings, or, as C. A. Ellwood expresses it, "The science of the origin, development, structure, and functioning of social groups." The word was first used by Auguste Comte* in 1838 to designate a division of his Cours de philosophie positive, and Comte is generally acknowledged as the founder of the science. But sociology did not originate with Comte as an offspring without a genealogy. If all theories which deal with the general nature of human association and the reciprocal relationships of men to one another are sociological, then sociology is implicit in the folklore* of primitive peoples, and reached a high development in Plato (427-347 B.C.) and Aristotle (384-322 B.C.), which has not again approached until the Summa Theologiae of Thomas Aquinas (1225?-1275). But science is distinguished by its method rather than by its content, and it was Comte who prepared the way for a new conception of social phenomena and a new method of treating them He was the first to combine 1) a clear distinction between society and its specifically delimited political and economic forms as an independent focus of theoretical interest with 2) an observational method competent to deal with social relationships in their completeness and 3) relatively free from a priori theological, metaphysical, and normative limitations But it was the publication of Herbert Spencer's* Study of Sociology in 1873 which established the subject in general favor, and prepared the ground for the popular reception accorded in the next fifteen years to four great attempts at a systematic exposition of the field, in Spencer's Descriptive Sociology (1874-81) and Principles of Sociology (1877-86), Albert Schäffle's Bau und Leben des socialen Korpers (1875-78), Lester F. Ward's Dynamic Sociology (1883) and Guillaume de Greef's Introduction à la Sociologie (1886-89).

During this formative period the field of sociology was defined and clarified, first, as a general science of social relationships studying the characteristics common to all social phenomena as distinguished from the special social sciences, economics, political science, education, jurisprudence, etc., which treat of the internal structure and specific functions of specialized social groups and processes, industry, the state, the school, law, etc. Economics, for example, treats of cooperation and competition in the wealth-producing, distributing, and consuming activities, while sociology studies cooperation and competition as general processes of interaction among human beings in all group relationships Political science is interested in social control as exercised by the state, while sociology considers the control function as it operates in all social behavior. Both economics and political science study industry and the state as specialized institutions, while sociology studies the basic characteristics of social institutions as such. Second, sociology emerged before specialized social sciences dealing with many social institutions and group relationships, like the family, the church, and recreation, had developed. Sociology has investigated these intensively in order to complete its detailed knowledge of many types of specialized social phenomena. Third, since social phenomena are obviously conditioned by the kind of biological organisms human beings are, and the kind of geographical environment they have, sociology has also found it necessary to study the relationships and correlations between the social and such non-social phenomena as the biological, the geographical and the individual-psychological.

During the past half century, sociologists have been concerned less with comprehensive systems of social theory like those of Comte and Spencer and more with detailed research upon the types of problems indicated above. This has resulted in a number of different schools of sociology, the geographical, the biological, the psychological, the economic and other variants, owing to the undue emphasis upon one or another of the factors which constitute or affect society as a complex whole. The most fundamental cleavage, however, is the methodological one, which gives rise to two schools, the "natural science" and the "autonomous," based on a difference of view as to the nature of social facts and the proper methods of their scientific study. The former school, taking its cue from the physical sciences, holds that social facts are facts of external observation. Consequently, sociology is a science of overt behavior, and the inner life of thought and feeling, if it is considered at all, is treated as inferences drawn from the data of external observation, precisely as are the physicist's inferences as to the internal structure of the atom. From this standpoint, all scientific knowledge is quantitative knowledge, the only valid scientific problems are those which admit of quantification, and the only valid research techniques are those of counting and measuring, together with the mathematical analysis of the values so ascertained. The opposing school, on the other hand, insists that social facts possess a dual character. They must be understood, not only as observed data, but also as felt experiences. The personal and dramatic qualities which social relationships have for those who participate in them are as essential to their scientific description and interpretation as are their external manifestations in overt behavior. Since all social facts involve these subjective aspects which have no analogues in the subject matter of the sciences of external nature, it must become an autonomous science in the sense that it is not limited by the methodological assumptions of those sciences in the formulation of its problems and the development of its research techniques. It must make whatever assumptions, formulate whatever postulates, develop whatever conceptual systems, and adopt whatever research techniques, its data may require. The sociologist may and should learn much from his studies in the methodology of the physical and biological sciences, he may and should adapt their methods of quantification and experiment wherever they are applicable, but he must not be limited by them In proportion as his data are different, he must be left free to adopt a different methodology, leaving to philosophy the task of criticism and synthesis of the methods and the results of all the sciences into an organic unity of all knowledge. See anthropology.

C A Ellwood, Methods in Sociology (1933); L L Bernard, The Fields and Methods of Sociology (1934), P. A. Sorokin, Socio-cultural Causality, Space, and Time (1943).   H.E J.

sociology of religion, the: The sociology of religion involves two aspects. From the sociological side it refers to the group life of man as manifested in the interactions and relationships that occur in human society, from the standpoint of religion it refers to man's beliefs in a deity or deities superior to men and upon whom they are considered to be dependent, and to the behavior that ensues from such beliefs.

Thus, the sociology of religion is definable as a study of the processes and results of human association as affecting, and affected by, man's religious beliefs.

Such a definition in itself serves to account in large measure for the numerous and widely divergent religions that exist in the world, for—like industrial, political, or other cultural phenomena—the content and manner of any faith will reflect the life and times and environment of a society and its reaction to them, and of its members to each other. Thus, sociology within this field explains that particular religions will be backward or advanced according to the corresponding cultural level of the people local and primitive deities will be believed in where cultures are local or primitive, universal and intelligent deities will be believed in by those who have a world-wide and highly educated outlook. A warlike people will have warlike gods, whereas peace-loving and humanitarian civilizations will conceive of their's in terms of benevolence, and concerned with human well-being. The old-time divinities of storm-driven Scandinavia were like their own thunder and lightning; whereas acceptance of the philosophy of ancient Greece led to the conception by the early Church of a single triune Being which combined the characteristics of the mystic Logos with those of a heavenly Father, and an earthly Son.

In similar fashion the sociological approach makes clear that specific doctrines are an outgrowth of the settings in which they originate. Thus, a long-subject people like the ancient Hebrews, centered their faith about a Messiah* who would bring temporal deliverance on earth; and the early Christians, persecuted for their beliefs, were inspired by the idea of an escape from earth to heavenly mansions. Ancient pastoral folk thought of Elysian Fields after death, whereas the American Indian looked forward to happy hunting grounds. Nor does it stop there, for sociology makes clear how, as a result of the cultural lag that frequently accompanies tradition, beliefs which originated in an earlier day tend to persist even when out of harmony with the findings of modern research.

On the other hand, the sociology of religion undertakes to account for the remarkable effects of religious beliefs on human relations past and present: the centuries-long conflict between church and state, the earnest effort to work toward a "Christian" society, the impact of various faiths in creating, maintaining, or modifying social institutions (family, school, government, and others), all stand forth as cause-and-effect sociological sequences, emerging from the interaction of men with men, as conditioned by environment.

Just as there is only one Chemistry, the identical principles of which are applied to separate fields, (e.g., bio-chemistry, chemistry of agriculture), so there is only one sociology, variously applied (e g, sociology of art, of education, of religion). Occasionally in the last-named it is confused with a statement of religious teachings. This is an error to be guarded against, for sociology, like any other science, deals with principles, based upon adequate data, logically interpreted, and as science, by definition it can deal only with factually-based evidence and not with value judgments nor metaphysics per se. Its principles, however, may become guides to the validity of ideals which religion teaches

Wm Cecil Dampier, A History of Science, and its Relations with Philosophy and Religion (1943); C A Ellwood, The Reconstruction of Religion (1922), Earle Edward Eubank, "Fields and Problems of the Sociology of Religion," chap 12 of Fields and Methods of Sociology (1934), L L Bernard, editor, C Luther Fry, "Changes in Religious Organizations," chap. 20 of Recent Social Trends (1933), vol II, Pres Hoover's Research Committee Report. W. F Ogburn & H. W Odum, Directors, James M Hastings, Encyclopedia of Religion and Ethics, E W. Hopkins, Origin and Evolution of Religion (1923); Wm James, Varieties of Religious Experience (1902), Arthur L Swift, New Frontiers of Religion (1938); J A. Thomson, What is Man? (1924).   E.E.E

Socrates: (c 380-444) Historian of the early church. Advocate in Constantinople. His history covers period c. 305-439, dealing chiefly with the theological controversies. Is not a critical history in the modern sense but is of interest and value for description of contemporary scene.

            K.H.C.

Socrates: Greek thinker (469-399 B.C.), the son of an Athenian stone-cutter and a mid-wife. Much of his life was spent in the discussion of lofty problems of philosophical and religious import. As recorded by Xenophon and Plato*, these discussions were marked by keen wit and high ideals. Socrates was convinced that he was negatively guided in his pursuit of wisdom by a familiar spirit (daemon). (See daimon.) The story of his execution at the direction of the Athenian court (Plato, Apology, Crito and Phaedo; Xenophon, Memorabilia) is a touching account of the last hours of a great man. Though the Socratic method* is probably his greatest contribution, certain positive views are traditionally attributed to him. The contention that "virtue is knowledge" (Protagoras and Meno of Plato) indicates his high regard for practical wisdom. Socrates was not wanting in respect for the State gods of Athens but there is evidence that he placed a Supreme God on a different level from that of the minor divinities and that he was a believer in a form of personal immortality*. Possibly Plato's account of piety (Euthyphro, 5 E) stems from Socrates. In Platonism, Cynicism and Stoicism, Cyrenaicism and Epicureanism, and among some Renaiscence* moralists (Erasmus*), the influence of Socratic ethics is important.

E. Zeller, Socrates and the Socratic Schools, trans. by Reichel (London, 1885).   V.J.B.

Socratic method: The style of discussion used by Socrates* in his frequent talks with the Sophists* and the young men of Athens. The significant characteristics of this method are· 1) a profession of ignorance on the part of the questioner (learned ignorance), 2) the pointed use of series of questions leading to the discovery of a universal definition, 3) the contention that the rôle of the teacher is not to confer knowledge but to draw it from the learner (mid-wife analogy), 4) the admission of the superior wisdom of others leading to a demonstration of their basic ignorance (Socratic Irony). Good examples of the use of this method are found in Plato's* Meno and Protagoras.   V J.B.

sodalities: Pious unions of the faithful erected for the carrying on of some particular work of piety or charity. They differ from other pious unions in that they constitute an organic body or moral person, and from confraternities* which are devoted chiefly to public worship. The most important pious organization called a sodality in the United States is the Sodality of the Blessed Virgin Mary, founded in 1563 and erected into an archsodality in 1584. The confraternities of the Holy Rosary and of the Scapular of Our Lady of Mt. Carmel, which are not ordinarily called sodalities in the United States, also have large memberships in this country. See Catholic Societies   T T.M.

Söderblom, Lars Olof Jonathan (Nathan): (1866-1931) Son of a pastor, Söderblom studied theology at Upsala, ordained 1893 Pastor of the Swedish church at Paris, 1894. Interested in the social aspects of the church, also studied at Sorbonne in the field of history of religions, especially attracted to Auguste Sabatier*. Doctor of theology at Sorbonne, 1901, and called to professorship at Upsala, Söderblom exerted a tremendous influence on the younger student generation Himself a brilliant and gifted personality with interest in music, art, literature, he advocated freedom of research in the Church, but also with deep respect for tradition he labored on winning all classes for the church, whose spiritual home the Church should be, as spiritual power more than organization. Following a brief professorship at Leipzig, 1912-14, Söderblom became archbishop in 1914. Throughout the war he sought to maintain fellowship between churches of various warring countries, and afterwards became a leader in the ecumenical movement, arranging the Stockholm Conference of 1925, and heading the Life and Work movement, though also active in Faith and Order. His leadership and genius for friendship made Sweden a center of interchurch interest. In the field of scholarship his main contributions lay in studies in Mazdaism*, La vie future d'apres le mazdeisme (1901), in philosophy of religion, Uppenbarelsereligion (1903), Das Werden des Gottesglauben (1913), The Living God (Gifford Lectures, 1930), and in Luther studies, Humor och melancholi (1917). His devotional writings and sermons were widely read, and his leadership at home and abroad made him one of Protestantism's outstanding figures of the century.   C.J.B.

Sohm, Rudolf: (1841-1917) German jurist and canonist. Born in Rostock, Mecklemburg. In 1866 he became privatdozent at Goettingen, from 1872-1887 he was professor at Strasburg, and from 1887-1917 at Leipzig. His main fields of interest were History of Germanic Law and History of Ecclesiastical Law. He combined the historical and systematic approach with great logical power, and by his ingenuous interpretation of its historical development laid the foundation for modern Protestant church law in Germany. He held that any legal order was incompatible with the nature of the Gospel, and thus regarded the coming into existence of the church of the second century as the most fatal deviation from the original ideas of Jesus. His views had a considerable influence upon Harnack's* interpretation of the ancient church. Active Lutheran, friend, and for some time collaborator of Fr Naumann.

Principal works.
Kirchenrecht, vol I (1892), vol II (posthumous, 1922), Wesen und Ursprung des Katholizismus (1909, 3rd ed, 1912), Die altdeutsche Reichs-und Gerichtsverfassung (1871). See also Otto Barion, Rud Sohm und die Grundlegung des Kirchenrechts (1931)   O.A.P

Sol Invictus: Name applied by the Romans to a sun-god or divinity imported from the Near East to Rome, along with other foreign gods, in the years following disasters to Romans during the Second Punic War, identified with Mithras, a high divinity derived from religion of the Persians, as Mithras, Sol Invictus had a festival which led to the Christmas celebration of the Christians, on December 25, a syncretic god of the Roman imperial state cult. For a time in the late Roman Empire certain equations were drawn between Sol Invictus (Mithras) high divinity in relation with Mazda*, and Christ, high divinity in relation with God (Zeus*). See mystery religions.
                                                  F.L.P.

sola gratia: See grace.

Solemn League and Covenant: See League and Covenant, the Solemn solemn mass: See mass.

solifidianism: (Lat, solus, alone, fides, faith) A term applied, sometimes with disparagement, to the doctrine of justification by faith* alone, apart from good works. See Romans 3:28.
                                                  H.W.J.

solipsism: See epistemology.

Sollen und Sein: "What ought to be and what is", a contrast referring to the cardinal opposition in the philosophy of Kant* between the realm of moral obligations and that of natural existence.
                                                  R.K.

Solomon: Greatest king of Hebrew Monarchy, ruling 977-937 B C, organized elaborate government, introduced horses, chariots, and other military innovations, with help of Phoenician* artisans built palace, temple, Millo, store and chariot cities, and Red Sea fleet which made three-year trips to S. Arabia, W. Africa, and possibly India, mined in Sinai and constructed copper refinery on Gulf of Akabah; transformed small country into world empire by marriage alliances; poet, musician, and naturalist After his death this empire collapsed as the ten tribes broke away to escape work conscription, regimentation, and taxation for the vast public works. See I Kings 1-12 See altar, Chemosh, Song of Solomon, Wisdom literature.   R.E W.

Solomon, Odes of: A curious pseudonymous collection of 42 hymns, probably written in Greek in N Syria between 75 and 150 A.D.; although ascribed to Solomon, they are in no way connected with him, perhaps a collection of baptismal hymns used for initiations into one of the mystery cults, a Christian work but containing many non-Christian elements, especially Gnostic, Jewish, and Oriental, the hymns are highly poetic and reflect deep spiritual experience, great devotion, and joyousness in religion; remarkable recent addition to early Christian literature.
J R. Harris The Odes and Psalms of Solomon (1909 and 1911)   R.E.W.

Solomon, the Psalms of: See Psalms of Solomon, the Solomon, Song of: See Song of Solomon.

Solomon, the Wisdom of: See Wisdom of Solomon, the.

Soma: Originally, probably a plant from which the soma juice, the favorite libation to the Vedic gods was extracted. Soma becomes also one of the principal gods of Vedic Hinduism* to whom the entire ninth book of the Rig-Veda* is dedicated. See Aryan religion.   C.S.B.

somatology: See anthropology.

Son of God: Hebrew religion was strictly monotheistic, and the term "Son of God", as found in the O.T, must not be understood in any literal sense. It has its origin in the Semitic idiom which expresses any intimate relation as one of sonship. As royal ministers are sons of the king, so the angels are sons of God, and this name is likewise given to judges and sovereigns, ruling in God's name. Israel as God's people, is personified as his son. The name is nowhere applied definitely to the Messiah*, except in certain passages in the Psalms, where the interpretation is doubtful. In apocalyptic literature the name is used with a Messianic reference in only one or two instances. The N.T. writers repeatedly describe Jesus, in his Messianic character, as Son of God. Their idea is still, fundamentally, the Semitic one of close relation, but it merges in the further idea that Christ in some way participates in the divine nature. The author of Hebrews (1.5ff.) thinks of him as an angel, whom God had exalted above all others, investing him with his own majesty and calling him by the name of Son. The Nativity stories in Matthew and Luke might seem to suggest a literal sonship, but the thought is rather that Christ had entered the world like Adam by an immediate divine creation Paul assumes that God himself is manifested in Christ, and this is affirmed still more explicitly by the Fourth Evangelist, who sees in Christ the incarnation of the Logos* which had dwelt from all eternity within the being of God. This advance on the older conception of Messianic Sonship was due not so much to a speculative as to a religious need If Christ were to bring men into fellowship with God he must be intrinsically divine, not merely a heavenly being, however exalted. The later Christology* takes its rise from the Logos conception of Sonship, as set forth in the Fourth Gospel It was soon recognized that in his metaphysical account of the nature of Christ the evangelist had left many vital questions unanswered Did the Logos share in all the attributes of God? Was he originated by God, or co-eternal with him? Did Christ have two personalities, a human and a divine, and if so, what was the relation between them? The discussion of such questions occupied the Greek theologians throughout the second and third centuries and came to a head in the Arian controversy, which ostensibly was settled by the Nicene creed At this point, however, it began again under new forms, and has never come to any real conclusion. No metaphysical definition of the nature of Christ will ever be possible. This is realized by the Fourth Evangelist himself, who falls back in the end on ethical categories. The Father loves the Son. Christ is perfectly at one with the will of God and is thereby his Son. See Son of man

C. A. Briggs, The Messiah of the Gospels (1897), H. J Holtzmann, N. T. Theologie (1897).   E.F.S.

Son of man: A title ascribed to Jesus in the gospels and signifying his destined role in the conduct of the Final Judgment*. Popularly the phrase is used as an equivalent of Messiah*, a practice to be deplored since their origin and connotations are totally distinct. The confusion may well be seen as a consequence of the developing Christology*, in the course of which both titles were ascribed to Jesus, thus in seeming conformity to the principle of good mathematics, "things equal to the same thing are equal to each other."
The use of the phrase as the designation of the coming final judge is probably due to Dan. 7.3. In the apocalyptic* imagery of this book the heathen nations are represented pictorially by awesome beasts; in contrast to them stands "one like unto a son of man," who represents Israel, the kingdom of the Most High. The phrase son of man (Aram. bar nasha: Heb. ben adam) properly means simply man (Lat. homo; Gr anthropos). Gradually the colorless phrase seems to have become the technical designation in apocalyptic circles of the supernatural figure destined to preside over the Final Judgment.
That Jesus made use of this phrase in this technical sense is highly probable, although it has been frequently denied. That he meant thereby to designate himself, while popularly held, is far less certain. Before the gospels were written his followers had come to believe that when he had referred to the advent of the son of man he had been speaking obliquely of himself. Not infrequently the later gospels (Matt. and Luke), sharing this view, substitute the phrase son of man for Mk's original "I" (Matt. 16.13, cf. Mk. 8 27). In at least two passages (Mk. 2.10 f., 2 27 f) the phrase "son of man" is almost certainly to be seen as a mistranslation of the Aramaic and should be rendered "man."

The popular notion that "son of man" indicates Jesus' humanity as "son of God" does his divinity is quite indefensible. The term, when used as a title, as already indicated, properly means a supernatural figure charged with the superlatively great task of destroying evil and acting as a truly cosmic figure.

F. Jackson and K. Lake, The Beginnings of Christianity (1920), vol I, M. S. Enslin, Christian Beginnings (1938).   M.S.E.

Song of Solomon: This book became canonical owing to the suppositions that it was by Solomon* and that it sang of the love of God for His people Israel in accordance with Hosea's* symbolism. Both suppositions were false. It sings of the love of man and woman in a manner illustrated by numerous Oriental songs, ancient (notably Egyptian parallels—recently much new material!—) and modern (Palestinian-Arab). The custom of treating bride and groom as king and queen at Arab marriage festivities in certain localities has been invoked to explain the allusions to Solomon and Shulamith (supposedly the Shunammite of I Kings 1-2, cf. Hebrew "Shunem," today "Solem") On the other hand the "brother and sister" terminology for the lovers is illuminated by the Egyptian love songs. Whether the Song is a collection of separate poems or forms a poetic cycle accompanying some sort of dramatic action is controversial. While the book may have a nucleus of early material (cf. allusion to Israelite capital Tirza, I Kings 16:23), other indications (loan words) suggest origin in the late Persian or early Greek period.

R H. Pfeiffer, Introduction to the Old Testament (1941), J A Bewer, Literature of the Old Testament (rev ed, 1933)   E.G K.

Song of the Three Children: See Three Children, Song of the.

soothsaying: Action or profession of one who is accepted as competent to foretell events, interpretation of dreams, visions, omens, portents by certain priests assumed to be under the immediate influence of the gods so as to possess power to predict events or perform other unusual feats. In Babylonia, soothsaying was closely related to astrology, and hepatoscopy* which dealt much with externals and had fixed rules.

Among the Ancient Arabs· Persons with familiar spirits possess powers of prediction through the revelation from the spirit. Among the Hebrews: the nabi is a type of soothsaying. The Nabi ('Speaker') is not a poet, nor philosopher, nor priest, nor judge, but the mouthpiece, herald or messenger of the deity or spirit; the one who speaks for another, the interpreter of the oracles. The nabi type of soothsaying, unlike that of ancient Babylonia, was less concerned with the external, and with set rules, it developed into profound moral and social attitudes and insights which under the great prophets of Israel, deeply affected the outlook and conduct of a whole people. See divination   F.L.P.

Sophists: Popular teachers of philosophy and rhetoric, the Chautauqua lecturers of their day, who travelled about the country attempting to spread culture and dialectical skill and accepting pay from their pupils. They did not hold to a common body of doctrine Some, like Prodicus and Protagoras, were defenders of sound traditional morality. Some, like the Thrasymachus of Rep. I, were ruthlessly selfish and immoral. Some, like Gorgias, avowed complete skepticism. The most famous formula of Protagoras, "Man is the measure of all things," has been taken by some (perhaps unfairly) to express a complete relativism. Plato* represents Socrates* as attacking the Sophists. See Socratic method.   J.E.N.

Sorley, William Ritchie: (1885-1935) Knighbridge Prof. of Moral Philosophy at Cambridge, philosophical historian, critic of naturalistic ethics, and strong exponent of the moral argument for God Insisting that true philosophical synopsis must give an adequate account of the irreducible "ought" in seeking the clue to existence, Sorley finds objectively valid values revealed in human moral experience The coherent interpretation of these in relation to natural existence, and the human realization of values, leads reasonably to a personal God in whom these values have their being as ends of existence. See conservation of value; empirical theology.

A History of English Philosophy (1920), Moral Values and the Idea of God (3rd ed., 1930).

                                        P.A.B.

sortes: "Lots*," or devices for appeal to chance in divination*. In a special sense books laid open to disclose an oracle where the eye alighted. The sortes virgilianae had their counterpart in sortes apostolorum and sortes sanctorum which contained scriptural materials. Their use was frequently condemned in the Middle Ages. J.T.M.

soteriology: (Gr. soteria, deliverance; logy) A term of 19th Cent. origin, used particularly in Protestant writing, to designate the traditional branch of Christian theology devoted to the doctrine of salvation*. At first the distinction was frequently made between objective soteriology (the redemptive work of Christ as once-and-for-all accomplished) and subjective soteriology (the administration of that redemption by the Holy Spirit*). The term is now used more commonly to designate simply the doctrine of the saving work of Christ as distinguished from the doctrine of his person (Christology*). See mass, Roman Catholic.   E.T.R.

Soto, Domingo de: (1494-1560) Representative of the Dominican order at the Council of Trent* and adviser to Charles V on colonial policy, he developed both the essential principles of morality on which policy towards the natives should be based and a doctrine of international relations not unlike that of Vittoria*.

J W. Allen, A History of Political Thought in the Sixteenth Century (London, 1928).   H.H.

soul: The primitive notion of the soul was that of an unsubstantial human image or shadow held to be the cause of life and possessing an independent personal consciousness and volition, manifesting power over man's existence, appearing as a phantasm in his conscious and semi-conscious experience and capable of independent flights and infusions into both animate and inanimate nature. Considerations which, it is believed, played into the early conception of the ghost-soul are. extraordinary experiences such as dreams, visions, memory-images, the contrast of living bodies as over against the dead, the experienced power of will, the tendency to conceive of certain qualities of life (necessary attributes of successful adaptation) in terms of actual entities or quasi-substances, the mystery of existence, and the like. Great variations of form attend the primitive notions the soul is the shadow, the breath, the permeating power, the flowing blood, the hovering presence of the departed in the grave or in natural phenomena and in the locus of some far-distant scene.

The tendency to separate the soul from the body is not surprising in view of the following factors: language tends to substantialize and even personify adjectival qualities, man naturally tends to deplore the transitory and seek something permanent and stable, the prominence of certain qualities above others, the tendency to focus attention upon some whole as distinguished from its changing characteristics. Thus the concept of soul-as-substance has played a normal, natural and almost major rôle in the development of the notion

The primitive Hebrew conception follows the pattern of the primitive ghost-soul. The earlier view as found in the O.T. suggests the soul to be the seat of feeling and desire and secondarily that of intelligence. At death, the soul leaves the body, lingering at the place of burial, visiting familiar scenes and then (the development of later thought) travelling on to the gloomy and empty existence of Sheol*, the dark and desolate underworld. (Is. 14·9-17) The view that man consists of soul and body is known as dichotomy. The later view in the O.T. distinguishes the spirit from the soul and (with body) man thus becomes a trichotomy. The spirit survives; the soul becomes the vital principle making for mental life, perishing with the body. Spirit returns to Spirit and personal existence is submerged. The two views became rivals; but the trichotomous view failed to win general popularity.

The Platonic-Aristotelian tradition exerted an enormous influence in the history of Western thought. Particularly evident is this in the doctrine of the soul.

Plato's* doctrine of the soul has rootage in a long history. the ghost-soul in the pre-Homeric period, the soul in Olympian religion (the Homeric epic) was conceived to be a shadowy image inhabiting the body and departing by way of the mouth or open wound of the dying, descending into Hades devoid of powers, the soul in the mystery-religions of the 7th and 6th centuries B C took on the leading rôle in schemes of personal redemption and mystic union with the gods. Prominent among the religious cults was the Orphic (6th century B.C) which set forth a theology and soteriology teaching the doctrine of its distinct nature as over against the body and giving to Plato the characteristic ideas of pre-existence, the imprisonment in the body and deliverance. Purification rites were also set forth by the Pythagoreans* and other pre-Platonic philosophers. For Plato the soul is intelligence, immortal, self-moving, the divine in man which apprehends eternal truth and is independent of the fluctuations of the senses. By achieving the purest thoughts the soul truly comes to its own for its homeland lies in the pure world of ideal patterns.

For Aristotle* the soul is a vital principle pervading the world of life and mind. All material things are besouled. It is the formal, the efficient and the final cause. The world is not a split dichotomy of soul and body, the two intermingle. This is his characteristic doctrine. The soul cannot, he thought, be separated from the body, and yet, he added, there may be some parts thereof which are separable ! Only creative reason alone, this class of soul, highest of functions, is capable of existing as the eternal from the perishable. Whether this is personal is, of course, open to question.

It is well-known that the religious-philosophical cults in the Graeco-Roman world which was the immediate background and foreground of early Christianity gave more emphasis to the practical than to the theoretical interests. Stoicism* had taught the doctrine of the logos*, the world-reason, the soul being an offshoot of fine material substance like warm air. The Stoics introduced the word pneuma, a kind of pervasive spirit or principle possessing a meaning more than soul (psyche). A trichotomy was thus re-introduced into the stream of thought Convergence of the Hebrew and Greek currents of ideas began to crystalize in the third century B.C. particularly among the Jews of Alexandria in Egypt Philo, a contemporary of Jesus, a liberal theologian and the forerunner of the Platonic mystic Plotinus* (204-269) combined Platonism, Stoicism and the Pentateuch adopting the view of pre-existence of souls and holding to the logos as the intermediary between a transcendent God and an alien world, speaking of the sojourn in human flesh as an unfortunate descent of the soul. He took over the Stoic pneuma and identified it with the breath of the Hebrew God and the reason of Plato and of Aristotle in a kind of trichotomous doctrine. The author of the Fourth Gospel with boldness identified Jesus as this intermediary logos, as is well known.

The N T. nowhere gives a clear statement of theoretical human psychology. Passages in the Pauline writings teach a dichotomy; others a trichotomy (e.g., I. Thess. 5 23. Cf. also Hebrews 4 12). In the Gospels psyche and pneuma are used synonymously, the former emphasizing the idea of individual personality. As to its origin, the soul appears as a concreation with the body. "The present body", writes F. C. Porter (work cited below), "which does not rise, Paul calls not physical or material but psychical, a body fitted for the human soul. Soul, psyche, the word of honour in Plato's hope, is lowered in Paul, and made inseparable from the physical, to which in Plato it is absolutely contrasted, and the word spirit, pneuma, which to the Greeks was more material and less personal than psyche, and contained less promise and potency of immortality for man, is exalted and becomes the essential nature of the risen Christ and so of risen Christians, it becomes also . . . the expression for that present experience of the indwelling Christ. . . . It would seem that to Paul the word "body" means individual personality, and is essential in his thought to the distinction and the permanence of the separate self."

Early Christian thought continued to mix Hebraic and Greek ideas of the soul in various forms and degrees. (Cf. the synthetic philosophical theology of Clement of Alexandria and the systematic theology of Origen who wedded tradition and speculation into a vast structure.) Influenced by Neo-Platonism* (which had taught the attributeless One issuing in a *Nous*ced* or Pure Intelligence which, in turn, produces a World-Soul from which, in turn, emanates individual immaterial souls whose essence is the spark of Divinity and whose purification consists in contemplation upon divine origins), St. Augustine* set the standards for later Christian orthodoxy when he taught the divine origin and unique character of the human soul and its immortal destiny and its created beginning. St. Augustine became overshadowed by Aquinas* in later Catholic thought and the Platonic and Neo-Platonic conceptions gave way to the Aristotelian. Aquinas held to 'Aristotle's naturalism, viz., that the soul is the form of the body; but he rejected the doctrine of Aristotle which held that the active reason is separable. For Aquinas, the soul was a whole, a unity. The soul is an immaterial substance (Platonism) but intimately connected with nature and is the form of the body (Aristotelianism). The world, however, is good because it is God's world created by him and man's destiny is not that of a withdrawal from the world (Neo-Platonism) but the fulfillment of his function in the world. There is for Aquinas a hierarchy of souls, reaching from the lowest (those souls bound up with matter without the capacity to dominate), passing through degrees (plants, animals) and reaching the higher stages in the intellect of man. This higher quality assures its superiority and independence and its character of separability and immortality. The hierarchy continues in forms higher than man, beyond angels to the form of forms, God. Man's soul has qualities in common with the lower forms although it is higher; but his soul is lower as regards the world of spirits. Man's soul does not pre-exist. His soul has both a natural and supernatural setting. To explain its high possibilities, it becomes necessary to introduce the concept of special creation. The ultimate state for man is the re-union of body and soul (resurrection*).

In spite of the influence in Catholic thought of the Aristotelian naturalism (the close union of soul and body) the soul came to be regarded more and more as a separate entity. Christianity became dramatized by the church as a redemptive religion in which the soul sought release from mundane connections and its salvation out of the world sought. Stress upon other-worldness and the promise of a haven of release and rest marked the soul as wholly unique and its nurture as the paramount end of life's adventure. Soul, again, becomes a substance sui generis. In Catholicism there remains the alternating stress upon the Aristotelian and Platonic emphases, although Aquinas remains the norm for its theology.

In modern thought it was Descartes* who proclaimed the philosophical divorce between soul and body, each, henceforth, to go, in thought, its way as a separate entity although having strange commerce with each other during the brief span of life. Both Catholic and Protestant orthodox circles have found the Platonic conception to their liking as witness the hymns, poetry and the ritualistic dramatizations of the soul's journey and destiny Modern psychological thought, however, finds the Aristotelian naturalism much more compatible with the scientific approach in the current emphasis upon man as a psychophysical organism in a world which calls for adaptation Man is not a trichotomous nor a dichotomous being but a unitary organism whose destiny beyond this world, it is held, remains an open question. Modern psychology has, for the most part, lost the soul and substituted terms less encumbered by traditional theologies and metaphysics. The soul now becomes the self or the person or one's spirit or the id or the psycho-physical or a mere SR (stimulus-response), depending upon the particular brand of psychological theory. See death and burial practices, eschatology; immortality, pre-existence, primitive religion, spirits, transmigration. See also psychology, schools of

For a survey of the development of ancient and medieval ideas on the soul see V Ferm, First Chapters in Religious Philosophy (1937), chap VIII. For a survey of "Recent Theories of Soul-Mind" see the same author's First Adventures in Philosophy (1936), chap. XVIII Consult E B. Tylor, Primitive Culture (3rd ed, 1889), vol. I, Wm. McDougall, Body and Mind (5th ed, 1920); F. C. Porter, "Paul's Belief in After Death" in E H. Sneath, ed, Religion and the Future Life (1922), art. "Soul" in A Dictionary of Christ and the Gospels (1917), ed by J Hastings, C W. Morris, Six Theories of Mind (1932); G S. Brett, A History of Psychology, Ancient and Patristic (1912), P Coffey, Ontology, or the Theory of Being (1929).

v.F.

Southworth Lectureship on Congregationalism, The: Established in 1866 by Edward Southworth of West Springfield and Wells Southworth of New Haven, Conn., at Andover Newton Theological School, Newton Centre, Mass. This lectureship (capital sum, $7,000) was founded "to interpret the Congregational polity in its relation to the Christian Church." Lectures are presented at irregular intervals. Lecturers have included the Rev. Newman Smyth, Dr. H. J. Cadbury and Prof. R. M. Jones.

(Data from the Office of the President of the Theological School.)   V F.

Sower, Christopher: (1693-1758) American printer and publisher born near Marburg, Germany, educated at Halle and Marburg universities, migrated to Pennsylvania in 1724 with his wife and only son Christopher (1721-1784). After a period of farming and medical practice, he established a press in Germantown where in 1743 he produced the first German Bible printed in America. His son, who became an elder or bishop of the Dunkers*, joined him in the business. They published almanacs, school books, a newspaper, hymn books, Bible lesson cards, later editions of the Bible, and other incidental works. During the Revolution the second Sower was persecuted as a pacifist and much of his business was ended The name has, however, been connected with Philadelphia publishing ever since.
W M.B.

Sozomen: (c. 400-443) Church historian. Native of Palestine. Advocate in Constantinople His history deals with period c. 323-439 and is largely based on work of his contemporary Socrates*, but is of less value. Good use is also made of other sources Monasticism* is given large place.   K H.C.

Spangenberg, August Gottlieb: (1704-1792) Bishop of the Moravian Church, studied at Jena and lectured there on philosophical subjects. After brief service as adjunct of the theological faculty at Halle, he joined the Moravian Church*, 1733. He is known as capable organizer of Moravian enterprises in England and the West Indies, his best work as administrator was achieved in Pennsylvania and North Carolina. From 1762 onward he participated in framing the new constitution of the Church of whose governing Board he was chief member. Among his literary works are Idea Fidei Fratrum (1782) a compendium of Christian faith of the Moravians, and *Leben des Herrn Nicolaus Ludwig Grafen und Herrn von Zinzendorf (1775). Spangenberg was also a writer of hymns.

J Risler, Leben August Gottlieb Spangenberg's (Barby, 1794) , G. Reichel, August Gottlieb Spangenberg (Tuebingen, 1906).   W.N.S.

speaking in unknown tongues: See charismata; pentecostal sects; tongues, gift of.

Spegel, Haquin: (1645-1714) Bishop in Skara, 1685, in Linköping, 1691, and archbishop of Upsala, 1711. One of Sweden's greatest ecclesiastical leaders, Spegel was influential in the codification of the Church Law, 1686, especially in its provisions for education, in the new Catechism of 1689, and the revision of the Bible translation. He was one of Sweden's foremost hymn-writers, assisting Jesper Swedberg* in the new hymn-book of 1695, published the first church-history in Sweden (1707-08), and contributed to Swedish philology and literature through his God's Work and Rest, an epic, biblical poem, and his Glossarium Sveogothicum.   C.J B.

spell: Spoken words, written words, or symbols used for the purpose of working changes in the nature of behavior of objects, an attraction or a fascination exercised by a person or place or thing, upon other persons, etc ; a trait that is common to the religious customs and practices of all peoples. See death and burial practices, magic, om, primitive religion   F.L.P.

Spencer, Herbert: (1820-1903) English philosopher. Trained in engineering; one of the first to make bold use of the idea of evolution, applying it to all the fields of inquiry. He enjoyed a great vogue, but his ideas were comprehensive rather than exact· his claim to deduce evolution from the conservation of energy is a curiosity of intellectual history. Proclaiming Mansell's* doctrine of the inconceivability of God's nature, he tried to reconcile science and religion in the one proposition that the ultimate is unknowable. Evolution was from simple homogeneity to complex heterogeneity. Spencer in part anticipated, in part echoed, Darwin*. See sociology.

H Spencer, System of Synthetic Philosophy (First Principles of Biology, Psychology, Sociology, Ethics) (1862-92) , On Moral and Physical Education (1861) ; etc   C.H.

Spener, Philipp Jakob: (1635-1705) German Lutheran theologian and "father of Pietism".* A scholar of broad learning and a principal founder of the University of Halle (1694), Spener was pre-eminently a practical churchman, holding influential pastoral positions at Frankfurt-am-Main, Dresden, and Berlin. Influenced by devotional reading of the Scriptures and the writings of Luther, Arndt, Baxter, and Grossgebauer, as well as by emphasis on practical religion acquired through theological study at Strassburg and Geneva, Spener began to hold informal religious meetings (collegia pietatis) in his home to counteract the sterile intellectualism of the prevailing orthodoxy. The pietistic movement thus engendered received its manifesto in Spener's most influential work, Pia Desideria or Earnest Desires for a Reform of the Evangelical Church (1675). His six "desideria" were: Bible study in informal groups, the restoration of the spiritual priesthood of all believers; practical Christianity in daily life; love instead of argument in dealing with dissenters and unbelievers; reform of theological education in the direction of vital personal religion; deeper spirituality in preaching, with a return to apostolic simplicity and sincerity. Although he drew abuse from the orthodox theologians, Spener cannot be held personally responsible for the ascetic and separatistic tendencies in later Pietism.   T.A.K.

Spengler, Oswald: (1880-1936) Rebelling, with Nietzsche*, against optimism and rationalism, Spengler taught that the intellect killed its objects, turning them into fixed, mummified caricatures of living things. Cultures grow and decay like organisms and must be experienced or "seen into" with "deep, wordless understanding". Since 1800 the world has been in a period of decadence. Men should accept this and cultivate the scientific and political interests which decay has brought without attempting the impossible task of seeking the real behind the changing and the relative. Spengler calls himself a "representative of historical-psychological skepticism" His Der Untergang des Abendlandes had a profound influence in Germany. The English translation (1926) and his Man and Technics (1932) have affected American thought.   J S B.

Spenta Mainyu: The Holy Ghost in Zoroastrianism*, sometimes identified with Ahura Mazda* (Yasna* 30 and 45), the name means, "blessing spirit." He is the good cosmic spirit fighting against the evil spirit, and the mediator between the supreme god and man   R.H.P.

spermatic word: A Stoic* term for Primary Being understood as the creative or generative force in the universe in which the seed or germ of all things is contained. See logos.   S.M.G.

Speyers, Diets of: See Spires, Diets of.

Spinoza, Benedict: (1632-1677) "God-intoxicated" to some, "atheist" to others, a monist, affirming there is but one substance or reality. Substance, "God or nature," is "absolutely infinite," perfect. So-called substances are merely "modes" of Substance. Neither they nor Substance act freely in the sense of having alternatives for action. Substance can only act out its nature; freedom is self-determination. We can be free by seeing ourselves as part of God's self-determined being. "Intellectual love of God" is salvation, which, through Bible and churches, even common men can obtain Spinoza was one of the first to apply scientific scholarship to the Bible (in his Tractatus). Atheistic or not, his views are deductions from Substance, defined as independent existence, (existence in se) and God, defined as absolutely independent, self-active being. (See omnipotence.) The purely self-active can be only active toward us, while we remain passive toward it, hence, since substantiality means self-activity, in relation to God we are insubstantial. So God loves only himself, not us. Spinoza forced into his system many precious ethical insights. He wrote chiefly in Latin, otherwise in Dutch. See Enlightenment, the, pantheism.

    B Spinoza, Tract. Theol Politicus (1670); Ethics, demonstrated in geometrical order (1677); etc.
      C.H.

spire: (A.S. spir) The upper or tapering part of a tower or steeple.   F.T.P.

Spires, Diets of: Spires was the scene of four diets during the Reformation* period. In 1526

Charles V* was anxious to enforce the Edict of Worms* but the political situation in Europe forced him to concur in the resolution of the diet "Each one is to rule and act as he hopes to answer to God and his Imperial Majesty" This decision opened the door for the spread of Lutheranism and divided Germany religiously. In 1529 Charles V felt he was powerful enough to crush Lutheranism In the diet of this year he accordingly cancelled the resolutions of 1526 and commanded strict enforcement of the Edict of Worms by the Estates On April 19 the Lutherans protested in these words "In matters concerning God's honor and the salvation of souls each one must for himself stand before God and give account." From this protest at Spires all Protestants take their name

In two other diets at Spires Charles V was once more obliged to make concessions to get Lutheran help against the Turk (1542) and against France (1544). His victory over the latter enabled him to turn against the Lutherans and crush them at Muehlberg in 1547.   E C.K.

spirit: See ruah, soul, spiritual life, the.

Spirit, Holy: See Holy Spirit.

spirits: Beings of the invisible environment active for good or ill in human affairs. Gods* may be spirits and spirits may grow into gods but usually their powers rank them below the gods and above mankind.

The idea of a human soul* separable from the body was the model for the conception of a non-human spirit. This idea was probably the most fruitful of all the blundering adventures in the interpretation of the world achieved by primitive man. It split the universe in two, making possible the dualisms of spiritual-material, soul-body, this world-other world It transformed the real gods of nature of early religions into spiritual beings and released them for limitless growth in the unseen realm. It made possible all the varied forms of belief in afterlife existence and, in ages of frustration, furnished a safe haven for values unattainable on earth.

The spirit population of the earth has always been greater than the human. Not only in religions of pre-literate peoples but also in those of Egypt, Babylonia, Iran, Greece, Rome, India, China, Japan, in Buddhism, Judaism, Christianity and Islam hosts of spirits worked with and against man Their activity was seen in all startling or super-usual happenings. The good spirits could fulfil human desires, bring luck, fertility and protect from dangers. Sometimes a spirit could be persuaded to take up its abode in a material object and be a constant companion as the beneficent power of a fetish. The evil spirits, demons*, were blamed for the dangerous and destructive moods of nature, for sickness, pestilence, death, possession, nightmare Sometimes it is difficult to differentiate the activity of spirits from that of ghosts* who linger about their old homes. Ancestral souls care for the welfare of their families like good spirits. Souls of the unhappy dead such as women who died in childbirth, unmarried persons, the unburied, murdered or forgotten dead act with all the malignancy of demons.

In the higher religions spirits are usually specialized and named according to their activity for weal or woe. Sometimes a name applied to a class of spirits merges the vague multitude into one who becomes a god or a powerful devil*. Since they are not human, spirits may take any imaginable form. India* has many picturesque types. There is a wide difference between the magnificent archangels and arch fiends of Zoroastrianism* and the tricky little household spirits, between the regal Iblis of Islam* and a fever demon.

Spirits are sometimes classified according to their dwelling place in sky, air, earth, underworld, water, forests or mountains. Good spirits were treated as lesser gods. Demons had to be held in check by powerful charms. Tantric Buddhism* had spells for the control of more than sixty thousand different kinds of them. See angels, exorcism, fetishism, jinn; primitive religion, totemism. Cf. Chinese religions. A E.H.

spirits, discernment of: See discernment of spirits.

spiritual, the negro: See negro spiritual, the.

spiritual direction: Guidance given by a competent person to one in search of perfection and holiness. The wisdom of centuries of Christian ascetics and saints is applied to the needs of the individual soul. Much of this is done in the confessional*. See cure of souls. C.R.

spiritual life, the: Life that is either (humanly) controlled by spirit, or (divinely) directed by and toward the Holy Spirit*, or both.

The concept of spirit has had a checkered history. Common to all stages is the idea of power (usually with emotional intensity) and of value (there are good and evil spirits, but no neutral ones). It has often been associated with abnormal phenomena, such as speaking with tongues* and "holy rolling," and with literalistic beliefs, frequently chiliastic, as in Montanism* and later sects and cults. The spiritual life has therefore come to be identified with fanaticism and emotional excesses, devoid of rational or moral control, and has therefore fallen into disrepute in some quarters.

Among more thoughtful believers, however, spirit has meant that in man which is most akin to God, man's experience of the highest values of goodness, truth, beauty, and holiness. Thus every person is to some extent potential spirit. In particular, the spiritual life is the development of a conscious relation to the divine Spirit (the Holy Spirit), in prayer, fellowship, service, and growth.

That the spiritual life is supersensuous is emphasized by Platonists*; that it is a transforming power, a work of divine grace*, is St. Paul's contribution; that it leads to union with God is the insight of mysticism* of the East and the West; that it is a rational and social power building institutions is shown by Hegel*, that it is nobly superior to the "pettily human" is Eucken's* thought. In the Orient the spiritual life has for centuries been cultivated as Yoga* (union with God).

One of the chief traits of the spiritual life is its relative freedom from determination by economic, racial, and physical conditions, combined with devotion to the task of changing those conditions when they can be changed, and of rising above them when they cannot. This freedom is not absolute, and Marx is partially justified in holding that the "realm of freedom" cannot be fully realized in an unjust social order. Religious faith brings spiritual life to its highest fruition when human spirituality is regarded as conscious co-operation with the eternal Spirit of God, and therefore as grounded in an eternal power that cannot be defeated spiritual relationships: See relationships, spiritual.

See Hegel, Philosophy of Mind (1817, trans. 1894); R. Eucken, The Unity of the Spiritual Life (1888), B. H. Streeter, The Spirit (1919), G. Santayana, The Realm of Spirit (1940), E S Brightman, The Spiritual Life (1942)   E.S.B.

Spiritualism: 1) a theory of reality. See ontology. 2) A religious-philosophical cult which is given to the study of psychic phenomena and which holds that these are to be explained in terms of discarnate spirits who have a lively interest in the living. Spiritualism was formally inaugurated in 1848, "mid-wifed" by the fantastic exhibitions of the Fox sisters. The origin of the movement is plural. Man's insatiable curiosity about post-mortem existence makes any form of spiritualism a natural religion. In general, spiritualists hold to unending development and progress of each one in a glorious hereafter; a cosmos that is friendly, affectionate converse between earth dwellers and their beloved in Summerland, seeks spiritual guidance from spirits who once were here; salvation for all; spiritual democracy; man is to enjoy freedom, love, joy and not to degenerate into the morose attitudes implied in conventional soteriological ideas. Spiritualists lack a holy book, their churches are congregational in polity. The N S A was organized in 1893 with headquarters in Washington. The Morris Pratt Institute at Whitewater, Wis. is the first spiritualist seminary. Lily Dale, N. Y. is the most famous of the spiritualist camps and a mecca for its devotees and the curious. Since 1879 meetings have been held there continuously. Cf. psychical research, societies for.

George Lawton, The Drama of Life after Death (A study of the Spiritualist Religion) (1932).

V.F.

Spittler, Ludwig Timotheus, Freiherr von: (1752-1810) Created a baron in 1806, he was made minister of state and curator of the University of Tübingen by the Duke of Wurtemberg. He was considered as one of the best historians in his time. He developed the peculiarities of the histories during the Enlightenment* period once more with rigorous exactness. His aim was to write the most terse history of the church. It is almost an epigrammatic narrative. The ability for compactness and conciseness is still more prominent in his works on secular history He was a convinced pupil of Voltaire*. Of all the pragmatic historians he was the most faithful to the heritage of Semler*. The writing of church history received through him a really political, mundane and modern character.

Grundriss der Geschichte der christlichen Kirche (3rd ed , Gottingen, 1791) , Sammtliche Werke, 15 vols. (Stuttgart und Tubingen, 1827-37).   H.H.

sponsor: (Lat. spondeo, promise) A godfather* or godmother, one who undertakes profession of faith* on behalf of a child at baptism* and is responsible for its religious education. Anglicans require three godparents, Roman Catholics one, requiring another at confirmation*.   T.J.B.

Spranger, Eduard: (1882-) with Karl Jaspers* he is the chief living exponent of the school of Verstehende Psychologie, the originator of which was Wilhelm Dilthey*, the philosopher. The school has concerned itself exclusively with the various dynamic functions that represent the apex of development in the mature personality. The method of the school consists in the postulate of ideal types, representing ultimate and absolutely coherent patterns of value, unifying any personality capable of following one of them consistently. The various authors of the school admit that no individual is perfectly self-consistent. The different ideal types, Spranger's being the best known, are merely "schemata of comprehensibility" to aid in understanding people. The value directions of the mature personality are for Spranger the religious, the esthetic, the theoretical, the economic, the social, and the political. His classification offers a starting point for empirical investigation of the complex philosophies of life that serve to confer unity upon the mature personality. His six ideal types of personality are merely theoretical guides in psychological understanding The unity of a man's life is understood through its approximating reference to an ideal scale of over-individual values. The individual is viewed as striving to fit himself into the objective spirit which is itself embodying these values. See psychology, schools of.

Types of Men (Halle a d Saale, 1928) ; G W. Allport and P. E. Vernon, A Study of Values (1931) , E Bosshart, Die systematischen Grundlagen der Padagogik Eduard Sprangers, mit einer monographischen Bibliographie Eduard Spranger (Leipzig, 1935) , A A Roback, The Psychology of Character (1927) , G Murphy, Historical Introduction to Modern Psychology (1930).   H.H.

Sprecher, Samuel: (1810-1906) A pupil and brother-in-law of S. S. Schmucker*, professor of theology and president of Wittenberg Lutheran Seminary (founded in 1845 at Springfield, Ohio), prominent leader in the affairs of the General Synod of the Lutheran Church. He advocated a frank statement of "American Lutheranism"* leading his district synod in 1855 in the formal adoption of the Definite Synodical Platform, an American version of the Augsburg Confession offered as an antidote to the growing Lutheran conservatism of that time. He later affirmed a more favorable attitude toward the old Lutheran symbols.   V.F.

sprinkling: See affusion.

sprite: (A Middle English-1200 to 1500 A.D - word for spirit) An elf*, a fairy*.   F L.P.

Sprunt Lectureship, The James: Established by Mr. James Sprunt of Wilmington, N. C., at Union Theological Seminary, Richmond, Virginia for the purposes of enabling the Seminary to secure each year the services of scholars as special lecturers on subjects connected with various aspects of Christian thought and work and the creation of permanent Christian literature. The foundation was created in 1911 with a capital sum of $30,000 and increased in 1919 to $50,000. Among the volumes published in connection with this lectureship are The Bearing of Recent Discovery on the Trustworthiness of the New Testament by Sir William M. Ramsay (1913-1914); Christian Psychology by Prof. James Stalker (1913-1914), The Origin of Paul's Religion by Dr. J. Gresham Machen (1920-1921), In His Image by Hon. William Jennings Bryan (1921-1922); The Mystery of Preaching by Dr. James Black (1923-1924), Fundamental Christianity by Dr. Francis L. Patton (1924-1925), Jesus and the Educational Method by Dean Luther A. Weigle (1924-1925); The Unfinished Task of Foreign Missions by Dr. Robert E. Speer (1925-1926), The Christian Apprehension of God by Dr. H. R. Mackintosh (1927-1928); The Garment of the Living God by Prof J Y. Simpson (1933-1934), The Church of Christ and the Problems of the Day by Prof. Karl Heim (1934-1935), The Philosophy of Christian Education by Prof. H. H. Horne (1936-1937); A Preface to Theology by Dr John A Mackay (1939-1940). (Data furnished by the Seminary.)   V F.

Spurgeon, Charles Haddon: (1834-1892) English Baptist, one of the most popular preachers of the nineteenth century He was something of a fanatic and withdrew from the Baptist Union at 1887.   W.S.H.

Sraosha: Zoroastrian divine being, forming a triad together with Mithra and Rashnu* (Yasht* 10 41, 100). His name means "obedience," and he is first mentioned in the Gathas*, Yasna 57 and Yasht 11 are dedicated to him. He protects the faithful and fights the demons.   R.H.P.

sruti: (shruti) There are two kinds of sacred writings recognized in Hinduism, sruti, the very highest type of revelation, the very word of God, and *smriti, revelation of a lower order. Vedic literature is regarded as sruti. Sometimes also the Bhagavad-Gita is so regarded.   C.S.B.

Stabat Mater: 13th century hymn on the Blessed Virgin at the cross, ascribed to the Franciscan Jacopone da Todi (d. 1305), used liturgically on the Feast of the Seven Sorrows* of Our Lady, it remains primarily a popular hymn, both in its original form and in Anglican and Protestant adaptations.   E.R.H.

stalls: (Gr. stellein, to set or place) Seats for clergy and choristers on the north and south sides of the choir or chancel* in a church Often elaborately carved.   F.T.P.

Stange, Carl: (1870-) He taught in Konigsberg, Greifswald and Gottingen. He attempts to bring philosophy and theology, philosophy of religion and systematic theology into a more intimate apologetically valuable relation. His main achievements are directed towards a new Lutheran theology prepared by competent studies on Luther as well as by ethical and dogmatic studies.
   Die christliche Ethik in ihrem Verhältnis zur modernen Ethik (Gottingen, 1892) ; Das Dogma und seine Beurteilung in der neueren Dogmengeschichte (Berlin, 1898) , Christentum und moderne Welt-schauung (Leipzig, 1913) ; Die Wahrheit des Christ-usglaubens (Leipzig, 1915) , Die Religion als Erfahrung (Gutersloh, 1919) , Der Untergang des Abendlandes von O Spengler (Gutersloh, 1922) ; Grundriss der Religionsphilosophie (Leipzig, 1922) ;
Christliche und philosophische Weltanschauung (Gutersloh, 1923) Dogmatik (Gutersloh, 1927) , Studien zur Theologie Luthers (Leipzig, 1928) .
                                               H H.

Stanley, Arthur Penrhyn: (1815-1881) English clergyman, professor at Oxford and Dean of Westminster from 1863. His friendship with Queen Victoria gave him a wide influence; he was a broad churchman, championing Colenso and writing vigorously for latitudinarian* principles.
His best-known work is a study of the eastern churches.   W N P.

station: In Methodist polity a conference appointment consisting of a single church, in distinction from a circuit of churches.   F.G E.

stations of the cross: Also called the Way of the Cross*. A Catholic devotion in honor of Christ's journey from the house of Pilate to Calvary. Beginning around the year 1350, the devotion consists of meditation before 14 crosses and pictures depicting the sufferings of Christ.
The Stations are attached to the walls of the church, requiring a special blessing before an indulgence can be gained.
   The 14 stations are as follows: Jesus is condemned to death; Jesus is laden with the Cross;
Jesus falls under the Cross; Jesus meets His holy Mother; Simon of Cyrene helps Jesus to carry His Cross; Veronica presents her veil to Jesus, Jesus falls the second time; Jesus comforts the women of Jerusalem, Jesus falls the third time; Jesus is stripped of His garments; Jesus is nailed to the Cross, Jesus dies upon the Cross; Jesus is taken down from the Cross and placed in Mary's arms;
Jesus is laid in the sepulchre.
   Cf. Catholic Encyclopedia, vol. XV, p. 569; The New Catholic Dictionary, p. 1015.   S.C.

Staupitz, Johann von: (? -1524) Vicar-general of the Augustinian monastic order in Germany at the beginning of the Reformation. In the Erfurt convent of the order he met distressed young Martin Luther and comforted him by directing his thoughts to the grace of God in Christ. An influential friend and counselor of the future reformer, Staupitz encouraged him to study for a doctorate in theology, and in 1512 gave over to him his own chair of the Bible in the University of Wittenberg where he had been professor and dean of the theological faculty. In spite of his strong leanings toward the evangelical faith and his warm personal friendship for Luther, Staupitz remained a faithful Roman Catholic. During the heresy proceedings against Stephan Agricola, a follower of Luther, in 1523, Staupitz condemned Lutheranism as a heresy. From 1520 until his death he was the abbot of the Benedictine convent in Salzburg.   T A K.

Steffensen, Karl: (1816-1888) He taught at the University of Basel, where he exercised a strongly prophetic influence as a teacher. He possessed a most intense metaphysical feeling for the secret of the world and life. He had a style of beauty and pregnancy He opposed naturalism and positivism. Notwithstanding the idealistic tendency of his metaphysics, he abhorred all false idealiza-tions of history. The contemporary optimistic theism was for him a poetic falsification. Evil and good were for him the ultimate grounds of the world. As a member of the contemporary speculative theism, he was both profound and independent.
   Karl Steffensen. Gesammelte Vorträge und Aufsätze mit einigen Erinnerungsblätter von Freunden und Schülern (Basel, 1890) ; Zur Philosophie der Geschichte, edited by R Eucken (Basel, 1894).
                                               H.H.

Steinbart, Gotthilf Samuel: (1783-1809) He was professor in Frankfurt a. O. As the soul of neology, pioneer in laying the foundations of rationalism, his chief work was characterized by the apologetic aim, the popular philosophical attitude, the reduction of the content of faith to a doctrine of happiness. Under renunciation of radical criticism of the world and of eschatology, his religious view measured everything according to the feeling of happiness, and Jesus was given only the role of a pioneer towards happiness
   System der reinen Philosophie oder Glueckseligkeitslehre des Christenthums, für die Bedürfnisse seiner aufgeklärten Landsleute und anderer, die nach Wahr-heit fragen, eingerichtet. (Zuellichau, 1778, 4th ed., Zuellichau, 1794).   H.H.

Steiner, Rudolf: (1861-1925) Born in Kraje-witz, Hungary, he was the spiritual head and founder of the anthroposophical movement, an offshoot of the theosophical* movement. A manysidedly gifted personality, he was the author of eurhythmics, a new art of dancing and his own architecture of the temple at Dornach, Switzerland The theosophical movement obtained through him a still more intellectual character.
He contended that the ascent to higher super-normal levels of cognition was only possible by a growing liberation of the chains of egoism Steiner devised special exercises in meditation in order to reach higher levels of knowledge. He combined the idea of rebirth with his doctrine of higher capacities of knowledge; which are dormant in all men. In his later years he devoted himself to social problems and medicine.

Das Christentum als mystische Tatsache (Berlin, 1910), Wie erlangt man Erkenntnisse hoherer Welten (Berlin, 1919), Die Geheimniswissenschaften im Umriss (Leipzig, 1920), F Rittelmeyer, ed Vom Lebenswerk Rudolf Steiners (Munchen, 1921), A. Sichler, Die Theosophie in psychologischer Beleuchtung (München, 1921), H Leisegang, Die Grundlagen der Anthroposophie (Hamburg, 1922), A Mager, Moderne Theosophie, eine Wertprüfung der Lehre Steiners (Munchen, 1922)   H H.

Steinmann, Theophil: (1868-) He was professor in Gnadenfrei and in Herrnhut, Germany. He cultivated the relations of faith with the contemporary world view, of theology with the general intellectual life, and above all with philosophy.

Der religiöse Unsterblichkeitsglaube (Leipzig, 1908), Die Geheimreligion der Gebildeten (Gottingen, 1913)   H.H.

Stephan, Horst: (1873-) He taught first in Marburg and Halle. Now he is professor in Leipzig. Starting from historical studies about Schleiermacher, Hamann, Herder and New Protestantism, he tried to represent the Christian faith from its center and to make it fertile within the range of modern thought.

Der Pietismus als Träger des Fortschrittes in Kirche, Theologie und allgemeiner Geistesbildung (Tubingen, 1908), Die heutigen Auffassungen vom Neuprotestantismus (Giessen, 1911), Glaubenslehre. Der evangelische Glaube und seine Weltanschauung (Giessen, 1928), 2nd ed , in cooperation with H Leube Die Neuzeit, 4th volume of G. Kruger's Handbuch der Kirchengeschichte (Tubingen, 1931), 2nd ed , Geschichte der evangelischen Theologie seit dem deutschen Idealismus (Berlin, 1938).   H.H.

Stephen: One of seven Greek-speaking Jews in the Church at Jerusalem who were set apart, according to Acts 6 1 ff., to look after secular matters. Later brought before the Sanhedrin* for criticizing Judaism and stoned to death by mob action after having delivered a long speech.

S.M G.

Stevens, George Barker: (1854-1906) Graduated Rochester University, 1877, Yale Divinity School, 1880, studied theology at Berlin and Leipzig Universities, 1885-1886.

Professor of N.T., Yale Divinity School, 1886-1906. An esteemed teacher and contributor to N.T. theology.

Author. The Teaching of Jesus (1901), The Theology of the New Testament (International Theological Library, 1902), The Christian Doctrine of Salvation (1905), articles in theological journals

J.W.B.

Stevens, William Arnold: (1839-1910) Studied at Leipzig and Berlin. Professor N.T., Rochester Theological Seminary, 1877-1910. Author Select Orations of Lyssas (1876) and commentaries on N.T. Formulated principles of the functional significance of the N.T. participle.

C.H.M.

stigmata: (pl. of Gr. stigma, mark) Physical wounds like those of the crucified Jesus, reputedly imprinted on persons, like St. Francis*, vouchsafed a peculiar intimacy of renunciatory suffering with their Lord.   R C P.

stigmatization: The production of stigmata or marks on the body which are believed to have religious meaning and to be due to supernatural infliction. Among Christians stigmata have taken the form of wounds resembling those of the crucified Jesus. St. Francis of Assisi* had such wounds in his hands, feet and sides according to his contemporary biographers. Stigmata are now held to be due to strong religious emotion and to be connected with some form of hysteria.*

R W.F.

Stöcker, Adolf: (1835-1909) German Lutheran minister and political organizer. He served as court preacher at Berlin (1874-1890), a conservative member of the Reichstag, and founder of the Christian Socialist Workers' Party (1877). He was a paternalistic monarchist, a bitter opponent of the Social Democratic Party, and a virulent antisemitist.   L.H.DeW.

Stoddard, Solomon: (1643-1729) Congregational clergyman, was graduated from Harvard University in 1662. In 1667 he went as chaplain to the Congregationalists in the Barbados, returning to Boston in 1669. When about to embark for England he was asked to preach in the church in Northampton, Massachusetts. Found satisfactory he was given a call and was ordained there on Sept 11, 1672. In that pulpit he remained until his death, being assisted after 1727 by his grandson, Jonathan Edwards*. Stoddard took a prominent part in the religious and political movements of his day, and for fifty years was the most influential man in western Massachusetts. He stood out against the principles of the prevailing Congregationalism* and advocated a national church organized along Presbyterian lines. He early accepted the Half-Way Covenant* proposed by the Synod of 1662, which permitted the children of those who had been baptized in infancy and who would "own the covenant," to have their children baptized. These grandchildren, however, were not admitted to the Lord's supper or given voting privileges in the church.

Around 1677 Stoddard introduced the practice, called Stoddardeanism, which erased the line between "half-way" and full church members, and permitted all to full church privileges, even when they could not relate a specific experience of regenerating grace. Baptism and the Lord's supper, he argued, "were not designed merely to increase faith in those who already had it—since no one could tell who did—but to be 'converting' ordinances for all men." Stoddard's practice was stoutly opposed, especially by the Mathers of Boston, but in time it came to prevail in western Massachusetts.

W. Walker, Creeds and Platforms of Congregationalism (1893), W. B. Sprague, Annals of the American Pulpit, I (1857); "Stoddardeanism," New Englander, July, 1846, Perry Miller, "Solomon Stoddard," Harvard Theol. Review, XXXIV (1941).

s.e M.

Stoicism: It is the generative reason, the Divine Word, or Reason, that is the seed, or vital principle, whence all things come, and in virtue of which they live. All things come from fiery breath and return to it. The whole universe is one polity in virtue of the spirit that is its origin and its life of the common end to which it tends, of the absolute and universal scope of law it obeys —mind, matter, God, man, form one community. All men are of one blood, of one family, all and each are sacred to one another. Harmony with nature and oneself is the ideal life. (See happiness) Preeminently a rule of life and religion, it sought to teach self-sufficiency by a rigorous training of the will, a sense of duty reentorced by a religious teaching not unlike Calvinism, a strong belief in the overruling power of Divine Providence, making men feel their own life as a calling and as a duty assigned by God. Although the Stoics defended popular religion, they objected to the superstitions and anthropomorphical elements in it, and offered an allegorical interpretation of it. Stoicism had a profound humanitarian effect upon the development of Western jurisprudence. See Cleanthus, Epictetus, fate; logos, Marcus Aurelius, Roman religions; spermatic word, Seneca, Zeno of Citium. Cf. Cynics.

E V Arnold, Roman Stoicism (Cambridge, 1911); E. Caird, Evolution of Theology in the Greek Philosophers (Glasgow, 1904), vol 2, R. D. Hicks, Stoic and Epicurean (London, 1910), R. M Wenley, Stoicism and its Influence (1927), E Zeller, Stoics, Epicureans and Sceptics (London, 1880).   H H.

Stolberg, Friedrich Leopold, Graf zu: (1750-1819) Danish ambassador in Berlin and appointed president of the government in Eutin, Holstein, by the Prince-Bishop of Lübeck, he embraced Roman Catholicism. He wrote the first distinctly romantic history of the church. His contemporaries welcomed the striking religious note of his work. He chiefly aimed at the recruiting of misled youth for the Catholic church. The work was largely preoccupied with the religion of Jesus Christ stole: A scarf-shaped vestment, often of valuable material, worn by priest and deacons when administering sacraments or performing other sacred rites. See vestments   E.R.H.

Geschichte der Religion Jesu Christi, 53 vols. (Hamburg, Mainz, 1806-1864).   H.H.

Stone Lectureship: The Levi P. Stone Foundation was established at Princeton, Theological Seminary in 1871. Five lectures on the Foundation have been given annually since 1879. In 1883 the income of the fund was permanently designated by Mr. Stone for lectures "upon some topic kindred to theological studies, provided always that the lectures shall not controvene the system of doctrine taught in the standards of the Presbyterian Church."

Noteworthy lectures were·

R. S. Storrs, "Bernard of Clairvaux, the times, the man, and his work" (1878-79), Robert Flint, Croall Lecture for 1887-88· "Agnosticism" (1880-81); Mark Hopkins "The scriptural idea of man" (1882-83); H. J. Van Dyke, "The church, her ministry and sacraments" (1889-90); R E Thompson, "De civitate Dei The divine order of human society" (1890-91); M. W Jacobus, "A problem in New Testament criticism" (1897-98), Abraham Kuyper, "Calvinism" (1898-99), W J Beecher, "The prophets and the promise" (1902-03); James Orr, "God's image in man, and its defacement in the light of modern denials" (1903-04), D H Fleming, "The reformation in Scotland" (1907-08); Herman Bavinck, "The philosophy of revelation" (1908-09); L F Benson, "The English hymn" (1909-10), A T Robertson, "The Pharisees and Jesus" (1915-16), K D Macmillan, "Protestantism in Germany" (1916-17); H. E Dosker, "The Dutch Anabaptists" (1918-19); W. L. Phelps, "Reading the Bible" (1918-19), L F. Benson, "The hymnody of the Christian church" (1925-26), Adolf Keller, "Religion and revolution" (1933-34); C G Osgood, "Poetry as a means of Grace" (1939-40)   For a complete list, see the Biographical Catalogue of Princeton Theological Seminary (1933), page xxvii.   J.A M stones in religion: Stones occur as amulets and charms*, as centers for magical rites, as altars for sacrifice, as boundary stones, as phallic* symbols, even as gods themselves or their places of abode The shape, size or appearance of stones gave primitive people cause to wonder and served to make unusual stones the objects of devotion. Among advanced religions, the Black Stone of Mecca, the Ka'bah, is still kissed by thousands of Moslem pilgrims In India, the lingam as symbol of the god, is worshipped by the act of pouring water or placing flowers thereon. Red powder is also sprinkled on it, doubtless in imitation of a blood sacrifice. In Buddhism, rocks bearing the imprint of Gotama's foot or hand were worshipped. The stupa or relic shrine was chiefly a great heap of stones and rubble. Boundary stones are frequently objects of veneration in India.

Stones played a prominent role in the tribal religion of the OT. Jacob called the stone on which he slept and dreamt, God's house, "Bethel," and anointed it (Gen. 28·18). He set up and consecrated a stone pillar and heap on several occasions. Rocks served as altars* (Judg. 6:20; 13.19). No religion has been without its sacred stones. No people have lacked the imagination to see in them the form or spirit of something divine and living.

See art. "Stones" in Hastings Encyclopedia of Religion and Ethics.   M.L.C.

Strauss, David Friedrich: (1808-1874) German theologian and man of letters. A disciple of both Hegel and F. C. Baur, while a repetent or tutor in philosophy at Tubingen the young Strauss decided that the gospels did not constitute the fundamental Begriff (idea) of religion, but rather they represented the temporary Vorstellung (concept) of thought to which faith was not bound. This led to his radical and bitterly criticized Leben Jesu (1835) which established his reputation but wrecked his academic career overnight. Although he accepted the historicity of Jesus, he refused to accept the authority of the gospels, denied that they were reliable accounts, and stated that many of their narratives concerning Jesus, including his birth and childhood, his last days and resurrection, and his miraculous deeds, were "myths," patterned to a great extent on O.T.

proto-types and prophecies This work, despite its limitations, marks the beginnings of the modern study of the life of Jesus (See Lives of Jesus.) Among the more important of his later contributions are the following Christliche Glaubenslehre (1840-41), in which he posited the opposition of faith and knowledge and denied personal immortality, Das Leben Jesu fur das deutsche Volk (1864), a popularization of his earlier life, Christus des Glaubens und der Jesus der Geschichte (1865), a critique of Schleiermacher's posthumously published lectures on the life of Jesus, and Der alte und der neue Glaube (1872), an attempt to harmonize idealism with the materialism of natural science and Darwinianism which produced almost as great a reaction as his Leben Jesu. Cf. Ullmann, Karl.   M.R.

Streeter, Burnett Hillman: (1874-1937) English theologian and N.T scholar. Canon of Hereford (1915-34), Provost of Queen's College, Oxford (1933-37). A university teacher for 38 years and one of the intellectual leaders in the Anglican Church, Streeter is best known for his studies of the Gospels. In his magnum opus, The Four Gospels A Study of Origins (1924) he developed his multiple source (four document) hypothesis of Synoptic* relationships and origins, including his Proto-Luke theory which, perhaps, has been unduly acclaimed. In a later work stemming from his N.T. studies, The Primitive Church· Studied with Special Reference to the Origins of the Christian Ministry (1929), he reaches the conclusion that no one order prevailed in the primitive church, and expressed the hope that this result of historical investigation might remove one of the barriers to Christian reunion As a Christian apologist Streeter wrote several books and edited and contributed to others in which he attempted to show that there was no necessary conflict between science and religion. This thesis is fully developed in Reality A New Correlation of Science and Religion (1926), in which his theory of knowledge, bi-representation, is presented. Among his other writings are The Message of Sadhu Sundar Singh (1921), in collaboration with A. J Appasamy, The Buddha and the Christ (1933), and The God who Speaks (1936). He also edited and contributed to the following: Foundations (1912), Concerning Prayer (1916); Immortality (1917), The Spirit (1919), and Adventure (1928).   M R.

Strong, Augustus Hopkins: (1836-1921) Baptist educator and theologian. President Rochester Theological Seminary, 1872-1912. Author of Systematic Theology, final edition, 3 vols., 1907-1909. Tour of Missions (1918), provoked fundamentalist controversy. His proposals for a greater Baptist University in New York City stimulated movement resulting in University of Chicago.   C.H.M.

structuralism (structural psychology): See psychology, schools of.

Stuart, Janet Erskine: (1857-1914) English

nun and superior-general of the Society of the Sacred Heart Her writings on educational subjects, her ascetical teaching and gift of understanding have made her a force in the Catholic world.   E.A.R.

student religious organizations: Christian student societies are as old as the universities They antedate all other voluntary student organizations. Some of the most creative movements in the history of the Chrisian church had their beginnings in these societies There are records of societies in American colleges as early as 1706

Societies at Harvard in 1721 and 1723 met "twice a week for the worship of God" and for discourses "of 20 minutes" by "one of the Society on any subject he pleases"—the students "taking turns in leadership." In 1742 at Yale a number of students "associated themselves with one another for mutual conversation and assistance in spiritual things"

For seventy-five years the Moral Society of Yale (1797) exerted a powerful influence on the moral and religious life of the college The Society of Brethren (Haystack group) that formed around Samuel Mills at Williams College in 1806 and its successor at Andover Seminary (1810) stirred up students in other colleges who formed student missionary societies, and awakened the church of New England to its foreign missionary responsibility leading to the formation of the first missionary sending society—the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions.

From 1810 to 1858 as new colleges were founded on the frontier, religious societies spontaneously developed These societies seem to be as indigenous to colleges as professors and class rooms. Generally they were called Societies of Inquiry or Societies of Religious or Missionary Inquiry While there was no intercollegiate or world student organization, yet these associations were united in fact and spirit by a network of correspondence involving societies in Great Britain and Europe as well as the United States. They have always been, as they are today, ecumenic in spirit, practising Christian fellowship across all the lines that divide men— racial, geographical and ecclesiastical Perhaps here lies one of their greatest gifts to the church "Thanks be to God" wrote British students to American in 1822, "for the grand union of believers in Christ. No distance of place, difference of color nor adversity of circumstance can prevent its exercise."

It is against this background of indigenous, ecumenic, intercollegiate and international Christian student societies that the history of all student religious organizations in American colleges must be written.

Student Y.M.C.A. 1858—

For more than three-quarters of a century the Student Y.M.C.A. has been a major channel for voluntary student religious activity. On October 12, 1858, students at the University of Virginia, dissatisfied with their scattered religious activities, banded together to form the first Student Y.M.C.A. It combined the discussional, theological, ethical and missionary interests of earlier student religious societies into one comprehensive campus-centered Christian Association. The inclusiveness and practicality of this Association commended itself to students and faculty alike with the result that in two decades Y M.C.A.'s developed spontaneously in from 70 to 100 colleges, generally replacing older societies of inquiry.

At Louisville, Kentucky, in 1877 representatives of these student Y M.C A.'s created the Intercollegiate Y.M.C.A. as a part of the general Y.M.C A. movement, calling Luther D. Wishard of Princeton to be the first national student Y.M.C.A. secretary. In the next decade Associations were formed in more than 250 colleges.

In answer to a call by the Student Y.M.C.A and Dwight L. Moody* 250 students from 90 colleges in 26 states came together in 1886 at Mt. Hermon, Massachusetts, for the first summer conference for students, beginning a way of doing religious work with students that has since spread around the world and that established the pattern for the summer conferences and training institutes for young people promoted by the denominations in recent years. Out of the Missionary awakening in the Mt. Hermon conference came the forces which led in 1888 to the creation of the Student Volunteer Movement*.

In 1888 John R. Mott accepted "for one year only" the national secretaryship of the Student Y.M.C.A., thus beginning a Christian lay ministry among students which for five decades influenced the religious life of universities in every corner of the world.

Full-time student secretaries were introduced by the Y.M.C.A.'s at Yale and Toronto in 1886. Today, in fully 125 larger colleges and universities in the United States, Advisory Boards of Student Y.M.C.A.'s exist for the employment of secretaries, most of whom now have taken graduate work in theology for advanced degrees—M.A., B.D. and Ph.D. Buildings as social and religious centers were also introduced in the late 80's and have spread to most larger colleges. These Associations have not only developed a wide range of social and religious activities and extensive service programs for the campus and community, but they have pioneered thinking and action among students and faculty in the areas of social concerns and in interracial understanding.

The movement's national headquarters are at 347 Madison Ave., New York. Its policies are determined in an annual meeting by the National Council of Student Christian Associations, made up of 100 students, secretaries, and professors elected by the white and Negro colleges of the country to represent them. This Council elects a National Student Committee and Executive Committee subject to the approval of the National Council of the Y.M.C.A. to administer the work between meetings. There are regional offices, councils and secretaries in each section of the country. In 1943 more than 100,000 students are banded together in the work of 600 local student Y.M.C.A.'s. The movement has been fortunate in its succession of national executives, Luther D Wishard (1877-1888), John R. Mott (1888-1915), David R. Porter (1915-1934), Arthur Roland Elliott (1934-1943), and R. H Edwin Espy (1943-   ).

World's Student Christian Federation, 1895-

Ardently desiring to achieve a union of Christian students of all lands, John R. Mott and Luther D. Wishard, representing Christian students of U.S.A. and Canada and the beginning Student Christian Movements in foreign mission lands, joined British, German and Scandinavian leaders of Student Christian Movements in the ancient castle of Vadstena on the shores of Lake Vettern in Sweden in August, 1895, to form the World's Student Christian Federation, which the late Bishop Charles H. Brent once described as "the greatest movement of the Spirit of God in modern times." The Federation has no individual membership but is a union of autonomous national student Christian movements—only one movement in a country being recognized for membership. In the United States, in 1943, denominational groups as well as the Y.M C.A., Y W.C.A. and S.V.M. may unite with the Federation through the Provisional Council of the W S C.F. Regular or affiliated movements are found in more than 40 nations and its General Committee meetings once in three years bring together students and professors from every race and nation and communion of the Christian Church.

It organized and directed in World War No. 1 and in the reconstruction period following—as it is also doing in World War No. 2—an extensive program of relief for dislocated student groups, student refugees and prisoners of war in Asia and Europe, and in many open and hidden ways kept lines for spiritual communication open between students in enemy countries.

The World headquarters is at 13 Rue Calvin, Geneva, Switzerland. Since 1935 Robert Mackie of the British Movement has been its secretary. Its magazine published quarterly is The Student World. Its work and world conferences held since 1900 have established the pattern for the ecumenical World council of Churches and most of the leaders for movements of the Church have come from its ranks. The present general secretary of the World Council of Churches, Dr. W A. Visser t'Hooft is the former general secretary of the W.S.C.F.

Student Y.W.C.A.
(see Y. W.C.A.) 1873-

The first student Y.M.C.A.'s in coeducational colleges had women as well as men members. The first separate Student Y.W.C.A. was formed at Illinois State Normal School in 1872 although prior to this date there were in most of the early women's colleges and coeducational institutions young ladies' religious and moral societies. Between 1880 and 1885 many separate women's Associations were formed and in August, 1886, at Lake Geneva, Wisconsin, 19 women students met as representatives of 80 Associations to form the National Y W C.A. Miss Nettie Dunn of Hillsdale College was called to be its national secretary.

In 1894 it became a charter member of the World's Y.W.C A. and in 1906 under the leadership of Miss Grace Dodge it united with the Women's Christian Association to form the National Board of the Y W.C.A. Like the Student Y.M.C A it developed local and national secretaryships, summer student conferences, and in addition to the social and religious pioneering that characterized the student Y.M.C.A. it has always performed two functions unique to it as a women's movement It has been a center for women's student life on most campuses, offering many opportunities for growth and leadership not otherwise available for women students to the same degree as for men students, it has also achieved great solidarity with the general Y.M.C.A movement in its struggle for better conditions for women and children in the nation's life and for more of interracial equality.

The national headquarters are at 600 Lexington Avenue, New York It bands together fully 100,000 women students in more than 600 colleges and universities Miss Eleanor French (1943) is Executive Secretary. It has regional councils and secretaries and its national policies are made by the National Student Council of the Y.W.C A, subject to the approval of the National Board of the Y.W.C A

National Intercollegiate Christian Council

Since 1920, locally and nationally, the Student Y.W.C A. and Y.M C.A.'s have been increasing their areas of cooperative work—locally through councils and in many cases united Student Christian Associations, and nationally through the National Intercollegiate Christian Council. Its membership is made up of the National Student Councils of the Y.M.C.A. and Y.W.C.A. It is not an overhead organization but a council through which the two Associations can think and work together without breaking their connections with the parent Y M.C.A. and Y.W.C.A organizations It meets annually for national policy making and entrusts the carrying out of these to an administrative Committee and various program commissions which meet frequently during the year. The executive secretaryship of N I.C C. alternates each year between the two movements. Summer student conferences in all parts of the country are now on a joint basis. The N.I.C.C has led the two movements on many social issues, its Christian message and churchmanship policies, and in the adoption of advanced interracial policies and practices. In many cases locally or regionally a man or a woman is employed jointly by the Associations to give leadership on behalf of both movements.

Church Student Movements (1900-   )

The Church has always ministered to the religious needs of students through the parish church and religiously founded colleges. Specialized ministries to the religious needs of students and the encouragement of denominational student organizations are, however, quite recent. They are the result of the rapid growth of public higher education. By 1910 it was apparent to educational leaders of the Protestant denominations and of the Roman Catholic Church that in any given state there were already more of the churches' students in the state universities than there were in the colleges of the denomination. This led to local experimentation with church student programs and to decisions by the larger denominations to provide special pastoral, program and teaching leadership for students in state universities. University pastors were employed by national and state agencies of the denomination in cooperation with the parish church and attached to the local churches in the state university centers as fulltime student workers. Gradually about the campuses of larger state universities fine student houses ("a home away from home") have been built as centers for student religious program and activity. The term foundation was first used by the Methodists at the University of Illinois when in 1913 they incorporated their student program under the leadership of Rev. (now Bishop) James C. Baker as the Wesley Foundation of the University of Illinois. In 1916 the term Wesley Foundation was officially adopted for its student program in state universities by the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church Other denominations later adopted similar terms, the Presbyterians (Westminster Foundation), Congregationalists (Pilgrim Foundation), Baptists (Roger Williams Clubs), and Episcopalians (Canterbury Clubs). All of this work has been established by national leadership of the denominations and has been subsidized by grants from national and state denominational educational agencies.

The gradual adoption of the society idea for the denominational student program underscores a fact of immense importance. The denominations in the first two decades of this century followed their students in state universities with university pastors who were to give pastoral leadership. It was in the main a work of the denominations for their students. In the past two decades it has become a work of as well as for students based on the principles pioneered by earlier student societies and especially by the S.C.A.. The local denominational student societies today are generally as clearly student led and in spirit as ecumenic as are the Student Christian Associations and they too are expressions of the student religious society tradition.

The Lutheran and Episcopal policy has been to strengthen the parish church as the center for its ministry to students with a lesser emphasis on special student workers. However among Lutheran students there has grown up the Lutheran Student Association of America with clubs in most colleges where there are Lutheran students. The Southern Baptists have followed the Student Movement pattern, organizing locally Baptist Student Unions and promoting statewide and Southwide student conferences that attract large numbers of students. Their summer student conference at Ridgecrest, N. C is the largest annual gathering of students in the United States. Since the reunion of the Methodist Church, the term Methodist Student Movement has been used to describe both the Wesley Foundations in state institutions and the Methodist fellowships in Methodist colleges.

The national administration of the denominational programs centers in the university departments of the Boards of Education of the various denominations. Through the University Commission of the Council of Church Boards of Education—national plans are made for strengthening denominational work and for interdenominational student activity. Much cooperative work is done among the denominations and with the Christian Associations through local campus religious councils, through joint regional movements like the New England S.C.M. and through national agencies like the War Emergency Council for Student Christian work. In a number of larger universities, denominations and Christian Associations pool their leadership and financial resources for the strengthening both of local church's ministry to students and interdenominational work.

College Catholic Clubs

In 1880 Catholic students at the University of Wisconsin met in the home of Mrs. John Melvin to form the Melvin Catholic Club. This was one of the earliest of the college Catholic clubs Others were formed in this decade at Yale, Harvard and Michigan. Today they are found in more than 500 colleges and universities. The first of these to be named Newman Club in honor of Cardinal Newman*—a name now widely used—was at the University of Pennsylvania in 1894 Pope Leo XIII* urged the erection of chapels at institutions like Oxford as a means of safeguarding the faith of Catholic students. In 1905 Pope Pius X* issued his encyclical Acerbo Nimis commanded "the establishment of schools of religion for teaching the truths of our faith and the precepts of Christian morality" to youths attending "such public institutions wherein no mention is made of religion." This pronouncement greatly accelerated the formation of College Catholic Clubs. The movement has had the warm support of the American hierarchy and the reasons given for encouraging the formation of clubs, the erection of student chapels and the support of chaplains have been almost identical with those of the Protestant denominations for the support of their student religious organizations. The Federation of College Catholic Clubs was formed in 1915 at the home of Mrs. John Phillips in New York City and its first conference was held in 1916. The Federation has aroused the interest of the hierarchy and the laity in the student problem, has raised funds for Newman Halls, secured the appointment of chaplains and drawn together in the program of Catholic action large numbers from the more than 85,000 Catholic students in some 600 non-Catholic colleges. The Federation is international and collaborates with Pax Romana, a world-wide organization of Catholic students similar to the World's Student Christian Federation. The Federation recognizes first the authority of each bishop, and, as a Federation working with clubs in the U. S, has been placed as a separate division in the Educational Department of the National Catholic Welfare Conference with headquarters in Washington, D. C.

B'nai B'rith Hillel Foundation

While Jewish cultural and religious societies have had a place in the universities for many years—notably such societies as the Intercollegiate Menorah Society and Avukah—yet it was not until 1923 that a special religious and social program was developed among Jewish students comparable in any way to the denominational university pastorate. This new Jewish youth movement—the Hillel Foundation—is sponsored by B'nai B'rith, a national order nearly a century old. The movement is the product of the vision and perseverance of a young rabbi, the late Benjamin Frankel, who had been serving as a bi-weekly student rabbi at Champaign, where the University of Illinois is located. Upon his ordination in 1923 he determined to remain in Champaign and organize a student center for the growing body of Jewish students. He had the support of the Champaign Jewish community and of a group of earnest and public-spirited men in Chicago Largely through their assistance the first year of the Hillel Foundation was successfully completed. In the next year, the project, with all of its potentialities, was offered to the Executive Committee of B'nai-B'rith, which undertook sponsorship for the movement. This decision was approved at the international convention of the Order, in 1925, and a great Jewish student movement was launched

The Hillel Foundations consciously followed the patterns developed by the Christian Associations and the denominations, making of the local organization "a democratic institution governed by a student council elected by the Jewish student body." They steadily seek to increase the areas of cooperation and work with Christian student groups to increase interfaith understanding.

At two points a Hillel Foundation differs from other denominational foundations

1. It is not under the control of the synagogues locally or nationally. In this respect it is an extra-church agency like the Y.M.C.A. and Y.W.C.A

2. Its religious and social aims are inextricably interwoven with the necessity for preserving Jewish integrity, training students in neglected elements of Jewish culture, surrounding the Jewish college student with a Jewish atmosphere, social, educational and religious. "Except for this distinctive Jewish cultural note, the report of a Hillel Foundation would read very much like that of a Wesley, Westminster, or Pilgrim Foundation."

Hillel Foundations, like those of the Christian denominations, have been organized in the larger state and independent universities where the need has seemed greatest and where there has been the greatest concentration of Jewish students. By 1930 there were foundations in 12 universities, in 1943 there are foundations in more than 80 universities, a number that is being rapidly increased because of the war emergency

Dr Abram L Sachar, Director of the Foundation at the University of Illinois, is the National Director of the B'nai B'rith Hillel Foundation with office at Champaign, Illinois.   c.p.s.

Student Volunteer Movement for Foreign Missions: An agency for promoting missionary interest among college students and recruiting candidates for service under the various mission Boards of North America.

This Movement originated in the first Y.M C A conference for college students, convened by D. L. Moody* and held at Mt. Hermon, Mass. in July 1886.   Despite the absence of official plans for missionary promotion, Robert Wilder from Princeton awakened much interest among the 251 delegates.   One hundred of them signed a statement already used at Princeton, "We are willing and desirous, if God permit, to become foreign missionaries".   In 1886-87 Wilder and John Forman, both India born and from Princeton, visited 162 colleges and theological seminaries and enrolled over 2000 Student Volunteers. Robert Speer was the travelling secretary in 1889-90 and enrolled 1100 in 110 schools. By 1891 the total was 6200.

Formal organization was effected in 1888 and the Movement, though autonomous, became the missionary department of the student Christian Associations and the recruiting agency for the mission Boards of the churches   In 1900 the Movement was incorporated and the headquarters were set up in New York. From 1888 to 1920 the chairman of the executive committee was John R Mott who was one of the "Mt. Hermon Hundred" and an influential leader in the student Y.M.C A.   He did much to unify the various phases of the student Christian movement and to relate them to the growing missionary program of the churches.

The program of the Movement included campus visits by travelling secretaries and the promotion of voluntary mission study classes which in 1919 enrolled 47,681 college students. Most noted were the Quadrennial Conventions which began in 1891 and became widely noted for their size and enthusiasm as well as for their slogan, "The evangelization of the world in this generation".   The eighth was held in 1920 and drew 6890 people from 949 schools.   Each student generation was thus faced with a missionary appeal by such noted leaders as John R. Mott, Robert E. Speer, G. Sherwood Eddy, Robert P. Wilder and others.

Between 1886 and 1936 the Movement enrolled just under 50,000 Student Volunteers, of which number over 13,000 sailed to the foreign mission fields. These Volunteers constituted about half of the total number of missionaries sent out. Gifts for missions were stimulated so that in 1918-19 over $303,000 were contributed by student religious organizations.*   By 1920 the Movement was the recognized recruiting agency for the mission Boards and its ideology and objectives served as a unifying center for all branches of the student Christian movement.

The last two decades have been marked by confusion and decline in both the general student Christian movement and in the missionary program of the churches   Accordingly the work and influence of the Movement have greatly decreased. By 1940 only a small staff remained and both the objectives and relationships of the Movement had become less clear.

John R Mott, Five Decades and a Forward View (1939)   Clarence P Shedd, Two Centuries of Student Christian Movements (1934) . Robert P Wilder, The Great Commission (1936) , William M Beahm, Factors in the Development of the Student Volunteer Movement for Foreign Missions, unpublished dissertation at University of Chicago (1941)   w.m b

Students' Lectureship on Missions: The Students' Lectures on Missions were endowed in 1893 by the students of Princeton Theological Seminary with the generous assistance of James Shepard Dennis   A course of five lectures on foreign missions has been given annually.   Among the lecturers there have been many famous missionaries, as   Robert Eliot Speer, John R. Mott, Charles Roger Watson, Wilfred T. Grenfell, Sir Andrew Fraser, Charles E Scott, Samuel M. Zwemer, J. C. R. Ewing, Webster E. Browning, Charles Allen Clark, Augustus K Reischauer, John Van Ess, Albert B. Dodd, John A. Mackay, Nicol Macnicol, Kenneth Scott Latourette, William Paton.

For a complete list of lectures consult the Biographical Catalogue of the Seminary (1933) page XXX.   j.a.m.

Stundists: See Russian sectarianism.

Stundobaptists: See Russian sectarianism

Stylites: See anchoret.

Suarez, Francisco: (1548-1617) Spanish Jesuit* theologian, known as Doctor Eximius   As a religious he was firmly devoted to prayer and mortification, a tireless worker, humble and modest.   As a theologian he taught in the ranking educational centers of his day, at Avila, Segovia, Valladolid, Rome, Alcala, Salamanca, and Coimbra.   He also taught philosophy at Avila and Segovia.   His voluminous writings testify to their author's marvellous grasp of the field, his depth of thought and clarity of expression.   They have merited many Scholastic commentaries.   w.h.

subdeacon: One who has received the lowest of the three Major Orders, which culminate in the priesthood.   He assists the deacon at the altar, sings the epistle during a Solemn High Mass, and washes the sacred linens used at Mass*.   w.h.

subjective idealism: See idealism, subjective sublapsarianism: (sub, under, lapsus, fall) The doctrine which holds that God did not decree the Fall* of man, but foresaw it, thus holding the decrees of reprobation and election to be subordinate to the fact of the Fall.

Held by some of the orthodox Dutch Calvinists. Neither rejected nor affirmed, as such, at the Synod of Dort*, but congenial to the orthodox. See predestination. Cf. infralapsarianism, supralapsarianism.   E P.B.

subliminal self: (Lat., sub, limen, under the threshold) A term used in the 1890's by F. W. H. Myers, and subsequently made popular in religious psychology (now much less commonly used), to designate what was believed to be the larger portion of the self lying below the level (threshold) of consciousness yet constantly influencing thought and behavior. The unconscious factors or processes comprehended under the term are now widely recognized the influence of racial history, infantile and childhood conditionings (habits acquired through suggestion and imitation*, and complexes of ideas and emotions accumulated around traumatic experiences), dream mechanisms, short-cut problem-solving, dissociation, etc The interpretation of such factors and processes, however, is not uniform, some psychologists regarding them as purely physiological mechanisms, others as predominantly psychological or mental (Freud*, for example, speaks of "unconscious psychic states") William James* used the concept of the subliminal or subconscious self to suggest the area of human experience in which contact with the Divine Life may occur (Varieties, 511 ff.). See mysticism.   E T.R.

subordinationism: (fr Lat. subordinare, to subordinate) A modern term referring in general to any interpretation of the Doctrine of the Trinity* which treats the Second or Third Persons as metaphysically inferior to the First, but applied in particular to those early views of the relation between the Son and the Father (and incidentally to the relation of the Holy Spirit* with the Son and the Father) which anticipated, but fell short of, the Nicene formulation of consubstantiality (homoousia*) and the subsequently definitive *Symbolum Quicunque (Athanasian Creed).   E.T.R.

subsistence: (Lat. subsistere, fr. sub, under; sistere, cause to stand) In most current usage, the kind of being attributable to relations between terms, or to any possible object of thought, whether or not the object exists, and whether or not it is an object of actual thought. In scholasticism, an individualizing mode of a substance.
                                                    L.H.DeW.

substance: (Lat. substantia, fr. sub, under; stare, to stand) The real being which possesses attributes, endures through change, and underlies external appearances. The essence of an existent. Philosophers differ concerning the questions whether substance is one (Spinoza) or many (Leibniz), knowable (Aristotle) or unknowable (Hume), material (Democritus) or mental (Lotze), etc.   L.H.DeW.

substance, Aristotelian: See Aristotle and Aristotelianism.

substitutionary theories: See redemption; satisfaction.

sudra: The lowest of the four traditional varnas or castes in India. The three upper castes are called the twice born The Sudra, formed, according to Rig-Veda* X, from the feet of the Purusha*, performs the humble, menial tasks in Indian society Still below the sudra is the outcaste or untouchable, though the line of demarcation is not sharply drawn between them and the Sudras.
                                                    C S B.

suffering: See atonement, evil, passion, perfect.

sufficient cause: See cause.

suffragan: A diocesan bishop is suffragan to his archbishop—by analogy an auxiliary bishop* is so called in mediaeval English and modern Anglican usage   E.R.H.

Sufism: A system of Mohammedan mysticism, arising chiefly in Persia The Arabic sufi, means wool, and refers to the woolen garments worn by such ascetics from the 2nd century In common with Hinduism and Christianity it offers steps toward union with God, as repentance, abstinence, renunciation, poverty, patience, trust. Love is the key to the Sufi ethics. The most brilliant poetry of Persia* is Sufi. Recent revivals appear in Egypt and Turkey. See Alfarabi, dervish; Mohammedanism, tauhid   P.E.J.

suggestion: (Lat, suggestio) The process by which an individual tends uncritically to accept, as true or normative, ideas and attitudes to which he is exposed. The tendency to such credulous response is the psychological law directly exploited by much commercial advertising and political propaganda. More important, it is a chief factor in the individual's conformity to the mores and prevailing attitudes of the group or groups to which he belongs, and no where more obviously than in the life of the cultus. Suggestibility tends to diminish with increase in critical intelligence.
                                                    E.T.R.

suicide: Self-destruction by the intentional taking of one's life. Although now held to be reprehensible legally, morally and religiously in the West, various positions have been taken toward it historically from approval and even recommendation of it under certain circumstances (as in Stoicism* and Japan) to positive condemnation. On the whole the Christian church has condemned it unqualifiedly as an offense against God's will, grace and judgment. The recent trend is to attribute it to insanity or to personal disorganization viewed as a function of social disorganization. See harakiri, seppuku.
   For historical survey see Hasting's Encyclopaedia of Religion and Ethics. For contemporary interpretation see Encyclopaedia Britannica and R S. Cavan: Suicide (1928).   R.W.F.

Sulpicians: Members of the Congregation of St. Sulpice, founded in 1642 by M. Olier, a French priest. The Congregation takes its name from its first establishment. The life work of the Sulpicians is to prepare young men for the priesthood

W H.

Sumerians, religion of: See Mesopotamian religions.

Summa Theologica: The summa theologica is a "compendium containing brief, systematic, comprehensive and well thought out exposition of the principal truths of Christian doctrine" It developed out of the sentencebooks, which began to be compiled in the late patristic and early mediaeval period, and which at first were impersonal collection of excerpts (sententiae) from the writings of the Fathers of the Church. In systematic presentation these works continued to develop, while they gradually became more personal, especially from the early twelfth century on. By the late twelfth century, therefore, the character of the sentencebooks had greatly changed, and to denote this change the title summa theologica began to appear around the turn of the thirteenth century. The best known of sentencebooks is the Libri IV Sententiarum composed by Peter Lombard* between 1145-1152, the greatest summa is the Summa Theologica, written by St. Thomas Aquinas* between 1267-1273. This latter work is divided into three parts, of which the first two are each in turn divided into two parts. In general, part one treats of God, part two of man and his relations to God, part three of Christ in his Incarnation and in his continuation through the Church and her sacraments. St. Thomas completed this work only as far as part three, question ninety, article four. The scholastic method of handling theological questions, so well exemplified in St Thomas' Summa, developed during the hundred years or so immediately preceding its writing, and has its origin principally in the Sic et non of Peter Abailard* and in the logical works of Aristotle*, all of which became available in translation to scholars in the West only in the twelfth century. See Sentences.

P.S M.

summum bonum: (Lat., the highest good) The highest ideal of conduct. The good is the object of desire, "that at which all things aim" (Aristotle, Nic. Eth., I, l, i), it is substantially identical in meaning with value*. Greek ethics, dominated by the idea of the highest good, was teleological, in contrast with the formalism of Kantian ethics. The central problem of Greek ethics was the definition of the summum bonum. Although Plato (Socrates) identified the good with pleasure in the Protagoras and then repudiated this identification in the Gorgias, he hesitated to commit himself to any definition of the Idea of the Good (Rep. 506DE). Aristotle described it as happiness (See eudaemonism.) The hedonists (see Cyrenaics, Epicureanism) found it to be pleasure, either physical or mental. The Cynics* declared that the summum bonum is knowledge, while the Stoics*, nearer to Kant, found it solely in a good will (independent of "externals"). For the Neo-Platonists*, as for many Christian mystics, the summum bonum was the union of the soul with God. See axiology.

See article, "Summum Bonum" by P. Shorey in Hastings, Encyclopedia of Religion and Ethics.

E.S B

sun, sun worship: Sun myths are found in the mythologies of all races The sun has been one of the most persistent and ancient objects of interest of the human race. Sun symbols occur in Neolithic deposits around the globe. Max Mueller ascribed to sun worship the earliest form of religion. But it cannot be assumed that sun myths and symbols are always evidence of sun worship The elaborate calendars of ancient peoples and the simple calculations of the most primitive tribes on the course of the sun, reveal other interests associated with the sun The observed relation of the sun to food production gave the shaman his clue to weather prediction and crop protection. In more advanced civilizations, such as the Babylonian and Mayan, the study of the sun's movements, correlated with that of moon and stars, led to the science of astronomy and aided the development of mathematics.

Sun worship reached its highest development in Egypt, Mexico and Japan. It was only in Mexico that this development was accompanied by a high degree of perfection of astronomical and mathematical sciences. In Egypt, the pyramids were probably associated with sun-worship as shown by their orientation. The sun god Ra persists through Egyptian ancient history. In the 13th century B. C. Ikhnaton* established a monotheistic religion of high ethical character, centering about the sun god Aton, represented by a disk with rays extended as beneficent hands. Solar worship spread to Greece and into Western Europe. In Mexico, the Mayans pictured the sun god as a jaguar. Human sacrifice came to be associated with the cult. Their priests worked out an exhaustive calendar and mathematical tables Among other American Indians there was the sun dance of the Plain Indians, the vision experience of the Crow in Montana (see Lowie, Primitive Religion) and the ceremonial offering of sacred meal to the dawn by the Pueblo in Arizona. In Japan, the royal house is believed to stem from the Sun goddess Amaterasu* and to have maintained an unbroken line for 26 centuries Her earliest mythologies, centering about this solar cult, are associated with the struggle for food against a harsh climate.

In all solar cults, the sun represents healing, fruitful qualities. And in the ethical religions, as that of Aton, the Sun was a harsh judge of men's deeds as well as a benevolent sovereign.

M.L C.

Sunday: Prior to the late sixteenth century Christianity did not identify Sabbath and Lord's Day. Luther, Zwingli, Calvin and other early Protestant reformers taught that the Sabbath was abrogated in Christianity. Calvin thought it an insult to the Jews to change their day. It was English Puritanism* which first identified Sunday with Sabbath and the Westminster Confession of Faith* popularized the innovation in 1647. New England Congregationalism* introduced this new theology to America and all American Calvinistic groups promoted it. Opposition to First Day Sabbath in colonial days was led by the Rogerenes and Seventh Day Baptists who were joined by the Seventh Day Adventists in the mid-nineteenth century. The invention of the automobile and the building of good roads are destroying both Seventh and First Day Sabbaths. See Lord's Day; Sabbatarianism, Puritan, sabbath, Christian.

C.H.M

Sunday School Council of the Evangelical Denominations: See Sunday School movement in the United States.

Sunday School movement in the United States: Essentially an evangelical Protestant endeavor to provide religious education in schools held on Sunday, promotional and instructional aspects of growth designable by periods, as follows:

I. Sporadic Beginnings, 1674-1815 Catechetical-Centered Instruction of Children First practical application of the Sunday School idea in America is credited to Roxbury, Massachusetts, where in 1674 children are claimed to have been gathered for Sunday religious instruction, details uncertain. Thereafter until 1816 followed a comparatively ineffectual struggle to achieve more than fitful local expression. For over a century progress was virtually negligible, only a few accounts of activity of Roxbury type slipping into historical record, notice so limited in most instances as to leave authenticity of report open to question. It was not until Robert Raikes popularized the Sunday School in England in the 1780's and news of his success crossed the Atlantic that anythink like a Sunday School "movement" took shape in America.

The basic features of the Raikes' scheme appealed to the current evangelical temper. Being a philanthropic plan for ameliorating the condition of poor and neglected children, it naturally fell in line with mounting evangelical missionary spirit. Considerably more significant, however, was the thoroughly lay character of the project. Lay promoted, lay supported and lay taught, increasingly on the voluntary principle, the Raikes' school offered the ordinary religious individual a means of practical service unlike any he had had before. No longer need his revival-engendered evangelical zeal remain pent-up for lack of concrete expression.

Thus there cropped up, 1785-1815, a fair number of Sunday Schools based on the new English model. First recorded of these was a home-conducted project of William Elliott, a Methodist layman who aimed to better the condition of the white children, servants and slaves working on his Virginia (Accomack County) estate. By 1790 enthusiasm had spread sufficiently in the South to prompt the Charleston (S.C.) Methodist Conference to urge the establishment of "Sunday Schools" for "poor children, white and black", such to be held "in or near the place of public worship" under the leadership of "persons" appointed by church officials Poor attendance, however, soon induced the Conference to abandon official appointments and return the cause to its initial base of voluntary lay initiative. Meantime, the movement was spreading northward, devoid of fast denominational ties, to experience better reception By 1791 Philadelphia, New York and Boston had each initiated a project in Sunday instruction of needy children. Occasionally satellite adventures developed, typified in the East by the Pawtucket (R. I.) Sunday School for cotton mill youth, in the West by the Pittsburgh effort to provide Sunday instruction for frontier children.

Still the movement remained essentially a series of uncoordinated local efforts. Only activity in Philadelphia appears to have enjoyed a degree of extended influence. There, in 1790 under the leadership of the Reverend William White, a group of citizens of varied faith united to form the "First Day or Sunday School Society" for the purpose of systematic promotion of the Raikes-type school. Rooms were secured in various parts of the city, teachers employed and classes begun During the first ten years some 2,000 underprivileged children were so served with religious instruction Thereafter success was less marked. Finally, on account of encroachments upon the curriculum of the newly founded Pennsylvania school system of which it had been largely the inspiration and to difficulties of the war years, the society closed its schools in 1814 and turned its attention to less conspicuous promotion of the voluntary lay-taught school.

The instructional aspects of the period prior to introduction of the Raikes-type school are obscure. Thereafter a general plan of operation becomes apparent Children between the ages of six and twelve or fourteen were chief objects of attention; pre-school, adolescent and adult ages practically ignored. School sessions of five to eight hours on a single Sunday were not unusual, time being equally divided before and after morning worship service. Lengthy session was dictated by course of study. Inasmuch as the children taught were highly underprivileged, pupil illiteracy was so universal as to require elementary instruction in reading, writing, spelling, etc. before much progress could be made in religious improvement. Thus the early Sunday School dispensed both rudimentary and religious education, a dual service that required keeping scholars the greater part of the day. Religious emphasis was maintained throughout by employment of Catechism* and Bible as basic texts, a conscious yet forced limitation of teaching materials, since other text-books would not have been available in quantity even if desired. Choice of catechism varied with sponsoring group, all historic Protestant catechisms as well as the private adaptations of Watts, Rayner and Packard seeing use. The Bible played a secondary role, being used chiefly as a reader, passages chosen with view to illustrating catechetical teaching.

The ultimate aim of instruction in this period appears that of righting the child with God by exposing him to and urging his acceptance of "correct doctrine". It was a material-centered program, theology and preparation for the other world in the foreground, children in the background. Gradation of materials to suit the age of child non-existent in the modern sense although the catechisms of Watts and the Methodist Church made a special effort to word complex doctrines more simply for the younger ages. Memoriter catechetical method of teaching requiring pupils to memorize answers to questions asked by preceptor added appreciably to the educational ordeal. The introduction of the reward ticket (ca 1811) to liven enthusiasm indicates rather clearly that the process was an ordeal.

II Promotion by Union, heydey 1816-1858· Transition to Bible-Centered Curriculum and Halting Advance toward Standardization of Materials and Method. With the close of the War of 1812 the stage was set for a Sunday School boom Restored transatlantic communication brought fresh suggestions of way and means of promotion from England. Renewed interest in education and religion created a favorable atmosphere for their application. Welling national spirit encouraged application on a nation-wide scale.

The forward surge began in New York City in 1816 with the joint founding of the "Female Society for Promotion of Sabbath Schools" and the "New York Sunday School Union Society", the former to promote work among women and girls of the city, the latter among boys. Though thoroughly lay organizations, by the end of their first year they had together under their care 44 schools, 5,200 scholars and several hundred teachers, a number of denominations being represented in the endeavor.

The founding of the Sunday and Adult School Union in Philadelphia in 1817 proved to be even more eventful. Announcing the nation as its mission field, this Union steadily forged ahead to gain unquestioned precedence. By 1824 there were in its connection 723 schools, 7,300 teachers and 49,619 scholars representing seventeen states, the District of Columbia and various Protestant faiths. In addition, major responsibility for publishing Sunday School literature had been assumed.

Clearly bested as promotional agencies the New York societies magnanimously chose to become auxiliaries to the Philadelphia Union and urged other local societies not yet affiliated to do the same. The Union responded by changing its charter and name to suit the situation, becoming on May 25, 1824 the American Sunday School Union pledged to 1) Secure unity of effort. 2) Circulate appropriate literature in every part of the land. 3) Plant a Sunday School wherever there was a population.

For approximately forty years the "American" Union held its position as central agency of Sunday School progress in America, but it was an up-hill, down-hill existence. The first ten years were mostly up. Within eighteen months nearly 400 local and regional unions representing 22 of the 24 states lined up with the main effort, whereupon the Union settled back to consolidate gains rather than stress further auxiliary expansion. By 1830 the results of organizational effort were obvious. Now the Union had in its connection 6,000 schools, 60,000 teachers and 400,000 scholars. In addition it had issued since 1824 some 6,000,000 Sunday School works· this exclusive of the establishment of three periodicals, one for infants, one for children, one for teachers. Contemporaneous with this report came the launching of the gigantic "Mississippi Valley Enterprise" designed to place within two years a Sunday School in every community west of the Alleghanies. Success achieved to the extent of 3,000 new schools founded and another 1,000 revived, a "Southern Enterprise" was projected on a similar scale in 1833. At this point spectacular advance ceased. Opposition forces that had been biding their time leaped to life to bring the new project to an untimely end. Thenceforth the principle of centralized control by Union received repeated rebuff, within thirty years was pushed aside.

The factors undermining Union leadership were general and ecclesiastical. Of general nature were various objections to the plan and purpose of the Sunday School itself, such as that it usurped the role of the parent, overlapped the program of the public school, imposed on the leisure of the child, profaned the Sabbath, etc. As a pioneering organization the Union tread a much rockier path in these areas than did its successors More specifically ecclesiastical in nature as well as more telling in consequence were the numerous denominational attacks upon the "Union" principle of control. One after another, beginning 1826 with the Episcopalians, the major denominations flouted Union effort by founding Sunday School societies of their own, determined thereby to make the Sunday School a church auxiliary for inculcating peculiar doctrinal tenets. Even non-evangelicals, not heretofore inclined to Sunday School activity, founded religious education projects of their own, Unitarians leading the way in 1830. Only the more radical anti-missionary groups (see anti-missionary movement) resisted to any degree the urge to denominational promotion, a matter of little comfort in face of their blatant accusation that the Union was a "priestly" design to effect merger of Church and State. By 1859 it was clear that the days of centralized promotion by Union were over. Its literature had been successfully challenged by the output of partisan presses; its treasury was drained, most of its auxiliaries were dissolved. Graciously it acknowledged its loss of prestige and gave way to "National" Convention, bequeathing the latter supervisory welfare of some 3,000,000 scholars. The Union has, however, carried on in subsidiary capacity to date, having to its credit the impressive average of nearly four Sunday Schools founded daily during the entire period of its existence.

Chief instructional aspects 1816-1859 were: 1) Firm establishment of the principle of "voluntary", i.e., unpaid, lay teaching. 2) Forsaking of sole ministry to the underprivileged to conduct work among all classes of society. 3) Extension of age range upwards to include adults (ca 1815) and downward to include infants (ca 1827). 4) Curricular change reducing Sunday School from a more or less all-day session of elementary instruction centered about catechism to a relatively brief period of Biblical exercise.

Curricular change merits special notice. Improvement of public school facilities progressively reduced the need for instructing the poor in the rudiments of reading, writing and spelling. Expansion among educated classes pushed this practice still further into the background. Soon day school subjects were dropped completely, reduced scope of curriculum leading to shortened instruction period, approximating that customary today.

Of the exclusively religious developments in the area of curriculum, several bear mention. First came an English-inspired turn away from catechism toward unrestricted memorization of Biblical material. Taking hold in a modest way about 1815, by 1825 the latter practice became the vogue, making the Sunday School little more than a place for recitation before the teacher of random passages of Scripture memorized during the week. Rewards were dispensed on the basis of the quantity of material so mastered, some of the more enthusiastic pupils memorizing whole books of the Bible

About 1825 this memorization process was significantly modified by the introduction of "Selected Scripture Lessons". Whereas haphazard pupil choice of memory verses had come to be the rule, premium placed on quantitative recitation rather than - quality of material chosen, now teacher or organization "selected" definite portions of Scripture for memorization each Sunday of the year, seldom more than ten to twenty verses in length, and required all who would receive credit for instruction to comply with these "limited" selections. Thus orderly and qualitative Biblical instruction pressed to the fore. The privately published lesson lists of Goodrich (1820), Fowle (1823), Parmele (1823) and Tomlinson and Seaton (1824) paved the way for the advance. The American Sunday School Union's "Selected Lessons", first appearing in 1825 reaped the harvest. So popularly were these received throughout the country that standardization of Sunday School curriculum came near to being an established fact.

Almost immediately various types of "Lesson Helps" appeared to further enhance the effectiveness of instruction. Hereby the untrained lay teacher was provided with a means of interpreting Selected Lessons to the pupil. The "Union Bible Dictionary" was a preliminary gesture in this area, providing meanings of names, descriptions of places, explanations of customs, etc. Sunday School periodicals provided additional suggestions. Most significant of all, however, was the "Question Book Annual". First Judson (1826), then Fisk (1828), then the "American" Union (1828) published books of questions designed to test the pupil's mastery of the content of the Selected Lessons for the current year. The "Union Questions" quickly gained the day, making for another conspicuous advance toward the standardization of curriculum of materials

Thence ensued the so-called "Babel Era" of Sunday School instruction Private and denominational agencies becoming alarmed at Union monopoly of Sunday School literature, flooded the market with alternative materials. As early as 1831 the Moravian "Verse-a-Day Plan" received widespread publicity, calling for memorization of an assigned verse each day and the basing of the Sunday-Lesson on the seven verses learned during the week Thereupon followed a confusion of Scripture Selections, Question Books and periodicals bent on teaching doctrines of specific groups. Some organizations even reverted to the old basis of catechetical instruction. It appeared as though Union efforts to introduce orderliness into Sunday School curricula were to go for naught

Yet the libertinism of the period was not without its positive side. If nothing else, it gave impetus to a crude move toward gradation of lesson materials Some private lesson writers, in addition to making the usual superficial adaptations of materials for Infants and Adults, went so far as to prepare four grades of instructional helps for the ages 6 to 12. Older adolescents, however, continued to be herded with adults.

III Promotion by Convention, haydey 1859-1905 Practical Achievement of Standardized Bible Study The meeting of the "National" Sunday School Convention at Philadelphia in 1859 heralded a new era in the life of the American Sunday School. This was not because the Convention idea was particularly new. Local Sunday School gatherings of Convention sort had been common since about 1820. Even two National Conventions had been held by the "American Union" in 1832 and 1833 in connection with a Sunday School survey. The significant thing about the 1859 Convention at Philadelphia was that it was the first of "National" scope to take serious thought for its succession. Before adjournment, a non-partisan lay committee was appointed to call another Convention, which gathering was in turn to make similar provision for its continuation, and so each succeeding one in turn. Thus central leadership other than that of the American Sunday School Union emerged.

Although the outbreak of the Civil War postponed the meeting of the next National Convention, planned for 1861, until 1869 the response to the new leadership was at this time most reassuring, 526 workers from 28 states attending. The next session held at Indianapolis in 1872 brought an enthusiastic expansionist motion that Canada be invited to participate fully in the scheme. Canadians responding favorably, the Baltimore gathering of 1875 appropriately became the First "International" Sunday School Convention. Ever since International gatherings of Sunday School workers of the United States and Canada have been held regularly, up to 1914 at triennial intervals, after that quadrennially. So far as the exercise of central leadership of the Sunday School Movement on this continent goes, however, the International Convention was forced to step aside in 1905 to make way for newer developments (infra). Poor attendance did not figure into the superseding process, inasmuch as the International Convention of 1905 had an attendance just short of 2,000. Moreover, the Convention idea was at that very time assuming even greater expression in another form In 1889 a World Sunday School Convention had been formed as a separate organization for promoting International cooperation on a larger scale. Still meeting as regularly as conditions of war and peace allow, it has so far met twelve times, last gathering being held at Oslo, Norway, in 1936, 3,000 delegates from 60 nations attending Quite obviously the Convention spirit is still very much alive in Sunday School circles. It is only as main channel of Sunday School development that it has been superseded.

The half century of Conventional ascendancy was due largely to two factors. First of these was the extremely democratic theory of organization upon which the Convention system was conceived. Each Convention was cautiously considered a separate enterprise, a new election of officers being held before adjournment to allow unseating of any undesired leadership As for powers of jurisdiction, the officers elected were to confine their attention to the immediate problems involved in calling the next Convention. During the interim between gatherings local and denominational leaders were to carry on without interference This arrangement placated the chief fear that had brought Union efforts to grief, viz., that of a permanent board of managers which might become so powerful jurisdictionally as to dictate universal policy over minority opposition. Consequently evangelical groups of nearly all descriptions reunited for promotional purposes. Hereupon the second factor began to exert its influence. Attendance at a large National or International Convention returned the Sunday School worker to his church with widened perspective, enthusiasm and knowledge which appreciably enhanced his effectiveness as a leader. Attendant looked forward eagerly to the next Convention, those whom he had led to the new inspiration he would bring back.

Educationally speaking, the rise of the Convention to power signified revival of the "American Union's" dream of standardized Sunday School curriculum, so effectively stopped on the threshhold of realization by the wilful confusion of the "Babel Era".

The priming factor in this educational development was the adoption of the Normal Class method of training Sunday School teachers. Undoubtedly influenced by the Normal School movement in public education, the Rev. John Vincent both conceived the idea of and successfully held a local Sunday School Normal Class at Joliet, Illinois. The founding of the first regular Sunday School Teacher's Institute followed at Galena, Illinois, in 1861. Rapidly the practice spread to other parts of the country, achieving perhaps its most memorable expression in the establishment of the Chatauqua Sunday School Assembly for Teachers in 1874, perhaps its most spectacular success by way of influencing theological seminaries to offer courses in the field of religious education beginning 1906.

This emphasis on teacher-training inevitably meant change in the area of curriculum. Teachers trained in methods of lesson presentation at an Institute or Assembly revolted against their traditional role as listening post in memoriter and catechetical exercise. Theirs was the urge to exercise the true teaching mission of interpreting lesson to scholar Unitedly they began to clamor for less confusion, more planning in the issuance of lesson lists and helps that they might be able to exercise newly felt mission to best advantage

Curricular adjustment came by way of adoption of a Uniform Bible Lesson system which called for the study of the same text by all ages, children and adults, on a given Sunday. The Reverend J H Vincent laid the foundation for the development, first by founding in 1865 at Chicago a Sunday School Teacher's Quarterly whereby new lesson plans could easily be circulated over a large area, secondly by beginning publication in this quarterly in 1866 a course of "uniform" lessons entitled "A Two Years' Course With Jesus". So the periodical lesson help for teachers and the first significant course of uniform lessons were born simultaneously. Vincent, relinquishing his editorial duties in 1867, was succeeded by the Rev Edward Eggleston who sought to promote the uniform policy on a thoroughly national scale by changing the name of the "Quarterly" to National Sunday School Teacher and by publishing therein beginning 1868 a National Series of lessons. Similar attempts followed. Soon Convention officials fell wholeheartedly behind the movement, adopting as their objectives for Sunday School lessons 1) One Lesson for all ages. 2) One lesson for all schools. 3) Expositions of the lesson in all religious and secular papers that could be induced to cooperate. Accordingly an International Lesson Committee was appointed by the 1872 Convention In 1873 the familiar International Uniform Bible Lessons made their official appearance. Adoption within evangelical circles was practically immediate. Publication has continued to date in five to eight-year lesson cycles within which Old and New Testament materials have been used in variant plan. The overthrow of Convention leadership in 1905, however, was tantamount to official repudiation of the Uniform Lesson System, so that its popularity has since been steadily on the wane, though its circulation is by no means inconsiderable even now

As the International Uniform Lesson appeared without commentary, the matter of producing adequate lesson helps became urgent. Private and denominational publishers soon placed upon the market a goodly variety of such helps. Perhaps as widely used as any of these were the Eclectic Library (1872-1879), its successor, the Lesson Commentary (Vincent and Hurlburt, editors, 1880-1900) and Select Notes on the International Sun- day School Lessons (F. N Peloubet, editor, 1875). Quite clearly such helps reflected a move away from the older mechanical means of instilling Scriptural precept by memoriter and catechetical method, a move in the direction of focussing pupil attention upon the deeper meaning of the Scripture selection by way of explanations and illustrations designed to excite imagination and kindle emotions.

Yet despite improved teaching helps, the fundamental nature of the Sunday School program remained unchanged. It was still material centered as contrasted to child-centered in emphasis. Impartation of a specific body of knowledge continued to be the chief educational objective. It could scarcely be otherwise so long as the idea of a Uniform Lesson for all ages remained in command Adaptation to specific age needs was necessarily limited to the process of diluting or stepping up of lesson commentary as the immediate situation demanded. So, in a way, the Uniform Lesson was a backward step. It definitely throttled the move toward gradation of lesson materials which had begun to take form late in the "Babel Era" On the other hand, its part in bringing order out of instructional chaos is not to be underestimated. The growing teaching consciousness which prompted this return to orderliness was in itself insurance that the ultimate outcome would be adaptation of lesson material to meet the scholar at his specific age level.

IV. From Convention to Council, 1905 to date: Re-evaluation of Objectives Leading to Closely Graded Church School Curriculum. Although the central guiding body of the American Sunday School Movement has borne varying names since displacement of Convention leadership, general development are such as to advise singular treatment of events transpiring from that time to this Throughout this latest period of Sunday School growth two inter-related trends stand out· 1) A gradual shift of key leadership positions from voluntary lay to professional religious hands. 2) Correspondingly an increasing application of the best of educational techniques resulting in finer and finer adaptations of methods and practice.

The gathering force of these interrelated trends were directly responsible for the rise of the International Sunday School Association to the place of central leadership in 1905. Unswerving attachment of lay Convention leaders to the International Uniform Lesson had for some time proved irksome to professional religious educators. Democratic as the organization of this central guiding body was in theory, in practice its powerful lay executives seemed consistently able to rally sufficient backing to defeat any proposed changes in the Uniform system. Finally professional advocates of lesson reform were driven to separate action. In 1884 a group of specialists bent on securing graded lessons for younger ages organized a National Primary Union which functioned separately from the Convention Executive, but none the less demanded the right of a special session at Convention meetings. In 1892 the graded Blakeslee Lessons appeared as formidable rivals to the Uniform lessons Contemporaneously Northern Baptist educators were preparing a Primary, Junior and Advanced lesson course independent of Uniform selections In succession, the Field Workers Association (1892), the Sunday School Editorial Association (1901), the Religious Education Association (1903) and other lesser known bodies were established for the purpose of promoting advances as best they could independent of Convention ties. Significant Schools of Sunday School Method were also founded throughout the 1890's, such as those at Northfield (Mass.), Winona Lake (Ind) and Asbury Park (N.J). Schools of Demonstration in which methods were applied in actual situations followed (1899 ff), such as those of the Hyde Park Baptist and Congregational churches of Chicago, under the leadership of faculty members of the University of Chicago, and the Union School of Religion in connection with Columbia University. The pressure of profession organization and research could no longer be successfully resisted. About 1900 the Convention Lesson Committee agreed to make concessions with respect to lesson adjustments, first for younger children, then for college students, then for adults Simultaneously traditional control by Convention at large gave way in practice to central control by an Executive Committee compromised of representatives of the leading Sunday School forces that had pressured alteration in the Uniform system. Now in effect Sunday School policy was being formulated by a permanent board of officials over which Convention meetings had but nominal control Accordingly, it was considered appropriate in 1905 to change the name of the central guiding body to International Sunday School Association.

Association leadership proved to be of brief duration. Most unfortunately the decision was made in 1907 to reinforce functional Executive permanence with Incorporation proceedings. Denominational revolt flared anew. The implications of control by a legally incorporated Board of Managers were no more acceptable now than in the early days of the American Sunday School Union. By 1910 the "Sunday School Council of Evangelical Denominations", consisting of employed officers of the Sunday School boards and agencies of nineteen denominations, had been formed purposely to combat the Associational principle of leadership and was operating effectively For a decade territorially-minded Association officials tried to stand off denominationally-conscious Council. Strife at last ended in 1922 in the compromise formation of the International Sunday School Council of Religious Education which in 1924 became simply the International Council of Religious Education. Within the new Council set-up executive and committees were constituted on a bi-cameral basis whereby "territorial" and "denominational" interests received equal representation. In like democratic spirit legislative power of the Convention was restored with respect to fundamental issues. Such permanent organization as existed between Conventions was to be by way of "Professional Advisory Sections" for children, young people, adults, field workers, editors, etc So, under the professional leadership of the International Council, the Sunday School Movement has continued to exhibit a united front to the present day

Amidst this recent organizational upheaval, its provoking feature, the move for child-centered graded curriculum, was taking strides apace Co-incidental with Associational rise, the International "Closely Graded" Lessons appeared in their initial form in 1909. Similarly with the rise of opposition to Associational leadership, a succession of rival graded lessons made their appearance The Lutheran Graded Series (of gradual making since 1895); the Chicago Constructive Studies in Religion (1910, being a belated printing, W R. Harper's Hyde Park School of Demonstration), Scribner's Completely Graded Series (1911, a revision of the old Blakeslee Lessons), the Christian Nurture Series (1912 ff, Protestant Episcopal), the Westminster Series of Departmental Graded Lessons (1915 ff, Presbyterian) The Unitarian-sponsored Beacon Course in Religious Education (1912 ff) also deserves mention as indication that non-evangelicals were also feeling the influence of the atmosphere.
With the restoration of organizational unity under the International Council no specific effort was made to curb the trend toward multiplication of curriculum materials. Rather, through its "Professional Advisory Sections", the Council confined its attention to supplying specific groups with knowledge of basic educational principles upon which they could formulate lessons suited to their own cherished beliefs. Consequently few distinct religious groups are to be found today without their own graded lessons standardized in keeping with the Council's departmental scheme for the various ages, viz. Nursery (1-3), Beginners (4-5), Primary (6-8), Junior (9-11), Junior High School Age (12-14), Senior High School Age (15-17), Young People (18-ca. 25), Young Adults (ca 25-ca. 35), Adults (ca. 35). Within each department the various ages are also treated separately. Cradle Roll and Home Department are frequently added to the scheme of grading, the former to display interest in the babe-in-arms, the latter to provide for religious needs of the shut-in.

Far more important than these outward evidences of curriculum advance in direction of the pupil-centered curriculum is the changing philosophy of religious education that underlies them.
The ideal of imparting a specific body of Biblical knowledge has been superseded by a desire to arouse commitments, loyalties and enthusiasms that will translate themselves into actual religious living on the part of the child or adult; or, in other words, to build religious "character". Religious education and character education have become in a very real sense synonymous terms.
Accordingly every educational device useful in soliciting actual religious response from the pupil has come to be considered appropriate as lesson material. Hence the inclusion of much extra-

Biblical matter in the way of inspirational biography, studies of social problems, etc., also, an emphasis on pupil activities designed to mould character through the medium of creative experience.

To be considered as counterpart of this developing philosophy of religious education is the growing conviction that the terms Sunday School and Church must cease to be considered as separate entities. Rather they are to be considered one and the same The Church, instead of having such a school in its connection is to be considered "in all its parts and functions itself a school". Sunday School, morning worship, the sermon, Young People's Groups, Adult Fellowships, Mission Bands, Week-Day Religious Instruction and Vacation Schools are but variant aspects of one unitive Church School of Christian living.

V. Non-Evangelical Sunday School Activity. Although the organized Sunday School Movement has been an evangelical affair, the non-evangelical religious bodies in the United States have not been inactive in the field as occasional reference to Unitarian activity has already indicated The latest religious census figures (1926) gives the total number of Sunday School Scholars in the United States as over 21,000,000. Of this number, some 1,000,000 are to be found in Catholic Churches, another 500,000 or so scattered among Christian Science, Jewish, Mormon, Spiritualist, Unitarian and other such groups Obviously, however, the percentage of enrollment within these groups is very small when compared with the whole. If allowance is made for the extremely different set-up of the Catholic catechetical classes conducted by priests on Sunday, the scope of the actual "school" idea outside evangelical circles appears even more limited. See anti-Sunday school movement in the U S, Biblical history, instruction in, catechumenate, parochial schools, religious education, Young Peoples' Societies.

The following four sources will provide at once excellent general coverage and exhaustive research references to ca. 1930. T Nelson and Sons, Encyclopedia of Sunday Schools and Religious Education, Vols I-III (1915), E M. Fergusson, Historic Chapters in Christian Education in America (1935),
F. G Lankard, A History of the American Sunday School Curriculum (1927), E. W. Rice The Sunday School Movement, 1780-1917 (1917). For developments since 1930, consult the official publications of the Religious Education Association as listed in the Union List of Serials. For a general statement of the place of the Sunday School in non-evangelical bodies see P Monroe, A Cyclopedia of Education, (1919), Vol V p 453, for more detail, consult histories of the specific groups concerned The latest religious census figures on the Sunday School are to be found in most convenient form in the Statistical Abstract of the United States, U. S. Dept. of Commerce, Bureau of Census, (1938)   G.P A.

Sunna: (Arabic, sunnah, usage, tradition) The religious tradition in Islam, held with the Koran to be of divine authority. The term was applied first to the sayings and doings of Mohammed, then to collections of moral and legal traditions supplementing the Koran*. See Hadith, Mohammedanism   P E.J.

Sunnites: One of two main divisions in the Moslem world, the other being the *Shi ites. The Sunnıtes comprise 150,000,000 Moslems and represent the largest body of the faithful. They are the orthodox party, accepting as authoritative traditions (sunna) of Mohammed rejected by others They acknowledge the first four caliphs* to be true successors of Mohammed. Most of the Moslems in Turkey, Arabia and Africa are Sunnıtes. See Abu Hanifa, Mohammedanism; Persia, religions of   P.E.J.

sūnya, sūnyatā: See Buddhist Terminology.

superintendent: See clergy.

supernatural in primitive religion: See primitive religion, virgin birth.

supernaturalism: Name of a school in modern Protestant theology. Strictly speaking this designation is a misnomer, because by definition God, who is the subject of all theology, is above nature. The term obtained its specific significance, however, as a result of the conflict of traditional with 'natural' theology in the age of rationalism. Against the attacks that Socinians, Deists and Neologists made on orthodox theology some of their opponents pointed out 1) that the central beliefs of the Christian faith, though being reasonable, are not attainable through mere reasoning, yet that their truthfulness is confirmed, nevertheless, by prophecies and miracles, and 2) that the Bible is the divinely inspired and infallible source, from which knowledge of the saving truth as well as of the confirmatory facts can and must be derived. Pascal* was the first clearly to develop that line of apologetics. For its insistence on supernatural events this school was later on called supernaturalism.

While prior to the rationalistic criticisms the supreme authority of the Bible had been taken for granted everywhere within the Protestant churches it became then necessary for those, who accepted its authority, to demonstrate the legitimacy of this claim. The conflict between supernaturalism and rationalism is not primarily concerned with epistemology, but rather results from divergencies in ontology. Rationalists believe in the essential oneness of all reality, whereas the supernaturalists hold that the nature of God is fundamentally different from that of this created world, so that any divine operation in this world must appear as something extraordinary.

In the 18th century outstanding representatives of supernaturalism on the Continent were J. A. Bengel (1687-1752)* and the school of Swabian Pietism, J. C. Lavater (1741-1801) and J. G. Hamann (1730-1788). The Moravians* brought the new views to England and America, and they obtained popularity there through the Evangelicals, Wesley and Whitefield. But on the whole the reaction against rationalism developed on independent lines in the Anglo-Saxon world. William Law, Paley, Bishop Butler and Jonathan Edwards defended the cause of supernatural religion by adopting the method of the rationalists and pointing to the inadequate or faulty use of reason made by them.

The second phase of supernaturalism began, when the idea of 'natural religion' succumbed under the attacks of Kant's and Hegel's philosophies and Schleiermacher's theology For their analysis of human consciousness created a new confidence in human reason and called forth a new rationalism. Thus it tended at the same time to debilitate the authority of the Bible Critical study of the Bible, vigorously started in the second half of the eighteenth century, worked in the same direction These developments demanded new efforts and methods on the part of the supernaturalists. Epistemologically they pointed to the existence of a specific religious faculty in the human mind (Fries*), ontologically they stressed the absolute transcendence of the divine being (Kierkegaard, R. Otto"), theologically they emphasized the personal character of God and his dealing with men, over against the impersonal nature of the Divine in modern idealism and positivism (W. Herrmann, James Orr, Lofthouse, H. R. Mackintosh). Exegetically this school was aided by men of great erudition (Franz Delitzsch, Zahn, B. F. Westcott, J B Lightfoot, Ad. Schlatter) and of profound insight (Godet*, Dean Alford, Hermann Cremer*). Renewed study of the reformers (Th. Harnack, Holl, B. B. Warfield, Westphal) opened new avenues for the presentation of supernaturalistic theology. In the nineteenth and twentieth centuries supernaturalism developed on four different lines which represent different ways of looking at God's work in this world and interpreting it in harmony with historical Christianity: 1) Biblicism (J. T. Beck, Schlatter, C. F. Chr. von Hofmann and the school of Erlangen*, Martin Kaehler*, the Evangelicals in England and America, R. W. Dale*, A. B. Bruce), 2) Confessionalism (Vilmar, Abr. Kuyper*, Princeton Theology, Karl Barth*, P. Althaus*), 3) Sacramentalism, especially in the Anglican Church (Pusey, Cardinal Newman), and 4) Apocalyptic and premillennian* theology. This list is far from being exhaustive. Belief in the sufficiency of reason and in the authority of the Bible will blend so completely in many a theologian's mind that it is impossible to say to which of the contending parties he belongs Cf. rationalism; natural theology, naturalism; naturalism and theology.

Art Rationalism and Supernaturalism by O. Kirn and C. A. Beckwith in Schaff-Herzog's Encyclopedia, vol IX, pp. 393-402, John Hunt, Religious Thought in England (London, 1873), vol. III; John Hunt, Religious Thought in England in the 19th Century (London, 1896); F. Kattenbusch, Die deutsche evangelische Theologie seit Schleiermacher (6th ed, Giessen, 1931), Jacques Maritain, The Degrees of Knowledge (1938), Niels Ferré, Swedish Contributions to Modern Theology (1939); Gustav Frank, Geschichte des protestantischen Theologie (Leipzig, 1875), vol. III; G. P. Fisher, History of Christian Doctrine (2nd ed., Edinburgh, 1908).   O.A.P.

super-personal: This is a term applied to God to indicate that the essential characteristics of personality involve such limitations that God can not work under them and still be God. The scope and diversity of his activities and the intimacy with which he deals with each individual person are such as to render the concept of personality inapplicable. The fact that we have no pronoun other than he and she to refer to the super-personal is a limitation of our language and signifies nothing about the nature of God. Also distinction must be made between the symbolic terms of personality used in worship and attempts to use personal terms to state accurately the nature of God. Only in 'the latter case is the concept of personality questionable. The word "impersonal" has been used to designate the idea of the super-personal, but this expression totally falsifies the idea. Cf. God as personal.   H.N.W.

superstition: A word commonly derived from supersto in its meaning to stand over, menace, hence implying religious dread, could more intelligibly come from its other meaning, to stand over, remain over, survive. So understood, the application of the term to practices still preserved while their significant connections have perished, is apt. Superstitions may thus be understood as survivals of extinct, defeated religions, and in fact the common use of the term to condemn bears witness in its animus to a not utterly extinct rivalry. See Chinese religions, folklore.
    J. Michelet, Satanism and Witchcraft (1939)
                                              P.G.M.

Supper, the Last: See Lord's Supper.

supralapsarianism: (supra, before, lapsus, fall)
The doctrine which holds that God's decrees of reprobation and election were before the actual Fall* of man, and were part of the original purposes of God. The general position of the orthodox Dutch Calvinists. Confirmed at the Synod of Dort*. See predestination. Cf. infralapsar-ianism, sublapsarianism.   E.P.B.

Supremacy, Acts of: A short Act of 1534 declared Henry VIII* "only supreme head in earth of the Church of England." This was an extreme form of the mediaeval imperialist theory, it was applied by the exercise of ecclesiastical jurisdiction in the King's name under Henry VIII and Edward VI. Repealed under Queen Mary, 1554, it was not revived under Elizabeth. But a new act of 1559 declared the Queen "supreme governor" of the realm in all matters, authorized to visit and correct the Church. This phrase, perhaps deliberately chosen as one open to varying interpretations, does not challenge the spiritual position of the Church as crassly as the other;
but in practice the Act of Supremacy subjected the administrative system of the Church of England* first to royal control, and since 1689 to dependence on parliamentary legislation. Civil lawyers are likely to interpret it as making the Church of Engand a purely national institution, while ecclesiastics may regard its acceptance as a kind of Concordat* between the nation and the English part of the Catholic Church.   E.R.H.

suras: (Arabic, surah, a step, a degree) The chapters or sections of the Koran,* sacred book of Islam. There are 114 suras arranged evidently from the longest to the shortest without logical or chronological order, by Zaid the secretary of Mohammed* after the prophet's death.   P.E.J

surplice: (Late Lat, super and pellis, fur) A loose white vestment* of linen or cotton with wide sleeves, derived from the alb* for use over coats. Worn by the clergy in the Roman Catholic, Anglican and Moravian churches and by choristers. Its use in England was made a matter of controversy by the Puritans*. See rochet.
                                              T.J.B.

Sūrya: One of the minor sun gods in Vedic Hinduism, usually associated with the round red orb of the sun. He is regarded variously as the child of Ushas (dawn), and as her husband. A dozen hymns of the Rig-Veda* are addressed to him.
                                              C.S B.

Susannah, History of: Apocryphal addition to Daniel*. The Septuagint and Vulgate place it at the end of the book, and Theodotian at the beginning. The devout wife of Joakim resists the advances of two elders who acted as judges and was falsely accused by them. As the condemned woman was being led to her execution, Daniel came to her aid. By his wise cross-examination of the accusers he established her innocence.
Thereupon the congregation condemned the accusers to death in accordance with Deut. 19 19.
The story was probably written by a Palestinian Jew during the early part of the first century B C in Hebrew or Aramaic, illustrating the Pharisaic insistence on strict examination of witnesses and severe punishment of malicious witnesses. (Makkot 5b) See apocrypha, Old Testament.   S.S.C.

Susano-o- (no-Mikoto): (Jap) Literally "Impetuous Male," Susano-o is, according to Shinto* mythology, the brother of Amaterasu o Mikaki* the Sun Goddess. While the Sun Goddess reigned over the Plain of High Heaven and the Moon God ruled over the night, he was master of the sea and the domain of hidden things. His violent character so frightened his sister that she hid in a cave and thus brought darkness to the universe. Enticed by a multitude of deities with a mirror and a set of jewels, she emerged and again illumined the world. The council of deities banished Susano-o from the High Plain to the earth. He descended to Izumo, subdued rebels, and secured a sword from the Eight-Headed' Serpent, which sword he presented to the Sun Goddess. Eventually he became not only the ruling deity of Izumo, but also the Storm God for all Japan and the agent of mysterious things and evil doings. Both he and his sword, which is believed to be the very one jealously guarded as a national treasure, have been an encouragement of the militant spirit in Shinto.
Because of these reasons, Susano-o is a very important deity in Japan today.   W.T.C.

Süskind, Hermann: (1879-1914) He taught in Tubingen. Killed in World War I, he was one of those most strongly influenced by Troeltsch*. He sought to understand Schleiermacher* from the angle of philosophy.
   Der Einfluss Schellings auf die Entwicklung von Schleiermachers System (Tubingen, 1909), Christentum und Geschichte bei Schleiermacher (Tubingen, 1911).   H.H.

Suso, Henry: (ca. 1295-1366) A south German Dominican mystic whose Autobiography and Book of Heavenly Wisdom interpret the mystical approach of Meister Eckhart* in terms of the intensely passionate love lyric of an age of chivalry. See Friends of God.   D.V.S.

sutras: A late stage of Vedic literature designed to present in extremely concise form the requirements of Vedic religion*. Some of them are so brief and aphoristic that they cannot be understood by the uninitiated without the aid of commentaries. They are of four kinds. 1) Srauta, or priestly sutras, 2) Grhya sutras which deal with the domestic rites, 3) Dharma sutras, which deal with social duties, and 4) Sutras which deal with grammar, philosophy, astronomy, magic, etc. The Laws of Manu* is a late form of one of the most important Dharma Sutras. See Forty-two Chapter Sutra (under Buddhist Terminology).   C.S B.

suttee, sāti: The practice of widow-burning in India. It was outlawed by the authorities early in the nineteenth century. Ram Mohan Roy* was one of those who vigorously opposed the institution.   C.S.B.

Sverdrup, George: (Dec. 16, 1848-May 3, 1907) Lutheran theologian and church leader. He was born in Balestrand, Norway, son of a Lutheran pastor and politician. He studied theology in Christiania, Norway, and in Germany, Oriental studies in Paris. His friend and later colleague Oftedal brought him in 1874 as professor of O.T. and Dogmatics to the Augsburg Seminary, Minneapolis, Minn., whose president he was from 1877-1907.
   Under the influence of Hauge* he worked very actively among the Norwegian immigrants in the Middle West. He was anxious to activate the laity in church life, and following Grundtvig's* ideas, to transform the congregation into a cultural and educational unit. His sincerity, the strength of his religious convictions, his fearless presentation of his views and his independent mind made him a great church leader, but also a fierce and redoubtable polemicist. As a protest against the formation of the United Lutheran Church Sverdrup and his friends founded the Norwegian Lutheran Free Church in 1897 upon a congregationalist basis (since 1917 united with the other branches in the Lutheran Norwegian Church).
   Principal works (all in Norwegian):
   Sammelte. Skrifter i Udvalg (a collection of articles and essays), 6 vols., ed. by A. Helland (1909-1912); Aand og Liv (sermons), ed. by Oftedal, 2 vols.; Biography in A. Hauck's Realenzyklopaedie, 3rd ed., vol. XXIV, pp. 537-575. See also American Lutheran Biography, pp. 789-791.   O.A.P.

Swain, Richard La Rue: (1860-   ) Author of the stimulating and widely read volume What and Where is God (1920).   J.W B.

Swander Lectureship, The: Founded by the Rev. John I. Swander and his wife in 1901 this lectureship is given annually at the Theological Seminary of the Evangelical and Reformed Church, Lancaster, Pennsylvania. Its capital sum is $10,000 and the lectures, four or more, are designated to promulgate "sound Christological science", the lecture topics being mutually agreed upon. The latest course was given by Dr. E. S. Brightman.
   (Information from the office of the President of the Seminary.)   V.F.

swastika: A very ancient and widespread ornamental form or symbol, found both in the Eastern and Western hemispheres. It is usually regarded as a symbol of the sun. In India it is a symbol of good luck. It may be either right hand (male) 卐, or left hand (female) 卍. The former is most widely used in India. In Germany where it is the emblem of the Nazi state the latter is used.
   Thomas Wilson, "The Swastika, the Earliest Known Symbol and its Migration," U. S. National Museum, Annual Report, 1894 (1895), Leon de Millone, Le Swastika in Annales du Musees Guimet, vol. 31 (Paris, 1909); G. Bellew, "Aryan Peoples and the Swastika," Blackwoods Magazine, vol. 247, pp. 653-658, May, 1940.   C.S.B.

Swedberg, Jesper: (1653-1735) Professor at Upsala and bishop of Skara. Swedberg was sympathetic toward Pietism's stress on a faith which showed itself in a godly life. Himself of a warm, child-like, nature, he was interested in the doctrines of unio mystica and of angels, believing in their presence and activity. He published a Hymnbook with many of his own hymns, but failed to have it officially received. He was friendly towards the Church of England, especially with Bishop Robinson of London. As bishop of Skara he supervised the Swedish Church in London, and Lisbon, and befriended greatly the Swedish Church on the Delaware. His literary activity included devotional, homiletical, catechetical, philological works; also a record of the Swedish Church on Delaware, in America Illuminata.   C.J.B.

Swedenborg, Emanuel: (1688-1772) Son of Jesper Swedberg. Swedenborg's student days included impressions from Rudbeck at Upsala, Newton, Boyle, Halley, Locke, in England, Polhem in Sweden, the Cartesian philosophy and the Cambridge Neo-platonists.
   The Principia (1734) explained the universe in mechanistic terms. A mystical view pervaded the Oeconomia regni animalis (1736), the world was now less a machine, more an organism. The anima receives illumination from the central source of life and light when the mens controlls man's physical nature. Between the physical and spiritual world there is a close correspondence, each natural phenomenon shadowing a spiritual reality. In the Clavis hieroglyphica arcanorum this idea was extended to the mystical correspondence between words and their inner meaning—a basis for his later spiritual interpretation of Scripture, which was the means whereby the divine was communicated to the mind of man.

In Amsterdam, 1736, Swedenborg had an experience of photism, in Amsterdam, 1744, and in London, 1745, he experienced visions which he interpreted as revelations of the Creator-Redeemer Henceforth he proclaimed a truth received by didirect vision, though the biblical imagery of De Cultu et Amore Dei (1745) concealed much the same cosmology and psychology as the earlier works. Even his visions were more a confirmation than a source of his speculations.

The theology of Swedenborg is systematically presented in Vera Christiana religio (1771). The orthodox doctrines of the Trinity and the Atonement were repudiated. Redemption consists of the Incarnate God overcoming the increasing powers of hell. Man's freedom enables him to choose and follow the good On death he enters the realm of the spirits when he either ascends to the heavenly sphere, becoming an angel, or descends to hell, becoming an evil spirit. Following a spiritual mode of interpreting Scripture, which he held to be inspired, Swedenborg considered the Judgment to have come in 1757 and Christ's Second Coming as a victory over rebellious spirits. The heavenly world corresponds to the human, and even marriage finds transcendent meaning in heavenly marriage of kindred souls, (Arcana Coelestia, Apocalypsis, De Ultimo Judico, De Amore Conjugiali). The orthodox churches must give way to the New Church (which dates from the completion of Vera Christiana religio, 1770) when men will be correctly instructed in the truth of God. See New Jerusalem, Church of.

R L. Tafel, Documents concerning the Life and Character of Swedenborg (1875-77), 3 vols , Works, Swedenborg Society (London, 1916) , B Worcester, Life and Mission of Emanuel Swedenborg (1883) ; S. Warren, Compendium of the Theological Writings of Emanuel Swedenborg (1885) , M. Lamm, Emanuel Swedenborg (1915).

                                     C.J.B.

Swedish Ev. Mission Covenant Church: See Evangelical Mission Covenant Church of America.

syllabus of errors, papal: A collection of errors. There are two such collections of errors, one issued in 1864 by Pius IX*, the other in 1907 by Pius X*. The Syllabus of Pius IX contains 80 condemned theses. All of these are succinct expressions of important errors of the times which had previously been condemned by the Pope. It aroused great opposition among the Church's enemies. The Syllabus of Pius X is the decree Lamentabili sane exitu. It condemns in a list of 65 theses the main errors of Modernism*. One of its effects was an increase of exegetical work among Catholic scholars to offset the false scriptural interpretations of Loisy* and other Modernists. For a complete list of the condemned propositions of both Syllabi see Denziger's Enchiridion Symbolorum, nn. 1701 ff. and 2001 ff.

                                     C.R.

Sylvania Phalanx: See communistic settlements, secular.

Sylvester, I, St., Pope: (314-335) As Bishop of Rome, during the age when Constantine* was changing the pagan Roman State into a Christian government, with religious worship a matter of conscientious conviction to all, Pope Sylvester I and his predecessor, Miltiades (311-314) are the two hinges of Christian antiquity on which the door which closes the age of the persecutions and opens the period of religious freedom revolves His friendly associations with Constantine alone would explain the rising power of the papacy which needed not the medieval fictitious "Constantine Donation"* to accentuate its historical existence. Of doctrinal importance are the decrees of the Council of Arles, 314*, regarding the Donatists*, sent to Sylvester for approval, also the celebration, during his pontificate, of the first Ecumenical Council of Nicea, 325, which condemned Arius*, who had denied the divinity of Jesus Christ and His equality (consubstantiality. homoousios*) with God the Father. It was Sylvester who, according to certain early MSS, presided over the deliberations and confirmed its Acts not in person indeed, but through his Legates* Hosius*, Bishop of Cordova and two Roman priests. According to the Liber Pontificalis Sylvester consecrated the Basilica of St. Peter, erected by Constantine, also the Lateran, former imperial palace, now converted into the Cathedral of Rome, St. Paul's, Beyond the Walls, and the basilica of the Sesorian Palace (Santa Croce). The so-called Constitutum Sylvestri or Canon Sylvestri is a VI cent. spurious fabrication. During his pontificate it is highly probable that the first Martyrology* was compiled, also the establishment of a Roman School for ecclesiastical chant. His feast is celebrated on Dec. 31; by the Greeks and Syrians, on Jan. 2.

Litt Liber Pontificalis (ed , Duchesne‧ Paris, 1886-92), vol I, pp 170-201, Bollandists, Bibliotheca hagiographica (Brussels, 1898-1901), vol. II, pp. 1119-21, Id., Bibl. Hag. Graeca (Ib. 1909), p 230 ff , I von Dollenger, Papstfabeln, 2 (Munich, 1890), p. 61 ff , Jaffé, Regesta Romanor Pontificum, 2, vol I, pp 28-30, Marucchi, La Basilica Papale del cimitero de Priscilla (Rome, 1908).

                                     R.M.H.

Sylvester II, Pope: See Gerbert of Aurillac.

symbol and symbolism: Religious symbols direct attention, awaken response and guide behavior in dealing with realities too complex, intimate or otherwise inaccessible to precise designation. However, the term symbol has become highly ambiguous in recent learned discussion. In symbolic logic, for example, it means the most precise kind of designative sign that can be used. This is very different from the symbolism in religious usage of the Cross, the Church spire, and ritual. To distinguish the religious symbol from these other kinds we must analyze the nature and use of signs.

A sign represents some structure of existence and possibility. The honk of a horn may represent a possible sequence that will injure me if I do not get out of the way of the oncoming automobile.

The cry "Auto coming" is a sign for the same thing under proper circumstances Every statement made by words is a sign.

In order to have signs and meanings we must have structures, which is to say, distinctions and connections, whereby events can be so demarcated and related that when a few happen these few can represent all the others, including possibilities. In this way I can through representation by a few events deal emotionally, theoretically and practically with all the other events and possibilities which pertain to that total structure in which the signs are minor components. All meanings are, then, structures whereby events are (or might be) so demarcated and related that a few of them, called the signs, can represent all the others.

Our physiological reactions, however, are so much more complex, subtle and changing than our intelligible structures of well-defined meaning that we are always dealing physiologically with realities which exceed the scope of those demarcations and relations which our signs represent. The statement "I love you", when spoken sincerely in love, is not only a sentence pointing out the individual loved and stating the fact that one loves. Nor is it merely an expression of the emotion of the lover. It also refers to all that is so connected and associated as to make up the total personality loved, much of which the lover cannot clearly and fully specify. A symbol of this sort adumbrates, while other signs specify and designate. So it is in religion that a symbol is a sign which awakens and directs our response to that matrix and context which overflows and encompasses the limited structures which are precisely designated by our linguistic signs. The Cross is a symbol of this sort Some doctrines of the faith, at least as used by many religious folk, are symbols and myths (see myth) rather than statements of truth in the sense of representing some specifiable structure of events.

Ernst Cassirer, Der Begriff der Symbolischen Form in Aufbau der Geistes Wissenschaften (1923), C. W. Morris, Foundations of the Theory of Signs (1938); Ogden and Richards, The Meaning of Meaning (1923); W. M. Urban, Language and Reality (1939); A. N. Whitehead, Symbolism, Its Meaning and Effect (1927).   H.N.W.

symbolics: The essential things of religion are unseen and eternal (2 Cor. 4: 18); but they can be mediated to our finite and imaginative apprehension under symbols* of word and form. Symbolics may be the study of religious symbols. But the reference is commonly specific, to doctrinal or creedal symbols. Creeds and Confessions are symbols of the Christian Faith, as held in the various ages and communions; 'Symbol' used of Apostles' Creed as early as third century. Symbolics divided thus Fundamental, study of Symbols belonging to the whole Church (Apostles', Nicene, Athanasian Creeds); Particular, study of Symbols of particular Churches (Augsburg Confession, Helvetic Confessions, Thirty-nine Articles, etc.). Creeds and Confessions retain their character as Symbols of Faith, their place in the structure ʼand inheritance of Church or Churches, however religious thinking and expression may change or the Churches unite their testimony. These developments may yield other attempts to define Christian principles, and so other data for Symbolics. See konfessionskunde symbolism: Representation of one entity or idea in terms of another, usually the translation of an abstraction into concrete form. Sometimes used for mystification as in the O.T. prophetic books, sometimes for the purpose of confining knowledge of sacred mysteries to the elect as in gnostic theologies. The early Christian Fathers, esp. Augustine, followed the rabbinical practice of interpreting scriptural narratives as elaborate symbolical representations of spiritual truths. See idols and images, myth.   V.F.H.

C A Briggs, Theological Symbolics (1914)

J.L.

symbolism: A symbol is a sign or an identifying mark In the days of persecution certain pictures and abbreviations were used in order to conceal some truth from the enemy. Thus the three Greek letters IHC became the abbreviation for IHCOYC, or Jesus; and XPI for XPICTOC, or Christ. The Latin cross, of course, signified the Crucifixion, and later came to denote Christianity. The assurance of eternal life was signified by the circle, the Trinity by an equilateral triangle, and regeneration by an octagon.

In later years, when Christians were permitted to build houses of worship, and when the arts of wood-carving and stained glass were developed, our Lord was often pictured together with the four evangelists, or again He was shown on the cross, with His mother on one side and St. John on the other. Certain signs were evolved, so as to distinguish them one from another, for some of the early converts could not read, and names would prove of no value to them. Thus it became customary to identify our Lord by means of a nimbus*, or circle about His head, and from this circle emanated four rays, forming a cross. His mother was given a nimbus with stars adorning its border, and she was usually garbed in light blue. St. John was shown with an eagle at his feet. Each of the other apostles was given a mark of identification. St. Peter usually carried two keys in his hand, St. Andrew leaned upon a cross saltire and St. Paul was given a sword and a book.

These symbols usually recalled some well-known fact in the life of the apostle or the O.T. worthy. Isaiah was given a saw, the supposed instrument of his martyrdom, Moses his two tablets of stone, Noah held in his hands a small model of the ark, and St. Stephen was shown with stones lying at his feet.

Although the number of symbols multiplied so that today they fill a fairly thick book, yet their use in ancient and mediaeval art is by no means as lavish as is generally supposed. It would seem that the ancients rarely used symbolism merely as decoration, but employed it only when necessary.

During the second and third decade of the present century there was a profuse, and frequently needless use of symbols. Instead of using, for example, the symbols of the apostles in order to distinguish them one from another, these symbols were painted and carved at random, often where there were neither painted nor carved figures to identify. Frequently such symbols were used inappropriately, as for example when the symbols of our Lord's Passion were displayed on the sides of a font. A fanciful symbolism of numbers was carried to ridiculous extremes, and three steps at the church entrance were said to signify the Trinity, four posts under the gallery the four evangelists and six panels in the altar the six days of creation.

It is well to know symbolism so that one may identify the figures in ancient and modern stained glass and carving, but to use it in the thoughtless, lavish way in which it is used in this country is to rob it of any meaning that it may have had. Those who would know the meaning of the thousands of symbols of ecclesiastical art* would do well to consult E. Geldart's Manual of Church Decoration and Symbolism (London, 1897). See I H S.   F R.W.

symbolism, Medieval number: Method by which the medieval mind assured itself of cosmic order. Convinced that "God has arranged all things in number   " (Wisdom XI, 20), theologians found symbolic relationships in scriptural numbers and other observed or created numerical groupings.   On the basis of Pythagorean and gnostic theories, each number* was assigned a root meaning and diversified representations.   Some root meanings were 1 = Unity of God and Spirit; 2 = Diversity of Earth and Matter, 3 = Trinity, extension of Godhead, 4 = Extension of Duality, Earth, 5 = Flesh (senses), 6 = Earthly Perfection (days of Creation); 7 = 3 + 4, Universe of Spirit and Matter, 8 = Immortality; 9 = Extension of Trinity, Angelic Number, 10 = Extension of Unity, Perfect Completeness.

Isidore of Seville, Liber numerorum; Hrabanus Maurus, De numero; Petrus Bungus, Mysticae numerorum significationis liber; Vincent F Hopper, Medieval Number Symbolism (1938).   V.F.H.

symbols, particular Christian: (Gr., symbolon, a sign) Christian symbols are outward and visible signs of divinity, doctrines, spiritual ideas, sacred seasons, characters in Christian history, etc. Among the earliest symbols of God are the hand and the all-seeing eye. Among the numerous symbols of Christ are the fish*, the letters of whose Greek name are the initials of the Greek words, "Jesus Christ Son of God, Savior," the vesica, a closely related symbol, the candle, the crown and the lamb. The Holy Spirit is represented by the dove and by various forms of the candlestick. The Trinity is symbolized by the triangle in various forms, the trefoil, the shamrock and similar devices   Various monograms such as X P and I H S* stand for Christ, while the cross* in numerous forms stands for his suffering and redemptive love. The star stands for the Epiphany* and many other Christian ideas.   The symbols for Christian doctrines are numerous; e.g., the ox for patience and sacrifice, the anchor for hope, the peacock for the resurrection and the butterfly for immortality.   The Evangelists, the Apostles and the Virgin have their appropriate symbols and every feature of the church edifice has its especial symbolic significance.

F. R. Webber, Church Symbolism (1927); T A. Stafford, Christian Symbolism in the Evangelical Churches (1942), V O. Vogt, Religion and Art (1921).   F T P.

symbols, particular, in early Christian times: The primitive church possessed symbolic rites in Baptism and the Lord's Supper. It made use of symbolic gestures, as in the laying on of hands.* It had symbolic forms of speech, e.g., "maranatha" (the Lord cometh) which served as a watchword by which Christians recognized each other. But there is no mention in the N.T. of visible objects connected with worship or with dress and behaviour. Christianity distinguished itself from pagan religion by avoiding these outward signs, which savoured of idolatry.   In the second century, however, the symbol of the Cross* became customary, and Tertullian says that it was used by Christians to bless almost all their actions. Strangely enough it is not found in the Catacombs*, where Christian ideas are conveyed not so much by symbols as by types (e.g., the Good Shepherd, the Orante, the Ark of Noah* &c). Almost the only real symbol is the fish*, the Greek word for which contains the initials of the name and titles of Christ   A symbol of the same kind is the labarum*, the monogram of Christ which Constantine adopted as the Roman standard, and which was doubtless of early origin.

F. R. Webber, Church Symbolism (1938); R. A. Lanciani, Pagan and Christian Rome (1896).
                                                        E.F.S.

Symeon Metaphrastes: (To be most probably identified with Symeon Magister the Logothete) Flourished in the second half of the tenth century. His fame rests on his compilation of the legends of saints in the Byzantine Menologion. He was canonized by the Eastern Orthodox Church*. Later additions to his authentic collection have been likewise ascribed to him.   He wrote other less known works.

K. Krumbacher, Geschichte der byzantinischen Litteratur (Munich, 1897). 2nd ed, pp. 200-3 sympathy: The emotional and imaginative experience of entering into and sharing the mind, particularly the thought and sentiment, of some one else   As a "feeling with" others it is experienced at non-reflective levels and makes for social solidarity.   At higher levels it involves mental assimilation, communion and personal insight.   It has its basis in original nature, may be developed and extended through social experience and is the main root of altruism. As a virtue it is made primary in Buddhism, is stressed in Christianity, was exalted by Schopenhauer and repudiated by Nietzsche. It is a personal and culture force of great significance.   R.W.F.
                                                        M.S.

synagogue: (From the Greek "assembly" or "place of assembly") Used to designate the religious community of the Jews or, more often, the house of their worship The origin of the synagogue is still a matter of conjecture. Some scholars trace it back to pre-exilic* times, others date it as late as the Seleucidan or Maccabean era. Sacral and secular origins have alike been suggested, some seeing in the synagogue a continuation of the ancient local sanctuaries, others assuming that it evolved from communal assemblies in post-exilic Palestine. Plausible seems the view, backed by Jewish tradition, which seeks the early formation of the synagogue among the captives of the Babylonian exile who unable on foreign soil to continue with sacrificial ritual, developed a more spiritual form of worship Prayer and study took the place of offerings, and the synagogue became a substitute for the destroyed temple.

Whatever the time and circumstances under which it originated, the synagogue marks a departure in the history of religion. Without a visible symbol of the deity to lend sacredness to an especial place, without propitiation by sacrifice or a privileged clergy to mediate or intercede for the common man, the public worship of the synagogue, spiritual and democratic throughout, permitted anyone anywhere to commune with God. The new institution had a great historic influence, within and without Judaism. In all the ages, and in all the lands of dispersion, the synagogue became the focus of the religious, social and intellectual life of the Jews, serving not only as place of public worship, but also usually as elementary school, law-court, communal center and even hostelry for strangers. The synagogue also, and not the temple, supplied the mould and model for the worship of both Christianity and Islam. Its historic effect earned the synagogue the praise of being "la création la plus originale et la plus féconde du peuple juif" (E. Renan)

The earliest synagogues, thus far unearthed in Palestine, date as late as the first century C.E. Older are the remains in Egypt and Greece which point respectively to the third and second pre-Christian century. Recent excavations, both in Palestine and adjacent lands, yielded evidence of a lost pictorial art of the ancient synagogue (notably the cycle of biblical frescoes in the synagogue of Dura-Europos, built in 244 C.E.). The new finds seem to bear also on the old question of the origin of early Christian art. See Bet Hamidrash; Ezra, Great Synagogue, the.

S. Krauss, Synagogale Altertuemer (Berlin-Vienna, 1922); E. L. Sukenik, Ancient Synagogues in Palestine and Greece (Schweich Lectures) (London, 1934).   s.s.

synaxis: (Gr., assembly) A gathering (early Church) for public worship, whether eucharistic (liturgical) or non-eucharistic.   P V.N.

syncretism: In the field of religion it is the term descriptive of the mingling of faiths which come in contact one with another. It may take place consciously as in the case of some modern religions which are products of the deliberate weaving together of various strands of religious thought to form a new religion. More frequently it is a quite unconscious process of give and take such as inevitably occurs where differing faiths meet See W. E. Hocking, Living Religion and a World Faith (1940). Examples are the flowing together of Hebrew and Greek thought in early Christianity, the fusion of certain Moslem and Hindu ideas in the Sikh* faith, etc   c.s.B

syncretistic controversy: A seventeenth century debate centering around the extent to which harmony and reconciliation were possible between different religious groups. It brought into conflict those who stressed respectively the exclusive and the inclusive aspects of truth The immediate issue was the relation between Lutheran and Reformed Churches. Calixtus* was prominently involved in the controversy.   G.R.C.

synderesis: (late Gr. synteresis, spark of conscience) See conscience.   H.H.

synergism: Represents the modification, in a slightly semi-pelagian direction, of the strict Augustinianism which marked early Lutheranism. Its leading representative was Melanchthon*, and the chief issue was the nature and status of fallen man, especially in relation to conversion. See grace. Cf. Loci Communes, monergism synod: An authoritative ecclesiastical assembly. In the ancient church the word at first was equivalent to "council". This came to be used for ecumenical conventions and "synod" was applied to those representing particular territories or jurisdictions or communions. In modern churches the word has different technical meanings. In Presbyterian polity* the synod is the judicatory intermediate between the presbytery and the supreme body, the General Assembly* or in some cases General Synod. In the various groups of American Lutheranism the synod is the controlling organization, e g., Missouri Synod. In the Eastern Orthodox Church of Russia the supreme governing body is the Holy Synod. In churches having diocesan bishops there are diocesan synods.

                                  G.R.C.

                                  R H.N.

Synodical Conference, the (Lutheran): See Lutheran Church in America.

Synoptic Gospels: The Gospels of Matthew, Mark, and Luke called 'synoptic' either because they present a common view or because they may be viewed side by side. The reason for this common view, it is now recognized, is the use made by Matthew and Luke of the earlier Gospel of Mark. (See article "Harmony of the Gospels"). Matthew rearranges the material in Mark in order to fit it into his five main divisions (chs. 3-7, 8-10, 11-13, 14-18, 19-25). Luke, on the other hand, retains the order of Mark but omits a long section (most of chs 6-8) and makes two long insertions into Mark. Much of the material found in these long insertions is spread widely over the Gospel of Matthew. In brief, Mark's ·narrative was not viewed by the later evangelists as infallibly accurate, Matthew could adapt the Marcan material to his arrangement of material by subject, while either inserted other material into Mark or (as the late Canon Streeter* held) inserted Mark, in seven sections, into his earlier collection of discourse material and anecdotes. (The so-called "Proto-Luke Hypothesis").

The priority of Mark is recognized by practically all N.T. scholars except those influenced by the ancient ecclesiastical theory that Matthew wrote first and then Mark abridged Matthew. Upon this theory of the priority of Mark have been based a number of extravagant views which would make Mark practically infallible, in order and chronology and in interpretation.

By 1900 the majority of Protestant critics had come to recognize not only the priority of Mark but also the existence of another source, chiefly consisting of sayings of Jesus, used by Matthew and Luke in addition to their use of Mark, (the so-called "Two Document Hypothesis"). Much attention has been given to the reconstruction of this Sayings Source ("Q"* for Quelle, which means "source"), one of the most widely followed still being that of Harnack*

At the present time various modifications of the two-source theory (or "Two Document Hypothesis") are maintained One is the "Four Document Hypothesis" of Canon Streeter, Vincent Taylor, and others In addition to Mark and "Q", each of the later synoptists had a document peculiar to himself the special document or source of Matthew is designated "M", while that of Luke is designated "L". Another theory, which really goes back to an earlier date than Streeter's hypothesis, recognizes not only four sources but several This "Multiple Source Hypothesis" was first advanced by Professor Burton* of Chicago and has been widely held in this country. There are probably sources underlying even the Gospel of Mark —some of them undoubtedly written sources, as Professor Branscomb holds.

This Multiple Source Hypothesis fits the requirements of Form Criticism*. the earliest sources are fragmentary crystallizations of the oral tradition. No doubt these fragments grew into larger 'blocks' and eventually into collected 'sources' like "Q" and "M", but oral tradition did not cease to exist when sources were compiled, nor were the sources looked upon as definitive and infallible Each one still "interpreted [or translated] as he was able", as Papias observed in the second century.

Thus the Synoptic Gospels contain our earliest sources for the life and teaching of Jesus. Mark was probably written in Rome in the year 68. Luke, the first volume of a work on Christian origins (Luke-Acts), was probably written late in the reign of Domitian, perhaps about 95 A.D., but where we do not know. It was somewhere in the Graeco-Roman world and presumably outside Palestine. Matthew is variously dated from 85-110, or even a little later. It presumably comes from Antioch or its hinterland. Of course, the tradition contained in the Gospels is much older than the writing of the Gospels, and the authenticity of a passage or a saying is not determined by the date of the Gospel in which it appears See gospel

See also B H Streeter, The Four Gospels (1924) , A von Harnack, The Sayings of Jesus [trans 1908] , E D Burton, A Short Introduction to the Gospels (1904) [rev by H R Willoughby, 1926], F V Filson, Origins of the Gospels (1938) , D W Riddle, The Gospels, Their Origin and Growth (1939) , F C Grant, The Growth of the Gospels (1933).

                                                                F.C.G

synteresis: A moral sense, classed by Aquinas as a habit, common to all men; a residuum or remnant of man's unfallen nature Jerome explains it as a spark (scintilla) of conscience which man retained at the Fall.
A Koch and A Preuss, Moral Theology (1925), vol I, 3rd ed   J.T.M.

Syrian churches: A group of Churches, located in the nearer East, including those border provinces within and beyond the boundary which separated the Roman Empire from Persian territory, so-called because the basic language was Syriac. The leading city was Edessa*. Under the leadership of St. James of Nisibis and his disciple, Ephraim Syrus, both of whom attended the Council of Nicea*, these churches accepted the Nicene orthodoxy. Rabbulas, Bishop of Edessa (412-435 A.D.) also tried to hold them to orthodoxy in face of the Nestorian* heresy, but his successor Ibas (435-457)* welcomed Nestorianism and established a famous Nestorian School at Edessa. Subsequently those of the Syrian churches within the Empire became Monophysite* while the others were Nestorian. These churches are also important for various texts of the N T. including the Peshitta and the Diatessaron of Tatian. See canons of various churches, versions of the Bible, ancient.   A.K.R

Syrian National Church: See Jacobites.

Syro-Hexaplar version: See versions of the Bible, ancient.

systematic theology (history of, etc.): Theology* is literally discourse about God; as the term is used, belief concerning God and other beliefs cognate to it. Systematic theology concerns these beliefs in ordered elucidation and in their relation to contemporary thought and life—'contemporary' in each age, the task of theology falling to be done continually as the intellectual outlook and even the meanings of words undergo change. Thus there is a history of Systematic Theology.

The sources of Christian theology are the Scriptures and Christian testimony through the centuries. The seminal minds in theology are the writers of the N.T., these are not systematic theologians, though Paul, particularly in 'Romans', the writers of 'John' and 'Hebrews' do interpret formally the meaning of Christ, salvation, etc., in view of current conceptions and needs. But essentially theirs is the creativity of preachers of the Word.

The post-Apostolic age was not fruitful theologically, the Apostolic witness was received but imperfectly grasped Theology began when pagan assaults and heresies forced a double strategy in the truth's defence, the one evoked apologetic*, the other theology stiictly so named. Irenaeus* (c. 125-202 Adversus Haereses), Tertullian* (c. 150-220: De Praescriptione Haereticorum), the father of Latin Theology, wrote theology in combating heresy; Origen* (185-253) fought on both fronts, confuting heathen assailants (Contra Celsum) and producing in De Principiis what is regarded as the earliest systematic doctrinal treatise. A little later the Arian* Christological* heresy found more than its theological match in Athanasius* (298-373. De Incarnatione); who, with the School of Antioch* where theology was less speculative and more historico-exegetical, the Cappadocians* and others did much to win for theology its royal place in Greek Christianity; to John of Damascus* (8th century) and beyond it was never without outstanding names.

Theology in the West found equally stout champions, some of them, Augustine, Anselm, Aquinas, among the greatest figures in the annals of the Church. These men were the philosophers of their age as well as the theologians; the Bible was still the foundation of theology but philosophy had a large hand in shaping its problems The concepts of Plato (Neo-Platonism) and Aristotle lay side by side with Scriptural beliefs and metaphors in a massive concord of Reason and Faith.

With the Reformation came recoil fiom rational dilution of theology and fresh zeal for its Biblical originals. Luther and Calvin were superb theological minds; Calvin's Institutes achieved system on the new principles that vied with Aquinas'

Summa Theologica of the former type. But theology was now due for a long eclipse. This was because, with the Renaissance* and break-up of medievalism, science and philosophy sloughed the imprimatur of the Church; by converse, theology receded from the intellectual forefront, becoming overshadowed even in her own field by philosophy and psychology of religion, as philosophy and the sciences increased and their method pervaded the world of knowledge.

The nineteenth century saw theology's self-recovery as an independent discipline. Schleiermacher and Ritschl wrought the change, although their psychologic and evaluative approach makes their constructions quite inept to more radical proponents of the integrity of theology of our own time. These are in the wake of Kierkegaard* who saw Time and Eternity, Reason and Faith as discontinuous, so for Barth* and others, the Truth or Word of God* is not homogeneous with other truth, even as God is not the idealization of man. Hence the theology of the Word, living and having its being not in man's wisdom but in what God has revealed Here in the re-capture of its mission of confession and exposition of Truth committed to it lies, it is believed, the restoration of theology as a living spiritual force; while its effort toward ever deeper understanding of the Revealed · Word and its meanings hic et nunc, provides scope for a vigorous and creative intellectual life. See dogmatic theology.

C A. Briggs, History of the Study of Theology, 2 vols (1916), K Barth, The Word of God and the Word of Man, trans Horton (1928); K. B. Kirk and others, The Study of Theology (1939).

J.L.

T

tabernacle: (Heb., mishkan, dwelling place, i.e., of Yahweh*. Ex. 25.8) The portable tent sanctuary used by the Israelites during their desert wanderings and early life in Canaan until it was replaced by the permanent sanctuary at Jerusalem*. While the detailed instructions to Moses* of its measurements and specifications (Ex. 25-27) and the minute account of their execution (Ex. 36.8-38 31) are presented by the Priestly writer as a contemporary report, critical study shows that the description of the tabernacle is a post-exilic* idealization of the Temple* of Jerusalem. In the mind of the author the requirement of a single sanctuary for Israel dates from the days of Moses. Following the covenant at Sinai, God revealed to him the pattern of its construction, which the inspired artists Bezalel and Oholiab used in creating the Tabernacle out of the materials voluntarily offered by the people. (Ex. 31. 1-11, 35-36.7). As the place where God met with the representative of the people, it was known also as the Tent of Meeting. (Ex. 29.42-45).

s s.c.

Tabernacles or Feast of Booths: (Heb., sukkot) Annual autumnal harvest festival, observed from the 15th till the 22nd of Tishri. Beginning as a purely agricultural "feast of ingathering", it was invested with sanctity by the priestly legislation. The first day constitutes a "a holy convocation", upon which all servile work must cease. It was observed by erecting booths from palm branches, boughs of willows, etc, as memorials of the booths in which the Israelites lived after their deliverance from Egypt. (Lev. 23. 33-43, Num. 29. 12-38, cf. Neh. 8. 15 ff.). The agricultural nature of the feast is evident also from its water-drawing ceremonies. (Cf. Mishnah* Sukkah) In post-biblical times the seventh day acquired a special character as *Hoshana Rabbah The eighth day (22nd of Tishri)—Shemini Azeret—is treated as a separate "day of solemn rest". An added day originated in Babylonia in post-Talmudic times, which is designated Simhat Torah, Rejoicing in the Law*, upon which the annual cycle of Pentateuchal reading is finished and resumed again. See Jewish religious festivals; lulab.

s.s.c.

table of the Lord: See Lord's table; sacramental meal.

tables of the Law: According to Ex. 24.12 Moses* ascended the mountain and received from God "the tables of stone, and the Torah* (Law) and commandment". Subsequently they are spoken of as "written with the finger of God" (Ex. 31.18; 32.15-16). On the way down the mountain, as Moses beheld the people dancing around the golden calf, he dropped and shattered the tablets. (Ex. 32.19). Commanded to prepare exact copies of the tablets, he spent forty days and nights on the mountain and "wrote upon the tables the words of the covenant, the ten words". (Ex. 34.1-4, 27-28). As he descended with them his face shone with a divine splendor. He placed these "tables of the testimony" in the ark*

Rabbinical* opinion differed regarding the arrangement of the Decalogue* on the tables Some thought that it was inscribed on each table, while others held that five commandments were written on one and the remaining five on the other. (Canticles Rabba 5.4) The latter view is followed in the synagogue* presentations of the tables of the Law*.

s.s.c.

Taborites: The Taborites were the leftist party among the Hussites*, and were so named after the fortified city of Tabor in southern Bohemia which they had built. Their radicalism took the form of strict biblicism, although they repudiated extreme chiliastic* groups which originated among them and which developed various antinomian practices and held that the Lord's Supper is a mere memorial, repudiating both transubstantiation* and every other form of the real presence* theory The ecclesiastical leader of the Taborites was Bishop Nicholas of Pelhrimov, while the chief military commander of their armies was John Zizka.

Joseph H Muller, Geschichte der böhmischen Brüder (Herrnhut, 1922)

M.S.

tabu: A prohibition of acts and contacts immediately dangerous to the doer and through him to his group. The word comes from the Pacific area where tabu (tapu, kapu) was expanded into a technique of social control. When the scientists began the study of religions the term was used generally to indicate the caution signs set up by groups to guard against things and actions inherently dangerous. The attitudes involved in the tabu belong to the earliest phases of culture when man was making his first faltering steps toward group security in a world little understood and filled with potential menace. The approved pattern of behavior in relation to environment and of individual to individual in the group was established by long experience in the satisfaction of basic desires. Within this tested pattern the individual was safe. When the approved mode of behavior was violated there was a feeling of apprehension, of danger. Moreover, there were many things and events that had a mysterious quality in regard to which the only established pattern of behavior was one of caution, a warning against contact. Violation of the group code or contact with these sources of infection was an immediate threat to the safety of the individual. He acquired a contagion which might prove fatal to him and might spread to the whole group ‚in contact with him. Punishment came automatically from the dangerous situation itself. It was not a human sanction nor the action of a god or supernatural being. These latter sanctions were later developments. The concern of the group at first was not in punishment but in purification* of the individual to make him once more safe for social relations.

The tabu caution against contact applied almost universally to death and blood. The contagion of a corpse often required the destruction or abandonment of objects in contact with it, even the dwelling, and always the purification of mourners before normal living could be resumed. Blood of menstruation or childbirth was dangerous, demanding isolation and rites of purification. Warriors returning from battle were also tabu. Offenders against the sex code or murderers carried a contagion that might even endanger the food supply. Like the warrior, a stranger was tabu until he was made safe by ceremony. Rulers, chiefs, priests and magicians were sometimes hedged about with a mysterious potency that made them dangerous for ordinary mortals to touch. The danger might even extend to their regalia, clothing, food*, land or name. The sanctity of objects of religious cult and associated with the gods marks them off in the same way. Property was protected by infecting it with danger to the transgressor by means of a curse or spell*. Prohibition in some cultures of the use of certain foods by women and the uninitiated and of touching the new crops until they were released for general use by a first fruits* ceremony seems to be an extension of the original meaning of tabu.

The danger involved in the tabu situation sometimes results in the death of the offender. If not, the group may protect itself against his contagion by banishment, by his public confession, or by some form of cleansing ceremony. When divine or legal sanction assumes control of behavior the primitive, automatic sanction of tabu is weakened, absorbed or ignored. See primitive religion.

A.E.H.

Tagore, Sir Rabindranath: (1861-) Indian poet and educator who by his personality and teaching, his mystical poems, Gitanjali, his essay Sadhana, The Realization of Life, and other writings interpreted the religious faith and philosophy of India in such a way as to win the sympathetic understanding of the West.

See his The Religion of Man (1931)   J W.B

T'ai Chi: See Chinese Terminology.

talisman: (Arabic) An amulet*, an object which owes its efficacy to a property transmitted from without, such as a tooth, claw, or horn of an animal; supposed to aid the possessor in warding off evil and bringing good fortune.   F.L.P.

tallit: Prayer shawl worn by Jews at morning worship. It is woven of wool or silk, with fringe attached to the four corners as ordained in Numbers 15 37-39.   B.Z.B.

Talmud: (derived from the Hebrew lomed which means study) The Talmud is an encyclopaedia of Jewish tradition supplementing the Bible (O.T.) and summarizing more than seven centuries of cultural growth. Its origins go back to the close of the Biblical (O.T.) canon and it did not reach its final stage of development till the end of the 5th century. It is primarily concerned with law, but it also includes many copious discussions in the fields of religion, ethics, social institutions, history, folklore and science.

The makers of the Talmud accepted the Torah* as the revealed will of God; its mandates were, therefore, abidingly valid and were not to be altered by the will of man. But the dynamic of a changing world had created new facts in Jewish political and social life, new developments in culture, in religious doctrines and ethical ideas. Thus the Bible (O T.) (Deut. 24 1) recognizes the possibility of dissolving the marriage ties, but does not specify under what circumstances or by what procedure this was to take place. The Bible (O.T.) visualizes all religious life as centering around the central sanctuary in Jerusalem, with the sacrificial cult as the principal medium of worship. When the Jerusalem Temple ceased to be, a new ordering of Jewish religious life obviously became necessary. Similarly, true to its largely rural background, the Bible (O.T.) offers us no body of precedents or principles governing the regulation of trade, labor and industry. The Talmud is the record of new enactments, procedures and interpretations by which the basic religious ideology of the Bible (O.T.) was implemented so as to function in a changed Jewish society.

Historically, Talmudic literature developed in two layers. The oldest, the Mishnah (derived from the Hebrew repeat or study), is the product of the scholarly edition of Rabbi Judah the Prince and his disciples who were active in 3rd century Palestine. It is written in a clear and lucid Hebrew and is divided into six principal sections which are subdivided into an aggregate of sixty-three tractates; these being again divided into chapters and paragraphs.

The six main sections to the Mishnah* are called "Sedarim", orders, derived from the fact that each section represents an orderly arrangement of opinions and laws on its particular subject. The six Sedarim are Zeraim, Moed, Nashim, Nezikim, Kodashim, Taharot. Zeraim or seeds, deals with agriculture, appended to it is the all important tractate Berakot which deals with prayer. Moed meaning festivals, deals with the Sabbath, holidays, fasts and feasts of the Jewish calendar. Nashim which means women, discusses marriage, divorces and other phases of family life. Nezikim or injuries, deals with civil and criminal law. Kodashim, holy things, discusses the sacrificial cult and other details of the Temple service. The last section Taharot, cleanliness, deals with all questions of ritual purity.

Because of its very brevity, the statements in the Mishnah required constant amplification and interpretation. And Jewish society continued to change, requiring constantly newer techniques for ordering life along the ideals of the religious tradition. A second layer was consequently developed in the literature of the Talmud to supplement the Mishnah. This second layer is known as *Gemara.

Derived from the Aramaic gemar and meaning study or teaching, the Gemara exists in two versions, both in the Aramaic vernaculars current respectively among the Jews of Palestine and Babylonia. For in post-Mishnaic times, the Jewish community in Babylonia had overtaken Palestine as a center of Jewish learning, and the Babylonian schools developed a parallel supplement to the Mishnah, which indeed proved even more influential than the Palestinian supplement. Frequently the same teachers are represented in both Gemaras, for there was a constant interchange of visits among the Palestinian and Babylonian rabbis and the academies in each country were fully informed on the work being done by their sister academies in the other country. Not all tractates of the Mishnah are supplemented by the Gemara, only those that were of interest to the teachers that created the Gemara. The Palestinian Gemara, frequently called Yerushalmi or Jerusalem Gemara, supplements thirty-nine tractates, the Babylonian only thirty-six and a half. In compass, however, the latter is three times as large as the former, the Babylonian Gemara being more elaborate and more copious in its expositions. The Mishnah and Gemarah taken together comprise the Talmud.

The Talmud and various related literary creations of the same period has frequently been called the Oral Torah, because for centuries it was expounded and transmitted orally. Individual students probably employed notes to aid their memories, but none of these compilations were officially edited until a considerably later date. The Palestinian Talmud was concluded some time in the 5th century as a result of the general decline of the Jewish community in Palestine, marked by the abolition of the last vestige of Jewish autonomy, the patriarchate, in 425 C.E. The Babylonian Talmud was concluded toward the end of the same century, for in Babylonia, too, Jewish life was declining, following the persecutions of Jews under the Sassanian Kings, Jezdegerd II (438-457) and Perez (459-484) The final canonization of the supplementary Torah in the crystallized texts of the Talmud brought to a close one of the most creative epochs in the history of Jewish tradition. See Israel, religion and theology; law, Hebrew; Moses ben Naham; pilpul, Rashi, Saadia ben Joseph, Tanna.

The Talmud has been translated into English by a group of scholars under the chairmanship of Rabbi I Epstein and is being published by the Soncino Press, London, England A good anthology of significant Talmudic statements on every phase of religion and life is A Cohen's Everyman's Talmud (London, 1934) An accurate and exhaustive survey of the world outlook of Talmudic Judaism is G F Moore's Judaism in the First Centuries of the Christian Era, 2 vols (Cambridge, 1927).   B.Z.B.

tamid: See s v. holocaust.

Tammuz: See Mesopotamian religions.

Tanna: (Aramaic, meaning teacher, plural, tannaim) One of the Jewish scholars of the first two centuries, whose teachings are contained in the *Mishna, (the rabbinical laws) and in the *Baraita, (additional teachings outside the Mishna.) Cf. Akiba   P E.J.

Tantras: Relatively late sacred writings of Hinduism*, dating in their present form from the seventh or eighth centuries of the Christian era or even later Only a few of them have been translated. They are used particularly by the Shivaite sects, especially the Shaktas* who worship the female principle of the universe, usually represented in Kali*, wife of Shiva. They contain, a great deal of the mystical and magical, discuss a wide variety of subjects such as medicine, science, religion, enjoin the use of *mantras, mystic diagrams, and strange symbolism, and serve as the source of the rituals used in tantric worship The practices of the left-hand saktis are abhorrent to the moral sense of most Hindus today. See sacred literatures.   C.S.B.

Taoism: See Chinese Terminology.

tapas: The first meaning of the word is heat. It comes to mean fervour or heat of devotion and finally penance, self-mortification, austerity, asceticism.   C.S.B.

taqiyya: A principle by which Moslems in a hostile country are permitted to conform to the alien religious practices for the sake of their own security. It seems to have originated with the *Ismailis.   P.E.J.

targum: The Hebrew term for translation and usually referred to the specific translations of the Bible (O T.) The most important of these was the Greek translation known as the Septuagint* or the Targum of the Seventy, so called because it was executed by a commission of seventy scholars. Another Greek translation was executed in the 2nd century by the Greek proselyte, Aquila, from Pontus. He became so famous for his translation that he was also credited in later time with the popular Aramaic translation which was used as an official text in Babylonia and subsequently also in Palestine, to accompany the reading of the weekly Scriptural lessons in the synagogue. The technical name of this translation is Targum Onkelos, but it is also referred to by the more general designation, Targum. B.Z.B.

Tartarus: See heaven and hell.

Tatian: A Christian writer in the middle part of the 2nd century. An Assyrian by birth, he became at Rome a follower of Justin Martyr*, and wrote an apologetic work, An Address to the Greeks, which still survives Towards the end of his life he joined the heretical sect of the Encratites*. He is most celebrated for his Diatessaron* a harmony of the Gospels which for a time displaced the Gospels themselves. See Lives of Jesus; Syrian churches, versions of the Bible, ancient.

E. J. Goodspeed, Early Christian Literature (1942), H. M. Gwatkin, Early Church History (1916). E.F.S.

tauhid: The unity of God in Moslem theology. Among pantheistic *Sufis the term came to mean the unity of the soul with God, but this was not accepted by the orthodox. P.E.J.

Tauler, John: (ca. 1300-1361) A Dominican mystic of the school of Meister Eckhart* and a preacher of great power whose life was chiefly associated with the city of Strasbourg. He was a member of the loosely organized mystical band known as The Friends of God*. His Sermons have lived on in many translations.

R. M. Jones, The Flowering of Mysticism (1938). D.V.S.

taurobolium: Early Roman empire, a rite used in the mystery of Attis* to assure immortal life, the sacrifice of a bull upon a covering over a pit, in which rite the worshiper, in the pit, is baptized by the bull's blood streaming through openings in the platform overhead. F.L.P.

Tausen, Hans: (1494-1562) Tausen, an early Danish convert to Lutheranism, after 1526, as chaplain of Frederick I, was an influential preacher in Copenhagen, advocating Reformation doctrines against Romanists, especially Paul Helgeson. After victory of Lutherans in Denmark, 1536, Tausen became a leader in the reconstruction of the church, aiding in translation of Bible, devotional writings, composition of hymnbook, and ecclesiastical reorganizations. C.J.B.

Taverner, Richard: See Bible, English.

Taylor, Alfred Edward: (1869-) Erudite philosophical scholar, authority on Platonic and ancient thought, Prof. of Moral Phil. in Edinburgh since 1924. He roots his theism not so much in the cosmological and teleological arguments, which merely suggest an intelligent, immutable Will, but in the objective deliverances of moral insight and revelatory religious experience. An idealistic absolutist when he wrote Elements of Metaphysics in 1903, his two volumes, Faith of a Moralist (1930), reveal a theist with Anglo-Catholic leanings See also Plato, The Man and His Work (1927). P.A.B.

Taylor, Jeremy: (1613-1667) English theologian and prose writer, called by Emerson "the Shakespeare of divines." Among his principal works are A Discourse of the Liberty of Prophesying (1647), The Rule and Exercises of Holy Living (1650), The Rule and Exercises of Holy Dying (1651), and The Golden Grove (1655). L.W.C.

Taylor, Nathaniel: (1786-1858) American theologian, abandoned Jonathan Edwards'* theory of "moral inability" and asserted that man "not only can if he will, he can if he won't." Far from being providentially decreed, sin enters the world because "such is the nature of free agency that God could not wholly prevent its perversion." See American theology, early; New Haven theology; Taylorism. W.M.H.

Taylor, Nathaniel W. Lectures: A lectureship at the Yale University Divinity School, established March 14, 1902, in memory of the Reverend Nathaniel W. Taylor, B.A. 1807, who was Professor of Systematic Theology and Chairman of the Faculty, 1822-1858. The lectures are upon some topic in the field of theology. Among the courses have been those by George W. Knox, The Direct and Fundamental Proofs of the Christian Religion, 1903; William N. Clarke, The Use of the Scriptures in Theology, 1905; Henry C. King, The Seeming Unreality of the Spiritual Life, 1907; George A. Gordon, Religion and Miracle, 1909; William E. Hocking, Human Nature and its Remaking, 1916; Walter Rauschenbusch, A Theology for the Social Gospel. 1917; Douglas C. Macintosh, The Reasonableness of Christianity, 1925, Hugh R. Mackintosh, Types of Nineteenth Century Theology, 1928; Frank C. Porter, The Mind of Christ in Paul, 1929; Robert L. Calhoun, God and the Common Life, 1934; John Baillie, Our Knowledge of God, 1936; H. Richard Niebuhr, The Meaning of Revelation, 1940. L.A.W.

Taylorism: Name given to Nathaniel Taylor's* modified Edwardean theology, which so stressed the freedom of the will as to limit God's sovereignty. Viewed by its antagonists as a fatal concession to Arminianism*. See Edwards, Jonathan; means, New Haven theology; Oberlin theology.

F. H. Foster, A Genetic History of the New England Theology (1907). W.M.H.

Te Deum: A hymn, probably by Bishop Niceta of Remesiana (4th cent.), in praise of God and Christ, to which supplicatory versicles have been added—used on special occasions of rejoicing and at Matins* on festivals. E.R.H.

technology: See culture.

Tefillah: See Shemoneh Esreh.

Teichmüller, Gustav: (1832-1888) Was professor at Dorpat, now Tartu, Estonia. He wrote a number of works dealing with the history of ancient philosophy. He coined the concept of a semiotic knowledge, the use of linguistic signs for feelings which themselves are not knowledge but which can be made available for knowledge. Religion symbolizes for Teichmuller the synthetic function of intellect, feeling and action. Energetically defending personal immortality, he polemicized against positivism and Darwinism.
Ueber die Unsterblichkeit der Seele (Leipzig, 1874) ; Darwinismus und Philosophie (Dorpat, 1877) ; Ueber das Wesen der Liebe (Leipzig, 1879) , Die wirkliche und die scheinbare Welt (Breslau, 1882) , Religionsphilosophie (Breslau, 1886)   H.H.

teleological argument for God: This argument takes the fundamental form The order pervading the inorganic, organic, and human realm is indicative of an intended plan in an intelligent and good Purposer. This argument complements the causal reasoning in the cosmological argument* in calling attention to the adaptive interrelation of the various parts or aspects of the universe to each other in a way conducive to the production and conservation of human values.

Introduced by Plato (Laws), the particular form of the argument has been moulded by the knowledge and concept of the natural world affecting the thinkers who advanced it. Thus, as long as organisms were thought to have originated in their present forms, with ready-made specialization of organ to function and of part to whole (as one part of a clock is to the other parts), one could expect the teleological views of a Paley or Butler in the 18th century. But their pre-Darwinian appeal to special, external design was denied in favor of an immanent purposive operation when it was shown that the present forms of organism were evolutionary modifications from one source.

Meanwhile, the change from Newtonian absolutes to the modern field-theories of physics discouraged mechanical conceptions of natural entities in favor of organism (e.g., Whitehead*). Finally, the fact that the preparation of the physical universe for life definitely exceeded the expectations of chance, along with the theory of "emergent evolution," increased the suspicion that the order of nature was an order of purposive development.

Throughout the history of the argument is the insistence that such order as there is in the organic and inorganic world is a surd mystery in the mechanical view of the world. However, a synoptic view of the world, including the values human beings realize and serve, weighs the balance in favor of the teleological hypothesis.

Thus the argument has moved design within from without, and emphasized not specific adjustment of various parts, interesting though that be, but the interrelation of the ultimate collocations of the universe This "wider" teleological argument, as presented by one of its best adherents

(F. R. Tennant*), rests on the suggestiveness of the coherent adaptation between a) nature and human cognitive powers, b) the inorganic and life, and between organic parts to preserve whole organisms, and c) human values and the rest of the human world See God teleology: (Gr. telos, end) A term used to identify the branch of philosophy which has to do with ends or final causes. The whole is considered as ideally prior to the parts and constitutes the explanation of their mechanical processes. The whole is an unchangeable form, and controls all movement, giving all movement purpose and goal, with all processes subordinate to a purpose. The idea of teleology is older than the word. The concept was evident in the organic view of nature which was developed in ancient Greek philosophy against the mechanical view Anaxagoras* was the first of the ancient philosophers to use the argument. Christian Wolff* was the first to use the term The argument is prominent in the teachings of Thomas Aquinas, (1224-1274), Joseph Butler (1692-1752), Immanuel Kant (1724-1804), Abraham Tucker (1705-1774) See cause, Fiske, John, God, teleological argument for God   W.G.H.
    L Henderson, The Fitness of the Environment (1924), The Order of Nature (1925) , F R Tennant, Philosophical Theology vol 2 (1930) , H Bergson, Creative Evolution, Eng tr. (1911).   P A B.

telepathy: The direct communication of mind with mind without the use of sense perception. J B Rhine of Duke University claims to have found experimental evidence in support of the view that there are certain supernormal faculties. This claim has been the subject of considerable controversy See abnormal psychology, parapsychology, psychical research, societies for See J B Rhine, Extra-Sensory Perception (1934)
                                              A.T.B.

Tell El-Amarna Tablets: More than three hundred sun-baked tablets and fragments discovered at Tell-el-Amarna, Egypt, from 1887 to 1933. Most of them are diplomatic letters written in Akkadian and received by the Egyptian kings Amenophis III (1411-1375 B.C.) and Amenophis IV or Ikhnaton (1375-1358 B C.) from their Syrian and Palestinian vassals Important source of information on the Near-Eastern civilization in the second millenium B.C.
    See S A B Mercer, The Tel-el-Armana Tablets, 2 vols. (1939)   S.L.T.

Tell-el-Duweir: See Lachish Ostraca.

Teller, Wilhelm Abraham: (1734-1804) He was first professor in Helmstedt, then provost and superior consistorial councillor in Berlin He applied the idea of progress to Christianity, subjected the content of the N T to the viewpoint of historical conditionality His aim was a modest practical rational change of the Christian faith. As a neologist he claimed to surmount orthodoxy and pietism, to revive the unity of Christianity with the temporal movement, giving reason a wider room and opening the path for rational and historical criticism

Lehrbuch des christlichen Glaubens (Helmstedt und Halle, 1764) , Worterbuch des Neuen Testaments zur Erklarung der christlichen Lehre (Berlin, 1772) , Die Religion der Vollkommeneren (Berlin, 1792) temperance movement: A series of interrelated efforts to limit or prohibit the use, sale, or manufacture of alcoholic beverages. Its objectives and methods have undergone extensive modification and expansion in the course of their historical development. Such efforts are almost as old and as universal in human society as the use of intoxicating beverages. In Chinese tradition, one of their emperors ordered all vineyards destroyed as early as the eleventh century, B.C. Temperance was encouraged by the priests of ancient Persia and India and by the O T. Scriptures, total abstinence was taught by certain Hebrew sects such as the Rechabites*, as well as by Buddhists and Moslems, and the Mogul emperors tried to prohibit the liquor traffic in India. Among the Carthaginians intoxicants were prohibited to magistrates and on military campaigns, among the Romans various emperors sought to curb drinking, and in Mexico the Aztecs made drunkenness among the young a capital offense, and permitted the free use of alcohol only to the aged and on holidays.

H.H.

During the Middle Ages, the manufacture of wines and beers was so restricted by social conditions as not to permit of much abuse, but with the spread of distillation after the thirteenth century over-indulgence in hard liquors became common, especially in Northern Europe The insobriety of the masses aroused the opposition of the ruling, military, and employing classes, and more determined restrictive measures were adopted, especially with the rise of the factory system.

In the American colonies many local restrictive and regulatory measures were adopted during the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, and the churches endeavored to encourage moderation by moral suasion, and by resolutions against the distillation of ardent spirits. Dr. Benjamin Rush is generally accredited with laying the foundations of the modern temperance movement with the publication of his Inquiry into the Effects of Ardent Spirits upon the Human Body and Mind in 1785. The first organized temperance society on record in America was created by 200 farmers in Litchfield County, Conn., who in 1789 pledged themselves not to use any distilled liquors during the ensuing farming season; but the first society of more than local and temporary influence was formed at Moreau, N. Y., by a young physician, Dr. Billy J. Clark, in cooperation with the Congregational minister, the Rev. Lebbeus Armstrong, and with Dr. Rush as an honorary member. Dr. Rush also appeared before various ecclesiastical bodies to urge the necessity of inaugurating a plan to arouse public opinion on the liquor issue. His activities resulted in the appointment of temperance committees by the leading denominations to devise ways and means, and inspired the efforts of an influential group of clergymen, notably Lyman Beecher*, Jedediah Morse, and Jeremiah Evarts Beecher's sermons at East Hampton, L. I., and Litchfield, Conn., eventuated in the organization of the Connecticut Society for the Reformation of Morals in 1813, and in the same year the Massachusetts Society for the Suppression of Intemperance, founded in Boston by Morse and Evarts, spread the movement throughout New England and New York

With the organization of the American Temperance Society, later known as the American Society for the Promotion of Temperance, and still later as the American Temperance Union, in Boston on February 13, 1826, the movement assumed the proportions of a national crusade Agents were employed to organize and affiliate local, county, and state auxiliaries with the national body Within a decade over 8,000 such groups had been formed comprising more than 1,500,000 members, and with a periodical press of 11 weekly and two monthly journals to serve as a medium of communication and propaganda.

The earlier temperance reformers were chiefly concerned with the abuse of distilled liquors. They thought little of total abstinence, or of extending the ban to light wine and beer. But with a new generation new issues arose. Proposals came before the convention of the American Temperance Union at Saratoga, N. Y, in 1836 1) to denounce the anti-slavery reformers within the movement and to appease the Southern societies, 2) to abandon the exclusive reliance upon moral suasion and to turn to legislative coercion, and 3) to bring all alcoholic beverages, fermented as well as distilled, under the ban of total abstinence. A decision on the first two issues was avoided, but the total abstinence plank was adopted two years later, by a narrow margin, and the movement declined owing to the defection of a minority who could not be persuaded that temperance required total abstinence.

But the next decade witnessed the rise of more nation-wide temperance organizations than any similar period in American history Most of these took the form of secret societies or lodges with dues-paying members, each of whom took the total abstinence pledge or initiation The movement now took on a contagious emotionalism, exemplified in the Washingtonian Movement and in the oratory of John B. Gough (1817-86) for over forty years the most popular lecturer on the temperance issue in America. This phase culminated with the arrival in the United States of Father Theobald Mathew, of Cork, Ireland, "the greatest of all temperance missionaries," who in his American tour of 27 months, is reported to have traveled more than 27,000 miles, and to have administered the total abstinence pledge to more than 500,000 Catholics.

Public opinion was now prepared for the second phase of the temperance movement, that of state and national prohibition, which advanced over the country in three waves. 1) The first wave lasted from 1846 to 1855, when thirteen states and territories enacted statutory prohibition. But attention was diverted from the liquor issue by the problems of the Civil War, Reconstruction, and the Westward Expansion, and these laws were soon repealed   Only five of them survived the conflict, and only two remained in effect in 1880. During this period the temperance movements which had sprung up in the different countries became increasingly conscious of each other, and organizations of international scope began to appear. The Independent Order of Good Templars, formed in Utica, N Y., in 1851, spread to Canada, England, Scandinavia, Australasia, South Africa, and South America before the century closed   The National Woman's Christian Temperance Union, founded at Cleveland, Ohio, in 1874, gave rise to the World Christian Woman's Temperance Union, with national organizations in fifty countries.   A conference of leaders in the national movements in London in 1909 resulted in the International Prohibition Confederation, and the World League Against Alcoholism was formed at the close of World War I a decade later.   2) The initiation of the second wave began with the enactment of constitutional prohibition in Kansas in 1880. Before the close of the decade six states had written prohibition into their basic law, and a seventh had re-enacted statutory prohibition. Again there was a recession, and by 1907 all but three of these enactments had been rescinded.   3) The third wave began in that year.   Heretofore the prohibition had been confined to the East and Middle West, but now the movement shifted southward.   Within five years seven states, all Southern, had joined Kansas, Maine, and North Dakota in the dry column, and by 1919 thirty-nine states had enacted such legislation.

In addition, a considerable proportion of the rural and suburban territory in wet states was dry by local option.   This privilege of the people of a precinct, ward, municipality, township, or country to decide by petition or by popular vote whether or not the liquor traffic should be licensed in their locality had first been accorded by Indiana in 1832.   The Anti-Saloon League had actively fostered such legislation after its organization in 1893, and by 1919 over nine-tenths of the land area and two-thirds of the population of the United States were in dry territory

Although proposals to amend the Federal Constitution to provide for national prohibition had been introduced into Congress as early as 1876, not until 1913 did the dry forces, led by the Anti-Saloon League, actively press the measure, and in December of 1917 it had received the necessary two-thirds majority in both Houses. Within fourteen months it had been ratified by three-fourths of the states, and it was proclaimed effective as of January 17, 1920, one year after ratification.

In the meantime, the Food Control Act of August, 1917, had forbidden the use of any form of foodstuffs in the distillation of spirits for the duration of the War, and complete War Time Prohibition, approved in September, 1918, became effective on July 1, 1919, and remained in effect until superceded by the legislation enacted under the Eighteenth Amendment

The Amendment had prohibited the importation, manufacture, transportation, or sale of "intoxicating beverages", but had not further defined the term.   The Volstead Act, which gave effect to the Amendment, defined intoxicating beverages as those containing one-half of one percent or more of alcohol.   This extreme definition was challenged in the Courts and finally sustained, but it later contributed to the breakdown of the measure.

Organized opposition to the Eighteenth Amendment began immediately, supported by large industrial interests which wished to shift taxation to the liquor industry, by other groups who held the matter a proper field for local and state rather than federal action, and by the urban wing of the Democratic Party, which had always been hostile to the measure   Proponents of the Amendment declared that it had reduced industrial accidents, improved the public health, increased savings accounts, diverted enormous purchasing power from alcoholic beverages to other purposes, and released productive resources for employment in more constructive ways.   Opponents argued that the banishment of the saloon was a gain, but that it had been replaced by "speak easies," night clubs, rum running, racketeering, corruption in enforcement units, and general disrespect for law.

The legislative revolt against the measure began with New York, which repealed its State Enforcement Act in 1923, followed by Montana in 1926 and Wisconsin in 1929, but it was not until the economic collapse of the early 1930's that the full extent of the change in public opinion was revealed.   Finally, the Democratic platform of 1932 declared for repeal, and the appropriate resolution was passed by Congress in February, 1933. The states acted in record time, and on December 5, 1933, the Twenty-First Amendment passed the control of the liquor traffic back to the states.

But the temperance movement continues.   It is again placing heavier stress on education and moral suasion, and is insisting on more effective supervision over the conditions of sale while endeavoring to recreate popular sentiment in favor of more effective legislative control.

Ernest H Cherrington, The Evolution of Prohibition in the United States of America (1920), Charles Merz, The Dry Decade (1931), August F. Fehlandt, A Century of Drink Reform in the United States (1904)   H.E.J.

Templar, Knights: See Knights Templar.

temple: Although the term is variously employed in popular speech, strictly speaking any place or edifice dedicated to the worship of deity, or regarded as the dwelling place of deity is a temple. The earliest temples may have been caves such as those found on the island of Malta, or in Egypt or in India.   Very simple and little adorned in primitive times, the temples in most religions became, in time, elaborate structures upon which were lavished the wealth and the best creative skill of the architects and artists of the respective cultures which produced them.   Naturally temples differ greatly from culture to culture, each expressing something of the genius of its own culture, as the great temples of Karnak and Luxor in Egypt, the Parthenon in Greece, the temple at Jerusalem, the cathedrals of medieval Europe, the elaborate temples of Hinduism and Jainism and Buddhism in India and the far east and the simple, rude shrine of the Sun Goddess at Ise in Japan.

Common to most of them is a central place of exceptional holiness, the very dwelling place of deity, the altar*, a rich symbolism expressive of the faiths and hopes of the people, and some attempt to convey, whether through the dim light, the architectural pattern, the artistic decorations, or otherwise the sense of mystery and awe which resides at the heart of most religious worship.

Generally, worship in the temples is rather individual than corporate In the synagogue* and the mosque* and the church the worship is usually congregational, though in the Catholic churches this is not always true. Great churches and synagogues are frequently called temples, and the term has been borrowed by secular organizations such as the Masonic order and other fraternal organizations as the designation of the edifices in which they meet and carry out their peculiar rituals. See church building.   C.S.B.

temples, Egyptian: Known as the "god's dwelling" or "house," the latter term often including the temple estate as well as the building proper. All temples were built and endowed by royal decree in the name of the reigning monarch, never by private gift Many, like the great temple of Amon* at Karnak, amassed vast wealth and exercised great influence in local and national affairs.

The primitive temple was a single-roomed structure of matting, wattle or mud-brick, without windows, housing the image of the god or the animal worshiped. It might be surrounded by a fence, while before it stood two poles attached near the top to the front of the building. Of temples, other than those connected with royal tombs, we have practically no remains before the XVIII dynasty (16th cent. B C.) By that time the temple had become a large stone structure of which the primitive shrine, developed into a dimly-lighted room formed the nucleus, the "great place" or "seat", where dwelt the cult image and where the regular daily services were performed. It was surrounded by a complex of rooms and passages, and was preceded by one or more columned or hypostyle halls used for ceremonies in which the image of the god was carried in procession by priests, open courts where non-priestly worshipers might enter, and pylons. The approach to the shrine extended directly from the main pylon entrance along the central axis of the building, the floor-level of which rose from front to rear while the roof became correspondingly lower. Entrance to each section of the building was closed by massive wooden doors overlaid with gold or copper decorated with figures of the deity. The columned halls were sometimes lighted by windows in a clerestory above the central axis, though the interior became progressively darker towards the rear of the building.

The fence which had enclosed the primitive shrine was replaced by massive mud-brick walls like fortifications, within and without which were numerous subsidiary temples and shrines, offices, workshops, storehouses and quarters for the temple staff. Adjacent to each temple was a pool or lake used in ceremonies connected with the sun-cult. Before the entrance stood one or more pairs of obelisks and against each pylon tower and extending above it were from one to four flagstaffs with colored streamers near the top. The approach to the pylon, flanked by recumbent sphinxes, led from a landing stage by a canal along with the god's river barge, used in certain feasts, could be brought near the entrance. The temple was equipped with vessels of gold, silver, faience and other material, altars and offering tables, small silver images of the king in various attitudes of the cult, and other rich furnishings. About the building stood stone statues of the gods, the king and individuals who apparently secured this privilege by royal favor The walls of the building were covered with reliefs, showing the king performing the acts of the cult or engaged in warlike activities, the latter appearing on those parts of the temple more remote from the central shrine. Reliefs, inscriptions, columns, cornices, and statues were painted in detail with strong colors. Trees and gardens were planted about the building

The Old and Middle Kingdom temples connected with the royal tombs differ radically from the Empire temples just described, as do those of Hatshepsut at Deir-el-Bahari and of Seti I at Abydos. However, the other temples in the necropolis at Thebes follow in general the pattern given above but in them much greater emphasis is laid on provision for the cult of the king as distinct from that of the god than in the normal temple. The Ptolemaic and Roman temples not connected with royal tombs, contain the essential elements of the earlier buildings but present certain variations of their own. The temple of the Aton at Amarna is unique in its structure.

A Erman-H Ranke, Aegypten (1923), pp 319-330; M. A. Murry, Egyptian Temples (no date); A. M Blackman, Luxor and its Temples (1923); U. Hoelscher, The Excavation of Medinet Habu (1934), vol I.   H.H.N.

temples, Far Eastern: The Far East is profusely adorned with temples. They are found in every village and town, in many crossroads, and in practically every scenic spot. At their best they are the highest achievement of Far Eastern architecture The "wonder" of Far Eastern architecture is, of course, the Temple of Heaven.

I) The Temple of Heaven. The Temple of Heaven is part of the Altar of Heaven. There are nine altars in and around Peiping: the Altar of Heaven in the south, the Altar of Earth in the north, the Altar of the Sun in the east, and the Altar of the Moon in the west, and five others. The largest and the most important is the Altar of Heaven. It is an enclosure of 737 acres surrounded by a red wall of over three miles long. Inside this enclosure there are cypress groves, wide avenues, majestic gateways, the Altar proper, minor altars, the Temple, halls for the emperor's fasting and for the rehearsal of ceremonies, treasure house, slaughter house, brewery, kitchens, storage, bell towers, wells, etc. The whole structure was built in 1420 and enlarged and beautified in 1754. Some of the buildings were used by the government of the Republic for schools, hospital, etc., and part of the compound was turned into an agricultural experimental station.

The Altar proper is a raised platform of three white marble terraces with elaborately carved railings and balustrades Measurements are based on odd numbers, especially the number 9 which is symbolic of infinity. The diameter of the lower terrace is 21 (3x7) chang (A chang is 11 ft. 9 in.); that of the middle terrace, 15 (3x5) chang; and that of the upper terrace, 9 (1x9) chang

From this Altar a broad walk raised 8 ft. above ground leads to a circular building facing south, popularly called the Temple of Heaven. This edifice is 9.9 chang high, supported by 24 huge columns outside and four inside. It stands on a stone platform of three terraces surrounded by carved stone railings. It has two projecting eaves and a most gracefully curved roof, giving the impression of three stories, although there is only one story inside The lower eave of blue tiles has a diameter of 25 chang; the second one of yellow tiles has a diameter of 22.26 chang; and the roof of green tiles has a diameter of 21.5 chang and is crowned with a "button" of gold color. The number of tiles and steps of the terraces is based on the number 9. Under the roof and above the entrance there is a tablet reading "The Temple for the Prayer of Agricultural Prosperity."

Inside this Temple there is neither any image nor tablet, but an altar in the center with a nine-dragon screen. Here on every winter solstice the emperor used to make sacrifice to Heaven on behalf of his people and to pray for a good year. Ceremonies of grand sacrifices were performed in both Spring and Autumn.

II) Temples of Confucius. Similar grand sacrifices, led by high government officials, were performed in Confucian temples. The principal temple of Confucius* is the one in the native place of the Sage, Ch'ufu in Shantung province, where the first Confucian temple was built as early as 442 A D. Imposing lines of cypress and stone memorial arches lead to the Gate of Grand Perfection. Entering the enclosure by a side gate and proceeding northward, one finds a rock-like trunk of a juniper which tradition holds to have been planted by the Sage himself. Further north is a small pavilion on the site where Confucius taught his pupils. Still further north is the temple proper, the Temple of Grand Perfection built in 1724. It is an edifice 70 ft. high and 134 ft long raised on a platform with a finely carved stone railing. The ten stone columns in its front, exquisitely carved all around with dragon design, are gems of Chinese sculpture.

In the center of the temple is the altar dedicated to the Sage, whose image in sitting position is behind a "Tablet of the Perfect Sage and Foremost Teacher Confucius" Four side altars are dedicated to Confucius' "Four Equals". pupil Yen Hui (521-481 B C.) and grandson Tzŭ Ssŭ (483-402 B.C.) on the east and pupil Tsêng Tzŭ (505-436 B C.) and follower Mencius (371-289 B.C.) on the west. Behind these are the altars of the Twelve Virtuous Men, all pupils of Confucius. North of this temple is a temple for the Sage's wife, who is represented by a tablet Further north is the Temple of the life of Confucius where some 200 stone tablets depict the life of the Sage It is here that one finds the stone carving of the famous portrait of Confucius painted by the greatest of Chinese painters, Wu Tao-tzŭ (d. 792). South of the Confucian Temple, on the southern part of the compound, are gateways and buildings, including a two-storied treasury of books and art objects.

Outside and to the east of this compound are houses and family temples of the direct descendent of Confucius and a well from which tradition believes Confucius' family drew its water Further northeast stands a special temple of Yen Hui Some two miles to the north is the Confucian Grove in which is located the Confucian Grave. The stone tablet in front of the grave measures some 15 ft. Leading to the grave is the Temple of Sacrifice, the original of which was built in 155 A D Its approach is lined with stone figures of men and animals 13 ft. high Almost all counties in China and Korea and some places in Japan have a Confucian temple, variously called wên miao, K'ung miao, and hsüeh kung. None, however, approaches this principal temple in dimension or in grandeur. Usually a Confucian temple consists of three courts in a central axis. The temple proper is in the north of the second court. The third court is sometimes to the east of the second. The south gate was made only when a native obtained the highest degree (chuang yuan) in civil service examination, and then it was used only by the emperor and the chuang yuans.

III) Ancestral halls. Like Confucian temples, ancestral halls (called ts'ŭ) in both China and Korea usually face south and are in the style of dwellings, schools, and palaces. In simple form, this style involves one brick building with a straight and unglazed roof. In elaborate form, this style becomes the "palace style" which usually involves one or more buildings in a central axis, often with subsidiary buildings on both sides and sometimes with gardens around. Each building has one, two, or three halls intervened with open courts and side corridors. In general they have brick walls, gently curved roofs and eaves of glazed tiles and elaborately decorated with dragon designs as well as human and animal figures, and beautiful columns, beams, and ceilings intricately carved or painted.

The central altar in each building faces the main entrance in the south. There are often secondary altars on both sides. In front of the altar stands a long table on which are placed an incense burner, a pair of candle sticks, and a pair of flower stands. Behind this table are lines of tablets of ancestors covering the whole wall. To the right of the main entrance of the first hall there is usually a small altar dedicated to the Guardian Deity of the Gate or the God of Ground or both. In front of the hall are high wooden posts supported by stone tablets indicating degrees obtained by members of the clan in competitive civil examinations. Services are held in these halls on memorial days and grand sacrifices are in some places conducted every Spring and Autumn.

These halls are also used for schools, community meetings, exhibitions, etc.

IV) Temples of deities of the masses. The description of ancestral halls applies to the temples of deities worshiped by the masses in China. These temples, called miao (or tz'ŭ in the cases of illustrious historical persons) are labelled by Western writers as Confucian or Taoist without justification (see Chinese Religions). Unlike ancestral halls, these temples usually contain images instead of tablets, have one or more resident priests, are frequented by superstitious women, are not well kept, and, in many cases, are used for commercial and other secular purposes. Small shrines are barely spacious enough to house an altar with an image or a tablet.

V) Taoist temples. The description of ancestral halls also applies to Taoist temples, called kuan and, in the cases of large ones, kung. The larger the Taoist temple, the more closely it approaches Buddhist temples in both exterior and interior arrangement as well as in decoration.

VI) Buddhist temples. Buddhist temples are called ssŭ in Chinese and ji in Japanese. In both China and Korea the general style is the "palace style," which is the style for all Far Eastern temples except the Temple of Heaven and Shinto shrines. Like Confucian temples, ancestral halls, or Taoist temples, Buddhist temples usually consist of a group of brick buildings, facing south.
Entering the main gate, ascending terraces, and passing by a brick screen, one comes to an open court which is often paved and decorated with walks and lotus ponds in artistic patterns. Facing the screen is the main building the portal of which is guarded by two huge and fierce looking Guardians. Inside the hall are the Four Heavenly Guardians, two on each side, and a few feet to the north, in the center, is the sanctuary of Maitreya (see Buddhist Terminology) the Welcoming Buddha whose smile greets the worshiper as he enters the hall. Going north and passing an open court, one comes to the sanctuary of the patron deity. Immediately behind him and separated by a wall is Wei-t'o, the guardian of the sanctuary and the upholder of the Law. He faces the Buddha in the hall across an open court, so that law is always tempered with compassion. The open court is often paved with stone slabs, adorned with small pagodas, stone protecting lions, stone tablets, lotus ponds, bronze incense burner, a small drum tower and a bell tower. The hall of the Buddha is called the Precious Hall of the Great Hero. It is supported by huge vermilion pillars on a raised platform, covered with single or double projecting roofs of green tiles The main altar is located north of the center of the hall, with one or three images of the Buddha (see Buddhist Terminology Triad), each on its own platform In front of each platform is a long table covered with incense burners, candle sticks, flower stands, musical instruments, and offerings of all sorts Large bells and red lacquered wooden boxes are placed on stands by the altars, and silk draperies, elaborately designed lamps, and other articles hang down from the ceiling. Along the two side walls of the hall are altars for groups of arhats (see Buddhist Terminology) or Heavenly Beings or the various transformations of the Buddha. Often there are two side shrines against the rear wall of the hall for such deities as Wên-shu, P'u-hsien, Yao-shih-fu, and Ti-tsang. Sometimes these deities and the arhats have their own halls. At the back of the altar of the Buddha is the altar of Kwan-yin* and attendants, all facing north, and at the corner behind the Buddha's altar is a small shrine dedicated to Kuan Ti* or Ti-tsang.

In addition to this main hall, there are in many cases Halls of the Ten Thousand Buddhas, Meditation Hall, Hall of Wisdom, Hall of the Patriarch, etc., further to the north. Also, further north, but more often on both sides of the main hall, there are usually abbot's hall, reception halls, study halls, halls for other purposes, dormitories, refectory, kitchens, storages, bath hall, etc. Larger monasteries have an infirmary, rooms for solitary confinement, a library on the second floor, a printing press, animal pens, a crematorium, vegetable gardens, and other units. Most temples have artistic gardens All have a bell tower and a pagoda (the pre-Buddhist mound for the remains of the dead known as the stupa took the form of a pagoda which is dedicated to housing supposed bones or ashes, scriptures, and other sacred relics of the Buddha).

The pagoda ranges from several feet to 360 ft., is usually octagonal, has many stories with projecting eaves of various colors. Pagodas for an arhat has four stories, for a bodhisattva (see Buddhist Terminology), seven stories, and for a Buddha, at least eight and usually 13 stories.
There is, however, only one story inside the pagoda. In some cases there is a winding staircase up to a certain level. On top of the pagoda is a chain of nine wheels or circles.

Buddhist temples in the Far East, especially in Japan, are gems of architecture and attract both Buddhists and non-Buddhists alike. Buddhist temples in Korea are similar to those in China In Japan, however, they are made of wood with sliding doors. They do not follow a general pattern in arrangement nor do they usually face south, as styles varied from period to period.
Many, however, follow the general scheme adopted in China. In any case, the compound usually consists of a number of buildings, courts, and gardens, all surrounded by a wall with monumental gateways. The single or double roofs of the buildings are generally high and look heavy, but are gracefully sweeping. In the approach to the main building there is sometimes a Shinto gate-way, the torii. Outside the gate of the building there is usually an altar of an arhat. In many cases, the portal is guarded by the two Guardians, as in Chinese temples. Within the gateway there is often a Shinto shrine. The inside of the temple is remarkably clean and spacious, the whole attention being directed towards the central altar. On this altar there is a large image of the Buddha, other smaller images and tablets, and often a Shinto mirror. There are side altars for Kwannon, Monju, (see Japanese Terminology), Jizō, etc., as well as altars for the founder of the sect, patriarchs, and ancestral tablets. Besides, there are small altars for Buddhist and Shinto deities and nobility.

The courtyard of a Japanese Buddhist temple is usually more artistic than that in Chinese or Korean temples. It is decorated with pine trees, fountains, stone lanterns, museums, etc. Here festivals are held, old people enjoy their leisure, and children have their fun. The pagoda in Japanese temples (sotōba) is usually of three or five stories, which are shaped from bottom to top like a cube, a sphere, a cone, a crescent, and a ball, symbolic of earth, water, fire, wind, and ether respectively. It is generally only a few feet high.

VII) Shinto shrines. Shinto* temples, which number about 150,000 in Japan, are found all over the country, in almost every village and town, and wherever the Japanese migrate. More important ones are located in scenic spots amidst a magnificent grove. The approach is inevitably marked by a torii (the meaning of which is uncertain), a gateway made of wood, and sometimes of stone, with two horizontal and projecting beams supported by two round columns. The square enclosure is surrounded by a wooden fence or wall, sometimes by trees and even stones, and marked off by a sanctified rope of straw, from which pieces of paper are hung to keep evil spirits away. Inside the compound there is a small wooden or bamboo pole in which is inserted a piece of paper or cloth so cut that the parts hang down over both sides of the pole. There are a sanctified well or rock for the use of the deity and a fountain for the purification of worshipers. The building is square and is of unpainted wood, never of stone, with a thatched or bark roof, in the style of a dwelling house. Over the angle and each end of the roof there are beams projecting in an oblique cross. Although there is no decorative effect, the simplicity and dignity of the building against the background of green trees are very impressive. Inside the shrine there are a hall for worshipers and a sanctuary facing the entrance and accessible only to priests. In this sanctuary a box is enshrined which contains a mirror, a stone, a sword, or in some cases some other relic, wrapped in silk and never to be seen by a human eye. Under the influence of Buddhism since the Nara period (645-783), some shrines have eaves, tile and curved roofs, vermilion pillars, colonnades and two-storied gates instead of a simple fence, two or more buildings including reception halls and art treasury, a stage for religious dance, etc. The Daijingu Shrine at Ise, dedicated to Amaterasu* the Sun Goddess, is the national shrine, the most sacred place in all Japan.

w.t c. temples, Greek and Roman: Temple (Lat, templum, Gr, temnō, to cut) meant originally a rectangular space of earth or sky, marked off by a priest, to be used in making sacrifices or taking auguries, then, a shrine built on consecrated ground. Hence our English temple.

Greek Temples

The earliest Greek temple, dating from perhaps the ninth century B.C., was a simple one-room structure (Gr. nāos), the dwelling-place of the god and his image. Later, this nāos was divided into aisles by rows of columns on either side. An open porch (pronāos), supported by columns, was placed in front of it, and a corresponding vestibule (opisthodomos) behind it. Colonnades were added, sometimes only in front (a prostyle temple); sometimes both in front and behind (amphiprostyle), more often in later temples on all four sides (peripteral). The whole temple was built on a platform (stylobate, or podium), approached by steps, usually three. Its orientation was normaly east.

Two styles of Greek temple developed almost simultaneously on opposite sides of the Aegean, the Doric among the Dorians of Greece and the West, the Ionic among the Ionians of Asia Minor. The Doric, with simple sturdy lines, gives an impression of weight and dignity; the more slender Ionic embodies buoyancy and grace. The Doric frieze reflects its earlier wooden construction in the triglyphs, the old beam ends, and the metopes, the spaces between; the Ionic frieze presents a flat, uninterrupted surface. The Doric metopes, the Ionic frieze, and the triangular space below the gable (pediment) at either end of the temple were adorned by artists with appropriate sculptured figures. Polychrome paint, of which only traces remain, added richness and depth to the whole.

The Acropolis of fifth century Athens provides the finest expression of both orders, of the Doric in the stately Parthenon, of the Ionic in the exquisite Erechtheum. The Propylaea, monumental gateway to the Acropolis, significantly combines the two.

A third order, the Corinthian, variant of the Ionic adding the acanthus leaf motif, appeared in the late fifth century. The most conspicuous example is the colossal temple of the Olympian Zeus in Athens, completed in the time of the Roman Emperor Hadrian (135 A.D.)

Roman Temples

The earliest Roman temple followed the Etrusco-Italian plan with its nearly square triple cella (nāos), which provided separate rooms for the Etruscan triad, Jupiter, Minerva, and Juno. The high podium, with steps only in front, remained a characteristic feature of Roman temple architecture. The Greek temple with fixed orientation was accessible from all sides. The practical Romans, orienting their temples as the specific site dictated, stressed the frontal view. They deepened the pronãos, enlarged the cella, and more often than not omitted the opisthodomos Even in the peripteral, the colonnade usually stopped at the extended rear wall of the cella In the purely Roman pseudo-peripteral, the cella occupied the full width of the podium, and engaged columns along the sides gave the illusion of a peripteral temple.

The ornate Corinthian order was a Roman favorite, from it arose the still more ornate Composite The finest existing example of the Corinthian order comes from the Augustan Age, the Maison Carrée at Nîmes, France, the earliest datable example of the Composite is found in the Colosseum at Rome (80 A.D.).

A second type of temple, the small round temple, is of every ancient origin. Several are known, e g., the temple of Vesta at Tivoli. The most impressive example is the massive Pantheon, rebuilt by Hadrian, combining the use of the arch, vault, and dome.

Neither in Greece nor in Rome was the temple itself a place of assembly for worshipers. It is interesting to reflect that the prototype of the Christian church is found not in the temples but in the basilicas of Rome.

William J. Anderson and R. Phené Spiers, The Architecture of Ancient Greece (rev. by William Bell Dinsmoor, 1927), same author, The Architecture of Ancient Rome (rev by Thomas Ashby, 1927), Walter Hege and Gerhart Rodenwaldt, The Acropolis (Oxford, 1930), D. S Robertson, A Handbook of Greek and Roman Architecture (Cambridge, 1929).   E.M N.

temples, Hebrew: Several places of worship were used by the Hebrews in the course of the centuries (Ark* of the Covenant, sanctuaries of Bethel, Shechem, Shiloh, etc.), but the more important ones are those of Jerusalem*: I. First Temple, erected by Solomon* (976-936 B.C.), described in I Kgs. v-vii, destroyed by the Babylonians in 586 B C. II. Second Temple, built by Zerubbabel in 521 B C. (?). III. Third Temple, begun by Herod the Great in 19 B.C., completed in 64 A.D., and destroyed by the Romans in 70 A.D. Also description of an Ideal Temple in Ezekiel xl-xliii, at the time of the Babylonian Exile. See Babylonian captivity. Cf. sacred vessels, tabernacle.

See H. Vincent, Jérusalem, recherches de topographie, d'archéologie et d'histoire, 2 vols. (1912-1914); K. Möhlenbrink, Der Tempel Solomons (1932); G. E. Wright, Solomon's Temple resurrected, in The Biblical Archeologist, vol. IV, No. 2 (May, 1941), pp 17-31.   S.L.T.

temples, Indian: Early Vedic Hinduism* built no temples. If any were built before the rise of Buddhism* they have completely disappeared. Now Mother India is a land of temples. There are said to be 1500 in the sacred city, Benares, alone. They vary in size from modest village temples to vast structures that compare with the most imposing cathedrals of Europe. The central feature of all Hindu temples is a cell or room in which the image of the god to whom the temple is dedicated is found. This is usually very simple in construction, but everything else about the temple is subordinate to it. A temple of Shiva* will contain the linga*, the sacred symbol of the god, usually a conical stone upon which sacred leaves or flowers are placed and holy water from the Ganges is sprinkled. In a temple to Vishnu* will be found an image of Vishnu and/or his avataras, and offerings of food are made to the accompaniment of music, chanting, and incense.

Beside the central shrine there may be a few or many courts and other buildings, housing the priests and the women attendants. Ornamentation varies in different sections of India, many of them lavish beyond description, some having literally thousands of statues and carvings. The Jain* temples are perhaps the most lavishly decorated temples, Mesopotamian: General character. The Mesopotamian temple was in all historical periods conceived as the house of the god to whom it was dedicated. Here the god lived and worked and from here he supervised—like any human manorial lord—the large temple estate from which he derived his livelihood (For this aspect of the temple see Mesopotamian religions).
              C.S.B.

The concept of the temple as a god's dwelling did not prevent it from acquiring numinous qualities and from being itself personalized to a certain extent. Ningirsu's temple in Lagash greets its owner, when it espies him from afar, with a roar that makes the heavens tremble; its terrifying nimbus reaches to the sky and awe of it inspires all lands. In ritual laments designed to placate an angry god his temple often has a voice, and the brickwork of a temple may intercede for a petitioner with the god. Similarly temples often appear in the personal names of Ancient Mesopotamia as active divine powers granting offspring, giving protection, and hearing petitions just as would a deity.

Prehistoric periods. The character of divine dwelling, which pertains to the Mesopotamian temple in historical times, fits in with and explains also the evidence which we have for the temples of the prehistoric periods. The prehistoric temple plan which developed from Al Ubaid times through the Uruk, Proto-literate, and Early Dynastic periods contains as its basic feature a long rectangular room, the cella. In the earlier of these periods entrance to the cella was frequently through a door in one of the end walls ("Langhaustempel"), but by and by it became customary to have the door in the side wall, still, however, near the corner ("Herdhaustempel"). The room usually has a hearth in the middle and, beginning with the Uruk period, a dais against the end wall farthest from the door; later parallels indicate that this dais was the place of the cult image. As pointed out by Andrae this plan has features typical of a primitive dwelling-house suited to an adverse climate: a hearth in the middle of the room to heat and light it as evenly as possible, and the best seat (that of the master of the house) placed in a commanding position against the end wall where it is also farthest away from the cold draft coming in through the door. We should therefore, in all probability, view this basic unit of the Mesopotamian temple plan as an all purpose living room in a primitive house, as yet little specialized   Here the god sat throughout the day receiving visitors, issuing orders, listening to petitions and settling disputes.   Here too, at mealtime, he presided over the family banquet, and here he most likely spent the night.

Some amount of specialization must be assumed, however, already in the oldest periods; for although the central unit will on occasion constitute the whole temple, it usually formed merely a core around which smaller subsidiary rooms grouped themselves.   Our oldest plans (Al Ubaid, Uruk, and Proto-literate periods) all show a row of such subsidiary rooms along either side wall. The functions which these rooms served are for the major part obscure but a few stand out clearly. When the entrance shifted from the end wall to the side wall it came to lead through one of these subsidiary rooms, which thus took on the character of a vestibule.   The side room directly opposite this vestibule, on the other side of the central room, shows on many plans a stairwell, presumably accommodating stairs leading to the roof. Lastly, a side room communicating with the cella through a door near the dais served, as may be concluded from remnants of ovens sometimes found there, as the god's kitchen where his food was prepared.

The building material used for Mesopotamian temples was the native unbaked brick, and the walls show, as far back as the late Al Ubaid period, the decoration with vertical T-shaped grooves which is so characteristic of sacred architecture in Mesopotamia in later times   Our first example of another feature well known in historical times, the ziqqurrat, dates from the Uruk period.   The ziqqurrat is an artificial mound of clay or unbaked bricks and serves as substructure for the temple.   Originally of rounded outlines it was later stylized as a stepped pyramid.   It never became an obligatory feature of the Mesopotamian temple and its ultimate significance still eludes us. Efforts to establish significant differences of plan and function between temples on the ground ("Tieftempel") and temples on the ziqqurrat ("Hochtempel") have not proved successful.

Historical periods   The Early Dynastic period saw the beginning of several developments which were instrumental in shaping the later Mesopotamian temple plan.   The temple is still the house of the god, but the emphasis seems subtly shifted from dwelling to office, from home life to administration.   A court, focus of the administrative activities of the temple, makes its appearance and takes a prominent position in the heart of the plan.   The old deep living room cella where the visitor shared in the home life of the god is replaced by a shallow audience or reception room where one may see the god on business.

On the basis of the actual development as it can be followed in the plans of the Sin temple in Khafaje, Frankfort has plausibly suggested that the temple court in general originated by a walling in of the open space before the temple, which by and by had become an integral part of its life.

Through subsequent building of subsidiary structures along the inside of this wall a central court came into being.   In its most imposing form this new feature meets us in the temple ovals excavated by Delougaz in Khafaje and in Al Ubaid. The temple itself lies on a raised artificial mound in one end of the oval and is reached by a flight of stairs.   The oval, a substantial wall of mud bricks, is built up along the inside with rooms leaving an open square in the middle, the court. In succeeding periods the oval tended to square off more and more.   It is preserved in final form in the temple complex in Ishchali (Old-Babylonian period) which contains—squared—all the essentials of the arrangement of the Khafaje oval: surrounding wall with subsidiary rooms along the inside leaving a square court in the middle, from here steps lead up to the temple itself which lies on a raised platform at the end farthest from the entrance.   A similar complex, but with both court and temple on the same level, is exemplified by the Ningal temple in Ur (Cassite period)

Another significant development led—after the Early Dynastic period, and in Babylonia only—to changes in the plan of the cella and of the temple itself.   The new plan shows an open rectangular court surrounded by rooms on all sides.   The entrance gate is in the middle of one end wall of the complex; across the court, in the same axis as the main gate, lies the cella, sometimes preceded by an antecella.   The cella is a rectangular room with the door in the middle of the side wall toward the court; the dais with the cult image stands in a shallow niche in the middle of the other side wall, directly opposite the door ("Breitraum").

The origin of this new plan is not yet clear. The writer is inclined to view it as resulting from an enlargement of the old deep cella to proportions beyond the point where it could be conveniently roofed.   The end of the cella in which the dais stood could still be spanned and became the new cella   This end had already been partly separated from the rest of the room in Early Dynastic times by brick pillars and sometimes by square pilasters in the side wall   The remainder of the room was left unroofed as an open court with the old rows of subsidiary rooms around it.   The entrance stayed in many cases in the side wall of the complex ("bent axis approach") but a new door in the end wall of the complex facing the new cella was added to the plan and finally won out as the main entrance.

In Assyria, on the other hand, the old plan survived in essentials down to the second millennium B.C.   It was superseded, not by the plan which had developed in Babylonia, but by a slightly modified form of the old plan in which proportions and arrangement of the cella remained intact except that the entrance was shifted from the side wall to the end wall opposite which stood dais and cult image ("Langraumtempel").

W Andrae, Gas Gotteshaus und die Urformen des Bauens (Berlin, 1930) ; Th A. Busink, Sumerische en Babylonische tempelbouw (Batavia, 1940) ; H. Frankfort's chapter "Conclusions" in P. Delougaz and S Lloyd, Pre-Sargonic Temples in the Diyala temporal power: Any authority of the Church over earthly goods, as that exercised formerly over the Papal States* and now over the Vatican City   L.R.W.

Regin: (1942), G Martin,, Die Gegensätze im lel,l' wischen und assyrischen Tempeltau (Leipzig, 1936)   T.J.

temporality of God: The view that time* is an irreducible aspect of God's experience—a reaction from the rationalistic view that additive change cannot be attributed to God or to the universe as a whole. The claim that the time-process brought no enrichment to a world essentially and eternally rational was said to be intolerable for moral, aesthetic, and religious reasons "It was better to admit the world to be not at present entirely rational, and retain some hope of its amendment, than to conceive of it as perfectly rational—and utterly hopeless." See A. Lovejoy, The Great Chain of Being (1936), p. 245

But non-temporalism was also hard to reconcile with speculative and scientific descriptions of the world's basic development.   On metaphysical grounds such contentions, as Leibniz', that time cannot exist independent of events (cf H. Bergson's durée réelle) led to taking time seriously as applied to the divine experience. The temporality of God is also more consonant with finitistic* views of God designed to account for evil especially. See God.   P A B temptation: Usual meaning, solicitation to evildoing, ascribed to outside spiritual or diabolic agency, in many religions. So Jesus was tempted· Mt. 4. 1 ff   Many now hold that we have more to fear from our own evil impulse than from any satanic tempter (James 1· 14). In O T, Satan*, perhaps the personification of a divine function, was at first (Job 1 and 2) God's vigilance officer who tested men and reported on their sincerity. Under dualistic ideas, the tester, natural adversary to the insincere, became the tempter (cf. 2 Sam. 24. 1 and 1 Chron. 21: 1), the enemy of God and man In N.T., temptation (pierasmos) includes trial, tribulation, especially as presaging the End (Lk 22: 28, 9 and in the Lord's Prayer). See sin.

X. E. Kirk, Conscience and its Problems (1933), S A McDowall, Is Sin our Fault? (1932); R. E. D. Clark, Conscious and Unconscious Sin (1934)
                                                                J L.

tempus clausum: (Lat., literally "Closed Time") The period from the First Sunday of Advent to Christmas inclusive, and from Ash Wednesday to Easter Sunday inclusive, during which the solemn celebration of marriage, that is, matrimony contracted at Mass* with solemn benediction imparted by the priest, is prohibited in the Catholic Church. However, with the permission of the Bishop, granted only for a grave reason, solemn nuptials may be celebrated during this time. Marriage* without such solemnities may, of course, be contracted by Catholics at any period of the year.   C.V.

temürah: See Kabbalah.

Ten Articles, The: (1536) Were issued by Henry VIII* to define what is necessary to be believed for salvation and the ceremonies, rites and usages to be retained. They represent a compromise between the Old Learning and the New. The grounds of Faith are limited to the Bible, the three Creeds, the Four General Councils and the traditions not contrary to Scripture. The sacraments of baptism, penance and the altar are retained, justification is included without particular designation, veneration of images, honour and prayers to saints and the doctrine of purgatory are also retained. They were supplanted the following year by "the Bishop's Book" (The Institution of a Christian Man).   F W.B.

ten stages: See Buddhist Terminology. stages, ten tenebrae: (Lat, darkness) The public chanting of Matins and Lauds for Holy Thursday, Good Friday and Holy Saturday. A candle is extinguished as each of fourteen psalms is completed, and the last candle, the fifteenth, is placed behind the altar, hence the name "tenebrae" or darkness.

                                                                L R.W.

Tennant, Frederick Robert: (1866-) Lecturer in theology and philosophy of religion at Cambridge, 1907-1938, Dr. Tennant stresses a broad empirical approach to theological and philosophical problems. Accordingly, his theism is sustained by the facts of experience and science, including values, and not by appeal to supposedly independent and unique religious or moral data. His "wider" teleological argument* uses the regularity and interdependence of nature, knowledge, and value as the most probable indication that a good Person created and directs the ultimate collocations of reality. See empirical theology; religious datum.

The Concept of Sin (1912); Miracle and Its Philosophical Presuppositions (1925), Philosophical Theology, 2 vols (1928, 1930)   P.A.B.

Tennyson, Alfred: (1809-1892) English poet. Less original and profound than many of his contemporaries, Tennyson is probably the most representative literary man of his age. He was inclusive in his choice of materials, and he sensed perfectly the typical thoughts and aspirations of the middle-class Victorian. For this reason the whole body of his work is significant, quite apart from any question of intrinsic merit. Particularly important is In Memoriam (1850), which presented a widely accepted solution to the conflicts of science and religion.

The standard edition of the Poems (9 vols, 1898-99) contains Tennyson's own annotations.
                                                                L.W.C.

teraphim: (Heb. deriv. uncertain; only plural) A seemingly opprobrious term applied in the Bible to images (I Sam. 19. 13, 16) or household gods (Gen. 31: 19, 34 f.) sometimes used in divination (Ezek. 21: 26).   S.H.B.

terce: (Lat., ad tertiam) The office of the third hour of the day. See divine office.   E.R.H.

Teresa, Saint: (1515-1582) Of old Spanish nobility, de Cepoda family. Influenced by S. Augustine's Confessions and by Jesuit priests, she entered Carmelite* convent, 1535. Known for her visions and reform efforts, she saw her vocation to found a very ascetic sisterhood to be known as Descalzos (Barefoots) Division of Carmelite order followed opposition. Teresa then established and supervised sixteen convents, fourteen monasteries Her writings, Life by Herself, The Way of Perfection, which is a guidebook for nuns, and many extant letters show her to be a good psychologist and mystic. Canonized, 1622. See John of the Cross
                                                            A.S.

terminism: idem nominalism. See s v. universals, battle over.

terminism: (fr. Lat., terminus, limit) The view that God's offer of saving grace has a terminus or limit for each individual beyond which repentance* is futile and salvation* impossible, formulated as a doctrine chiefly among English Friends and German Pietists* in the late 17th and early 18th centuries, and motivated by the desire to hasten the experience of repentance and conversion. Prominent among the terminists were J. G.
Bose and A. Rechenberg.   E.T.R.

territorialism: A theory of church government which came in with the Reformation* but was formulated in the late 17th century. It ascribed to a temporal ruler, by virtue of his office, the right to govern the church within his realm, both in external and internal affairs—though not to impose his own faith on his subjects. See s v. religious liberty.   E.C K.

Terry Lectures: A lectureship at Yale University established November 1, 1905, by gift from Dwight H. Terry, for lectures on religion in the light of science and philosophy. Among the courses have been those by J. Arthur Thomson, Concerning Evolution, 1924, Robert A Millikan, Evolution in Science and Religion, 1927, Arthur
H. Compton, The Freedom of Man, 1932; John Dewey, A Common Faith, 1934, John Macmur-ray, The Structure of Religious Experience, 1936.
                                                            L.A.W.

Tertiaries: (Lat., tertiarius, having a third part)
Those who belong to the "Third Order"* of certain religious institutes. These institutes embrace a "first order" or those male religious living in a monastery, a "second order," or those female religious living in convents; and a "third order," or those lay people living in the world. Tertiaries however may also live in a community By becoming members of the "third order," tertiaries can avail themselves of many privileges otherwise denied to those outside the cloister. See Catholic Societies.   W.H.

Tertullian: A native of the Roman Province of Africa, of pagan parentage, born c. 160 A.D., converted probably in mature manhood, widely read in law, literature and philosophy. He appears, in his Christian writings, as the prosecutor of paganism. His strong ascetic leanings led him later to embrace Montanism*. He probably remained a layman throughout his life. His main surviving works are (Souter's dating, following d'Alès) Ad Martyras, Ad Nationes, Apologeticus, (197), De Testimonio Animae, De Spectaculis, De Praescriptione Haereticorum (c 200), De Oratione, Baptismo, Patientia, Paenitentia, Cultu Feminarum, Adv. Judaeos (200-206); Adv Mar-cionem, Valentinianos, Marcioneus (207-210), De Corona, Idolatria, Ad Scapulam (211-212); then his Montanist Works (213-222). Some of his works—the Apologeticus (probably) and the de Spectaculis (certainly) were issued in Greek.

The date and manner of his death are unknown.
The most vigorous of the early Christian apologists*, he has never been canonized. See reason in religion, revelation; satisfaction, traducianism. Cf Marcion   F.W B.

Test Act, the: (1673) Prescribed the reception of the sacrament of Holy Communion according to the rites of the Church of England, and a declaration renouncing belief in the doctrine of transubstantiation* as a preliminary test and condition to the enjoyment of a temporal office or trust in England. It is a revival of the corresponding clauses of Elizabeth's Act of Supremacy*. Its object was to exclude from public office Roman Catholics who had received indulgences from Charles II. James, Duke of York (later James II), convert to the Church of Rome, resigned his position of Lord High Admiral in consequence   F.W B testament: For meaning of term see Bible; Old Testament; New Testament.

tetragrammatom: The four letters of the inef-fable name of God, YHWH. This name is never pronounced save with the vowels of Adonai or Elohim Cf. Zohar, Jehovah.   A H S

Tetrapolitan Confession: This confession of four imperial cities is the oldest theological symbol of the Reformed Church* in Germany. Prepared by Bucer*, in 1530, during the sessions of the Diet of Augsburg, it sought to present a doctrinal compromise between Lutheran and Reformed sacramental theories. It was an early, but futile, attempt at a Protestant-Evangelical union symbol.
  Philip Schaff, The Creeds of Christendom (1877), vol I.   T.F H.

Tetzel, Johann: (ca. 1450-1519) Dominican friar whose high-pressure methods of hawking indulgences* called forth Luther's protest and thus led directly to the Reformation*. See Theses, Ninety-Five, of Luther.   E.C.X.

Teutonic order (Knights): German religious military order. Originated during third Crusade*
(c. 1190) as hospital brotherhood. Adopted semimonastic life Undertook military service. Discipline was strict, the life was simple and the organization efficient. Important later in Prussia and as Baltic power. Finally reverted to original duty of caring for the sick. See military religious orders.   K.H.C.

textual criticism: See Biblical criticism. Cf. manuscripts of the Bible, translations of the Bible.

Tezcatlipoca: (Aztec) Warrior god, observer and punisher of evil doers, god of the waxing moon who wanders about at night, a counterpart of the god Quetzalcoatl*.   F L P.

Thags, Thugs: A secret organization which existed for several centuries in India, dedicated to robbery and murder by strangulation. It was put down by the British authorities in the first half of the nineteenth century. They had in all they did the sanction of religion, believing that their patron goddess, Kali*, wife of Shiva, required this service of them. Every act of brigandage was preceded by worship, and a share of the ill-gotten gains was presented to the goddess in one of her temples.   C.S.B.

Thanksgiving: As a special day of prayer and thanksgiving it was first instituted by Governor Bradford of the Plymouth colony in 1621 after the first successful harvest. After 1630 it became an annual observance after each harvest, and other New England Colonies soon took up the practice. New York was the first state to inaugurate an annual Thanksgiving Day (1830) and other northern states gradually followed. Virginia was the first southern state (1855) to observe a Thanksgiving Day. Abraham Lincoln in 1864 began the practice of issuing a proclamation calling upon the nation to give thanks to Almighty God, fixing the fourth Thursday of November as the day. Later this was changed to the last Thursday in November. President Franklin D. Roosevelt in 1939 set a new precedent by placing Thanksgiving on the third Thursday of November, though many Governors of states refused to follow his suggestion.
Robert H Schauffler, Thanksgiving. Its origin, celebration and Significance, etc. (1925).
           w.w.s.

theater: See religious drama.

Theatines: Members of a religious Order of men in the R. C. Church. Founded in 1524, it derived its name from the Italian city of Chieti (Theate) of which one of its founders, G. P. Carafa (afterwards Pope Paul IV), was Bishop. The original purpose of the group was to perfect the lives of the clergy and laity but its members have been prominent in missionary activities, in preaching, and in hospital work. The rule is quite strict. There are also two groups of nuns following a modified Theatine rule. V.J.B.

theft: The act of obtaining the property of another wrongfully. The term is often used broadly to cover larceny, swindling, embezzlement and fraud. Theft has been ethically condemned and is legally punishable—within the limits and under the circumstances determined by the mores—among all peoples. It was a legitimate means of livelihood in the Hindu robber caste and at a certain period of Jewish history was not regarded as a crime when practiced upon Samaritans or thieves.   R.W.F.

theism: (Gr., theos, god) The terms theist and theism, following their slightly earlier etymological equivalents deist and *deism, are altogether modern, first occurring (according to the Oxford Engl. Dict) in the 17th Cent. and first used in contrast to the already established terms atheist and *atheism (Plato had used atheos and atheotes), as, e.g., in Cudworth's The True Intellectual System of the Universe (London, 1678, see preface). During the 18th cent theism and deism were used interchangeably (indeed as late as 1827, the 2nd Ed. of Sam. Johnson's Dictionary makes them synonymous) to indicate a philosophical as opposed to a dogmatic belief in God (natural theology as contrasted with revealed), with deism, however, as the dominant and more controversial term. Although Shaftesbury, as early as 1709, had written (through Palemon). "I consider still that, in strictness, the root of all is Theism, and that to be a settled Christian, it is necessary to be first of all a good Theist" (The Moralists, Pt. I, Sect. 2), it was not until the 19th century that theism came commonly to be recognized as the normative philosophical expression of the Christian religion, and, at the same time, critically to be distinguished from deism and pantheism* as its logical extremes.

Theism is distinguishable from monotheism* (belief in one God) only in that it is chiefly a philosophical term and connotes something more than mere contrast with polytheism (belief in a plurality of gods). Its essential idea is that of a unitary, personal Being as the creative source or ground of the physical world, man and value, at once transcendent to nature (i.e., distinct from it and never exhausted by it) and immanent in it (i.e., natural processes involving the continuing divine activity). Theism is thus contrasted with deism, which implies the total transcendence* of God to nature, and with pantheism, which by identifying God with nature becomes a doctrine of exclusive immanence*. It assumes that God is both knowable, to some degree at least, and dynamically available in human experience. It may be idealistic (viewing the physical world in terms of mind-activity and therefore denying to it any metaphysical independence) or realistic (interpreting the physical world as in some sense metaphysically real). Although a modern term, it is manifestly applicable, in varying degrees, to many ancient and medieval, as well as modern, philosophies, e.g., those of Plato, Aristotle, Plotinus, Anselm, Albert, Aquinas, Descartes, Locke, Leibniz, Kant, Lotze, etc. A recent use of the term in combination with naturalism*, viz., theistic naturalism (see e.g., The Growth of Religion by H. N. Wieman and W. M. Horton, 1938) makes God an aspect of, or a principle within, the process of nature; with natural process as the ultimate category, however, such a view is to be sharply distinguished from theism in the strict sense. See God.

Out of a vast literature the following may be mentioned: R. Flint, Theism (1877); B. P. Bowne, Theism (1902); J. Ward, The Realm of Ends (1911, 3rd ed. 1920); A. Seth Pringle Pattison, The Idea of God (1916, 2nd ed. 1920); G. D. Hicks, The Philosophical Bases of Theism (1937); J. Laird, Theism and Cosmology (1942). E.T.R.

Themis: (Gr. Thémis, from tithēmi, to place, put) 1) Law, not as fixed by statute, but as established by custom. 2) Themis, personified, is the goddess of law and order. Aeschylus represents her as Gaia (Earth), the mother of Prometheus (Forethought).   E M.N.

Themistians: See Agnoetae.

theocracy: (Gr. theos, God; kratein, to rule) The rule of God in human organization. Historically, the rule of a State or Church by the representatives of God, usually a priesthood, but possible, as with Calvinism*, the people   Both the idea and the resultant organization are properly called "theocracy". See kingdom of God.
                                                              E.P.B.

theodicy: See evil, omniscience, omnipotence, perfect.

Theodore of Mopsuestia: (ca. 350-428 A.D.) Born probably in Antioch, and educated there as the friend and fellow-student of John Chrysostom* He became a presbyter in Antioch, but in A.D. 393 became Bishop of Mopsuestia in Cilicia. He was one of the more orthodox members of the Antiochian school*. See Zervanism.   A K R.

Theodore of Studion: (759-826) Became the hegumenos of the Studion monastery in Constantinople in 799. He gained fame for his adaptation of the Rules of St. Basil*, and his version has become the prevailing monastic rule throughout the Orthodox East. He was the chief defender of the image* worship during the reign of Emp Leo V, denying the Emperor's right to interfere in dogmatic matters. Exiled, he was allowed to return in the next reign, but was not able to secure victory for the icondulic* cause. See Basilians.
    Alice Gardner, Theodore of Studion (London, 1905).   M.S.

Theodore of Tarsus: (602-690) Educated Athens. Consecrated Archbishop of Canterbury (668). Organized and disciplined the English Church compelling full submission to Canterbury. Wrote a Penitential, regulating morals and religion.   R.E.E.H.

Theodoret: (ca. 386-457) Born and educated in Antioch; became Bishop of Cyrus in Syria about 420; an exegete who used the gramatico-historical method of his teacher, Theodore of Antioch, while avoiding the latter's rationalism, a historian who continued the work of Eusebius*. He took a prominent part in the Christological controversies, defending a modified Nestorianism but attacking the Monophysitism of Eutyches. See Antiochian School; Three Chapter controversy.   A.K.R.

Theodosius, the Great: See Constantinople, Councils of.

Theodulf of Orleans: (c. 750-827) The versatile Bishop of Orleans whose influence is shown by his promotion of monastic, clerical, educational, and judicial reform. Capable missus dominicus of Charlemagne. Poet of the Palace School*.
                                                              F.W.N.

Theologia Germanica: Late fourteenth century anon. didactic writing: series of talks to young religious by a priest-teacher in the House of the Order of Teutonic Knights, Frankfurt, Main. The writing treats briefly of God's truth in the individual soul, of growth toward perfection, of Jesus' example in suffering, of "The middle way" between the active and contemplative self. The ideas resemble teachings of Friends of God*, active in the Rhine valley and are classed as practical mysticism. First published in part (cvii-xxvi) in 1516, and complete in 1518, by Martin Luther who added the title. Twenty different editions in German, and many in French and Latin were printed in the sixteenth century. Placed on R. C Index 1621.
    Franz Pfeiffer, Theologia deutsch (4th ed , Gutersloh, 1900) for parallel original and modern German texts, Susanna Winkworth's edition in English (1854) pref. by Charles Kingsley; Maria David-Windstosser, Etude sur la "Theologie Germanique" (Paris, 1911)   Excellent bibliography.   A.S

theological anthropology: See anthropology, theological.

theological education: See theological schools, Jewish; seminaries, major Roman Catholic; theological schools, Protestant, U. S. and Canada. See also anti-theological education agitation in the U. S.

theological encyclopaedia: The study of theology falls into a number of departments, each of which must be considered separately. All of them, however, are inter-related, and may be presented in such a manner as to indicate their mutual dependence This survey of theological knowledge with regard to the whole field as well as to each part of it is denoted by the term "Encyclopaedia". The technical term has now fallen into disuse, but conveys an idea which can never be safely neglected.   E.F.S.

theological journals: See Journals of religion and theology.

theological schools, Jewish: The major theological seminaries as listed in the American Jewish Year Book (1942-3) are Reform: Hebrew Union College (1875), Cincinnati, Ohio; Jewish Institute of Religion (1922), New York City. Conservative· Jewish Theological Seminary of America (1886; re-organized, 1902), New York City. Orthodox: Hebrew Theological College (1922), Chicago, Ner Israel, Rabbinical College of America (1933), Baltimore, Md., Rabbi Isaac Elchanan Theological Seminary and Yeshiva College (1896; re-organized, 1928), New York City.
                                                              F.A.L.

theological schools, Protestant, United States and Canada: United States. Several types of educational preparation for the ministry have existed in the United States. While each of these served the needs of its own day, each also eventually proved insufficient and helped to pave the way for its successor. In rough chronological order of origin the types are these·

1. European universities. The Protestant ministers who migrated to the colonies before about 1700 were, predominantly, men educated in European universities, Anglicans and Puritans chiefly at Oxford and Cambridge, and the Dutch at Leyden and Utrecht. Ministers thus trained continued to come in later years, and the Lutherans relied on European-trained ministers until about the end of the eighteenth century. But with the rise of a 'native ministry' there was need for American educational institutions.

2. American colleges. The next step was the creation of American colleges patterned after European examples, the influence of Emmanuel College, Cambridge, being especially strong. Harvard (1636), William and Mary (1693), Yale (1701), and Princeton (1701), were founded with the preparation of ministers as a large part of the purpose, as was true of many later colleges. Theological materials were included in the college curriculum; e.g., the curriculum for A.B. contained Hebrew and Greek, Bible, and dogmatic theology But the A B. graduate was considered to be "raw and unfurnished" for the work of the ministry, often the candidate for ordination remained in residence after graduation, studying divinity for two or three years more, and perhaps proceeding to A M.

3. Chairs of Divinity in colleges marked a step toward specialization in theological education in America. The Hollis Professorship of Divinity at Harvard (1721) whose first incumbent was the Rev. Edward Wigglesworth; the Yale Professorship of Divinity (1756) with the Rev. Naphtali Daggett as first incumbent, and the College of New Jersey (Princeton) Professorship of Divinity and Moral Philosophy with the Rev. John Blair, established a pattern of theological work leading to A.B. and A M. which still persists in many colleges, although other degrees have frequently been substituted.

4. Private instruction. Distance and difficulties of travel, expenses of a regular college course, revival movements which engendered criticism of existing scholastic training for ministers, and doctrinal controversies which produced dissatisfaction with some of the college teaching, conspired to encourage candidates to seek private theological instruction from a suitable minister. Several instances of Congregational ministers privately instructed in America are known for the seventeenth century. In the eighteenth century, especially in the latter half, this type of instruction played a major role in American theological education; Shewmaker estimates that at least 150 ministers engaged in such teaching among the Congregationalists, Dutch Reformed, and Presbyterians. Besides these, many Lutheran ministers gave private instruction. In many cases a minister taught only a few students, but some individuals prepared numerous candidates, as Nathaniel

Emmons of Wrentham, Mass, who is said to have trained 87 men. Teaching of this kind is not to be confused with that of private academies for general education, which of course were common. But some ministers attempted to meet the need for both general and theological education, thus establishing institutions which flourished briefly as academies for all of a minister's education. Examples are the famous "Log College" of the Tennents at Neshaminy, Pa., and the academies of the Blairs at Faggs Manor, Pa, of Robert Smith at Pequa, Pa., of John McMillan at Chartiers, Pa., William Graham at Timber Ridge, Va., Samuel Doak at Bethel, Tenn., and David Caldwell at Buffalo and Allamance, N C. The "Shepherd's Tent," established by the Rev Timothy Allen at New London, Conn., in 1742, was an outgrowth of the revivalist movement; outlawed in Connecticut, the school was removed to Rhode Island. Many eminent divines were prepared by private instruction, and there was value in the apprentice feature often accompanying private education. But as a whole the result of the method was a lowering of standards for the ministry. Private instruction tended to sever theological education from the college setting and to turn it in the direction of schools created exclusively for the preparation of ministers. Two trends can be discerned in the private instruction of the eighteenth century· that which had the purpose of maintaining denominational conceptions in theology and worship, and that which was chiefly concerned with a particular experiential form of piety. The first led to the denominational seminaries; the second is related at least indirectly to the Bible Schools.

5 Theological seminaries. Private instruction merged so gradually into the formal theological seminary as to make it almost impossible to say where one ends and the other begins. The connecting thread is the appointment of an individual to be the official teacher of theology for a given religious group. Some such men left no permanent institutions, while others, receiving financial support from the church, established schools.

Beginning about 1754 the Dutch Reformed attempted to establish a chair of divinity either in Kings College (now Columbia University), or in the College of New Jersey (Princeton), or in Queens College (Rutgers). Failing in each of these attempts, they determined to establish a professorship under their own ecclesiastical control and having no connection with any college. On October 8, 1784 they appointed the Rev. John Henry Livingston, one of the pastors of the Collegiate Reformed Dutch Church of New York City, as Professor of Sacred Theology, and the Rev. Hermanus Meyer of Pompton Plains, New Jersey, as Instructor in Sacred Languages. This action is usually reckoned as the establishing of the first Protestant theological seminary in the United States. Livingston began his teaching in 1785, in New York, while continuing as a pastor. In 1810 he removed to New Brunswick, N. J., where he became President of Queens and Professor of Theology. The theological school and the college were intimately related, but the theological school has a continuous existence from 1784 and is now the New Brunswick Theological Seminary.

In 1794 the Associate Presbytery of Pennsylvania appointed the Rev. John Anderson as its professor. Continuing as pastor at Service, Pa., he built a log house for his school and immediately began instruction in theology and other subjects, with a small number of students. The school is known as Service Seminary. In 1821 it was transferred to Canonsburg, Pa, and thence to Xenia, O., in 1855 By the union of 1858 it became a seminary of the United Presbyterian Church of North America. In 1920 Xenia Seminary was removed to St. Louis, and in 1930 merged with the Pittsburgh Seminary to become the present Pittsburgh-Xenia Theological Seminary.

About 1797 the work of the Hartwick Foundation was begun among the Lutherans. From about the middle of the eighteenth century the Lutherans had desired a theological school of their own, but, aside from European-trained ministers, had been obliged to rely on private instruction. The Rev John Christopher Hartwick left his estate for the establishing of an institution of learning The representatives of the estate resolved in 1797 to establish a 'theological and missionary seminary,' and teaching was begun, in 1815 the seminary was located at Hartwick, N Y, and was chartered in 1816 It was Lutheran in teaching and in the personnel of the trustees, but was not an official seminary of the church. A school opened at Gettysburg, Pa., September 5, 1826, was the first official theological seminary of the Lutheran Church, and continues as the Lutheran Theological Seminary of Gettysburg.

Anti-Trinitarian views were gaining strength in New England when the Rev. Henry Ware, a Unitarian, was elected to the Hollis Professorship in Harvard, in 1805. Resentment over 'the defection of Harvard' being strong among the orthodox Congregationalists, Andover Theological Seminary was opened in 1808, representing the views of the 'moderate Calvinists,' and the 'consistent Calvinists' or Hopkinsians. The pioneer Baptist school for the theological instruction of college graduates was Newton Theological Institution, established in 1825 at Newton Centre, Mass. In 1931 these institutions merged, forming the present Andover Newton Theological School at Newton Centre, Mass

Among the Presbyterians, after the Log College at Neshaminy (ca. 1726-1746) had disappeared and the schism between the New Side and the Old Side'* had been healed by the reunion of 1758, the Professorship of Theology at the College of New Jersey, together with private instruction and various schools, served the needs of theological education until early in the nineteenth century. Sweet observes that the Presbyterians established "an even hundred schools" between 1726 and the end of the century, and "all were primarily ministerial training schools," (Religion in Colonial America, p. 269), yet none fully met the need as the Presbyterians saw it. In 1811 the General Assembly adopted "The Plan of a Theological Seminary," which was established at Princeton, and began its work in 1812 with one professor, the Rev. Archibald Alexander, and three pupils. The School continues as Princeton Theological Seminary. The Assembly left Synods free to establish theological schools on what was called "the principle of locality," and several other Presbyterian seminaries were founded by the end of the 1820's.

In the Protestant Episcopal Church, opinion was divided over the question whether theological education should be carried on in diocesan seminaries or whether one seminary should be established for the whole church, but in 1817 the General Convention established the General Theological Seminary, in which instruction was begun in 1819.

The first of the Baptist seminaries was the Hamilton Literary and Theological Institution, organized in 1820 at Hamilton, N Y., by the Education Society of the State of New York. It became Colgate Theological Seminary, and is in the ancestry of the present Colgate-Rochester Divinity School.

The German Reformed Church founded a seminary in 1825 in connection with Dickinson College at Carlisle, Pa, in 1829 the school was independently established at York, Pa. In 1871 the seminary was removed to Lancaster, Pa., where it continues as the Theological Seminary of the Reformed Church in the United States, serving the now merged Evangelical and Reformed Church.

The Methodists, perhaps less from conviction against theological education than from realistic acceptance of pioneer conditions, were late in their development of seminaries. The first is said to have been the theological department of an academy at Newbury, Vermont, which began instruction in 1841. That school is in the line forming the present School of Theology of Boston University But the Methodists have shown great ingenuity in developing methods of 'education on the job' for their ministers.

Such events as have been sketched are signs of a conviction coming to be generally held among Protestants in the United States early in the nineteenth century, viz., that each denomination could best discharge its responsibility for the education of ministers by founding one or more seminaries under some form of direct denominational control. Given this conviction, when the nation expanded in population and territory and when denominational differences played so large a part as they have done in the United States, it was inevitable that seminaries should multiply. The following Table (from E. G. Dexter, A History of Education in the United States, p. 312), serves to show both the rate and the geographical distribution of the growth.

Theological Schools

Year	N. Atlantic	S. Atlantic	S. Central	N. Central	Western	Total
1890-1902	3	3	6	9	2	23
1880-1889	2	4	2	7	—	15
1870-1879	1	1	4	7	2	15
1860-1869	11	4	2	9	1	27
1850-1859	9	—	4	7	—	20
1840-1849	4	—	—	4	—	8
1830-1839	4	2	1	4	—	11
1820-1829	7	2	—	1	—	10
Totals	41	16	19	48	5	129

Not all denominations, however, shared the conviction that seminaries provided the best way to prepare ministers. The Disciples of Christ, e.g., traditionally had a definite conviction against seminaries Their colleges, however, gave large attention to Bible study as the principal elements in the training of ministers. In the first ninety years of their history the Disciples founded 54 colleges, each having a chair or department of Bible. The College of the Bible, founded at Lexington, Ky., in 1865, set a different pattern— a school definitely for ministers, but placed in connection with 'a scientific and literary institution.' Five other Bible Colleges of similar type have been established, purposely avoiding use of the term 'theological school.'

It is impossible in limited space to trace further the development of individual schools or even of denominational policies. Many histories of particular institutions are available, and denominational histories usually give attention to ministerial education.

For approximately a century theological seminaries pursued their way in relative isolation from one another, isolated also to a large degree from other types of educational institutions. Taking the period as a whole (say from 1800 to 1918), certain facts stand out. (a) Religious liberty was furthered by the seminary plan of theological education. Religious bodies large or small were free to establish and maintain schools, with no external pressure, where any interpretation of religion could be taught to ministers in the making. By the same token the way was left equally open to set up schools representing 'dissenting' or 'heretical' points of view. The results are far-reaching, since both the right to maintain and the right to remake religious convictions were preserved at one of the fountain sources, viz., the education of ministers. But this aspect of religious liberty was kept at a heavy cost; for (b) a serious decline in educational standards for the American ministry accompanied the rise of theological seminaries. This phenomenon itself is too complicated to admit any single explanation, but apparently it does bear some relation to the existence of schools for ministerial education which were responsible to the religious body for doctrine, but were not responsible to any group for the maintenance of educational standards. It became easy to admit students without college preparation Between 1785 and 1835 there was a sharp drop in the number of college graduates among Congregational clergymen in New England. In the years 1881-1885, in all seminaries reporting, only 23.6 per cent of the graduates held college degrees. The admission of a large percentage of men without college preparation dragged down the level of teaching. Libraries commonly were poor. As a whole scholarship in seminaries was at a low ebb.

The year 1918 marks a turn toward cooperative measures which have not taken away the autonomy of individual schools, but which have cross-fertilized theological education and have had the direct result of raising educational standards. In that year problems incident to World War I led to the gathering of a representative group of theological educators at Cambridge, Mass., out of which grew The Conference of Theological Seminaries and Colleges in the United States and Canada, meeting biennially until 1936. In 1922-23 a survey of theological education was conducted and reported in Theological Education in America, by R L. Kelly, (New York, 1924). The Conference, in collaboration with the Institute of Social and Religious Research, soon sponsored a much more thorough survey which was reported in The Education of American Ministers, by Mark A. May, William Adams Brown, and others (4 vols., 1934). In 1936 the Conference became The American Association of Theological Schools, with a membership at that time of 64 institutions in the United States and Canada. The Association adopted standards for accrediting, appointed a Commission on Accrediting, and authorized the Commission to "institute and maintain a list of Accredited Theological Seminaries and Theological Colleges," the latter being the common term in Canada.

The standards place theological education at the graduate level, separating it from undergraduate instruction; requiring an A.B. or its equivalent for admission to candidacy for the B.D.; calling for a three-year course leading to the B D.; requiring a faculty of at least four full-time professors, with other sections relating to library, equipment, finances, etc.

Inspections with a view to being accredited are made only upon invitation by an institution. In 1938 the Commission reported its first list of accredited schools, 45 in number, the report for 1942 contains 57 institutions. The 1938 report, summarizing the accredited institutions, showed an enrolment of 5102 students, 577 faculty members, a plant value for 37 schools totaling $29,438,634, and income-producing investments for 35 schools totaling $57,546,825.

Theological education in the United States is now so complex that only by a careful definition of terms can one say how many theological schools are in existence. For example (1) The Roman Catholics in 1940 reported 98 "major seminaries" which provide "courses in the Sacred Sciences as prescribed by Canon Law and give young men immediate preparation for ordination," enrolling 5237 students (2) The Roman Catholics in the same year report 83 "minor" or preparatory seminaries, usually covering four years of high school work and two years of college classical work, admitting students as early as 12 or 14, some but not all of these schools are given over exclusively to training candidates for religious orders or societies, or secular priests, or both. They report 9692 students, only 1788 of these being lay students. (3) There are, in 1943, 57 accredited Protestant theological schools in the United States and Canada, four of these being in Canada and the remaining 53 in the United States. (4) There are some 57 other theological schools in the United States, the basis of whose work approximates that of the accredited schools, but which vary from the 'standard' in one or more particulars such as size of faculty, standards of admission or graduation, etc. (5) There are at least 32 colleges in the United States, not included in the above classes, which include the preparation of ministers as part of their function. Typically they maintain a Department of Theology, or a School of Theology, and confer such degrees as Th.B , or in some instances a B.D. (6) There are 9 junior colleges which also include the preparation of ministers as part of their function and, similarly, maintain a Department of Theology (7) There are 31 other theological schools or departments of theology, reported to be in existence, but the nature of their work is too uncertain to justify listing them in other classifications (8) Besides all these, there are at least 17 Bible Schools which often, and perhaps normally, serve as places of preparation for ministers. Addition of these figures gives a total of 181 Roman Catholic institutions, and 199 for Protestants. The latter total has not varied greatly since about 1930, for the Survey of Theological Education reported 198 institutions in the United States existing primarily for theological education, 157 being primarily for white students and 41 for Negro students. But not all theological schools are stable institutions; e.g., 23 schools reported to exist in 1936 cannot be found in current lists.

At present the trend in the United States seems to be toward raising of standards, and either mergers or various forms of affiliation which reduce the number of small isolated schools. At the same time the appearance of new schools does not thus far suggest actual diminution of the total number of schools devoted to theological education.

Canada   The earliest settlers in what is now Canada were predominantly French and Roman Catholic.   The early Protestant clergymen came from England, Scotland, and the United States. But the Protestants were numerically a minor part of the total population until about the time of the American Revolution, with the result that provisions for the education of a native Protestant ministry came later than in the United States.

The story of theological education in Canada is, to a large degree, a reflection of the struggle for religious equality in respect of educational advantages. One of the results was the creation of numerous small colleges, with denominational affiliation, which had the education of ministers as a prominent purpose. Many of these have, in later years, devoted themselves almost entirely to theological education.

The Church of England was made the established church of Nova Scotia in 1758. King's College, under Anglican control, was founded at Windsor, N. S., by the provincial legislature in 1789. Strict Anglican tests were imposed on professors and students, and dissenters were excluded. Thomas McCulloch, a Presbyterian minister, founded a 'log college' at Pictou early in the nineteenth century, to secure educational rights for Presbyterians, and to prepare ministers. The case of Pictou Academy became a storm center, dividing Anglicans and dissenters, forcing the issue of educational rights for the latter. Dalhousie College, founded in 1818, was "intended for those who are excluded from Windsor College [King's]." In 1838 Acadia College was founded by the Baptists at Wolfville Pictou Academy is perpetuated in Pine Hill Divinity Hall, while Acadia College became Acadia University in 1891 and has a faculty of theology. In the twentieth century the Carnegie Corporation attempted to have all the colleges of Nova Scotia move to Halifax and join with Dalhousie University, each constituent maintaining its identity and funds, but giving up its examining and degree-granting power except in Divinity, thus forming a great university center with affiliated theological colleges.   Only the University of King's College, successor to King's College, agreed, it now is a theological college associated with Dalhousie University.

When Upper Canada, now Ontario, became a separate province in 1791, the Constitutional Act of that year set aside one-seventh of the lands of the province as "clergy Reserves" to endow "a Protestant Clergy." This was interpreted by many to mean the Church of England, and Bishop Strachan gained a large measure of control over education in the province. In 1827 he seireJ a charter for King's College, Toronto, which was to be under Anglican control, its professors to be Anglican and its divinity degrees confined to those who subscribed to Anglican tests. Efforts were made to permit professorships of divinity in King's College to be established by any denominations of Christians desiring to do so, but the plan came to nothing. The Methodists opened Upper Canada Academy at Cobourg in 1836, which became Victoria College in 1841. The Kirk Presbyterians obtained a charter for Queen's College at Kingston in 1841, and the Free Presbyterians founded Knox College in 1844 King's College in 1849 was changed to become the University of Toronto and the Divinity Faculty was abolished, whereupon the Anglicans established Trinity College in 1851. The Act of 1853 made it possible for denominational colleges to affiliate with the University of Toronto The Federation Act of 1887 brought into federation with the University of Toronto the theological colleges of Knox (Presbyterian), Wycliffe (Anglican), Victoria (Methodist), now Emmanuel College in Victoria University, of the United Church, and St. Michael's (Roman Catholic). Trinity College federated with the University in 1904 "The essence of the scheme [of federation] is a group of Arts or Divinity Colleges gathered about a central University, supported and controlled by the State, the University conducting examinations, conferring degrees except in Divinity, and giving the instruction in those branches of learning which are costly to conduct, or are taken by only a few students, or are professional in character."

At Montreal four Protestant theological colleges were affiliated with McGill University; the number now stands at three: Diocesan Theological College (Anglican), Presbyterian Theological College, and United Theological College (United Church)

The constitutions of the four western universities were modelled largely after Toronto, and the affiliation of theological colleges with the universities is thus familiar through western Canada. The University of Manitoba has five affiliated theological colleges St. Boniface College at St. Boniface, and St. Paul's College, Roman Catholic; St. John's College (Anglican); Manitoba College and Wesley College (United Church); the latter four being at Winnipeg. The University of Alberta has two: St. Stephens (United Church), and St. Aidan's (Anglican), St. Andrew's (Anglican), and the Lutheran Seminary; and at Regina, St. Chad's. The University of British Columbia has two: Union College of British Columbia (United Church), and the Anglican Theological College of British Columbia.

A canon of the General Synod of the Church of England in Canada provides that degrees in divinity are to be conferred after examination by a Joint Board consisting of the Archbishop of Rupert's Land as chairman and representatives of the church universities and theological colleges, viz., the Universities of King's, Bishop's, and Trinity Colleges, and Montreal Diocesan, Wycliffe, Huron, St. John's, Emmanuel at Saskatoon, St. Chad's, and Anglican Theological College of B. C.

Thus Canada has made a signal achievement in the clustering of theological schools in university centers, and in establishing an affiliation of the theological colleges with the universities. The process seems to have been more completely worked out in the western than in the eastern provinces But at present there are few isolated 'theological seminaries' in Canada Affiliation with the universities has preserved denominational autonomy, but has also kept theological education in a university setting

UNITED STATES Centennial of the Theological Seminary of the Reformed Church in America, 1784-1884 (1885) E G Dexter, A History of Education in the United States (1922) F G Gotwald, "Theological education in the Lutheran Church prior to the founding of Wittenberg College and Seminary in 1845," Lutheran Quarterly, XLVI (pp 82-100), Jan , 1916. J Johnson, "Early theological education west of the Alleghanies," Papers of the American Society of Church History, Second Series, vol V, pp 119-130 (1917) J McNaugher, Theological Education in the United Presbyterian Church and its Ancestries (1931) R B Montgomery, The Education of Ministers of Disciples of Christ (1931) S. E Morison, Three Centuries of Harvard, 1636-1936 (1942). W. O Shewmaker, "The training of the Protestant ministry in the United States of America, before the establishment of theological seminaries," Papers of the American Society of Church History, Second Ser , vol. VI, pp 71-191 (1921). S Simpson, "Early ministerial training in America," Papers of the Am Soc of Ch Hist , Second Ser , vol II, pp. 117-121 (1910) "Theological seminaries" [articles on history of individual schools], New Schaff-Herzog Encyclopedia of Religious Knowledge, vol XI, pp. 343-394 (1911) Numerous histories of particular institutions, denominational histories, biographies, etc
CANADA N Burwash, The History of Victoria College (1907) W Gregg, History of the Presbyterian Church in Canada (1885). W. McCulloch, The Life of Thomas McCulloch, D.D. (n p , n d). J T McNeill, The Presbyterian Church in Canada, 1875-1925 (1925) E H Oliver, The Winning of the Frontier (1930) J. E Sanderson, The First Century of Methodism in Canada, vol. I (1908). A. Shortt and A G. Doughty, Canada and its Provinces, vol XI (1914) The University of Toronto and its Colleges, 1827- 1906 (1906). Universities Yearbook, 1936 (London, 1936)
Both U. S and Canada. R. L Kelly, Theological Education in America (1924) M A. May and others, The Education of American Ministers, 4 vols (1934). Bulletins of the American Association of Theological Schools, especially Bulletin 12, June sp, 1938, "First Report of the Commission on Accrediting."

LIST OF THEOLOGICAL SCHOOLS, UNITED STATES AND CANADA

The following list contains (1) The theological schools which are members of the American Association of Theological Schools, indicated by *, (2) The theological schools which are accredited by the A.A.T.S., indicated by ; all these are also members of the A.A.T.S.; and (3) Certain others.

UNITED STATES

California· Berkeley Baptist Divinity School, Berkeley, Calif , No. Baptist, 1904; *Church Divinity School of the Pacific, Berkeley, Calif., Prot. Episcopal, 1893; Pacific School of Religion, Berkeley, Calif., Cong -Chrn., 1866; *Pacific Unitarian, School for the Ministry, Berkeley, Calif , Unitarian, 1904; San Francisco Theological Seminary, San Anselmo, Calif., Presb. U. S. A., 1871; *University of Southern Calif., School of Religion, Los Angeles, Calif , Methodist, 1880.

Colorado Iliff School of Theology, Denver, Colo., Methodist, 1892

Connecticut *Berkeley Divinity School, New Haven, Conn., Prot Episcopal, 1854, Hartford Theological Seminary, Hartford, Conn., Cong.-Chrn., 1834, Yale University, Divinity School, New Haven, Conn., Cong.-Chrn., (1701), 1822.

District of Columbia Howard University, School of Religion, Washington, D C, Non-denom., 1871

Georgia Candler School of Theology, Emory Univ, Emory University, Ga, Methodist, (1836), 1914, Columbia Theological Seminary, Decatur, Ga, Presb U S, 1828, Gammon Theological Seminary, Atlanta, Ga, Methodist, 1883

Illinois Augustana Theological Seminary, Rock Island, Ill, Augustana Lutheran, 1860, Bethany Biblical Seminary, Chicago, Ill, Ch of the Brethren, 1905, *Chicago Lutheran Seminary, Maywood, Ill, United Lutheran, 1891, Chicago Theological Seminary, Chicago, Ill, Cong Chrn, 1855, Concordia Theological Seminary, Springfield, Ill, Mo Lutheran, 1846, Evangelical Theological Seminary, Naperville, Ill., Evangelical Ch, 1873, Garrett Biblical Institute, Evanston, Ill., Methodist, 1855, McCormick Theological Seminary, Chicago, Ill, Presb. U. S. A, 1829, Meadville Theological School, Chicago, Ill, Unitarian, 1844, *Northern Baptist Theological Seminary, Chicago, Ill, No. Baptist, 1913, Seabury Western Theological Seminary, Evanston, Ill, Prot. Episcopal, 1858, University of Chicago, Divinity School, Chicago, Ill, No Baptist, 1866.

Indiana Anderson College Theological Seminary, Anderson, Ind, Ch of God, 1917, *Butler University, College of Religion, Indianapolis, Ind, Disciples, 1925

Iowa Drake University, Bible College, Des Moines, Iowa, Disciples, 1881, *University of Dubuque, Theological School, Dubuque, Iowa, Presb U S A., 1852, Wartburg Theological Seminary, Dubuque, Iowa, Amer Lutheran, 1853

Kansas *Central Baptist Theological Seminary, Kansas City, Kans, No Baptist, 1901

Kentucky *Asbury Theological Seminary, Wilmore, Ky, Non-denom, 1923; College of the Bible, Lexington, Ky, Disciples, 1865; Louisville Presbyterian Seminary, Louisville, Ky, Presb U S & U. S. A, 1853, Southern Baptist Theological Seminary, Louisville, Ky, So Baptist, 1859

Louisiana *Baptist Bible Institute, New Orleans, La, So Baptist, 1918.

Maine *Bangor Theological Seminary, Bangor, Me, Cong.-Chrn, 1814

Maryland Westminster Theological Seminary, Westminster, Md, Methodist, 1882

Massachusetts Andover Newton Theological School, Newton Centre, Mass, Cong.-Chrn; No. Bapt, 1808; Boston University, School of Theology, Boston, Mass., Methodist, 1841, *Divinity School of Gordon College of Theology and Missions, Boston, Mass, Non-denom, 1889; Episcopal Theological School, Cambridge, Mass, Prot. Episcopal, 1867, Harvard University, Divinity School, Cambridge, Mass, Non-denom, (1636), 1816, *New Church Theological School, Cambridge, Mass, Gen. Conv New Jerus, 1866; *Tufts College, School of Religion, Medford, Mass., Universalist, 1851.

Michigan. *Calvin Theological Seminary, Grand Rapids, Mich, Chrn. Reformed, 1876, Western Theological Seminary, Holland, Mich, Ref. Ch. in Amer., 1866.

Minnesota Augsburg Theological Seminary, Minneapolis, Minn, Lutheran Free Ch., 1869; Luther Theological Seminary, St Paul, Minn., Norwegian Lutheran, 1876; *Northwestern Lutheran Theological Seminary, Minneapolis, Minn., United Lutheran, 1921

Missouri. Concordia Theological Seminary, St Louis, Mo, Mo. Lutheran, 1839, Eden Theological Seminary, Webster Groves, Mo, Evang. & Ref., 1850

Nebraska: *Presbyterian Theological Seminary, Omaha, Nebr, Presb. U. S. A., 1891; Trinity Theological Seminary, Blair, Nebr., United Danish Ev. Lutheran, 1894

New Jersey. *Bloomfield Seminary, Bloomfield, N. J., Presb. U. S. A., 1868; Drew Theological Seminary, Madison, N. J., Methodist, 1867; New

Brunswick Theological Seminary, New Brunswick, N J, Ref Ch in Amer, 1784, Princeton Theological Seminary, Princeton, N. J., Presb U. S A, 1812

New York *Alfred University, School of Theology, Alfred, N Y., Seventh Day Bapt, 1861, *Biblical Seminary in New York, New York, N. Y, Non-denom, 1900, Colgate-Rochester Divinity School, Rochester, N Y, No Bapt, 1870, General Theological Seminary, New York, N Y, Prot. Episcopal, 1817, Hartwick Seminary, New York, N Y, United Lutheran, 1797, St Lawrence Univ, Theological School, Canton, N Y, Universalist, 1858, Union Theological Seminary, New York, N Y, Non-denom, 1836

North Carolina Duke University, Divinity School, Durham, N C, Methodist, 1926, *Johnson C Smith Univ, School of Theology, Charlotte, N C Presb U S A, 1867.

Ohio Ashland Theological Seminary, Ashland, O, Brethren Ch., 1878, Bonebrake Theological Seminary, Graduate School of Theology, Dayton, O, United Brethren, 1871, *Divinity School of Kenyon College (Bexley Hall), Gambier, O, Prot. Episcopal, 1824; Hamma Divinity School, Springfield, O, United Lutheran, 1845, Evangelical Lutheran Seminary, of Capital University, Columbus, O, Amer Lutheran, 1830, Oberlin Graduate School of Theology, Oberlin, O, Cong.-Chrn, 1833

Oklahoma *College of the Bible, Phillips University, Enid, Okla, Disciples, 1906

Pennsylvania Crozer Theological Seminary, Chester, Pa, No Bapt, 1868, *Divinity School of the Protestant Episcopal Church in Philadelphia, Philadelphia, Pa, Prot Episcopal, 1857, *Eastern Baptist Theological Seminary, Philadelphia, Pa, No Bapt, 1925, Evangelical School of Theology, Reading, Pa., Evangelical, 1905, Lincoln University, Theological Seminary, Lincoln University, Pa, Presb. U. S. A, 1856, Lutheran Theological Seminary, Gettysburg, Pa, United Lutheran, 1826, Lutheran Theological Seminary, Mt Airy, Pa, United Lutheran, 1864, *Moravian College and Theological Seminary, Bethlehem, Pa, Moravian, 1807, Pittsburgh-Xenia Theological Seminary, Pittsburgh, Pa, United Presb, 1794, Reformed Presbyterian Theological Seminary, Pittsburgh, Pa, Reformed Presb, 1810, Temple University, School of Theology, Philadelphia, Pa, Non-denom, 1884, Theological Seminary of the Reformed Church in the United States, Lancaster, Pa., Evang & Reformed, 1825; Theological Seminary of the Reformed Episcopal Church, Philadelphia, Pa., Reformed Episcopal, 1886; Western Theological Seminary, Pittsburgh, Pa., Presb U S A, 1825; Westminster Theological Seminary, Philadelphia, Pa., Orthodox Presb, 1929

Puerto Rico *Evangelical Seminary of Puerto Rico, Rio Piedras, P R, Presb. U. S. A, 1919

South Carolina Erskine College Theological Seminary, Due West, S. C., Assoc Ref Presb, 1839; *Lutheran Theological Seminary, Columbia, S. C, United Lutheran, 1830

Tennessee *Cumberland Presbyterian Theological Seminary, McKenzie, Tenn, Cumberland Presb., 1914, University of the South, Theological School, Sewanee, Tenn, Prot. Episcopal, 1878; Vanderbilt University, School of Religion, Nashville, Tenn, Non-denom, 1875

Texas. Austin Theological Seminary, Austin, Texas, Presb. U. S, 1902; Brite College of the Bible, Ft. Worth, Texas, Disciples, 1914, Dallas Theological Seminary and Graduate School of Theology, Dallas, Texas, Non-denom, 1924, Southern Methodist University, School of Theology, Dallas, Texas, Methodist, 1915; *Southwestern Baptist Theological Seminary, Seminary Hill, Texas, So. Bapt, 1907

Virginia: Union Theological Seminary, Richmond, Va., Presb U S., 1812; Protestant Episcopal Seminary in Virginia, Alexandria, Va., Prot. Episcopal, 1823

Wisconsin: *Mission House, Plymouth, Wisc., Evang & Reformed, 1859, Nashotah House, Nashotah, Wisc, Prot Episcopal, 1842; Theological Seminary of the Joint Evangelical Synod of Wisconsin and Other States, Thiensville, Wisc., Evang. Lutheran Joint Syn. of Wisc. &c., 1865.

CANADA

Alberta St. Aidan's College, Edmonton, Alberta, Anglican, St. Stephen's College, Edmonton, Alberta, United Church, 1903

British Columbia Anglican Theological College of British Col, Vancouver, B C, Anglican, 1912, *Union Theological College, Vancouver, B. C, United Church, 1927

Manitoba Manitoba College, Winnipeg, Man, United Church, 1871, *St. John's College, Winnipeg, Man, Anglican, 1820, Wesley College, Winnipeg, Man, United Church, 1877

Nova Scotia *Pine Hill Divinity School, Halifax, N S., United Church, 1926, Acadia University, Faculty of Theology, Wolfville, N S, Baptist, 1838, University of King's College, Halifax, N S, Anglican, 1789

Ontario. Emmanuel College in Victoria University, Toronto, Ont, United Church, 1836, Evangelical Lutheran Seminary of Canada, Waterloo, Ont, Evang Lutheran, 1911, Huron College, London, Ont, Anglican, 1863, *Knox College, Toronto, Ont, Presbyterian, 1844, *McMaster University, Faculty of Theology, Hamilton, Ont., Baptist, 1887; Queen's Theological College, Kingston, Ont, United Church, 1842, Toronto Baptist Seminary, Toronto, Ont, Baptist, 1927, Toronto Bible College, Toronto, Ont, Non-denom, 1894, University of Trinity College, Toronto, Ont, Anglican, 1851, Wycliffe College, Toronto, Ont, Anglican, 1877

Quebec *Diocesan Theological College, Montreal, Que, Anglican, 1873, Presbyterian Theological College, Montreal, Que., Presbyterian, 1864, United Theological College, Montreal, Que., United Church, 1864, University of Bishop's College, Lennoxville, Que., Anglican, 1843

Saskatchewan. Emmanuel College, Saskatoon, Sask., Anglican, 1879, Lutheran Seminary, Saskatoon, Sask, United Lutheran 1918, St Andrew's College, Saskatoon, Sask, Anglican, 1912, St. Chad's College, Regina, Sask, Anglican, 1907.   L.J.S. theological schools, Roman Catholic: See seminaries, major Roman Catholic.

Theological Society, American: A society composed of theologians and philosophers meeting annually in New York for the discussion of theological problems. The Society was organized at Union Theological Seminary in New York, April 8, 1912. This meeting was the outgrowth of a conversation between D. C. Macintosh (Yale) and E. W. Lyman (Bangor) who had chanced to meet in Heidelberg in July, 1911. W. A. Brown (Union) had been approached and had heartily endorsed the proposal, inviting several other scholars to meet in his home in February, 1912, for the discussion of details. At the April, 1912, meeting a constitution was adopted, and officers elected, with fifteen charter members: W. A. Brown, E. S. Drown, G. Cross, A. M. Dulles, D. Evans, M. G. Evans, R. C. Knox, E. W. Lyman, A. C. McGiffert, D. C. Macintosh, S. B. Meeser, D. S. Miller, H. S. Nash, F. C. Porter, and E. Sneath. The formal purpose of the Society, as expressed in the constitution, was: "to promote the interests of present-day constructive theology, by the holding of meetings for the discussion of theological problems and for the furthering of acquaintance and fellowship among those working in this field, and by arranging for coöperation in theological investigation." During the early years two meetings each year were held; since 1918 this has been changed to an annual meeting in the spring. The original intent of a small membership limited to experts residing in the general vicinity of New York has been observed. The present membership is sixty. In recent years a daughter society has been established in the Midwest   M.S.E.

theology: (Gr., theos, god; logos, study) The discipline which concerns God (or the Divine Reality) and God's relation to the world. In the widest and most inclusive sense theology is a branch of philosophy or that field of philosophical inquiry which concerns God and related questions. So conceived, the discipline may well be called philosophical theology. In this sense theology need have no relation to any religion. Many writers, however, view theology as associated with religion and define it as the intellectual expression of religion. Such a conception is less adequate since a theologian may well carry on his work of investigation in the spirit of free inquiry without being religious or having any commitment to any given religion. For clear thinking, it seems best to employ the generic term theology (somewhat as defined above in the opening sentence) and add a qualifying adjective to denote the particular area of interest and approach: e.g., philosophical, primitive, medieval, modern, contemporary, Jewish, Mohammedan, Christian, Catholic, Liberal, Reformed, Lutheran, or even by further restricted qualifications, as e.g., apologetic, revealed, polemic, rational, systematic, ecclesiastical, historical, scientific.

It has become the tendency, however, for many theologians to use the term without any qualifying adjective to designate their particular faith or commitment. Thus, since in Western Christian thought God predominantly has been conceived to be a personal being who has revealed himself in a definite course in history, in human form, by a supernatural direction in sacred writings and through a social organism (the church), many theologians employ the term exclusively to designate the ideology of a particular religion. This has been true both in Catholic and Protestant thought. Theology then becomes distinct from philosophy as revelation is said to be distinct from speculation. A few examples: "Theology is the science of religion." "Theology is related to philosophy as revelation is to reason." "Theology starts from revelation and the consciousness of God, philosophy starts from reason and self-consciousness." "Theology is in possession of the truth; philosophy is in quest of the truth." (Philip Schaff in the work cited below.) Unhappily, because of this restricted conception of theology—which has enjoyed a traditional usage of long standing—philosophers (particularly the more recent philosophers of religion) have come to consider any alleged affiliation with theologians as a mark of intellectual degeneration. The theologian and the philosopher although interested in a common field of inquiry look upon one another with suspicion: the philosopher to the theologian becomes a secular play-boy in holy matters while the theologian to the philosopher becomes an arrogant dogmatist. Broadly conceived, however, both the philosopher and the theologian may well be the same person in a field of free inquiry concerning the existence and character of the Divine Reality (however conceived) and the world of experience and nature as these relate to what is considered divine. In these latter days we are coming to see more clearly that revelation and inquiry need no longer be viewed as incompatibles, rightly understood.

Protestant theologians have, up until quite recent times, divided their theological field into many patches, each theologian cultivating his particular patch under the more or less avowed direction of the dogmatic (systematic) theology of his church. Such traditional and particular theological disciplines were propaedeutic, theology and religion, exegetical (biblical) subdivided into· biblical philology, biblical archaeology, isagogics, criticism, canonics, hermeneutics and biblical theology; historical (ecclesiastical) subdivided into biblical history, church history, patristics; systematic (philosophical) subdivided into apologetics, biblical theology, dogmatics, symbolics, polemics, irenics, ethics, statistics and such particular inquiries as e.g., Christology, soteriology, etc.; practical subdivided into the ministry, ecclesiology, polity, liturgics, homiletics, catechetics, poimenics and evangelistics. Recent tendencies in the division of the theological field have aimed at simplification of division under more comprehensive groupings and in the case of some liberal theological curricula unhappily less unified by a constructive and comprehensive system. Some such generic divisions are history and philosophy of religion, O.T. (literature and theology); N.T. (literature and theology); church history, systematic theology with emphasis upon one particular religion, historical theology of a particular religion, homiletics and public speaking, religious education and practical theology, church administration, foreign missions, individual and social ethics, music and art. See religion, the problem of definition; God; theism. See under specific headings, e g., systematic theology.

Philip Schaff, Theological Propaedeutic (1892), John Baillie, The Interpretation of Religion (1928), chaps. I-IV; Vergilius Ferm, ed , Contemporary American Theology, vol I (1932), Vol. II (1933).   v.f.

theology: See American theology, early, Chicago school, dogmatic theology, empirical theology; Lundensian theology; Mercersburg theology; natural theology; New theology; New England theology; New Haven theology, New Testament theology, Oberlin theology, practical theology; symbolics, systematic theology. Also Biblical theology.

Theology Lectures, The: Given annually at the University of Virginia, established in 1934, with the object of compensating for the lack of formal theological instruction in contemporary secular education by providing an undenominational scholarly discussion of theological subjects before University students.

(Data from the office of the Secretary of the University.)   v.f.

Theopaschites: (from the Greek Theos, God, and pascho, I suffer) A name given to the Monophysites*, because, holding as they did that there was only one nature in Christ, they embodied that belief in a liturgical formula, "God has been .crucified". The school arose in opposition to the Christological* decisions of the Council of Chalcedon*, A.D. 451. Cf. patripassianism.   a.k.r.

theophagy: (Gr., theos, god; phagein, to eat) Eating the god. The practice can be traced back to the eating of the sacred animal to secure mana, or the god in the form of an animal. The later widespread custom of eating the god sacramentally as in the mystery religions* has been carried over into Christian practice. See sacramental meal.

Preserved Smith, A Short History of Christian Theophagy (1922), H. R. Willoughby, Pagan Regeneration (1929).   v.f.

theophany: An intimate manifestation of God to a human being at a definite time and place; often very physical as in the Iliad and Genesis; more spiritual in later classic form such as Moses at burning bush, Moses on Sinai, Elijah on Horeb, Jesus at Transfiguration, etc., more spectacular and personal than mere revelation.   r.e.w.

Theophilanthropy, Society of: Deistic* group originating in Paris in 1796 during the Directory period of the French Revolution when atheism was rampant. Creed consisted of three articles, God, virtue, immortality of the soul. Worship and practice were very simple. Died out after 1802.   k.h.c.

Theophilus, The Battle-Axe: See Battle-Axe experiment.

Theophronians: See Agnoetae.

theopneustia: A term employed by some German theologians and taken from 2 Tim. 3,16 (theopneustos) to mean the mysterious power of the Divine Spirit which inspired the writers of the Christian scriptures. The title of a volume by L. Gaussen which is a conservative apologetic for the Divine truth of the Christian scriptures. See inspiration.   v.f.

theosophy: A term which, in general, refers to a system of thought claiming to be divine wisdom. More particularly, the term is associated with the Theosophical Society founded in 1875 by the Russian Madame Blavatsky. Leadership in America has for many years fallen to Mrs. Besant who describes the thought as the Ancient Wisdom. Reality is held to be One, the source of all existence containing within a cyclic process of emanation and evolving ascension. Man's salvation consists in his achievement by discipline, resignation and purgation of ascending planes toward the astral way by the help of the secret divine wisdom The symbol of reality is the wheel. Theosophy represents the grafting of Eastern thought upon Western. Cf. I Am, Liberal Catholic Church, mahatma; R. Steiner; Vedanta. See communistic settlements, religious.

G G Atkins, Modern Religious Cults and Movements (1923), C. Ferguson, The Confusion of Tongues (1928).   V F theotokos: See Virgin Mary.

Therapeutæ: A group of ascetics having their centre near Alexandria in Egypt about the time of the Christian beginnings, and described by Philo of Alexandria' in an essay Concerning the Contemplative Life. This group, composed (unlike the Essenes*) of both men and women, is said by Philo to have devoted their time to contemplation, "studying . . the laws and sacred oracles of God enunciated by the holy prophets, and hymns, and psalms, and all kinds of other things by reason of which knowledge and piety are increased and brought to perfection " They lived in separate huts or cells, assembling only on the Sabbath and the Pannuchis ("all night festival") which occurred every fiftieth day Their origin and fate are alike unknown. The only reference to them is in the above-mentioned treatise of Philo. See asceticism.   M.S.E.

Thesaurus Meritorum: The Roman Catholic Church claims to be in the possession of a treasury of spiritual merits, accumulated partly from the satisfaction' of Christ for the sins of the world, an act redundant because of its infinite value, and partly from the superabundant satisfactions of the Saints for their own sins It is from this treasury of overflowing merits that the Catholic Church grants indulgences*, that is, the remission of temporal punishments which men, even after the absolution* of their sins, otherwise would had to incur.   S.C.T.

Theses, Ninety-Five of Harms: For the Reformation festival of 1817, Claus Harms*, pastor at Kiel, published Luther's 95 theses together with 95 of his own against rationalism and the proposed union between the Lutheran and Reformed churches. His theses caused a tremendous sensation and elicited some 200 replies.   E.C.K.

Theses, Ninety-Five, of Luther: A series of propositions drawn up by Martin Luther* asking for a theological debate on the question of indulgences*. October 31, 1517, the day when Luther nailed these theses to the door of the castle church at Wittenberg, is generally considered to mark the beginning of the Reformation*. Occasioned by the indiscriminate manner in which Tetzel*, a Dominican friar, sold indulgences, Luther's theses were not designed for general circulation nor to constitute an attack on the Church or the papacy. Luther claimed, indeed, to express the true mind of the Pope over against Tetzel. Germs of the evangelical position, however, are evident throughout, e.g., the first thesis. "the whole life of believers should be penitence"; the sixth: "The Pope has no power to remit any guilt, except by declaring . . . it to have been remitted by God," the thirty-sixth: "Every Christian who feels true compunction . . . has remission of pain and guilt, even without letters of pardon";

the sixty-second "The true treasure of the Church is the Holy Gospel . . of the grace of God". Heroic resolve to accept battle is revealed in the ninety-fourth "Christians should strive to follow Christ their head through pains, deaths, and hells". Having unconsciously exposed vulnerability of the whole medieval Church, Luther's theses stirred up an unexpected commotion which eventuated in the Reformation.   T.A.K.

Thesmophoria: (Gr, Thesmophória, from thesmóphoros, law-giving) A festival celebrated in Athens and elsewhere in Greece in October, honoring Demeter* under her ancient name, the law-giver A festival for women only, it sought to insure fertility for farm and folk alike. There was a strange chthonian ritual with a symbolic visit to Hades, to induce fertility.   E.M.N

Thessalonians, First and Second Letters to the: The earliest of the letters of Paul that have come down to us are those written at Corinth, to the church at Thessalonica, in the midst of the second missionary journey. Paul had been obliged to leave Thessalonica before his work there was completed, or even well established. In his anxiety over the fate of the churches he had founded at Thessalonica and Philippi, he had sent Silvanus and Timothy back from Athens to find out what had become of them and to do what they could for them. Paul waited anxiously for the news they would bring, and was greatly relieved to learn that the Thessalonians had stood firm in their new faith First Thessalonians is the expression of his relief over Timothy's report and of his great interest in them. It was written in A D. 50. The closing chapters give a picture of Christian problems and hopes. One problem was the idleness of some who thought the Day of the Lord had come, and so gave up their daily work, and became a charge upon their brethren. This became a scandal in the church and the community, and Paul wrote his second letter to correct it. He appeals to the Antichrist doctrine, and points out that as the Antichrist* has not appeared, the Day of the Lord has not come. The second letter was also written from Corinth, probably only a few months after the first. Aspersions have been cast upon the genuineness of II Thessalonians, but the letter is historically more difficult to explain as spurious than it is as genuine.
Ernst von Dobschutz, Die Thessalonicher-Briefe (1909); James E. Frame, Epistles of St. Paul to the Thessalonians (1912); George Milligan, St. Paul's Epistles to the Thessalonians (1908)   E.J.G.

Thieme, Karl: (1862-1932) He was professor in Leipzig. He exercised a sharp criticism on the revivals of the old Christology and the doctrine of the Trinity, and achieved great merits through the working out of certain concrete details in Luther's theology.
Die sittliche Triebkraft des Glaubens (Leipzig, 1895); Die christliche Demut (Giessen, 1906); Jesus und seine Predigt (Giessen, 1908); Von der Gottheit Christi (Giessen, 1911); Die Augsburger Konfession und Luthers Katechismen (Giessen, 1830).   H.H.

Thierry of Chartres: (died ca. 1150) Famous teacher at Paris and at Chartres, whose Heptateuchon, a handbook of the seven liberal arts, is one of the chief sources of our knowledge regarding studies in the first half of the twelfth century. Thierry freely utilizes the first translations from arabic sources in the field of medicine, astronomy and mathematics. His theology is characterized by a peculiar Christian neo-Pythagoreanism.*   S.C T.

Third Order: An association of lay persons called tertiaries*, established by some monastic groups, such as Augustinians or Dominicans, and allowed on stated conditions to share in the works of the monastic body. See Catholic Societies
                                                            L.R W.

Thirteen Articles: Framed by English and German theologians in 1538 on the basis of the Augsburg Confession*, never published, but a source for the Forty-Two Articles*.   E.R H.

Thirty-nine Articles: The basic doctrinal formula of the Anglican Church These articles were a revision of the Forty-two Articles* which had been framed under the leadership of Thomas Cranmer during the reign of Edward VI Although they were first approved in 1563, they did not gain general acceptance until 1571.
  See E T Green, The Thirty-nine Articles (1896).
                                                            W S.H.

Thirty Years' War: Series of wars fought mainly in Germany but involving most of Europe Causes. 1) Conflict between Protestants and R. Cs. as aftermath of Reformation. Peace of Augsburg had left number of matters unsettled. R. Cs. were growing in strength through success of Counter-Reformation* and activity of Jesuits. 2) National and political rivalries, suspicion of imperial designs, opposition of France to Hapsburgs, tangled web of international diplomacy involving Spain, France, England, the Low Countries, Denmark, Sweden. Political and religious motives thus closely interwoven. Religious lines not always sharply drawn, e.g., French support of Protestant armies. Terrible devastation was wrought by the bitterness of the conflict and the plundering of the armies.
  Began as religious and national revolt in Bohemia. Was suppressed but wider area was already involved. Protestants rallied under Christian IV of Denmark but were defeated and Peace of Lübeck followed. Edict of Restitution, ordering restoration of R. C. property secularized since 1552 brought renewal of war. Gustavus Adolphus of Sweden intervened to uphold Protestantism and to protect and extend Swedish interests. He defeated imperial armies under Tilly at Breitenfeld and Wallenstein at Lützen. His death in battle was severe blow to Protestants. Their defeat at Nördlingen brought temporary Peace of Prag (1635) on basis of status quo of 1627. Political motives overweighed the religious in later stages of the war. Finally the Peace of Westphalia* (1648) brought only minor political adjustments.

Main religious change was recognition of Calvinism as well as Romanism and Lutheranism. See League, German Catholic   K.H.C.

Tholuck, August: (1799-1877) He was professor in Berlin and Halle. His most influential works were exegetical works. His far-reaching and profound influence resulted more from his powerful sermons and his devout pastoral care of the students rather than from his theological achievement He sought to revive something of the central Pauline doctrine and make Luther again vital. Theologically he remained in the scheme of a pietistically and idealistically deepened supernaturalism. In Tholuck the theology of the awakening failed to achieve a systematic reflection upon its enthusiastic faith and Christianity Lehre von der Sünde und vom Erlöser, oder die wahre Weihe des Zweiflers (Gotha, 1923) , 9th ed. (Gotha, 1871) ; Glaubwürdigkeit der evangelischen Geschichte (Hamburg, 1837) , Der Geist der lutherischen Theologen Wittenbergs im 17 Jahrhundert (Hamburg u Gotha, 1852) , Das kirchliche Leben des 17. Jahrhunderts (Berlin, 1861) , Geschichte des Rationalismus (Berlin, 1865).   H.H.

Thomas, St.: (From the Aramaic word for "twin," which in Gr. is didymus [Joh. 11 16, etc.]) Surname (or nickname) of one of the twelve. According to a lost Acts of Thomas, known to Origen, first missionary to Parthia. According to the extant Acts of Thomas, missionary to India. See Thomas Christians   S M.G.

Thomas, Acts of: 13 purported "acts" of St. Thomas, who is said to have been sold as a slave into India by Jesus, together with an account of his martyrdom. An early 3rd century document with Gnostic interests. See apocrypha in the N.T. church, pseudepigrapha, N T.   S.M.G.

Thomas of Becket: See Becket, Thomas à.

Thomas, Gospel of: A Gnostic Gospel from the middle of the 2nd century, often condemned as heretical by early Christian writers. Preserved in abbreviated form in three Gr. mss. and in several translations. See pseudepigrapha, N T   S.M.G.

Thomas à Kempis: See Kempis, Thomas à.

Thomas, The Hiram W., Lectures: Established in 1916 at the University of Chicago by Mrs. Vandalia Varnum Thomas as a memorial to Dr. Hiram W. Thomas, distinguished clergyman, to be given by men "of the larger faith" who are to interpret the growing thought of the world in religion and life. The six lecturers have been M. I. Pupin, R. A. Millikan, W. L. Sperry, W. E. Hocking, I. F. Lewis, G Vlastos. Endowment, $2,214 00.
  (Data from the offices of the Dean of the Divinity School and the Secretary of the University.)   V.F.

Thomas Christians, the: There is a Church in South India known as the Syrian Church of Malabar. It holds the tradition that the apostle organized the Church and suffered a martyr's death in A.D. 58. Cosmos, a Greek traveller of the 6th Century, wrote of this Church. In May 1613 the Church divided, the Uniat Section remaining loyal to Rome, and the Jacobite* Section looking to the Patriarch of Antioch. Despite schisms this Church is experiencing a new growth.

See J N Farquhar's articles in the Bulletin of the John Rylands Library, vols 10-11 (Manchester, 1926), A. Fortescue, The Lesser Eastern Churches (London, 1913)   D.F E.—J.T M.

Thomas Matthew Bible: See Bible, English.

Thomasius, Gottfried: (1802-1875) He was professor at the University of Erlangen. As a Lutheran he developed a biblical interpretation of the old Protestant doctrine of *kenosis For him it was an act of the divine logos He also gave Kliefoth's* theory of the four circles of dogma (the theological, the christological, the anthropological and the soteriological) its classical development in his history of dogma. See neo-Lutheranism.

Christi Person und Werk (Erlangen, 1852-61); Die christliche Dogmengeschichte, 2 vols. (Erlangen, 1876).   H.H.

Thomism: (From Thomas Aquinas, its founder) Historically, this term denotes the philosophico-theological synthesis embodied in the mature works (*Summa Contra Gentiles, Summa Theologica) of the thirteenth century Dominican monk and master in the faculty of arts at Paris. Though essentially theological in method and object, these works contain an implicit Christian Aristotelianism characterized by moderate realism and pluralism—a Weltanschauung platonic in structure but Christian in spirit.

In contemporary philosophy it denotes that branch of Neo-Scholasticism which considers present day problems in the philosophy of science, knowledge theory, social and political philosophy in the light of principles elaborated by St. Thomas. Outstanding exponents of modern Thomism (sometimes called neo-Thomism) are Jacques Maritain, Mortimer Adler, Leon Noel, Etienne Gilson, Peter Hoenen, Martin D'Arcy). See Scholasticism, neo-Scholasticism; St. Thomas Aquinas.   J.J.F.

Thor: (Teut.) Thunder-god of Norway and Iceland who breaks up the winter ice and snow and restores fertility; a god of fertility and agriculture. The oak is his tree. He is the god of the sailor, the guardian of ships, and his effigy on the ship brings good luck. Winter sacrifices to him bring back the return of spring and fruitfulness. As a god of fertility his worship continued in Europe into the eighteenth century, his day (Thursday), set aside for him, is a good day for weddings. He came to be pictured wearing red hair, a long beard, and carried a hammer. Thunder is represented as the sound from his playing ninepins with the other gods.   F.L.P.

Thorn, Conference of: Called by King Ladislaus IV of Poland in 1645 to prevent religious strife among Catholics, Lutherans and Reformed within his borders, this conference was conducted by foreign champions of each faith but accomplished nothing after three months of acrimonious bickerings except to worsen the lot of the Evangelicals in Poland and to embitter both Lutherans and Reformed against each other in Germany.   E.C.K.

Thornwell, James Henley: (1812-1862) Theologian, Columbia (S. C) Theological Seminary, 1855 onward. Moving spirit in organizing Presbyterian Church, U S., 1861. Prodigious scholarship gained him Bancroft's commendation, "most learned of the learned."   A.C.

Thoth: (Egyptian) Ibis god of ancient Egypt; god of wisdom, inventor of writing, patron of literature, moon god and chief minister of Re*, the sun god, in the myth of Osiris*, he separates the fighters, Horus and Set, heals their wounds; he frees Osiris of grave accusations brought by Set.   F.L.P.

Three Chapter controversy: An incident in the later stages of the Christological* controversies. In A.D. 544 the Emperor Justinian*, orthodox but theologically innocent, was persuaded by his crafty consort, Theodora, to issue an edict approving the "Three Chapters" (or formulated statements), in which the alleged errors of Theodoret* were drawn up along with those of the Nestorians*. This edict was violently resisted in the West, and thus broke out the Three Chapter Controversy, which was not brought to a close until the time of Gregory the Great*. The real centre of the controversy was Monophysitism*. See Constantinople, Councils of, Ibas; Theodore of Mopsuestia.   A.K.R.

Three Children, Song of the: Fragment preserved in the Apocrypha*; a forty verse antiphonal psalm sung supposedly by Hananiah, Mishael, and Azariah when saved from the fiery furnace, an interpolation (written between 150 and 50 B.C.) which, with an independently interpolated "Prayer of Azariah" (28 verses) which precedes it, forms the "First Addition" to the canonical book of Daniel, inserted after Daniel 3:23 in Theodotion, Septuagint, Vulgate, and some versions dependent upon the Septuagint, absent in the Hebrew and Aramaic. See Apocrypha, Old Testament. See R. H. Charles, Apocrypha (1913).   R.E.W.

thrice born: See conversion.

Thurneysen: Eduard: Protestant theologian. Born 1888 Wallenstatt, Switzerland. 1913 pastor in Leutwil, since 1927 preacher at the "Muenster" in Basel, 1927 privatdozent, 1939 professor of Practical Theology in Basel. Friend of Karl Barth* of old standing, and one of the originators of Dialectical* Theology. Indebted to the influence of Blumhardt Junior and Kutter. His literary activity is devoted to the practical-ecclesiastical rather than the purely theoretical problems of theology. Was co-editor of Zwischen den Zeiten, the magazine of the Barthian group.

Principal works·
Chr Blumhardt (1926), Dostojewski, 2nd ed (1930), Das Wort Gottes und die Kirche (1927), Die Bergpredigt (1936), Die Verkündigung des Wortes Gottes in unserer Zeit (1941). Volumes of sermons published jointly by Th and K. Barth Suchet Gott sowerdet ihr leben (1917, 2nd ed. 1929), Engl tr.. God's Search for Man (1935), Komm Schöpfer Geist (1924, 2nd ed. 1929), Engl. tr. Come Holy Spirit (1933), Die grosse Barmherzigkeit (1935)   O.A.P.

Tiamat: (Semitic-Babylonian) Primeval waters; undifferentiated matter out of which gods and men, heaven and earth, sprang. In the Creation myth the primeval mother (Tiamat) linked with a primeval father (Apsu) as parents of the gods, at a later stage, Tiamat is overcome by Marduk* who cuts up her body Marduk as god of life or light, and Tiamat the personification of the power of darkness and chaos. Tiamat is represented as chaotic waters, as a raging serpent, and as a monster dragon. Tiamat may personify the destructive flood waters of the Tigris and Euphrates; or personify the salt waters of the Gulf at the mouths of the rivers. The most advanced notion of Tiamat appears in the preface of the Cosmogonic Epic in which two waters, Apsu and Tiamat, by interaction brought the universe into existence. See cosmogonies.   F.L.P.

tiara: The crown worn by the Pope* as a symbol of his sovereignty. The crown is round and cylindrical, having three tiers, representing his threefold power as Father of princes. Ruler of the world, and Vicar of Jesus Christ.
Cf. Catholic Encyclopedia, vol XIV.   s.c.

T'ien: See Chinese Terminology.

T'ien-t'ai School: See Buddhist Terminology.

timbre: The quality of a tone by which we distinguish one instrument or voice from another. This is determined by the shape of the sound wave.   E.H B.

time: (A.S. tima, akin to A.S. tid—origin of tide —and Dan. time, hour) As quantity, the "measure of change" (Aristotle), more generally, the system of relationships which change involves, such as before, after, and contemporary. Before and after are usually left undefined. However, Augustine* attempted to define them as follows· the past (or what is before the present event) is the remembered as such; the future, the anticipated as such. This makes time essentially psychological. Augustine inferred from this theory that time does not apply to God, but he seems not to have reflected sufficiently upon the fact that creaturely memory and anticipation seem far from coextensive with past and future, and that most of the past might be defined as that which we fail to remember (unless in deep subconsciousness). Only with a perfect memory could past and remembered be identical, and who unless God could enjoy such a memory?

The psychological theory explains the difference between before and after through the difference between memory and anticipation. The explanation can be carried further. Bergson, Whitehead, and others hold that memory is awareness of the determinate and actual, while anticipation is awareness of the more or less indeterminate and potential. "Time is a species of objective modality" (Peirce*.) It is the way in which the actual or determined is related to the potential or indeterminate-determinable. "Time is creation or nothing." (Bergson.) Events become, but there is no corresponding unbecoming of events. A happening, once it has occurred, evermore or "immortally" has occurred (Whitehead). This modal or creation theory of time, when combined, as it has often been, with the psychological theory, implies that past events are somehow, by someone, remembered forever, but that future events are anticipated (even by Omniscience*) only as more or less indefinite possibilities, this being what they really are so long as future. (See Gerson, Levi ben.) The modal theory explains time's "arrow" (Eddington) or directional character, since it makes the basic temporal relations asymmetrical or irreversible. If B remembers A while A has no memory (conscious or unconscious feeling whose object is determinate) of B, then A's actuality will be involved in B's as its past, but B's actuality will not be involved in A's Thus the modal theory may also be called the "snowball" theory (Bergson).

Relations of contemporary things are defined by their symmetry or mutuality of involvement, either as mutually involving or mutually not involving each other. The latter or negative view is held by Whitehead and by relativity physics, according to which contemporaries are without effect on each other. Perhaps, however, there is such effect, but it is too slight or unsystematic to be verified in human perception and inference.

Ancient thought failed to state clearly either the psychological or the modal theory of time, and saw in change a puzzling and melancholy mixture of being and not-being. It was not observed that past events, at least, need not be classified as non-entities. Change, to have positive meaning, must involve creation of the previously unreal, but it need not involve destruction of any previous reality. Addition, though without subtraction, of reality is real change and sufficient for the reality of time. And though for human consciousness the past is for the most part no longer possessed, the psychological theory of time need not measure change by human psychology. The cosmos or God need not be so forgetful as man, whose mind is precisely not cosmic or divine. Thus the non-psychological or supposedly objective theory of time, in its usual form, has been perhaps unwittingly subjective in a peculiarly narrow sense, in that human forgetting was taken a proof of the unreality or cosmic forgottenness of past events.

Some objectivists (as Santayana) as well as some idealists suppose that future, past, and present events are all real in the same sense. But then time, or the order of change, is really the order of an unchanging totality, "all events", each of which, in its place in the totality, or in "eternity"* simply is, rather than becomes. This is the attempt to reduce becoming to mere being, to deny all difference in principle between memory and anticipation or between actuality and potency. It is a "spatialization" of time (Bergson) which explains it away.

The reality of time has been questioned on the ground that it involves contradictions. For example, it is held both necessary and impossible to conceive a first event of time. Some answer that a first event is conceivable, others that an actually infinite* past involves no strict inconceivability, although a kind of unimaginability. Again, it has been argued (by Bradley and McTaggart) that, since an event which is before another event retains this position when both are in the past and already enjoyed it when both were in the future, the happening of the event changes nothing in its relationships and hence effects nothing and is unreal. The assumption is that future events are real and have real relations. The creation* theory denies this, holding that there are no determinate future events, and that what are called such are dates on the calendar", or rather, items in the abstract schema which distinguishes the future as relatively indeterminate from the pure indeterminacy of possibility in general. An event comes into being as involving (remembering) earlier events, and thus as related to them, but such relations do not in their full determinateness exist in advance. Time is not a mere relation of becomings but a becoming of relations. The determinate present is related to the determinate past, not vice versa. We have to do with George Washington as an individual, he had not and (unless in heaven) still has not to do with us as individuals but only as the vague class, "my (Washington's) posterity." Washington is past to us not because we do not have his full actuality as content of our present awareness, but because, so far as we are aware of him, it is as having nothing to do with us while we do have to do with him. Were we to retain him in our awareness ever so perfectly, he would still be past to this awareness so long as his non-relationship to it was given. What is past is not what is unreal now but what, as real now, does not contain in its nature the relationships in which it stands. These belong to the present as such, which alone stands in no relations except those which it intrinsically involves.

The denial that the past is real now implies that statements ascribing determinate characters to past events cannot be true, for truth is correspondence to the real. The inactuality of the future means that statements ascribing wholly determinate characters to it are all false. (See Gerson, Levi ben.)

Even so destructive an agency as war does not remove from actuality any events actually elapsed or any experiences actually experienced, but only cuts off the hope of certain additional experiences which otherwise might have been enjoyed. The vast scope of human forgetting, by a natural anthropomorphism*, tends to make us feel that the values of the present, as apparently not containing those of the past, plus the values of the near future, make up almost the sum of values to be taken into account. This anxious absorption in the present and near future may be the real "defect" of "temporal" existence of which Berdyaev* and so many have complained, but it is a defect of human temporality not of temporality as such To dismiss time as of merely creaturely concern without exploring the possibility of a super-creaturely form of time is as illegitimate as to deny personality to God merely because creaturely personality, like creaturely anything, is imperfect. (See analogy; God as personal).

If all experience is indestructible, then, as is often said, we are immortal not just in the future but in our present being. Our present self-realization contributes to the real not some deposit or mere effect, it contributes itself. If there be a divine form of temporality, such that God is able to receive new content, then our "service" to him is to become, and help our fellows to become, as precious additions to the divine being as possible. A purely timeless God could receive no additions and could not in any way be served or advantaged. The history of theology must have been vastly different than it has been had the modal-psychological theory of time been clearly thought of two thousand or even five hundred years before Bergson.

See cycles of time, Zurvan.

Augustine, Confessions, A. N. Whitehead, Adventures of Ideas (1933), DeWitt H Parker, Experience and Substance (1941), C. D. Broad, Mind and its Place in Nature (1925). (The last gives a criticism of the type of theory set forth above)

C.H.

Timothy, First and Second Letters to: Of these two Epistles the Second is probably the earlier, and is certainly the finer and more valuable. It purports to be written by Paul on the eve of his martyrdom at Rome to his assistant Timothy at Ephesus, and offers him counsels and warnings to aid him in the future conduct of the Christian mission. Second Timothy, is not so much a letter as a manual of church order, although it also contains passages of great importance for Christian ethic and theology.

I and II Timothy (along with Titus), in their present form, may be dated about 120 A.D.

See Pastoral Epistles.

W. Lock, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Pastoral Epistles (ICC, 1924); E. F. Scott, The Literature of the New Testament (1932).

E.F.S.

Tindal, Matthew: See deism; Enlightenment, the Tischendorf, Lobegott Friedrich Constantin von: (1815-1874) Distinguished German discoverer of N.T. manuscripts, most notably the Codex Sinaiticus;* and editor of the Greek text of the O.T., the N.T., and the N.T. Apocrypha. His 8th large critical edition of the Greek N.T. (1869-72), though too much influenced by the Codex Sinaiticus, is still indispensable, for its immense apparatus of variant readings.   E.J.G.

tithes: A tithe is a tenth part, specifically, in the Bible, a tenth part of ones produce set aside for a religious purpose. At different times it was 1) brought by the worshiper to the sanctuary and there consumed by him, 2) delivered as a charity to the needy, and 3) paid as dues to the priests and Levites   s.h b.

Titius, Arthur: (1864-1936) He was professor in Kiel, Gottingen and Berlin. Greatly interested in social questions, he took pains to study the philosophical basis of the natural sciences and to achieve the correct relationship to the natural sciences, which he brilliantly mastered in all fields, and which he opened for theology.
Religion und Naturwissenschaft (Tubingen u Leipzig, 1904), Recht und Schranken des Evolutionismus in der Ethik (Berlin, 1910), "Psychiatrie und Ethik" in Studien z systematischen Theologie. Theodor von Haering zum 70. Geburtstag . dargebracht. (Tubingen, 1913)   h.h.

Titus, Epistle to: A letter which purports to be written by Paul to Titus, whom he had left behind him in Crete, to follow up a mission which he had himself begun. Along with counsels of a more general nature for the right ordering of a Christian community, the Epistle pays special attention to heresy, which in Crete had become a growing evil. The Pauline authorship of Titus is more than doubtful, since there is no place in the known career of Paul for a sojourn in Crete. He can only have written the letter if he was set free from his Roman imprisonment and resumed his missionary work on new ground. The Epistle (along with I and II Timothy), in its present form, may be dated about 120 A.D. See Pastoral Epistles.
W Lock, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Pastoral Epistles (ICC, 1924), E F Scott, The Literature of the New Testament (1932).
                                                                        e.f.s.

Tobit: An Apocryphal book, probably composed originally in Aramaic cir. 200 B.C. by a pious Egyptian Jew, and the name of its central figure. See apocrypha, Old Testament.   s.h.b.

tokens: Small metal disks, often oval in shape, that were distributed by the elders in the Scottish church to those of the members who were qualified to participate in the Communion service. They were returned by the members at the service and thus enabled the session to check on attendance.
                                                                        a.k.r.

Toland, John: (1670-1722) For him there is nothing in Christian doctrine either against or above reason. Reason alone convinces men of the inspiration of the Scriptures. Neither the account of creation nor miracles are contrary to reason. Toland justifies a nature religion, which he terms pantheism*, a term first coined by him. See deism; Enlightenment, the.
G Berthold, John Toland und der Monismus der Gegenwart (Heidelberg, 1876), G. V. Lechler, Geschichte des englischen Deismus (Stuttgart und Tubingen, 1841), J. M Robertson, Short History of Free Thought, 2 vols (London, 1899), A. Seeber, John Toland als politischer Schriftsteller (Schramberg (Wurttemberg), 1933).   h.h.

Toledo, Creed of: A creed elaborated in one of the eighteen councils of Toledo (400-702), especially the creed of the Eleventh Council (675) which was directed against Priscillianism*
                                                                        e a r

toleration: See religious liberty.

Toleration, Act of: (1689) Originally limited to Trinitarian Protestants, but significant as marking the end of the effort to maintain complete religious uniformity in England   e.r.h.

Tolstadius, Erik: (1693-1759) An early leader in Swedish pietism His Stockholm church became a spiritual center in the capitol, his preaching and counselling attracting eager followers Though influenced by Dippel, Tolstadius maintained an independent attitude towards more radical pietism, and gave no support to the Zinzendorf* movement
                                                                        c j.b.

Tolstoy, Leo: (1828-1910) Russian social reformer and prolific writer. He is known for his Christian anarchistic ideas and his life of renunciation See anarchism.   v.f.

(Tomlinson) Church of God: A pentecostal holiness sect with headquarters at Cleveland, Tenn. Its early history corresponds with that of the Church of God* but a division occurred in 1922 and the group adhering to the principles of the general overseer, A J Tomlinson, added his name to the title to distinguish the group. The census reports 441 churches and 18,000 members. See pentecostal sects.   e t.c.

tonality: The sense of key. The relationship of tones both melodically and harmonically to a central fixed tone. Whereas the modes* had tonal centers, the relationships of other tones to them were melodic and not harmonic. When the harmonic relationship became apparent in the 17th century, tonality assumed its complete modern meaning
J. Yasser, Theory of Evolving Tonality (1932)
                                                                        e.h b.

tongues, gifts of: According to Luke (Ac. 2: 4 ff.,) this gift consisted in a power to speak in foreign languages, previously unknown. Paul, however, discusses the subject at length in I Cor. 12 and 14, and makes it clear that the language spoken was a succession of unmeaning sounds, improvised in a state of ecstasy*. These sounds were often so varied that they gave the impression of a regular language, which would be intelligible to some race which used it. The phenomenon is one that has often manifested itself in religious revivals, and the listeners have been convinced that they heard articulate speech. Luke, apparently, thought of the tongues in this manner. Paul, who himself possessed the gift in a pre-eminent degree, is aware that the sounds convey nothing to human ears, but still believes that they represent a heavenly language,—the tongues of angels (I Cor. 13·1) which the Spirit would naturally employ. Modern psychology would say that the ecstatic, seeking an outlet for emotions for which he could find no words, falls back on a language intelligible only to himself. See charismata, pentecostal sects.

    G. B Cutten, Speaking With Tongues (1927)

E.F.S

tonsure: (Lat., tonsura, a shearing) A ceremony initiating one into the clerical state, which consists in cutting the subject's hair. The custom dates from the earliest years of Christianity, and signifies renunciation of the world. It confers no power.   W.H.

Tophet (or Topheth): Altar of human sacrifice, outside Jerusalem in Valley of Hinnom, where children were laid in the red hot arms of Molech, most famous and most abominable of the idolatries practiced there, popularized, and possibly introduced, by King Manasseh; destroyed by Josiah (620 B.C.) but apparently rebuilt, vigorously condemned by Jeremiah; symbol of paganism, since Milton, a synonym for Hell. See Manasseh.

R E.W.

topological psychology: See psychology, schools of.

Torah: A Hebrew word, the basic meaning of which seems to have been "casting (of the sacred lot)" in oracular divination. As the religion of Israel and subsequent Judaism evolved, the word acquired a steadily expanding connotation, oracle, the content of divine revelation, a single divinely revealed law, then the entire body of divinely revealed law, and, finally, the total content of God's unending revelation to and through Israel. This last is its specific meaning in its broadest sense, as it is employed in modern Jewish literature. In a narrower sense, Torah designates the first five books of the Bible, the so-called Pentateuch* or five Books of Moses, in which, according to orthodox Jewish doctrine, all the laws revealed by God to Moses* are contained. Torah designates likewise the scroll, upon which these five books are written, always by the hand of a trained scribe, at least one copy of which is deposited in the ark* in every Jewish synagogue, and from which sections are read in regular order at the religious services throughout the Jewish calendar.

    See O.T.; tables of the law; law, Hebrew. Cf. Jubilees, Book of; Talmud.   J.M.

Torgau Articles: A statement of the reasons for the abolition of ecclesiastical abuses, drawn up at the request of Elector John of Saxony in March, 1530, by Melanchthon* in collaboration with Luther, Jonas, and Bugenhagen. This document, discovered in the Weimar archives in 1830, is important only as a source of the Augsburg Confession*, in the second part of which its content is substantially reproduced. It is printed in English translation in H. E. Jacobs, Book of Concord, II (1883).   T.A.K.

Torrey, Joseph: (1797-1866) Graduated Dartmouth College 1816, Andover 1819. Professor of Intellectual and Moral Philosophy, University of Vermont; President of the University 1862-1866, continued the philosophy of James Marsh*.

    Author A Theory of Art, translator of Neander's General History of the Christian Religion and Church (1847-1854), 5 vols , (republished in London and Edinburgh).

    Henry A. P. Torrey (a nephew of Joseph Torrey), professor of Philosophy in the University of Vermont 1868-1902, also represented the Marsh, or "Burlington" school of philosophy and was a teacher of rare insight. He was author of Selections from the Works of Descartes (1892) and of a series of articles on "The Theodicèe of Leibnitz" (Andover Review, Vol. IV).   J.W.B.

Tosefta: The word Tosefta, (literally, "additions") is used primarily to describe a Rabbinic work, apparently compiled in the third century, but containing traditions much older, and put into writing much later. This work contains material which supplements the Mishna* or authoritative code of Jewish law established by Rabbi Judah I the Patriarch and his colleagues early in the third century. Inevitably, the scholars who formulated the Mishna were compelled to exclude from it a mass of material which was relevant and important This was studied and memorized by special students, and part of it was collected by scholars of the day as Tosefta. Other parts are included in other Rabbinic works, such as the Mekilta, the Sifra, the Sifre, etc The word, Tosefta is also used sometimes to denote additions to other works than the Mishna, but in this sense it is rare.

L.F.

total depravity: See depravity.

totemism: (Ojibwa, ototeman, brother-sister kinship) Belief in totems and totemistic relationships; extends usually to limits of the tribe, a system of distinguishing families, by which privileges and obligations of individuals concerning marriage, protection, food supply, etc., are fixed, originally applied to the American Indians, later to counterpart systems all over the world, and particularly among certain contemporary primitives. See animals, worship of; fasting; food; primitive religion; spirits.   F.L.P.

Tower of Babel: (A word related to the Hebrew "Balal" to confound) Name of a tower . . . built by the peoples of Shinar (Babylonia) as recounted in Genesis 11 . . . in an attempt to reach heaven . . . therefore God "confounded" them so that each spoke a different language and scattered them over the face of the earth.

N.G.

tract: The only division of the chant* that represents direct psalmody in the mass. Originally for a soloist, the melody is ornate and florid. See plainsong; psalmody.   E.H.B.

tract movement: See religious tract movement.

tract periodicals: See religious tract movement.

tract, religious, movement in the U. S.: See religious tract movement in the U. S.

Tractarianism: A name given to the principles set forth in Tracts for the Times (1833-41), a series of ninety pamphlets issued by the early leaders of the Oxford Movement*. See Anglo-Catholics.   L.W.C.

tradition: See culture, folklore.

tradition, Roman Catholic: The sum of revealed truths pertaining to faith and morals, not consigned to Scripture, but transmitted by God by word of mouth to the Church. (Denziger n. 783) In the strict theological sense Tradition is a source of revelation having equal authority with Sacred Scripture. Its complexus of truths has come from God through the words of Christ or through the Apostles inspired by the Holy Spirit. Its content is all that revealed truth which has not been written down in Scripture. An infallible teaching body, the Church, defines through the Pope and in general councils and in its universal ordinary doctrine which truths are contained in Tradition. The chief source is the unanimous declarations of early Christian writers.   C.R.

traditionalism: (Lat., traditio, fr. tradere, to give up, transmit)
1) Specifically, a 19th Cent philosophical point of view developed within the Catholic Church (but soon repudiated by it) under the literary leadership of F. R. de Lamennais*, and subsequently centering at Louvain, according to which, because of the untrustworthiness of individual reason, faith in revelation mediated through the traditions of mankind is the only channel of truth.
2) In general the appeal to, or apotheosis of, tradition as normative and authoritative above modern discovery and criticism, chiefly, therefore, a liberal term of reproach. The R C. Church makes much of tradition but would repudiate the charge of traditionalism on the ground that the Church itself is the locus of authority*, with reason as confirmatory and independently valid for fundamental metaphysical truths. Anglo-Catholicism has formulated the norm of Christian truth in terms of tradition, i.e., the witness of the undivided Church (before the Schism of 1054), but counts itself as entirely open to new scientific knowledge and insight, hence refusing to accept the negative connotation of traditionalism. See Northern Catholicism (London, 1933), ed. by N. P. Williams and Chas. Harris. Protestant Fundamentalism and Jewish Orthodoxy are commonly accepted as traditionalist.   E.T.R.

traducianism: The view that the soul of a child is generated from the souls of its parents. The view first appears in the thought of Tertullian*.   V.F.

Traherne, Thomas: (1636?-1674) English poet and prose writer. Living the life of an obscure Anglican clergyman, Traherne was known two hundred years after his death only for a few unimportant essays. His Poems were first published in 1903, his prose Centuries of Meditations in 1908. The former compare favorably with the work of Herbert and Vaughan, the latter, revealing the author even more clearly as a man of original mind and deep spiritual insight, are a valuable addition to the literature of devotion.
                                                                                                                     L.W.C.

transcendence: (Lat., trans, across, scandere, to climb) Used especially for the superiority and independence of deity, and in contrast to immanence*. But the two may be so defined as to be capable of inhering in the same being. God* may be both "in" and "beyond" the world. If he is merely beyond, then he is not in, if merely in, then not beyond, but remove the merely, and he may be both. Sheer transcendence, God merely outside the world, suggests that the world is equally outside God, sheer separation being a mutual relation. Transcendence would thus not be unique to deity. But non-exclusive transcendence, God both in and beyond things, may be non-mutual and unique; for things may be in God yet not beyond him. If so, he is whole and they are parts (see panentheism), and if the things are contingent, God will have accidents. But he may also have an essence which is purely necessary, and this may be "in" the world while the world is not in it. (What is as a whole accidental may yet involve a necessary part or factor; but the necessary factor can contain no accident) A necessary essence may be beyond the world, in the sense of being independent of just what world exists. God as both essence and accidents contains the world, but even in his accidental aspect is beyond it in being a whole greater than the parts through an over-all integrity or "whole-quality" (Wertheimer) that expresses, not just the world, but himself as possessing the world. Thus the transcendence of the divine essence is abstract (see perfection), the world being external to it; the transcendence of God's total being, essence and accidents, is concrete, the world and all reality being internal to it. The one is mere Cause, abstracting from all effects, the other is Cause-with-effects

The denial of abstract or essential transcendence is what many mean by "pantheism". Such denial destroys freedom and self-identity in God, for he then has no essential nature independent of the world, just as it is, and either all difference between what is and what might be disappears, since all is necessary, or else all is contingent, and God may become utterly undivine at any moment (where nothing is necessary, anything may happen).

The denial of concrete transcendence might be called deism* (but most traditional "theism" would have to be so classified). This denial destroys the inclusiveness of God. God-and-the-world becomes a whole which is more than God —for how, on the assumption, can it be less, or merely equal to him? Concrete transcendence banishes the paradox by identifying "God and the world" with "God in his total being", in which total being the world is included as content of the divine knowledge and love. The insistence of religion upon the superiority of God is not more marked than its teaching that we are within, not outside, his "love and care" If it be said that this does not mean, within his reality, it must be replied that then either God's love and care are not parts of his reality, or else their direct objects are entirely external to the love and care which embraces them It hardly seems that the infallible adequacy of God's awareness to its objects is compatible with such externality.

Transcendence and immanence have abstract and concrete aspects thanks to which the seeming mutual opposition between the two disappears in a complementary contrast Not only is God both in and beyond the world, but the world is both outside of and within God, for it is not involved in his necessary essence, but is in his total being as also accidental. The world is not beyond God, for where it is, there is he, whereas he is where the world is not, for example, actually in some other, say, earlier world, and potentially in some other possible world.

See infinite, omnipresence, pantheism, theism. R A Tsanoff, Religious Crossroads (1942) , A N. Whitehead, Process and Reality (1929), last chapter; G. T. Fechner, Zendavesta (1851), chap 11. C H.

transcendentalism, New England: A name applied to the doctrines of a philosophic and literary group centering in Concord, Massachusetts (c 1836-60), of which Emerson*, Thoreau, Alcott, and Margaret Fuller were representative members. Although its strongest impulse came from Kantian idealism, it was broadly eclectic, owing much to Platonic and Oriental influences as well as to the Unitarian reaction against Calvinism. Reliance on intuition and an extreme optimism regarding human nature were characteristic tenets See H. C Goddard, Studies in New England Transcendentalism (1908). L.W.C.

transept: (Lat., trans septum, enclosure) The transverse part of a church, usually at the entrance of the choir* and projecting beyond the sides of the building. F.T.P.

transfiguration: The incident described in Mark 9.2-8 and Synoptic parallels. As Mark narrates it, the story describes a divine confirmation of Jesus' Messiahship, despite the fact that He has to suffer. In vs. 9 Mark adds that the disciples were charged to keep what they had seen a secret until after the resurrection. Perhaps the story originally belonged to the cycle of resurrection* narratives and has been moved forward by Mark to become an incident in the earthly life of Jesus. Mark wishes to assert that three intimate followers, even during Jesus' lifetime, knew 'Him as the glorified Son of God, a fact that was hidden from others until after the resurrection. S.M.G.

translatio imperii: The medieval theory that the power of the ancient empire was authoritatively transferred to the medieval empire. The papal claim was that this was effected by action of the papacy in the latter's exercise of its divinely bestowed authority in things temporal. A. Dempf, Sacrum Imperium, Geschicts-und Staatsphilosophie des Mittelalters (1929). J.T.M.

translations of the Bible: See Bible, English, modern translations, versions of the Bible, ancient, targum.

transmigration: Rebirth of a soul* at death in another body. There is a tendency to use the word reincarnation for rebirth in another body of the same species, especially the human Transmigration has the broader meaning of passage back and forth across the boundaries of all forms —plant, animal, human, demonic and divine. The origin of the idea is obscure. Early and pre-literate cultures had such concepts as of the multiple souls of a man residing in animals, the appearance of the dead to survivers in animal form at the grave or near their old home, the return of an ancestor in a new-born child. Yet belief in transmigration does not seem to have grown from such seed ideas. Since it flourished chiefly in late and higher cultures, it may have emerged as a satisfying way of binding the idea of personal survival of death to moral responsibility.

Transmigration is a fundamental idea in Hindu* thought. The Vedas know nothing of it, but the creators of the Brāhmanas began to be troubled by the idea of repeated deaths. Coupled with *Karma, the inexorable law which made each birth depend upon previous deeds, it set the problem for all religious philosophies for twenty-five centuries—how to escape the wheel of eternally recurring birth and death. The stream of lives is beginningless and rolls on forever unless broken by an effective method of salvation. The Charvakas alone of all India's thinkers refused to accept the idea The Buddhists denied the existence of a soul but did not question transmigration. They explained that the skandhas of a dying being created an "intermediary being" which entered the womb to create the skandhas of the new being.

The Orphics and Pythagoreans taught transmigration. Plato and Platonism were attracted by the belief but it was not essential to their philosophies. In Greece the imprisoning of souls in bodies had a retributive purpose. In India good and evil deeds alike bound the soul on the wheel. Since release was the ultimate goal, it was no gain to merit rebirth as a god. The Zohar tried to weave the idea of transmigration into Judaism but beyond the Kabbala had no lasting effect upon Jewish thought.

Man's hope of building an ever-perfecting culture on the earth makes reincarnation more attractive than immortality* as a theory of future life for some minds. See samsara. A.E.H.

transubstantiation: (Lat., trans, across or over and substantia, substance) The word officially used since the Council of Trent* to express the changing of the substance of bread and of wine into the substance of the Body and the Blood of Christ, the accidents of bread and of wine remaining. See Lateran Councils; Radbertus. Cf. remanence. L.R.W.

Trappists: Popular name for the Cistercian Reform of de Rance, inaugurated in the Abbey of La Trappe in the seventeenth century. When the primitive rigor of the Cistercians* had waxed cold, the blame could be laid at the feet of inconstant abbots, the contemporary political scene, and human weakness. Reforms had taken place in France, Spain, Germany, Italy, and Portugal, but these were always very limited in scope. The reform inaugurated by de Rance however attained eminent stature. From the Abbey's location at La Trappe the Reformed Cistercians became known as Trappists.   W H.

Traub, Friedrich: (1860-   ) He taught at the University of Tübingen. As a neo-Kantian*, he was a devoted Ritschlian* who did much for the spread and development of the Ritschlian movement.
Theologie und Philosophie (Tübingen, 1910), Glaube und Geschichte (Gotha, 1926)   H H.

treason: A breach of allegiance to or attack upon the safety of the government or head of the state to which one owes loyalty. It is a high crime in all nations and is usually punishable by the severest measures.   R W.F.

treasury of merits: The merits of Christ and the saints. See Thesaurus Meritorum.   L.R W.

trees, sacred: The O.T. story of man begins with a garden and two sacred trees (Gen 2 9). Abraham frequented the Oaks of Mamre (Gen 13 18; 14 13). The burning bush was the place of Moses'* sense of God's presence. Deborah held court under her palm tree (Judges 4 5). The struggle of the Hebrews against the old Canaanitish religion was against their groves, high hills which concealed their venerated places.

Religion abounds with an amazing variety of practices in the treatment of sacred trees. In the earliest savage cults, a belief in tree spirits is found. Mythologies are replete with tree cults, and the sculpture and the decorative arts of ancient cultures carry the theme of the life-giving fertility of the tree. For the tree symbolizes both living vitality and the fellowship with nature for the worshiper. Buddha's* conversion under the Bohdi tree provided a link thereafter between the Buddha's followers and the living Bo tree. Throughout Europe, once covered with great forests, tribes had their sacred trees. When a daring Irish monk brought Christianity to the Saxons in the 8th century, his first act was to cut down their sacred tree. The oak tree was especially sacred among the Greeks, the Celts and Germans.

Sacred trees may be the abode of deities or may be the divine beings themselves. Thus, they are treated as human beings, appealed to by voice and offering, threatened if not fruitful, married to other trees, treated with great respect as taboo. The social value of tree cults was to increase respect for trees, insure their preservation. Among some tribes no tree was cut down without offering a prayer to the tree spirit. The deer parks in Japan around her shrines represent a deep veneration for trees, which has been socially beneficial to the nation in preservation of forests and of the beauty of their valleys. See yggd-rasil.   M.L.C.

Trench, Richard Chevenix: (1807-1886) Anglican Archbishop of Dublin. Apart from several collections of poems, he is best known for studies in N T and etymological questions both Greek and English. An Irishman by birth, most of his ministry was passed in that country.   W N.P.

Trent, Council of: According to Roman Catholics the nineteenth ecumenical council of the Catholic Church, it formulated the Church's reply to the Protestant Reformation. With interruptions of about three and ten years it lasted from December 13, 1545 to December 4, 1563.

Luther had appealed to a general council, stipulating that it should be held north of the Alps. The popes were afraid of an assembly so far from Rome. Trent, an imperial German city but located south of the Brenner Pass, was suggested as a compromise. Protestants were, however, represented at the Council only briefly. Italy, Spain, France and Germany sent the largest delegations. Only during intervals of peace in the war between Spain and France could the Council meet.

The papal bulls summoning the Council fix as its principal aims the elimination of religious disunity caused by the Protestant secession and the reformation of morals. In its dogmatic decisions the Council refrained from deciding points controverted in Catholic schools and limited itself to rejecting specifically Protestant tenets. Dogmatic tradition as well as Holy Scripture was declared a source of faith and the Vulgate was held authentic in matters of doctrine. The doctrine of original sin was defined. Justification by faith alone and the intrinsic corruption of fallen man were rejected. Finally, many Protestant doctrines on the Sacraments* were anathematized. The principal disciplinary decrees of the Council concerned the obligation of residence of bishops and priests, the training of priests, the reform of religious orders and the reform of Church finance. In general these decrees were characterized by prudence rather than by rigor. Although not accepted by all Catholic rulers, the decisions of the Council played an important rôle in the revival of Catholicism in the sixteenth century. See canons of various churches, Catholic Reformation; Confessions, Formal of the Christian Church; versions of the Bible, ancient· Latin Vulgate.

Sources of the Council are in course of publication in Concilium Tridentinum, 12 volumes incomplete (1901-1938), cf P Richard, Concile de Trente (1930-1931) and A Michel, Les Décrets du Concile de Trente (1938), both in Hefele-Leclercq, Histoire des Conciles (1907-1938).   E.A.R.

triad, Babylonian (An, Enlil, Enki): See Mesopotamian religions.

triad, Buddhist: See Buddhist Terminology.

triad, Christian: See Trinity.

triad, Hindu, the: See s.v. Vishnu, Trimūrti triad, Norse: See s.v. Odin or Odhin.

Triad Society: See Chinese religions.

triad, Taoist: See San-ch'ing under Chinese Terminology.

triad, Zoroastrian: See s.v. Sraosha triads: (Gr. trias, triados, a group of three) Groups or unions of three Gods. There is a tendency in religious history for the gods to be grouped in threes, except when opposed by a contradictory principle, such as that of one sole God, as in Judaism, Christianity and Mohammedanism. Even in Christianity, the Trinity* of the Father, Son and Holy Ghost reflects the underlying tendency. In India, the great Triad include Brahma, the Creator, Vishnu, the Preserver and Shiva, the Destroyer These represent the cycle of existence, just as the Babylonian triad of Anu, Enlil and Ea represent the materials of existence, air, water, earth. While no satisfactory explanation for the formulation of triads has been given, it need not be regarded as mysterious. There seems to be a similar tendency toward conceiving of one god, two gods, four gods. In Christian history, the Virgin was gradually added to the Trinity in popular religion and in art In China, it was the balance of heaven and earth, yang and yin*, darkness and light, which needed to be maintained. Or it was the rhythm of the four seasons, the four cardinal directions, for which their pantheon was arranged.   M L C tribal God: A deity who is worshiped by and considered as the patron of a particular tribe, especially among nomadic peoples. Some of the tribes who made up the Hebrew nation originally worshiped such deities. It is possible that Jahveh* was originally the god of one or more of the Hebrew tribes. See gods.   J.P.H.

tribal personality: See corporate personality.

trichotomy: See soul.

Tridentine Profession of Faith: The profession of faith, prescribed by Pius IV in 1564 to meet the requirements of the Council of Trent*, is a full and definite statement of the Catholic faith on those points particularly which were assailed in the sixteenth century. See Confessions, Formal of the Christian Church.   E.A.R.

triduum: (Latin tres, three; dies day) A period of three days chosen for special prayer or devotion for the preparation or celebration of a feast.
                                                                S.C.

Trimurti: The Hindu triad of gods, Brahma, the creator, Vishnu, the preserver, and Shiva the destroyer.   C.S.B.

trine immersion: A mode of baptism* wherein the candidate is immersed three times successively in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit. It is based on the formula of Mt. 28.19 and early Patristic writings, practised widely in the Eastern Church and by several groups in the West such as the Dunkers*, and is recognized universally as a valid form. See baptism, non Christian.   W.M.B.

Trinitarians: The Order of the Holy Trinity, founded in 1198 during the crusading* period to secure the release of Christian captives taken by the infidels Originally regularized as canons according to St Augustine, the religious have, since their seventeenth-century recognition as mendicant* friars, distinguished themselves by diversified, social contributions.   R C P.

Trinity: The doctrine, accepted as a dogma by all Catholic and Eastern Orthodox Christians and by the principal Protestant Churches, that God is one in being (or substance), power, and majesty, but subsists eternally in three co-equal, perfect persons or hypostases, to which are appropriated respectively the individual names Father, Son or Word (Logos), and Holy Spirit. This doctrine received full expression for the first time as the result of the work of the Cappadocian Fathers so-called (see Cappadocians, the three), Basil, Gregory of Nyssa, and Gregory Nazianzus. It was given formal statement in the synodical letter of a council held in Constantinople* A.D. 382—preserved by Theodoret*, Historia Ecclesiastica, v. 9 (Eng. tr., Nicene and Post-Nicene Fathers, Series II, Vol. XIV). The Constantinopolitan formulation may be taken as the definitive theological statement of the doctrine. The religious formula of the Trinity—that God is to be believed in and worshiped as both one and three—is implicit in the N.T. adherence, on the one hand, to Hebraic Monotheism (the *shema of Israel) and, on the other, to the distinct religious significance of Jesus Christ "The Lord", "The Only—begotten Son", and of the Spirit, "another Comforter." Recognizing, as modern scholarship does, the reality of development and of organic process in Christian doctrine and the presence of this factor in the N.T. period as well as later, it is in the highest degree remarkable that a work as early as the Gospel according to St. Matthew should associate with Baptism an explicit Trinitarian formula. This fact proved determinative for the structure of the Creed of Nicea A.D 325 and the Creed commonly called the Apostles'*. It informed the theological work of the Ante-Nicene Fathers, of whom the most important in the development of the doctrine of the Trinity are Ignatius, Irenaeus, Tertullian, and Origen. Tertullian first used the Western formula una substantia, tres personae. To the acute heresiarch Sabellius* is to be credited the elimination for the first time of every vestige of subordination in thinking of the three persons, while to Apollinarius' (heretical only on the person of Christ) and to St. Athanasius the Cappadocians mainly owed their conversion from Semi-Arianism (homoiousion to patri) to the Nicene position.

In the West from the time of St. Augustine* (fl. A.D. 400) a distinctive approach to the ideas alike of Deity in general and of the Trinity prevailed. God was conceived of in personal and concrete terms. Psychological categories were brought into the service of theology. This is the background of the Augustinian construction of the persons of the Trinity as inner relations or aspects of the one Divine being, the living and personal God   These relations are however self-subsistent and equal respectively to the Divine essence in its fulness, since in God there is nothing partitive but only perfect simplicity   Thus for St. Augustine the Word or Son is eternally generated as the object of thought in the Divine mind, while the Holy Spirit proceeds eternally as love by the act of the Divine will   This treatment is normative for Scholasticism*. St Thomas in his "Treatise on the Trinity" in the *Summa Theologica does little more than expand it and give it a systematic exposition.

The two principal developments of Trinitarian thought in modern times are to be found in the philosophical system of Hegel* and in the attempt to think of God as in Himself a Divine Society. The first is a variant of the psychological approach in the form which its analysis of Divine being takes. It differs sharply from the Augustinian-scholastic theory in making the evolutionary advance of nature and progression of history organic to the dialectical process in which the Divine self-consciousness is itself constituted and eternally realized.   The second modern development, which may be called the social interpretation of the Trinity, is not strictly new. Adumbrations of it can be found in the great Gnostic heresiarch Valentinus* (Hippolytus, Ref., VI 24), in St. Augustine's analysis of the sentence, "God is Love" (De Trin, vi. 7, viii 14, ix 2), in Richard of St. Victor* (fl A.D 1160), and in the learned Bishop Bull (Works, II, p. 9). Yet in the characteristic recent elaborations of such an idea, in which persona is deliberately equated with personality or ego (C. F. D'Arcy, F. J. Hall) and God is declared to be in His innermost being an Eternal Society or Family (Fairbairn, Illingworth, Geo A. Gordon), it cannot be doubted that we have to do with a socially conditioned facet of modernism. It can hardly be doubted further that this general development goes beyond traditional Catholic doctrine. With Tennant* it must be admitted that experience yields no analogy which quite fits the Catholic and Reformation doctrine of relations which are yet substantive "persons." It is perhaps at this point that the Cappadocians, with their attempt to hold one being (ousia) from the standpoint of internal analysis but three objective hypostases or individual subsistences or modes of existence, have a permanent contribution. See creeds of Christendom, filioque, procession of the Holy Spirit, subordinationism, tritheism. See also Greek terms.

Select Bibliography—Historical· F. C. Baur, Die Christliche Lehre von der Dreieinigkeit, 3 vols (Tubingen, 1841-3) ; J A Dorner, Hist. Doct. Person of Christ, Engl. tr., 5 vols. (1872) ; A. von Harnack, Hist Dogma, Engl. tr , 7 vols (1894-9) ; F. Loofs, Leitfaden, 4th ed (1906) , J LeBreton, Histoire du Dogme de la Trinité (Tomes I and II, 1910, 1928) ; Essays Trinity and Incarnation, ed. A E J. Rawlinson (1928) , G L. Prestige, God in Patristic Thought (1936)   General. C. Gore, Incarnation of Son of God (1891) and later works, A M Fairbairn, Place of Christ .   . (1893) , J R. Illingworth, Personality Hum. and Div. (1894) and later works, G. A. Gordon, Ult Conceptions of Faith (1903) , F J Hall, The Trinity (1910) ; C. C. J Webb, God & Personality (1919) ; W. Temple, Christ the Truth (1924) ;

A E Garvie, Christian Doct Godhead (1925) , H. Rashdall, God and Man (1930) , F R Tennant, Phil Theol, II (1930) , N. Micklem, What is the Faith? (1936)   C W.L

Trinity Sunday and Season: The Feast of the Trinity*, observed on the Sunday after Pentecost* in various places from the 10th cent , was extended to the whole Latin Church in the 14th (in the Eastern Orthodox Church the Trinity is specially honored at Pentecost). In various north-European uses (continued in Anglican and Lutheran Prayer Books) it replaced Whitsunday* as the Sunday after which Sundays were numbered till Advent*   See church year cycle.   E R H.

trisagion: (Gr., treis, three, hagios, holy) 1) The antiphonal chant of the angels in the inaugural vision of Isaiah (6 3), invoking God as thrice holy. It forms the basis of the Kedushah (Sanctification) in the morning and afternoon liturgy of the Synagogue. It is used in the Eastern and Western Churches, and is known also as Sanctus, Ter Sanctus, Cantus or Hymnus Seraphicus or Cherubicus and Hymnus Gloriae 2) It designates specifically the short hymn of the Greek Christian liturgies. "Holy God, Holy and Mighty, Holy and Immortal, have mercy upon us", dating from the reign of Theodosius II (408-50) or from the fourth cent   It appears also in the Roman Missal for Good Friday.   s s.c.

tritheism (Gr, tris, three, theos, god) Literally, the view that there are three gods, often attributed to Christianity by those who have not understood the Doctrine of the Trinity*, but probably never intentionally held by a Christian theologian. The charge of tritheism has occasionally been made within the Church against extreme interpretations of the Trinitarian doctrine, e g., in the 6th Cent., the view of John Philopon that the three hypostases must mean three substances, and in the 11th Cent , the view of Roscelin* that the three persons of the Trinity are only nominally one.   E.T R.

Trithemius, John: (of Trittenheim 1462-1516) Abbot at Sponheim (near Trier) Humanist. Student of theology, history, occultism. As historian he invented sources, is unreliable except for his own time.   E C.X.

Trito-Isaiah: See Isaiah.

Triton: (Gr., Tritōn) In Greek mythology, a merman, son of Poseidon* and Amphitrite, whose trumpet is the conch   Fish-shaped, he may be compared with certain Oriental gods, e.g., Dagon* of the O T. (I Sam. 5 3, 4).   E.M.N.

trivium: The lower disciplines in medieval universities, i.e., grammar, logic and rhetoric. See Scholasticism.   P.G M.

Troeltsch, Ernst: (1865-1923) Professor of theology at Heidelberg and of philosophy at Berlin, Troeltsch devoted his main efforts to the solution of the problems raised for both theology and philosophy by the development of historical science and the rise of historical relativism. Noting the strong interdependence of religion and social culture (as in The Social Teachings of the Christian Churches), he was unable to regard either as wholly a function of the other, though Christianity could not claim validity beyond its sphere in Western civilization The independent core of religion he designated, in the thought-form of his neo-Kantian* philosophy, as a religious a priori. The problem of social history seemed to him soluble only in the form of culminating yet passing "syntheses of culture" which were less the product of historical determinism, as with Spengler*, than of human freedom. Troeltsch is the leading theologian of the religio-historical school and a chief representative of non-sceptical relativism in philosophy of history.

E Troeltsch, Gesammelte Schriften, 4 vols. (Tuebingen, 1912-1925) ; The Social Teachings of the Christian Churches, 2 vols (Trans. by Olive Wyon. London, 1931) , Absolutheit des Christentums (2d ed Tuebingen, 1912) , Christian Thought (London, 1923) , Glaubenslehre (Munich, 1925) , H R. Mackintosh, Types of Modern Theology (1937) , R S. Sleigh, The Sufficiency of Christianity (London, 1923)   H.R.N.

troll: (Teut.) An earth demon, or giant; a personified non-human nature power in the religion of the early Germanic and Scandinavian peoples; later, a friendly but a mischievous dwarf.

                                                                                     F.L.P

trope: The addition of words, a syllable to each note, to the elaborate melismas of the Gregorian chant*. The additions never formed a part of the official liturgy. They were introduced into the chant from the 9th to the 12th centuries.

                                                                                     E.H.B.

truce of God, the: Medieval Church institution which forbade private war on Friday, Saturday and Sunday of every week on pain of excommunication* or interdict*. This institution—to be distinguished from the Peace of God—later included other periods in the calendar, such as parts of the Lent and the periods extended up to Whitsuntide and to St. John's Day, June 24. Private war was also forbidden from the Day of the Ascension of the Virgin, August 15 to Saint Martin's Day, November 11.   S.C.T.

truth: The problem of truth involves two inquiries: its nature and criteria. Two types of criteria of truth are. the non-philosophical and the philosophical. By the first is meant those judgments claimed to be true by assertion: e.g., appeal to some authority, social agreement (consensus gentium); appeal to feeling, appeal to intuition; appeal to self-evident or axiomatic principles. The criticisms of these several appeals are fundamentally alike· all are either dogmatic (non-philosophical) or inconsistent. If one asserts something about which there is no further appeal one is dogmatic; if one appeals to reason to sustain any one or all of the above criteria, one is inconsistent—for, then one has set up another criterion (reason) to sustain the appeal. Philosophically, the above criteria lie outside the pale of argument. A further common criticism is that authorities, feelings, intuitions conflict in the testimony of men, self-evident truths are not always so self-evident, the agreement of the majority turns out often to be false

The philosophical criteria of truth fall into three types 1) The coherence theory asserts that to be true which fits into a harmony. Truth cannot fundamentally be inconsistent A systematic liar will eventually fail to harmonize a system of lies. To deny coherence is to appeal philosophically to another system of coherence (system of denials). 2) The correspondence theory asserts that that idea is true which conforms with an actual situation My judgment of a fact or reality is a true judgment if it agrees with what is presented. The problem raised here is the question of knowledge how am I to know that ideas correspond to the extra-mental? The holders of this view must sustain their appeal by a well-worked out epistemological theory if they are to escape the charge of dogmatism John Locke* is representative of this view and he failed to dodge the critic's charge of dogmatism. 3) The pragmatic theory in general is that a truth is a judgment which works. There are pragmatists and pragmatists. To say that an idea works may mean· it satisfies, it works for most people; it is a name for successful adaptation (John Dewey), it is experimentally justified (the laboratory technician). Criticisms of this theory are May there be a truth which lies beyond the demonstration of workability? May not a lie work? Is not satisfaction even to a large number as precarious as consensus gentium? Is truth only an abstraction of that which works truly?

It is possible that all of the philosophical criteria must be applied in judgments, perhaps they are not so much antithetical as complementary. As to the nature of truth, philosophers disagree in accordance with their epistemology and metaphysics. For an objective idealist, truth is inherent in objective reality if truth is taken to mean a systematic whole of the Universal Idea or God; for a pragmatist truth may not exist ontologically but be a concept relative to a particular judgment. The pragmatist has been criticized by his application of a defensible test of truth beyond legitimate application to the nature of truth.

The criteria of religious truth follow the same pattern: non-philosophical and philosophical with the virtues and vices named above. See pragmatism; myth; twofold-truth theory. Cf. epistemology, reason in religion.

W P. Montague, The Ways of Knowing (1925) ; G. T W. Patrick, An Introduction to Philosophy (1924) ; E S. Brightman, An Introduction to Philosophy (1925) ; V. Ferm, First Adventures in Philosophy (1936).   V.F.

Tuatha de Danaan: (Celtic, collective name; 'the folk of the goddess Danu' or 'folk of the god whose mother is called Danu'). Gods in early Ireland; gods living in underground. In the mythical tales of Medieval Chroniclers these gods were one of several groups which successively colonized Ireland; each group was affiliated with the Hebrew patriarchs, once lords of the country, they were finally overthrown by the Milesians, ancestors of the Irish. The surviving members of the Tuatha de Danaan retired to the hills, lived underground and became a race of wizards, or fairies in their natures they are still gods or divinities. After Ireland became Christian they were thought to be harmful to agriculture.

F.L.F.

Tübingen School: Designation of a group of theologians who under the leadership of F(erdinand) C(hristian) Baur (professor of theology at Tübingen, 1826-1860) sought to explain the evolution of Christianity in terms of a rigidly maintained Hegelian* philosophy of history Compromise and the reconciliation of opposites—the universal law of progress—Baur found unmistakably present in the life and thought of the apostolic age and its resultant writings. In its earliest stage Christianity was a form of Judaism: Jesus was the Messiah of the Jews, not the founder of a world religion. Such was the view of the Jewish Christian wing under the leadership of Peter and James In contradistinction to this view (thesis) Paul maintained that Jesus was the Messiah of the whole world, and Christianity was wholly distinct from Judaism and thus unrestricted by the Mosaic law (antithesis) Out of this clash, which convulsed the church throughout the first century, arose the later reconcilement and more or less colorless "union Christianity" of the second century (synthesis). Upon this Procrustean bed all the writings of early Christianity were forced to lie. Only those writings which revealed the intensity of this struggle were apostolic. Of the so-called Pauline letters only four—Romans, I and II Corinthians, and Galatians (especially the latter two)—could be adjudged from the pen of Paul. The other epistles and Acts, being more or less conciliatory, were, of course, postapostolic. In the gospels they fancied they found the same situation. Matthew was the product of the earliest (Jewish) position and was thus the most trustworthy, only imperfectly so, since it was the result of several reconstructions of the original material. Luke represented the Pauline opposition—this gospel was the best representative (after the Hauptbriefe) of the Pauline antithesis. Mark was the unionistic epitomist. As for John —and the same is true of the Johannine letters— since the whole controversy is already far below the horizon, it was to be seen as the product of the later second century, when harmony had been gained, and was therefore worthless as an historical document. Great weight was laid on the so-called Clementine Homilies and Recognitions. In these writings Baur and his pedisequi thought they discerned Paul (thinly disguised as Simon Magus) in constant conflict with his archopponent Peter. Since they found a similar hostility to Paul in Revelation, that writing was regarded as primitive, the earliest and most Jewish of all the N.T. In spite of its overemphasis, its hobby-riding, and its all too evident critical weaknesses—especially in synoptic criticism—this school of thought made an invaluable contribution. It has properly been styled "a fruitful failure."

In addition to Baur, as members of this important and distinctive school of criticism should be included Schwegler, Zeller, Volkmar, Hilgenfeld, Lipsius*, Hausrath*, Weizsacker*, Pfleiderer*, and Schmiedel For an excellent and fair discussion see the anonymous article, translated under the title, "the Tübingen Historical School," Bibliotheca Sacra, Vol. XIX (1862), pp. 75-105. See Lives of Jesus.

M S.E

Tucker, Abraham: (1705-1774) A British moralist and the original exponent of Utilitarianism * Author of The Light of Nature Pursued in which he "pursued the scheme of Reason, by the Light of Nature". He exerted a major influence on the subsequent trend of philosophy especially on Paley*, who first formulated a theory of Utilitarianism He accepted the universe as a constitution, composed of individual facts through which man must plow slowly and inductively Author of Man In Quest of Himself

W.G.H.

Tucker, William Jewett: (1839-1926) Born in Griswold, Conn., July 13, 1839, graduated, Dartmouth College, 1861, Andover Theological Seminary 1866, Pastor, Franklin St. Church, Manchester, N. H., 1867-1875 and Madison Square Presbyterian Church, New York, 1875-1879; Bartlett Professor of Sacred Rhetoric, Andover Theological Seminary, 1880-1893; co-editor The Andover Review, President Dartmouth College, 1893-1909.

Dr Tucker was founder of the Andover House (later South End House) Boston, 1891 (one of the earliest social settlements in America), and was one of the foremost in arousing interest in Christian social ethics in the churches, also teaching a course on this subject in Andover Seminary. As preacher, teacher and college president he won the admiration and fealty of youth and was potent in vitalizing Christian thought and life.

Author From Liberty to Unity (1892) , The Making and Unmaking of the Preacher (1899) (Lyman Beecher Lectures) ; Public-Mindedness (1910) , Personal Power (1910) ; The Function of the Church in Modern Society (1911) , My Generation, an Autobiographical Interpretation (1920) Tributes to Dr Tucker by President Ernest W Hopkins and by Robert F Leavens, appeared in The Dartmouth Alumni Magazine, April, 1939 Cf J. W Buckham, Progressive Religious Thought in America (1919).

J.W.B.

Tung Chung-shu: See Confucianism.

Tung Shan Shê: See Chinese religions (Secret Societies).

tunic: The vestment which the bishop places on the sub-deacon at ordination, similar to a dalmatic* also a short vestment worn by a bishop under the dalmatic.

Cf Addis and Arnold, A Catholic Dictionary, p. 821

S.C.

Tunkers: See Dunkers.

tutelary god: A religious entity or 'power' serving as a guardian or protector of an individual, family, clan, tribe, city, or nation. Among one-factor religions* as in Christianity and Buddhism, a patron saint*, or guardian angel*, or minor divinity which has its duties and jurisdiction fixed and conditioned by a spirit or spirits of higher or highest authority in the spiritual government by which the universe is operated, derived from historical and mythological persons, separately, or in combination of characters.

Among the two-factor religions*, guardian spirits whose duties and authority are not unified or systematized with the others in a single 'order' of religious power, such tutelary gods are derived from powers of deceased persons, animals, plants, and other objects.   F.L.P.

tutiorism: A system of teaching in Catholic moral theology, but not favoured by it, which holds that in cases of doubt as to the lawfulness of an action, it is better to be on the safe side, i.e., one must favour a law as against liberty and, when laws conflict, one must favour that law opposed to natural inclinations   T.J.B.

Twenty-Five Articles, the: A rescension of the Thirty-Nine Articles* of the Anglican Church given by John Wesley to the American Methodists and adopted by the Baltimore Conference in 1784 as an informal basis of belief. It omits or modifies Articles of the older creed not applicable to American polity, or out of harmony with distinctive Wesleyan emphasis.   F.G E.

two-document hypothesis: See Q, Synoptic Gospels.

two-factor religions: A word coined by Fred L. Parrish to identify the great division of the historical religions of the world in which all religious ideas and practices of the faiths are based upon the assumption that the religious factor* native to man and the religious factor native to non-human nature 'powers', are different kinds of factors, mutually exclusive, the kind of religion represented by each religion in the great division; historical religions which assume that there is no religious factor of unity, but on the contrary, two imping-ing 'worlds': 1) of the human here and hereafter, and 2) of the 'immortal' spirits, gods and demons of non-human derivation.

(About ten per cent of the peoples of the world today belong to historical religions using this two-factor assumption; the two-factor assumption is used so rigidly that separate bodies of ideas and practices obtain among all primitives for making religious adjustments with the two different groups of religious powers.) See his The Classification of Religions (1941). See religious 'powers', one-factor religions, classification of religions.   F.L.P.

twofold truth theory: According to this view "something may be true theologically which is not true philosophically, and vice versa." (Windel-band, History of Philosophy, 1919, pp. 320 ff.) Throughout the Middle Ages many had thought and acted in accordance with it, but William Ockham* provided it with an acute epistemological analysis. (Cf. R McKeon, Selections from Medieval Philosophers, II, 351-421) Ockham's statement was a moderate one compared with that of later Averroists*, or of Marsilius of Padua*, Pierre Bayle* and numerous moderns The idea was of influence in the development of mysticism, political history, theology (cf Luther's concept of justification), and was of great importance in secularizing science. See common grace, John of Jandum, Pomponazzi, reason in religion; truth Cf. Satyasiddhi School under Buddhist Terminology.   Q.B.

Two-Seed-in-the-Spirit Predestinarian Baptists: A group of 16 conservative Baptist churches having 200 members in Tennessee, Kentucky, and Alabama. They have the same origin and general principles as the Primitive Baptists* and have been known as "Hard Shell"* Baptists. Their distinctive "Two-Seed-in-the-Spirit" doctrine is an involved theory In the "earthly generation of mankind" there are two "seeds," a good seed from God and a bad seed from the devil, and each unchangeably produces good and bad, saved and lost, people. "Close communion" and feet washing are practiced, and paid ministers and "church activities" are opposed, evangelistic work is unnecessary, since "Christ came to save sinners" and "finished his work" See Baptists. See also anti-missionary movement in the U. S.   E.T.C.

two swords, the doctrine of: The mediaeval theory of the division of powers between church and state, based on S. Luke xxii. 38. While earlier theorists declared that the two powers, secular and ecclesiastical, held their authority directly from God, twelfth century theologians, such as St. Bernard and John of Salisbury*, maintained that the prince, as agent of the "Sacerdotium," received his power from the church.   E W.K.

tychism: (Gr., tuche, fortune*, chance) A term employed by Charles Peirce*, meaning chance or the unpredictability of events.   V.F.

Tyconius: (4th century) A Donatist who rejected the rebaptism of those who were baptized into the Catholic church; who maintained that unholy men are permitted to live in the holy church, that the administration of the sacraments by unholy priests can be efficacious, that the Catholic church is anti-Christian and that the coming of the last days was to proceed from the Donatist* church.
F C Burkitt, "The Book of Rules of Tyconius," Texts and Studies, III, 1 (Cambridge, Eng., 1894); T. Hahn, Tyconius Studien (Leipzig, 1900).   H.H.

Tyler, Bennet: (July 10, 1783-May 14, 1858) Congregational clergyman, theologian, educator. When fifteen years of age an accident incapacitated him for manual work, so his family, although very poor, raised the money to send him to Yale College which he entered in 1800 as a classmate of Nathaniel W. Taylor* who later became his great theological opponent. Graduating in 1804 he taught and studied theology, and was ordained over the church at South Britain, where he remained for fourteen years. In 1822 he became president of Dartmouth College, leaving in 1828 to take the pastorate of the Second Church of Portland, Maine. Alarmed by the liberal tendency emanating from Yale College, and especially aroused by the publication of Taylor's Concio ad Clerum in September, 1828, Tyler returned to Connecticut to lead the conservative revolt against the New Haven Theology. When the East Windsor Seminary (later Hartford) was founded in 1834 Tyler became its first president and professor of theology, and retained that position until he resigned in July, 1857. He remained throughout his life an ardent and consistent opponent of all the liberal movements within the Calvinistic orthodoxy of his day. See New Haven theology, means.

See the Memoir by Nahum Gale, vol. I of Tyler's Lectures on Theology (1859), F. B. Dexter, Biographical Sketches of the Graduates of Yale College, V (1911); C. M. Geer, Hartford Theological Seminary (1934).

s.e.m

Tyndale, William: (1495?-1536) In exile from his native England, Tyndale translated from their original languages the N.T. (1526), the Pentateuch (1530), and the Book of Jonah (1531), as well as other portions of the O.T. He was burnt at the stake for heresy in Vilvorde, Belgium. His translations were used in the Great (Cranmer's) Bible of 1538, and subsequently in the Authorized and Revised Versions. See Bible, English.

Works (3 vols, Parker Society, Cambridge, 1848-1850). See J. F. Mozley, William Tyndale (1937)

e.w.k.

types: Typology is a technique, closely related to allegory*, by which persons or events in the O.T. are interpreted as adumbrating Jesus Christ or some doctrine or practice of the Christian Church. St. Paul and the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews made use of O.T. "types," and in a number of instances Jesus is represented by the Gospels as having so expounded O.T. Scripture. The method flourished as an exegetical* device until the rise in modern times of historical criticism.

s.m.g

typology: See types.

tyrannicide: Literally, the killing of a tyrant. The theoretical justification of this act was the subject of considerable theological discussion during the medieval and reformation periods.

w.s.h.

Tyrrell, George: (1861-1909) Liberal R. C in England. Leaving the Anglican Church, he was received into the R. C. Church in 1879, and entered the Society of Jesus* in 1880 Because of his views denying the inerrancy of R. C. theology and affirming the mutability of the visible Church organism, Tyrrell was expelled from the Society in 1906 As a result of his criticism of the encyclical "Pascendi"*, Tyrrell incurred virtual excommunication in 1907. See Modernism. Among his more importing writings are:

A Much-Abused Letter (1907), Medievalism (1908), Christianity at the Crossroads (1909)

h.w.j.

Tzadikim: See Chasidism.

tziruf: (chiluf) See Kabbalah

Tzschirner, Heinrich Gottlieb: (1778-1828) He was professor in Wittenberg and in Leipzig. As a representative of supernatural rationalism or rational supernaturalism, he was open towards other theological movements. He also achieved a certain understanding of Schleiermacher. His influence was notable in spite of his early death.

Christliche Kirchengeschichte seit der Reformation. A continuation of J M Schroeckh's* great work, 10 vols. (Leipzig, 1804-12); Vorlesungen über die christliche Glaubenslehre (Leipzig, 1829). h.h.

U

ubiquity: (Lat., ubique, everywhere) A term used in the doctrinal discussions of the sixteenth century to explain the Lutheran view of the real or bodily presence of Christ in the Lord's Supper. In answer to their opponents' argument that the human nature of Christ (real body and blood) could not be present because it could not be in more than one place at the same time, the Lutherans contended: by virtue of its union with His divine nature, Christ's human nature acquires the property of being present simultaneously wherever He wills. In this sense of relative omnipresence ubiquity is taught by Luther* and by the Formula of Concord* (Art. VII). See communicatio idiomatum; Lutheran doctrine of the Lord's Supper. T.A.K.

Ugaritic tablets: Hundreds of clay tablets discovered in Ras Shamra, northern coast of Syria, from 1929 to 1939. Most of them are inscribed in an alphabetic writing of cuneiform* appearance which was deciphered without the help of a bilingual inscription. Written in Ugaritic dialect, akin to Canaanite, Phoenician and Hebrew, they offer fragments of epic, liturgical, and mythological literatures and date from about 1400 B.C. Extremely valuable for the study of the Semitic languages and of the O.T.
See bibliography in C. F. A. Schaeffer, Ugaritica (1939); C. H. Gordon, Ugaritic Grammar (1940). S.L.T.

ulama: (Arabic, meaning the wise or learned men; plural of alim, wise, learned) Learned scholars in Moslem tradition and canon law. A college or body composed of imams, *muftis, and cadis (priests, expounders and judges.) See mulla. P.E.J.

Ulfilas: (c. 311-383) The apostle of Christianity to the Gothic people. He was born among the Goths in the region of the Danube, and was sent at an early age to Constantinople, where he became an Arian Christian. At the age of 30 he was sent as missionary bishop for forty years' leadership among the Goths. When his success drew the persecution of a pagan chief, he led his followers across the Danube and established a Christian community. His Gothic translation of the Scriptures raised the dialect to a literary language. See Arianism. P.E.J.

Ullmann, Karl: (1796-1865) He taught at the universities of Halle and Heidelberg. He was largely polemically active in the struggle against Friedrich Strauss and L. Feuerbach.
Historisch oder Mythisch? (Hamburg, 1838); Das Wesen des Christentums (Hamburg, 1845, 5th ed., Gotha, 1865) H H.

Ulrici, Hermann: (1806-1884) Was professor in Halle and a strong critic of Hegel*. His doctrine of God is a mediation between deism and pantheism. The world not only endures through God, but also in Him. God is the necessary presupposition of scientific ontology and cosmology. Liberty and reason have their origin in God. The human spirit discriminates the divine not only by logical but also by ethical categories Glauben und Wissen, Speculation und exacte Wissenschaft (Leipzig, 1858), Gott und die Natur (Leipzig, 1861); Gott und der Mensch (Leipzig, 1866), J. E. Schweicker, Ulricis Gotteslehre (Wurzburg, 1905). H.H.

ultramontanism: (Lat., ultra montes, beyond the mountains) A name used in regard to certain features of organization in the Roman Catholic Church whereby it is unified under the control of the Pope. The term has been used since mediaeval times, because in relation to most European peoples the Pope lives beyond the mountains, i.e., the Alps. Sympathetically employed, as it was in the beginning and is still by some Catholic writers, ultramontanism simply denominates the centralized, unified, hierarchical order which is a notable feature of Roman Catholicism. In a critical and pejorative sense, which is more frequent in modern times, the term is used to describe what is regarded as an extreme form of over-centralization, particularly in political organization of the R. C. Church, which does not give sufficient voice to the non-Italian members who may not have the same cultural and national interests. Contrasted with movements to found "national" branches of the Church, as in Gallicanism*.
U. Benigni, "Ultramontanism," in Cath. Encyclopedia, XV, 125. V.J.B.

Umā: A Hindu goddess, one of many of the consorts of Shiva, gentle, kindly and winsome in character, in contrast to Kali*. C.S.B.

Unam Sanctam, The: The Bull "Unam Sanctam", published Nov. 18, 1302 by Boniface VIII*

against Philip IV, the Fair, of France was the protest of the pope to the king for having violated the rights of the Church (the privilegium fori), abused the jus regaliae (royal acquisition of the revenues of purposely unfilled episcopal sees) and for having imprisoned the Papal Legate. It is a solemn defense of the rights of the Church against molestations by the Crown and a vindication of the superiority of the spiritual power (or sword) over the temporal.   R M H.

Unamuno, Miguel de: (1864-1936) The outstanding Spanish thinker and writer since Cervantes, and one of the greatest of modern men of letters. Born in Bilbao in the Basque provinces, Unamuno was educated in Madrid and spent most of his life as a professor, and a period as Rector, in the University of Salamanca While the most universally read literary man of his time, Unamuno never lived outside Spain, except during a period of exile in France in 1925-30. Essayist, poet, novelist, dramatist, philosopher, and mystic, his best known works are Vida de Don Quixote y Sancho (1905), English translation by H. P. Earle (1927); Del Sentimento Tragico de la Vida (1912), English translation by Crawford Flitch (1921); Essays (7 volumes published by the Residence de Estudients de Madrid 1916-18); L'Agonie de Christsianisme, published in Paris in 1925, English translation by P. Loving (1928).

Unamuno was profoundly influenced by Kierkegaard*, about whom he wrote in 1907, before the Danish writer had become known outside his own country. By stressing the concrete "man of flesh and bone" over against the so-called rational man, and exalting the significance of struggle, decision, and vocation in life, Unamuno became a precursor of the existential* movement in thought. He is, moreover, the greatest interpreter of the Spanish spirit. While being ecclesiastically neither Roman Catholic nor Protestant, Unamuno was a devoted Christian.   J.A.M

uncials: Large or capital letters such as were used in antiquity in book hands, in books prepared for sale. The name may be due to the habit of some Roman publishers of using twelve letters to the line (as the Romans counted twelve ounces to the pound and twelve inches to the foot). Manuscripts written in book hands are called uncials. Biblical uncials range in date from the second century before Christ (the Rylands Deuteronomy) to the tenth century after Christ See manuscripts of the Bible   E.J G.

unction: See anointing; extreme unction, oils, sacraments.

Underhill, Evelyn (Mrs. Stuart Moore): (1875-1941) Author of important studies in religious mysticism. Her best known work Mysticism (first edition, 1911, 13th edition, 1940) first appeared when she was much influenced by H. Bergson*. The frame of her interpretation of mysticism was considerably altered in the following thirty years as she was drawn to von Hügel, Whitehead and more recently to Maritain and this is reflected in the later editions of Mysticism As a religious poet, her Immanence takes its place with the poems of Crashaw, Herbert, and Donne among the finest of English mystical verse. Late in her life, her admirable historical studies of the mystics gave way to her own free interpretation of the spiritual life in Concerning the Inner Life, and The Golden Sequence. An Anglican of Catholic sympathies, her appraisal of Worship (1936) showed a penetrating grasp of liturgical worship but little sympathetic understanding of free Protestant worship.   D V S

Uniate Churches: Comprise such communions which, although originally deriving from the Eastern Orthodox (or separated) churches*, and commonly still retaining the Byzantine rite* and usages (such as the married priesthood), yet have accepted the supremacy of the papacy, they accept the doctrines of the Roman Catholic Church.
Adrian Fortescue, The Uniate Eastern Churches (1903)   M S.

Unigenitus (Bull of 1713): (Lat., unus, one; genitus, begotten) This document is so called from the Latin Unigenitus Dei Filius, "The Only-Begotten Son of God", which are the opening words of the text The bull was issued by Pope Clement XI, Sept. 8, 1713, against the Jansenistic* doctrines of Pasquier Quesnel*   C V.

unio mystica: (Lat mystical union) The joining of the soul of man to God in an essentially indescribable experience, transcending all ordinary conditions of human consciousness. Such a state, cognitive or affective, may occur as a natural phenomenon, or may require supernatural intervention. Beginning with biblical references (the soul as the bride of Christ in the Song of Songs, the experiences of Jacob, St. Paul's third heaven), Christian writers (St Augustine, St. Bernard of Clairvaux, the Victorines, St. Bonaventure, Meister Eckhart, St. John of the Cross, St. Theresa, B Ramon Lull, J. Boehme) have developed mystical exercises and terminology related philosophically to the spiritualism of Plato and Plotinus. It is quite possible that some form of mystical experience is found among the religions of India, in Mohammedanism, and in the Russian Orthodox Church Henri Bergson* stimulated interest in the condition as a source of religious motivation in his: Deux Sources de la morale et de la religion (Paris, 1932). See mysticism.   V.J.B.

Unitarianism: The doctrinal system characterized chiefly by belief in the unipersonality of God and the normal humanity of Jesus, as contrasted with the Trinity* and the eternal deity of Christ.

1. In Transylvania Unitarianism, splitting off from the Reformed Church, first took form in 1568 (almost simultaneously with Socinianism* in Poland, though independently of it). Having won the adherence of the ruling Prince and of many of the nobility the Unitarian Church was given legal standing as one of the four "received religions," spread rapidly, and became firmly rooted. A change of government was soon followed by a period of two centuries and a half of persistent oppression by Calvinists and Catholics in turn, which together with frequent wars greatly weakened the church, but its members held on heroically, and since the middle of the 19th century have generally enjoyed peace and friendly relations with the other confessions.

After the downfall of Socinianism in Poland the Unitarians of Transylvania led an isolated existence, unaware of kindred movements elsewhere until 1821, when they learned of the Unitarian movements then taking form in England and America, with which they have ever since maintained fraternal relations.

Their constituency is mostly of Szekler and Magyar free farmers. Their faith is a simple, undogmatic Christian theism, tending to be more conservative than that of Unitarians elsewhere, with little stress upon dogma and strong emphasis on practical religion. They are known for their high standards in morals and education. Their polity is in the main like that of the Reformed Church, is closely knit, and administered by a General Consistory, district Deans, and a Bishop and a lay Curator over all. The church suffered heavily in World War I, but has a constituency of about 70,000, in about 100 regular congregations, including a few in Hungary proper. The larger congregations have parish schools, and there are two higher academies, besides a college and a theological school at Kolozsvár.

See S. Székely, History of the Unitarian Faith (1839), F Kanyaró, Unitarians in Hungary (1891) (both in Hungarian), E. M. Wilbur, Our Unitarian Heritage (1925)

2. In England sporadic instances of Unitarianism occurred all through the 16th century, and half a score were put to death, and many imprisoned, for "Arianism."* In the 17th century Socinian influences coming from Holland or even from Poland became widespread in the Church of England, despite the laws, but no organization existed. At length the Trinitarian Controversy at the end of the 17th century and the Arian Controversy at the beginning of the 18th century in the Church of England, made such telling attacks on the Athanasian doctrine that those that could not accept it were nevertheless allowed to remain in the Church unmolested.

While Anglicans were thus discussing the Trinity, Dissenters* were occupied with the deity of Christ, and verging toward Arianism. This raised the question whether ministers should be compelled to subscribe the Westminster Confession*. Non-subscription won, and being left free from doctrinal restraint the Presbyterian churches rapidly grew liberal, and in two generations had practically all become Unitarian in belief. A similar change took place in the Welsh and Irish churches.

Doctrinal unrest meanwhile persisted among the Anglican clergy and led to an appeal to Parliament for relief from subscription to the Articles and liturgy: it was rejected by a large majority. A single one of the petitioners (followed later by a few others) then withdrew from the Church. Theophilus Lindsey gave up his living and going to London opened in 1774 the first Unitarian chapel in England, which attracted numerous adherents and survives to this day. A more influential leader was the Unitarian Dissenter, Joseph Priestly, who as minister of large congregations at Leeds and Birmingham championed aggressive Unitarianism with great effect, and much promoted it by his controversial writings. He gave latent and timid Unitarians the courage of their convictions in promoting their cause. After he had removed to America in 1794, his successor Thomas Belsham effectively rallied and organized the forces until in 1825 the British and Foreign Unitarian Association was formed, and systematic extension work was promoted.

In the 19th century the English Unitarians long had to struggle for the removal of civil disabilities, and for possession of their old church properties, but steadily gained strength and coherence. Under the leadership of James Martineau* their thought was transformed from a cold doctrinal liberalism to a warm spiritual faith, and doctrinal peculiarities were left in the background. Their members have had marked prominence in proportion to their numbers in liberal politics, social reform, philanthropy, education and literature. Their polity is congregational, their worship often mildly liturgical. They number about 350 congregations in the British Isles and about a score more in the colonies, and they have three theological colleges.

See Henry Gow, The Unitarians (1928), S H Mellone, Liberty and Religion (1925).

3. Unitarianism in America did not derive from the similar movement in England, but arose independently of it and contemporaneously with it. With two or three exceptions it developed out of Massachusetts Congregationalism, whose original strict Calvinism began before the middle of the 18th century to be outgrown, somewhat influenced by the English liberals, both Anglican and Presbyterian. It tended toward Arian views, and was quite averse to the bald Unitarianism of Priestley and his school, with which orthodoxy strove to identify it. It laid little stress on creeds, ignored objectionable doctrines, and aimed simply to promote positive Christianity. By the end of the 18th century all the Boston ministers but one, and more than half of those in eastern Massachusetts, had thus quietly abandoned the Trinitarian position. When the orthodox attacked them for this, Channing* became their spokesman in a famous sermon on Unitarian Christianity at Baltimore in 1819, which gave them a platform to rally round; and when the orthodox denied them Christian fellowship they were forced in 1825 to organize the American Unitarian Association to promote their cause. More than a third of the old churches had become Unitarian.

The new denomination grew slowly, being averse to sectarianism or to controversy, but was bitterly attacked by the orthodox for thirty years. Aside from rejection of the Trinity, its doctrine was not defined, and difference as to various minor points long hindered effective growth, so that it was not until the organization of the National Conference in 1865 that the church was thoroughly organized for action. There was still unhappy division between conservatives and radicals, but harmony was finally achieved, preserving complete spiritual freedom without resort to the restraint of a creed. The later history of the movement has been uneventful. Attention has been centered far less on doctrinal questions than on the application of Christianity to personal and social life, political reform, philanthropy and education. Though there is general voluntary acceptance of liberal Christian doctrine, the emphasis has so far shifted from a doctrinal centre that modern Unitarianism is now characterized not so much by its beliefs as by its insistence upon the fundamental principles of entire freedom in belief, the full use of reason in religion, and generous tolerance of differences of view.

The Unitarian polity is pure Congregationalism; and church extension is managed by the American Unitarian Association in regional departments. Active congregations number about 360, and the total consistency is estimated at about 145,000. There are three schools for the training of ministers. See anti-missionary movement in the U S., Confessions, Formal of the Christian Church; Parker Cf. humanism, religious, liberal theology.

See George Willis Cooke, Unitarianism in America (1902), E. M Wilbur, Our Unitarian Heritage (1925).

E.M W.

Unitas Fratrum: See Moravian Church, the; Unity of (Bohemian) Brethren.

United American Free Will Baptist Church (Colored): A sect of "general" or Arminian Baptists among the colored people of the South. They are closely related to the white Free Will Baptists*. They have 226 churches with nearly 20,000 members

E.T.C.

United Baptists: A group of conservative Baptist churches having the same general origin and characteristics as the Regular Baptists*. Nearly all of them are in the South, more than half of the congregations and members being in Kentucky. They are generally Arminian in theology and practice "close communion" and feet washing. There are 277 churches and 27,000 members.

E.T.C.

United Brethren in Christ: Influenced by the pietistic* movement, some of the German speaking people of the middle colonies experienced "spiritual quickening" in the eighteenth century. Many became preachers of "experimental religion". After more than thirty years as leaders in this work, Philip William Otterbein* (1726-1813), of the German Reformed Church, and Martin Boehm* (1725-1812), of the Mennonites, became co-founders of a new denomination. At the first legislative conference held near Frederick, Maryland, in 1800, it was determined that the name should be "The United Brethren in Christ," that conferences should be held annually and that Otterbein and Boehm should be the first bishops of the church. Christian Newcomer* (1749-1830) became the leader of the early period of expansion westward

The General Conference is the supreme legislative body of the church It has met quadrennially since 1817. It elects bishops for four-year terms. Pastors are appointed according to the itinerant plan

The theology is Arminian*. Baptism and the Lord's Supper are recognized as sacraments but the mode of baptism and the manner of observing the supper are left to be determined by the individual. The church has been a pioneer in social advance. Anti-slavery legislation was passed in 1821, temperance, in 1841

The headquarters are in Dayton, Ohio The Bonebrake Theological Seminary is in Dayton, Ohio. The colleges are Otterbein, in Westerville, Ohio; Lebanon Valley, in Annville, Pennsylvania, Indiana Central, in Indianapolis, Indiana, York in York, Nebraska, and Shenandoah, in Dayton, Virginia.

The membership is 441,970. In the continental United States, there are 2790 organized churches with 1858 ordained ministers. Cf. Evangelical Church, the.

A W Drury, United Brethren Church History (1930); Discipline of the Church of the United Brethren in Christ (1941), S S Hough, Christian Newcomer, His Life, Journal and Achievements (1941).

W.E.R

United Christian Youth Movement: See Young People's Societies, Christian.

United Church of Canada, the: This body was formed in 1925 by the Union of the Methodist Church, the Presbyterian Church, and the Congregational Churches of Canada (and Newfoundland). The movement for union had grown out of a common desire at the beginning of the century to avoid unseemly rivalry and the waste of men and money in mission work on the rapidly expanding northern and western frontiers. The union idea had also gathered some momentum from the numerous unions effected in the halfcentury preceding by the two main families, Methodist and Presbyterian, these unions had proved to be highly beneficial. But the union of 1925 was not complete. While a few individual Methodists stood aside, and a small number of Congregational Churches, no less than a third of the Presbyterian body declined to enter the United Church

In 1925 there were approximately 600,000 communicant members in the United Church, in 1941 there were 715,651. At the latter date the Church had 3,469 ministers (about 2,750 in active service) and 7,109 preaching places. There are nearly 1,800,000 persons under pastoral oversight. These figures indicate that it is largely a church of the frontier, of country villages and the open country, and of the thinly settled expanses of the north and west. Half of the preaching places are in Home Mission territory. The people of the older parts are called to liberal giving if those in the newer parts are not to be deprived of the comfort and strength of religion.

The load was heavy from 1929 to 1939, and it is heavy still (1943).

The Church maintains Foreign Missions in India, China, Japan, Trinidad and Portuguese West Africa. The Church has three arts colleges (Sackville, N. B, Toronto, Winnipeg), and eight theological schools (Halifax, Montreal, Kingston, Toronto, Winnipeg, Saskatoon, Edmonton, Vancouver) Very few are admitted to the ministry with less than a B A and three years of theology.

Before 1925 Methodist and Presbyterian organizations were very much alike, amalgamation was not difficult. A General Council, with legislative, administrative, and judicial powers, meets biennially. There are 11 Conferences (Synods), each Conference meeting annually, and 115 Presbyteries (Districts), each Presbytery meeting from 2 to 10 times a year. The Conference ordains and appoints ministers to their charges (usually the congregation has already called them), the Presbytery inducts (installs) them.

The faith of the Church is embodied in 20 articles of doctrine (part of the Basis of Union) It was discussed fully in T B. Kilpatrick's Our Common Faith, and it has been recently declared in a somewhat less formal 2000-word Statement of Faith, (1940) The worship of the Church is regulated by a Book of Common Order (1932) and a Hymnary (1930). The law and organization of the Church is set forth in a Manual of Government (revised every two years) See theological schools, Protestant, U. S. and Canada

Some account of the beginnings may be found in E L Morrows's Church Union in Canada (1925) and C E Silcox's Church Union in Canada (1933), and of developments since in the Year Book and the (biennial) Proceedings of the General Council The offices of the Church are at 299 Queen Street West, Toronto

R.D.

United Danish Church (Lutheran): See Lutheran Church in America.

United Evangelical Church: See s v. Evangelical Church, the; Ev. Congregational Church.

United Free Church of Scotland: This was formed in 1900 by the Free Church of Scotland* and the United Presbyterian Church*. A small minority continuing the Free Church obtained a court judgment for all its property, but Parliament gave the United Free Church an equitable share. Efforts for union with the Church of Scotland*, begun in 1909, interrupted by war, then resumed, were furthered in 1921 by an act of Parliament recognizing the spiritual freedom of the established church. The union was accomplished in 1929 under the name of the Church of Scotland. See Wee Free Church.

J. R. Fleming, The Church in Scotland, 1843-1929 (2 vols., Edinburgh. 1927, 1932), J Buchan and G. A. Smith, The Kirk in Scotland, 1560-1929.

R.H.N.

United Lutheran Church in America: The largest integrated body of Lutherans in the United States and Canada, formed in 1918 by the merging of the General Synod (organized 1821), the General Council (organized 1867), and the United Synod in the South (organized 1886) Following in the tradition of its eighteenth-century patriarch, H M Muhlenberg*, this Church has led other Lutherans in its adaptation of Lutheranism to American thought and life and in its tolerant spirit toward other denominations. In its doctrinal basis, however, it is conservative, holding "the canonical Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments as the inspired word of God", accepting the three ecumenical creeds, regarding the unaltered Augsburg Confession "as a correct exhibition of the faith", and recognizing the other confessions of the Book of Concord* "as in harmony of one and the same pure Scriptural faith". Larger powers are exercised by the general organization than in any other body of American Lutherans, although the constituent "synods alone have the power of discipline" and control the theological seminaries. The United Lutheran Church is composed of 32 synods, having 3606 ordained pastors, 4065 congregations, and 1,714,-945 members. It has 15 colleges, 12 theological seminaries, 20 children's homes, 19 homes for the aged, 9 hospices, 13 hospitals, 30 inner mission agencies, 2 deaconess motherhouses. It supports 70 ordained missionaries serving a baptized membership of 212,530 in mission fields in all continents The legislative powers are vested in a biennial convention of delegates from the synods. The headquarters of the Church are in New York City, and the first President, Dr. F. H Knubel, is still in office (1944). Among the objects of the Church, as defined in its constitution, is "to cultivate co-operation among all Lutherans" and it has taken a leading part in promoting a worldwide unity of the Church. See Lutheran Church in America. T.A.K.

United Methodist Church, The: A church formed in England in 1907 by the union of the Methodist New Connexion, the Bible Christians, and the United Methodist Free Churches, all of whom had seceded at various times from the Wesleyan Methodist Church. It joined in 1932 with the parent church and the Primitive Methodists to form the Methodist Church. See Methodism. F.G.E.

United Presbyterian Church of 1847: Two secessions from the Church of Scotland* protesting against disregard of the right of congregations to call ministers (1733, 1761) grew to the Associate or "Secession" Synod (1745) and the Relief Synod (1763). In 1847 the United Secession Synod, which had developed out of the Associate body, joined with the Relief Synod to form the United Presbyterian Church. Holding the doctrinal basis common to Scottish Presbyterians, this church maintained "voluntaryism", disapproval of church establishment. It was notable for its preaching and its foreign missionary enterprise. In 1900 it united with the Free Church of Scotland* to form the United Free Church*, having then 195,596 members. See Relief Church.

J. R. Fleming, The Church in Scotland, 1843-1929 (2 vols., Edinburgh, 1927, 1932); D. Woodside, The Soul of a Scottish Church (1917). R.H.N.

United Presbyterian Church of North America: The Associate Reformed Church was formed in America in 1782 by presbyteries whose antecedents were in the Associate Synod, which originated in a secession from the Church of Scotland* in 1733, and a Reformed presbytery whose antecedents were in the Reformed Presbyterian (Covenanter*) Church of Scotland, organized in 1743. In 1858 the General Synod of the Associate Reformed Church and the Associate Synod, descending from dissenters from the 1782 union, in a joint meeting in Pittsburgh constituted the United Presbyterian Church of North America. The Westminster Confession of Faith* was adopted and also a "Judicial Testimony" protesting against slavery, secret societies, open communion and the singing of "devotional compositions" other than the Psalms The United Presbyterian Church has spread widely in the United States, chiefly among people of Scotch-Irish descent, but more than half of its membership is in Pennsylvania and Ohio. It is conspicuous for foreign missionary interest and the generous giving of its people. In practice it has modified its position regarding secret societies, communion and the use of hymns. The church has five colleges and two theological seminaries. In 1919 it adopted a new creed, the "Confessional Statement". In 1941 it had 853 churches and 187,470 members

J B Scouller, History of the United Presbyterian Church of North America (1894), American Church History Series, XI, W E McCulloch, The United Presbyterian Church and Its Work in America (1925)

R.H N

United Society of Believers in Christ's Second Coming: See communistic settlements, religious, Shaker communities.

United Zion's Children: See River Brethren.

Unity: The Unity School of Christianity in Kansas City, Missouri was founded by Charles and Myrtle Fillmore in 1889. It is related to the general movement known as New Thought* in that the ends and values sought after are essentially the same. But it is much closer to traditional Christianity than New Thought generally. Indeed it seems to be a rather conservative form of Protestant Christianity which puts its major emphasis on the characteristic New Thought ends, namely health, well-being, and prosperity.

The Unity School reports over five hundred centers and more than two million members who follow its courses of readings and studies. The Movement publishes six magazines, numerous books, and tracts without number.

Widely used books by Charles Fillmore the founder are Christian Healing; The Twelve Powers of Man, Prosperity.

C.s B.

Unity of Brethren: See Bohemian (or Czech) Brethren; Hussitism.

Universalism: The basic doctrine of Universalism centers about the belief that all men will finally be saved. This doctrine is of ancient origin and has existed among many of the schools of Christianity There are Biblical passages in both the Old and New Testaments which are interpreted as furnishing Scriptural authority for the belief Such men as Clemens, Alexandrinus, Origen, Diodorus, Theodore of Mopsuestia and others laid the foundations for the system. They taught that punishment was remedial, that the nature of God was love, and that the Divine mercy could not be satisfied with partial salvation or everlasting punishment.

The doctrine became heretical about the sixth century and was largely neglected during the Middle Ages It was revived during the latter part of the 18th century, and became wide-spread during the 19th and 20th centuries

The modern movement of Universalism originated in England, being a logical development of anti-Calvinistic teaching. It carried the Wesleyan system of free grace* to the point where the grace of God would be accepted by all. John Relly of London taught Universalism in his sermons and in a pamphlet, "Union" which was widely read John Murray, who had been a member of a Calvinistic church, then a Wesleyan, accepted the doctrine and brought it to America in 1770.

Universalism was taught in the colonies by several groups, such as mystics and anabaptists*, as well as by some individual leaders among the Congregationalists, Episcopalians, etc., and by independents. Universalist churches were organized up and down the New England coast, people coming out from orthodox churches to make up the congregations.

Hosea Ballou* early gave to the world a systematic account of Universalism in his Treatise of the Atonement (1805) in which he outlined the doctrine of Unitarianism* as the basis for his Universalism

No exact form of creed is required of believers, freedom of interpretation being guaranteed, but statements of faith have been adopted, such as the "Winchester Confession," the "Worcester Declaration," and the "Washington Statement."

The system of government of the churches is congregational The local parish is largely autonomous. It can call its own minister and make its own decisions. There are, however, several organizations with which the local parish is affiliated First, the Universalist Church of America is the parent body, meeting in biennial sessions in various cities. It has a President, a General Superintendent, Treasurer, Trustees, etc. It is a delegate body and determines general policies. The national office is at 16 Beacon Street, Boston. There are also national associations of women, youth, Sunday schools, etc., which usually meet with the General Convention and have offices at the Boston headquarters. Several academies and schools were founded between 1830 and 1880.

There are State Conventions, each with Superintendent, etc., which assist local parishes in solving their problems. There are also a few "associations" which include all the churches in a particular restricted area. See Ballou, Hosea

(2nd), Confessions, Formal of the Christian Church, Miner, A. A., Murray, John; restorationism. Also see anti-missionary movement in the U S.

Statistics of the Church are as follows:
Number of churches 488
Number of members 48,923.
Number of constituency 78,883.

Official journal The Christian Leader, a bi-weekly

Hosea Ballou, The Ancient History of Universalism (2nd ed., 1829), Richard Eddy, Universalism in America (1884).   C.R S.

universals, battle over: The question of the nature of universals has been disputed throughout ancient and mediaeval philosophy but with less emphasis in modern philosophy. It has important ramifications in theology. Generally, it is agreed that the human mind has the capacity to take a group of somewhat similar individuals and represent them under one general thought, or at least under one name Such a unity in a manifold is called a universal As to the precise nature of these universals, three chief positions have been found in the history of thought (1) *extreme realism maintains that universals are existing things or essences (or in modern terminology, objective values) apart from their ideas in finite minds and from their realization in the individuals pertaining to their class, (2) *nominalism or terminism holds that universals not only have no reality in themselves, there is no real resemblance among the individual members of their class and there is no objective basis for the concepts by which they are thought in the minds of men, (3) moderate realism maintains a position somewhere between the foregoing· there are no real and actual universals in themselves but there are actual universal ideas in the intellects of men and these concepts have an objective basis in the real similarities of individuals of real classes of things. It should be noted that many variations of these three positions are possible and have occurred historically. Plato* is the classic example of an extreme realist. his Ideas or Intelligible Forms are perfect archetypes metaphysically and logically prior to the "many" individuals participating in them. Thus, there is one perfect "treeness", or pattern of tree, and all individual trees share in some way in its nature. The Neo-Platonists* (Plotinus, Porphyry) introduced the variation which would make these Ideas thoughts in the Divine Mind. In this they were followed by the Christian Fathers (Augustine, John Damascene). John Scottus Eriugena (9th c.), Remigius of Auxerre (9th c.), Wm. of Champeaux* (11th c.), the School of Chartres* (12th c.) and J. Duns Scotus* (13th-14th c.) supported various degrees of extreme realism during the middle ages. With the revival of Platonism in the Renaissance* (Marsiglio Ficino*, the Mirandolas, Nicholas of Cusa*, the Cambridge Platonists*) this form of realism appears again in the 15th and 16th centuries. Nominalism is found in an embryonic state in the sensistic theories of knowledge of the Stoics and Epicureans, possibly in some of the logical treatises of Aristotle*, but it reached its peak in the 11th c, in the dialectics of Peter Abailard, and again appears with Wm of Ockham and J. Buridan in the 14th c Many professors of theology in the 14th and 15th c. were nominalistic Moderate Realism is best represented in ancient thought by the metaphysics of Aristotle Avicenna (11th c.), Averroes (12th c.), and St. Thomas Aquinas (13th c.) are outstanding exponents of this view. It has remained the generally accepted teaching in Catholic philosophy. Until the contemporary period, modern thought has been largely nominalistic, but its pre-occupation with problems of knowledge has made classification from this point of view very difficult. Hegel*, for instance, seems to have tended toward extreme realism, not because of his idealism (for idealists can be and frequently are nominalists) but because of his emphasis on the concrete universal and lack of regard for the individual. In the twentieth century there have been noteworthy approaches to some form of realism. This is true of Santayana's* theory of essences, of Whitehead's* metaphysics, and of many contemporary axiologists who think of values* in the objective sense.

One's position in regard to the nature of universals affects one's theology in many points, but two chief items may be mentioned In the doctrine of the Divine Trinity*, the extreme realist may tend to emphasize the distinction of the Divine Persons From Boethius* (5th c.) onward the theological definition of person is modified by the amount of reality which is granted to substance The same may be said about Divine relations Nominalists, on' the other hand, incline to a minimization of such distinctions. The other great point of contact is found in the doctrine of the Eucharist There, it is evident that realism suggests a realistic, "fundamentalist" interpretation, and nominalism usually brings about a symbolical view of transubstantiation*. See Scholasticism.

The literature of the problem of universals is very extensive. Consult M De Wulf, History of Medieval Philosophy, transl by Messenger (3rd Eng. ed, 1935), 2 vols, and F Ueberweg, Grundriss der Geschichte der Philosophie, V Bande (Berlin, 1924-1928) for bibliography.   V.J.B.

unleavened bread: The bread eaten by Jews on the Passover* holiday to commemorate the exodus from Egypt, when the Israelites in their haste could not let their dough rise and baked the bread in the unleavened state.   B Z.B.

Unmoved Mover: See Aristotle and Aristotelianism.

Upanishads: The basic philosophic texts of Hinduism*, upon which all the orthodox schools of Hindu philosophy are supposed to rest. They are writings which record the speculations of the Hindu sages upon the nature of the world and of ultimate reality and how man may find salvation.* There are thirteen principal Upanishads, most of which are early, but there are many others from later periods of Indian history. The thirteen best known are Brihad Āranyaka, Chāndogya, Aitareya, Kena, Mundaka, Isā, Taittirīya, Svetās-vatara, Prasna, Maitrayana, Katha, Kaushītaki and Māndūkya.

S Radhakrishnan, Indian Philosophy (London, 1923), vol I, R E. Hume, Thirteen Principal Upanishads (1921)   C S B

Upright, the: See forgeries.

urim and thummim: The Urim and Thummim were objects attached to the breastplate of the High Priest* (Ex 28 30) and used by him to ascertain the will of God on questions of national importance.   (Num 27 21).   The exact nature of these objects is unknown for they disappeared at a very early date (Ezra, 2 63).   See divination.   E B.—L.F.

Ursinus, Zacharias: (1534-1583) One of the two authors of the Heidelberg Catechism*, published in 1562, under the direction of Elector Frederick III of the Palatinate, surnamed The Pious.   This influential symbol of the Reformed faith owes its mild Calvinism mainly to the erudition of the scholarly Ursinus, a member of the faculty of the University of Heidelberg, while its fervent piety and simplicity of language reflect the genius of Olevianus, its co-author, who was a popular preacher in Heidelberg.

K. Sudhoff, Olevianus und Ursinus (Elberfeld, 1857).   T.F.H.

Ursula, Saint: A virgin martyred at Cologne sometime before the fourth century.   Details of her life and martyrdom are lost to us, and their place has been taken by several legendary accounts. None of these have convincing authority.

C V.

Ursulines: A Catholic order of religious women, founded by St. Angela de Merici in Brescia, Italy in 1535, for educating young women.   The first female teaching order, it soon opened convents in Germany and France.   American foundations were begun in Quebec (1639) and New Orleans (1727).   C.V.

Ushabti: Ancient Egyptian glazed figurine* in the shape of a mummy, placed in the tomb and expected to cultivate the fields for the deceased in the next world.   R.H.P.

Ushas, Usas: Vedic goddess of the dawn, the only goddess of importance in the Vedic pantheon. She is celebrated in 21 hymns in the Rig-Veda. She is beautiful, gracious, and distinctly feminine in character.   Sometimes regarded as mother, at other times as husband of the sun god Surya.

C.S.B.

Ussher, James: (1581-1656) From 1625 the Archbishop of Armagh and primate of Ireland, returning to England for literary work in 1640. He was one of the most learned Reformed theologians of his time and propounded the chronology which was later inserted in the margin of the King James Version of the Bible, according to which the Creation was assigned to 4004 B C utilitarianism: Utilitarianism or universalistic hedonism*, affirms as moral standard the extension of the most possible pleasure and least pain among all sentient beings.   Pleasure and happiness are used as practically synonymous terms   Jeremy Bentham*, James Mill, and John Stuart Mill* were leaders of the movement, also then known as Philosophical Radicalism, during the first part of the nineteenth century.   They believed psychological hedonism* to be self evident, and endeavored to show that if individuals intelligently seek what will bring most pleasure to themselves (egoistic hedonism) they will be led through the operation of various sanctions to promote, the general happiness*.   They actively supported the social and political reforms of the time.   During the latter part of the 19th century Henry Sidgwick* was the ablest interpreter of theoretical Utilitarianism, while Herbert Spencer* and Leslie Stephen gave Utilitarianism an evolutionary application.   All the Utilitarians thus far mentioned defended individualism, believing that every man is best judge of what will bring most pleasure to himself, and so ought to be allowed freedom of initiative, except when his conduct will be detrimental to others.   James MacKaye, however, in the 20th century in Americanized Socialism (1918) gave Utilitarianism a socialistic slant, claiming that collectivistic measures will best promote universal happiness.   Hastings Rashdall* regarded his own view in ethics as "Ideal Utilitarianism".   Cf. Tucker, Abraham.

C T C

E. A. Albee, History of English Utilitarianism (1902) ; Leslie Stephen, The Utilitarians (1900), 3 vols ; Elie Halevy, The Growth of Philosophical Radicalism (Eng. transl., 1928).   W K.W.

utilitarianism, theological: Utilitarianism is a theory of ethics that considers moral obligation and moral judgment in the light of their capacity to produce happiness for everybody.   Theological utilitarianism regards the common good as the will of God.   See Paley, Wm.   W G H.

Utnapishtim or Per-napishtim (Haupt).   The Babylonian Noah.   The story is told of his rôle in the Deluge* in Tablet XI of the Gilgamesh* narrative.   Translated with critical notes and commentary by Paul Haupt in E. Schrader: Die Keilinschriften und das Alte Testament 3rd ed (Berlin, 1908).   P.G.M.

Utopia: See communistic settlements, More, Thomas.

Utraquists: Idem, Calixtenes.   See Bohemian Brethren; Hussitism.

V

Vāc: Vedic goddess of speech, in India

C.S.B.

Vacherot, Etienne: (1809-1897) A director of the Ecole Normale Superieure. He was a convinced naturalist who did not despise metaphysical inquiry. An irreconcilable and unsatisfactory dualism in which the real and the ideal are set against one another is typical in his thought. The world for him is unity, eternal and infinite, but lacking perfection. The ideal, perfection, is incompatible with reality. Thus the real is not at all ideal, and the ideal has no reality. God is for humanity the category of the ideal. For Vacherot the concept of God arises in human consciousness from a combination of the ideas of the infinite and of perfection.

La métaphysique et la science (Paris, 1858), 3 vols.; La religion (Paris, 1868), Le nouveau spiritualisme (Paris, 1884).

H.H.

Vaicesika, Vaiseshika: One of the six traditional schools of Indian philosophy, which sets forth an atomic theory. See Hinduism.

C.S.B.

Vaihinger, Hans: (1852-1933) He was professor of philosophy at the University of Halle, Germany. His main work The Philosophy of "As-if" is a system of theoretical, practical and religious fictions of mankind upon the basis of an idealistic positivism. For him religious ideas were beautiful myths and useful fictions, even though knowledge as such has no real truth value. His "as-if" point of view triumphed particularly in religious philosophy. Acknowledging the aesthetic and ethical value of religious fictions, his philosophical viewpoint was a solution and liberation for those who inwardly and outwardly felt pressed by the inert formulas of orthodoxy.

The Philosophy of "As-if" (London, 1924), F Lindstaedt, Grundwissenschaftliche Kritik der Hauptbegriffe von Vaihingers Philosophie des Als-Ob (Greifswald, 1914); H. Hegenwald, Gegenwartsphilosophie und christliche Religion (Leipzig, 1913); J. Spickerbaum, Das Vaihingersche Als-Ob und die Methode der Formsprache in Religion und Theologie (Munchen, 1922).

H.H

Vaisnavism: See Vishnu; Vishnuism.

vaisya: The third of the four traditional castes of India, the lowest of the twice-born. Supposed to include the merchant-farmer class of society.

Formed according to the myth (Rig Veda X, 90, 12) from the thighs of purusha* or cosmic man.

C.S.B.

Valentine Day, St.: The early martyrologies mention three Saint Valentines on February 14th. Many believe that the one especially honored is Valentine, the holy priest of Rome who ministered to the martyrs in the persecution of Claudius and who was himself beheaded by him on February 14th, about the year 270.

That Saint Valentine is the patron of lovers is easily understood since on his feast, about the middle of the month, birds begin to mate. And lovers chose the day as their festival and began to call one another "valentine." Legend attributes to him the power of healing lovers' quarrels.

Another explanation states that the pagan youths had a lewd superstitious custom of drawing the names of girls in honor of the goddess Februata Juno, whose festival was celebrated on the middle of the month. Several pastors substituted the names of saints in the lists for this day.

Cf. Butler, Lives of the Saints; Catholic Encyclopedia, vol XV, p 254

S.C.

Valentinian decree: See clergy.

Valentinus: Gnostic* teacher in Rome, c. 135-165. One of ablest minds of his age. Valentinian gnosticism has threefold division of personality instead of the more usual two.

K.H.C.

value: (Lat., valere, to be strong or well) Whatever is desired, liked, esteemed or approved. Synonym: good. Antonyms: evil*, disvalue. Values are to be distinguished from ideals. A value is the actual experiencing of what is liked; an ideal is the definition or concept of what is (or ought to be) experienced as a value. Valuation is the ascription of value (likability) to an experience. Evaluation is judging a value by an ideal of what ought to be (a standard, a norm). Psychologically, value has been viewed as pleasure (hedonism: Epicurus, Meinong), fulfillment of purpose, desire or interest (voluntarism· Aristotle, Spinoza, Ehrenfels, Perry), rational will (formalism: Stoics, Kant, Royce), integration of personality (idealism, perfectionism, synopsis Plato, Hegel, T. H. Green, Bosanquet).

Values are either intrinsic or instrumental. Intrinsic values are prized as ends, they are enjoyed for their own sake, independently of what they may lead to   Instrumental values are means to or causes of intrinsic values. All intrinsic values are also instrumental, although sometimes instrumental to evil, as well as to good   Most instrumental values may also be valued intrinsically. Thus the distinction is relative, not absolute, it is largely a difference in point of view. However, everything external to a mind is purely instrumental, for intrinsic value exists only as an actual personal consciousness of liking or interest, a personal enjoyment. Hence, all natural things, processes and events, and all economic goods and processes, in so far as they are not within the experience of a mind, are purely instrumental values.

The intrinsic values may be classified, in order of increasing value (breadth, inclusiveness, coherence): bodily (the joys of health and bodily activity—not the physical existence of the body), recreational (play, humor, amusement), work (usefulness, productive employment), associational (co-operation or sharing with individuals or groups), character (a rational will, loyal to what is believed best), aesthetic (beautiful, sublime, tragic, comic, etc.), intellectual (thinking, truth-seeking, truth-finding), religious (the holy, experiences·of worship, co-operation with the divine, etc.).   The intrinsic values are interdependent; they "interpenetrate" (Everett) or coalesce. Hence the ideal of intrinsic value is a personal-social life in which the unique contribution of each value is realized in harmonious interrelation with all the other values.

Experience moves from empirical values as given (value-claims, apparent values) to "true" or "ideal" values (a coherent and critical organization of value experience)

All philosophers hold to the subjectivity of value in the sense that value is primarily personal experience. Idealists and many realists (Platonic, scholastic, religious) hold also to the objectivity of value, or, better, of the ideals to which true values should conform. The objective ideals are cosmic norms (Platonic Ideas) or purposes. See axiology, conservation of value, ethics, perfect; summum bonum.

See· C. von Ehrenfels, System der Werttheorie (1902), W. M. Urban, Valuation (1909), B. Bosanquet, The Principle of Individuality and Value (1912); W G Everett, Moral Values (1918); E. S Brightman, Religious Values (1925); R. B. Perry, A General Theory of Value (1926), J. Laird, The Idea of Value (1929); J. Hessen, Wertphilosophie (1937); J. Dewey, Theory of Valuation (Int. Enc. of Unified Science, II, 1939), art. "Valor" in J. Ferrater Mora, Diccionario de la Filosofia (1941).   E.S.B.

vampire: A ghost who sucks the blood of the living.   A normal person might become a vampire unwillingly if a cat should chance to jump over his corpse before it was buried. The superstition seems to have originated in central Europe in the middle ages.   The word itself is probably Slavic.   P G M.

Vanir: Norse mythol, name of a group of gods, including Njord, Frey, Freyja, and possibly others who dwell in Vanaheim. Deities of wealth, fruitfulness, commerce, they were supposed to have quarrelled with the other gods led by Odin*, a myth possibly reflecting the opposition of rival cults.   R.B B.

Varuna: Sky god of Vedic Hinduism.   He was the guarantor of rita, the God of law and order in the world   His most notable feature was his concern for the moral law.   He was all-seeing; could discern even the inner heart of man, he was the punisher of sin, but was also gracious to forgive.   Noblest of all the Vedic divinities, possessing all the qualities that might have led to his supremacy as an ethical, monotheistic deity, Varuna's power and influence waned until he became a relatively unimportant Lord of the waters. Ahura Mazda in Persia stems from the same original Aryan divinity.   See Aryan religion.
                                    C.S B.

Vāsudeva: A variant name of Vishnu and of Krishna.   C.S.B.

Vatican: The official residence of the Pope* in Vatican City. It comprises the papal apartments, the apartments of prelates, officials, and staff, apartments of state, numerous chapels, the famous Vatican Library, archives of the Catholic Church, five museums of antiquities, two art galleries, a polyglot printing press, and an astronomical observatory.   See Papal States.   C.V.

Vatican Council: The Twentieth Ecumenical* Council of the Catholic Church. Pius IX* announced in 1867 his intention of convoking a general council, the first since Trent   When a report circulated that a definition of papal infallibility* was expected of the Council, an anti-infallibility campaign was started under the leadership of Döllinger*, a leading German historian. About seven hundred bishops were present at the opening on December 8, 1869.   The dogmatic constitution "Dei filius" on creation, revelation, faith, and the relationship of faith and reason was promulgated on April 24, 1870.   The debate on papal prerogatives was lively and lasted from May to July.   A large majority held that a definition of infallibility was in order.   A notable minority, consisting principally of German, Austro-Hungarian, French and North American bishops opposed such a step.   The members of this minority with but few exceptions were not opposed to the doctrine but considered its definition inopportune.   The majority prevailed and the dogmatic constitution "Pastor aeternus" was promulgated on July 18, 1870.   In it in addition to papal infallibility, the doctrine of the primacy was formulated.   With the outbreak of the Franco-Prussian War the membership of the Council dwindled and on October 20, 1870 the meetings were suspended after only a fraction of the program had been completed. The infallibility decree occasioned the schism of the Old Catholics*. See canons of various churches, pope.

C Butler, The Vatican Council (1930), 2 vols
E.A R.

Vatke, Wilhelm: (1806-1882) Professor of theology at the University of Berlin. As a liberal theologian he developed the tools in the methodical improvement of historical criticism. He had to struggle for a long time against the opposition of orthodox theology, especially of E. W. Hengstenberg's* He not only took sympathetic cognizance of natural science, but also exhaustively treated the psychological appearance of religion in human self consciousness.

Die Religion des Alten Testaments (Berlin, 1835), Die menschliche Freiheit in ihrem Verhältnis zur Sünde und zur göttlichen Gnade (Berlin, 1841), G S Preiss, Historische kritische Einleitung ins alte Testament (Bonn, 1886), Religionsphilosophie oder allgemeine philosophische Theologie nach Vorlesungen (Bonn, 1888), S H Benecke, Wilhelm Vatke in seinem Leben und seinen Schriften (Bonn, 1883)
H H

Vaughan, Henry: (1622-1695) English poet, noteworthy for a collection of religious poems, Silex Scintillans (1650-55), written largely under the influence of George Herbert*.
L.W.C.

Vāyu (Vata): There are two Vedic words for wind, Vāyu and Vāta, and both are used also for the wind god in Vedic Hinduism. Vayu is said to be used more commonly as the god name, though in the Rig-Veda there is but one entire hymn to Vāyu and two to Vāta.
C.S.B.

Vazquez, Gabriel: (1549-1604) Spanish Jesuit and theologian, whose works are distinguished for their critical acumen, historical information, and boldness of view.
E.A.R.

vectorial psychology: See psychology, schools of.

Vedānta: The best known and most popular formulation of Indian philosophy. One of the traditional six philosophic schools. As expounded by Shankara*, (circa 800 A.D.) in his commentary on the Vedānta Sutras, there is but one real, Brahman. The phenomenal world is illusion. It has only seeming reality, as have also the apparent individual selves of the world. There is truly but one self, Brahman-Ātman. Ignorance of the oneness of the self with Brahman* is the cause of samsara* or rebirth which is also only illusory. Knowledge then of the identity of the soul with Brahman is the key to salvation.* Who knows, "that, soul art thou," is emancipated from the wheel of existence. He has attained *moksha

Shankara, it is true, recognized a lower as well as a higher knowledge. On the lower plane, Brahman becomes the personal Brahma and by the techniques of sacrifice and worship union with Brahma may be achieved. But it is only a temporary salvation. Final emancipation comes only by the knowledge of identity with Brahman.

As interpreted by Rāmānuja* about 1100 A.D.

also in a commentary on the Vedanta Sutras it becomes a qualified monism, Visishtadvaita The phenomenal world and individual souls have real existence, though apart from Brahman they could not do so They are the body of Brahman. Ramanuja believed in the continuing existence of emancipated souls, and salvation or moksha was attained through *bhakti or the way of faith and love toward God.

S Radhakrishnan, Indian Philosophy (London, 1923, 1927), 2 vols , Also S DasGupta, History of Indian Philosophy (Cambridge, 1922, 1932), vols I and II, Paul Deussen, The Vedanta (1912)
C S.B

Vedas: Ancient scriptures of India held to be sruti or the very revealed word of divinity. They go back to the early centuries of Aryan migration into India, some of the hymns doubtless having been in use before the arrival in India. There are four Vedas, the basic Rig-Veda upon which the remaining three depend to a considerable degree, the Sama-Veda* or Chant-Veda, the Yajur-Veda* and the late Atharva-Veda*. Theoretically the later Hindu sacred writings serve but to elucidate further the teachings of the Vedas. Actually they are but little used by modern Hindus save the Arya-Samajists who represent a "back to the Vedas movement". Dyananda Sarasvati*, the founder, evolved an interpretation of the sacred texts which finds in them the all sufficient source of all that is of value in his version of Hinduism* which is essentially monotheistic.

So sacred were the Vedas at the time the Laws of Manu* took form that no low caste man might hear or recite them under penalty of having molten metal poured into his ears or his tongue cut out.
C S.B.

Vedic religion: See Hinduism.

Vendidad: A priestly code in the Avesta*, prescribing certain purifications, penances, and expiations. Beginning with the creation, the golden age, and the flood, it deals with agriculture, burial, civil and penal law, purifications after contact with a corpse and other impurities, commendation of the dog and of the cock, etc.
R.H.P.

veneration of relics: See images; relic.

veneration of saints: See saints, veneration of; ancestor worship; hero worship; icon; patron saints.

vengeance: See asylum, blood revenge; law.

venial sin: See mortal and venial sin, sin.

Venus: An Italic goddess of gardens, who was identified with the Greek Aphrodite, goddess of love and beauty. Almost all the myths about Venus consequently belong to Aphrodite, whose character was much less simple.
P.G.M.

Veronica, Saint: (Incorrectly derived from verum ikon, true image) A legendary woman, who gradually became associated with a famous picture of Christ that belongs to the twelfth century. Both Veronica and the picture were woven into the story of Christ's passion Traces of the legend mount to the fourth century, but without connection with the passion. The association with the passion comes only in the late Middle Ages.   c.v.

verse division of the Bible: While the Vulgate was divided into chapters early in the thirteenth century by Stephen Langton*, the further division of the chapters into verses was begun by Robert Estienne (Stephanus, the Latin form of his name, used in publication), the French printer, in his fourth edition (very rare) of the Greek N.T, 1551, in which he broke the text into 7959 verse paragraphs This was followed by William Whittingham at Geneva in his revision of the N T. in 1557, and in the Geneva Bible of 1560 was extended to the O T. and the Apocrypha. See chapters and verses of the Bible   E.J.G.

versions of the Bible, ancient: The translations of the Bible into other languages provide valuable help to the student who seeks the exact form of the original wording of the scriptures. In the case of the O T, early versions compensate somewhat for the lack of early Hebrew manuscripts*. In the N T., the ancient translations increase our knowledge of its transmission by indicating the geographical location of particular forms of the text. These versions came into being spontaneously, to serve missionary needs or the devotional life of those who did not know the original language of the scriptures. The earliest and freest translations were in time replaced by "official" church versions.

I. Versions of the Old Testament. The important ancient translations of the O.T. in their approximate chronological order follow

1. The Septuagint (Greek) is the most important of all versions of the O.T. Made in Alexandria by various translators who worked from about the 3rd to the first century B C, its parts vary widely in linguistic level and degree of literalness. Origen's edition (The Hexapla*) led to the corruption of the Greek by the Hebrew. The common symbol for this version is LXX*, more than 2000 of its manuscripts (from the 2nd to the 16th century) have been catalogued.

2. The Old Latin, so-called to distinguish it from the later Latin vulgate, in existence at the end of the 2nd century A.D. This version is relatively unimportant in the O.T. since it is a translation from the LXX and exists only in fragmentary manuscripts

3. The Peshitta* (Syriac) was the standard O.T. of Syrian Christians; it probably is as old as the 2nd century and was made from the Hebrew. However it was later revised by the Septuagint text, which diminishes its usefulness somewhat.

4. The Syro-Hexaplar (Syriac) was translated from Origen's edition of the LXX in 617 A.D. by Bishop Paul of Tella, who preserved the critical notations of Origen's Greek text. By this means, scholars are able to remove much of the corruption of post-Origen Septuagint manuscripts.

This version, therefore, is of great value in the study of the Septuagint

5. Four Coptic (Egyptian) versions of the O.T exist. The oldest of these, the Sahidic or Thebaic, was made in Southern Egypt from the LXX in the 2nd century. It aids in attaining a form of the Greek text older than Origen The Bohairic or Memphitic was made in Northern Egypt at least a century or two later. We have but a few fragments of the Fayumic and Akhmimic versions of the O T.

6 The Latin Vulgate was made by Jerome* toward the end of the 4th century. Jerome made three translations of the Psalter, each one closer to the Hebrew, but it was the second, not the third of these, that won its way into the official vulgate Throughout the area of the Protestant O T Jerome translated from the Hebrew, and wished to omit the apocryphal* books entirely, but he did translate two of them (Judith and Tobit), and the others were added later. This Latin Vulgate became the commonly accepted Bible of the West through the Middle Ages, it exists in as many as 8000 manuscripts. In general Jerome's version is a witness to the Massoretic Hebrew text (see Masorah), and gains in value from its position as the earliest extensive witness to this form of the text

7 Minor versions of the O T. Under this heading may be grouped the Greek versions other than the LXX, and the Gothic, Ethiopic, and Armenian Greek versions were made about the 2nd century A D. by Aquila, Symmachus, and Theodotion, the first being closest to the Hebrew, and all being included in Origen's Hexapla Only fragments remain. The Ethiopic, Gothic, and Armenian were made from the LXX about the 4th century A.D. and are extant today.

II Versions of the New Testament.

1. The Old Latin version of the N T. originated by the end of the 2nd century, probably in Africa, and exists in at least two forms, which are usually called the African and the European Latin. The "Itala" of older studies was shown by Burkitt to be Jerome's Vulgate. The Old Latin is of primary importance in the study of the text of the N.T. The "African" was used by Cyprian*.

2. The Diatessaron* was a harmony of the gospels made by Tatian* about 160 A.D. The recent discovery of one page of it in a Greek manuscript of the 3rd century in Syria strengthens the hypothesis that it was made in Greek and translated into Syriac. Aside from this leaf it is known in an Armenian version of St. Ephrem's commentary and less accurately in an Arabic translation recently edited by Marmardji.

3. The Old Syriac, so-called to distinguish it from the Peshitta, exists in two manuscripts in variant forms. These codices, the Sinaitic and the Curetonian Syriac MSS, belong in the front rank of textual witnesses. The text they represent is probably no later than 200 A.D. and can be assigned to Syria with certainty.

4. Five Egyptian (Coptic) versions of the N.T. are known today. The oldest of these is the Sahidic from Southern Egypt. It may be as early as the 2nd century A.D. The Bohairic version from Northern Egypt was evidently the dominant version of the later period since it has the richest manuscript attestation. Known only in part are the Fayumic, Akhmimic, and Middle Egyptian versions, some of these may be older than the Bohairic or as old as the Sahidic; the Akhmimic, for example, exists in two fourth century manuscripts. The Bohairic is well and favorably known for its support of Hort's Neutral Text; all the other versions listed this far have strong non-Neutral elements.

5. The Armenian version was made at least by 400 A.D. from a source whose text was close to that of MSS Theta, 565, and 700. The Old Georgian version was made from the Armenian and shares its quality, a quality which Streeter called Caesarean.

6. The Latin Vulgate was a revision of the Old Latin made by Jerome after 380 A.D. In the gospels, Jerome seems to have used a Greek manuscript of the type of Sinaiticus; in Acts, one similar to Alexandrinus. (See Codex Sinaiticus; Codex Alexandrinus.) The text of Jerome's revision is the official text of the Roman Church since the action of the Council of Trent* in 1546.

7. Minor Versions of the N.T.· The Gothic, Ethiopic, and Syriac Peshitta versions are definitely secondary in origin and importance Originating in the 4th to the 5th centuries, they are close to that form of the Greek text which Hort called Syrian. Of the minor Syriac versions, the Harklean made in 616 A.D. is an important non-Neutral witness, and the Palestinian lectionary of the 13th century contains a small percentage of early readings. See translations of the Bible.
A. General. K. Lake, The Text of the New Testament (6th ed., rev. by Silva New, London, Rivingtons, 1928) ; L. Vaganay, An Introduction to the Textual Criticism of the New Testament (trans. by B. V Miller, London, 1937) , I. M. Price, The Ancestry of our English Bible (9th ed., 1934) ; F G. Kenyon, Our Bible And the Ancient Manuscripts (4th ed , 1940) ; H. W. Robinson, The Bible in its Ancient and English Versions (Oxford, 1940) ; C. R. Gregory, Textkritik des Neuen Testamentes, vol. II (Leipzig, 1902).
B. By versions. (1) The Septuagint: A. Rahlfs, Septuaginta (Stuttgart, Privilegierte Württembergische Bibelanstalt, 1935) ; A. E. Brooke and N. McLean, The Old Testament in Greek according to the Text of Codex Vaticanus (Cambridge, 1906-) ; see the various Septuaginta Studien of the Göttingen Septuaginta Unternehmung. (2) Old Latin: Adolf Jülicher, Itala, Das Neue Testament in Altlateinischer Ueberlieferung, Vol. I, Matthäus Evangelium, Vol II, Marcus Evangelium (Berlin, 1938, 1940). (3) Latin Vulgate· A. Gasquet, Biblia Sacra iuxta Latinam Vulgatum Versionem (Rome: Vatican, 1926-) ; J. Wordsworth and H I. White, Nouum Testamentum Domini nostri Iesu Christi latine, secundum editionem Sancti Hieronymi ad codicum manuscriptorum fidem recensuit (Oxford, 1889-). (4) Syriac Diatessaron: M. J Lagrange, Introduction a l'étude du Nouveau Testament. Manuel de critique textuelle du Nouveau Testament II. Critique rationelle (Paris, 1935), pp. 184-202 ; O P. Marmardji, Diatessaron de Tatien (Beirut, Imprimerie Catholique, 1935). (5) The Old Syriac· F C. Burkitt, Evangelion da-Mepharreshe (Cambridge, 1904) (6) The Egyptian (Coptic) versions· Sahidic—G Horner, The Coptic Version of the New Testament in the Southern Dialect (Oxford, 1911-1924) ; H. Thompson, The Coptic Version of the Acts of the Apostles and the Pauline Epistles in the Sahidic Dialect (Cambridge, 1932) Bohairic—G. Horner, The Coptic Version of the New Testament in the Northern Dialect otherwise called Memphitic and Bohairic (Oxford, 1895-1905). General articles and other dialects—A Vaschalde, "Ce qui a été publié des Versions coptes de la Bible," Revue Biblique (1919-1922) , Le Muséon (1930-1933) ; Jean Simon in Le Muséon (1941) , H Thompson, The Gospel of St John according to the Earliest Coptic Ms. (London, 1924) (7) and (8) Armenian and Old Gregorian S Lyonnet in M J. Lagrange, Critique Textuelle (Paris, 1935) (9) Syriac Peshitta Pusey-Gwilliam, Tetra-euangelium Sanctum iuxta simplicem syrorum versionem (Oxford, 1901) , The New Testament in Syriac (London, 1905-1920). (10) The Syro-Hexaplar· A M Ceriani, Codex syro-hexaplaris ambrosianus photolithographice editus (Milan Ambrosian Library, 1874) (11) Gothic W Streitberg, Die Gotische Bibel (2nd ed., Heidelberg, Winter, ,1919) ; C. W S Friedrichsen, The Gothic Version of the Gospels (Oxford, 1926) (12) Ethiopic see C. R Gregory's Textkritik.　　　　　　　　　　　　　　　　K C.C.

verstehungspsychologie: See psychology, schools of.

vespers: The early evening hour of the Divine Office*. See evensong.　　　　　　　　　　　E.R.H.

Vesta: Chief of the Roman household divinities, perhaps originally the hearth-life, ignis in foco. The significance of the hearth for warmth and food is central. The hearth-fire of the king's house later became the "Temple"of Vesta, and after the kings were banished, the place of his daughters, guardians of the fire, was taken by Vestal Virgins, officially appointed by the state. Cf. Hestia.　　　　　　　　　　　　　　P.G.M.

Vestal Virgins: Guardians of the perpetual fire in the Atrium of Vesta. At first four in number, but later six. Their service lasted for thirty years (ca. 6-36) during which time they were forbidden to marry. They had many royal prerogatives, for example, lictors preceded them on the streets and even the highest magistrates made way; they had reserved seats at public games, and if a criminal on the way to execution encountered a Vestal, he was automatically pardoned and set free.

　　　　　　　　　　　　　　　　　　P.G.M.

Vestiarian controversy: A controversy over clerical dress in sixteenth century England. The initial phase occurred in 1550 when John Hooper objected to the requirement in the new ordinal prepared by Cranmer that candidates for ordination appear in white vestments. The controversy was revived in 1564 when Elizabeth sought to enforce uniformity of clerical dress.　　W.S.H.

vestments: Christian vestments are a particular example of a widespread custom of retaining in ceremonial use (civic or religious) styles of clothing otherwise discarded. They have developed further in church use, and serve to emphasize the office rather than the man, to express the dignity of worship, and to preserve historic continuity. The chief vestments come from the Roman daily dress of the 1st century—a tunic and cloak—which after the disuse of the toga was worn on official occasions as well. Since the adoption of trousers about the 7th century these garments survive as alb* and chasuble (late Latin casula, little house). Napkins carried first for use, then for ornament, became the stole and maniple. In the East the chasuble is open in front, and often worn without alb outside of the Eucharist. In the West it is open at the side (in modern usage often much curtailed), and is the primary eucharistic vestment. For other services vestments derived from the alb are worn—surplice*, cotta, or rochet. The monastic habit was similarly formalized from workman's dress, from monastic sources comes the cope, an ornamented cloak worn for various solemn functions. In the later Middle Ages hoods or capes worn over the surplice for convenience developed into insignia—hence the tippet and hood of Anglican clergy, the chimere of Anglican and mozetta or mantellettum of Roman Bishops Most Protestants abandoned vestments, though Scandinavian and some other Lutherans retained the alb and chasuble. But the gown commonly worn by the professional classes in the 16th century became in effect a vestment, about 1900 the frock coat started on a similar development, but the gown or some of the older vestments are now often used. In England vestments were retained in principle at the Reformation, but in practice all except the surplice and cope were disused until the 19th century. See ritualism.

   J Braun S J, Die liturgische Gewandung (1907), P Dearmer, The Ornaments of the Ministers (1908) vestry: 1) A room attached to a church in which the vestments, altar ornaments, sacramental vessels and parish register are kept, it is the place of vesting (vestiarium) the clergy, 2) It is also used as the place of meeting of the parish council, also called the Vestry. The powers of the Vestry are the control of parish funds, authorization of changes in or repair of the fabric of the church, election of certain officers (including the vestry clerk). Vestries in England also retained certain civil powers, e.g., control of poor law arrangements, from the reign of Elizabeth down to the beginning of the nineteenth century.
                                                    E R H

                                                    F.W.B.

viaticum: The Holy Communion administered to a person at the point of death, not to be confused with the sacrament of Extreme Unction*.
                                                    A.C.

vicar: In English Ecclesiastical law*, the priest of a parish the tithes of which are owned by the bishop*, a spiritual corporation or a layman, any incumbent of a benefice* who is not a rector*. In America in the Episcopal Church, the priest in charge of a chapel within a parish, or in charge of a parish of which the bishop is the rector.
                                                    T.J.B.

vicar apostolic: Formerly a bishop* who was delegated by the Pope to have certain jurisdictional authority outside his diocese. Now in the Roman Catholic Church 1) a prelate* commissioned to administer vacant sees or to discharge the functions of a disabled diocesan, or 2) in certain missionary countries a titular bishop delegated by the Pope for the government of the Church there.
                                                    T.J.B.

Vicar of Christ: The Pope*, a title that refers to the doctrine that the Pope is representative of Christ as head of the church on earth.
                                                    T.J.B.

vicar-general: In the Church of England* a layman, chancelor to the Archbishop of Canterbury or York, who acts as his deputy in certain legal matters such as, institution to benefices*, provincial appointments to the episcopate, and marriages. In the Roman Catholic Church* the deputy of a bishop in jurisdictional matters; the name after Trent for the archdeacon*.   T.J.B.

vicarious suffering: See atonement in Christianity, sacrifice, salvation.

Victor, Saint, mystics of: See mystics of Saint Victor.

vidhi: A rule or formula, sacred precept or scripture   P.G.M.

Vienne, Council of: The Fifteenth Ecumenical* Council of the Catholic Church (1311-1312) was called by Clement V to treat of the suppression of the Knights Templar*, a crusade, the reform of morals, and the defense of ecclesiastical liberty. The acts of the council have disappeared almost entirely. It refused to condemn the Templars unheard, voted money for a crusade, condemned the errors of Peter John Olivi, and issued reform decrees.   E.A.R.

vigil: (Lat., vigilia, night watch) Originally the night office of festivals (see matins), later the penitential observance of the day before certain festivals   E.R.H.

Vinaya School: See Buddhist Terminology.

Vincent de Paul, St.: (1581-1660) French priest, founder of the Congregation of Priests of the Mission (Vincentians or Lazarists), of the Sisters of Charity*, and of the Ladies of Charity. In the revival of Catholicism in seventeenth century France, there is no brighter name than that of this poor shepherd boy who became the father of the poor, a restorer of the clergy, and the great saint of "le grand siècle." See foundling asylums.   E.A.R.

Vincent, J. H.: See Sunday School movement in the United States.

Vincent of Lerins: A "religious" of the early Church (died cir. 440), best known for his Commonitorium, in which Christian faith is discussed and tests are suggested for orthodox belief. Succinctly summed up in the phrase, quod ubique, quod semper, quod ab omnibus, the Vincentian canon has been widely employed in historic Christianity. Another phrase from Vincent, non nova sed nove, has also been used extensively to describe the relation of Christian faith to newer forms of expression.   W.N.P.

Vinet, Alexandre: (1797-1847) Swiss theologian, built his theology on a Kantian faith in the autonomy of the individual conscience, from which he deduced the necessity of complete religious liberty, separation of church and state, and the duty of testing all traditional doctrines by direct personal experience. See Frommel.

W.M.H.

virgin birth: There are many instances of unusual, miraculous and supernatural conceptions in the history of religions. Emphasis upon the virginity of the mother is relatively rare. In simple cultures conception might occur through contact with the elements or objects of mysterious potency such as amulets, fetishes or images. Stories of divine parentage gave added prestige or authority to many men in the lands bordering on the Mediterranean in ancient times. The rulers of Egypt were sons of the high god, Rē. Zeus and Apollo fathered some of the most illustrious men of Greece and Rome including Plato, Alexander, Apollonius of Tyana and Augustus. In these cases the virginity of the mother was not important. Supernatural intervention attended the conceptions of Isaac, Samson and John the Baptist in the Biblical story. The materials for the body and spirit of Zoroaster were brought from heaven by the Amesha Spentas*, made into the sacred liquor, haoma*, mixed with the milk of unimpregnated cows and fed to the parents of the prophet. The embryo of Mahāvira*, founder of Jainism, took form in the womb of a Brāhman lady. The god Indra* transferred it to a ·mother of more aristrocratic and wealthier lineage. Gotama Buddha* surveyed the world from the Tusita heaven and chose the woman for his final rebirth. These conceptions were miraculous or at least unusual, but all of the mothers were married.

Romulus was certainly virgin born since he was the child of a Vestal* priestess and the god Mars. The Zoroastrian* prophets who appear at the close of each millennium of the last age of the world are conceived by virgins impregnated by the seed of Zoroaster while bathing in an Iranian lake. The account of the conception of Jesus in Luke's Gospel follows the pattern of supernatural intervention as in the conception of Isaac or John the Baptist. Matthew's account, however, stresses the virginity of Mary* although the claim to virgin birth ruins the genealogical argument of the gospels by which Jesus has status as Messiah* by descent from David through Joseph. The doctrine of Virgin Birth was universally accepted by the middle of the second century. It was necessary to insist upon it then since only the union of the divine and human essences in him could make Jesus an adequate savior.

A.E.H.

Virgin Mary: The place of Mary, the mother of Jesus, in Christian thought and devotion is based on the meaning of her unique position as the human mother of Incarnate ·God, rather than upon the N.T., or upon apocryphal gospels (e.g., Proto-evangelion of St. James), or upon patristic opinions (e.g., the comparisons with Eve in Justin Martyr and St. Irenaeus), for these are considerations of that meaning. The references in the N.T. to the Blessed Virgin Mary are few and their information slight. Except in the Infancy Narratives in St. Luke which speak of her acceptance of her vocation as Mother of Christ, she is present in the background of events.

With the development of the cultus of the saints*, devotion to her held a first place that was enhanced by the decision of the Council of Ephesus* (431) which centered its attention on the question raised by the Nestorians*, the unity of the Person of our Lord, in connection with their term, Christotokos. The decision in favour of St. Cyril's* term, Theotokos (literally, God-bearer, and thus less liable to misunderstanding than Mater Dei or Mother of God), was based on affirmation of the reality underlying the communicatio idiomatum. This understanding of her honour was assured by the decision of II Nicea against excess (See Mariolatry). By the 7th century feast days in her honour in the calendar included her Nativity, the Purification, the Annunciation*, and the Falling Asleep. In the East her cultus has always been close to the Liturgy*, while in the West after 1000 there came a certain separation of her cultus from devotion to Christ (in votive masses*, the Little Office, the Angelus*, the Rosary* and the Salve Regina). In doctrine St. Mary is regarded as typifying the response of humanity to Deity as in the Church and the Christian soul. She is regarded as the first of the saints who in her life was preeminent in purity and obedience and who now, because she already enjoys the Beatific Vision*, is preeminent in prayer. Pious opinions have stated this in terms of her sinlessness, her perpetual virginity, her mediatorship and her bodily assumption—the first three of these being matters of faith for Roman Catholics. Definition of the sinlessness led to the medieval controversy in which the Scotists* upheld the. Immaculate Conception* as against the Thomists*, the view that by the anticipated merits of Christ Mary was preserved from, rather than freed from, original sin*, a position made matter of faith by Papal bull of 1854. See Mary, cult of, Sabbatine privilege.

T.J.B.

virtualism: See Lord's Supper.

virtues, seven: See seven virtues.

Vishnu: A relatively minor sun god in the Vedas, one of the Adityas, Vishnu became the supreme god of the great Vishnuite or Vaisnava* sect of Hinduism*. He is the Preserver in the Hindu Triad in which Brahma* is Creator, and Shiva*, Destroyer.

Traditionally Vishnu is held to have appeared in many different incarnations*, including some in animal or half animal form, as the fish, and tortoise, the boar, the man-lion. The greater incarnations or avatars are Krishna, Rama, Buddha, representing an attempt to assimilate Buddhism to Vishnuism; and Kalki is yet to come. See Lakshmi; Narayana.

C.S.B.

Vishnuism, Vaisnavism: One of the two major theistic sects of Hinduism*, which center about the worship of the great personal god Vishnu* or some one or more of his incarnations, of whom Krishna and Rama are the most important. Its beginnings are to be found well back in the pre-Christian era. The Bhagavad-Gita* is perhaps its noblest literary expression. Its fuller development came under Ramanuja* and Ramananda* leaders of the two principal subdivisions of the sect. Other subdivisions are the Madhvas, dating from the 13th century, the Vallabha-Charyas, and the Chaitanyas from the 16th century. In general the Vishnu worship is of the *bhakti type, and some subsects have carried it to an extreme which has offended the moral sensibilities of most cultured Indians. In its more advanced forms it is essentially monotheistic in belief and practice.

C.S.B.

visions: Visual imagery which impresses its beholder with its meaningful and objective character yet which is without the appropriate sense stimulus or physical presence. In psychological structure and origin visions are not unlike dreams and are not necessarily pathological. They may be normal dreams or vivid memories or vigorous imaginings.

In religion the term refers to a not uncommon experience of persons under the influence of intense religious emotion or of mystics* and those of mystical temperament. Religious visions have historically been believed to be supernatural in origin and revelatory in significance. They are characteristic phenomena of religious ecstacy* though not esteemed its most important feature. Their content is derived from the current religious beliefs and expectations of the subject and his culture. They are now held to be induced by concentrated emotional attention upon religious objects or themes. Psychologists classify and interpret them as visual automatisms and hallucinatory phenomena. In later Israel the visions of the true prophets were distinguished from those of false prophets by their ethical content and their worth for practical life. This continues to be the important test of their value. They may also have diagnostic value for psychologists and psychiatrists in their study of personality disorders.

R.W.F.

Visitation: A name given to the visit of Mary, the mother of Jesus, to Elizabeth, the mother of John the Baptist, before the birth of their respective children as narrated in Luke 1·39-56. Also the name of a Feast adopted by the Franciscans* in the 13th century and extended to the Church at large in the 14th century. Assigned to July 2nd.

S.M.G.

Visitation, Order of the: An order of religious women, known as the Visitation nuns, founded in 1610 by St. Francis de Sales, Bishop of Geneva, and St. Jane Francis de Chantal. This order, which stresses the unaustere, common life of prayer and poverty, spread rapidly through Europe.

It now conducts residential schools for girls, including a number in the United States. c.v.

visitation of the sick: A regular ministry of the clergy in the Christian Church from the earliest times to aid the sufferer in the sanctification of his illness. Ancient offices for anointing* and visitation required several of the clergy and choir. Modern offices in the Roman Catholic, the Anglican, and the Eastern Churches are for the priest alone. They comprise Unction, Confession, Communion, and prayers for the sick and dying. There is now in all churches a greater attention to pastoral as well as liturgical* ministrations to the sick. See sacraments.

T.J.B.

Vittoria, Francisco de: (1480-1546) Chief Spanish Dominican ethico-political theorist of the Counter-Reformation*. As God is the ultimate source of political authority, it is the duty of government to use its power for the welfare of the governed. His doctrine of international law is the most original part of his thought. He argued that there was an international community, including Christian and non-Christian nations, which had equality as members thereof. International law rests ultimately on an agreement of the majority of nations. He held that lack of an acceptable authority to adjudicate a dispute between states and the existence of a legitimate ground for war did not justify the actual making of war. He insisted that the government of colonial empire has the moral responsibility of giving the natives nothing less than human treatment.

J. B. Scott, The Spanish Origin of International Law, Francisco de Vittoria and his Law of Nations (London, 1934); H. F. Wright, ed., Francisco de Vittoria (1932).

H.H.

Vittorino da Feltre: (1378-1446) The greatest teacher of the Italian Renaissance*, with a disinterested love of learning, virtue and youth, and combining classic culture with Christian piety. His school at Mantua, which grew out of his post as tutor for the Gonzaga family, employed methods later developed by Pestalozzi.

Orelli, Vittorino da Feltre (Zurich, 1812); Rosmini, Vita de Vittorino (Bassano, 1801); J. A. Symonds, Revival of Learning (1877), pp. 289-299; W. H. Woodward, Vittorino and other Humanist Educators (Cambridge, 1905).

W.E.G

Vivekānanda, Swami: (1862-1902) The name assumed by a high-caste Bengali, Narendra Nath Datta, a follower of Ramakrishna* and organizer of the Ramakrishna Movement in India, when, after his master's death, he became a sannyasi. He represented Hinduism* at the Parliament of Religions at the Chicago World's Fair in 1893, and founded the Vedanta Society in America. He was a great mystic as well as teacher and organizer.

Sister Nivedita, The Master as I Knew Him; Romain Rolland, Prophets of the New India (1930).

C.S.B.

vocation: This word is employed in two senses, both of them with their roots in the N.T. 1) The Christian calling. It is assumed in the O.T that a great leader or prophet is directly called by God, either in his lifetime (e.g. David, Isaiah) or even before his birth (e g., Jeremiah). This idea was taken up and expanded by Christian teachers, who held that men became disciples in response to a special call by God. The Gospel was offered to all, but only those could accept it whom God had singled out from the mass of men and "called to be saints". Paul and the Fourth Evangelist ground their certainty of salvation in this assurance* that God has called his servants before they entered the world (see predestination). 2) The word is also applied to the activity or the condition of life which a man finds allotted to him, and in this sense has passed into our common language Paul thinks of slaves and free men as "called" to the status they occupy. He can say "Let every man abide in the same calling to which he is called". (I Cor. 7:20) It is implied that men should regard their everyday tasks and duties as divinely appointed to them, and it was this new estimate of labour which brought about a social transformation.

W. Morgan, Religion and Theology of Paul (1917)   E.F.S.

vogue: See culture.

Volkelt, Johannes: (1848-1930) Of eminent importance in the field of aesthetics, he was professor of philosophy at the University of Leipzig. He not only held a critical metaphysics possible, but he favored an unlimited realism He regarded the religious attitude an intuitive, immediate subjective experience with reference to a transempirical reality. It is in essence an immediate subjective certainty, of being in unity with the absolute, God. He felt that the life of religion could be saved by an inductive and hypothetical metaphysics.
Die Quellen der menschlichen Gewissheit (München, 1900), System der Aesthetik, 3 vols (München, 1905, 1910, 1914), Was ist Religion? (Leipzig, 1913); Die Gefühlsgewissheit (München, 1922), Fr. Lipsius, "Volkelt als Religionsphilosoph" in Volkelt Festschrift (München, 1918).   H.H.

Voltaire, Francois Marie Arouet de: (1694-1778) French popularizer of Newton's physics and Locke's* philosophy, no one labored so tirelessly as he for freedom of discussion and publication. His onslaught on persecuting Christianity was probably the greatest contribution to freedom of speech ever made. The novelty of his ideas of religion and tolerance consisted not in any quality intrinsic to them. He believed in the need for God as a club over the heads of the masses. Closely akin to Puritanism* in his views on moral virtues, he was not a supporter of the harsh life without graces. He also advocated a secular and uniform religion, though he was less concerned with its precise content. See Enlightenment, the.
K. Martin, French Liberal Thought in the Eight- eenth Century (Boston, 1929), F J C. Hearnshaw, ed, The Social and Political Ideas of some Great French Thinkers of the Age of Reason (London, 1930), H N Brailsford, Voltaire (London, 1935), N L Torrey, The Spirit of Voltaire (1938).

                                                         H H

Volume enterprise: See religious tract movement

Volunteer Movement for Foreign Missions, Student: See Student Volunteer Movement for Foreign Missions

Volunteers of America: A religious and philanthropic organization founded in 1896 by Ballington Booth (1859-1940). It was the outgrowth of a dispute over organizational policies between Ballington Booth, then Commander of the Salvation Army in America*, and his father, William Booth, founder and "General" of the Army. It is similar to the Salvation Army in doctrine, methods, and activities, but it is more democratic in government and less extensive in scope, having but 104 stations or mission posts, as compared with 1,566 for the parent body. Mrs. Maud Charlesworth Booth, widow of the founder, continues as Commander-in-Chief of the Volunteers.   H.E.J

votive mass: A Mass* which does not correspond to the Office of the day. As a rule the Mass complements the Office, that is, it agrees with the feast of the breviary. Such a Mass may be celebrated for some grave reason, for any reasonable cause, or at any time permitted by liturgical law. See forty hours' devotion.   w.H votive offering: (Lat., vovere, to promise to God) A general name given to those things promised or dedicated to God or a saint and in consequence looked upon as set apart by this act of consecration. Votive offerings are divided into 1) things vowed to God or the saints in some trouble or crisis of life, and 2) things presented in gratitude for a recovery or deliverance without having been previously promised.   B.S.

votive office: A liturgical prayer not entered in the general calendar but adopted with a view to satisfying a special devotion. Such offices were called votive (vovere, wish) because their recitation remained optional since it was the object of a privilege. All votive offices were abolished Nov. 1, 1911 by the apostolic constitution of Pope Pius X.   B.S.

vows: See oaths; Greek religion; Roman religions.

Vulgate, the Latin: See canon, Old and New Testament; Jerome; Sixtus V; versions of the Bible, ancient.

W

wafer: See altar bread.

wagering: See gambling.

Wahabites: A reforming sect of Islam, founded by Mohammed ibn Abd al' Wahab in the 18th century. The aim is to restore the pure religion of the Koran, strict monotheism and a literal interpretation of the scripture. Elaborate worship or dress, pilgrimages to tombs of saints, or prayers to saints were condemned as idolatry. The movement had considerable political power throughout Asia, and still has religious influence. Their intolerance has separated them from other Moslems.

P.E.J.

wakan, or wakanda: (Sioux) A life-power permeating all natural objects and forces; a natural but unusual power inherent in objects affecting all phases of man's life. See manitu, orenda. F.L.P.

wake: (fr. A.S. wacan, to wake) 1) The keeping of a watch or vigil at the side of a dead body until the time of burial. Chiefly an Irish custom, sometimes observed with great solemnity, but more commonly with considerable festivity. 2) An annual local parish festival formerly observed in the Church of England in connection with the feast of a patron saint* or with the dedication of a church. Originally a religious observance lasting through the night but becoming (at least by the 16th cent.) a holiday occasion for village games, dancing and drinking, often riotous in its excesses. See death and burial practices. E.T.R.

Waldenström, Paul Peter: (1838-1917) Swedish churchman, D.D. (Yale), Ph.D. (Uppsala), linguist, author, teacher, preacher, and formidable controversialist. Deeply influenced by the revivals, he became the outstanding leader of the dissenting movements. In 1872, he attacked the doctrine of the atonement* as taught by the state church. "God is love," he said, "and does not need to be reconciled, but a reconciliation which takes away the sin of the world is needed, and has been given in Christ." Independent as a member of the Riksdag, conservative as a leader of the Mission Covenant* organized in 1878, he continually pointed to the text of the Bible asking the question, "Where is it written?" E.G.H.

Waldo, Peter and Waldenses: Experiencing a conversion in 1170, Waldo gave up all his landed property to his spouse after a pilgrimage to Palestine, where he had been directed in Matthew 19: 21. The rest of his property he distributed to the poor, and devoted himself to the study of Scripture. Having taken a formal vow of poverty, he gathered about him a group of followers, begging their way and preaching a message of self-abnegation. He died 1217 A D. His followers were known as Poor Men of Lyon. They travelled in strict observance of Christ's direction to the seventy (Luke 10 1-4) Their appeal for papal recognition denied and put under ban at the Council of Verona (1184), they were driven out of Lyon and found their way with their message into southern Europe Renunciation of private property, an ascetic life, separation of husbands from their wives, and three days' fast in the week were the conditions for membership into their communion. They repudiated indulgences, purgatory and masses for the dead. They denied the efficacy of the sacraments administered by unworthy priests. A literal appreciation of the teachings of Christ as contained in the gospels was their chief theme. They had no fixed and articulate theology.

Known among its own membership as Vaudois, the Waldensian church is a Protestant community, Calvinistic in principle, before the Reformation. They were a community of hardy mountaineers and simple folk. The question of their historical origin is highly controversial. They repudiate the view that they were simply the followers of Peter Waldo of Lyon. They deny that they first appeared as a sect of heretics, breaking off from the historic church. They lay claim to apostolic origin, having preserved the purity of faith through the centuries. They also claim to owe their existence to a schismatic bishop during the episcopate of Sylvester in the fourth century, who broke off with Rome because it placed the church under imperial rule. Still another claim is that the communion owes its origin to Claude, bishop of Turin in the eighth century, who revived the Augustinian doctrine of predestination, and who ignored Augustine's teaching according to which the church was the appointed medium of communication between God and man. The alleged connection between the Waldenses, inhabiting the southern and Italian valleys of the Alps, and the Cathari* or Albigenses*, neighbors of the Waldenses, living in the northern and French side of the Alps, has been refuted It is not certain what factors were responsible for the gradual disappearance of the Cathari and the survival and slow progress of the Waldensian movement. It is probable that the Cathari were absorbed by it. One thing is certain that the Waldenses are not a direct offshoot of the Cathari movement.

The Waldensian church grew in reality out of a fusion of the work of Peter Waldo and the Poor Men of Lyon with movements originated by Arnold of Brescia, Peter de Bruys* and Henry of Cluny. It came to contain elements in the teaching of these four men, and matured into a distinctly organized church. Waldo's movement was the most vigorous of them all. The ideas of Protestantism were in the air. Its spirit was alive when Waldo and his Poor Men came to embrace them and blend them with their own version of the teaching of Jesus. What attracted so powerfully wide circles of the population to these schismatic movements were not their "doctrines", but the ethical seriousness and the consequence with which they carried out the moral demands of the gospel. Enthusiastic about the imitation of Christ, their strict biblicism became a blazing criticism of the church against the hierarchical lust of power, lust of money, wealth, pomp and worldly pleasures. As preachers of apostolic poverty, they rejected Rome and its papal claims. Although they aimed to become inwardly independent of the church that had degenerated into a rival world power, they strove principally for the personal experience of peace and perfection.

J. J. v. Dollinger, Beiträge zur Sektengeschichte des Mittelalters (München, 1890), 2 vols., T Gay, Histoire des Vaudois, refaite d'après les plus récentes recherches (Gay, 1912); H. Lea, History of the Inquisition of the Middle Ages (1901-1906) ; K. F. Müller, Die Waldenser und ihre einzelnen Gruppen (Gotha, 1886).   H.H.

Walkyries: Daughters of Odin* virgin warriors, who took part in battles with men, and carried away the souls of dying heroes to Valhalla; also Valkyries, Walküre.   P.G.M.

Wallin, Johan Olof: (1779-1839) Sweden's greatest hymn-writer, Wallin earlier was interested in other forms of poetry, but after 1811 gave himself to revision of the hymnbook of the Swedish Church (issued 1819), of which he gradually became the prime author. His hymns reveal his humanistic, philanthropic nature, as well as a lyric, biblical quality. He held many ecclesiastical offices, and was elected archbishop in 1837.
      C.J.B.

Walter of Mortagne: Bishop and theologian, born at Mortagne, Flanders, first decade of the twelfth century. From 1136 to 1144 he taught at Ste. Geneviève, Paris On the question of universals he was an indifferentist, thereby opposing both William of Champeaux and Abailard. He died in 1174, as Bishop of Laon.   C.V.

Walter of St. Victor: (lived in the twelfth century) As a coarse polemicist, he condemned all natural knowledge, and particularly contemptuous of dialectic and speculative learning.   H.H

Walther, Karl Ferdinand Wilhelm: (1811-1887) Organizer and first president of the Lutheran Missouri Synod and outstanding exponent of conservative and confessional Lutheranism* in America. A young pastor steeped in the theology of the Reformation and rebelling against the prevalent rationalism, he arrived in Perry County, Missouri, in 1839 in the company of seven hundred devout Saxon pilgrims led by Martin Stephan. In 1841 he became pastor at St. Louis, and in 1846 he founded the Missouri Synod, bringing together Lutherans in various parts of the country under a democratic constitution which he had drafted. From 1850 until his death he was professor of theology at Concordia Theological Seminary in St. Louis. Of his many writings on doctrinal, ecclesiastical, and pastoral themes, the following are outstanding: Kirche und Amt (1852), Die Rechte Gestalt einer vom Staate unabhängigen evangelisch-lutherischen Ortsgemeinde (1863), Postil on the Gospels (1871), and The Proper Distinction Between the Law and the Gospel (1897, Eng. ed., 1929). He also edited J. W. Baier's Compendium of Theology in three volumes (1879). Walther exerted further influence through two journals which he founded and edited, Der Lutheraner and Lehre und Wehre. An uncompromising and indefatigable defender of confessional orthodoxy, colloquially called "the Lutheran Pope", he debated vehemently on such topics as the nature of the Church, the Anti-Christ, conversion, and predestination. He left the impress of his powerful personality on his followers and made his influence felt throughout the Church at large. See Missouri Lutherans; neo Lutheranism.   T.A.K.

Wang Yang-ming: See Chinese Terminology.

Ward, James: (1843-1925) Professor of Mental Philosophy at Cambridge, creative psychologist and influential panpsychist. For him the phenomena of physical law, biological evolution, the conservation of values, and the human experience of objective value are inexplicable by metaphysical pluralism, or mechanistic naturalism. The world is ultimately a realm of ends. It is constituted by the interaction of purposive psychic entities, which, created and sustained by a cosmic Person, differ progressively in the quality of their conative and cognitive power.

Naturalism and Agnosticism (1915), 4th ed.; Psychological Principles (1920), 2nd ed . The Realm of Ends or Pluralism and Theism (1920), 3rd ed.   P.A B.

Warfield, Benjamin Breckinridge: (1851-1921) Presbyterian theologian Born near Lexington, Ky. Graduate of the College of N. J. (Princeton) 1871, of Princeton Theological Seminary 1876 Graduate studies in Leipzig. After a short pastorate he became in 1878 instructor and from 1879-1887 professor of N T. Exegesis in Western Theological Seminary, Pittsburg, Pa. From 1887-1921 he was professor of Systematic Theology in Princeton Theological Seminary. He was chief editor of the Presbyterian and Reformed Review, 1890-1903, then for many years editor of the Princeton Theological Review. In the succession of Charles Hodge* and together with Abr. Kuyper* in Holland he was for many decades the protagonist of confessional Presbyterianism. Aided by an indefatigable study of N.T. criticism and interpretation, patristics, church history and Reformed theology, and familiar with all that was being written in foreign languages, he expounded in innumerable articles the truths of the Bible and, based upon the Bible, those of the Westminster Confession.* In his writings he was polemical and critical, rather than constructive, interested in the particular doctrines rather than in their systematic connection, because he took the plenary inspiration of the Bible and the truthfulness of the great Presbyterian tenets as his imperturbable starting point.

Principal works:
Introduction to the Textual Criticism of the New Testament (1886) ; The Gospel of the Incarnation (1893), The Lord of Glory (1907) ; The Plan of Salvation (1915). His numerous articles and reviews were collected and in topical arrangement published in ten volumes (1927-1932). Among them are Revelation and Inspiration (1927), Studies in Tertullian and Augustine (1930) ; Calvin and Calvinism (1931), The Westminster Assembly and Its Work (1931) ; Perfectionism (1931-1932), 2 vols. Bibliography by John R Mackay in The Expositor (London, 1922) ; see also the Memorial Address by F. L. Patton (1921) ; Biography in Dictionary of American Biography, vol. XIX. p,. 453 f.   O.A P.

Warnefrid, Paul (Paul the Deacon): (c. 725-c. 799) Monk, historian, poet, member of the palace school* of Charlemagne. Most noted for his history of the Lombards.   F.W.N.

Wars of religion: Huguenots*, 1562- . Cruel persecutions prompted the Huguenots of France to take up arms to achieve religious liberty in 1562. Eight separate wars were fought with the Catholic party in the next three decades. The most notorious event in this struggle was the Massacre of St. Bartholomew*, August 24, 1572, in which 30,000 Huguenots lost their lives. Chief leaders on the Catholic side were Catherine de' Medici* and the Guises, on the Protestant side, Coligny, Conde, and Henry of Navarre—later Henry IV*, who guaranteed Huguenots a measure of freedom in the Edict of Nantes*, 1598. But persecution and civil strife began anew after his death and culminated in the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes in 1689, through which several hundred thousand Huguenots, the most skilled artisans and the best intellects of France, were forced into exile. Religious toleration for Protestants was not attained until 1787.   E.C.K.

washing: (ritual, in O.T.) Washing of the person and of the clothes is frequently specified in the Levitical legislation as part of the requirements for removing a ritual taboo (uncleanness), e.g., Levit. 14.9; 16.24, 28. Washing of the hands also was a symbolic protestation of innocence, cf. Deut. 21:6; Psalm 26:6. See feet washing.   R.B.Y.S.

water: See holy water, baptism; baptism, non Christian rites.

Watts, Isaac: See hymns.

Weber, Hans Emil: (1882-) He first taught in Bonn. Now he is at Munster. His greatest contribution is the conquest of the immanentistic world view by a better, faith-determining application of the critical method, and the facing of the difficulties resulting from the lay orthodoxy strengthened by the communal movement.
Die philosophische Scholastik des deutschen Protestantismus (Leipzig, 1907) ; Der Einfluss der protestantischen Schulphilosophie auf die orthodox-lutherische Dogmatik (Leipzig, 1908) ; Das Problem der Heilsgeschichte nach Römer 9-11 (Leipzig, 1911), Die Vollendung des neutestamentlichen Glaubenszeugnisses durch Johannes (Leipzig, 1912), Glaube und Mystik (Gutersloh, 1927) ; Eschatologie im Neuen Testament (Gutersloh, 1930), Reformation, Orthodoxie und Rationalismus (Gutersloh, 1937) ; Das Geisteserbe der Gegenwart und die Theologie (Leipzig, 1925).   H.H.

Weber, Max: (1865-1920) One of the most outstanding German economists and sociologists. His three volumes devoted to the sociology* of religion represent one of the most valuable contributions in this field. The principal topic of the work is an analysis of the relationship between religion and economic phenomena based upon an immense amount of factual material. He studied the economic ethics of Confucianism, Taoism, Hinduism, Buddhism, Christianity, Islam and Judaism on the life of the peoples who adhere to these religions. He also studied particularly the relationship between Western capitalism and Protestantism. A modern capitalistic organization is made possible by a definite psychology, conduct and corresponding social conditions. Weber maintains that modern Western capitalism* was originated by the Protestant religion and its economic ethics. The spirit of modern capitalism is that of Protestantism, of its rules of conduct and practical ethics.
M. Weber, Gesammelte Aufsätze zur Religionssoziologie (Tubingen, 1920), 3 vols., Wirtschaftsgeschichte (Munchen, 1924) ; R H. Tawney, Religion and the Rise of Capitalism (1926) is a recapitulation of Weber's theory.   H.H.

Wee Free Church: In 1901 the Free Church of Scotland* and the United Presbyterian Church* formed the United Free Church of Scotland*. 25 ministers and 63 congregations of the Free Church, mostly Gaelic-speaking, abstained from the union and maintained that they were the legal Free Church, because this church had departed from its principles by joining with the United Presbyterian Church and also by adopting in 1892 an interpretation of the Confession of Faith. On the allegation of a breach of trust thus committed suit was brought by the dissenters for all the property of the Free Church. Defeated in the Scottish courts, they won in the House of Lords and all the property was adjudged theirs. This decision was practically overruled by an act of Parliament, which yet gave the successful litigants more than their numbers entitled them to. With this support the present Free Church of Scotland began. It has grown somewhat; in 1929 it had 8,500 communicants. It has a theological college at Aberdeen.   R H.N.

Weeks, festival of: See Jewish religious festivals.

Wegscheider, Julius August Ludwig: (1771-1849) He taught at the University of Halle. His main work dominated the last generation of rationalism. He exerted a great personal influence through his long teaching career. He decided with brief authoritative sentences the correctness of theological doctrine. Despite the gigantic ballast of learned annotations, he refrained from investigating the ratio and its relation to religion and Christian faith. His standard was the naive feeling of certainty of the human understanding. Jesus was for him neither God nor the supernaturally direct revelation of God. But He was for him the most excellent and first originator of human salvation.

Ethices Stoicorum recentiorum fundamenta cum ethicis principiis quae critica rationes practicae secundum Kantium exhibt, comparata (Hamburg, 1797), Über die von der neuesten Philosophie geforderte Trennung der Moral von der Religion (Hamburg, 1804), Institutiones Theologiae Christianae Dogmaticae. Scholis suis scripsit addita singulorum dogmatum historia et censura (4th ed, Halle, 1815, 8th ed., Leipzig, 1844).   H.H.

Weigel, Valentin: (1533-1588) German mystic. Influenced by Sebastian Franck, Paracelsus, Neoplatonism, and the "Friends of God", he developed a philosophy of monistic subjective idealism in which all truth was traced to a divine "inner light" in man. A successful Lutheran pastor, Weigel reconciled his ideas with the accepted dogmas by placing an allegorical interpretation upon the latter. The real import of his teaching did not appear until the posthumous publication of his writings, the chief of which is Dialogus de Christianismo (1616). Weigel's influence was felt by such important thinkers as Böhme, Leibniz, and Arndt.   T.A.K.

Weisenburg Catechism: See catechism.

Weiss, Johannes: (1863-1914) German theologian and professor of N.T. in Göttingen, Marburg, and Heidelberg. Of the many important volumes which Weiss produced, none was more significant than the little monograph, Die Predigt Jesu vom Reiche Gottes (1892) which may properly be regarded as the manifesto of thoroughgoing eschatology* (though the more vociferous Schweitzer* is usually regarded as the father of the movement) as the key to an understanding of the mission of Jesus and of the resulting early Christianity. Among other volumes of lasting worth are his Commentary on First Corinthians (Meyer series, 9th ed., 1910) and Das Urchristentum (1917) which latter, still unfinished at time of his death, was subsequently completed and published by Rudolph Knopf. A list of his other writings is contained in the preface to the English translation of the last work, The History of Primitive Christianity, edited by F. C. Grant (1937).   M.S.E.

Weisse, Christian Hermann: (1801-1866) As professor of philosophy in Leipzig, he elaborated an ethical theism in close relation with Christian dogma, the later Schelling and Jacob Boehme. The concept of liberty was central for him. God is bound to the logical and mathematical laws of existence, but He is free within the same.

Die Idee der Gottheit (Dresden, 1833), Reden über die Zukunft der evangelischen Kirche (Leipzig, 1849); Über die Christologie Luthers (Leipzig, 1852), Philosophische Dogmatik oder Philosophie des Christenthums (Leipzig, 1855-62), 3 vols, Psychologie und Unsterblichkeitslehre, ed. by R. Seydel (Leipzig, 1869).   H H.

Weizsäcker, Karl Heinrich von: (1822-99) Mediating theologian, professor of Church History at Tübingen from 1861. Best known today for his modern translation of the N.T. (1875) and his book on Das Apostolische Zeitalter (1886) which was translated into English. A distinguished preacher to the community as well as scholar. See Tübingen school.   C.T.C.

welis or walis: Moslem saints who are thought to have miraculous powers. Worship is not due them, but as holy ones who intercede with God for men, they are often appealed to for aid.
        P.E.J.

Wellhausen, Julius: (1844-1918) German Protestant Orientalist and leader of a school of Higher Criticism of the Bible. Devoted himself to disentangling the historical process that produced the religion and literature of Israel and to establishing the correct order of the documents composing the Hexateuch*. He is linked with Graf's hypothesis of the lateness of the Priestly Code*. He also made notable contributions to Islamic and N.T. studies. See Lives of Jesus.
        S.S.C.

Welsh Calvinistic Methodists: See Calvinistic Methodists; Methodism.

Wendt, Hans Hinrich: (1853-1928) He taught in Kiel, Heidelberg and Jena. He was one of the furtherers of Ritschlianism who considered questions of world view. He also created an entirely different type of dogmatics than Ritschl had in mind.

Die christliche Lehre von der menschlichen Vollkommenheit (Göttingen, 1882); Die Lehre Jesu (Göttingen, 1886-90, 2nd ed., Göttingen, 1901); System der christlichen Lehre (Göttingen, 1906-7, 2nd ed., Göttingen, 1920); Erklärung der Augsburger Konfession (Göttingen, 1927).   H.H.

werewolf: In north European folklore, a man (or woman) who could at times turn into a wolf, to satisfy an appetite for human flesh. Late Anglo-Saxon wer: man and wulf.   P.G.M.

wergild: In Teutonic law, the price to be paid by one guilty of manslaughter to the relatives of the victim. It was a valuable means of ending blood feuds, a step beyond lex talionis*. Similar laws have been worked out among many other primitive peoples.   P.G.M.

Wernle, Paul: (1872-) He is professor at the University of Basel, Switzerland. Himself a notable religious-historical investigator, he opposes at important points the investigations of Troeltsch, Bousset*ᵗ and Heitmuller. He also has written from the scientific point of view one of the best introductions to theological study.

Einführung in das theologische Studium (Tubingen, 1921), 3rd ed , Die Anfänge unserer Religion (Tubingen, 1904), 2nd ed , Der schweizerische Protestantismus im 18 Jahrhundert (Tubingen, 1923-25), 3 vols   H.H

Wesel, Johann: (1419 or 20- 1498) "Light of the World", educated by the Brethren of the Common Life* at Zwolle, knew Greek and Hebrew, and studied theology at Paris. Head of a nunnery at Groningen, he spent much time in the Monastery of Mount St. Agnes (Agnietenberg), near Zwolle. Knew Hegius, Agricola, von Langen. Criticized by Gansfort* for "scholastic subtlety" and "inconsiderateness . . . with the unlearned."   Q.B.

Wesley, Charles: (1707-1788) and John: (1703-1791) Founders with George Whitefield* of the Evangelical Revival and (through the "United Societies" organized by them) of Methodism as a distinct branch of the Christian Church. Among Christian evangelists, missionaries, organizers, and preachers of all time, John Wesley stands in the front rank A graduate of Oxford (Christ Church) and Fellow of Lincoln College, he was a thorough scholar, an expert linguist and grammarian, and a poet- and hymn writer of exceptional ability. It is Charles Wesley however who was the poet of the Evangelical Revival and of world Methodism. He wrote in all more than 6000 hymns, at least ten of which are among the great hymns of the Christian Church. His only rival among modern hymnodists is Isaac Watts*, and Canon Overton has held him to be, quantity and quality alike considered, "the great hymn writer of all ages".

The Wesleys were the fifteenth and eighteenth children respectively of Samuel and Susannah (Annesley) Wesley. Both parents were children of distinguished non-conformists* and entered the Church of England* by deliberate choice, Samuel being disinherited in consequence. The story of their life for 38 years at Epworth Rectory, Lincolnshire, is an epic. It is above all a story of "plain living and high thinking" The influence of Susannah upon her sons, whose education and spiritual nurture from the cradle was her especial care, is particularly notable. It was at Oxford in 1727 or 1728 that Charles began the Evangelical Revival by going to the weekly Sacrament and persuading two or three fellow-students to do the same. This was the beginning of the "Holy Club", also called "a new set of Methodists", of which John on his return to Oxford in 1729 assumed the leadership. In October 1735 the two brothers set sail for Georgia. On shipboard and later they saw much of the Moravians*. Through the latter John after the disillusionment of his career as a Parish Priest and Missionary in Georgia discovered Luther and was led to a personal experience of salvation through faith alone.

Charles had a similar experience and both began to preach a Gospel of power. Joining forces with Whitefield early in the following year (1739), they began the powerful movement known as the Evangelical Revival. Henceforth their lives were bound up with its progress, John taking the more active and executive role and hardly living save for his preaching, direction of societies, and literary and educational projects. He was accustomed to travel five thousand miles a year on horseback and to preach an average of fifteen sermons a week. Both brothers married, Charles in 1749, John in 1751. The marriage of the latter to a widow, Mrs. Vazeille, was in every way unfortunate. Charles was a stiffer, though not an essentially stronger, churchman than John, and opposed the ordinations for America in 1784 by the latter, who that same year had given the Societies a legal constitution. Their separation from the English Church was inevitable, though John Wesley counseled against it with strong words until his death in 1791, three years after that of his brother. Both are among the Saints of the Universal Christian Calendar.

See Articles of Religion; assurance, evangelicalism and evangelical revival, hymns, Methodism.

Select Bibliography —Charles Wesley. Journal and Letters, ed Thos Jackson (1849) , Early Journal (1910) , Poetical Works of John and Charles Wesley (1868), 13 vols , Lives by Thomas Jackson (1841), John Telford (1886), and F. L Wiseman (1933) John Wesley· Collected Works (1872) , Journal, Standard ed , N Curnock (1909-16), 8 vols., Standard Sermons, ed E H Sugden (1921) , Lives by Robert Southey (1820), Luke Tyerman (1870), 2 vols , J H Overton (1891), J. S. Simon (1927), F. J McConnell (1939) See also G C Cell, Rediscovery of John Wesley (1933) , Umphrey Lee, John Wesley and Modern Religion (1936) ; Maximin Piette. John Wesley in the Evolution of Protestantism (Eng. tr., 1937).   C.W L.

Wesleyan Methodist Connection: See holiness churches.

West Memorial Lectures on Immortality, Human Conduct and Human Destiny, The Raymond F.: Established in 1910 at Stanford University, Palo Alto, California by Mr. and Mrs. Frederick W. West. This lectureship (capital sum, $10,000) calls for a guest lecturer "of the highest personal character and of superior intellectual endowment." The lectures are, on the present plan, delivered in alternate years in a series of at least three.

Among the lecturers the following have served: Charles E. Jefferson, Hastings Rashdall, John Dewey, Henry O. Taylor, Irving Babbitt, Julian S. Huxley, Carl L. Becker, J. R. Angell and R. M. Jones.

(Data from the Office of the Secretary of the University.)   V.F.

Westcott and Hort: Cambridge scholars who while still young men planned a critical text of the Greek N.T., which they published in 1881, after twenty-eight years of work. In the course of their work they developed the principles of textual criticism*, and the history of the text to a degree unequalled before or since.   E.J.G.

Westminster Assembly: The Long Parliament (1640) gave the Puritans* opportunity to achieve their aim of "a further . . reformation" of the Church of England.* To this end Parliament called "an Assembly of . . . divines", with certain of the two houses, to meet on July 1, 1643 in Westminster Abbey It was instructed to prepare plans for a reformation of the church which would bring it into nearer accord with the Church of Scotland* and the continental Reformed churches, for Parliamentary action The Westminster Assembly thus was not an independent council but an advisory body to Parliament. It consisted of 121 clergymen of England and Wales, many of whom were eminent as theologians or Biblical scholars or preachers, with 10 Lords and 20 Commoners. Almost all were Puritans and of these the great majority were Presbyterians.* There were small groups of Independents (Congregationalists) and Erastians. A few Episcopalians were appointed but bore little part. After the Solemn League and Covenant* was taken by Parliament and by the Assembly at its order, in September, 1643, as the condition of Scottish help to the Parliamentary army, 6 Scottish commissioners entered the Assembly and were influential.

The Assembly's principal documents were: 1 A form of church government, on which rested the abortive establishment by Parliament of Presbyterianism in the Church of England, in 1646 and 1648, 2 A directory for church discipline, approved by Parliament with a reservation; 3. A directory for ordination, approved; 4. The Directory for Worship, to replace the Book of Common Prayer, approved, 5. The Confession of Faith (see Westminster Confession of Faith) to replace the 39 Articles, submitted in December, 1646, which received partial Parliamentary approval in 1648, 6. The Larger Catechism* and 7. The Shorter Catechism, composed in 1647, the latter being approved In 1648 and to its last session in February, 1649 the Assembly occupied itself chiefly with examining ministers for appointment to livings in the Church of England. The authority of the Assembly's documents as a constitution for the church was annulled at the Restoration (1660). They have had great influence otherwise, especially in the Presbyterian churches.

W Beveridge, A Short History of the West. Ass. (Edinburgh, 1904) ; S. W. Carruthers, The Everyday Work of the West. Ass. (1943) , A. F. Mitchell, The West. Ass. (1897) ; W. A. Shaw, History of the English Church, 1640-1660, vol. I (London, 1900).

R.H.N.

Westminster Catechism: See catechism; catechumenate.

Westminster Confession of Faith: In 1645 the House of Commons asked the Westminster Assembly* to present to it a confession of faith for the Church of England*. The Assembly, which already on its own motion had this under consideration by committee, from July, 1645, worked as a whole on the Confession, with interruptions, completing it in December, 1646. Its composition was marked by large unanimity reflecting the theological agreement of the members The Confession is a summary of Christian doctrine in 33 chapters, occupying about 35 ordinary octavo pages. The work of Puritan divines with cooperating Scottish commissioners, it embodies British Calvinistic theology, on the whole of the more moderate type respecting predestination*. With this it combines emphasis on the federal theology* or doctrine of the covenants, highly esteemed by Puritans and Scots. Its structure was based largely on the Irish Articles of Archbishop Ussher* of 1615. Published in 1647, the Confession received partial Parliamentary approval in 1648, but its life as a creed of the Church of England was brief. It was adopted in 1647 by the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland*, wherein it still has authority. The Savoy Declaration* of 1658 of the English Congregationalists and the London Confession of 1677 of the English Baptists in great part incorporated it. The Confession was the doctrinal standard of New England Congregationalists to the end of the 18th century. It is now authoritative in most of the Presbyterian churches* of the world, in some with interpretations and revisions. No Protestant doctrinal formulation has had or has higher position. See Confessions, Formal of the Christian Church, Irish Articles.

P. Schaff, Creeds of Christendom, vol. I, historical and critical, vol III, text of Confession (1877) ; A. F. Mitchell, West. Assembly (1897) , E. D. Morris, Theology of the West. Symbols (1900) ; B. B. Warfield, The West. Assembly and Its Work (1931).

R.H.N.

Weston, Henry Griggs: (1820-1909) Baptist preacher and educator. Editor of Baptist Quarterly, 1869-1877. President of Crozer Theological Seminary, 1868-1909.   C.H.M.

Westphalian Treaties: (1648) The Westphalian Treaties followed the Thirty Years' War* (1618-48). The one concluded at Münster between the emperor and the French, the other at Osnabrück, between the imperials and the Swedes may be considered from either a political or religious viewpoint. Both were dextrously manipulated by Richelieu in the interest of France. Politically and nationally speaking, the Thirty Years' War and the subsequent Peace Treaties meant a hitherto unheard of loss and humiliation for Germany; a lasting weakening of both the united German States and of the imperial authority in the Reich, which only Bismark was later somewhat able to remedy. Denmark and Spain too were debilitated (Treaty of the Pyrenees) ; Sweden became a power of great strategic importance while France from now on headed towards the absolutistic age of Louis XIV. Moreover, not only Germany, but all Central Europe became a loose association of many substantially independent States. The medieval centralized Europe of one Religion, with pope and emperor representing respectively the spiritual and the temporal power was definitely dead and the modern system of equally autonomous territories took its place. Henceforth also, the idea that religious differences should and could be settled by force of arms gradually passed out of the minds of men and rulers. Religiously, Protestantism gained a stronger, politically recognized, foothold in Europe, whereas Catholicism lost an inestimable number of churches, properties and revenues. The Lorraine dioceses of Metz, Toul and Verdun remained in the possession of France. Sweden obtained besides the German territory of Pomerania, also the ecclesiastical revenues and benefices of Bremen and Verden. In compensation for these losses Germany was to receive the secularized ecclesiastical territories of Brandenburg and Mecklenburg. The Religious Peace of Augsburg (1555)* was re-confirmed, with the proviso, however, that Calvinism* was to be permitted publicly to function. The retention of ecclesiastical properties and the holding of religious services were to be adjudged as of Jan. 1, 1624, the mean or compromise year between 1618 and 1630, and to be known as the "Norm Day" or "Norm Year" according to which all disputes were to be settled. Both ecclesiastical and secular estates were to enjoy the "jus reformandi", i.e., the right to introduce Protestantism into those places that could not be regulated by the "Norm Year". Other minority dissenters were to be permitted to worship at home according to the dictates of their conscience and to frequent their own churches outside of their native or adopted territory, if they so desired. Emperor Frederick III (1637-57) refused to accept the "Norm Year" for Austria, which generally speaking up to that time had not been affected substantially by either Protestantism or the Thirty Years' War. The principle "cujus regio, illius religio" was amended in such a way as not to apply in future to the people or lands of a prince who changed his religious convictions or affiliations. Practically, this was a renunciation of the "reservatum ecclesiasticum". In the future all religious questions were to be discussed and settled in the Reichstag by the Corpus Catholicorum and the Corpus Evangelicorum not indeed by a majority vote but by an amicable settlement known as "Itio in partes" Pope Innocent X*, represented at the Treaty of Munster by his Legate*, Fabio Chigi (the later Pope Alexander VII), while approving of the provisions of the Treaties ending the Thirty Years' War, for which all Europe longed, refused to recognize in virtue of the Brief Zelus domus Dei, Nov. 26, 1648, the articles referring to the retention of confiscated church properties and revenues once belonging bona fide to the Catholic Church.

Litt. Cath. Encyc. XIV, 656-7; XV 601-5; Lexikon f. Theologie u. Kirche X, 842-3; L. Pastor, History of the Popes, Herder (1940), vol. XXX, ch. III.   R.M.H.

wheel of life: See karma; samsara; theosophy; transmigration; Vedanta.

White Friars: See Carmelites.

White Lotus Society: See Chinese religions.

Whitefield, George: (1714-70) English religious leader, co-founder with John and Charles Wesley* of the Evangelical Revival, one of the great preachers in point of power and effectiveness of all time. Born in Gloucester at the Bell Inn, at fifteen he was taken from the school of St. Mary de Crypt, where he had shown promise in elocution and play-acting, to assist his widowed mother in the public-house. In 1733 he entered Pembroke College, Oxford, as a servitor, taking a degree in 1736. Here he came under the influence of Charles and later John Wesley and became one of the Oxford "Methodists". Ordained deacon in 1736 he began independently his remarkable career as a preacher and evangelist. On his return from America late in the year 1738 he joined forces with the Wesleys who had begun to lead a revival. In 1740 the difference between him and John Wesley over election, final perseverance, and sanctification led to an open rupture. Though speedily reconciled, the two henceforth went largely separate ways. Whitefield's Calvinism, which was uncompromising, had three roots personal experience; contact with Calvinist Divinity through reading and association with Calvinists in England, Scotland, and America; and the Articles of Religion*. In a letter to John Wesley he says, "I never read anything that Calvin wrote. my doctrines I had from Christ and his Apostles." His influence upon Evangelicalism within the Church of England (see Evangelicals, Anglican), which tended spontaneously toward Calvinism, was in consequence greater than that of the Wesleys. After 1748 Whitefield enjoyed the friendship and influential patronage of Selina, Countess of Huntingdon.* His real life remained in his evangelical tours, during one of which, on his seventh visit to America, he died, worn out with ceaseless ardors and toils. He was buried, where he died, in Newburyport, Massachusetts.

See evangelicalism and evangelical revival.

Select Bibliography.—His Works were collected in 1771-2 in seven volumes Memoirs, 1834 (by John Gillies—revised) and Sermons in one vol. Lives by J. P. Gledstone (1871), Luke Tyerman (1876-7), 2 vols., A. D Belden (1930).   C.W.L.

Whitehead, Alfred North: (b. 1861) British-American philosopher. Taught mathematics and theoretical physics at Cambridge, 1911-14, and at University College, London, 1914-24. Professor of philosophy at Harvard University from 1924 until retirement in 1938, during which time his chief philosophical works appeared (earlier writings being either mathematical or near the boundary between mathematics [or physics] and philosophy). Whitehead's system has been called "the most large-minded synthesis since Hegel" (Lovejoy). It includes a conception of cosmic evolution recalling views of Bergson, Peirce, Alexander, or Lloyd Morgan, a Platonic doctrine of forms or "eternal objects," a theology which, like much recent Protestant thought, conceives God as receiving enrichment from the world process and so in some sense temporal. But the central and most original feature is the theory of "societies of occasions." The unit of reality is neither mere being nor mere becoming, but the "experient occasion", as a social union of a number of such occasions, and having aspects both of being and of becoming. Occasions immediately "prehend" or feel other occasions, and this prehension is sympathetic, a "feeling of feeling." There is no hard core of dead matter, such as could neither have feelings itself nor furnish content to the sympathetic feelings of others. A man, for example, feels his own just past feelings in immediate memory, but he also feels feelings just previously felt by his bodily cells or other entities in his body. All such entities are constituted by streams of experience on some level, however primitive. Each such stream (or "society with personal order") is made one by its feeling of feelings in its own past. But also, by feeling of feeling it is united to other streams. Self-identity and unity with others do not differ absolutely. Egoism and altruism have the same root in the immediate sympathy of the occasion for other occasions. Time and space are only the relational structures into which the "of" is articulated in the becoming of feelings of feelings. The past consists of occasions prehended in a given occasion a, but not prehending it; the future, of occasions not prehended in a, but such that, if they occur, they are bound to prehend a. The non-immanence of future occasions in the present gives freedom or indetermination. Strictly, no future events exist, but only certain potentialities from which events can be created. This holds even for God, who knows events as fully determinate only as the events occur, and who himself is in process (or process is in him) of a uniquely perfect kind by which he inherits all the richness of past events. Thus in God our experiences, though they "perish, yet live forevermore." God is perfect in his power of synthesizing events into the most meaningful whole they are capable of forming, but just what events shall occur as material for this synthesis depends partly upon the inherent freedom or self-determination which is the essence of every event-unit of reality. God can set limits to the discords or conflicts resulting from the plurality of freedoms, and in this way he is the "ground of order" or "harmony" in the world. But he cannot destroy freedom, and he does not wish to diminish it below the point at which decreased risk of conflict would mean an equally increased risk of the opposite evil, namely "tedium", loss of "zest" in the occasions. God has two natures, 1) the Primordial, which is "infinite," "unconditioned", "unchanged", and the home of the eternal forms, objects of his "conceptual feelings"—in so far, like the God of Thomist and other traditional theologies—but is not "eminent in actuality", rather by itself is "abstract," "deficient in actuality"; 2) the Consequent Nature which is finite, "conditioned by the creative advance of the world," and thus "fluent", "in a sense temporal," "concrete," "conscious". It is by the consequent nature that there is a "reaction of the world upon God." Thus God illustrates the chief categories of the system, in that his actuality, like all actuality, is essentially a sympathetic union of experiences responsive to the feelings of others and literally prehending them, and in that he consists neither of mere being nor of mere becoming, but of a) indeterminate but determinable future potentialities, b) the process of creative advance from determinable to determinate occasions, and c) the treasury of past becomings, past events, as "living forevermore," "immortal" in their indestructible being. The units of change do not change, events do not alter, they only become, but having become they belong always thereafter to the wealth of reality, which is enriched, never diminished, with temporal passage. The final tragedy is not loss of what has been actual, but rather the occurrence of suffering as actual, and also the non-occurrence of what might have been actual had the various freedoms been more fortunately exercised. Such tragedy is inherited by the consequent nature of God to whom it is "profane" to attribute "arbitrary power [see omnipotence] or mere happiness." Rather God is the "fellowsufferer who understands", whose joy has an "heroic" tinge, since it involves sharing in our sorrows. See infinite; time.

Principal works· A Treatise on Universal Algebra (1898), (with Bertrand Russell) Principia Mathematica (1910-1913), Religion in the Making (1926), Process and Reality (1929), The Aims of Education (1929), Adventures of Ideas (1933), Modes of Thought (1938). The Philosophy of Alfred North Whitehead (1941), ed by P A Schilpp, contains Whitehead's Ingersoll Lecture on Immortality and Lecture on the Good, also essays by various authors on Whitehead's philosophy, including "Whitehead's Philosophy of Religion" by J S Bixler and "Whitehead's Idea of God" by C. Hartshorne Probably for most readers Adventures of Ideas (especially parts Three and Four) is the best account of the Whiteheadian philosophy, though for the theology the final chapter of Process and Reality is essential.   ·H·C.

Whiton, James Morris: (1833-1920) A B. Yale 1853, Ph.D. 1861. Teacher, pastor, professor of ethics, Meadville Theological School 1893-1894, on staff, New York Outlook, 1896-1920.

Whiton was one of the active protagonists of the New Theology*.

Author of books on education and theology, including Gloria Patri, or Talks on the Trinity (1892); Miracles and Supernatural Religion (1903); Interludes in a Time of Change (1909).

J.W.B.

Whitsitt, William Heth: (1841-1911) Baptist minister and church historian. Served in Confederate Army. Article in Johnson's Encyclopedia, 1896, on Baptists precipitated the controversy over the introduction of immersion in 1642 and his resignation from presidency of Southern Baptist Theological Seminary followed in 1899.

C.H.M.

Whitsunday: The name of the feast of Pentecost* in the Church of England. The word apparently occurs first in the Ancrewn Riwle in the thirteenth century. A corruption of White Sunday, but authorities differ as to why the day was so called. See church year cycle. Cf. Trinity Sunday and Season.

W. M. Campion, The Prayer Book Interleaved (1872).

P.G.M.

Whittier, John Greenleaf: (1807-1892) Poet, abolitionist, and influential member of the Society of Friends* (Quakers). Author of "Snow-Bound," "Our Master," "The Eternal Goodness," etc He often expressed in poetry his opposition to religious ritual including the communion service, a part of one such poem, "The Brewing of Soma," has been taken out of context and is now widely used in Protestant churches as a communion hymn, "Dear Lord and Father of Mankind " The authorized biography by S T. Pickard is still standard (revised ed., 1907) but Albert Mordell's Quaker Militant (1933) is fuller for the anti-slavery activities. T. F. Currier's Whittier Bibliography (1937) is exhaustive.   E D.SN.

Wichern, Johann Hinrich: (1808-1881) He was the father of the Innere Mission—the national mission in Germany. He was its leading and foundation-laying mind, the aims of which have remained determinative. In practical life he was the director of the Rauhen Haus in Hamburg.
   Gesammelte Schriften (Hamburg, 1901-1908), 6 vols ; vols 1-2, 4-6, ed by J. Wichern, vol 3, ed by F. Mahling; M Gerhardt, Johann Hinrich Wichern (Hamburg, 1927-28), 2 vols   H.H

Wiclif: See Wycliffe.

widows, treatment of: Culture* sets the general framework of behavior toward the widow and there has been considerable variation in the treatment accorded them among different peoples of the world throughout history. From the first, the Christian Church supported dependent widows and orphans*. Widows were given higher status than women in general in that women could publicly work in the Church only as widows. Among the ancient Hebrews there existed the custom of levirate whereby the brother of a man who died childless was expected to marry his widow and carry on the family name. Thus the widow in this culture was looked upon as property to be handed over to the next of kin. In ancient China, while it was considered a disgrace for the widow to remarry, there was this same cleavage to the husband's family*. If the widow returned to her own parents, she lost all her rights in her husband's property, including what she brought with her. She usually remained with the husband's parents, if they were living, as their daughter. Perhaps the most degraded position to which widows have been subjected was in India prior to British control. There it was a comparatively frequent practice for the widow to commit suicide by throwing herself upon the funeral pyre of her husband.
   In the American colonies widows were held in high regard, a number of distinguished gentlemen having had love affairs with them. They had the life use of property left to them by their deceased husbands. In our own culture the attitude toward the widow has been inconsistent. She has been thought of at once as glamorous, yet dangerous, shrewd and mercenary, using her experience to secure a husband to support her. On the other hand the widow has often been considered timid, unsophisticated, the easy victim of those persons who would defraud her. This anomalous position of the widow in American culture persists although with some relaxation particularly in urban areas. Cf. suttee.   H.R M.

Wilberforce, William: (1759-1833) English statesman and philanthropist, born at Hull, educated at St John's College, Cambridge, who devoted his entire public life to parliamentary reforms. He opposed the war against America in 1775, and the war against France in 1792. His greatest achievement after twenty years of constant endeavor was to secure the passage of a bill to abolish the slave trade. He wrote on religious themes and helped to found the Bible Society*.   P.E.J.

Wilburites: See Society of Friends.

Wilfrid: (c. 634-709) Bishop of York, leading English churchman, monastic and missionary; champion of learning and culture. Life of vicissitudes and travels. Set precedent of making appeals to Rome. At Synod of Whitby was influential in securing victory of Roman forms over the Celtic. See Anglo-Saxons and the Introduction to Christianity.   K.H.C

William de la Mare: (died 1298) Oxford Franciscan and author of the best Bible Correctorium of the 13th century. With his pamphlet against Saint Thomas Aquinas, entitled Correctorium fratris Thomas, the Franciscan order took an open stand against the Angelic Doctor   S.C.T.

William of Auvergne: (died 1249) Predominantly Augustinian in theological method, his systematic monographs were of great significance for the development of scholasticism. He laid particular stress upon the independence of religious certainty and upon the idea that the unity of God already involves a triad.
   M. Baumgartner, Die Erkenntnislehre des Wilhelms v. Auvergne (Munster, 1900) , St Schindele, Beiträge zur Metaphysik des Wilhelm von Auvergne (München, 1900) , J M. N Valois, Guillaume d'Auvergne (Paris, 1880).   H.H.

William of Auxerre: (died ca. 1231) He shared with his contemporaries the growing influence of peripatetic philosophy in epistemology, and the exclusion of Aristotelian influence upon religious questions. Cf. intention, sacramental.
   Summa aurea (Paris, 1500 A D).   H.H.

William of Champeaux: (ca. 1070-1121) A student of Roscelin*, the father of verbalism or vocalism, whose doctrines, however, he strenuously opposed with his realistic interpretation of the problem of the universals* Abailard*, who is the chief source to learn William's doctrines, heard his lectures in the Cathedral School in Paris. William of Champeaux was a life-long friend of Saint Bernard* of Clairveaux, whose mysticism he shared. At the time of his death, we find him as bishop of Châlons-sur-Marne.   S.C.T.

William of Conches: (1080-1145) A writer of varied interests whose books comprise astronomical, physiological, psychological and physical subjects. Most outstanding was he in the field of grammar. His philosophical treatises show the influence of Democritus, Seneca and Cicero. In his scientific views William presents a remarkable independence from the church fathers   s.c.t.

William of Malmesbury: (died ca. 1143) Author of the De gestis pontificorum Anglorum to be found in the Patrologia Latina. This work is an important source to learn about historic personages such as Lanfranc*, Archbishop of Canterbury (d 1089), John Scotus Eriugena* (ca. 800-ca. 880) and many others.   s.c.t.

William of St. Thierry: (1119-1148 or 1153) Author of many exegetic and mystic writings of psychological penetration such as Libri duo de natura corporis et animae. An intimate friend of Saint Bernard* of Clairveaux, he led a campaign against Peter Abailard* with his Disputatio adversus Abaelardum.   s.c.t.

Williams, Sir George: (1821-1905) Born October 11, 1821. The youngest of eight sons of Amos and Elizabeth Williams of Ashway Farm, Didverton, in the County of Somerset, England. English Grammar School education. Apprenticed in a "draper's" shop in Bridgewater (1836)—"a careless, godless swearing young fellow." Following meeting in Zion Chapel (Congregational) returned to his shop bedroom to "yield himself wholly to God"—the beginning of a life-long lay Christian ministry. Entered employ of Hitchcock, Rogers & Co., leading London drapery establishment. Moved by the wretched living and working conditions of London clerks and the church's neglect of youth, he with eleven other young men met frequently for prayer in an upper bedroom in the shop On June 6, 1844 this fellowship became the Young Men's Christian Association*, an organization designed "to bring religion into the sphere of the daily occupation." He lived to see this "wide-spreading league of Christian youth" encircle the globe and to be knighted for its achievement by Queen Victoria at its Jubilee celebration in London, 1894. A great ecumenic lay Christian leader and a pioneer in social betterment (Early Closing Movement) he died at the age of 84, mourned by leaders of youth around the world. He was buried in the crypt of St. Paul's Cathedral.   c.p.s.

Williams, Roger: (c. 1604-1684) Banished by Massachusetts Bay in 1635, he became a founder of Rhode Island. A Calvinist, he argued for religious liberty on the basis of predestination. An unimmersed Baptist for a few weeks, 1639, he was separated from membership in all churches, 1639-1684. Contrary to usual assumptions, he did not advocate unlimited religious liberty, holding that "there could be no government in the world without the sword."   c.h.m.

Windelband, Wilhelm: (1848-1915) He taught at the universities of Strasburg and Heidelberg. He was a member of the Baden or Southwestern German school of philosophy. His general aim was to emancipate the cultural sciences from the course of the method of natural science. Religion transcends for him the empirically given. The holy or the divine is the normal consciousness of the true, the beautiful and the good experienced as transcendent reality

     History of Modern Philosophy, translated by J H Tufts (1893), Geschichte und Naturwissenschaft (Freiburg, 1894), "Das Heilige", chapter II in Praeludien (Tubingen, 1902), Lehrbuch der Geschichte der Philosophie, 13. ed., edited by H. Heimsoeth (Freiburg, 1935)   h.h.

Winer, Johann Georg Benedikt: (1789-1858) A German Protestant theologian who taught at Leipzig and Erlangen. Chiefly noted for a Grammar of N.T. idioms (1st ed., 1822).   s.m.g.

Wisdom of Jesus, the Son of Sirach: See Jesus, the Son of Sirach.

Wisdom of Solomon, The: An important Jewish apocryphal book, and so included in the Catholic version of the Bible. It belongs to the so-called Wisdom Literature*. It is of composite authorship, and was probably written in Greek, in Alexandria, in the last half-century B.C. Its first section (1.1-6. 8) treats of righteousness and sin, reward and punishment, divine justice and immortality. The second section (6.9-10.21) extols Wisdom as the supreme guiding force in life and history. The third section (11.1-19.22) is a panegyric of the Jewish people. Tradition has mistakenly attributed this book, like Proverbs and Ecclesiastes, to Solomon*. See apocrypha, Old Testament.   j.m.

Wisdom literature: Unlike the Torah and the Prophets, the biblical books of wisdom were the products neither of authoritative guardians of the cult nor of spokesmen of God, but of keen observers of human nature and patient teachers of the art of living. Their favorite medium of instruction was the mashal or proverb, the terse enunciation of truth that is self-evident and self-illustrative. Their teaching covered the whole range of human life and was expressed in a tone that is sober and realistic, sometimes spiced with humor and sarcasm.

     Much of the wisdom of the Bible is of great antiquity. Tradition speaks of wisdom as the universal possession of the Children of the East, of Egypt and of the South. Much of it was ascribed to Solomon*. (I Kings 5.9-14) The oldest collection of Hebrew wisdom is the book of Proverbs*. Parts of its nucleus of Aphorisms (chs. 10-24) may possibly hark back to Solomon. The latest part of the book (chs. 1-9) came from the late Persian, if not from the Greek period, and displays a high conception of wisdom as the well-encompassing intelligence of God, the first of His works and His helper in creation, the foundation of the world and the guide of man.

     The highest point of Hebrew wisdom was reached in the sublime drama of Job*, which Heine characterized as "the Song of Songs of scepticism" In its wrestling with the mysteries of life and providence, doubt rises to the vindication of conscience and of the transcendent nature and justice of God In Ecclesiastes* wisdom takes on a gloomy coloring. The reality of God and the moral government of the world still form the starting point of the sage's reflection, but he gazes with weary and disillusioned eyes on a world that is grey and chilly and on the pageant of human effort that is all "emptiness and striving after the wind".

Sapiential material is found also in the books of the Prophets and Psalms, in the apocryphal Letter of Aristeas (No. 187-300), Ahikar, Testament of Twelve Patriarchs, (see pseudepigrapha) Four Maccabees*, and especially in the books of Sirach and Wisdom of Solomon. The same type of teaching continues in Rabbinic* literature (Cf. Pirke Abot) and in the N.T. (Sermon on the Mount, James, etc.).

Beside commentaries on the books mentioned in the article, see T. K. Cheyne, Job and Solomon (1887) ; W. T Davison, The Wisdom Literature of the O. T. (1894) ; J. F. Genung, Hebrew Literature of Wisdom (1906) , D. B. MacDonald, The Hebrew Philosophical Genius (1936) , C. H. Toy, art. "Wisdom Literature," Enc. Biblica (1903). IV

                     s s.c.

Wise, John: See American theology, early.

Wiseman, Nicholas Patrick Stephen: Cardinal and first Archbishop of Westminster. He was born at Seville in 1802, died in London in 1865. After receiving the doctorate in divinity he became professor at the Sapienza, Rome. From 1828 to 1840 he was rector of the English College in Rome. He was co-founder of the Dublin Review. In 1850 he was created cardinal and appointed first Archbishop of Westminster. His remaining years were spent in lecturing, writing, and promoting Catholic social reform.   C.V.

witchcraft: Witchcraft in general consists in the use of magic* to injure the bodies or goods of others. Though witches may practice "white" magic, their activities are generally believed to be malevolent and the witches themselves to derive their powers from devils or other evil spirits. By reason of their magic powers witches are reputed to be able to produce or cure disease, to induce love or aversion, to "conjure" others, to give life to inanimate objects, to bring about storms and sell winds, and to fly through the air. They are often associated with toads or black cats, which are supposed to embody their "familiar" demons. Though the practice of witchcraft has existed all over the world from ancient times, the most extensive witchcraft persecution in the modern world began in Europe about the close of the Middle Ages and lasted until the eighteenth century. During the late seventeenth century it found echoes in the well-known trials in Salem, Massachusetts, and elsewhere in the American colonies.

See bibliography under folklore. See malleus maleficarum.   T P C.

witchcraft: (AS. wiccecraeft, fr. masc. wicce, fem. wicca, wizard, witch, and craeft, power, art) Supposed practice of malevolent sorcery, especially by women in league with evil spirits.

Among uncivilized peoples magic arts have a recognized place prescribed by socially approved priests or medicine men* But even in such communities there are often unofficial sorcerers who claim superhuman powers of calling up spirits of the dead, predicting the future, causing or curing disease, and otherwise affecting the tides of fortune Often such persons are hated by the official practitioners of magic* and become social outcasts, sought after by those who wish superhuman aid in secret, antisocial enterprises. These furtive contrivers of occult arts are the typical witches of our most ancient literature. Even when employed by kings they are regarded as beyond the pale of approved religion or morality (as in I Sam. 28), and usually there are strict laws against their activities.

In classical Greece and Rome witchcraft was outlawed and severe penalties were prescribed, but the laws were seldom enforced. During the first twelve centuries of the Christian era, ecclesiastical authorities generally doubted the reality of witchcraft or belittled its importance. But the schoolmen of the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, with their insistence on literal acceptance of the Bible, their professed elaborate knowledge of the supernatural world, and their ardent warfare against heresy, returned the belief in witchcraft to respectability and called on church and state to enforce the command, "Thou shalt not suffer a witch to live" (Exod 22 18). The Inquisition* blamed witchcraft for the swelling tide of heresy, and in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, church, state, and mob vied with one another in the ardor of their persecutions of alleged witches. In 1437 and 1445, Pope Eugene IV issued bulls commanding punishment of witches who caused bad weather, and in 1484 the bull Summis Dessiderantes, by Pope Innocent VIII, started a wave of torture and execution in which many scores of thousands were killed. Similar bulls were issued by Julius II and Adrian VI. Nor did the Reformation put an end to the terror. Luther joined in the denunciation of witches and there were many executions in protestant Scotland in the seventeenth century. One of the latest witch-hunting epidemics occurred at Salem, Massachusetts, in 1692, when in six months twenty persons were executed for witchcraft. Even in the twentieth century many ignorant persons believe in the reality of witchcraft, and some conservative theologians, especially Roman Catholic, defend its "abstract possibility." See, e.g., H. Thurston's article, "Witchcraft," in The Catholic Encyclopedia (1912). Yet probably most of the latter would agree with Thurston in denouncing the persecutions and in asserting that "in 99 cases out of 100 the allegations rest upon nothing better than pure delusion."

To most intelligent persons witchcraft is now of interest only for historical or psychological reasons. Psychologists regard the epidemics of witch-hunting, and the many voluntary confessions of black magic during such episodes, as examples of individual and social psychopathology, especially hysteria and paranoia. These epidemics serve as terrible warnings of the results which may be produced by attempts to suppress mental disease with cruelty. To liberal theologians they typify also the peril of setting religious dogma beyond the province of rational and moral examination

See A D White, A History of the Warfare of Science with Theology (1896), W S Nevins, Witchcraft in Salem Village in 1692 (1916).

L.H DEW

Wittenberg, Concord of: An agreement between Lutheran and Reformed theologians on the controverted doctrine of the sacraments reached as the result of a conference at Wittenberg, Germany, in 1536. The Reformed (Swiss and Upper German followers of Zwingli) agreed to Luther's view of the eucharist that "with the bread and wine the body and blood of Christ are truly and substantially present". They agreed also that "through baptism there comes to infants the forgiveness of original sin". The Concord was signed by Luther, Melanchthon, and Bugenhagen for the Lutherans and by Bucer (the convener), Capito, and Aulbert for the Reformed The Concord raised high hopes for Protestant union but it never received general official recognition and resulted only in polite correspondence and a temporary truce.

T.A.K.

wizard: Commonly regarded as a male witch, but more properly a magician or sorcerer.

P.G M.

Wizenmann, Thomas: (1759-1787) He was vicar at Essingen, Württemberg, Germany, for three years. Then he accepted a tutorship with a wealthy family. He overworked himself and ruined his health. He succumbed to tuberculosis. As a very spiritual-minded Swabian theologian and philosopher, he was not only able to continue but also to advance beyond the ideas of Zinzendorf, Oetinger and Collenbusch. Still more pronouncedly soteriological in thought than they, he struggled also much more seriously with the philosophy of his own day, and established a promising connection with the idealism of Hamann*.

Die Resultate der Jacobischen und Mendelsohnschen Philosophie (Leipzig, 1786); Die Geschichte Jesu nach dem Matthäus als Selbstbeweis ihrer Zuverlässigkeit betrachtet . . . (Leipzig, 1789); Göttliche Entwicklung des Satans durch das Menschengeschlecht (Dessau, 1792); A.v.d Goltz, Wizenmann, der Freund Jacobis (Gotha, 1859).

H.H.

Wobbermin, Georg: (1869-) He has been teaching at the universities of Marburg, Breslau, Heidelberg and Göttingen. He gives a most comprehensively methodical reflection on and exhibition of systematic theology. As adherent of the neo-idealistic movement, he seeks to realize for his time the best inheritance of Schleiermacher* by means of the religious-historical and religious-psychological stimulations in close association with the inheritance of Ritschl*. In careful delimitation of a priori rationalism, neo-Friesianism* and mere empirical religious psychology, he established his transcendental-psychological method which unites the fundamental tendencies of Schleiermacher and William James in mutual correction

Theologie und Metaphysik (Berlin, 190..), Der christliche Gottesglaube in seinem Verhältnis zur gegenwärtigen Philosophie und Naturwissenschaft (Leipzig, 1911), 2nd ed, Systematische Theologie nach religionspsychologischer Methode (Leipzig, 1924), 3 vols, 2nd ed, Schleiermacher und Ritschl in ihrer Bedeutung für die heutige Lage und Aufgabe (Tubingen, 1927), Richtlinien evangelischer Theologie zur Überwindung der gegenwärtigen Krisis (Göttingen, 1929), Christian Belief in God (1918), Nature of Religion (1933).

H.H

Woden, Wuotan: (Teut.) Wind-, storm-, and war-god of early Germany. As a wind-god he may bring good or evil to the crops and cattle, as a storm-god he leads assaulting hosts of men to cattle. As a war-god he early received human sacrifices and horse sacrifices, in later times the sacrifice was beer. He is also a god of trees and a god of fertility. In later times his day (Wednesday) is considered the best for planting and sowing. Like Odin* he is pictured riding a gray horse, wearing a cloak and hat and carries a spear. Corn left in the fields by the farmers is for Woden's horse.

F.L.P.

Wolfenbüttel Fragments: Lengthy extracts from the most important work of H. S. Reimarus*, published in seven installments by Lessing* (1774-78) while librarian at Wolfenbuttel, Brunswick. The last extract to be published, "The Aims of Jesus and his Disciples," is a brilliant anticipation of thoroughgoing eschatology, stressed twelve decades later by Johannes Weiss and Albert Schweitzer. The publication of these Fragments aroused a storm of protest and debate. The original manuscript is in the municipal library at Hamburg.

M S.E.

Wolff, Christian: (1679-1754) The first German to establish a "school" of philosophy. He adopted the theories of Leibniz, combined them with ideas taken from Aristotle, and modified them to organize his comprehensive system. He set rationalism and empiricism against each other to advance the theory that they are essentially the same. Every object has a rational and an empirical character which agree in results. Reason is deduced from the contradiction. Wolff unified German thought and developed a philosophical vocabulary that is still in use. See psychology, schools of.

W.G.H.

Wolsey, Thomas: (1471-1530) Born at Ipswich; educated at Magdalen College, Oxford, B.A. 1486, ("Boy Bachelor"); turned to Divinity (B.D. 1510), Thomist rather than Renaissance point of view. 1506, chaplain to Henry VII; Dean of Lincoln 1509; 1511, Privy Councillor, Bishop of Lincoln 1514, and Archbishop of York, 1515, Lord Chancellor and Cardinal, 1518, joint legatus a latere; 1529 Bishop of Winchester (in commendam); twice expected election to the Papacy. His main spheres of distinction lay in the field of diplomacy and in law. He attempted, and for a time succeeded, in effecting the "Reception" of Roman Law and Jurisprudence in English Courts. His downfall was caused when he failed to secure the nullification (miscalled 'divorce') of Henry VIII's* marriage to Catherine of Aragon. He died in disgrace at Leicester Abbey on his way from York to London to answer a charge of high treason   F.W.B.

woman, religious and ethical status of: Generally used to describe the religious, ethical and moral conceptions of women held by the dominant influential group in any society. These conceptions which go to define woman's status are usually first held by a person of great influence of the opposite sex, often a religious or political leader, and then gradually inculcated into the culture of the group. Thus woman's status today is not alone the result of conceptions held in present-day society, but a reflection of attitudes toward woman's conduct throughout history. Woman's religious, economic, ethical, and social status are all interwoven in cultural history and show her advance from subjection to men to somewhat equality with them.

Traditional attitudes toward women in our society are derived largely from the early Christian teachings of the Church Fathers. It was the Apostle Paul who expressed the earliest authoritative opinion of Christianity in regard to the status of women. Women he thought inferior. They must, he said, keep silence in the churches and "adorn themselves in modest apparel, with shamefacedness and sobriety." Women were all tainted with the sin of Eve and therefore needed discipline. The charitable work of the church was entrusted to none but women over sixty. Woman was dangerous to men, sex and sex desires sinful according to the Church Fathers. It was woman who had brought sin into the world. Marriage* although never explicitly condemned was placed third and lowest in the scale of Christian purity. Highest was absolute virginity, next, celibacy that is voluntarily adopted after marriage or after the death of husband or wife. Thus the view of woman as a thing both inferior and evil found expression very early in the history of the Church and while not accepted explicitly by all groups did find expression in the course of the Middle Ages in the idea of the subjection of women. On the other hand, it was medieval theory which developed a counter doctrine of the superiority of women. This was in the form of the adoration toward the Virgin* in heaven and the lady upon earth and it was this doctrine which handed down to the modern world the ideal of chivalry. Thus the cult of the lady was the mundane counterpart of the cult of the Virgin. The romantic worship of a woman as well as the worship of God was the necessary quality of a perfect knight. But chivalry* like asceticism* was practiced by only a limited group and yet it does show the inconsistencies existent about women, teaching simultaneously her superiority and inferiority.

Although a number of important factors have led to the emancipation of women in our Western society, many vestiges of these two earlier doctrines still exist in relation to the ethical status of women today and in the mores governing her conduct. The Industrial Revolution gave woman an opportunity to earn money outside the home and become economically independent of man to some extent. The extension of equal suffrage to woman gave to her to a large degree political equality. With these symbols of feminine emancipation and emerging equality with men came imitation of much of men's behavior and attitudes, such as speech, dress, smoking and drinking habits. Yet women have remained in the paradoxical position of being both dependent and independent, of resenting their feminine rôle whenever it does not carry with it complete equality with men, yet exaggerating their femininity in order to receive equal or special privileges. They appeal, in other words, to man's chivalrous rôle which symbolizes woman's inferiority and inequality of the past. Woman is still thought of at once as the temptress and siren and the embodiment of all that is kind, pure and virgin. She is recognized as man's intellectual, political, and social equal, yet sex differences still govern her ethical status in that she is bound by ethical restrictions unknown to men as well as being more restricted in her conduct by many of the mores common to both men and women. See double standard of morals, family, motherhood, widows, treatment of.

Willystine Goodsell, The Family as a Social and Educational Institution (1927); Una Bernard Sait, New Horizons for the Family (1938), Bernhard Stern, The Family Past and Present (1938), Kimball Young, Personality and Problems of Adjustment (1940)   H.R.M.

Woolman, John: (1720-1772) Quaker, mystic, social reformer. Woolman's quest for pure religion, which made him an American Quaker* "saint," and caused him to attack the evils of slavery, war, poverty, and greed, is recounted in his famous Journal.   T.E.D.

Woolston, Thomas: (1669-1731) See deism.

Word of God: In the O.T. we read over and over again of the coming of God's word to a prophet*. It was the spoken word of God · Also it was the expression of his power by which he created the world (Gen. 1.3). This word was found in the Torah* or Law, and it abides forever (Is. 40.8). In the later Jewish 'literature there was a tendency to personalize the concept, but it never became a separate hypostasis.

In early Christianity, the word of God was found not in Torah but in the message about Christ (Acts 10.36, etc.). I Pet. 1.23 speaks of Christians being begotten by the word, and Heb. 4.12 vividly personifies the penetration of the word, but it is still the message about Christ. Rev. 19.11 calls Christ the word of God and I John 1.1 refers to him as the "word of life." The prologue to the gospel of John*, however, goes beyond any of these. (1:1-18) Here we have a hymn to Christ as the word of God. Though it was interpreted by the later Greek church in terms of Stoic and Philonic philosophy, it is more probable that the evangelist used the term in contrast to Jewish Toraology, and with some influence from Hellenistic redeemer concepts.

Since the Bible* contains the written word of God the terms have been for many Christians identical. That has been especially true of those who hold to its plenary inspiration*. Especially in Lutheran theology has the concept of the "word of God" been emphasized. Most Lutheran theologians, however, would employ the term for the biblical message about Christ rather than for the literal text of the Bible itself. It is God's saving deed, which creates faith in the hearts of those who are saved. See logos, Mohammedanism. Cf. sruti.   C T.C.

Wordsworth, William: (1770-1850) English poet. An active boyhood in the Lake District, four years at Cambridge, and one turbulent year in France during the first stages of the Revolution furnished the background for Wordsworth's poetic career, the rest of his life was uneventful. The inner record of those years, which saw the development of his transcendental philosophy, are recorded in his greatest work, The Prelude (completed 1805, published 1850). Later he harmonized his views with the historic doctrines of Christianity, writing the result into the Ecclesiastical Sonnets (1822) Of the shorter poems, Tintern Abbey (1798), Intimations of Immortality (1807), and the Ode to Duty (1807) are among the most significant.

The best edition of The Prelude is by E. de Selincourt (1926), and there is a good one-volume edition of the Poetical Works by T. Hutchinson (1933). The standard biography is G. M. Harper's William Wordsworth, His Life, Works, and Influence (2 vols, 1916).   L.W.C.

World Sunday School Convention: See Sunday School movement in the United States.

World's Student Christian Federation: See student religious organizations.

Worms, Concordat of: An agreement between Emperor Henry V and Pope Calixtus II (23 Sept. 1122) concluding the investiture* controversy in Germany which had troubled the German ecclesiastical scene for nearly a century and had developed into an open conflict between Henry IV and Gregory VII. By the terms of this agreement, which was one of the earliest concordats, Henry V relinquished investiture by ring and staff and permitted the free election of bishops, Calixtus on his part agreed that all elections should be held in the presence of the emperor who would have the right to invest the elected ecclesiastic with the temporal prerogatives of the office. See concordat.   F.W.N.

Worms, Diet of: (1521) A convention of the estates of the German Empire convoked by Emperor Charles V* and held in the town of Worms to hear the case of Martin Luther* who had already been excommunicated by the Pope. Asked to retract his writings against the papacy, Luther declared. "Unless I shall be convinced by the testimonies of the Scriptures or by clear reason . . . I neither can nor will make any retraction, since it is neither safe nor honorable to act against conscience". Referred to the authority of the Church, particularly to the Council of Constance* with which he was at variance, Luther insisted, "The Church universal is the number of the elect". According to tradition, Luther concluded his self-defence with the words, "Here I stand I cannot do otherwise God help me Amen" Luther's courage won him admirers, but the Diet adopted an edict declaring him an outlaw On the following day Elector Frederick of Saxony took him into protective custody and concealed him in the castle of, Wartburg. Luther's appearance at Worms is a dramatic landmark in the struggle for free conscience. See Worms, Edict of.   T A.K

Worms, Edict of: Was issued by the famous Diet of Worms*, 1521, in condemnation of Luther's position. It was notable for its comprehensiveness in denouncing Luther's views, the severity of its penalties, and for its practical ineffectiveness It also attempted to subject the press to a rigid ecclesiastical censorship. See Reformation; Spires, Diet of.   G.R C.

worship: Worship is renewed self-commitment to God. (See God, prayer, Living Christ.) It is the practice of whatsoever rites, ceremonies or other means may serve to put the individual more completely under the control of God's creativity by releasing him from those enthrallments and constraints that resist this divine working. No one is entirely free of the bonds which limit the power of God in the life of man. But these conscious and unconscious resistances may be indefinitely reduced and some of them cast off quite completely by methods of worship. However, new resistances are always developing and so worship is required as a regular or recurrent practice.

While the forms of worship may be practiced by any one at any time, genuine worship is impossible until certain preconditions are met. These prerequisites are four.

The first requirement opening the way to genuine worship is the awakening of the sense of need for the true and living God. This is perhaps the most difficult condition of all to meet. Men very commonly have the sense of need but what they think they need is that which they have learned to cherish as the basis of their personal stability. No human being begins by finding this support and basis in the living God. Each child begins by finding it in the home. Finding personal stability in the home is not the same as finding it in God however much God may be in the home. After leaving the home, the child may seek the security and goods of life in some other established order, or in self-confidence, or in moral idealism, or in stoical resignation, or in clever adaptation, or in some illusion. But none of these are identical with the creativity of God, however much some of them may be the gifts of God. Not until these give way beneath the individual and he discovers the inadequacy of them all, will he turn from the gifts to the giver and find the ultimate source of personal integrity. No one can truly worship until he awakens to this deepest need of human life.

The second requirement is that he have some contact with people who do truly worship and who seek to commit themselves to the reality of God. Our appreciative awareness of realities most pervasive and most difficult to apprehend must be aroused and directed by participation in the appreciative activities of others.

The third requirement is that he develop some evaluative sense of the inadequacy of all other ways of living and some recognition of the superiority of life that is free of every other ultimate bond save that of God's creativity.

The fourth requirement is decision, made with utmost sincerity, and ever again renewed, that he will cast off every constraint that opposes the work of God in his life.

After these prerequisites have been met, the methods of worship are the following

1) Association with others who are truly and faithfully worshiping. This social influence is a powerful agent in delivering the individual from the obstructions in his mind and personality which prevent the creativity of God from possessing him.

2) Confession and repentance of sin. This means to search out and apprehend in their specific character so far as possible what these obstructions may be in one's living which resist the work of God. It also means to recognize that one's deepest sins are never conscious.

3) Repeated act of self-commitment to God. This must be practiced again and again. It means to resolve with one's whole self that one will meet every possible condition required to give God free way in one's life.

4) Facing the worst. This means to search out imaginatively the very worst that is likely to happen and learn to face it with the freedom and security of deeper self-commitment to God's creativity.

5) Aspiration after the best that one knows. One's vision of the best is renewed and clarified in worship.

6) Praise and thanksgiving, practiced not because God wants to be praised, but because this is the way that one exposes himself most fully and expansively to the presence and power of God.

Confession and repentance of sin on the one hand, praise and thanksgiving on the other, are perhaps the two most important parts of worship. The one cuts out obstructions in the personality, the other opens out the shut-in personality. Both clear the way for God's creativity to gain supreme control over the life of man. This supreme control and the goodness of life that issues from it are the aims of worship. See liturgics; liturgy.

B. E. Meland, Modern Man's Worship (1936). William L. Sperry, Reality in Worship (1925); Evelyn Underhill, Worship (1937); H. N. Wieman, Methods of Private Religious Living (1929); Robert Will, Le Culte, Etude d'Histoire et de Philosophie religieuses (1924). H.N.W.

worship of ancestors: See ancestor worship.

wounds, the five sacred: The wounds in the hands and feet made by the nails in crucifying Jesus Christ, and the gash in His side made by the spear of the Roman soldier as the Savior hung dead on the cross. Devotion to the five sacred wounds was widely spread during the Middle Ages. In many dioceses and religious orders the Feast of the Five Wounds is celebrated on the fourth Friday of Lent Cf. incense   c v.

wrath of God: Symbolical and inadequate language, necessarily anthropomorphic in character, used in an attempt to indicate the qualitative intensity of the reaction of God in the fundamental character of His Being as Eternal and Sovereign Holy Love against all that is not in harmony with His will. The doctrine of divine wrath, when interpreted as though that wrath existed or could exist in isolation from Sovereign Love (I Jn. 4: 7-19), has been presented in poetry and painting as well as in some theological statements in a form which constitutes a caricature of the character of God as He is revealed in "Christ who is the image of God" (2 Cor. 4:4, cf. Heb. 1·3; Jn. 14 9). It is helpful to approach any consideration of the wrath of God by noting N.T. references to anger in connection with the life of Christ. Although warning against sinful anger such as is involved in any uncontrolled and carnal indulgence of selfish and vehement fits of temper (cf Eph. 4.31; Col 3 8), a type of wrath or anger which despite its readiness to pose as "righteous" (cf. Ja. 1 19-20, Tit. 1 7) must be branded as a vice (cf. Eph. 4:26) the N.T. nevertheless recognizes, both directly and by implication, that in the life of Christ instances of holy anger do occur, and that such righteous anger is to be regarded as, and actually is, a virtue. For examples of such sacred anger read Mt. 23 13-33; Mk. 3·5; 10:13, 14, 11:15-17, cf. Mt. 16.23; 18.6. It follows therefore that righteous anger against evil cannot be ruled out as a mode of the essential character of love which is in Christ (c.f. Lk. 13 34, 19 41), and therefore, according to the Christian faith, in God. The Christian view affirms that since the Being of God as Sovereign Love is eternally holy God confronts evil* with severity, condemnation and opposing power, the wrath of God being in truth the wrath of His Sovereign Love, whose purpose in the manifestation of wrath, since God cannot deny Himself, can never be other than the overcoming of evil by His own Goodness and the establishment of the rule of His Sovereign Love. The wrath of God as described in the Scriptures is not only to be thought of as a reality but also as the present judgment of evil and the divine opposition to it.

Men have long experienced both the necessity and the difficulty of attempting to interpret the holiness and the love of God in such a way that what is regarded as the immanent tension between them does not become an irreconcilable contradiction or a religiously-unendurable type of antinomy between the holiness involved in Sovereign Love and the Sovereign Love affirmed to be holy. It is urged that if the divine love could abrogate its own holy wrath against evil (Rom. 1:18) it would not be Holy Love. Dispossessed of holiness, God could neither be nor supply the moral imperative and dynamic for man's ethical needs Even in the case of man it is pointed out that the absence of a righteous anger or wrath against evil indicates the absence of vital love for the good Again, it is maintained that if the holiness of God be interpreted in a manner which denies the conviction of faith that God's holiness is the holiness of His Sovereign Love, the result is a religiously-untenable doctrine in which God, dispossessed of His essential character of love, could Himself experience no triumphant constraint to seek and to save that which is lost. Such a God would be religiously valueless. In opposition to any exaltation of love to the exclusion of holiness, or to any emphasis on holiness at the cost of love, as if either could be ontologically abstracted from the other, Christian faith, while admitting that holiness and love may be distinguished for the purposes of human thought and necessary discussion, affirms nevertheless their existential identity in God. God as Sovereign Love cannot defeat Himself by being untrue to the character of His own Being which involves the divine fidelity to the objects of His own Love. Nor can the Sovereign Love which is eternally holy cease to confront evil with condemnation. Nevertheless if the fundamental character of Sovereign Love is truly sovereign it must be the Lord of all even within the Being of God Himself, "for God is love." Though Sovereign Holy Love may be concealed by its own mode of wrath which appears as though it were the contradiction of God's fundamental character of Love, the deepest Christian faith triumphantly affirms that the Reality of that wrath, experienced by man in terms of warning, chastising, cleansing or in any other way, is in truth the Reality of the Sovereign Love accomplishing its own redemptive and sanctifying purposes. Christian faith could not endure any doctrinal formulation in which the Unity of the Being of God would be defeated by the alleged antinomy of two eternal "sovereignties" within God, i.e., Sovereign Love and "sovereign" wrath. For while the character of Holiness is eternal in the eternally Sovereign Love, the wrath of that Holy Love must pass away from God's relationship to the penitent man who is reconciled to God through Christ. Ignoring neither the Sovereignty nor the Holy severity of Love the N.T. describes Sovereign Love as proving its sovereignty by "taking the form of a servant" (Phil. 2.7) and obeying the stern constraint of that Holy Love by "becoming obedient even unto . . . the death of the cross." (Phil. 2:8) The sacrificial love of Christ, manifested in giving Himself "for all" (2 Cor. 5.14) as the Victim who takes the sin of the world upon Himself and into Himself being "made to be sin on our behalf" (2 Cor. 5: 21), is acknowledged by Christian faith as the triumphant deed of God Himself who was in Christ reconciling the world unto Himself, "that in the ages to come he might show the exceeding riches of his grace in kindness toward us in Christ Jesus" (Eph. 2:7). For the Christian believer, God's work of reconciliation* through Christ is at once the supreme revelation of Sovereign Holy Love and an ultimate "mystery of the faith" (I Tim. 3 9) God is Himself reconciled to the world by His own work of reconciling the world unto Himself.   H W.J.

Wren, Sir Christopher: See art, ecclesiastical, Christian, church building.

Writings, the: See hagiographa; Old Testament.

Wu Shan Shê: See Chinese religions (under Secret Societies).

wu wei: See Chinese Terminology

Wundt, Wilhelm Max: (1832-1920) He first taught physiology in Heidelberg. Next he taught philosophy in Zurich. Last he was professor of philosophy at the University of Leipzig He was the founder of the institute for experimental psychology*. He owed his international reputation to his achievements in psychology. In scope of interests and knowledge he resembled Leibniz, but not in logical precision of his thought. He was equally conversant in the natural sciences and the cultural sciences. He developed a philosophical system that sought to arrive at a non-contradictory world view in which the totality of reality finds its place. His was a spiritualistic idealism, and idealistic monism. The fundamental characteristic of the psychical was for him a creative synthesis, voluntaristically colored He was opposed to a substantialist view of the soul. He postulated the law of the increase of psychic energy because the law of the conservation of energy was ill adapted to explain the evolution of the mind He not only pioneered in experimental psychology and physiological psychology, but also in folk psychology— the study of social groups and problems of the psychology of language, religion, art, and morality. He constructed his ethics from the standpoint of ethical personality based on the needs of society.

Lectures on Human and Animal Psychology (London, 1894, 2nd ed , London, 1896, 3rd ed , London, 1901) , Ethics, 3 vols (London, 1897-1901) , Ethik (4th ed., Stuttgart, 1912) , Principles of Morality and Departments of Moral Life (London, 1901) , Principles of Physiological Psychology (London, 1904) ; Volkerpsychologie, 10 vols. (3rd ed , Leipzig, 1900-1920) ; Logik, 3 vols. (3rd ed , Stuttgart, 1906-1908) , System der Philosophie, 2 vols (3rd ed., Leipzig, 1907, 4th ed., Leipzig, 1919) ; The Elements of Folkpsychology (London, 1916) ; R. Eisler, Wilhelm Wundts Philosophie und Psychologie (Leipzig, 1902) ; E. König, Wilhelm Wundt, seine Philosophie und Psychologie (3rd ed., Stuttgart, 1909) , A. M. Selitrennikow, Die ethischen und religiösen Anschauungen W. Wundts (Charkow, 1910) ; K. Thieme, Zu Wundts Religionspsychologie (Leipzig, 1910) ; F. Emmel, Wundts Stellung zum religiösen Problem (Würzburg, 1911) , W Nef, Die Philosophie Wilhelm Wundts (Leipzig, 1923) ; P. Petersen, Wilhelm Wundt und seine Zeit (Stuttgart, 1925) ; P. S. Hess, Das Religiöse Bedürfnis Eine kritische Studie anhand der Religionstheorie Wilhelm Wundts (St. Gall, 1935).   H.H.

Wundtian psychology: See psychology, schools of.

Wycliffe (or Wyclif) John: (ca. 1320-1384) English preacher, reformer and Biblical translator.

Having initially studied nominalism, he found his way to St Augustine and to the Bible. He accepted the metaphysical realism of the older scholastics because both Augustine and the Bible represented it. He felt that since Augustine and his pupils correctly understood the Scripture, they also rightly taught what was correct in philosophy. As a realist he critically examined the elements of his age. In social and political questions he advocated the overthrow of the old order in the name of a legal biblicism. His conjoined Augustinianism and biblicism became a strong, effective weapon in the realization of his reform-criticism of the church and its doctrine. Like his great contemporaries he exhibited a renewed interest in the City of God by Augustine, whose predestinarian grace enabled him to establish a new idealistic conception of the church, and to exercise a penetrative critique of sacramental doctrine. His biblicism made him a pitiless critic of the contemporary church. The great Hussitic movement was nothing but a practical realization of his revolutionary, biblically inspired, reform ideas. Cf. Bible, English, catechism; catechumenate, canons of various churches, Grosseteste, R.; Lollards; remanence.

R. Buddensieg, J. Wiclif (Halle, 1885); H. Furstenau, J. Wiclif's Lehre von der Einteilung der Kirche und von der Stellung der weltlichen Gewalt (Berlin, 1900), D Heine, Wiclif's Lehre vom Güterbesitz (Gutersloh, 1903); G. Lechler, J. Wiclif und die Vorgeschichte d. Reformation (Leipzig, 1873), 2 vols. B Manning, "Wyclif," Cambridge Mediaeval History (1932), vol. VII.   H.H.

X   Y   Z

Xaverian Brothers: A Roman Catholic Congregation of Lay Brothers, founded at Bruges, Belgium, by Theodore James Rijken in 1839, principally for the education of poor boys. In 1929 the Congregation possessed some fifty houses and numbered about 440 members.　　E.A.R.

Xavier, St. Francis: Born in Spanish Navarre in 1506, he became one of the first Jesuits*, and sailed in 1541 to blaze a trail for the Faith in the huge Portuguese Indian Empire. He was the first to preach Christ to the Japanese, and was trying to enter China when he died in 1552.
　　E.A.R.

Xenophanes: (c. 569-480 B.C.) Xenophanes of Colophon, Asia Minor, reputed founder of Eleatic* school, reformer in practical and intellectual affairs. Opposed anthropomorphistic conception of the gods, introduced monism· "God is one, supreme among gods and men, and not like mortals in body and mind (thoughts).₁ According to Xenophanes "Die Gottheit ist ganz Auge, ganz Geist, ganz Ohr," "The whole of God sees, the whole thinks, the whole hears."₂
　¹ H. Diels, Die Fragmente der Vorsokratiker, 11 B, 23;
　² Ibid., 11B, 24.　　P.R.H.

Ximénes, De Cisneros, Francisco: Famous Spanish statesman and prelate. He was born at Torrelaguna in 1436, and died at Roa in 1517. In 1484 he became a Franciscan, and in 1495 was appointed archbishop of Toledo and chancellor of Castile. The University of Alcalá was founded by him. He was created cardinal and designated Grand Inquisitor in 1507. Under his leadership the Moors were defeated at Oran in 1509. In 1516 he was appointed regent of the Kingdom.
　　C.V.

X P I: See symbolism.

Yahadut: See Judaism (Introductory).

Yahweh: See Jehovah. Also see cosmogonies; tetragrammatom.

Yajur-Veda: One of the four Vedas of early Hinduism, representing a later stage of religion than the Rig-Veda.* It contains a good deal of material taken from the Rig-Veda, but used in a different connection. It is highly ritualistic in character. The most characteristic features are the yajus or prose formulas which give the name to the book.　　C.S.B.

Yama: In the Vedas Yama and Yami are twin brother and sister who are the parents of the human race. A variant tradition makes Manu the first parent. Yama is the first to find a pathway from Earth to Heaven and becomes king of the blessed dead, though later he is also ruler of hell. He is most frequently known as the god of the dead.　　C.S B.

Yamato-Damashii: (Lit., "The Soul of Japan." Yamato, an ancient name for the region about Nara and later for Japan as a whole). The Japanese national spirit.　　D.C.H.

Yang and Yin: See Yin yang.

yantras: Mystic diagrams usually drawn on copper or other metal tablets which are believed to possess occult powers. Used in connection with an appropriate *mantra their power is irresistible.
　　C.S.B.

Yashts: Avestan* hymns of praise in honor of Zoroastrian* divine beings, some of whom (notably Anahita*, the star Tishtrya, Mithra) are ancient Iranian deities, and of angels (fravashis*); although later than Zoroaster, they represent in part an earlier religious stage.　　R.H.P.

Yasna: Zoroastrian* liturgies in the Avesta*. They include invocations to Ahura-Mazda* and other gods, liturgies for the preparation of the sacred drink (haoma), commentaries on the prayers, and the five Gathas (in chs. 28-34, 43-51, 53) containing the teaching of Zoroaster.
　　R.H.P.

Yazatas: The Avestan* term for the minor deities of Zoroastrianism* (literally "worthy of praise;" ized in modern Persian). They are subordinated to Ahura Mázda* and his angels. Although not mentioned in the Gathas*, they are praised in the Yashts*.　　R.H.P.

Yellow Hat Lāmaism: See Lāmaism.

Yellow Springs (Ohio) community: See communistic settlements, secular.

834

Yezidi: See devil worshippers.

yggdrasil: The world tree in Norse mythology, rooted in Niflheim, Midgard and Asgard. Its topmost bough overshadowed the hall of Odin.* Its leaves are always green. The Norns*, or Fates dwell at its foot, by the Urdar fountain. It is to be destroyed by fire in the twilight of the gods.

P.G.M

Yi Ching: See Chinese Terminology.

Yiddish: The vernacular of about two-thirds of Ashkenazi Jewry (i.e., ten or eleven million), derived from Middle High German, and fused with Hebrew-Aramaic expressions and survivals of Old French, and with elements of Polish, Russian, English, etc It is believed to have originated as a separate dialect about a thousand years ago in the Rhine provinces, whence it was transplanted by waves of migration to Poland, Lithuania, Austria, Bohemia, Hungary, etc. As a literary medium it was first used for devotional purposes, for translations of Bible, prayers, homilies, and ritual customs, and subsequently for entertainment, such as translations of popular romances and tales, and of original poems, stories, dramas, etc.

Because of its use of Hebrew characters, Yiddish was designated Ivre-Taitsch (Hebrew-German). It was also referred to as Taitsch, Juedisch-Teutsch, and Jiddisch. The Mendelssohnian Enlightenment (18th cent.), striving to adjust the Jews to European culture, stigmatized Yiddish as Jargon, a name, which, though carried into general use, is currently avoided as discrediting. Though a mixed language, it has acquired a character of its own, expressive of the inner needs of the Jewish people.

The Enlightenment movement among East European Jews in the 19th cent. as well as the nationalist and socialist movements utilized Yiddish for educational purposes. Through the skill with which they carried on their work, and through the labors of a number of gifted poets, novelists, and dramatists in Europe and in America, Yiddish —during the past half century—developed an extensive literature of high quality.

S. Birnbaum, Grammatik der jiddischen Sprache (1915-16) ; A. Roback, The Story of Yiddish Literature (1940) , M. Waxman, A Hist. of Jew. Liter., vol. II, ch xii; vol. IV, chs. vi-vii, xii, Weinrich, art. "Yiddish," Allgemeine Enzyklopedie, Yidden, II, 23-90; L. Wiener, Hist. of Yiddish Liter. in the 19th Cent. (1899).

s s.c.

Yima: The Indo-Iranian counterpart of the Vedic Yama*.

c.s.b.

Yin yang: See Chinese Terminology.

Y. M. C. A., Student: See student religious organizations.

Yoga: Literally the word means in Sanskrit "to yoke". Today it is used in two senses in India: 1) to denote a technique or system of discipline by means of which a yogin attains to moksha* or salvation, 2) to denote a system of philosophy, one of the six major schools that have developed in India.

As a philosophic school it takes its rise from the Yoga-Sutras of Patanjali, who borrowed heavily from the atheistic Sankya* system particularly the dualistic doctrine of the prakriti and purusha, and the belief that moksha lay in the knowledge of the utter separateness of matter and spirit. To this he added, however, belief in Ishvara*, a personal god, thus making his system, known indeed as Sankhya-Yoga, theist'c.

The Sankhya had asserted the necessity of attaining knowledge, but had not elaborated specific techniques for so doing This the Sankhya-Yoga does in great detail The Yoga-Sūtras furnish minute directions as to the steps necessary to reach the desired goal. There are eight stages, the first two being negative and positive ethical preparation, yamas and niyamas, then comes physical preparation, the asanas or postures of which there are many, and pranayama or breathing exercises (eight kinds); then follow exercises in concentration, the withdrawal of the senses pratyahara, concentration, dharana; contemplation, dhyāna, and finally Samādhi, first conscious, and at last super-conscious, in which all sense of subject and object is completely lost, and matter and spirit stand wholly apart. Complete deliverance is not, however, attained until after death.

On reaching the more advanced stages of Yoga the yogins are believed to attain to miraculous powers. Marvelous stories are told of their prowess in the literature of India and in the writings of some westerners as Yeats-Brown, Lives of a Bengal Lancer, and Paul Brunton, A Search in Secret India.

Various kinds of Yoga are distinguished: hatha-yoga, or bodily yoga which includes the earlier stages enumerated above as a preparation for concentration, but is also much used as a therapeutic technique for healing various bodily ills, bhakti-yoga attains the desired goal of union with god through devotion· raja-yoga is the yoga of concentration, and jnana-yoga is the highest type which attains through knowledge to the desired goal. See Hinduism.

F. H Woods, The Yoga System of Patanjali (1914) , K. T. Behanan, Yoga, a Scientific Evaluation (1937).

c.s.b.

Yogācāra: See Buddhist Terminology.

yogī, yogin:· A Hindu term for one who practices the yoga* discipline in order to attain salvation. Popularly used for any Hindu ascetic.

c.s b.

Yom Kippur: See Atonement, Day of.

Yorker Brethren: See River Brethren.

Young; Brigham: (1801-1877) Born in Vermont; carpenter, joiner, painter, glazier, left the Methodist Episcopal church for Latter Day Saints, 1832; Apostle, 1835; President of the Twelve Apostles, 1840; after death of Joseph Smith Jr., assumed leadership and led a group to Utah. (See Latter Day Saints—Utah). He made public polygamy in August 1852, started Salt Lake Temple 1853; built temple at St. George, Utah. Led settlement and development of Utah and was first territorial governor.

s.A.B.

Young Men's Christian Association, The:

The Young Men's Christian Association was organized on June 6, 1844, by George Williams* and twelve young men in London. The original purpose, "the improvement of the spiritual condition of the young men engaged in the drapery and other trades," was soon broadened until the American movement adopted the symbol of the triangle for spirit, mind and body to reach the whole man, and later the young men and boys of the whole world. Robert McBurney was the pioneer city secretary in New York who conceived and constructed the first of a thousand model buildings in America alone, now valued at over $250,000,000

Under Richard C. Morse and later John R Mott as General Secretary of the International Committee for the United States and Canada, specialized work was rapidly developed for city young men and for students in some eight hundred colleges, in the physical, educational, and religious activities, for men in the Railroad, Industrial, Army and Navy, County, and Colored work, and other departments. (See Y.M.C.A, Student.)

The foreign outreach of the North American Associations began in 1889 and thirty-two countries were eventually entered by some six hundred secretaries in its World Service to develop indigenous, self-directing, self-supporting, self-propagating institutions which would in time leaven the masses in their own lands. There are now some two million members in sixty countries endeavoring to offer a concrete program that is at once practical and spiritual, for individual character building and national regeneration. In countries like Poland, where 99 per cent of racial Poles are Roman Catholics, the movement is conducted within a Catholic framework entirely by Polish Catholic laymen. Among the Greeks or Russians, the Association is loyal to the Orthodox Church. In Protestant countries, it is managed by members of the evangelical Protestant churches, but it is an ecumenical movement loyal to all Christian churches.

The World Alliance of the Associations is under the World's Committee situated at Geneva, Switzerland. As the Association has just completed its first century, 1844-1944, it now enters upon a new century generally agreed upon certain basic elements in the YMCA philosophy as conditions and principles which must be realised for its future success· 1. It must be loyal to its dominant spiritual purpose as a Young Men's Christian Association; 2. This purpose must permeate with spiritual passion the whole breadth of its manifold work; 3. A bold and comprehensive program must be built upon the needs of each local and national community, 4. The Association must concentrate upon its field of the young men and boys of the nation and the world; 5. It must aim at sound but bold financing without debts or deficits; 6. It must be loyal to its tradition of lay leadership, as laymen sacrificially give their life, time and money to the work; 7. It must have adequate buildings and yet a community-wide program beyond all its buildings, 8. It must avoid selfish isolationism as a mere competing social and religious organization, but must cooperate loyally with the church, the home, the school, and all other social and religious agencies, 9. It must in its World Service outlook take account of all the four hundred million young men and boys of the world as its parish, 10. It must ever remember its objectives to build a new man and a new society, by a whole program of a whole gospel, for the whole man, the whole country, and the whole world

Sherwood Eddy, A Century with Youth One Hundred Years of the Y (1944)   S E.

Young People's Societies, Christian:

By "young people's society" is meant a local church organization of youth in the age range of 12 to 24, to provide a program of worship, commitment, testimony, Bible study, recreation, Christian service, and related activities, with or without adult sponsorship, but always more or less self-motivated and directed. It is the happy meeting point of a natural desire on the part of young people for an "endeavor" of their own, and of adult leaders' concern with the development and conservation of the religious interests of youth

Societies of young people for one or more of the above purposes were not unknown in Europe and America in the seventeenth, eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. Some were for prayer and devotion, some singing societies, some temperance, some missionary, and some very nearly like the more modern young peoples' society. Young people were, of course, also included in the Sunday schools. However, the active beginning of the wave of interest in young people's organizations in the church may be dated with the formation of the first Christian Endeavor Society in the Williston Congregational Church of Portland, Maine, on February 2, 1881 by Dr. Francis E. Clark. The Christian Endeavor society idea took hold on the imagination of people, and the movement spread so rapidly that in six years over seven thousand societies were reported, with a membership of nearly half a million, in the churches of many denominations, on several continents.

Christian Endeavor became a national and later an international movement, non-denominational in character, and made a bid to become the inclusive organization for youth of all evangelical churches, thus in spirit anticipating the ecumenical movements of today. But, whether due to weaknesses in the non-denominational idea or in the program of Christian Endeavor, or to the desire of denominations for holding and guiding their own youth, or both, it was not long until many of the denominations had set in motion youth movements of their own, notable among them the Epworth League of the Methodist churches organized in 1889, the Baptist Young People's Union organized in 1891, the Luther League of the Lutheran Church organized in 1895. Some denominations used the Christian Endeavor as their own youth organization, and local units of Christian Endeavor continued to exist in some churches of denominations which sponsored their own youth organization.

Though differing widely in purpose, structure and program, youth organizations in general hold these features in common: They include members of both sexes (there are some marked exceptions to this general rule), limit their membership to persons in the age-range of young people, engage these young people in active participation in program and work, have a strong religious emphasis with an accent on service, foster and maintain a bond of fellowship. They seek to win young people to Christ, build them up in Christian living, and train them for Christian service.

The very success of youth organizations has been one of their weaknesses. They have tended to be "another" organization in the church, often more in the church so far as place of meeting is concerned than of the church in organization and responsibility. In 1914 Walter S. Athearn published a memorable book, The Church School, in which he pointed out the way in which the church has been atomized into many subsidiary organizations and programs, with its attendant evils, so that the church itself has often been lost in the many lesser loyalties. This led to his plea for unification of all educational organization and program into a church school, which is still in process of being worked out. This emphasis on unification has developed to where it is now unity in the whole church program which is sought, so that there might be "a church and only a church", yet with desirable differentiation so as to provide for individual and group differences. In this process youth organizations are playing an important part.

The recent endeavor of every denomination as well as of interdenominational agencies has been to devise a plan for youth work which will at one and the same time provide youth with an organization of their very own, while yet keeping them consciously an integral part of the church as a whole. Within the youth division itself this endeavor to provide for unification and integration has led to the formation of youth organizations which are inclusive of all the youth of the church, and make provision for all the activities and experiences which should normally be provided by the church for young people. This is leading to the disappearance of the organized Sunday school class, the organized Sunday school department, the distinctive "society" organization, the club for through-the-week activity, in favor of a single, inclusive youth organization of the church. As a transition stage, these separate organizations may be continued, but some plan for correlation is provided so that essential unification may result. Out of this has come the Youth Fellowship of the Methodist Church, the Pilgrim Fellowship of the Congregational Church, the Youth Fellowship of the Evangelical Reformed Church, the Baptist Youth Fellowship, and similar inclusive organizations for most of the denominations. Program differentiations are resulting from this unified approach to youth work, looking in the direction of a more intensive worship and study program for Sunday morning, a discussion-forum type of program for Sunday evening, with provision for fellowship, service and recreational activities tied in to meet the needs of the whole youth group rather than as a necessary adjunct of each separate meeting.

This unified approach to the youth of the church lays a new burden on curriculum makers, that of providing the materials for a unified program. Steps in this direction have been under way for several years, and are coming to fullest fruition in the curriculum plans being developed jointly by the denominations through the International Council of Religious Education.

Christian youth in North America today are brought into fellowship through the United Christian Youth Movement, a cooperative program of national denominational and state and national interdenominational youth agencies, including in their constituency approximately 10,000,000 Protestant young people. This Movement, operating through delegated representatives, including adult leaders of the cooperating agencies as well as young people who are members of the Christian Youth Conference of North America, the Christian Youth Council of North America, and the annual regional planning conferences for youth, seeks to unite Christian youth in conviction, purpose, long-range objectives, and projects by means of which these convictions may find expression and these objectives be achieved. See Student Volunteer movement.

F O Erb, The Development of the Young People's Movement (1917) ; H. T. Stock, Church Work With Young People (1929) , N. C. Harner, Youth Work in the Church (1942) , I. K. Beckes, Young Leaders in Action (1941) , M. M Chambers, Youth Serving Organizations, American Council on Education (1937).
         P.H.V.

Young Womens Christian Association: The Young Womens Christian Association is an international Christian woman movement. The first Y.W.C.A. was organized in London in 1855, growing out of the simple desire to meet the needs of women and girls. In the United States, Association work for young women was begun in New York City in 1858, having as part of its first program housing and the holding of religious meetings. The present national organization, the Young Womens Christian Associations of the United States of America, was formed in 1906 by the coming together of two earlier national organizations. The executive body of this national organization is the National Board, with headquarters at 600 Lexington Avenue, New York, N. Y. President, Mrs. Henry A. Ingraham; General Secretary, Mrs. Harrison S. Elliott.

The purpose of the Young Womens Christian Associations of the U.S.A. as stated in the national constitution is as follows:

"The immediate purpose of this organization shall be to unite in one body the Young Women's Christian Associations of the United States; to establish, develop and unify such Associations; to participate in the work of the World's Young Women's Christian Association; to advance the physical, social, intellectual, moral and spiritual interests of young women. The ultimate purpose of all its efforts shall be to seek to bring young women to such a knowledge of Jesus Christ as Saviour and Lord as shall mean for the individual young woman fullness of life and development of character, and shall make the organization as a whole an effective agency in the bringing in of the Kingdom of God among young women."

From its earliest beginnings the Y.W.C.A. has always tested its work by its two major objectives, that of a Christian organization and a primary interest and responsibility in all that concerns women. It has considered increasingly important and necessary the inclusion within its interests, program, activities and its policy groups, of women from a wide range of social, educational and economic background and experience. In 1942 nearly 3,000,000 women and girls shared in the life of the Association, including business and professional women and girls, industrial girls, students, younger girls, home and farm women, Negro women and girls and girls of foreign birth or foreign speaking.

A major characteristic of the Y.W.C.A. is that of diversity, its programs vary from the simplest kind of service in terms of providing housing and food to the most carefully developed group work along accepted modern lines. The central emphasis of the Association in all its program is on the development of the religious life of the individual and the building of a society in which Christian ideals of living may be realized as fully as possible. Through a wide variety of cooperative relationships, locally, nationally and internationally, with social agencies, with churches and religious organizations, with schools and educational agencies and with women's organizations, the Y.W.C.A. brings to these groups its major emphases of Christian purpose and the interests of women.

There are in the United States at the present time 417 community Y.W.C.A.'s, 580 Associations of students in colleges and universities, 67 branches for Negro women and girls, 74 groups of American Indians, 13 International Institutes and 409 Registered Y.W.C.A.'s in rural centers. The present membership of the Association is about 500,000. See Y.W.C.A., Student.   M.S.S.

Youth Fellowship, Methodist and Reformed:
See Young People's Societies, Christian.

Yule: (M.E. yol, fr. A.S. gēol) The traditional English (esp. northern dialects) and Scottish term (occurring in many forms) for the Christmas* season and the festivities associated with it.   E.T.R.

Y. W. C. A., Student: See student religious organizations.

Zaddick, Joseph Ibn: (1080-1147) Appointed judge of the Jewish community at Cordova, Spain, he was both a Talmudic scholar and a poet. His fame rests on his philosophical work the Microcosm, written in Arabic, known only in Hebrew translation of unknown authorship. Though he wrote a general compendium of mathematical and philosophical science for beginners, his central theme was to justify Judaism before his own people and especially before the Jewish-Arabic intelligentsia. The trend of thought in his work Microcosm (Heb. Olam Katon) is Neo-Platonic, combining Aristotelian physics with Platonic metaphysics, ethics and psychology. As his Aristotelianism is probably derived from secondary sources, many of the Stagirite's ideas are misunderstood, giving rise to an increased sort of turgid Aristotelianism. Starting his metaphysics with proofs of the world's creation, of God's unity and his attributes, he tones down the extremes of Neo-Platonism*, seeking a level in which Aristotelianism and Platonism meet by compromising. His Microcosm was the first summary view of science, philosophy and theology in Jewish literature. He makes man's knowledge of himself central in his philosophy. Uncritical towards the various schools of philosophic thought, particularly of Plato and Aristotle—typical of the Middle Ages—he developed a harmonistic attitude in the presence of conflicting authorities. He argues that in the literal and positive sense no attributes can be applied to God. All of God's attributes are figurative expressions. God's essence cannot be known at all. We arrive at divine attributes by transferring them from God's effects in nature to his own essence.

M Doctor, Die Philosophie des Joseph ibn Zaddik, nach ihren Quellen, insbesondere nach ihren Beziehungen zu den Lauteren Brudern und zu Gabirol untersucht (Munster, 1895); L. Weinsberg, Der Mikrokosmos, ein angeblich im 12. Jahrhundert von dem Cordubenser Joseph ibn Zaddik verfasstes philosophisches System, nach seiner Echtheit untersucht (Breslau, 1888); I. Husik, A History of Mediaeval Jewish Philosophy (1941).   H.H.

Zadokites: See s.v. Sadducees.

Zahn, Theodor von: (1838-1933) German Protestant theologian. Born, Moers, Rhineland; in 1868 privatdozent Goettingen, 1877 professor of N.T. Exegesis, Kiel, 1888 at Leipzig, and from 1892-1909 at Erlangen. One of the leaders of conservative N.T. scholarship in the 19th century, of a most comprehensive erudition, aided by a solid knowledge of the ancient languages and gifted with keen exegetical insight, but sometimes straining the documents beyond the legitimate limits. By means of original research Zahn succeeded in many cases in re-establishing the traditional views concerning the genuineness of the N.T. books, the historicity of the records and the reliability of the ancient Christian tradition. His studies in the history of the N.T. canon are inexhaustible mines of information, and they advanced the study of that subject immeasurably. In exegesis he followed his teacher J. Chr. K. von Hofman* to a certain extent, without adopting, however, all of the latter's theological views.

Principal works:
Forschungen zur Geschichte des Neutestamentlichen Kanons, 11 vols. (1881-1916); Geschichte des Neutestamentlichen Kanons, 2 vols. (1888-1892) Engl. tr.; Einleitung in das Neue Testament, 2 vols (1897-1899, 3rd ed., 1905-1907, Engl. tr. in 3 vols., 1909, 2nd ed. 1917); Editor of: Kommentar zum Neuen Testament (1903, ff)   He wrote the volumes on the Gospels, Acts, Romans, Galatians, Revelation, Editor (together with v Gebhardt and Harnack) of Patrum apostolicorum opera, 3 vols (1875-78) ; Bread and Salt from the Word of God (in sixteen sermons, 1905) ; Autobiography in. Die Religionswissenschaft der Gegenwart in Selbstdarstellungen, vol. I (1925).   O.A.P.

zakat: The Moslem tax for the benefit of the poor.   The giving of alms is one of the five duties of Islam.   Alms were at first voluntary charity, but eventually became a system of taxation, not only for the poor but for the building of mosques and other community projects.   They are now usually left to the conscience of the individual.   P.E.J.

Zandīks: See Mani and Manicheism.

Zarathushtra: See Persia, religions of; Zoroastrianism.

Zealots: (Hebrew, Kanna'im) Name of a party opposing the attempt to bring Judea under the dominion of Rome . . . especially from the time of Herod (37 B.C.-4 A.D.) until the fall of Jerusalem . . . (70 A.D.) . . . some authorities trace them to a religious sect of the Maccabean period. . . . They were particularly active at the taking of the census by Quirinus, governor of Syria, in 6 A. D. . . . they were most influential in Galilee. . . . It was only after its capture in 67 A.D. that they fled to Jerusalem and took a definite part in the defense of the city.   They were fanatic patriots who would brook no compromise with Rome, and zealots for the particularistic fulfillment of religious laws.   N.G.

Zechariah: Companion book to Haggai*, Zechariah's four prophecies are confined to chs. 1-8 consisting of an introductory oracle on avoiding the mistakes of the ancestors, an eight-fold vision on impending international events, plans for coronation of Zerubbabel, and a long exhortation sermon on ethical living.   Chapters 9-14 consist of later supplements, mostly eschatological* or nationalist in nature.   Zechariah carried on Haggai's work, after the latter presumably died or returned to Babylon, delivering prophecies between 520 and 516 B.C. when the temple was completed by Zerubbabel.   He used the obscure vision to conceal his seditions from the Persian government.   Zechariah glowed with optimism, anticipating world revolution in which the Hebrew nation would be restored to power and all peoples would embrace the Jewish religion.   Zechariah was a priest, but with some of the ethical emphasis of the pre-exilic prophets.   See The Prophets and their Times by J. M. P. Smith and W. A. Irwin (1941), pp. 248-57, 285-89.   R.E.W.

Zen: See Buddhist Terminology.

Zend-Avesta: See Avesta.

Zeno of Citium: (ca. 342-260 B.C.) Founder of the Stoic* school at Athens.   A student of Crates, the Cynic.   He had a pragmatic interest in science for the sake of life.   Believing in suicide (like many Stoics), he took his own life.   His writings are lost.   J.E.N.

Zeno of Elea: (b. 490-85 B.C.) The Eleatic* and the father of dialectic* (mental experimentation), conceived of reality (mathematically) as constituted of discrete, non-extended points obtainable from repeated division of extension.   This permitted the conception of an infinite* number of non-extended points within a finite distance and provided the assumption for his tantalizing paradoxes.   See Parmenides.   P.R.H.

Zeno of Verona: Patron saint* of Verona.   Historicity of the tradition that he was bishop there, possibly in 4th century, and authority of the Tractates, is fairly well established.   K.H.C.

Zephaniah: First of the seventh century prophets, successfully breaking the seventy year silence during which all aspiring prophets were martyred, he revived the teachings of Amos, Hosea, Isaiah, and Micah.   He denounced the national degeneracy fostered by Manasseh and Amon, opposed the renaissance of heathenism, and inspired the Deuteronomic* reform, possibly assisting in writing that book.   Influenced most by Micah, Zephaniah was a proletarian among the royal family.   He envisioned all persons of class and wealth eliminated from Judah, with the remnant of the godly poor as the nucleus of the new Jerusalem.   Chapter 2, together with the eschatological and "day of the Lord" passages in chs. 1 and 3, are probably secondary interpolations.   Zephaniah usually is appraised on the basis of these spectacular supplements rather than his real writings.   His two notable addresses (chs. 1 and 3) probably were delivered in Jerusalem 332-330 B.C., and martyrdom may have followed.   See The Prophets and their Times by J. M. P. Smith and W. A. Irwin (1941), pp. 131-39.   R.E.W.

Zervan Akarana: "Eternal (or uncreated) time," mentioned in the Vendidad*; Zervan (time) in a later Zoroastrian* doctrine (first mentioned by Eudemos of Rhodes, a pupil of Aristotle) was either the primaeval deity, or fate, or one of two original gods. See Zurvan.   R.H.P.

Zervanism: (Zervān, "Time," Gr. kronos, cf. chronos) As Kronos is the father of Zeus, so in an old Zoroastrian myth Zervan is the father of Ahuramazdah*—but also of Ahuramazdah's twin, the evil Ahriman* (cf. Zoroaster's Gāthā, Yasna 30, 3-6).   Until recently this belief was considered a late aberration from pure Zoroastrianism.   The researches of Benveniste and especially those of Nyberg have shown that: 1) it is older than the introduction of the reformed Iranian calendar early in the time of Xerxes; 2) it is in the primitive and somber form known in Western Asia especially from information traceable to Theodore of Mopsuestia*, very probably the Magian form of ancient Median religion before the time when the Magi* adopted Zoroastrianism; 3) before the rise of the Magi in the West it was known east of the Caspian in some form to Zoroaster himself (note the Gathic verses referred to above), 4) opposed to the spirit of Zoroastrianism both in its oldest form and in later developments and frequently condemned by various types of Zoroastrian orthodoxy, it nevertheless left its mark on Zoroastrianism from earliest times onward, the greatest bulk of it which entered Zoroastrianism coming with the conversion of the Magi before the time of Xerxes and Darius, 5) a rather crude and primitive form of it appears as an accepted form of Zoroastrianism to the Armenian Christian Eznik and probably to Theodore of Mopsuestia as late as the fifth century A.D., a similar form being known in a similar way to Mani in the third century (cf. Manicheism); 6) in formulating a reformed Zoroastrian orthodoxy for the Sasanian state-church Kartīr (c. 250-290 A.D.) clearly omits and probably opposes the crude forms of Zervanism, as do later Zoroastrian theologians after him, though some of these give it surprisingly broad scope in their system   In spite of Mani's* use of the myth and in general of a strongly Zervanic type of Zoroastrianism in the formulation of his religion for Persians* the Manicheans, too, found themselves obliged to combat crude Zervanism far to the eastward, as their famous Confessional or Khuāstuānīft, even in its Turkish form, shows.   For further information one may see in English Emile Benveniste. The Persian Religion (Paris, 1929), pp 76 ff, and later, more elaborate, and better, H. S. Nyberg: Die Religionen des Alten Iran (Leipzig, 1938), 380 ff. and passim   M. Sp.

Zeus: See Aryan religion; Greek religion. Cf. Jupiter.

Ziegenbalg, Bartholomaus: (1683-1719) One of the two first Protestant missionaries to India—Heinrich Plütschau was the other. Although themselves German, they were sent as "royal Danish missionaries" at the direction of king Frederick IV of Denmark, in 1706. He did important literary work in the Tamil language, including a translation of the entire N.T. and part of the O.T.   C.S.B.

Ziegler, Theobald: (1846-1918) Professor of philosophy in Strasburg. He wrote a great many works on education. He demanded a reconstruction of society. The ethical free from all the supernatural was the product of societal evolution. It was society that evaluates the ethical acts, not the individual. He thought it highly questionable if the Christian world view was able to survive in view of the modern world view.
In Sachen des Straussschen Buches: Der alte und der neue Glaube (Schaffhausen, 1874) ; Geschichte der Ethik (Strasburg, 1886), 2 vols ; Grundlinien eines Systems der Ethik (Strasburg, 1890) · Religion und Religionen (Strasburg, 1893) ; Individualismus und Sozialismus (Dresden, 1899) ; Die geistigen und sozialen Strömungen des neunzehnten Jahrhunderts (Berlin, 1900), 2nd ed.   H.H.

Zimmerman Lectureship: In 1929 Dr. and Mrs. Jeremiah Zimmerman of Syracuse presented the Lutheran Theological Seminary at Gettysburg the sum of $5,000 to endow a lectureship on effective preaching.   A series of five lectures during Gettysburg Seminary Week is held each year on this foundation   Lecturers have included preachers of national reputation.

(Data from the office of the President of the Gettysburg Lutheran Theological Seminary)
                                          V.F.

Zinzendorf, Nicolaus Ludwig, Count of Zinzendorf und Pottendorf: (1700-1760) German pietist, religious reformer, founder of Moravianism.   He was born in Dresden, of parents affiliated with the Pietist* movement.   Spener* the founder of Pietism was his godfather.   Of remarkable religious precocity, Zinzendorf at ten was put under the severe discipline of Francke's* Paedagogium at Halle and at sixteen was sent to the University of Wittenberg, where the theological climate was anti-Pietist and orthodox. The two influences by action and mutual reaction stamped Zinzendorf permanently.   His theological position was closer to that of Luther than was Spener's, his emphasis being on simple, heartfelt trust in God through Christ rather than on conscious conversion or ardent endeavor after personal holiness.   He continued however, the initial impulse of Pietism in so far as it was a protest against high and dry orthodoxy and a seeking for heart religion.   It was through Moravian missionaries, disciples of Zinzendorf, that John Wesley* was led both to the discovery of the doctrine of justification by faith alone and to the experience of having "his heart strangely warmed".   He and the Count broke sharply however and decisively on the issue of sanctification.

Zinzendorf's activity as a reformer began modestly.   His idea at first was to create a Christian band or association the members of which by preaching, writing, traveling, and works of charity would seek to awaken living religion within the Lutheran Church   It was only with the arrival and organization as a social and religious community of Bohemian refugees, to whom the Count had given asylum at Herrnhut on his Berthelsdorf estate, that the opportunity arose of founding and directing a movement on international scale.   In Germany it remained for long within the Lutheran Church.   For foreign missionary purposes Zinzendorf permitted the independent perpetuation of the ancient Moravian ministry and in this way the Moravian Church (or Brethren) as a distinct Christian Church came into being.   The importance of Moravianism in the modern missionary movement can hardly be exaggerated.

See Bohemian Brethren; evangelicalism and evangelical revival; hymns; Moravian Church; pietism.
Sixteen Discourses (Eng. tr. 1740) ; Hymns (Eng tr. 1749) ; Lives by A. G. Spangenberg (1772-5; Eng. tr. 1838) ; F. Bovet (1860; Eng. tr 1896) ; W. Walker in Greatest Men of the Christian Church (1908). Cf. John Wesley, Journal; J. T. Hamilton, A History of the Moravian Church (1900) ; and L. Hennig, Kirche und Offenbarung bei Zinzendorf (Zurich, 1939).   C W L.

Zionism: The movement for the return of the Jews to the Promised Land, i.e., Palestine. Jewish tradition regarded the dispersion of the Jews as a temporary incident. Israel was punished for its sins, and the Jews were driven into exile. But Jews believed that there would come a time when God would forgive them and bring them back to the Promised Land. The Return was associated with the prophetic doctrine of the Messiah* and the Messianic days The Messiah would "gather the children of Israel around him and march to Jerusalem, and then after overcoming the hostile powers establish the Temple and set up his own dominion." (Jewish Encyclopedia, Messiah, Vol. VIII, page 511b).

Modern Zionism aims to utilize political conditions and methods to establish a publicly and legally assured home in Palestine for all Jews in need of a homeland, or who wish to link their destiny with that of their own people in a free land in which they would settle as a matter of right and not on sufferance. The Zionist movement was initiated and its ideology formulated in a book called A Jewish State, written in 1896 by Theodor Herzl, a Viennese journalist and playwright. The term Zionism was used to distinguish the followers of Herzl from the Chovevei Zionists (Lovers of Zion) who, since 1880, had carried on an agitation for the founding of Jewish agricultural colonies in Palestine with a view to the ultimate reestablishment of a free Jewish community The ideas of the Chovevei Zionists were based on the doctrine of Geulath Haaretz, the Redemption of the Land, as prescribed in Talmudic teachings. Heinrich Graetz, the author of The History of the Jews, wrote an essay in 1863 in which he endeavored to show that the Jewish nation was its own Messiah and should bring about its own redemption and rejuvenescence without waiting for the coming of the Redeemer. The growth of the sentiment to return to Palestine was due to the recrudescence of nationalistic sentiment throughout the world, which was accompanied by a parallel development of anti-Semitism. Rabbi Kalisher held that the salvation promised by the prophets could come only gradually and through self-help on the part of Jews. The thought of self-liberation was contained, in its most vivid form, in a brochure written in 1881 by Leo Pinsker, a Russian Jew. The Chovevei Zionists were inspired by these writings, organized groups in many Russian cities, and carried on a program of colonization and settlement in Palestine over a period of two decades.

Theodor Herzl formulated the thought behind these groping steps for a return to Palestine in his booklet, which he followed up with the preliminary steps for the organization of a public movement to incorporate his ideas. This was the Zionist Congress, the first session of which was held in 1897. The means suggested were to be "The Society of Jews" and "The Jewish Company", the first to serve as the legal representative of the movement, the second as the economic instrument for the building of the Homeland. The Society was to approach the powers with a demand for sovereignty over some part of the world surface, large enough to serve the needs of the Jewish people. Palestine was then only vaguely indicated. There was to be a complete break with the principle of gradual infiltration of the Jews, as practiced by the Chovevei Zionists. The Jewish Company, which subsequently became the Jewish Colonial Trust, was to be the executive instrument for migration and settlement.

Herzl's ideas were opposed by the Hebrew philosopher Asher Ginsberg, known as Achad Ha'Am, who placed the emphasis on the spiritual aspects of Jewish life and the need for a spiritual regeneration. He believed in the establishment of a national spiritual or cultural center to act as a centrifugal force against the disintegrating tendencies within Jewish life A renaissance of the spirit must come gradually through a process of education and development. Only when the spirit of the people had acquired a center, and had become centralized, would it become possible to establish the material counterpart of a rejuvenated Jewish people.

The Herzlian Zionists rejected the emphasis placed upon the spiritual Return by the followers' of Achad Ha'Am. Nevertheless, in the development of the Zionist movement considerable attention was given to culture and spirit advocated by the followers of Achad Ha'Am. Great impetus was given to the revival of the Hebrew language and literature. There developed a devotion to the traditional ideals of the Jewish people from a national view-point. The practical work begun in Palestine inevitably adopted forms which had their origin in Jewish tradition. Although greatly influenced by the teachings of Achad Ha'Am, the Zionist movement continues in the spirit of Herzl. It was in accordance with the foundations laid by Herzl that Dr. Chaim Weizmann pursued the lead in the direction of engaging the interest of England. The Balfour Declaration was issued by the English Government in 1917, it incorporated the purposes of the Basle Program formulated by Herzl Subsequently, the Balfour Declaration was made part of the Palestine Mandate issued by the League of Nations to the English Government.

The term used in the Basle Program in 1897 was "a publicly assured and legally secured home for the Jewish people in Palestine." The Palestine Mandate uses the formula of a Jewish Home. In 1942, the formula of a Jewish Home was merged in the idea of Palestine as a Jewish Commonwealth. Under the pressure of anti-Semitism* disseminated throughout the world by the Hitler Nazis, the Jewish settlement in Palestine grew in a most remarkable way. In 1917 the Jewish population was considered to be approximately 65,000. In 1941 it was estimated that the Jews had increased to over 500,000. They had settled in many agricultural colonies and developed many industries. They had conquered by peaceful methods many of the historical places in Palestine formerly occupied by Jews. They had acquired about a million dunams of land owned and settled by Jews. They had built the all-Jewish city of Tel-Aviv with a population of over 125,000. The ancient city of Jerusalem, formerly contained within the historic walls, spread out and a new Holy City was built and occupied by thousands of Jews. The Hebrew University, which opened its doors to Jews and Arabs alike, was founded on Mount Scopus, overlooking the city of Jerusalem, and a network of schools and high schools, carried on in the Hebraic spirit, was established. The peaceful efforts of the Jews to establish themselves in the Holy Land were interrupted from time to time by clashes instigated by the Arabs of Palestine, who were constantly being appeased by the Mandatory Power. During the second World War, recognizing that the totalitarian states were the enemies of the Jewish people, the Jews of Palestine in large numbers offered their military service to the English, but the Arabs were found to be largely envenomed by the Nazi spirit and refused to align themselves with the English cause. The Jews of Palestine had developed industrial and commercial resources which were placed in the service of the English cause, and they contributed substantial reinforcement of the Allied armies in the Near East During the second World War, the Jews were preparing to register their demand for the recognition of Palestine as a Jewish Commonwealth or State. See Israel, religion and theology.

Achad Haam, Selected Essays (1912), Theodor Herzl, A Jewish State (1896), Theodor Herzl, Altneuland (1902); Pinsker's Auto-Emancipation (1882).   L L.

Zoar, separatist society of: See communistic settlements, religious.

Zöckler, Otto: (1833-1906) He taught in Giessen and Greifswald. Conversant with the facts of the natural sciences, he wrote informative apologetic-historical studies with a theosophical woof. He was influential more through polyhistory than through the power of creative method.

Theologia naturalis. Entwurf einer sysfematischen Naturtheologie vom offenbarungsglaubigen Standpunkte aus (Frankfurt a. M. und Erlangen, 1860), Geschichte der Beziehungen zwischen Theologie und Naturwissenschaft, mit besonderer Rücksicht auf die Schöpfungsgeschichte, 2 vols. (Gutersloh, 1877-79), Gottes Zeugen im Reich der Natur. Biographien und Bekenntnisse grosser Naturforscher aus alter und neuer Zeit (Gutersloh, 1881), Handbuch der theologischen Wissenschaften in enzyklopädischer Darstellung, mit besonderer Rücksicht auf die Entwicklungsgeschichte der einzelnen Disziplinen, 3 vols. (Nördlingen, 1883-84), 4 vols., 3rd ed. (Nördlingen, 1889-90).   H.H.

Zohar: (Splendor, Brightness—derived from Daniel 12.3) A Jewish mystical work of diverse origin which became the classic text of Kabbalah* and the Bible of medieval mysticism. The Zohar is in the form of a commentary on the Pentateuch*, written in Aramaic and in Hebrew, which purports to be the record of the revelations made to Rabbi Simeon ben Yochai (2nd C. A.D.) while hiding in a cave for thirteen years, and by him transmitted to his disciples. This pseudepigrapha* was compiled by Moses de Leon, of Granada, Spain (1250-1305) and made public in 1300.

The body of the Zohar is interspersed and supplemented with special tracts and dissertations which together form an unsystematic and frequent-ly contradictory compendium of Jewish mystic lore on the nature of God, His attributes and dimensions, the mysteries of the Tetra-grammaton*, the evolution of the cosmos, the nature of the human soul, heaven and hell, angelology, magic and astrology, besides expositions on many ethical themes, on prayer and the recondite meanings of the commandments and ceremonies.

Next to the Bible, the Zohar came to be regarded in the centuries following its publication as the holiest book in Judaism and profoundly influenced the theology, liturgy, poetry and the messianic hopes of the people The Zohar also influenced Christian thought in the 16th and 17th centuries, and a considerable number of eminent Christian scholars were attracted to it, translated portions of it, wrote commentaries upon it and used it for purposes of Christian apologetics. See transmigration.   A H.S.

Zoroaster: See Persia, religions of; Zoroastrianism.

Zoroastrianism: A religion developed in eastern Iran as a result of the work of Zoroaster (Zarathushtra) c. 1000 B.C The prophet protested against a new teaching with extravagant emphasis upon sacrifice and the slaughter of cattle which he felt was undermining the ancient lore and endangering the material and social values of the agricultural, cattle-raising community. He condemned the priestly cults, repudiated his rivals' gods as demons and exalted the heaven god, Ahura Mazda*, the "Wise Lord" as the single divine power, embodying cosmic and social order, the celestial champion of the ideal. Two ways of life were in conflict, the good against the evil, and all beings, earthly and spiritual were involved in the struggle. Zoroaster challenged men to choose the good or the evil side in the battle Allegiance was manifested by good thoughts, good words, good deeds or their opposites. To those who chose to fight on the side of Ahura Mazda and the good there was promised a share in the glorious future when the final victory over evil shall be won.

After Zoroaster's death the religion spread westward to make missionary conquest of all the Aryan states of Iran. The high monotheism and severe moral idealism which the prophet made central in his teaching were diluted by the inclusion of elements from the religions of the western districts. Ahura Mazda was again surrounded by a court of old Aryan* gods whom Zoroaster had denied. The priests of Media, the Magi*, adopted the religion and introduced their ceremonies, magic rites of purification, astrology and the practice of exposure of the dead. The Persian rulers gave the religion the prestige of their power. In later centuries the Magian priests spread its influence to Mesopotamia, Egypt and Asia Minor.

The central emphasis of Zoroastrianism is on practical moral living. It has never sanctioned asceticism or world-flight. The good life is ethical life, loyally dedicated to the realization of the good society in a world finally freed from all evil. Two eternal spiritual beings are engaged in a cosmic battle to decide the issue between good and evil. The leader of the hosts of light is the high god, Ahura Mazda (Ormazd). Opposed to him is Angra Mainya (Ahriman), the spirit of darkness. All living things are involved on the good or bad side of this battle array, from celestial spirits and demons to men, animals, insects and planets. Closest to Ahura Mazda are the six Amesha Spentas*, the holy immortal ones. Originally they were the mental, material and moral values of Zoroaster's ideal community; then they became divine attributes. Later they were personified as angelic companions around his throne and became his executives presiding over various divisions of the earthly scene. Six arch-demons surround Angra Mainyu. The Good God is not omnipotent and needs the help of his creatures if the ideal world is to be won. Consequently there can be no free grace, no easy forgiveness of sin. Every evil deed is a betrayal of the cause and must be made up for by a surplus of good deeds. Ahura Mazda is altogether good and the creator only of good things. He is therefore not responsible for the evil of the world, all of which is created by Angra Mainyu. At death each man is judged by the weighing of his good and evil deeds and goes to heaven or hell according to the fateful decision of the scale. An intermediary place of both pain and pleasure is provided for those whose deeds balance. At the close of the world struggle, when Ahura Mazda has at last triumphed, these temporary regions of the dead will end. All souls will be purified by fire. A new heaven and a new earth will come into existence and the eternal kingdom of righteousness, happiness and peace will be established upon earth as Ahura Mazda intended it in the beginning before Angra Mainyu intruded upon God's good creation with his evil works. Angra Mainyu will then be banished to the realm of eternal darkness from which he came.

During five centuries following the conquest of Persia by Alexander in 330 B.C. Zoroastrianism languished. It was kept alive by the priests and revived under the Sassanian rulers of the third century A.D. The scriptures, destroyed by Alexander, were partially restored. Unfortunately the sections best remembered were the ritual and ceremonial books. The Moslem conquest in the 7th century almost crushed the religion. A mass migration to India* preserved it in a more hospitable land. Under scholarly leadership the Indian Parsis* are developing a critically renovated, historically oriented, modernized form of the old faith. See Chinese religions; cycles of time; Gabars; Mazdaism; Persia, religions of, sacred literatures; salvation; saoshyant; Zervanism.

M. N. Dhalla, Zoroastrian Theology (1914); M. N. Dhalla, History of Zoroastrianism (1938); L. H. Gray, The Foundations of the Iranian Religion (1929); A. V. W. Jackson, Zoroaster, the Prophet of Ancient Iran (1899); J. H. Moulton, Early Zoroastrianism (1913); J. C. Pavry, The Zoroastrian Doctrine of a Future Life (1926); H. S. Nyberg, "Die Religionen des Alten Iran," German trans. H. H. Schraeder Mitteilungen der vorderasiatisch-aegyptischen Gesellschaft (1938).   A.E.H.

zuccheto: (It., zucca, head) A small round skull cap worn by the members of the hierarchy of the Church. The Pope's zucchetto is white, a cardinal's red, a bishop's purple.   S.C.

Zürich, Concensus of: The document which created unity among the Swiss Protestants. Drafted by Calvin*, with the aid of Bullinger* of Zürich, it is Calvinistic in theology but Zwinglian* in language. It was accepted by the various Swiss centres, and by ending dogmatic disputes, united Swiss Protestants under one creed.   G.R.C.

Zurvan: See Persia, religions of; Zervan Akarana.

Zwingli, H. (1484-1531) and Zwinglianism: Swiss reformer, was born or free peasant stock. He was educated in Swiss schools and universities, and had some experience of monastery life. His father did not intend him for the cloister, and sent him to the university of Vienna. Presently we find him teaching classics at Basel. Huldreich Zwingli was already in training and outlook a humanist. Here he contrasts sharply with Luther*, who never wholly escaped from the influence of scholasticism. Zwingli early appreciated the need of a purer theology and of closer study of the Scriptures. He was also prepared for bold criticism of Roman Catholic sacraments, vows, indulgences, etc.

When 22, he was ordained and became parish priest of Glarus. His ten years here laid the foundation of his subsequent work. He began the study of Greek, improved his Hebrew and read the Fathers. From this period dates his opposition to the use of the Swiss as mercenaries abroad, while his criticism of French alliances was so outspoken that he had to leave Glarus. For the next three years he was priest at Einsiedeln, and considered this as the period when he attained to evangelical truth. He studied the Greek Testament and began to base his preaching on "the Gospel". He found in the Bible a sufficient revelation of God, and was willing to abandon the philosophy and theology of the later Roman Church. In the early Fathers he saw useful but not infallible exponents of the Bible. It is important to notice his definite recognition of the theological importance of Scripture. At this point he furnished a lead to the other Reformed churches*. During this period, his opposition to the papacy was sharpening, but he still hoped for reform from within the church. It was chiefly with the grievances created by papal politics that he was now concerned, but since the Swiss were very necessary to the pope's plans, Zwingli was leniently treated.

In 1518 he was elected people's priest of the minster at Zürich. Early the next year he began a series of sermons on the N.T. which mark the beginning of the Reformation* in Zürich. He used scripture to attack the abuses of the Roman church—e.g., fasting and celibacy. When the pope asked Zürich to abandon him, he proposed a disputation and produced his famous sixty-seven theses. The Council upheld him, and its decision gave a legal sanction to the Reformation in Zürich.

The Reformation became of immediate political importance in Switzerland. The Forest cantons were hostile, and it became necessary to win the support of Bern. This Zwingli won by means of a disputation held at Bern. Zwingli was apt to see the fate of Swiss Protestantism as depending on the political developments within the Swiss confederation, and he was anxious to reorganize the life of the country on the lines of representative democracy in order to offset the disproportionate influence of the Catholic cantons His subordination of Church administration to the state becomes clear at this point, and remained a characteristic feature of his thought.

Meanwhile he had become involved in controversy with Luther regarding the Lord's Supper. This finally led in 1529 to the unsuccessful colloquy of Marburg*, but the differences between the two men were never reconciled, and there emerged no united front to the enemies of the Reformation.

The action of Zürich in banning images and eliminating certain ceremonies heightened the political tension, and Zwingli advised to prepare for war. The struggle which he had foreseen finally broke out, and in February 1531 the Protestants were defeated at the Battle of Kappel. Zwingli was killed.

The theological system associated with Zwingli emerges clearly in such documents as the sixty-seven articles and the First Helvetic Confession*, (prepared by his disciples but based on his teaching). He is notable for the explicit way in which he asserts the supreme authority of Scripture, and for the decided nature of his break with the mediaeval church. He desired a reformation of government and discipline as well as of theology.

He believed in the duty of all in authority to rule in the name of Christ and to obey His laws From this he drew the conclusion that there should be no government in the church separate from the civil government which ruled the commonwealth. Zwingli did not share Luther's distrust of the common man, and he had no fear of popular government. In theology he was Augustinian, but he chiefly laid emphasis on the positive side of predestination*—i e., on election to salvation. His most distinctive doctrine is his theory of the Lord's Supper* He believed that this sacrament is not the repetition of the sacrifice of Christ, but the faithful remembrance that that sacrifice had been made once for all. His deeper conception of faith—which involved a real communion and union of the faithful soul with Christ—made it possible for him to preserve what was also most valuable in the distinctive Lutheran doctrine.

His characteristic theological opinions were set aside in Switzerland in favour of the more searching system of Calvin*. The change is marked by the Zurich Consensus* (1549). See Confessions, Formal, of the Christian church.

A Baur, Zwingli's Theologie, 2 vols. (Halle, 1885-9), H Bullinger, Reformations-geschichte, 3 vols (Frauenfeld, 1838-40) ; Cambridge Modern History, vol II.   G.R.C.

Zygomalas, John: (1498-1578) Greek scholar and first secretary of the Patriarchs of Joasaph the Great (1555-1565) and Jeremiah II* (1573). He was a friend of the Protestants and favored the Union of the two churches.   G.E.Z.